Acocks Green Neighbourhood Forum – written evidence (CCE0002)

Thank you for the opportunity to offer thoughts and comments relating to our experiences with Citizenship and Civic Engagement, which is duly submitted.

1. Citizenship and civic engagement is the ‘bedrock’ of our democracy. It encourages being part of a social community, having a sense of purpose and status.
2. Citizenship is about being part of a common group with rights and privileges, but also with responsibilities and duties. Also each individual, who is part of, or choosing to join an accepted community, would be expected to support the common good, the laws, obligations, and functions that make that group specific or distinctive.

An understanding of citizenship should certainly be encouraged as part of the educational process. Appropriate ceremonies could be part of this.

3. Civic engagement and citizenship should be publicly acclaimed and accepted as such, by formal rights and even statute. Each can be awarded a certificate on reaching the voting age.

This would also remind those who influence the nation directly and are in authority, of the position of a citizen and their role in society

An informed and supported civic structure and local engagement could act as a monitor of the progress of citizenship.

4. Our current laws and customs do not encourage active political engagement.

Perhaps consideration could be given to a compulsory vote, with the opportunity to vote for ‘none of those listed’

There are mixed feeling on the voting age being lowered to 16, as there are some very engaged and thoughtful 16 year olds, but until there is improved engagement with civic responsibilities and politics, it would be prudent to probably remain at 18 years.

This could be reconsidered if we can address an appreciation of community and citizenship within our society. As currently we are very poor with our youth provision and engagement.

5. Encouraging good citizenship, should commence at primary school and throughout our life experiences.
6. We are not generally good with citizenship programmes; in fact it could be argued that we are experiencing a decline in the civic ethos, with poor local-governance engagement and accountability.

Yes! Let’s have a citizenship ceremony, but it must be meaningful and have depth, with those having influence to also want this to happen and be successful.

Local authorities, answerable to their communities, should have more autonomy and less central government interference. We are also seeing an increase in corporate influence on our public life, with governments being influenced by “big money” and its political funders.

7. What responsibility should central government, devolved and local government have? Accepting that parliament is sovereign, the structures and processes that serve this principle, are often seen to be disfunctional and must address the profound disconnection between our governance structures and the citizen, as certain policies and developments are having a negative impact on our civic life, as we have known them. We are experiencing long-term systemic failures with a lack of real accountability, by successive governments, with poorly drafted legislation and poor evidenced public information. There is much work to be done to rebuild public trust in our institutions. We must re-emphasise the term service and less importance to self-interest.

8. Our values and principles were built and developed over time, by the efforts and sacrifices of our forebears, which are still worthy and deserving of support.

They should be held in common agreement, and in support of equality and a sense of purpose and a feeling of belonging and identity.

As inequality, or the perception of it, could have a profound impact on the success and cohesion of a society.

9. Yes, many communities and individuals do feel left behind and ignored, they see the loss of their local community structures and poor engagement with social structures and low resourced civic agencies. Closed Police Stations and Neighbourhood Offices, together with reduced library services and lack of youth centres and generally reduced community facilities. These are disappointing and unacceptable outcomes, as our civic structures are being systematically closed to the public and do not allow a reasonable level of engagement with our public agencies.

The acceptance of our social neighbourhoods and community as a delight, support and refuge is being lost to a feeling of despair and hopelessness. Young people, particularly, are looking for direction and meaning.

A start in addressing these barriers is an improved engagement with the public agencies and public realm to counter the faceless bureaucracy and corporate impunity.

10. A relationship between citizenship and civic engagement is all “one and the same”. As without social cohesion and cooperation we shall have a fragmented society that could have the unfortunate outcome of hostility and separation, each with profound implications.

Whereas, we can celebrate our individuality, we must be ever mindful of our common aims and responsibilities.

11. It is an advantage that we are able to communicate in a common language, in supporting our common ties and to prevent isolation.

12. To be a tolerant and cohesive society is what we strive for, but this is also inculcated in our hard won values and standards. But it is also necessary that these are supported by practical and meaningful policies.

Action Together – written evidence (CCE0048)

7. Please take evidence from NAVCA and NCVO. There are numerous national reviews related to the voluntary, community, faith and social enterprise sector that could contribute to this discussion. The VCFSE sector is absolutely critical in this area but too often is not included or listened to in shaping solutions. Big national programmes are not the answer instead we need support for grassroots solutions shaped by local people which invest in the whole ecosystem of the VCFSE sector.

Action with Communities in Rural England (ACRE) – written evidence (CCE0094)

Introduction

The ACREnetwork consists of 38 County level rural development charities and their national association: Action with Communities in Rural England (ACRE). Members of the network have assisted rural communities to manage and adapt to change for over 80 years especially over issues such as affordable housing, access to local services, health & wellbeing and rural isolation.

ACRE's evidence is being submitted on the behalf of the whole ACREnetwork and therefore encompasses both a national viewpoint on how a rural dimension to public policy has been addressed since the Act came into force and also a more local one, derived from 38 rural development charities experience on how this has been rolled out to local government and government's more local agencies.

This submission responds only to Question 9 of the Select Committee call for evidence, as it was felt that this question has most relevance to the rural communities that the ACREnetwork support and represent in national debate. Due to the unique make-up of rural communities, in terms of demographic, industry, access to services and development we feel that it is imperative that the Committee considers a rural perspective when answering the question about communities and groups feeling 'left behind'.

Question 9. Why do so many communities and groups feel 'left behind'?

Opinion polls and other qualitative and anecdotal evidence suggest that the prevalence of a sense of being 'left behind' is not just a phenomenon of relatively deprived urban areas but is also very common amongst parts of the rural community. It may be possible to identify specific urban locations where this view is concentrated, in rural areas it is more diffuse and affects particular sections of the population in most rural communities.

Since the 2008 financial crisis, and the fiscal / public expenditure action that has been taken as a result, rural areas have seen dramatic economies being made in public services of all kinds. These have included health services, youth provision, library services, public transport etc. In all these services the tendency of those managing diminishing budgets has been to look at unit costs of delivery to individuals and families and seek to reduce services where either the unit cost is highest or the least visibly damaging cuts can be made. For public agencies that serve rural areas as well as urban ones, this has often meant cutting rural services first. For those living in rural areas it is not a matter of perceiving themselves as being left behind, they are being left behind and left out.

Government has seen community activity and volunteering as a means of ensuring that preventative services can be retained whilst budgets are protected for acute and emergency response services. This is evident across many areas of public service from the NHS to the Police Service. Rural communities are rightly proud of their tradition of resilience and self-sufficiency. Many feel this tradition has been abused and resources have been wasted in national initiatives where the bulk of the available money has not been used to support local activity but instead to build up new agencies and activity within local government departments. Many volunteers feel de-motivated by a tendency to be ‘sucked-into’ the public sector and their highly risk averse procedures. This tendency for ‘top-down’ direction from the public sector results in de-motivation of volunteers and is true across many areas, from health and wellbeing services to neighbourhood planning.

The Committee asks the question of how barriers to active citizenship can be overcome. In rural areas communities have always looked to themselves to provide some of those services and facilities that the state provides in urban areas. They understand that this is part of what it is to live in a rural area. What they find hard to understand is why the institutions of the state are so reluctant to understand, and take account of, the realities for people living in rural areas. The most frequent anxieties the ACREnetwork hear expressed by rural people when it comes to getting involved in their community are:

- excessive risk aversion and its resulting paperwork within the public sector;
- systems that rely on fast broadband that they either cannot get or cannot afford;
- national initiatives that are clearly designed only for major centres of population;
- complex and expensive consultations over urban initiatives and a reluctance to listen to how decisions will impact rural people in their communities;
- being treated as ‘cattle fodder’ for national citizenship initiatives that do not understand the commitment that individuals already make to their communities in rural areas.

ESOL Practitioner submitting information individually

1. A sense of belonging. Involvement in local community.
2. More work in schools on welcoming new arrivals. Funding for volunteer coordinators to get more society members involved with others. More integration and engagement activities locally.
3. A focus on people helping others who they might not normally work/meet with. More emphasis on the benefits of volunteering. Good for mental health, useful contacts...Young people to all get involved in volunteering.
4. I work with young people of 19 and 20 who earlier this year had to ask 'what is a general election?'. These are people who've been through apprenticeships, or done A levels, and one got into University. This shocked me. How can you get through the whole of an education system without knowing such basics. Something is completely wrong! They had very little interest in voting. They don't understand about MPs etc etc
5. Education has a massive role. Especially in these days of social media where young people's news comes entirely from their newsfeed. Citizenship should be embedded throughout education from primary to University. There should be content on politics in the UK and the difference from other countries, especially where refugees come from. The function of democracy. Why asylum seekers come to the UK. What the difference is between an asylum seeker, a refugee and a migrant. Far more investment in EAL in schools. There needs to be a big change in funding of ESOL and the importance that it has in the education of adults. A national strategy and a national website bringing together all provision both voluntary and statutory. This could be one that organisations submitted their own information too which would mean monitoring it would be less onerous. Learning English is key but takes time. Those in work find it hard to learn and develop further. We are wasting people's skills. Educated people are working in factories where they could be working in hospitals and schools etc.
6. I like the idea but know little about it. Could it be a separate subject in secondary schools taking the place of a GCSE for all. It could involve volunteering and some discussion, course work that was generic for all.
7. Far more funding for volunteer coordinators to work with mixed groups. Eg. host population helping develop English language skills. This sort of activity needs coordination (paid) for it to be fully successful and sustainable.
8. People at the bottom of society feel left behind. Often this is the white working class who then feel resentful of others. FAR more community workers, youth workers, addiction counsellors, debt counsellors, advisors etc etc working on the ground so that families are supported out of difficulties. These services are of course also needed by BME populations.

9. People lack support. They are alone, lonely, struggling. Children's Centres have closed, youth clubs have closed. There are far less people looking out for the most vulnerable and nipping issues in the bud. With the emphasis on finding jobs, those who are bringing up families and not actively looking for work get left behind. ESOL access is difficult. Waiting lists mean those keen to learn have to wait. They are then confined to their homes largely and this means their mental health suffers, leading to further problems. Children have to help parents interpret. These children are denied the childhood they deserve. In many areas ESOL is patchy, especially rural areas unused to migrant populations but with the spread of asylum dispersal there will be a need for ESOL in all areas.
10. A lot of the time workplaces and schools are diverse but divided. People make friends with those similar to themselves. They stick with what is safe. Having fluent English for instance doesn't mean that people integrate. I think the British people are quite closed. We are not an open society who throw open our doors to entertain people in our homes. Prejudices feed down to children and need to be tackled through the education system. We all need to feel valued. Helping others makes us feel valued. We need to have less of an attitude of 'making people engage'. Immigrants need to integrate but the indigenous population have a massive role in this. Programmes in Sweden linking people together locally for meals, activities, hobbies, language learning, look really valuable.
11. Levels of English proficiency are very important. Funding regimes do not support intensive delivery of ESOL as well as they should. Due to challenges in their lives, refugees cannot always attend all classes. This may be a reason that colleges are sometimes reluctant to invest too much of their Adult Education Budget in this area, worrying about success rates. There is not enough ESOL. Waiting lists exist in most areas. There is a lack of national support – materials (eg. citizenship materials not updated), curriculum, training for staff, recognition of teachers as professionals. There is little national coordination. There is no long term strategy and plan. Often first generation migrants 'sacrifice' their lives and concentrate on the education of their children. The support that has been given to Syrian refugees under the SVPRS etc should be built on. People need support to make the most of their lives. They then benefit society.
12. The Syrian programmes are a good model. Methodist Asylum Project in Middlesbrough and Action Foundation in Newcastle both use heavy volunteer involvement to support English language learning thus creating bonds between the host and migrant populations. MIMA in Middlesbrough run a community day on Thursdays bringing people from all walks of life together for a free lunch and other activities all taking place in the one venue on one day.

Section 1: INTRODUCTION

1. The Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement was set up on 29 June 2017 with the intention of exploring citizenship and civic engagement in the twenty-first century. This written submission is a response to its Call for Evidence to try and better understand the nature of the citizenship challenge for different parts of society while also thinking about citizenship and civic engagement in a more vibrant, positive and integrated manner.
2. In line with the Call for Evidence, this written submission uses the questions set out as a framework to offer views. These views are drawn from my research and scholarly engagement over the past 17 years in an attempt to provide timely, meaningful and informed insights. Where appropriate, footnotes are used to highlight appropriate sources.

Section 2: BRITISH IDENTITY AND NATIONHOOD

3. Sociologists such as Durkheim have shown us that national identities and notions of nationhood are created through the establishment of ‘social facts’¹. Constituting a wide range of different entities to which specific communities, societies or states express emotional attachment, ‘social facts’ function by unifying notions of familiarity, nostalgia and security. In doing so, they become unquestioned and symbolise what is normal and normative. In other words, they represent and symbolise who ‘we’ are.
4. As regards Britishness, a distinctly British identity was only conceived in the late 18th century and was indeterminably linked to what made Britain ‘Great’ at the time namely Empire, Protestantism, warfare and industry². Symbolic of Britain’s global dominance at the time, notions of strength and power became normatively linked to notions of Britain and Britishness.
5. Prime Ministers, politicians and others in the public eye continue to routinely deploy such notions today thereby conferring such nostalgic understandings with popular legitimacy. Of course, continuing to identify Britain and Britishness in this way is extremely problematic not least because they appear irrelevant and distant to many in today’s British society³.

Section 3: VALUES & SHARED VALUES⁴

6. The term ‘value’ has various meanings. When considering ‘shared’ values, it is likely to mean something attributed with importance, worth or usefulness that is also likely to be a standard or principle of behaviour therefore deemed important in life and something to share with others. In this respect, values should not be routinely dismissed out of hand. However, all of us are different and we attribute different levels of importance, worth or usefulness to a whole range of different things hence the focus on ‘shared values’ and the need to identify that which we all or at least many of us might attribute with importance or worth.
7. Much has been made of ‘shared values’ in recent years as a consequence of cohesion and integration taking a more central position in policy and political discourses; a response to Britain’s increasingly diverse population and ongoing immigration. Perceived anxieties about increasingly separate lives and the spectre of terrorism have also been significant. Central to these discourses has been the need to improve understanding about different people and different communities at the same time as respecting their differences. In essence, cohesion policy has sought to develop a shared sense of belonging and purpose.
8. In recent years, the drive towards identifying shared values has been prominent in debates about ‘British values’. However as a quick reflection of recent Prime Minister’s understandings of what Britain and Britishness might be shows to illustrate, trying to set out what being British is and what British values might mean is extremely difficult.
9. For Margaret Thatcher, Britishness was about: individual responsibility and industry; the Protestant work ethic; the upholding of democracy; the promotion and spread of liberty; and the importance of the family as also Parliament, Church and Monarchy also. Thatcher’s Britishness was then without doubt patriotic.
10. John Major’s Britain was characterised by cultural imagery: of warm beer and cricket on the village green, of going ‘back to basics’ and the instilling of traditional values.
11. For Tony Blair, while rooted in social justice there was also the need to rebrand Britishness via ‘Cool Britannia’. Critics might argue that Blair’s Britishness also saw itself as an unquestionable ally of America’s interventionist foreign policies.
12. More recently, David Cameron combined Thatcher’s patriotism with Major’s cultural imagery when he said that British values were “a belief in freedom, tolerance of others, accepting personal and social responsibility, respecting and upholding the rule of law – are the things we should try to live by every day. To me they're as British as the Union Flag, as football, as fish and chips"⁵.

13. From Prime Ministers alone, it is apparent that British values typically fall into two categories: civic or cultural. In the former, you have Blair's social justice while in the latter, Major's warm beer and village green. Both however are problematic.
14. When trying to establish what Britishness is or more precisely what British values are, civic values rarely hold sway. Civic values relating to social justice, equality, fairness, democracy or freedom of speech for example are neither unique nor specifically British: there are few nation states which would not subscribe to them. So whilst British values may well be about all of these things, so too would the values of Canada, Germany, Sweden and various others. Consequently, civic values can rarely be argued as being the preserve of any one nation.
15. As regards cultural values, very few are homogenously applicable. Typically dependent upon the socio-cultural and socio-economic heritages of different individuals and communities, cultural values are as subjective as they are exclusive. So for example, while warm beer and village greens may be attributed with importance and worth by somebody living in a Cotswolds village, the same would be highly unlikely by somebody living on a Moss Side council estate in Manchester. In many ways, cultural values are therefore quite banal and meaningless.
16. Factor in differences in age, gender, ethnicity, religion, class, education and a whole host of other variables and the identification of even a handful of universally accepted values become increasingly difficult. And as British society becomes increasingly diverse, so the identification of a single set of values that have universal importance and worth – and are unique to Britain and its people – becomes a near impossible endeavour.
17. This can be illustrated by considering shared values at a local level. So if 'tolerance, fairness and courtesy' were seen to be shared 'Brummie' civic values, then what exactly it is that would make these unique to Birmingham and Brummies? Why would those exact same values not also apply to Leeds, Manchester, Nottingham and elsewhere? If those same shared Brummie values were cultural then it might be argued that these would mean Brummies attribute worth to Cadburys chocolate, Rover cars and heavy metal music for instance. If so, then what happens to those Brummies who dislike Cadbury's chocolate, choose not to drive a Rover or despise heavy metal? Are they then lesser Brummies because they do not share 'our' values; might their rejection of 'our values' be used to demarcate 'us' from 'them'?
18. What about those also who only come to Birmingham for work or leisure? Do they have to share Brummie values while they are in the city or can they choose to continue to uphold their own values characterised by where they are from? And finally, what about those for whom Birmingham might be where they live but may never be ‘home’? Are they to rid themselves of their cultural, national, ethnic and other affiliations and allegiances, of their emotional, spiritual and physical attachments in order to truly share in Brummie values? Consequently, establishing a set of shared values is extremely difficult and inherently complex.

Section 4: FUNDAMENTAL BRITISH VALUES

19. In 2014, Operation Trojan Horse laid claim to a series of allegations about a plot by Islamist extremists to take-over a number of Birmingham schools⁶. Derived from an anonymous letter first published in the Sunday Telegraph, it was quickly described as likely to be a hoax by Chris Sims, Chief Constable of West Midlands Police⁷. From the four investigations that ensued – the Department for Education (DfE), Ofsted, Birmingham City Council and West Midlands Police – while a handful of issues relating to governance were identified⁸ there was no evidence of a plot to takeover any schools and no evidence of extremism. All charges against five schoolteachers have been subsequently dropped prompting Baroness Sayeeda Warsi to recently call for an independent inquiry into the allegations⁹.
20. Shortly after the Trojan Horse allegations became public, the DfE published guidance about the need to promote ‘fundamental British values’ as a means of ensuring young people are prepared for life in modern Britain once they leave school. According to Ofsted, these fundamental British values are: democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect for and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs and for those without faith. Since November 2014, schools have been required to actively promote them.
21. The active promotion of fundamental British values therefore has – and indeed continues to be – framed within discourses about counter-extremism and the legacy of Trojan Horse. Resultantly, it has become very easy for Muslims to interpret fundamental British values as directly targeting them on the basis that the Government does not see them as being ‘British’ and also most likely to become ‘extremists’. At the same time, it has become very easy for non-Muslims to interpret fundamental British values as being necessary because Muslims need to be ‘more British’ and are a ‘problem’ that needs ‘solving’¹⁰. To this extent, similar was voiced by Prime Minister Cameron in a speech to mark the 800th anniversary of the Magna Carta; reported in the British press as ‘Be more British Cameron tells UK Muslims’ (Walters, 2014).

22. Despite being hollow, such statements are concerning as they appeal to common-sense: if Muslims are different and separate, then requiring them to be more like ‘us’ cannot be problematic. As such, it becomes common-sense to believe that Muslims are different and separate to the extent that their difference informs and duly becomes all that ‘they’ are seen to be. When political discourses – especially those from Prime Ministers - infer such, then fundamental British values appear as being far from impractical, unreasonable or extreme.
23. While so, they are concerning in that they deploy hollow and meaningless notions of identity that in turn confer legitimacy on the process of demarcating ‘them’ (Muslims) from ‘us’ (the British). In doing so, they construct an ‘Other’ through accentuating how different ‘they’ are from ‘us’, a process that would appear to be at complete odds with what they seek to achieve.

Section 5: ALTERNATIVE APPROACHES

33. There are some alternative approaches to bringing people together. One is to consider what it is that people value about the place they live in. Rather than trying to establish a set of British or Brummie values, processes are instead put in place that seek to better understand what it is that is unique, important and valued about living in Britain or Birmingham. Not only does this provide an opportunity to engage people irrespective of difference, so too does it provides an opportunity to understand what is unique about the country to the myriad of people who participate in British society in a myriad number of ways.
34. The opening question for this not only acknowledges the heterogeneity – the complexity and diversity - of today’s Britain but so too does it provide opportunities for the homogeneity of Britain’s diverse population to come through equally. As such, all are able to share what they value.
35. Another approach is to explore the value of experience. In doing so, what is explored is that which brings people together and what experiences they share. This is pertinent because many people feel that their city or where they live is important to their sense of belonging and home. While so, everyday experiences can – at times - be somewhat mundane. While so, they remain undeniably meaningful to individuals and communities. Exploring the everyday lives of British people therefore provides an opportunity to construct a better picture and understanding of how our diverse histories and journeys intersect. From here, it is possible to find narratives that form the basis for a greater sense of togetherness.

36. Another alternative is for Britain's diversity to be seen, utilised and duly spoken about as being an asset. An excellent example of this is illustrated in both the bid to win and subsequent host the London 2012 Olympic Games. During the presentation by Britain's Bid Committee in 2005 in trying to secure the right to host the Games in 2012, Britain's – and more specifically London's – diversity was seen to be of value. Committee members spoke about how 'our' diversity offered significant opportunity and that it was a living success. This message was reinforced in an accompanying multi-story film titled, The World in One City. After its screening the then Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone added that "London is a city that welcomes the world with open arms...a city where 300 languages are spoken every day and the people who speak them, live together happily...". This was followed by Lord Sebastian Coe who said London was a "multicultural mix of 200 nations...[where] families have come from every continent. They practice every religion and every faith. What unites them is London". As he put it, it was the place and the experience of sharing London that made it – and Britain – special and unique.
37. The same was true of the opening ceremony in 2012 when British identity was not only multicultural and diverse but more importantly, valuing of it. Directed by Oscar winning film director Danny Boyle, the ceremony began with a short film of the River Thames tracing its way through Britain to London. From there, various large-scale tableaux drew in various junctures of British social, cultural and political history including the Industrial Revolution, the two World Wars, the swinging sixties, the monarchy and James Bond among others. While the monarchy and Bond nodded towards notions of empire and privilege, these were counter-balanced by nods towards Britain's more progressive politics, evident in references to suffrage, and trade unions. The ceremony also incorporated the arrival of the first Commonwealth migrants on the Empire Windrush and gave recognition to black and ethnic minority Britons via their role within the National Health Service and among others, through the projection of Britain's first televised interracial kiss onto the side of the house during the 'social media' interlude, a piece that also focused on the lives of two visibly non-white actors.
38. Successfully merging the old with the new, one of the most striking features of the ceremony was how Boyle deployed black and minority ethnic performers. In being ever prominent, they were used in ways that rendered many of Britain's pre-mass migration historical junctures inaccurate. Yet at no time was Britain's history threatened, criticised or seen to be having unfair demands placed on it. Because of this, the ceremony conveyed a very traditional vision and notion of Britain and Britishness at the same time as conveying one that seemed to truly understand and reflect who and what Britain and Britishness is today. As Tim Soutphommasane in The Guardian put it, "Danny Boyle's opening ceremony did the most to define the legacy of the Games...It was a convincing argument that Britishness wasn't about nostalgic yearning for the stuff of an imperial past, but something that existed in the present and future"¹¹.

39. What the 2012 London Games highlighted was that Britain's diversity was a fact.
40. Paradoxically however, while Britain was self-aggrandising to a global audience about how successful its world in one city approach had been, about how Britain's tolerance, equality and sense of fairness was something from which the entire world could learn, subsequent British governments, various politicians and others in the public eye had also been repeatedly using those very same things to tell the British people the complete opposite, oft recounting just how unsuccessful - and failing - Britain's diversity not only has been but so too continues to be¹².

Section 6: CONCLUSION

41. Establishing a coherent and unique set of shared British values is extremely complex and fraught with difficulties. Civic values are rarely ever distinctive and unique to any given nation while cultural values rarely tend to be meaningful to everyone in society.
42. Notions of British identity and British nationhood are rooted in a relatively short but extremely distinct historical period. Consequently, British identity and nationhood is typically associated with power and strength and thereby Empire, war and what made Britain historically 'Great'. Continuing with the same notions today fails to take into account Britain in the 21st century whether in terms of its diverse population or its place in the world.
43. Fundamental British values are problematic in that they comprise civic values they fail to incorporate exactly what it means to be British. They are also problematic on the basis that they are framed in counter-extremism policies and discourses.
44. Political and other voices in the public space have used British identity, nationhood and British values in ways that have conferred legitimacy on demarcating 'them' from 'us'. In this way, fundamental British values can be argued as being counter-productive.
45. When exploring what brings us together, it is necessary to reach out to Britain's heterogeneity. Whether in terms of place or experience, a better picture and understanding of how our diverse journeys and histories intersect is long overdue. However, from these it is possible that narratives will the potential to form the basis for a greater sense of togetherness will begin to emerge.

46. Communicating Britain's diversity as being a valuable asset has been shown to be effective and successful. A greater emphasis on our diversity as being successful and valuable in the public and political spaces has the very real potential of not only changing attitudes – and what is seen to be common-sense about our diversity and differences – but so bringing more people together.
47. Those in the public and political spaces must be challenged when they use Britain's diversity as a means to create tensions and divisions. In a post-Brexit context, this is especially important.
48. As the London 2012 Games opening ceremony showed, it is possible for a very traditional vision and notion of Britain and Britishness to be conveyed that simultaneously recognises and incorporates a very real understanding of who and what Britain and Britishness is today. More of this is necessary if we are to truly feel as though we all belong.

Allerdale Borough Council – written evidence (CCE0175)

1. Civic engagement is a crucial element of citizenship, whether a limited personal involvement or a fuller more political involvement. It provides the opportunity to ensure local people can have, or grow, and maintain a sense of belonging to an area. Our local citizen surveys tell us that people do have a strong sense of belonging to the area, however if the area achieves the business and population growth we anticipate, we need to know and be able to ensure the national policies for civic engagement are clear, supportive and flexible for the future.

2. Understanding how society and its governance works, at a national and more pertinently at a local level, is important in comprehending what citizenship is and can be. Rather than promoting ceremonial expressions of citizenship, it feels more important to engender this understanding in individual citizens from an early age for those born here, or early in the introduction to the way of life in this country for those coming to live here. To make this effective, we feel it needs to be interactive and exciting, and not delivered as a dry lecture or instruction.

3. No specific comment.

4. In our experience involvement in local democracy (for example as Councillors) primarily attracts older citizens, yet we are aware young people are interested in local issues which affect them, and often express their views though not through the ballot box, partly because they feel they are not being listened to. Rationalising legislation so that young people's rights are age aligned would in part resolve this. Finding other ways of engaging people, for example through allowing electronic voting would potentially encourage a larger number of people to become involved, We are aware that the Youth Parliament engages with alternative voting methods. We would advocate further work to allow these methods to include other citizens.

5. As indicated at 2, good citizenship should be supported through education for all ages and abilities. The provision of this education should be sufficiently interesting so that it should not need to be 'compulsory' but should emphasis political participation as indicated. Key to this is citizens understanding the process, structure of, and how to influence or be part of decision making processes in this country.

6. We are aware of other schemes to encourage citizenship, such as for those on limited incomes being offered council tax reductions in return for voluntary work, or young peoples' 'dreamscheme' projects which offer rewards for socially beneficial activity. Such opportunities might extend to all citizens. Any such schemes need to focus on creating the conditions in which people see the benefit of becoming involved rather than being made compulsory. Compulsory involvement may have greater acceptance if it were a universal expectation as it is in parts of Europe, though we would question whether it is feasible to introduce that at this time.

7. If there is an accepted understanding of what civic engagement means for the individual, then it may be easier to engage organisations at all levels to support the general principles. In the same way that public engagement and supportive legislation has begun to change attitudes to certain equality issues and minorities, the process of encouraging a greater civic engagement will need a multi-faceted approach, but one which does not begin with the imposition of legislation.

8. See the answers at 4, 5, 6 and 7.

9. Divisions in society and groups feeling 'left behind' has also become a multi-faceted problem with no specific answer. However there may be a crucial difference here: that engagement and conversation with particular groups could potentially elicit their views about what would enable better engagement for them. Of course this is said while also recognising that what people identify for themselves may not necessarily be the best method of engagement for them, and what actually is required is people skilled in engaging with these groups being given time to develop effective working relationships, which may take several years.

10. Diversity and integration are not visibly major issues in this area. To some extent the answer to this will lie in ensuring any educational approaches are diverse in their content and approach to delivery, and at the same time explicit about the expectations of citizens and their engagement with each other and society as a whole. If we recognise that some groups feel left out or left behind, the challenge is to ensure any new initiatives need to address the issue head on.

Nation: the missing piece of the debate on citizenship

There is an important missing point in the whole debate about citizenship. As evident in the questions asked by the Select Committee, the focus is on civic participation, active political engagement, citizenship ceremonies, pride and values. Yet, nation, the main social glue that brings people together, is missing. It is not mentioned in any of the twelve questions. This is even more surprising if one considers that nation is the most powerful force that can drive people together... as much as it can drive them apart. And this is maybe why the Select Committee, like many other academic scholars who have been trying to answer the question of how to live together with difference (Antonsich and Matejskova, 2015), seems to have deliberately eschewed 'nation'. This register is in fact often treated as a site of oppression, discrimination, and marginalization of religious, ethnic, racial and regional differences. And yet, other scholars (Billig, 1995; Edensor, 2002) have shown how the nation is also a mundane, banal register which intervenes in people's everyday life as a silent background, organising both temporally and spatially their activities in terms of shared habits (e.g. queuing, left driving, school time) which produce a sort of national synchronicity beyond their intersectional differences.

My argument is that policies targeting citizenship alone will not succeed in generating a cohesive society unless citizenship is also sustained by a vigorous and open debate about 'who we are' and 'who we want to be' as a nation. In Britain this might be even more difficult than in other countries, given the co-existence of multiple nations. The risk, as feared by many, is that this debate might lead to further divisions, as people increasingly start identifying themselves in terms of distinct nations. Yet, one should not forget that the existence of distinct nations is not necessarily conducive to national separatisms.

Until now, the debate about the future of Britain has been largely dominated by a civic national project, best represented by Gordon Brown's (2004) vision of a weak, civic national identity made by common values (passion for liberty, sense of duty, commitment to tolerance and fair play), shared interests and a set of common institutions (the Monarchy, the Parliament, the Armed Forces, but also the National Health System, the BBC, National Insurance, etc.) – for a revival today of a similar project see Denham (2017). Yet, if today the Select Committee is asking for evidence that could promote civic engagement, values and participation, it might be legitimate to question the effectiveness of such a civic project.

No more successful seems to have been the communitarian approach proposed by Lord Bhikhu Parekh (2000), the Chairman of the Commission on the Future of Multi-Ethnic Britain. His idea of Britain as a 'community of communities', although based on the commendable principle of putting all religious, ethnic and racial groups on an equal footing, has encountered resistance from the beginning (Uberoi and Modood 2013) and, in times, has fallen prey of the so-called ‘multicultural backlash’ (Vertovec and Wessendorf 2010), which has simplistically equated communitarianism with ethno-religious self-segregation.

As much as the Race Relation Acts, which have confirmed and protected Britain as a multicultural nation, are to be cherished and safeguarded, both the idea of Britain as a civic nation or as a ‘community of communities’ struggles to buy the minds and hearts of various people. The recent upsurge of a predominantly white nationalism, calling for a return to the past, when Britain (or England) was more white and Christian and less open to global flows and to Europe, seems to confirm the limits of any project of governance which would put citizenship at its centre. To reiterate again my point: it is not a question of citizenship, but of nation, of how people think of themselves and of the others. Thus, any public intervention aimed at social cohesion and integration should find a way to tackle the nation question.

So, what can be done? Any concrete action in this direction is a matter of political decisions, but here a few suggestions:

- Any citizenship debate should also incorporate a question about ‘who we are’ and ‘who we want to be’. Questions about the nation, however directly or indirectly framed, should be central and not outflanked by a focus on civic engagement, participation or values. These alone will not suffice to bring a diverse society together.
- The nation debate should be encouraged as openly as possible. Avoiding this debate due to a fear of dissolution of the Union is a short-sighted policy. On the contrary, people should be encouraged to talk about the nation they feel they belong to and the nation they would like to belong to, however this debate might bring forward issues of race, religion or ethnicity. Dismissing this debate as mere racism would do little to address the anxiety of a white majority who feels displaced and disoriented in what they believe is ‘their’ nation (Kaufmann, 2017). There clearly is more than a ‘civic’ nation out there. Finding platforms where this debate can happen and a plurality of views can be shared is essential to avoid that ‘nation’ becomes the monopoly of one part of the population against the others.
- Although some voices in this debate might be expressed in the name of ‘communities’, such a communitarianist approach to nation should not be promoted. This might be the most revolutionary change to adopt in the nation debate, as Britain has historically relied on the notion of ‘community’ as a way to channel and manage diversity. Yet, the nation debate should be among individuals, whose diversity can be declined via a plurality of intersectional affiliations (e.g., gender, sexuality, ethnicity, race, class). Minority cultures can be part of the debate as much as they contribute to the background of an individual, but neither ‘communities’ nor individuals who speak in the name of ‘communities’ would help advancing the debate about the nation we are and we would like to be. To this end, Britain might look at other cases (e.g. Italy - see my research on this case at <http://newitalians.eu/en/>), where the nation debate is not framed in communitarianist terms.

- Never forget that 'nation' is never a status achieved once and for all, but any nation is an ongoing project: the coming together of different people discussing what they want to be is per se a very national act.

Citizenship Question 5

Citizenship is chronically under represented both at Primary and Secondary level, it should have a greater as a standalone option at key stage as opposed to schools incorporating it into subjects such as PHSE or PSE which are not statutory subject whereas Citizenship is, The government and schools also need to promote active Citizenship alongside the classroom teaching of it both in the early key stages up to A level, this includes elections with school and communities promoting participatory activities for learners through schools councils and youth parliaments etcetera,. Council research papers have identified the value of Citizenship as a subject and it is needed to be given more focus by education practitioners.

Apptivism – written evidence (CCE0046)

7. Behavioural Economics, Chatbots and Facebook

Apptivism, a London based social purpose start-up, has developed chatbots that help citizens give their view to governments, politicians and non-profits.

The chats are hosted on Facebook Messenger (a platform that over 75% of the UK population uses regularly) and use behavioural economics research to enhance the user experience. This includes: having regular feedback loops; chunking information and personalising the conversation depending on demographics as well as responses.

One of their early clients was the States of Jersey who wanted to provide residents with an alternative method to email surveys or town-hall meetings.

Between May 2017 and September 2017, Apptivism co-created and deployed four chatbots on the environment; community; household taxation; and maternity / paternity benefits.

The chat would guide a user through a topic, take around four minutes to complete and link through to a results website to view high level outcomes from the anonymised data. A real-time anonymised data dashboard was provided to Policy Officers to be able access the insights.

Over the course of the four chats, Apptivism saw strong civic engagement metrics, including:

- 86% users find a chatbot a useful way to communicate with the Government;
- 68% users re-engaging across multiple chats; and
- 15% growth in users between each chat.

Cllr Saima Ashraf – supplementary evidence (CCE0271)

Introduction: A Changing Borough

The sheer scale and pace of the demographic change which has taken place within Barking and Dagenham over recent decades have put unprecedented pressure on our resident communities. Over the past 5 years, migration has resulted in nearly 11,000 more residents arriving in the borough than leaving during the same period. Overall population figures show an increase from 163,944 residents in 2001 to 206,460 in 2016 (ONS mid-year estimate). Population growth is also projected to continue, with 2016 GLA forecasting a population of 290,417 for Barking and Dagenham by the 2050 horizon (2016 based population projections, central trend).

The social and cultural diversity of new migrants is worth noting. Barking and Dagenham has had the fifth largest growth in residents born outside the UK and Ireland between 2001 and 2011 (333.66 percent), compared with other local authorities in England and Wales. Evidence suggests that outward migration is also significant. Between 2013 and 2015, approximately 33,000 new residents came to the borough, and roughly 30,000 left, meaning that the ‘turnover’ was almost a quarter of the borough’s population. The 2011 census recorded a population of 49.5 percent White British ethnicity in the borough, compared with 80.9% a decade earlier (2001 figure). The largest non-white British ethnicities were Black (20 percent), Asian (15.9 percent) and White Other (7.8 percent). English was not the first language for almost a fifth (19%) of residents at the time of the 2011 census.

The reported religion of residents within Barking and Dagenham also changed during the decade between the two censuses. In 2001, 69% of residents stated their religion as Christian. This dropped to 56% by 2011. During the same period, the proportion of Muslims rose from 4.4% to 13.7%, and the proportion of Hindus doubled (1.1% to 2.4%). The proportion of residents stating that they had no religious belief also increased from 15% to 19%.

As well as the huge demographic change the borough is highly deprived, with the 5th highest housing deprivation score (which focuses on issues such as affordability, homelessness and overcrowding) in both London and England. The Index of Multiple Deprivation (which deals with issues such as income, employment and housing) ranks Barking and Dagenham as 12th nationally and 3rd most deprived borough in London. This is owed, in part, to the sustained legacy of deindustrialisation which has impacted the borough since the late 1970s. As long-term, large-scale employers such as Fords and May & Bakers downsized or left the borough, residents were made unemployed and found themselves without the education and skills necessary to compete in the post-industrial economy.

Surveys carried out since 2008 have systematically ranked LBBD below the national average on questions related to community cohesion in the borough. The 2016 Resident's Survey found that just about 7 in 10 (72%) residents agree that their local area is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together. This is significantly lower, by 17 percentage points, compared to the national average (89%). Established residents, particularly the White British Ethnic group, are less likely to be satisfied with their local area as a place to live than in other parts of England (Overall 64% compared to 83% nationally). Overall, 1 in 7 residents have no intention of staying in the borough.

Introduction: A Changing Council

These challenges intervene in the midst of unprecedented pressure on local governments' resources. The politics of austerity are expected to lead the Council to a shortfall of £63 million, a third of its 2010 budget, by the horizon 2020. Having to respond to increasing needs with a reduced budget, the Council has had to find new ways of delivering services to achieve its vision of becoming an inclusive, prosperous and resilient place, in which all communities have the opportunity to achieve their potential. An Independent Growth Commission was established to examine options for development, regeneration and transformation, and the impact of pursuing those options, for the future of the borough and its residents.

The findings of the Growth Commission were published in February 2016, in a report titled: "No one left behind: In pursuit of growth for the benefit of everyone"ⁱ. In this report, the Commission outlined 109 recommendations covering all aspects of the borough's economic growth including housing, business, transport and infrastructure, culture and heritage, urban design, educational attainment, and skills and employment.

The report of the Growth Commission recommended more inclusive policy and strategy making, as well as implementation, as a way of building and engaging civil society, empowering communities, and fostering social cohesion. Following this, an extensive public consultation was launched to help produce the Borough Manifesto, a 20-year vision for the borough. This exercise translated in an unprecedented level of engagement with members of the community, which included interviews with local residents, businesses and partners, totalling over 3,000 responses, on their priorities for the future.

The residents' responses were aggregated into 10 overarching aspirations, such as making Barking and Dagenham a place people are proud of, and where they want to live, work, study and stay; a place where everyone feels safe and is safe; and a place where everyone is treated fairly and has the opportunity to succeed. In particular, one of the themes makes it a priority to address the residents' fears and aspirations in a rapidly changing place, arguing that social cohesion and community spirit are vital to the success of the borough. It sets a priority in 'making Barking and Dagenham a friendly and welcoming Borough with strong community spirit', through various priorities:

- To celebrate our history and heritage, through events and activities;
- To tackle extremism and hate crime wherever it occurs;
- To help different groups in the community to come together and integrate, understanding that diversity is a strength and that we can all learn from one another;
- To come together and support residents and communities to be more resilient so that they are able to do more for themselves, and;
- To start acting as equal partners, doing our bit across sectors and organisations for the benefit of the Borough.

Recognising the complexity, interdependence, and immediacy of the challenges faced by Barking and Dagenham, the Council is exploring a new approach to civic engagement, democratic engagement, social cohesion and integration, citizenship and identity. Our new approach positions the Council as a facilitator, enabling the community, rather than as a paternalistic provider of traditional services. Detailed below are responses to the questions posed by the Select Committee on 29 November 2017, outlining this new approach and its wider implications for citizenship and civic engagement.

Question 1: What do you think is the current state of civic engagement in the UK? Do you feel that the area you work in has better or worse than average engagement?

We face a crisis of civic engagement¹³ both locally in Barking and Dagenham and across the United Kingdom. This has manifested nationally with, for instance, the division caused by the June 2016 EU Referendum, and the reported rise in hate crime which followed.

In Barking and Dagenham, we face the same challenge as the rest of the UK, though it likely presents more acutely than many other areas of the country. This is due, in part, to the population and demographic change and churn which has taken place over the past 15 years:

- Between 2001 and 2016 the population rose from 164,000 to 206,500, and is projected to reach 275,000 by 2037
- Between 2012 and 2014 one quarter of the population moved into and out of the borough, representing significant population churn
- Between 2001 and 2011 those members of the community identifying as White British fell from 79% to 49%, while those identifying as BME increased from 15% to 50%

It is also due to the deprivation our community faces:

- A male healthy life expectancy of 59.8 years, below the London average of 64.1
- A female healthy life expectancy of 58.5 years, below the London average of 64.1
- 14.7% of residents with no qualifications, above the London average of 6.6%

¹³ We understand civic engagement as the act of working to make a difference in the civic life of the community. Acts big or small, from formal volunteering to informal community groups, from democratic participation to befriending one's neighbours, constitute and contribute to civic engagement.

- 7.5% unemployment, above the London average of 5.8%
- 67.1% employment, below the London average of 73.8%
- 13.3% of residents claiming DWP benefits, above the London average of 9.4%

This deprivation – a cumulative result of deindustrialisation and austerity – has affected residents in their sense of identity, belonging and power, at the same time that globalisation is rapidly changing the makeup of the community. Many feel ‘left behind’ by the state, at all levels.

One consequence, and most importantly for civic engagement, is that just 22% of residents formally volunteered in 2016, compared to the national average of 42%. However, the lack of civic engagement has had a range of direct and indirect consequences in this borough:

- In 2016 we found that 72% of residents believe Barking and Dagenham is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together, compared to the national average of 89%.
- White British residents have found to be consistently less likely to be satisfied with the area as a place to live, less likely to feel safe, and less likely to believe Barking and Dagenham is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together.
- One in seven residents want to leave the borough, while 64% are satisfied with the local areas as a place to live, compared to the national average of 83%.

Question 2: What role should local authorities play in encouraging volunteering? How could they be more effective? What examples are there of best practice?

As a local authority, our aim is to improve civic engagement in all forms. We believe that high levels of civic engagement will improve the resilience of the community, and positively affect a range of socioeconomic outcomes for residents. The London Borough of Barking and Dagenham (LBBD) is working with partners across statutory and community organisations to enable civic engagement. In doing so we are innovating the role of the local authority, together with wider civil society, in policy regarding engagement and volunteering, as well as the variety and forms of engagement and volunteering available to residents of the borough.

Every One Every Day

On 25 November 2017 we launched the 'Every One Every Day' initiative, a five-year project aiming to reinforce social cohesion and individual wellbeing by creating new forms of collaboration between residents, civil society organisations and the private sector. The initiative emerges from a unique collaboration between three funding bodies, LBB and Participatory City Foundation. It aims to pull together essential components for co-producing society: a shared vision of the future, new methods of co-creating value, cost savings and mechanisms for collective investment. It is based on the assumption that 'doing things together' – engagement – can improve the everyday life of residents, and foster cohesion in a borough where formal volunteering has been lagging behind national averages for a number of years.

The project proposes to facilitate the creation of a network of 250+ citizen-led projects and 100 new businesses over five years, working with over 25,000 people in the borough. These include activities which are intrinsically appealing to people, such as cooking, learning, making, trading, sharing, and growing. They provide an experience of co-producing something tangible as a group of equal peers.

Every One Every Day is resident-led, as they drive the development of activities themselves, and participate in those local initiatives with which they relate. It focuses on the skills, ideas and assets possessed by residents, with ultimate objective of building a ground-up culture of participation.

Every One Every Day is an innovative example of how local authorities can broaden their approach to civic engagement and volunteering by turning away from traditional, paternalistic policy and adopting an enabling, 'facilitator' position within the community. It truly relies upon the initiative and energy of the community itself.

Crowdfund Barking and Dagenham

Earlier in 2017 LBBD launched its own crowdfunding platform for the borough, in partnership with Crowdfunder UK. The platform and accompanying support provided by the Council and the Barking and Dagenham Council for Voluntary Service (CVS) – through advice and matchfunding – enables civil society organisations to diversify their funding efforts by tapping into the potential of the ‘crowd’ and information and communication technologies. For residents, crowdfunding is a step to empowering them to take positive action to improve their community without being dependent on funding institutions to finance projects or ideas. In the first six months of the platform, five different projects have benefitted from the Council’s matchfunding (small grants fund) and we are looking to further extend our reach in 2018. Crowdfund Barking and Dagenham empowers the community to support and finance the local causes which matter to them, no one else.

Local Lottery

The Barking and Dagenham Lottery, the first of its kind in London, launched to good causes in August 2017 with the aim of enabling the community to raise money for local good causes; charities and community groups identified by residents themselves.

The lottery is already funding 16 local good causes, including the Liberty Credit Union, the Disablement Association of Barking and Dagenham, a community-run growing space for people with limited access to gardens and facing health inequalities, and the Huggett Women’s Centre in Dagenham.

Supporting Community Initiatives

A wide range of thriving voluntary and community organisations operate in Barking and Dagenham, providing essential support to residents, supporting volunteers and ensuring no one is left behind. According to the Charity Commission, Barking and Dagenham has approximately 555 charities working within its boundaries. The role of these partners, and the CVS, as the local infrastructure provider is key. It is vital for the Council, CVS, independent fundes and other partners to support as wide a variety of such initiatives a possible. By doing so, we can widen the forms of volunteering and activities available to, and benefiting, residents of the borough. Current examples include:

- Barking and Dagenham Council for Voluntary Service (CVS):

The CVS provides a range of services in supporting civil society in its widest sense. It is funded in part by LBB, and with a long-term lease on a recently refurbished community building. As part of its remit, and with other, larger VCS organisations, the CVS promotes and supports volunteering opportunities across civil society.

The CVS provides space for a wide-range of community groups within its building 'The Ripple Centre', at low cost. This acts as a source of income for the CVS but also capacity builds groups.

The CVS also brings together partners on a range of issues such as LGBTQI+ network, migrant rights and strategic third sector priorities. It has a weekly newsletter highlighting opportunities for funding, training and collaboration opportunities.

The CVS has made a number of comments with regard to the specific additional requests for information made of Cllr Ashraf. These are summarised below, but do not necessarily represent the Council's view:

- Reports from the Runnymede Scorecard project indicate that all communities are equally affected by traditional poverty indicators.
- There is a palpable feeling of alienation expressed through political and community discourses by the white working class (as seen in the local Brexit vote).
- Engagement by the white working-class community has centred upon local political discourse and can be seen to be centred geographically in specific communities.
- Engagement from the white working class has therefore been through tenants and resident's associations, political affiliations, and community safety engagement structures like the ward panels. This resonates with feelings of insecurity and feeling under threat.

- There is an over representation of white working-class communities in some specific types of formal community organisations. Within the post-industrial epoch, families have sought to support what they perceive to be ‘their community’.
- The insular nature of some charities, can be seen to reflect fears of ‘the other’. There is also a particular tendency for the white working-class community to also cluster around the needs of disabled communities locally. This is less controversial than support for other specific groups.
- Grown in Dagenham:
Funded by the Big Lottery and established on Dagenham Farm in January 2016 through a targeted tendering process by the Council, the project works to involve local people in the farm and get more people benefiting from learning to grow food. They run weekly school food-growing and cooking sessions, an after-school club and holiday club for local school children, during which activities include planting out, harvesting soft fruit and learning to cook farm produce. They teach local unemployed lone parents in food-growing and food-production, with participants also learning the basics of marketing and retailing. They run food-growing sessions for people in recovery from alcohol abuse, and host a weekly communal lunch for staff and volunteers to enjoy together.
- Community Resources:
Grow creative solutions to local issues – solutions provided ‘By the community, for the community’. They are a group of volunteers from all walks of life who want to bring people together to realise that they can make a positive contribution to their community. They support local volunteers to start up and run projects that address needs they have identified in the local area. One Community Resources project is The Hub at Castle Point, which offers English conversation classes, parent and toddler groups, family learning sessions, a drop-in community café and ante-natal programmes, amongst other programmes. Another project is Community Connect, an LBBD-funded online resource designed to assess the issues facing an individual, and identify a personalised list of relevant support and services available in the local area. Peaced Together is a creative arts course for women. The course consists of five craft projects completed over ten weeks, each helping the group to explore a different topic and support women in recovery of various forms.

- Company Drinks:

An arts project and community drinks enterprise that links East London's history of 'going picking' – hop picking – with a full drinks production cycle: from picking to bottling, branding to trading and reinvesting. They run a year-round, borough-wide and intergenerational programme in Barking and Dagenham, with the venue provided by the Council of Barking Park. So far, 36,000 people have engaged with Company Drinks, including 2,400 Barking and Dagenham residents. More than 1,000 young people have been involved in making and mixing drinks. More than 30 monthly Hopping Afternoons for former hop-pickers and 120+ weekly volunteers' sessions have taken place. Company Drinks have run trips to Aarhus in Denmark, Warsaw in Poland, Leipzig in Germany and Colombes in France.

- Barking and Dagenham Somali Women's Association

Established in the mid-1990s in response to a rapidly growing ethnic minority population, the Somali Women's Association is a locally-based health, wellbeing, training and employability organisation committed to providing support to ethnic minority women and their families from its resource centre in Barking. Their vision is to set up an information and resource centre which has community café facilities, offers services to improve the health and wellbeing of women, and tackles the many problems and issues raised by health inequalities, FGM, unemployment and poverty. The Association is actively involved in a range of wider community activities, including those coordinated by the Council, such as our social cohesion hackathon and Big Conversation, described below.

- Established volunteering schemes

Many of the contracts for social care in particular that the Council tenders, are with local VCS providers. One of the key elements of those contracts is the role of volunteers from the community supporting residents. Organisations like Carers of Barking and Dagenham, DABD, and ILA have well designed and developed volunteering programmes.

- Cultural Connectors:

Creative Barking and Dagenham is a six-year project (2014 – 2019) for people living, working and socialising in Barking and Dagenham. Its mission is to enable local people to create, commission and curate outstanding arts and creative activities in their areas, and to promote the borough as a place where exciting art – of all forms – is made and shown. A part of this project is the Cultural Connectors network; an ever-expanding group of adults living locally, who are making decisions about the Creative Barking and Dagenham Programme. The Cultural Connectors work with partners across the borough to curate festivals, arrange trips and visits, commission artists and projects, participate in funding panels and spreading the word about Creative Barking and Dagenham.

Community initiatives such as those thriving in Barking and Dagenham are critical because they are born out of local priorities and empower the community to take action. As a local authority, we believe it is our duty to do everything possible to encourage and enable initiatives such as these.

Question 3: To what extent are local communities involved in the provision of nationally run volunteering schemes like the National Citizens Service? Do communities feel they have a say or that these schemes are imposed from the outside? Should community projects be prioritized over national schemes?

In Barking and Dagenham, as across London and beyond, the National Citizens Service (NCS) is delivered by 'The Challenge'.

As a Council we have a strong working relationship with The Challenge. We agree to exchange a range of regular data, including the number of participants, organisations working in collaboration, and the number of volunteering hours given. We support The Challenge in contacting and working with local schools. We have rental arrangements for several Council-owned buildings. Each year a number of Councillors participate in a ‘dragons’-den-style’ event, allowing participants to present their community projects, and providing a unique insight into the priorities of local children. The Challenge are also responsive to the Council’s recommendations of suitable local organisations with which to collaborate, which in the past has included Carers of Barking and Dagenham, Brighter Steppings and the Ab Phab Youth Club.

Nationally run volunteering schemes such as the NCS could, however, be further improved by ensuring that it is better informed by and constructed around the makeup and priorities of each local community. Too often such schemes are delivered at regional, rather than borough, level, and reflect a broad, generalised understanding of those individuals and groups they are trying to engage. For example, The Challenge reports to regional, rather than borough, targets. As a result, local performance of the scheme is difficult to assess, and is not responsive of local needs. It is also true that, while participation rates remain high, it is not always the most disadvantaged and hard-to-reach pupils who take part in the scheme. Indeed, it is frequently the more high-achieving pupils. Increased subsidiarity would improve the local knowledge informing the scheme, and help to reach the most disadvantaged pupils.

Greater responsibility and decision-making power at a local level, for design and delivery of such schemes, would improve their responsiveness. This could mean local authority involvement, community organisation control, or a combination of both.

Question 4: What role should local authorities play in encouraging democratic engagement? How could they be more effective? What examples are there of best practice?

The fiscal austerity imposed by successive national governments since 2010 means that by 2020 LBBD will have two thirds of the money to spend as it did in 2010. This has forced LBBD, and local government around the country, to re-imagine its role within the 21st century public sector. Councils must transform to ensure they continue to improve outcomes for residents. This has only increased the importance for local authorities of listening to their constituents, and has caused LBBD to adopt a more enabling position as a community ‘facilitator’, turning away from its more traditional, paternalistic role as a provider of services to users.

In practice, this means improving democratic engagement by improving the means by which we consult, engage and co-produce with residents.

The Borough Manifesto Consultation

Launched in July 2017, the Borough Manifesto is a 20-year vision for the future of Barking and Dagenham, shared across all the borough’s partners. Before developing this vision, during the summer of 2016, the Council undertook the most extensive engagement exercise ever conducted in the borough. We spoke to over 3,000 residents about what they liked about the borough, what they disliked, and what they hoped Barking and Dagenham would be like 20 years from now. We analysed these responses both qualitatively and quantitatively, and the results formed the foundation of the Borough Manifesto. The Borough Manifesto is an example of how consultation and engagement can and should be at the heart of strategy development, rather than – as is still so often the case – an afterthought.

(<https://www.lbdd.gov.uk/council/priorities-and-strategies/borough-manifesto/overview/>)

Social Cohesion Hackathon

We are exploring the use of participatory design techniques as a means of increasing the involvement of residents in solving some of our most pressing issues. For instance, in identifying and designing solutions to challenges of social cohesion. On 30 September and 1 October, we held the UK’s first social cohesion hackathon in partnership with local social innovation company DigiLab. The hackathon brought together 25 programmers and software developers with members of the community, of all ages and backgrounds, to identify, respond to and tackle the issues and concerns of local residents. Given the success of the exercise and the interest it generated amongst participants and community groups, we are now looking to reproduce the format in the near future.

Community Amplifiers

We are planning to recruit and train a group of community ‘amplifiers’ to help facilitate a conversation between seemingly differing views and perspectives, using inclusive methods and techniques. The role of the ‘amplifiers’ will focus on achieving increased harmony within the borough through allowing individuals and groups to appreciate the value of different worldviews and practices, and to improve democratic engagement as a result.

Improving, innovating and broadening the methods by which we consult, engage and co-produce with residents is beneficial for several reasons. Firstly, it ensures our work is truly responsive to and led by the will of the community. Secondly, it places residents at the heart of the policy development process and empowers them. Finally, improving our practices of consultation, engagement and co-production empowers residents to democratically engage with the Council, the community and wider society.

Question 6: What opportunities are there for local communities to be a site of democratic innovation? Should local authorities trial participatory budgeting and citizens juries? Should local authorities have the ability to allow votes at 16 for local elections?

Local authorities have significant capacity to act as sites of democratic innovation, trialing initiatives responsively to local priorities, but with potential for nationally valuable insight. Beyond the examples of such schemes named in the question, all of which enjoy increasing levels of support across the public sector, LBBD is developing a new local giving model with significant potential for democratic innovation.

Much like participatory budgeting, our new local giving model implements participatory financing as a means of empowering civil society. In particular, both Crowdfund Barking and Dagenham and the Barking and Dagenham Lottery – described above – use models of participatory financing to fundraise for local good causes chosen by the community itself. This empowers residents with choice, and further encourages them to donate resources, be it finance, time or personal energy to their community.

This is just one means by which local authorities may act as sites of democratic innovation, but as the appetite for such experimentation grows local authorities around the country will discover the potential for innovation of this kind, and the variety of initiatives being undertaken will grow.

Question 7: What role should local authorities play in integration? How could they be more effective? What examples are there of best practice?

One of the duties of local authorities is to enable effective integration¹⁴ by creating a welcoming community with a strong, coherent sense of civic pride. In turn, we see civic pride as a form of shared understanding within the community, constituted of three elements:

- An appreciation for the culture and history of the community.
- An understanding of the rights and responsibilities which accompany membership to the community.
- Positive participation within the community.

As a borough, we are working to enable integration by fostering a strong sense of civic pride through a variety of means.

The Summer of Festivals

Each summer, the Council hosts a programme of over 10 free events across the borough, celebrating the community's heritage, history and culture. These events foster civic pride and enable integration by providing a space for residents from different backgrounds to meet, interact and widen their social networks. The events also improve the community's shared understanding of and pride in our heritage, history and culture.

Following the 2017 programme:

- 91% of residents agree that the events should continue next year.

¹⁴ Integration is the process by which the conditions are created for the inclusion of new residents into a community. The product of effective integration is social cohesion. Social cohesion is a common sense of belonging to, and inclusion within, a community.

- 92% agree these events are a good way for people of different ages and backgrounds to come together.

The Summer of Festivals Programme is run in partnership with local businesses and civil society groups, giving participants excellent opportunities to understand and engage with the rich diversity in the borough.

History and Heritage

LBBDD are working to improve our shared understanding and appreciation of the heritage and history of Barking and Dagenham through several projects over the coming years:

- The East London Industrial Heritage Museum – a new facility of regional significance, on the site of the former Ford Stamping Plant in Dagenham, the Museum will tell the story of the area’s industrial heritage, but also support the development of new sustainable creative industries in the borough.
- The East End Women’ Museum – a permanent resource to promote women’s history that will record, share and celebrate women’s stories and voices from East London’s history.
- The Abbey: Unlocking Barking’s Past, Securing its Future – a capital improvement programme to the landscape at Abbey Green, accompanied by a programme of promotion and interpretation of the history of the former Abbey.
- Valence House – described by the Museums’ Journal as ‘one of the best local history museums in London’, Valence House is an accredited local history museum with locally, regionally and nationally significant collections. It provides a high-quality and extensive programme of events and learning for school groups and the wider community, including collection ‘masterclasses’ and family history help sessions.
- However, it is not just the Council who have an important role in maintaining the history and heritage of our borough. Initiatives such as Company Drinks, described above, are vital to engaging the community and encouraging people to take an active role in sharing our past. Local authorities should encourage and enable such community initiatives wherever and whenever they emerge.

The Good Neighbour Guide

An important element of civic pride is an understanding of the rights and responsibilities which accompany membership of the community. Consultation and engagement over the past several years, such as through the Borough Manifesto Consultation, and other qualitative research conducted with members of the White working-class population earlier in 2017, has identified that this is an issue of great concern for residents.

Many residents believe that the rapid population and demographic change which has occurred in the borough, and particularly the rate of population churn we experience, has caused a loss of understanding of the rights and responsibilities which accompany membership of the community. Residents frequently argue that these rights and responsibilities were better understood in those decades preceding deindustrialisation, and particularly the 1920s – 1970s.

Earlier this year, led by a series of engagement events, the Council developed The Good Neighbour Guide. To be sent to all residents, and then to all residents arriving in the borough, the Guide aims to articulate the rights afforded to every member of the community, including which public services are available and how they may be accessed. It also outlines the responsibilities expected of all residents, including being friendly and welcoming to those around them, appreciative and respectful of our culture, history and environment.

Faith in the Community

To better understand the role of faith in the community, and its implications for integration, we have commissioned an extensive study by the Co-Operative Advisory Group Consultants to assess current and future needs for religious premises in the borough. The study notes the changing faith landscape in the borough, and the increasing importance of certain faith groups. It also suggests that faith premises are already in short supply and looks at new opportunities to respond to the local and future demand for faith spaces.

One of the recommendations of the report is the creation of multi-faith premises. Whilst it is still at an early stage of development, the Council is looking to explore this option in partnership with faith organisations across the borough. We believe that this would solve the problem of the shortage of space, but might equally create a new space for mutual understanding and collaboration between various faith groups. This will enable easier inclusion of new residents within the community, improving integration and, in turn, social cohesion.

The Big Conversation

Important to our efforts to foster civic pride and enable integration is our belief that a cohesive community must share a common vision for its future.

Further to the Borough Manifesto, described above, which sought to articulate this vision, on 13 November 2017 LBBD and Lankelly Chase Foundation co-facilitated an event called ‘The Big Conversation’. A representative spread of 71 residents from all backgrounds within the community took part in the event. Through an exploration of participants’ own personal stories, ‘The Big Conversation’ sought to generate a reflection on what people want for their life, what they value in their community and what prevents them from achieving their needs. Through finding common ground, the event will help to foster civic pride and enable integration.

It is the belief of the Council that its work will foster a strong, shared sense of civic pride. In so doing, it may ensure Barking and Dagenham is a welcoming community, capable of including new residents in its economic, social and culture life. This is the means by which local authorities can promote integration and, as a consequence, improve social cohesion.

Al-Madina Mosque

Again, it is not just a matter of what the Council is doing or can do, but what action local government can encourage and enable by groups and organisations within the community. A good example of such activity is the excellent community work undertaken by the Al-Madina Mosque in Barking. Earlier in 2017 the Mosque won the Spirit of 2012 Connecting Communities Award from the British Ethnic Diversity Sports Awards, for their excellent sports programme which works to bring local communities together through sport or physical activity.

Association of British Insurers – written evidence (CCE0263)

ABOUT THE ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH INSURERS

The Association of British Insurers (ABI) is the voice of the UK's world leading insurance and long-term savings industry.

A productive, inclusive and thriving sector, we are an industry that provides peace of mind to households and businesses across the UK and powers the growth of local and regional economies by enabling trade, risk taking, investment and innovation.

Summary

- The ABI and the insurance industry has produced a range of guides covering insurance and the voluntary sector. These guides provide guidance and information for the voluntary sector on issues such as risk management in the voluntary sector, Trustee Liabilities, volunteer driving, event planning insurance and liability insurance for work experience placements.
- The ABI is committed to working with partners across industry and the voluntary sector to provide the clarity that individuals and organisations need in respect to insurance coverage.
- Much has been done to ensure that access to insurance is not a barrier for voluntary organisations and charities and the industry remains committed to supporting a thriving voluntary sector in the UK.

INTRODUCTION

1. WE WELCOME THE OPPORTUNITY TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE WORK OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS SELECT COMMITTEE ON CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT. VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS AND CHARITIES PLAY AN IMPORTANT ROLE IN SOCIETY BUT IN THE PAST, HAVE EXPRESSED CONCERN ABOUT ACCESS TO INSURANCE TO SUPPORT THE VALUABLE WORK THAT THEY DO. IN ADDITION, EMPLOYERS HAVE HISTORICALLY SOUGHT CLARIFICATION ABOUT WHETHER THEIR EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY INSURANCE POLICIES WILL COVER WORKPLACE PLACEMENT STUDENTS. THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY, WORKING

Association of British Insurers – written evidence (CCE0263)

THROUGH THE ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH INSURERS HAS SOUGHT TO PROVIDE VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS, CHARITIES AND EMPLOYERS THE SUPPORT AND CLARITY THEY NEED AND INFORMATION ON THE ISSUES THEY SHOULD CONSIDER IN RESPECT OF THEIR INSURANCE COVERAGE.

2. WE REMAIN CONCERNED THAT THE MESSAGES CONTAINED IN THE GUIDANCE DOCUMENTS WE HAVE PREPARED OVER THE YEARS CONTINUES NOT TO REACH THOSE VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS AND BUSINESSES THAT NEED TO BE AWARE OF IT. WE WOULD WELCOME ANY SUPPORT THAT THE HOUSE OF LORDS SELECT COMMITTEE ON CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT CAN PROVIDE IN ENSURING THAT THE POLICY POSITIONS ON THE KEY ISSUES SET OUT BELOW IS DISSEMINATED TO RELEVANT ORGANISATIONS AND REPRESENTATIVE BODIES.

VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS

3. VOLUNTEERS DO SO MUCH GOOD WORK IN COMMUNITIES UP AND DOWN THE COUNTRY. VOLUNTARY ORGANISATION AND CHARITIES OFTEN HAVE SPECIFIC INSURANCE NEEDS AND THE ABI WORKS WITH INSURERS TO ENSURE THOSE NEEDS CAN BE MET SO THAT ORGANISATIONS CAN CONTINUE THEIR IMPORTANT WORK.
4. Since 2005, when we produced guidance for the voluntary sector on risk management, the ABI has continued to seek opportunities to engage with the sector to improve their understanding of insurance. BY HELPING INDIVIDUAL VOLUNTEERS, VOLUNTARY GROUPS AND CHARITIES IDENTIFY AND REDUCE THE POTENTIAL RISKS THAT THEY FACE IN UNDERTAKING THEIR ACTIVITIES, AS WELL AS PROVIDING CONSUMER-FRIENDLY GUIDANCE ON THE INSURANCE OPTIONS AVAILABLE TO HELP TO MANAGE THOSE RISKS, THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY IS PLAYING OUR PART IN HELPING TO SUPPORT HEALTHY AND VIBRANT VOLUNTARY AND CHARITABLE SECTORS.
5. IN 2014, THE ABI, WORKING IN CONJUNCTION WITH A NUMBER OF ORGANISATIONS, INCLUDING THE BRITISH INSURANCE BROKERS ASSOCIATION AND THE VOLUNTEER LIAISON GROUP (WHICH CONSISTED OF THE ABI, MONEY ADVICE SERVICE, COMMUNITY MATTERS, THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR VOLUNTARY YOUTH SERVICES AND THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR VOLUNTEERING ENGLAND) PRODUCED The Voluntary, Community and Social Enterprise Sector – an insurance guide for individuals and organisations. THIS GUIDE EXPLAINS THAT THE PERCEPTIONS OF RISK CAN SOMETIMES BE OVERSTATED. IT AIMS TO PROVIDE A CLEAR DESCRIPTION OF THE TYPES OF INSURANCE VOLUNTEER ORGANISATIONS MIGHT CONSIDER IN HELPING TO MANAGE THEIR RISKS AND EXPLAINS THAT INSURERS OR INSURANCE BROKERS CAN HELP ORGANISATIONS FIND THE RIGHT PRODUCT FOR AN ORGANISATION'S SPECIFIC NEEDS.
6. AS WELL AS HELPING VOLUNTEERS, THE ABI HAS ALSO PRODUCED Trustee Liability Guide – A SUMMARY OF THE POTENTIAL PERSONAL LIABILITIES ASSOCIATED WITH BECOMING A TRUSTEE OF A CHARITY IN ORDER TO HELP TRUSTEES OF CHARITIES IDENTIFY AND MANAGE THE RISKS ASSOCIATED WITH THEIR UNIQUE ROLE.

7. FURTHER BACKGROUND IS AVAILABLE ON THE ABI website AND INFORMATION ON THE SPECIFIC INSURANCE NEEDS OF AN INDIVIDUAL CHARITY IS ALSO AVAILABLE FROM INSURANCE BROKERS. WE WOULD WELCOME THE OPPORTUNITY FOR THE HOUSE OF LORDS SELECT COMMITTEE ON CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT'S WORK TO CONTINUE OUR WORK IN DISSEMINATING THIS INFORMATION TO THE CHARITIES AND VOLUNTEER ORGANISATIONS WHO WOULD BENEFIT FROM ITS USE.

ABI'S VOLUNTEER DRIVING COMMITMENT

8. ALTHOUGH SOME INSURERS cover volunteer driving within regular motor insurance policies, others may charge an extra premium or impose a higher excess for volunteer drivers. In order to provide useful information and additional clarity to volunteer drivers, in 2011 the ABI coordinated and produced Volunteer Driving: The Motor Insurance Commitment. This document sets out the specific requirements and positions of individual insurance companies in relation to volunteer driving, e.g. some insurers want volunteers to contact them to inform them that customers intend using their vehicle for volunteering purposes whereas other do not require any contact from the customer; some firms require an additional premium to be paid whereas others will not require any additional premium. We aim to keep the information contained in the ABI's Volunteer Driving Commitment as up-to-date as possible and it was last updated in October 2017.

INSURANCE FOR PUBLIC EVENTS

9. AN ISSUE THAT IS SOMETIMES RAISED WITH US IT THAT VOLUNTARY ORGANISATIONS HAVE DIFFICULTY IN ACCESSING INSURANCE FOR ONE-OFF EVENTS. WE DO NOT CONSIDER THAT ACCESSIBILITY OF INSURANCE IS AN ISSUE GIVEN THAT A WELL-FUNCTIONING, COMPETITIVE MARKET EXISTS FOR THIS TYPE OF INSURANCE. TWO POINTS SEEM PERTINENT HERE:
 - There is perhaps a perception that insurance cover for a one- or two-day event ought to cost much less than it actually does. Clearly, most voluntary organisations are not wealthy and costs impact upon them significantly. However, costs reflect the risk and potential liabilities. Outdoor events with what may seem to be relatively innocuous activities can in fact present a risk of significant injury and damage to people and property, e.g. an unsecured bouncy castle could result in serious injury to children.
 - Short-term insurance policies can be disproportionately expensive due to economies of scale. From an insurer's perspective, the relative costs of setting up an annual policy and a two-day policy are not significantly different: they can both include the same amount of employee time and costs of reinsurance.

10. Against that backdrop, we have made significant efforts in recent years to explain these issues to the voluntary sector and continue to do so. In June 2013 we produced a guide for voluntary organisations called Celebrate! An ABI Guide to Planning an Event which is designed to help voluntary organisations to consider some of the risks that their event might pose and how to mitigate them.
11. Again, we would welcome the opportunity presented by the COMMITTEE ON CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT'S WORK TO DISSEMINATE THIS INFORMATION TO THOSE WHO NEED TO BE MADE AWARE OF IT.

INSURANCE AND WORK EXPERIENCE

12. THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY HAS DONE A GREAT DEAL IN RECENT YEARS TO DISSEMINATE INFORMATION ON THE INSURANCE POSITION FOR THOSE FIRMS WHO HOST WORK EXPERIENCE STUDENTS IN THEIR BUSINESSES. DESPITE THESE EFFORTS, MYTHS CONTINUED TO PERSIST. IN JUNE 2013, Government Ministers and the ABI announced THAT THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY HAD COMMITTED TO TREAT WORK EXPERIENCE STUDENTS AS EMPLOYEES FOR THE PURPOSES OF INSURANCE AGAINST BODILY INJURY AND CONFIRMED THAT SIMPLY GIVING WORK EXPERIENCE OPPORTUNITIES TO STUDENTS WILL NOT, IN ITSELF, IMPACT ON INSURANCE PREMIUMS. WE PRODUCED A guide for insurance and work experience FOR DISSEMINATION TO THE BUSINESS COMMUNITY.
13. AT THE SAME TIME, THE HEALTH AND SAFETY EXECUTIVE ISSUED GUIDANCE PROVIDING CLARITY TO EMPLOYERS ON THEIR OBLIGATIONS IN TERMS OF RISK ASSESSMENTS REINFORCING THAT A BUSINESS DOES NOT NEED TO REPEAT RISK ASSESSMENTS THAT ALREADY UNDERTAKEN FOR EACH NEW WORK EXPERIENCE STUDENT. THE DEPARTMENT FOR EDUCATION AND OFSTED ALSO PUBLISHED GUIDANCE TO CLARIFY THE HEALTH AND SAFETY RESPONSIBILITIES FOR EDUCATIONAL ESTABLISHMENTS ORGANISING WORK EXPERIENCE OPPORTUNITIES.

Association for Citizenship Teaching – written evidence (CCE0143)

1. Introduction

1.1 The Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT) is the professional subject association for all teachers and educators engaged in Citizenship education. ACT was founded by Professor Sir Bernard Crick in 2001, following the Government’s decision to make Citizenship a statutory subject within the National Curriculum for schools in England. It is a membership organisation and registered charity.

1.2 ACT’s vision is for a strong and vibrant democracy enhanced by young people who are educated with the Citizenship knowledge, understanding, skills and experience they need to play an effective role as active citizens; and who, together, can take action to create a more equal, fair and just society for all. ACT’s focus is on supporting teachers and the teaching of Citizenship through provision of professional networks, training and CPD, a national teaching conference, a journal ‘Teaching Citizenship’, teaching resources and information on the association’s website (www.teachingcitizenship.org.uk). Funded project work and consultancy also contribute to meeting ACT’s core objectives. ACT’s work is shaped by a committed Council of Teachers who are unpaid volunteers, and is governed by a Board of Trustees.

1.3 To help inform this submission, ACT consulted widely with teachers and educators¹⁵ using an online survey designed to elicit responses to those parts of the Committee’s enquiry that relate to Citizenship education. In particular, ACT’s evidence addresses parts of questions 2, 4, 6 and 12 and the fullest response is given in relation to question 5. Of the 148 survey responses received, most were from teachers in England working in schools and colleges for 11-18 year olds and 72% describe themselves as Citizenship teachers. A small number of responses were received from teachers in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. ACT also organised focus groups in four secondary schools in England during July 2017, with pupils in key stages 3 and 4 and one group of post 16 students.

1.4 This submission is supported by the Political Studies Association Specialist Group on Young People’s Politics.

2. The role and aims of Citizenship

¹⁵ The survey ran during August and was also distributed by members of the Political Literacy Oversight Group, The Politics Project, the Political Studies Association, The Crick Centre for Political Understanding, Active Citizens FE, the Citizenship Foundation, Bite the Ballot and Step Up To Serve.

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory?

2.1 A vibrant and healthy democracy in which every citizen feels their voice matters and they can play an active part in decision-making and public life needs young people who have had the benefit of effective Citizenship education. Democracy is precious and Citizenship education is vital in helping people to understand and participate within it: education in Citizenship is simply too important to be left to chance. General education through the school and National Curriculum must prepare children for life and work in the 21st Century and this cannot be achieved without an entitlement for every child to Citizenship education. Citizenship is a necessary subject in the National Curriculum.

2.2 In the last ten years, policy makers have held to a broad consensus that Citizenship is an important aim of education in England whether that be in the context of the knowledge-led, subject focused curriculum of 2014 or the aims led, concept and skills focused curriculum of 2008.

‘The National Curriculum has three statutory aims. It should enable all young people to become successful learners, confident individual and responsible citizens.’ (National Curriculum, 2008)

‘The national curriculum provides pupils with an introduction to the essential knowledge that they need to be educated citizens.’ (National Curriculum, Department for Education, 2014)

2.3 However, this broad consensus has been undermined by other aspects of policy. As a consequence, the extent to which these aims are realised through the school curriculum as a whole and specifically through the teaching of Citizenship as a National Curriculum subject is questionable. (Jerome, L, 2017¹⁶). In particular, the shift away from a broad and balanced curriculum to focus on a narrow ‘core academic curriculum’¹⁷ has undermined Citizenship teaching. Moreover, the freedoms associated with being an academy or free school means that England no longer has a truly National Curriculum. The reality is that Citizenship has become marginalised despite the apparent continuity in curriculum policy - that it continues, rightly, as a statutory National subject at key stages 3 and 4. The ACT survey conducted for this Committee showed that whilst 90% see Citizenship as an important priority and 85% said their Head or Principal was supportive of Citizenship education, just 47% felt it was actually made a priority in their own school or college.

¹⁷ <https://www.gov.uk/government/news/ambition-for-vast-majority-of-students-to-study-core-academic-gcses>

2.4 Teachers agree that Citizenship has a wide-ranging and important contribution to general education. In the ACT survey, 80% of respondents agreed that Citizenship should be a statutory National Curriculum subject at key stage 2 to 4 (age 7 to 16) with 54% at key stage 1 (age 5 to 7). Two thirds of respondents said it should also be part of 16-19 provision. The survey also shows 89% agree that the goal of Citizenship is to give young people opportunities to be active in their community and 87% said it promotes social cohesion in society. A high proportion of teachers, 86%, support teaching British values through Citizenship education even though many (44%) remain sceptical about the way these have been defined. ACT's view is that it would be more appropriate to express the fundamental British values as democratic values in the context of Citizenship education.

Recommendations:

- I. The role of Citizenship education must be clarified so the aims of the subject are widely understood and include a strong emphasis on democratic values.
- II. Citizenship should be a statutory entitlement for ALL pupils in ALL school types (with no exemptions), in addition to Citizenship remaining a statutory National Curriculum subject for pupils aged 11 to 16 with programmes of study.
- III. In addition Citizenship should be made statutory in key stages 1 and 2 for pupils aged 5 to 11 and included as a component of 16-19 study programmes to ensure continuity and progression in the subject.

3. Citizenship curriculum and qualifications

Q5 Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

3.1 High-quality and effective Citizenship education is found in schools that have several key characteristics:

- Citizenship is a priority, strongly embedded in the curriculum
- there are Citizenship trained teachers who lead and coordinate teaching
- specialists are supported by the Senior Leadership team
- Citizenship as a subject is part of a whole-school approach, manifested in the culture and ethos of the school and in the school's relations with the wider community.

The DfE-funded Longitudinal Study of Citizenship directed by the NFER from 2001-2010¹⁸ also showed that pupil outcomes in Citizenship improve where there is regular time for

¹⁸ <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/cels/>

Citizenship lessons planned and taught by trained Citizenship teachers to allow for depth of study and progression in learning and attainment.

3.2 When Citizenship is planned and taught well the impact and benefit to students becomes clear. A Year 12 student who participated in a focus group at a school in Kent commented, 'Citizenship is important as it increases understanding of the world around us....We need to become critical thinkers and find good sources of information. Citizenship helps us do this. Topics like democracy, voting and educating us on real news, not myths, around refugees etc. is really important.' A Year 8 student at the same school said, 'We would never get these topics elsewhere in the curriculum ...Citizenship helps you prepare for the world more than other subjects, it is real life stuff we learn'. At a school in Portsmouth, a Year 10 student commented, 'It is equally important as Maths, English and Science'. Another said that Citizenship 'expands your knowledge of what is happening in society and helps us to understand how the government works'; and that 'Citizenship teaches you a lot about responsibility, and we value how we got to the point we have in our society, for example through equality laws.'

3.3 The 2014 changes to the National Curriculum led to an unfortunate narrowing of the subject curriculum for Citizenship. Key aspects of subject content were removed leaving the emphasis on national institutions. This was at the expense of learning about: local democracy; public services and NGOs; freedom of speech; the role of the media in holding those in power to account and shaping and informing public opinion; human rights and equalities; diversity and change in society, including the role of migration; and practical experiences of active citizenship and democratic participation.

3.4 In the ACT survey 88% agreed active citizenship to give students a real experience of participation in politics at school and in the wider community is essential to effective Citizenship education. Schools can do this in a range of ways if there is sufficient curriculum time available, with the involvement of different members of the wider community and giving their pupils a say in choosing the issues and action they undertake. For example, active citizenship can involve students in different forms of campaigning, organising public meetings or exhibitions to raise awareness of issues, running social enterprise activities, participating in local decision-making within and beyond the school or college through student councils or parliaments and other youth forums. Recent research has demonstrated that the positive impact of active citizenship in school continues into young adulthood, in relation to people's attitudes towards, and their actual levels of, political participation (Keating & Janmaat, 2016)¹⁹.

3.5 The narrowing of the curriculum has coincided with a worrying decline in the numbers of Citizenship teachers. Since 2010, DfE workforce statistics show that numbers of Citizenship teachers and the amount of teaching time given to the subject has halved²⁰. The number of those training as specialist Citizenship teachers has fallen from 243 in 2010 to just 54 in 2016 according to DfE figures²¹. Consequently, in schools where the subject is taught there is a reliance on non-specialist teachers, who do not have the Citizenship subject knowledge or pedagogical repertoire to interpret the minimal teaching requirements in the National Curriculum and plan a coherent and meaningful Citizenship curriculum. This is unacceptable for any curriculum subject.

3.6 Effective Citizenship teaching requires a well planned curriculum and sufficient lesson time. The Ofsted subject monitoring report for Citizenship 2013 highlighted the need to develop and deepen learning of key concepts and knowledge through well-planned Citizenship provision and that schools that rely on teaching Citizenship through other subjects often have ‘less effective provision’; and that insufficient teacher subject knowledge leads to ‘limited and superficial learning’.²²The ACT survey showed 60% of teachers have less than an hour a week in which to teach the subject at key stage 3 (age 11 to 14) and key stage 4 (age 14 to 16) and about a quarter of these have less than 30 minutes a week. More than half, (54%) agreed the current National Curriculum programmes of study at key stages 3 and 4 do not provide sufficient breadth and depth of study. Similar numbers, 53%, say the primary Citizenship programmes of study also need improving. In fact the DfE non-statutory framework for primary Citizenship has not been updated since 2001 when it was first published, leaving a disjoint between primary and secondary Citizenship education.

Citizenship Qualifications

3.7 As with any subject, it is important to recognise students’ attainment and achievement in Citizenship. Some schools choose to do this through qualifications in Citizenship Studies because they believe it gives public recognition and status to the subject and helps with understanding among parents, pupils, employers and the wider community. National Qualifications in Citizenship Studies have existed for almost 20 years with the first A level introduced in 1998 and GCSE in 2001.

3.8 Recent changes to qualifications mean that the A level Citizenship Studies will no longer be available to students from 2018. GCSEs in Citizenship Studies are now focused on the development of knowledge, with assessments as end-of-course examinations rather than a combination of teacher assessment and examination. The active citizenship projects undertaken by students as part of the qualification is now just 15% of the overall marks, down from 60%. ACT is talking with teachers about these changes. Some have expressed concern about the lack of support and guidance from Awarding Organisations in teaching the new qualifications.

3.9 The number of students achieving GCSE Citizenship Studies peaked in 2009 at just over 96,000 but in 2017 was at just over 18,500. GCSE Citizenship Studies has been negatively affected by a number of factors including the removal of short course GCSEs (worth half a full GCSE) from school performance tables, and by the drive to focus on Ebacc subjects. In practice this means many students do not get the option of studying Citizenship at GCSE or they are forced to choose between Citizenship, Ebacc subjects they have not already taken as requirement by the school, and other non- Ebacc subjects such as RE, music or art. Whilst, technically, Citizenship is a statutory subject at key stage 4 in state-maintained secondary schools and this means all students in this phase should receive Citizenship education, the reality is that provision for the subject is often linked to the offer of qualifications.

3.10 The current policy not to redevelop A level Citizenship Studies means the subject has no formal recognition in general education beyond GCSE²³. Students are denied the opportunity to progress to an advanced level of study in Citizenship and there is no pathway to the study of Political and Social Sciences at University. Other developments such as Citizenship versions of the Extended Project Qualification could be explored to provide alternative routes to recognise attainment beyond GCSE.

Recommendations:

- IV. The DfE should strengthen National Curriculum Citizenship by including knowledge and understanding of citizen action and participation in active citizenship. Any revision should also address the breadth of study and missing content.
- V. Citizenship Studies should be available as GCSE and A level qualifications and the Extended Project Qualification should be developed to include Citizenship projects to encourage a wider range of students to have their learning recognised in the subject.
- VI. GCSE Citizenship Studies should be added to the list of qualifications included for humanities in the Ebacc.
- VII. The DfE should monitor the impact of qualification reforms on take up of the subject and publish information through the explicit inclusion of GCSE Citizenship Studies in their statistics.

4. What else is needed to support Citizenship?

²³ Credit based units from Laser Learning Award on 'Active Citizenship in the Local Community' have just been published.

Q6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Should they include a greater political element?

Q12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Strengthening practice and effective evaluation of Citizenship

4.1 The Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship that was established by the DfE rightly points to the need to evaluate the state of Citizenship in schools and better exemplify and disseminate effective Citizenship practice. When Citizenship was introduced in schools in 2002 DfE Ministers were keen to evaluate its effectiveness and build a robust evidence base to improve policy and practice. They commissioned NFER to undertake the Longitudinal Study (CELS) from 2001 to 2010, ensured England's participation in the two IEA international studies of civic and citizenship education (CIVED in 1999 and ICCS in 2009)²⁴ so as to compare progress with other countries and encouraged Ofsted to carry out regular subject reviews of Citizenship. However, since 2010 that evidence base for Citizenship has been allowed to wither on the vine. There has been no follow up to CELS, England did not participate in the latest IEA study (ICCS16) and Ofsted have ceased subject reviews. In fact Ofsted rarely comment on Citizenship at all in inspection reports even where a school has a curriculum for Citizenship that contributes to key elements of the inspection framework. They are also failing to report on non-compliance with the statutory National Curriculum. The ACT membership voted to support the recommendations in the Expert Group's National Action Plan – 'Citizenship for All'. ACT members agree that government and Ofsted are key partners along with Citizenship organisations in working to evaluate and improve the quality and standard of Citizenship education in more schools. There is an urgent need to build a clear, coherent national picture of Citizenship education following the recent curriculum and qualification reforms through research and evaluation data.

4.2 The approach to Citizenship education in England was informed by reviewing best practice at European and international level. As one of the last countries in Europe to introduce Citizenship as part of the school curriculum there was much to learn from global networks and practice in other countries. Prior to and following 2002, DfE Ministers encouraged England's active involvement in citizenship networks in Europe involving the Council of Europe, European Commission and Eurydice as well as globally through the British Council and IEA studies²⁵. From 2002 to 2010, England was viewed internationally as one of the leading exponents of effective Citizenship education and countries were keen to learn from our experience. However, since 2010 Citizenship practice in other countries has begun to outstrip ours, particularly in the Nordic countries including Finland, and Austria to name a few. This has coincided with DfE disengagement from European and global Citizenship education networks and evaluations²⁶ leading to a missed opportunity to continue to measure our practice against other countries and contribute to and learn from such networks.

²⁴<https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/the-international-civic-and-citizenship-education-study-iccs/>

Citizenship and National Citizen Service

4.3 Opportunities for Citizenship education beyond general education should be encouraged so that young people continue to practise and learn Citizenship and active citizenship in new contexts. The Government’s flagship youth programme, National Citizen Service, is a case in point where links can be made between general education and the youth programmes. However, to date, connections are not well made and opportunities to develop meaningful action are being missed. The ACT survey showed 56% of respondents said their pupils do not participate in NCS and 75% said there was no connection between the NCS and the teaching of Citizenship in their school or college.

4.4 In 2013 ACT was commissioned by NCS trust to develop exemplar teaching materials and a student social action tool kit. These were updated and republished in 2016 to align with the reformed curriculum. However, the materials have not been widely published or disseminated and initial plans to encourage NCS providers to work with the materials and make links with Citizenship teachers when they visit schools do not appear to have been implemented. Planned DfE guidance to schools and colleges on National Citizen Service, should include clear links to the curriculum subject of Citizenship and the ACT materials and although this is expected, it has not yet been published.

Making Citizenship visible in education policy

4.5 Currently a number of government departments are putting efforts and resources into public policy that supports Citizenship education and active citizenship. The Home Office funded ACT to work with schools on Citizenship curriculum projects to develop anti-extremism education through its Prevent innovation fund; the Cabinet Office funds work to educate young people about democracy and voting; the Office for Civil Society at the Department of Culture Media and Sport funds social action, National Citizen Service and new training for Community Organisers; DFID has funded the Global Learning Programme including global citizenship.

4.6 The Department for Education have not provided any significant support for Citizenship education or Citizenship teacher training and development since 2008, although just recently the DfE has funded a small project to promote British values through classroom debate resources for teachers which links with Citizenship, History and RE, and this project is being undertaken by ACT.

4.7 The absence of a clear communication policy to schools about Citizenship, in particular following the reform of the National Curriculum in 2014, is a problem. For example, it led some schools to assume that the rumoured removal of the subject must have happened and, three years on, some still do not know that Citizenship remains in the National Curriculum or has a GCSE. Consequently some schools have simply stopped teaching the subject.

4.8 The DfE could and should do more to clearly signal to all schools that Citizenship is an important curriculum subject with a clear contribution to make to the wider education agendas, for instance by making references to Citizenship in Ministerial speeches. They could emphasise that Citizenship provides the curriculum location, content and knowledge for exploring British values, Prevent and anti-extremist education. They could also acknowledge that Citizenship lessons provide the space to engage with students on a wide range of topical and controversial issues, as well as supporting greater social cohesion, equality and social justice. Trained and experienced Citizenship teachers are adept at handling such topics and issues. They should be valued as education leaders and experts who can work with other members of staff who lack the confidence or expertise.

Recommendations:

- VII. The government need to be seen to be valuing and promoting Citizenship education in all schools and colleges. A DfE Minister and a Senior Civil servant should be given the remit to develop coherent policy and communication for Citizenship education and Citizenship teacher training and development, as well as to coordinate with other government departments working on citizenship policy.
- VIII. The DfE should ensure that there is a strong and robust evidence base for Citizenship education which can be used to develop and maintain effective policy and practice. This evidence base should include commissioning evaluation and research and involve active participation in Citizenship education networks at the European and international level.
- IX. The Expert Subject Advisory Group’s National Action Plan ‘Citizenship for all’ should be supported by the DfE to ensure the quality of citizenship provision in schools is improved, more Citizenship teachers are trained, adequate teaching resources are available, links are made to NCS, and quality is monitored and reported through regular inspection and evaluation by Ofsted.
- X. The DfE should promote Citizenship initial teacher education as a ‘priority’ subject and demonstrate that Citizenship and Citizenship specialist expertise is valued by including the subject in the National and Specialist Leaders of Education and Teaching Schools programmes.

5. Other issues

Q2. Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role?

Q4. What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

Q12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Votes at 16, voter registration and graduation ceremonies

5.1 The ACT survey also asked questions related to other aspects of the Committees enquiry. If the franchise is extended, then clearly Citizenship education will become a critical route to ensuring younger voters are informed about their new political rights. The survey findings include:

93% agreed voter registration should be automatic for all eligible citizens

83% agree Schools should promote voter registration as part of Citizenship education

69% agree that 16 and 17 year olds should be given the right to vote in elections

50% agree that Graduation Ceremonies should be used to recognise Citizenship achievements.

Citizenship ceremonies

5.2 Manchester University has been working with the Citizenship department at Altrincham Girls' Grammar School to explore with pupils notions of how British identity is experienced by new citizens. The university interviewed new entrant citizens about their experiences of becoming British citizens and the reasons why they chose to become citizens. It developed Case studies and a framework of activities to use with pupils as part of Citizenship education. The pilot materials have been used successfully and are being further developed.

School and College Case studies

5.3 ACT is happy to provide further information as case studies or for Committee visits to schools providing high quality Citizenship in primary, secondary and post-16 education.

Association of the Lord-Lieutenants – written evidence (CCE0035)

The Association is a voluntary organisation which provides guidance and advice to the 98²⁷ Lord-Lieutenants of counties²⁸ in all four countries of the United Kingdom. Lord-Lieutenants are appointed by The Queen on the recommendation of the Prime Minister (the devolved administrations are involved in the process) and serve from the date of their appointment until their 75th birthday at the latest²⁹. They thus provide a relatively long-term point of continuity in their counties. The office is unpaid. Lord-Lieutenants represent The Queen in their counties, and carry out many of Her functions at a local level, such as presenting certain honours, medals and awards. They also assess nominations for honour, both personal and for The Queen’s Award for Voluntary Service, and seek to encourage good nominations for both. They maintain close links with local units of Her Majesty’s Forces and their associated Reserves and Cadets; and, in England and Wales, they lead the local magistracy as Chairmen of the Advisory Committee on Justices of the Peace, in liaison with the Ministry of Justice. Lord-Lieutenants are supported in their role by a network of Deputy Lieutenants, also unpaid. In appointing their Deputies Lord-Lieutenants can and do reflect the diversity of their communities.

Lord-Lieutenants also have an undefined, but important, community role which is to promote a spirit of co-operation within their counties by encouraging voluntary service, and benevolent organisations, and by taking an active interest in the business, industrial, cultural and social life of their counties and the voluntary activity that goes on within them.

Lord-Lieutenants are strictly non-political. This enables them to work in their counties with all sections and communities without politics forming a barrier; but it also means that in responding to the Committee’s consultation the Association is unable to take a view on the policy questions that they address. Nonetheless the Association considers that the experience and activities of Lord-Lieutenants do enable them to offer evidence which it is hoped will assist the Committee in its deliberations. The Association also considers that it is useful for the Committee to be aware of the Lieutenancy as one of the mechanisms available to help with implementing any conclusions it may come to in its final Report.

The Committee’s Questions

²⁷47 in England, 35 in Scotland, 8 in Wales and 8 in Northern Ireland.

²⁸ Ceremonial, rather than administrative, counties, and including some cities.

²⁹ It is unusual for a Lord-Lieutenant to step down before reaching 75. In Scotland four Lord Provosts are automatically appointed as the Lord-Lieutenants of their cities (Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee and Aberdeen).

The Association proposes to offer no evidence on Questions 3, 4 and 11 since that would involve expressing views on policy, and for the purposes of this evidence does not wish to comment on Question 12.

1. One of the fundamental purposes of Lord-Lieutenants is to promote cohesion within their counties. That involves identifying and promoting values that all citizens can subscribe to without stifling individual and cultural freedom. Given their close connection to the Crown Lord-Lieutenants seek to uphold, and to unite their communities in support of a constitutional Monarchy. In particular they have seen it as part of their role to try to ensure that the role of The Queen and the Royal Family is fully understood in their communities. This was particularly marked on the occasion of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee when Lord-Lieutenants made special efforts to ensure that schoolchildren understood the Monarchy, and the Association has made educational material (including PowerPoint presentations) available to Lord-Lieutenants to help them to continue this process. Lord-Lieutenants also play a key role in Royal visits to their areas, so that local activities and the people involved in them are able to receive direct Royal recognition. The Association believes that the potential of the Monarchy as a focus for bringing people together should not be underestimated. The Queen is the Queen of every citizen, and Lord-Lieutenants are able to testify from direct experience to the high regard in which she is held among all sections of the community. As The Queen's representatives Lord-Lieutenants have a welcome entrée into a variety of diverse ethnic, minority and other groups. They are very often invited officially to local festivals and events put on by local communities, or to open local community facilities. All this gives them an opportunity to foster common values in a way that other officials might find more difficult and to bring together a wide range of agencies and organisations to look at local problems.
2. This question touches on a number of areas where Lord-Lieutenants are involved. Following on from the theme of the previous question, the Association would stress the potential of The Queen and the Royal Family to foster a sense of belonging among all citizens. Lord-Lieutenants have embraced citizenship ceremonies for those attaining British citizenship through naturalisation, and they or their deputies regularly preside at them, greeting each new citizen personally and making a speech of welcome as a very visible sign of the importance attached to the occasion. So far as education is concerned, Lord-Lieutenants do go into schools to try to increase understanding of the Monarchy, and, as previously mentioned, the Association has provided resource material for this purpose. The Association cannot offer a view on whether there should be educational or ceremonial requirements for those who are citizens by birth; but if such requirements were to be introduced Lord-Lieutenants would be willing to contribute to them on matters to do with the Monarchy and all aspects of cohesion within the community under the Crown.

5. Much of this question involves taking a view on policy, but the Association can suggest that the unique local standing of Lord-Lieutenants as non-political representatives of the Crown gives them a particular advantage when it comes to encouraging young people to take an interest in constitutional matters; and they seek to do just that, as has already been explained. They would be willing to participate in any new arrangements that covered their particular responsibilities.
6. Lord-Lieutenants are involved with many activities that encourage young people to play an active role in the community, though not the National Citizen Service in particular. Historically Lord-Lieutenants owe their existence to the Crown's wish to improve local militias in the 16th century, and this has led to a particular link with uniformed youth organisations such as the Scouts and Girl Guides and St John and, in particular, the Army Cadet Force, the Sea Cadets and the Air Training Corps. Although clearly these last three have military origins they are not intended to be recruiting organisations for the regular forces, and their aim is to develop young people through adventure and challenge in an atmosphere of comradeship so that they become confident and active citizens. Lord-Lieutenants encourage all such activities. They contribute directly to their aims by appointing exceptional young people from a range of organisations as Lord-Lieutenants' Cadets, who accompany the Lord-Lieutenant on official duties and thereby gain an increased understanding of wider aspects of citizenship and public life. Any recommendations of the Committee that encouraged the development of youth organisations as a way of fostering good citizenship would be welcomed and actively supported by the Association.
7. While the Association is unable to comment on, or suggest, new policy initiatives it would point to the existing mechanisms, in particular the honours system, which has traditionally offered recognition of meritorious service to the community, and which offers scope for encouraging civic engagement. The relatively small number of honours awarded in each round means that this scope is limited, but the local profile of awards should not be underestimated. Lord-Lieutenants do not themselves nominate people for honours, but they can and do encourage the community to make nominations, and are involved in the assessment of honours nominations, enabling them to endorse particularly worthy candidates from their own direct experience or that of their Deputies. Lord-Lieutenants and their Deputies also play an important role in assessing local nominations for Queen's Awards for Voluntary Service. This often involves visiting nominated organisations and holding detailed local discussion before recommendations are put forward to the national panel. This is one way among many in which Lord-Lieutenants keep in touch with, and encourage, the voluntary sector.
8. Naturally the Association would identify as common values those that stem from Lord-Lieutenants' role as representatives of the Crown, namely a constitutional Monarchy, democracy and the rule of law. As already mentioned the Association would particularly wish to underline The Queen's unifying potential stemming from the regard in which she is held among all communities, and would willingly participate in initiatives to realise that potential to the maximum. So far as the rule of law is concerned, Lord-Lieutenants in England and Wales are directly involved in the courts system through their Chairmanship of Advisory Committees for Justices of the Peace. Although it is not the role of the Association to identify threats to the values it has identified it would always urge careful consideration of proposals for changes to the administration of justice that might lessen opportunities for direct participation by citizens in the justice system or affect access to justice at the local level.

9. Any feeling among communities and groups that they have been “left behind” is likely to stem from the experiences of individuals at the local level. It is therefore at the local level that initiatives to increase engagement are likely to produce the most immediately visible results. Lord-Lieutenants, being outside the political system, are well placed to provide local leadership and active encouragement of initiatives to improve inclusiveness and cohesion. The Association would suggest that any recommendations on this issue should include steps that can be taken at a local level as well as national policy initiatives. Lord-Lieutenants have unique experience of the particular factors that affect rural as opposed to urban areas, and, indeed, the different factors that apply in all four countries of the United Kingdom. The fact that an appointment as a Lord-Lieutenant normally lasts for many years means that they have a deep knowledge of what goes on in their counties and their official, yet non-political, status means that they can gain the confidence of, and foster contacts between, groups that might otherwise not normally communicate with each other.
10. The Association would again point to the desirability of fostering common values beneficial to cohesion and integration that do not conflict with cultural and individual opinions and loyalties. Lord-Lieutenants are an important part of a local mechanisms for encouraging the dissemination of such values.

Additional comments

Although this evidence has stressed the non-political nature of the Lieutenancy it should not be assumed that there is no contact between Lord-Lieutenants and their local authorities or other agencies within their Counties. Lord-Lieutenants and their Deputies will normally be in regular discussion with Chief Executives and Leaders to review matters, including economic and community development, opportunities for Royal visits, nominations for Queen's Awards or for national honours or even Royal Garden Party invitations, which are highly valued ways in which local community engagement can be recognised. Likewise there is regular contact with Chief Constables, local religious leaders, voluntary and youth organisations, and every organisation that goes to make up the life of the community. Without wishing to labour the point their ability to be involved in every aspect of local life without any political or personal axe to grind gives them a major role in fostering cohesion and inclusion.

Association of the Lord-Lieutenants – written evidence (CCE0035)

The Association would be very happy to assist the Committee further if it would be useful.

23 August 2017

Carina Badger – written evidence (CCE0159)

(Private individual: solicitor, qualified teacher (QTS) and advocate).

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

This is a very broad question for this sort of submission. My focus in this submission is on citizenship and civic engagement in schools. I would guide the committee to the contents of the Crick Report (<http://dera.ioe.ac.uk/4385/1/crickreport1998.pdf>) of 1998. Whilst rather old now, the findings of that report remain pertinent.

In particular, paragraph 1.1: “We unanimously advise the Secretary of State that citizenship and the teaching of democracy, construed in a broad sense that we will define, is so important both for schools and the life of the nation that there must be a statutory requirement on schools to ensure that it is part of the entitlement of all pupils. It can no longer sensibly be left as uncoordinated local initiatives which vary greatly in number, content and method. This is an inadequate basis for animating the idea of a common citizenship with democratic values.”

And paragraph 1.5: “We aim at no less than a change in the political culture of this country both nationally and locally: for people to think of themselves as active citizens, willing, able and equipped to have an influence in public life and with the critical capacities to weigh evidence before speaking and acting; to build on and to extend radically to young people the best in existing traditions of community involvement and public service, and to make them individually Introduction 7 Part One confident in finding new forms of involvement and action among themselves. There are worrying levels of apathy, ignorance and cynicism about public life. These, unless tackled at every level, could well diminish the hoped-for benefits both of constitutional reform and of the changing nature of the welfare state. To quote from a speech by the Lord Chancellor earlier this year (on which we end this report): ‘We should not, must not, dare not, be complacent about the health and future of British democracy.’”

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

The introduction of the Academies Act 2010 took many state schools out of the remit of the National Curriculum (and therefore outside the requirement to teach Citizenship) requiring only that they implement a curriculum that is broad and balanced (Academies Act 2010, Section 1).

The UK Government's supposed commitment to civic education is therefore questionable. The UK Government has taken strides in other areas to ensure that curricula in non-maintained schools include specific topics by virtue of being a condition in the master funding agreements. For example, all academies must "provide for the teaching of evolution". Further, all academies must actively promote: "fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs" (DFE2014:19). I raise this to highlight ways in which civic education (including an exploration of what is meant by "British identity") might be made a mandatory part of the curriculum for all state schools. Yet thus far, the UK Government has not availed itself of this opportunity with regard to citizenship education.

DFE (2014) Academy and free school: multi-model master funding agreement, Department for education, London.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

No comment.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

No comment but see comments above regarding Citizenship education.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

As recommended in the Crick report, Citizenship education should be compulsory. It may be that the subject is ill-understood. I taught Citizenship at Key Stages 3 and 4. To give you some flavour of aims in teaching in this area, allow me to explain some of the topics I taught:

- Council tax: what it is, what does it pay for? Who makes those decisions.
- Budget: how does Government balance the budget? What are some of the competing areas requesting money (e.g. Health, Military etc)? What is "national debt"? Where does the State get money from?

- Voting: How to vote (with a mock election including a ballot box and polling station). How to understand manifestos. What do different parties say. Why is voting important. Debate on whether voting should be compulsory. Debate on whether voting age should be lowered. Who you vote for (i.e. MP), how a government is formed and what your MP does.
- Living in a diverse Britain: Equality Act 2010 and repercussions for illegal acts (e.g. wedding cake case, risk of grievance procedure if in employment etc). Difficulties of reconciling competing rights: free speech vs anti-racism laws. Looking at legal case studies to understand the legal landscape. Role models from Diversity Role Models came in to discuss lived experiences of being LGBT and anti-homophobic bullying.
- Global issues: foreign aid; fair trade vs free trade; role of NATO, EFTA, EU. What the EU does; debate on Brexit.

Consistent with teachers' legal obligations to teach in a non-biased way, teaching in this area should be presented in a manner that encourages debate rather than directive teaching, to the extent appropriate. For example, free trade vs fair trade: competing claims, pros and cons of each, coming to conclusions but understanding that there are rarely black and white answers.

A key component of Citizenship education before it was amended by the previous government (under Michael Gove MP, then Secretary of State for Education) was the projects element. In principle, imagine that a class of young people is asked to:

- Work in groups
- Choose a topic for social change (locally, nationally or internationally)
- Come up with a plan for how to effect change, which could include increasing awareness of the topic amongst peers
- Research different sides of the debate to understand why people may not agree with them
- Execute that plan
- Interview people in authority (e.g. teachers, MPs, people in industry) to gain advice and obtain their views
- Reflect on their project

To give you some examples of topics undertaken by my students:

- Campaign for compulsory education amongst all Year 7s in their school on basic animal welfare (cats, dogs, rabbits etc).
- Petition for better lighting at local playground.
- Credit-card size cards with students' rights in the event of being stopped and searched
- Writing to MP and other people in authority with influence as part of a campaign for votes at 16
- Persuading school canteen to stock more fair trade products
- Anti-bullying programme that includes a buddying system for Year 7 students

I want to stress, none of these were my idea. All of the topics had to be researched to understand why people may not agree with them (e.g. for the fair trade project, an understanding of costs of items such as bananas).

There are a number of benefits to young people:

- Across a range of projects, students become more aware of the civic and political landscape in which they live: local councillors, MPs, how laws are made etc.
- Across a range of projects, students develop skills in civic participation.
- Students develop skills in team work, strategic thinking, working to a timetable and (where applicable) a budget (if given by the school); reflecting on what went well and where they can improve.

These projects have nearly disappeared from the educational landscape. They no longer form part of the Citizenship GCSE and schools are increasingly pressured towards grade-yielding activities. Some youth groups and extraordinary teachers continue this mantle, but the reality is that few young people now will have opportunities within school to participate in such projects.

I absolutely suggest that you consider how such projects might be brought back within compulsory schooling in State schools.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

No comment.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

No comment.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

LGBT rights are particularly at threat. The committee may wish to review submissions (or specifically request evidence from):

Carina Badger – written evidence (CCE0159)

- Stonewall
- Diversity Role Models
- The Proud Trust

on the impact of homophobic, biphobic and transphobic bullying amongst young people.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

No comment.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

No comment.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

No comment directly on this question; but an observation that Citizenship education in schools should not be reliant purely on an ability to write well. The information and learning should be more accessible precisely because the benefit of the subject is for all; not the academically-minded few.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

The Proud Trust in Manchester helps to organise citizenship days in which young people can undertake campaign projects, as referenced above.

8 September 2017

Associate Professor Philip Bamber – written evidence (CCE0194)

This short submission is in relation to the following lines of enquiry:

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support?

1 As part of revised guidance for promoting children and young people's spiritual, moral, social and cultural development (SMSC), the 2014 OFSTED inspection framework in England introduced the expectation that schools 'promote the fundamental British values (FBV) of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs' (Ofsted 2014:35). This echoed the professional standards for teachers in England introduced 2 years earlier that requires teachers do not undermine these stated FBV (DfE, 2012).

2 The definition and role ascribed to 'Fundamental British values' first emerged within the 2011 Home Office 'Prevent' anti-terror strategy. 'Prevent' defined 'extremism' (2011. Annex A) as vocal or active opposition to these FBV, illustrating the decisive role of security in driving values education in a post-multicultural space. Locating the FBV requirement in the Prevent Duty and in the Ofsted Inspection framework, encouraged a sense of social crisis by conflating education with national security in ways which many found troubling and divisive. Criticisms included the lack of public debate about the meanings of Britishness and the relation to conceptually unclear values (Richardson and Bolloten 2015; Smith, 2016).

3 The requirement for English schools to promote FBV has provoked concern and criticism from a range of commentators. This has highlighted the perceived lack of clarity about the values themselves and the sense of parochialism invoked by the agenda (Richardson and Bolloten 2015). The mundanity of consensus values that attempt to speak to everyone have been criticised as 'little more than feel-good words devoid of real substance' (Arthur, 2005: 245). Arguably attempts to formulate a common set of values militates against the celebration of diversity inherent in a liberal democratic society.

4 The seductive simplicity of the concise list of the FBV belies the conceptual nuances invoked by these values and the complexity of their diverse manifestations within practice. Conflict between particular values that are potentially irreconcilable is concealed. For instance, the guidance for schools (Department for Education [DfE], 2014) is ambivalent regarding the meaning of toleration. It fails to distinguish between a range of interpretations that include a genuine openness and deliberative engagement with difference to a grudging or uncritical acceptance of difference. Disputes around the idea of tolerance reverberate in practice. Concerns about both ‘negative toleration’ that simply requires ‘putting up’ with something towards which a negative attitude is held and ‘positive toleration’ that entails naïvely celebrating diversity has led to calls to move beyond tolerance to constructively engage with differences through dialogue for mutual understanding.

5 Our research into teacher understanding of British Values at Liverpool Hope University is ongoing and we would be willing to share further information with the House of Lords Select Committee as required. Despite the problematic nature of teaching ‘British values’ as outlined above, we have also found that the focus on teaching values opens up a more progressive space for developing criticality– for example through opening up pedagogical approaches such as philosophy for children and through nurturing encounters with others / engaging the community through initiatives such as service-learning (Bamber, 2016).

6 The committee should be aware that at the same time UNESCO has set out a vision for education emphasizing holistic aspects of learning that move ‘beyond the development of knowledge and cognitive skills to build values, soft skills and attitudes among learners that can facilitate international cooperation and promote social transformation’ (UNESCO 2014: 9). The subsequent Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) seek to harness international collaboration to better understand how education as a public good can more effectively nurture peace, tolerance, sustainable livelihoods and human fulfilment for all (see for example Bourn et al, 2017). Global Citizenship Education is seen as central to these efforts: an indicator for success in meeting SDG 4 is the extent to which global citizenship education is mainstreamed at all levels in (a) national education policies, (b) curricula, (c) teacher education and (d) student assessment (UNESCO, 2016: 287). In addition, the OECD have are developing a framework for global competency (OECD, 2016) to be used as the basis for international comparisons in the 2018 Programme for International Student Assessment (PISA). The SDGs and OECD measure of global competency present policy opportunities that we must exploit to help us move beyond narrow understandings of Britishness in order to prepare our young people for life in a modern Britain and global society.

Professor Martyn Barrett, Emeritus Professor of Psychology, University of Surrey– written evidence (CCE0037)

This evidence is submitted on an individual basis. It addresses the questions raised in paragraph 5 of the Call for Evidence, in particular the first question: “What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?” It also addresses the aim stated in the third paragraph of the Call: “to identify new ways of building bridges within and between communities, and to support civic engagement”.

My response to these questions is based on work that I have been conducting for the Council of Europe since 2013 on a project entitled “Competences for Democratic Culture” (CDC). The overall goal of this project is to enhance levels of active democratic citizenship, and to encourage greater respect for democratic processes and for cultural diversity, using formal education for this purpose. In order to achieve this goal, the project has developed a comprehensive description of the competences that citizens require for participating in democratic culture and intercultural dialogue, and has prepared detailed guidance for education policymakers and practitioners on how education can be used to equip young people with all of these competences. The project has also produced guidance on how education can be used to equip young people with the competences that are required to identify and deconstruct extremist propaganda and hate speech encountered on the internet and in broadcast and print media. The CDC project forms a core component of the Council of Europe’s Action Plan on “The fight against violent extremism and radicalisation leading to terrorism”, was endorsed by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in April 2016, and was the main focus of the 25th Session of the Council of Europe Standing Conference of Ministers of Education held in Brussels in April 2016 at which the Education Ministers of the member states issued a Final Declaration welcoming and endorsing the CDC Framework and calling on the Council of Europe to assist member states in examining and implementing the Framework in their national education systems. The UK was a signatory of the Declaration.

The challenges

The CDC project was set up in the context of the very serious challenges that are currently facing European societies. These include:

- The decline over the past two decades in citizens’ levels of satisfaction with democracy and levels of trust in formal democratic processes, national parliaments and national governments.³⁰

³⁰ Polavieja, J.G. (2013). Economic crisis, political legitimacy and social cohesion, in D. Gallie (Ed.) (2013), Economic Crisis, Quality of Work and Social Integration: The European Experience, Oxford: Oxford University

Professor Martyn Barrett, Emeritus Professor of Psychology, University of Surrey– written evidence (CCE0037)

- The increase over the past decade in levels of hate crime, violence, hostility, intolerance, prejudice, harassment and discrimination towards minority ethnic and religious groups.³¹
- The rise in support for extreme right-wing political parties that openly espouse Islamophobic, antisemitic, xenophobic and racist rhetoric.³²
- The ongoing security threat that is posed by radicalisation, violent extremism and terrorism.³³

Can education help to address these challenges?

One way in which citizens' commitment to and engagement with democratic processes and institutions can be enhanced is through the formal education system. There is clear evidence that appropriate educational input and practices can boost democratic engagement.³⁴ There is also clear evidence that educational interventions can be used to counter prejudice and intolerance towards other national, ethnic and religious groups³⁵, and to reduce support for violent extremism, especially when that education is delivered in collaboration with local partners and community organisations.³⁶

Education can therefore be used to address all of the challenges that European societies are currently facing. However, if education is to be used in this way, coordinated action is required at national level. This is because, ultimately, it is national governments that are responsible for determining the frameworks within which the contents of national curricula are determined and for making available the financial, material and human resources that are required by education institutions for delivering those curricula.

The purposes of education

It is often assumed that education has a single over-riding purpose, namely to prepare young people for future employment. However, the Council of Europe has a more comprehensive vision of education, which specifies four major purposes of education:

- Preparation for sustainable employment.
- Personal development.
- Preparation for life as active citizens in democratic societies.
- The development and maintenance of a broad, advanced knowledge base within society.

All four purposes are of equal value and all four are necessary to enable individuals to live independent lives and to take part in all spheres of modern, rapidly changing societies. These four purposes are not in conflict with one another but are complementary. For example, many of the competences people need to be employable – such as analytical and critical thinking skills, communication skills and the ability to work cooperatively as part of a group – also help to make them active citizens in democratic societies, and are also fundamental for their personal development. Likewise, the competences that are required for active citizenship are precisely those that many business leaders and employers seek in employees but report are often lacking in new recruits to the labour market.³⁷ Thus, while the CDC project has focused its attention on the competences that young people need to acquire in order to participate as active and respectful citizens in democratic societies, it should be borne in mind that these are precisely the competences that are sought by many employers and business leaders.

Background assumptions made by the CDC Framework

The CDC Framework that has been developed assumes that democracy requires not only democratic institutions but also a culture of democracy. While democracy clearly cannot exist without democratic institutions, these institutions themselves cannot function unless citizens practise a culture of democracy and hold democratic values and attitudes. Among other things, these include:

- A commitment to public deliberation.
- A willingness to express one's own opinions and to listen to the opinions of others.
- A conviction that differences of opinion and conflicts should be resolved peacefully.
- A commitment to decisions being made by majorities.
- A commitment to the protection of minorities and their rights.
- A commitment to the rule of law.

If citizens do not adhere to these values, attitudes and practices, then democratic institutions will not be able to function.

In addition, in culturally diverse societies, democratic processes and institutions require intercultural dialogue. A fundamental principle of democracy is that the people who are affected by political decisions should be able to express their views when those decisions are being made, and that decision-makers should pay attention to their views. Intercultural dialogue is the most important means through which citizens can express their views to other citizens who have different cultural affiliations from themselves. It is also a vital means through which decision-makers can come to understand the views of all citizens. This means that, in culturally diverse societies, intercultural dialogue is crucial for ensuring that all citizens are equally able to participate in public discussion, deliberation and decision-making. Democracy and intercultural dialogue are complementary in culturally diverse societies, and democracy in such a society can only function properly if it is accompanied by intercultural dialogue.

The CDC Framework has been developed specifically to assist educators to contribute to these two goals of achieving and consolidating a culture of democracy and fostering intercultural dialogue – and hence building bridges between communities – within European societies.

The three components of the CDC Framework

The CDC Framework has three main components:

Professor Martyn Barrett, Emeritus Professor of Psychology, University of Surrey– written evidence (CCE0037)

- A conceptual model of the democratic and intercultural competences that young people need to acquire in order to participate effectively in democratic culture and intercultural dialogue.
- Scaled descriptors for all of the competences that are contained in the conceptual model.
- Guidance documents for ministries of education and education practitioners on how the CDC model and descriptors can be used to inform curriculum development, pedagogical planning, assessment, and teacher education. A fifth document has been produced on how a whole-school approach may be used to implement the Framework. A sixth document explains how the Framework can be used to combat radicalisation leading to violent extremism and terrorism.

These three components are explained further below.

The first component of the CDC Framework: the conceptual model

The CDC Framework contains a conceptual model of the competences that people require to participate effectively in democratic culture and intercultural dialogue. These are the competences that education needs to promote in young people so that they are properly equipped for their future lives as democratic citizens in culturally diverse societies.

The competence model was developed through the following process:

- An audit of existing conceptual schemes of democratic competence and intercultural competence that are available in previous research and policy documents – in total, 101 such schemes were audited.
- An analysis of the 101 schemes to identify the constituent competences which they contained.
- The use of a set of principled criteria to identify the core competences contained across the 101 schemes.
- The production of a first draft of the CDC competence model.
- An international consultation with academic experts, education practitioners and policymakers, including experts nominated by the Education Ministries of the member states – the model received very strong endorsement in the consultation.
- The fine-tuning and the finalisation of the model, taking into account the feedback received in the consultation.

The conceptual model contains 20 competences in total. These are the competences that young people need to acquire if they are to function as effective democratic citizens in culturally diverse societies. The 20 competences fall into four broad categories: values,

Professor Martyn Barrett, Emeritus Professor of Psychology, University of Surrey– written evidence (CCE0037)

Importantly, some of these competences, such as cooperation skills, may be promoted already during pre-school education, whereas others, such as critical understanding of politics, law and human rights, are more suitable for targeting during secondary and/or higher education. For this reason, the CDC Framework has relevance to all levels of education, including pre-school, primary, secondary and higher education.

The second component of the CDC Framework: the descriptors

The Framework also contains descriptors for all 20 competences. Descriptors are statements or descriptions of what a person is able to do if they have mastered a particular competence. They therefore provide an operationalisation of the competences in terms of concrete behaviours. The descriptors have been formulated using the language of learning outcomes, so that they can be used directly in curriculum development, pedagogical planning and assessment.

The process of developing the descriptors involved the following stages:

- An audit of existing psychometric scales, research documents and policy documents – 98 source documents were audited.
- Scale items and statements found in these documents were extracted and rephrased to construct short statements that could potentially serve as descriptors – in total, 2,085 descriptors were written.
- These descriptors were evaluated using a series of rating tasks, validation tasks and scaling tasks that involved 3,094 teachers across Europe.
- The data collected from the teachers were used to identify a set of 447 validated and highly rated descriptors, and a smaller set of 133 key descriptors that were judged to be especially useful for indexing the achievement of the 20 competences contained in the model.
- The data were also used to scale the descriptors to different levels of proficiency – this means that the descriptors can be used to index whether a person has a basic, an intermediate or an advanced level of proficiency in any given competence.

An illustrative example of the key descriptors for one specific competence is given in Box 1 below.

Box 1: The scaled key descriptors for skills of listening and observing

- Basic level of proficiency
 - Listens attentively to other people
 - Listens carefully to differing opinions
- Intermediate level of proficiency
 - Can listen effectively in order to decipher another person’s meanings and intentions
 - Watches speakers’ gestures and general body language to help himself/herself to figure out the meaning of what they are saying
- Advanced level of proficiency
 - Pays attention to what other people imply but do not say

- Notices how people with other cultural affiliations react in different ways to the same situation

The third component of the CDC Framework: the guidance documents

The Framework also contains guidance documents that explain how the competence model and the descriptors can be used in formal education. There are six guidance documents in total. These explain in detail:

- How the CDC Framework can be used for the purposes of curriculum review and development.
- The pedagogical methods that are most appropriate for the teaching and learning of the 20 competences.
- How the Framework can be used for assessing pupils and students.
- How to apply the Framework using a whole-school approach in order to promote the development of the 20 competences.
- How teacher education and training may be adapted to support the use of the Framework in national education systems.
- How the Framework can be used to build and enhance young people’s resilience to radicalising influences and violent extremist propaganda, and to boost their commitment to democratic processes and respect for fellow citizens.

The formal launch and implementation of the CDC Framework

The six guidance documents and the validated descriptors are currently in press. They will be formally launched to the Education Ministries of the member states of the Council of Europe at the end of October 2017, at a meeting of the Prague Forum (a conference hosted by the Czech Ministry of Education).

The Education Ministries of the member states have been kept informed about the CDC project at all stages of its development, through the biannual meetings of the Council of Europe’s Steering Committee for Educational Policy and Practice (which consists of policymakers from the Education Ministries of all 47 member states). The Education Ministries have also been inputting ideas to the project throughout its development at these meetings. The Steering Committee has expressed very strong support for the CDC project since its inception in 2013.

Formally, the Framework is being offered to member states as a non-binding reference framework. This means that the member states can refer to it and use it in whatever ways they judge to be the most appropriate for their own education systems. The guidance documents outline various options for implementation and explain the issues that should be borne in mind when considering these options, but it is end-users who are required to make the decisions about which options are most suitable for use within their own countries. The Framework is intended to be supportive rather than either normative or prescriptive – it provides a set of resources that may be drawn upon and adapted by member states, as they see fit.

Ahead of the formal launch and the publication of the Framework, the Council of Europe – together with its education resource partner the European Wergeland Centre – has already delivered training in the Framework to education practitioners in 18 countries (Andorra, Armenia, Belarus, Belgium, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Estonia, France, Georgia, Germany, Greece, Luxembourg, Montenegro, Norway, Portugal, Romania, Spain and Ukraine) and two countries have already committed to implementing the framework in whole (Andorra) and in part (Ukraine). Additional member states are expected to commit to implementing the Framework in whole or in part after the formal launch has taken place in October.

Conclusion

The CDC Framework offers a systematic approach to planning the teaching, learning and assessment of competences for democratic culture and intercultural dialogue, and to introducing these competences into national education systems in ways that are coherent, comprehensive and transparent. The Framework provides an approach that can be used to equip young people with all of the competences that are needed to function as engaged and active democratic citizens, live peacefully and respectfully together with others in culturally diverse societies, and be resilient to propaganda that aims to radicalise them into violent extremism or terrorism.

Dr Koen Bartels – written evidence (CCE0197)

1. I would like to respond to your call for evidence on how to think about citizenship and civic engagement in a more vibrant, positive and integrated manner. I will especially focus on question 7 about support for civic engagement and civil society initiatives and the responsibilities of different actors involved. However, I will do so in the context of several other questions which were raised about the contemporary meaning of citizenship and civic engagement, their relation to social cohesion and integration as well as people's identity as citizens, and people feeling "left behind".

2. We seem to face something of a paradox with regards citizenship and civic engagement. On the one hand we live in an era of an unprecedented and increasing level of interconnection and interdependence. Yet at the same time that does not mean that the quality of those relationships is necessarily any higher. In fact, the state of our social and political relationships seems to suggest a strong sense of disconnection—from ourselves, others and the environment. Our dominant materialist worldview has left us socially estranged and vulnerable to separatist manipulation. It has left large segments of the population feeling isolated, left behind, excluded by 'the elite', and threatened by immigrants and globalization more generally³⁹. It also fuels unprecedented levels of poor mental health which incapacitated support services are unable to address⁴⁰.

3. What we do in these circumstances is seek to secure our own survival and our concept of who we need to take care of, who is 'us', becomes narrower and narrower. We feel a collective sense of helplessness to change the situation we are in and look to strong charismatic leaders to lead us out of here. We look to people who we believe to have more knowledge, power or resources than us to create solutions. Instead, we need to collectively find ways in which to re-connect to ourselves, others and our environment, to abandon old forms of identity and connection in order to forge new ones. In other words, the starting point for new and better forms of citizenship and civic engagement should be where people are⁴¹.

4. The way this works is as challenging as it is simple. The key is to create enabling environments in which people can connect to themselves, others, and their environment. Evidence from research I have co-produced with Tree House Liverpool CIC, an exceptionally innovative community organisation, demonstrates that creating such safe and appreciative spaces enables people to embark on a journey of personal growth, develop better relationships with those around them, and take up greater responsibility for their shared spaces and society in general⁴². In the case of Tree House, this is done by organising activities in shared spaces, i.e. the local park and adjacent area, including, yet not limited to, gardening, yoga, child-led play, tree planting, litter picking, philosophy discussions, street art, dog walking and film screenings. Yet, and this is crucial, it is not the organisation of the activities per se that is key, but the spirit in which this is done. There are tons of examples of nice community initiatives that bring people together and make a local area look better⁴³. What is distinctive of what I am suggesting is that the activities (and the organising of these) cultivate a psychologically safe and appreciative space. This enables people to be themselves (rather than hiding behind a facade), interact with others with unconditional positive regard (rather than for their own self-interest and personal gain), and understand others' point of view (rather than subsuming these under their own).

5. There is no single one-size-fits-all way in which this can be done. I cannot offer suggestions as to structures, or activities or purposes, because these all depend on the context and situation people are in and what they experience and feel in their interactions with others. Therefore, once more, this is where the starting point should be. But what is vital is that whatever shape or form an initiative takes, it should be guided by a profound ethical commitment to the quality of relationships of all those involved as well as shared abilities and willingness to be vulnerable, flexible and learn.

6. The fundamental challenge is that this does not tend to happen. It is not what people in general and governments in particular are used to. The United Kingdom has an especially poor track record when it comes to citizen engagement, as its admirable aspirations for participation, collaboration, inclusion, and empowerment have tended to end up in pathologising, patronising, controlling, manipulative practices that have had an adverse effect on socio-economic inequalities and structurally damaged people's trust in government⁴⁴. And the main barrier to enabling and sustaining community organisations continues to be government.⁴⁵ In addition, public services tend to operate through a punitive, rationalistic system which takes little to no account of the diversity of human experience and reduces the complexity of service delivery to a question of how many, how often, how long and for how much. 'Professionals' are exhorted to 'see' people through a deficit model to 'fix' them, treating them as 'things' easily characterised and categorized into groups to do things to using one or two distinguishing criteria.

7. So what I recommend government to do is not only a genuine commitment to double decentralisation but an actual empowerment of to local authorities and communities in terms of budgets, policy, and support. In contrast to the apocalyptic damage done by austerity reforms and an the continuation of centralised power, public services and communities alike should be properly supported and resourced to become psychologically safe and appreciative environments. Community initiatives should not be treated as quick and easy savings measures but should be valued (morally and financially) for their contribution to sustaining community engagement and citizenship. Public services should not solely focus on providing services and solving problems for people but, more fundamentally, on creating conditions in which we can all create spaces for feeling good, growing ourselves, and reviving our sense of connection and community. This means they should first and foremost be concerned with the quality of relationships⁴⁶: not assuming about or imposing on citizens but helping them to recognise their inner capacities to take charge of their lives and discover their own paths towards greater well-being. It requires those who claim expertise to at the very least to have humility, to accept the failures of the past, and to allow for the possibility that communities and client groups they think of as lesser and needy have more things to teach the world about how to live and work and be than they may imagine.

8. I hope the Select Committee will find these brief recommendations helpful. Please contact me if you would like any further information.

The UK Citizenship Process: Political Integration or Marginalization?

Executive summary:

The UK ‘citizenship process’ subjects immigrants to a set of requirements ostensibly intended to enhance their identification with ‘British values’.

Policy-makers suggest the policy will facilitate immigrants’ integration: as they learn about ‘life in the UK’, they will become better able to understand and navigate core institutions. Many external observers, by contrast, believe that the requirements exacerbate marginalization, constructing immigrants as objects of presumptive suspicion and concern. To gauge integration in a political sense, I use data from ‘Understanding Society’ and investigate interest in politics among noncitizens at Wave 1, comparing those who became citizens by Wave 6 to those who remained non-citizens. Those who became citizens subsequently reported lower interest in politics, relative to those who remained non-citizens. This finding reinforces the concerns of critics: the UK citizenship policy appears to do more to alienate new citizens than it does to facilitate their integration in the political sphere.

Basira – written evidence (CCE0261)

From the position of being British-Arab, we believe that citizenship education is central to enable understanding of the British value system and encourage integration.

A small booklet in the Arabic language of the British Values upon arrival will enlighten new immigrants of their rights and responsibilities towards the society at large. Combined with an obligatory course to learn English language will help/encourage them to communicate and integrate.

We need to draw the committee's attention that their identity is strongly based and influenced by religion, as it is seen or felt to be superior to their position as British citizens. And that there is a very close weaved relationship between religion and culture. With due respect to religious rights and freedoms, it is believed there needs to be more open public discussions about the common values of justice, equality and freedom; and, in particular, the rights of girls and women which may be hindered by the application of separate religious system.

In the case of newly arriving Arab- Muslim immigrants, who are coming from oppressive and authoritarian regimes, they did not have the experience of democratic and secular systems. Religious leaders should be encouraged to promote positive sections in the Quranic texts that clearly legitimize that Muslims are obliged to live by the laws of their new country. Religious leaders should be responsible for an honest explanation about values of justice and equality to be promoted based on the Quranic text too. And emphasize that it is not in contradiction of the belief.

We believe also that there is a fundamental relationship between 'values' and 'laws'; and, that one of the biggest obstacles to integration is the emergence of religious institutions, in particular Sharia Councils, where so-called Islamic laws are being passed and applied, which negate secular rights and freedoms, and in clear contradiction with British laws and human rights, especially for women. This 'Islamising' of the community is a big worry and a potential danger for the community's future engagement with the rest of society.

Citizenship education is important for all schools, Faith schools should not be exempted under any justification.

Faith leaders should take the responsibility to make a common programme to be preached in religious places aiming at humane the devil in our hearts that insist on difference and superiority.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

We have sent the report to you in its current form, in the first instance, in the interest of meeting the deadline. I look forward to hearing from you and can certainly provide further information, in other formats.

Janet Batsleer – written evidence (CCE0096)

Since May 2015 I have been engaged in a cross- European research study concerning Young People's citizenship and engagement and I am very happy to present to the Committee a short account of the initial findings of that study (www.partispace.eu). We are currently preparing comparative papers on themes of 'space', 'styles' and the pedagogical framing of young people's civic participation as well as on the specific role of Youth Councils.

In terms of 'civic 'participation' in our study there is clear evidence of a cleavage between the political domain and the socio-cultural domain, whilst the forms of social division with which the Committee will be familiar have a clear impact on issues of identity and belonging, and there are many examples of this throughout the report.

Funding and support for Youth Services and for community engagement projects has been greatly curtailed in recent years, whilst at the same time being restructured through schemes such as the National Citizen Service. Whilst other scholars who have conducted evaluations of and more critical financial assessments of the National Citizen Service than I have are better placed to comment, the loss of continuing ongoing spaces in neighbourhoods which can foster association and belonging cannot be compensated for by what is essentially a three week long summer scheme. I would be happy also to provide further information to the Committee on this issue.

I would also advise the Committee to consider the ways in which the failure to prioritise connection and mutuality lends itself to a deepening crisis, felt in many schools and across all communities, in young people's mental health. This is evident in the research we are currently conducting at MMU into the experience and response to loneliness among young people, which we are undertaking for the Co-op Foundation. Again, others will have fuller evidence on this, but I would be happy to assist the committee with suggestions of who to talk with and where to look for this evidence.

In other words, it will by no means be sufficient for the Committee to consider narrowly political accounts of the problems of democracy in relation to the non-participation of marginalised groups, and I would certainly suggest that some of the forms of socio-cultural participation to which the Partispace study points (especially in sport and in the arts in many forms) are very much worth including in the framing of the discussion, as are the forms of self-help and mutual aid being developed of necessity in many of the poorest neighbourhoods as a result of austerity policies.

To reflect, represent and serve the diverse communities of all of the United Kingdom’s nations and regions and, in doing so, support the creative economy across the United Kingdom

- 1.2 This submission seeks to be of relevance to the Inquiry by providing some recent examples of the BBC’s work in the context of these public purposes. These examples span TV, radio, online and the BBC as an organisation. Given the recent elections, we highlight specific examples from our election coverage.

Radio 1 Big Weekend

- 2.1 BBC Radio 1’s Big Weekend showcases a range of the biggest and newest musical talent from the UK as well as further afield to young UK audiences - bringing them together for a shared live music moment.
- 2.2 Radio 1’s Big Weekend travels to areas that wouldn’t usually host large scale music events of this kind. As well as shining a spotlight on the host city, in the lead-up and via the event’s coverage, Radio 1’s Big Weekend provides a major boost to the local economy.
- 2.3 To coincide with the UK City of Culture celebrations for 2017, this year the event was held in Hull, where over 50,000 music fans were able to enjoy performances from a diverse range of artists including Katy Perry, Kings of Leon, Stormzy, Rita Ora and Royal Blood - with 95 percent of the tickets going to people from the local area.

Radio 1 Academy

- 3.1 In the lead-up to Big Weekend, Radio 1 and BBC Learning produced Radio 1’s Academy - a programme of exciting outreach activity which aimed to inspire 16-19 year-olds in Hull to take the next step in creative careers.

- 3.2 Radio 1's Academy included a series of special events, local engagement and face-to-face activity in the area, beginning in February and culminating in May with a packed week of radio shows, gigs, masterclasses and Q&As featuring a host of stars from the world of music and entertainment.
- 3.3 During the five-day residency in Hull, influential figures from across the creative industries delivered exclusive hands on workshops, live music performances and industry insight, providing 16-19 year olds with the tools, contacts and information they need to take the next step in their creative careers.

Radio 1 Campaigns

- 4.1 In 2016, Radio 1 and 1Xtra's #1Million Hours campaign aimed to motivate our young listeners (age 16-24) to pledge 1 million hours of time to good causes over 12 months.
- 4.2 Throughout 2016 both networks shone a spotlight on all aspects of volunteering in a bid to highlight the benefits for young people, as well as the wider community. We worked with four featured charities, Age UK, Barnado's, Cancer Research UK and Oxfam, and pointed people to a range of volunteering opportunities, as well as inspiring people to seek out their own placements.
- 4.3 Our Editorial output included iplayer and audio documentaries and a series of special Radio 1 Surgeries. Radio 1 & 1Xtra DJs also spent time volunteering and reflected on their experiences on air across both networks. In December 2016 we comfortably reached our target of #1Million Hours pledged.
- 4.4 In 2017 Radio 1, 1Xtra and Asian Network launched 'My Mind & Me' - a year-long campaign to encourage young people to explore issues surrounding their Mental Health - aiming to get young people talking about Mental Health, to reduce the stigma around mental illness, and to raise awareness and understanding of mental health issues that affect young people.
- 4.5 We partnered with the National Citizen Service to create a group of Social Action 'Champions'. This group of young people from across the UK have been working with the stations to help shape the campaign throughout the year, offering their unique insights, stories and experiences and leading discussions on the key issues around mental health.
- 4.6 Throughout 2017 on Radio 1, 1Xtra and Asian Network, 'My Mind & Me' has offered a platform for listeners to discuss their own experiences, and will give peer to peer guidance and support covering all areas of mental well-being: from dealing with stress and pressure around exams; self-esteem; confidence and body image; and anxiety and depression.

Newsbeat

- 5.1 Newsbeat covers news, music, sport and entertainment news that is relevant to the lives of young adults. The focus is on original journalism, giving the audience a voice as well as explaining complex issues on radio, online, through social media, and by short-form visual documentaries. We look at a broad range of subjects from mental health and body image to ticket touts and gaming.
- 5.2 We've made sure our short and informative bulletins, social media videos and articles are where many of our audience are, particularly online including platforms such as Youtube, Facebook, Instagram and Snapchat. This provides listeners the opportunity to provide feedback, ideas and stories and to take part in debate.
- 5.3 Whilst we know many people listen to our Newsbeat bulletins – 7.8 million hear a bulletin or 15-minute programme every week – we have also been doing more short (30-90 second) explainer videos on a variety of topics, ranging from the election to the floods in Bangladesh, which gain millions of views and thousands of shares.
- 5.4 Newsbeat also provides a gateway to young voices and issues for the rest of BBC News. Newsbeat often serves the wider BBC audience with Newsbeat reporters and stories appearing on other outlets including the News at Six, News Channel, Today programme, BBC Radio 5live and more.
- 5.5 During the election, Newsbeat provided younger audiences with clear and jargon free coverage on the issues they want to hear about including explainer videos, infographics or debates, such as a widely shared video on social media on what the EU is.
- 5.6 The Wembley Arena debate during last year's EU Referendum was watched by nearly 700,000 young people. During the 2015 election, three quarters of the Newsbeat debate audience said it helped them understand the issues better.

Newsround

- 6.1 Newsround is the only dedicated television news service in the UK which engages directly with children, via its live bulletins which transmit every day of the week, both mornings and afternoons.
- 6.2 Newsround does not shy away from tackling the most serious of stories. It does, however, carefully curate them so that children can make sense of what is going on in the world and process it accordingly - especially as they will come across these stories in other media or in the playground anyway, but often not in a form which is suitable for them.

- 6.3 A recent example is the reporting of the Manchester bomb attacks, which emphasised the rarity of such events in society and gave the audience onward advice of who they could talk to if they were worried⁴⁷.
- 6.4 Newsround have also produced pieces that help children to understand and identify fake news, in order to help the audience maintain a balanced worldview and avoid information bubbles.
- 6.5 These television items are also augmented by a very wide range of content available on the Newsround website. This sector of the BBC Children's website is one of the biggest drivers of audience traffic, indicating the appetite in kids for topical engagement.
- 6.6 A project is currently underway to look at what other digital activities might be created for the audience who enjoy Newsround online, as children always move quickly in their uptake of new media forms.

BBC Election coverage

- 7.1 More than half of audiences considered the BBC best for election coverage. Throughout the 2017 General Election the BBC gave audiences across the UK opportunities to see politicians debate important issues, and to participate in the debates themselves. Our debates were watched by millions. We know that they were seen by audiences who don't traditionally tune in to mainstream news programmes.
- 7.2 In 2017, Mishal Husain hosted The BBC Election Debate live from Cambridge with senior Conservative, Labour, Liberal Democrat, SNP, Plaid Cymru, Green Party, and UKIP spokespeople, taking questions from the live studio audience. David Dimbleby also hosted a Question Time Leader Special with Theresa May and Jeremy Corbyn live on BBC One from York.
- 7.3 Question Time devoted a programme to the election in Northern Ireland, while BBC One in Wales broadcast Election Questions to Leanne Wood from Swansea, later broadcast in England. BBC One broadcast an Election Leaders Special with Nicola Sturgeon, hosted by Nick Robinson, from Edinburgh. Election Questions to Paul Nuttall came from Bristol and was also shown in England and in Wales.
- 7.4 The final BBC debate before the election was a Newsbeat Youth Debate, hosted by Tina Daheley. The debate was held in Manchester with an audience of 18-34 year olds, featuring leading Conservative, Labour, Liberal Democrat, SNP, Plaid, Green and UKIP politicians.

- 7.5 Throughout the Nations there were Leaders’ debates, debates on specific issues, and phone-ins. Sarah Smith chaired the Scottish Leaders’ Debate with a panel of five Scottish party leaders, in front of a live audience. Huw Edwards chaired the Leader’s Debate in Wales, while Noel Thompson hosted a debate on BBC One Northern Ireland. In the English regions, we hosted 12 debates with studio audiences, shown on BBC One in each region.
- 7.6 Across England, BBC Local Radio stations hosted around 80 election debates, many in front of live audiences, allowing people to talk directly to the candidates. They featured on digital platforms and social media. The debates took place in the heart of communities across England, at locations including: Coventry Transport Museum, Abingdon County Hall Museum, and Chequer Mead Theatre, East Grinstead.
- 7.7 Our flagship news programmes visited various parts of the UK. Victoria Derbyshire held a debate in Dunstable with a local audience and politicians, and hustings style live debates from towns across the country. The Today Programme had Nick Robinson’s Election Takeaways, where he sat down for food with groups of voters to examine how different parts of the electorate were making up their minds ahead of voting. BBC Asian Network hosted a Big Election Debate live from Birmingham. Nihal Arthanayake was joined by a panel of politicians and an audience of largely young British Asians who led the questioning in the 90-minute long programme.
- 7.8 Many people came to BBC News online for balanced and accurate reporting - 9th June was a record day for UK browsers coming to BBC News Online, exceeding the previous high recorded the day of the EU referendum result.
- 7.9 BBC News’ Reality Check⁴⁸ also helped audiences decipher the facts used throughout the campaign.

BBC Online

- 8.1 In the 2017 General Election campaign we coined the hashtag #getsmypvote to create a daily series of videos and interviews asking individuals or linked groups of people – beauticians, Turkish barbers, bodybuilders or chefs - what would ‘get their vote’ on an issue that’s in the news. This was a local idea that gained traction across the BBC with great promotion to national audiences.
- 8.2 We also created a project called Unreported. The aim of Unreported was to discover ‘unreported stories and voices’ and build new relationships. Over four months we worked with a group of women, all aged under 35 and from diverse communities in Birmingham and the Black Country, to discover new stories and deliver them on the BBC. Through workshops we learned about what interested them, where they got their news and what they thought of our coverage. We then worked with them to develop not only story ideas but how to craft the storytelling to ensure we didn't lose their voices. That involved training and taking them out on stories.

- 8.3 Unreported was widely shared across the BBC and on social platforms, particularly with women aged 25-34, receiving hugely positive reactions. It has been a rewarding project to have been part of and it has legacy. We are still working with the women on stories and one has now secured a place on the BBC's Production Trainee scheme.
- 8.4 The next group Unreported is working with is young men in the North East.. They include keen gamers, young men who live with mental health issues and former addicts. One of the themes which has emerged so far is that some of the group don't access any news at all, including on the BBC. Our first workshop is planned for mid-September. We always envisaged that the format could be syndicated – not only in the UK but around the world.

Social media

- 9.1 During the 2017 UK general election BBC News used a range of social media platforms to reach and engage younger and harder to reach audiences across the UK.
- 9.2 On Facebook we re-positioned our BBC Politics Facebook⁴⁹ page towards the election and featured a range of stories in video and text to help audiences better understand party positions and what was at stake for voters. These included *the Week in Cartoons*⁵⁰ (originally broadcast as a Facebook Live), a short Facebook 'show'⁵¹ and regular editions Of an audio *Electioncast*⁵² programme.
- 9.3 We also carried key moments from the campaign on our BBC News⁵³ and BBC Stories⁵⁴ Facebook pages, spent a lot of time encouraging audiences to engage directly with our reporters and correspondents via Facebook Live at campaign events. We went behind the scenes on debate nights and devoted time and resources to help our audiences 'make sense' of the campaign⁵⁵ and the result⁵⁶.

- 9.4 We launched a BBC politics Facebook messenger bot⁵⁷ to coincide with the Government's triggering of Article 50 at the end of March. When the Prime Minister decided to call a snap election in April we pivoted this bot towards the election for the campaign and used it to encourage audiences to explore our online manifesto guides⁵⁸, see the latest BBC Reality Check analysis on the campaign and to receive (if they wished) an alert to their constituency result. Several thousand people subscribed to this service through the election campaign.
- 9.5 On Twitter, alongside our regular publication of tweets around key campaign moments, announcements, results and analysis we decided to live-stream a number of our BBC election debate programmes (including the Question Time leader specials and Newsbeat debate) and the TV election night special itself. This allowed audiences on the platform to watch the programmes on their mobile devices alongside a curated stream of BBC and other tweets using agreed #BBCDebate or #BBCElection hashtags. Our analysis of this has service has shown us that we reached a predominantly younger (under 35) demographic and that peaks of viewing coincided with the same peaks for TV consumption.
- 9.6 Finally, we also decided to use our successful BBC News Instagram Channel to reach younger audiences through the campaign – and on election night specifically, with a 'live Instagram story' as events of the night unfolded. Live stories last for 24 hours and appear at the top of Instagram feeds for subscribers to that channel. They also allow publishers to link to relevant content and so provided another opportunity for us to encourage audiences back into the BBC News website to explore more of our content on the election.

Diversity at the BBC

- 10.1 Diversity is vital to a modern BBC and is written into our Charter. We're there for everyone - so we need to reflect and represent the whole of the UK. We aim to be the industry leader, ensuring that every licence fee payer can hear or see something of their world in the BBC. Attracting and developing great talent - whatever their background - both on and off air, is a priority.
- 10.2 In 2016 we launched an ambitious strategy to hardwire diversity into everything the BBC does. In March 2017, we unveiled the results of our recent and most comprehensive staff census that shows the BBC has met its 2017 targets - and is well on the way to hitting our 2020 goals.

⁵⁸ <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/election-2017-39955886>

Workforce	31 March 2017	2017 target	2020 target
Women (all staff)	48.2%	n/a	50%
Women (leadership)	42.1%	n/a	50%
Disability (all staff)	10.2%	5.3%	8%
Disability (leadership)	9.6%	5%	8%
BAME (all staff)	14.5%	14.2%	15%
BAME (leadership)	10.3%	10%	15%
LGBT (all staff)	10.5%	n/a	8%
LGBT (leadership)	11.5%	n/a	8%

10.3 While we welcome the progress made so far, we recognise that there is still further to go if we are to meet all of the ambitious targets we have set for 2020. Some of the schemes established as part of our diversity and inclusion strategy have delivered clear results, including:

10.4 Creative Access scheme: Over 30 interns from Black, Asian and Minority Ethnic backgrounds joined us through our Creative Access scheme, with more than three quarters becoming members of BBC staff. Five of the six individuals who joined our first Clore Leadership programme are in roles at the BBC, with one becoming our executive editor for BBC Africa. This year we have expanded the programme to include candidates with a disability.

10.5 We have programmes across the Corporation: For example, the BBC News Leadership programme - more than half on it are women - and a £1m scheme for journalists with disabilities launched earlier this year.

10.6 On air we've also made big strides in reflecting the full diversity of the UK: Our Assistant Commissioner development programme has been successful, creating content that is as diverse and brilliant as BBC audiences expect - including The Black And British season and programmes from Muslims Like Us, World Hip Hop News to the Instant Gardener. Programmes like Will Britain Ever Have A Black Prime Minister? on BBC Two have looked in depth at the experiences of black people in Britain today, and Call The Midwife has recently challenging stories about disability and ethnicity at the front and centre of Sunday night viewing.

10.7 BBC Three continues to give a platform to emerging and diverse talent: Such as the Five By Five series of shorts and The Break, which showcases five up-and-coming writers from black, Asian and minority ethnic backgrounds.

10.8 The BBC has also made progress in improving social mobility: For example, the growth in apprenticeships from 37 in 2012 to 230 this year, with an aim to have more than 400 by 2018.

BBC Academy

- 11.1 The BBC is committed to seeking out the brightest graduate and non-graduate talent, from the broadest range of backgrounds. Historically, the industry's over-reliance on Russell Group graduate recruitment has been a barrier to entry for many, especially those from less advantaged backgrounds. This was exacerbated by 'who you know' recruitment and young people willing to work for very little money to get a foot-hold on the career ladder.
- 11.2 To redress this imbalance, the BBC is committed to offering high quality, industry-designed apprenticeships and pre-employment opportunities, alongside our long established graduate level trainee programmes. This ensures that everyone with the raw potential to succeed is given a fair chance to apply for opportunities, opening our doors to all the talents our country has to offer. Examples of how we do this and recent successes include:
- 11.3 Long established graduate level programmes: Our alumni have gone on to become many of the industry's iconic leaders. In September 2016 we had 130 trainees on programmes in the BBC across the UK.
- 11.4 A fast growing portfolio of high quality Apprenticeships: These are aimed at those who have not been to university but who have the raw potential to succeed in our industry. The BBC Academy has been at the heart of designing new vocational qualifications with other employers in our sector. In the autumn of 2013, the BBC's Director General set a target for 1% of the BBC's workforce to be apprentices by the end of that Licence Fee period. By 1st November 2014 (2 years ahead of schedule) we met this target. In September 2016 we had 237 Apprentices on programmes across the UK and we have an ambitious aim to have 400 apprentices by the end of 2018.
- 11.5 We offer apprenticeships right across our business: In TV and Radio Production, Network and Local Journalism, Broadcast Engineering, Broadcast Operations, Digital, Business Management, Legal and Cyber Security. In Broadcast Engineering and Business, there is a degree built into the Apprenticeship.
- 11.6 We hire BBC Apprentices right across the UK: On local radio stations and in BBC departments in London, Bristol, Birmingham, Salford, Glasgow and Cardiff. This means that many of our apprentices can remain living at home, rather than moving to more expensive metropolitan areas.
- 11.7 We are passionate about opening up the doors of the BBC to everyone: Diversity really matters to us. The 2016 intake of Digital Journalism Apprentices are 57% BAME and our 2016 Business Apprentices are 29% BAME. These levels of diversity are unprecedented in our industry and are driven by us reaching out to all communities across the UK; offering a wide range of entry level opportunities, appropriate to everyone with the raw talent to succeed.

- 11.8 We work hard to connect with high potential disabled talent: This year, 50% of our prestigious Journalism Trainees declare a disability, with 23% of Production Trainees declaring a disability. The effort we are putting into our outreach programmes is delivering unprecedented levels of high quality disabled talent. Across all our Graduate Traineeships and Apprenticeships, 11.5% have a declared disability.
- 11.9 BBC Make It Digital Traineeship: 2015 saw the BBC Academy launch this highly ambitious pre-employment Traineeship in partnership with the Skills Funding Agency, Scottish and Welsh governments, and Department for Work and Pensions. This is an eight week pan industry programme aimed at unemployed young people. It draws on the inspiration of BBC content, and the BBC Academy's existing training know-how. So far, around 2,000 young people have started on the programme. Its aim is to develop strong employability and digital skills which research tells us are in short supply across UK industry. We are now embarking on phase 2 of the Traineeship which will broaden the age range of the trainees we engage with.
- 11.10 We offer approximately 1,200 work experience placements every year on our corporate work experience programme: These opportunities are open to all, access is via a central website and anyone can apply. In addition, some areas of the BBC also run their own, more locally targeted programmes, such as BBC Scotland. We are also now embarking on a new partnership with Job Centres whereby we will ring-fence places for young people who are unemployed – working with Job Centre staff to identify young talent. We also offer work placements to students from broadcast related Higher Education institutions, for example we reserve 200 places (via the Broadcast Journalism Training Council) for students studying journalism and also work closely with the National Film and Television School.
- 11.11 BBC Radio 1 Academy: Now in its 4th year, the Academy is a key part of the Radio 1 Big Weekend music festival, with career sessions, live radio show experiences and advice surgeries. This is done in partnership with local authorities.
- 11.12 We offer shorter pre-employment opportunities: For example, Radio 1's Where It Begins programme, BBC English Region's Kick Off Sports reporter scheme and BBC TV's Mama Youth programme for BAME talent.
- 11.13 In 2014 we launched a pre-employment Traineeship with the Stephen Lawrence Trust: This saw our two organisations working together (with Job Centres across London) to identify and develop young BAME talent. Everyone who successfully completed the Traineeship was fast-tracked to near the end of the application process for BBC Production Apprenticeships.

11.14 We work with schools to enthuse young people about taking up a career in broadcasting: The BBC's annual School Report, now in its ninth year, helps young people develop skills in Journalism. Last year, 33,000 students from around 1,000 schools took part and 300 staff gave up their time to be mentors for the schools. In particular, we worked closely with disadvantaged areas in the North East and the number of special schools participating went up from 33 to 48.

11.15 Reaching out to diverse young people via social media: The BBC Academy's twitter site @BBCGetIn⁵⁹ has been ranked as the UK's top employer for the most interaction with young people on Twitter. Overall, @BBCGetIn has been recorded as the second most active employer on Twitter. We have grown quickly to 85,000 followers.

11.16 In the 2015 'School Leaver 100' poll of school students aged 16-18 (not planning to go to university) the BBC was voted the number one employer. In October 2015 we were included in the Sunday Telegraph's Top Apprenticeship Careers List.

Philip Bedford – written evidence (CCE0040)

General

All human beings are born with the ability to commit great evil and/or great good within the society in which they live. The potential for evil is kept in check through the adoption and policing of a strong moral framework by Society. The responsibility for teaching this moral framework to each new generation traditionally is left to parents, with a little input from outside (schools, churches etc.). In the Western World there has been a significant movement over the past 50 years or so towards stressing the rights of the individual to the detriment of the wellbeing of society as a whole - in effect a promotion of selfishness and greed, and the teaching of the moral framework to new generations has slipped. I believe that the only way to bring Society back into balance is through education, both formal and informal, of both adults/parents and children – to put Society back in the centre i.e. that a parent's overriding responsibility must be to bring up mentally, well rounded, happy, contented and fit children whose governing philosophy in life is that:

Society comes before the individual - always, always, always; but Society is responsible for and must look after the individual - always, always, always, so that the moral framework on which our Society and its laws are based, once more be properly taught to new generations.

To succeed properly, this education must convince every person living in Britain that they are a "fully paid up" member of British Society, and that they see that Society as being fully inclusive at and across all levels, whether such levels be academic or cultural; classes, castes or ethnic groups; city dwellers or those that live in the country.

To become a person's governing philosophy of life, this life philosophy should be taught and reinforced throughout a child's formal education, as well as being promoted through voluntary organisations into which children, and newly arrived adults should be encouraged to join e.g. sporting clubs/associations, scouts/guides, Duke of Edinburgh Award, National Citizen service etc.

View from Australia

When I was asked to comment on the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement Call for Evidence paper, I thought it wise to seek the advice of a very good friend of mine in Australia who has been heavily involved with several families of Iranian 'boat people'. These families, for various honourable reasons, found themselves on the wrong side of the Iranian Government, and faced the choice of informal execution, or fleeing the country. Understandably they chose the latter and tried to enter Australia as refugees. His experience is very relevant to the current European/British refugee/migrant situation and he replied as follows:

“Thanks for the email Philip. This is an interesting subject. The same issues are currently being debated in Australia. Unfortunately the debate in Australia has largely been hijacked by right wing populist politicians as an anti Islamic, anti refugee and anti immigration debate about security concerns. Imposing civic responsibilities and obligations by law is likely to prove ineffective and destructive to social cohesion, genuine feelings of citizenship and the creation of any sense of community or belonging. It misses the point entirely. The Australian Government brags about its commitment to keeping Australia safe. Instead it is creating an underclass in the immigrant community and particularly the refugee community. Its treatment of refugees in particular is cruel and oppressive, its demeanour is proudly arrogant and disrespectful. Its policies are feeding racialism not reducing it. Unfortunately, many politicians overseas (including Donald Trump) are watching Australia's immigration policies with approval and envy. The world has nothing positive to learn from the current Australian Government approach!

After the Second World War and right up until the mid 1960's we had a huge migrant intake. Because of our racist "White Australia" policy at that time the source countries were Britain and Europe and particularly from Italy and Greece. There was work for everybody and by and large the immigrant group seized the opportunity and worked really hard to secure their future. They could see the light at the end of the tunnel. The immigrants saw Australia as the land of opportunity, they rapidly identified with it. Their standard of living slowly improved. In those days, the cost of housing (as a percentage of average wages) also worked in their favour. The university system was very accessible and affordable. They could see a future for their kids. They engaged with the community at many levels but particularly through sporting clubs.

At the end of the Vietnam war in the 1970's we had another large intake of immigrants; this time Vietnamese people escaping to Australia in leaky unseaworthy fishing boats. Fortunately, our prime Minister at that time was Malcolm Fraser (a conservative). Unlike the current racist group in Canberra, Fraser reassured the Australia community that the Vietnamese refugees represented no threat to Australian society. The Australian community responded to Fraser's leadership and welcomed them with open arms. Just like the post war immigrant group, the Vietnamese refugee group quickly fitted in and worked hard. They valued the opportunity to acquire Australian citizenship and they have contributed very positively to a multicultural Australian society. Again sporting clubs and school communities were an important mechanism in encouraging connection and integration. The current State Governor (Queens official representative) in South Australia arrived here by boat as a refugee from Vietnam back in the 1970's. This all happened in the absence of statutory English language requirements, Australian history lessons or even practice at saying "Gday Mate". When people feel included, valued and respected, then they learn the language necessary to participate. Having to force people to learn English simply indicates policy failure in other areas!

In the short term, if Britain wants positively to encourage immigrants to value their new citizenship, identify as being British and support civic engagement, then it requires leadership from political leaders, particularly the Prime Minister, to make immigrants feel welcome, valued, included and respected. The contributions made by immigrants need to be showcased and care needs to be taken to separate necessary political comment about radical groups and terrorist incidents, from comment about immigrants in general.

I think that the real issues are not about citizenship per se, rather they are about poverty and long term unemployment and under employment. This applies particularly, but by no means exclusively, to youth. It is a problem across the whole community not just the immigrant community. It is going to get worse. I am not a socialist, not a trade protectionist and not a Luddite. I support free trade and the world economy. There is nothing new in what I am about to say and unfortunately I do not have solutions to offer for fundamental economic problems. However, it is very clear that the whole employment landscape is changing fundamentally. Technologies are now emerging which are deskilling and destroying jobs. The immigrant group will number strongly in the impoverished group, they will be angry, disaffected and radical. The rest of the impoverished community will resent the presence of immigrants who are, "taking our jobs." Process work is rapidly disappearing either to off shore countries with low wage structures or to emerging labour saving smart technologies. Western countries need to reinvent themselves rapidly as technology innovators and scientific research powerhouses. The world needs to find another John Maynard Keynes with a new fresh perspective!"

My Australian friend mentions sporting clubs and school communities as playing a large part in the past successful integration of migrants into Australia. From my own experience both in Australia and currently in the UK, any community clubs/organisations (sports, social, academic &/or physical) play a prime role in integrating those who start on the outside of a community for whatever reason, into that community. As an example I am a tower bell ringer (campanologist) and am currently Tower Captain at St Mary's Chilham, Kent. The ringing community includes members of the titled aristocracy through to unemployed dustmen, first generation immigrants from most countries in the world including Eastern Europe, India & Pakistan, China, Japan and South America to 50th generation Celts, Romans, Danes, Saxons and Normans. In the tower they all see themselves as equal, with the only differentiation being their ringing ability. The same goes for all other inclusive groups. In South Australia, years ago I belonged to the Scottish Dance Society and the Bulgarian Dancing Club. The same people belonged to both and their ethnic background was irrelevant. I am Anglo Saxon and used to dance with a girl of Somalian Indian decent. Neither of us were of Scottish or Bulgarian origin - but it didn't matter. We were both country dancers in Adelaide - and we saw ourselves as fully integrated Australians. The fully integrated Adelaide common interest societies moved South Australians away from a Them and Us life philosophy to an inclusive Us life philosophy, and that should be one of the underlying aims and overriding outcomes of membership of any community group in Britain, membership of which must be strongly encouraged at all levels of government.

Postscript A

I referred to the breakdown in social cohesion which the move towards the promotion of Self over Society has been causing. Another manifestation of this change which tends to be self-perpetuating, is the blame and claim culture which has been increasingly adopted by British Society over the past 50 years. It would much better if, partly through education, and partly through legislation (to vary the laws of tort, especially those relating to negligence), we bring back a moral code which accepts that people make mistakes and that such mistakes do not immediately precipitate crippling damages claims. Only if there has been gross, deliberate or criminal negligence should a claim for economic damages be available. New Zealand introduced such a concept into legislation in the early 1970s when it set up the Accident Compensation Commission (now Corporation), which manages the country's no-fault fully funded compensation system financed from general revenue and employer contributions. Individuals suffering work or non-work related injury "receive government-funded compensation, in turn relinquishing the right to sue for damages arising from personal injury except in rare cases of reckless conduct."

Postscript B

Our current system of democracy with its entrenched party politics is inefficient and at times irrational, with populists damaging the process at every turn, but it is the best and fairest so far produced by the Human Race. However, democracy is a very fragile thing and there is a risk that some of the changes we seek to introduce, and the method of mobilising support for them through social media, could destabilise our Society. They may lead to, and indeed in some cases may already have done so, lead to the rise of some powerful people that the ordinary voters collectively might not be able to control. It could lead to the rise of some individuals who "know best" what is good for us but are, or become dictators. Although not having a written constitution is in many ways one of the strengths of Britain, its downside is that a party which is brought into power on a landslide vote, potentially is all powerful. It can legislate any change no matter how totalitarian and undemocratic it may be. It will therefore be essential that the current separation of power between the legislature/executive, its two houses, and the judiciary is not compromised by any changes introduced by any government, no matter of what political persuasion, and, even more importantly, that the Monarch retain real reserve power just in case. If we fail in this, then a totalitarian state may not be far away.

Bedfordshire Association of Town and Parish Councils – written evidence (CCE0072)

There are two aspects to this consultation: those born in this country being good citizens, and those born elsewhere becoming British citizens, as well as good citizens.

Citizenship ceremonies should be encouraged and celebrated; small administrative costs are acceptable, but costs should not be so high that they prevent applications.

Citizenship ceremonies should be publicised in local papers and magazines so that communities were more aware of them.

Experience elsewhere eg Germany has demonstrated that community groups working alongside people newly arrived in a country can help the integration process.

Some schemes developed with the best of intentions are in reality bureaucratic and completely unworkable and so fail at the first fence eg the Full Community Sponsorship scheme for integrating refugees, supposedly a way that community groups could be involved in supporting the resettlement of vulnerable people fleeing conflict.

All people should be treated as equal but the systems we have in this country do not treat all people in the same way. They favour particular groups but ignore others.

People are not moved by talk of global citizenship, they identify with local communities – how things affect them directly.

Schools already teach citizenship but this should be expanded to improve pupils understanding of their own democratic systems.

While voting by electronic means at a polling station to facilitate the count would be acceptable, the view is that there are already too many problems and opportunities for fraud with the current system for postal and proxy votes; members are not in favour of on-line voting.

Members are not in favour of lowering the voting age to 16.

Big Lottery Fund – written evidence (CCE0246)

Introduction

This paper outlines the Big Lottery Fund’s experience of citizenship and civic engagement as a grant-maker and how we view our role in promoting and supporting it. We have also outlined what the Big Lottery Fund sees as the key challenges to citizenship and civic engagement at the moment, and the Fund’s recommendations for addressing these. While all sectors, from government to private companies, have an important role to play in embedding citizenship and civic engagement across the UK, in this submission we focus on funders, the voluntary sector and broader society due to our direct involvement in, and understanding of, those areas.

Key messages

In this submission we outline:

- The context within which the Fund, and the country, are grappling with issues of citizenship and civic engagement;
- The positive possibilities of citizenship – including the potential payoff for getting it right, and the risks of getting it wrong;
- Our view of citizenship and civic engagement as positive, reciprocal, diverse and non-exclusive; and
- Our People in the Lead approach – which puts people at the heart of social change, and works with their strengths to make the UK a better place to live.

Recommendations:

- Funders, including the Big Lottery Fund, should be more open to funding ‘risky’ projects.
 - Funders, including the Big Lottery Fund, should simplify funding application processes.
 - The voluntary sector should better embed experts by experience in all aspects of their operations from service design to governance and decision making.
 - The voluntary sector should better engage with the opportunities and threats provided by the shift to digital.
 - As a society we must establish new ways for citizens to participate.
 - As a society we must celebrate our strengths.

About the Big Lottery Fund

The Big Lottery Fund is the largest community funder in the UK. Last year we awarded £713m of good cause money raised by National Lottery players to more than 13,000 community projects. Our ambition is to enable communities to thrive. We fund bright ideas – big or small, to help you make your community a better place to live.

What is citizenship and civic engagement?

As the UK's largest community funder, promoting and supporting citizenship and civic engagement are central to the way we work. This is exemplified by both the projects we fund and the ways in which they successfully deliver change.

That's why it is so important for us, as a grant maker, sector and community, to embrace an inclusive, positive and reciprocal vision of citizenship. When fully realised such citizenship offers significant benefits to us all. These benefits have been identified through rigorous analysis and lived experience. The Royal Society of the Arts' meta-analysis⁶⁰ – funded by the Big Lottery Fund – found that active citizenship and civic engagement ('citizen powered energy') brought benefits to:

- The economy: 'participation helps save money'
- Public services: 'participation develops more effective services'
- Community: 'shared social norms and strong feelings of trust and belonging...nurture further participation' and
- The individual: 'Participation increases individual well-being, confidence and skills'

As we outline below, these benefits resonate with the Fund and our aspirations and experience as a grant-maker.

Nazee Akbari, the Executive Director of the Barnet Refugee Service stresses the importance of citizenship and civic engagement to (re)building a sense of self:

"Citizenship is vital for refugees – it is part of the process towards people regaining their lost identities. Leaving their past lives, and often being unable to return, is deeply traumatic and destabilising for people's identities. Being valued and recognised as contributing to their new home is very helpful in stabilising people's mental health, allowing them to feel valued, ensuring they do not feel left behind."

At the Fund, we embrace a reciprocal, non-exclusive and diverse style of citizenship. Below we outline why these concepts are vital building blocks for UK communities and civic engagement. Throughout we also emphasise that citizenship covers an enormous array of activities – from village fetes to community mental health support to involvement at every level of service design and delivery.

When people feel proud of their communities – and when they recognise the strengths their communities possess – they are empowered to drive change. Indeed, positive citizenship is at the heart of emancipatory movements worldwide. In 'Pride Parades' Katherine McFarland-Bruce sets out the power of a positive sense of citizenship: "Pride participants challenge culture by enacting a new vision of what LGBT acceptance can look like.”⁶¹ This is particularly crucial in the face of discrimination or oppression, where positive feelings of citizenship can provide a defence against external condemnation and a platform from which to drive social change.⁶²

In the UK today, communities are crying out for opportunities to develop a positive sense of citizenship. In 2016, the Fund launched our ‘Celebrate’ programme to give communities the opportunity to celebrate their strengths. We funded projects across the country from traditional village fetes in Kent to a celebration of the Sierra Leonean community in Brighton and Hove. With only a small funding contribution available (up to £10,000) communities across the country jumped at the opportunity to celebrate their strengths. So significant was the demand for this funding that we doubled its initial budget. Over a single year, we funded 1,714 events which helped to embed and grow a positive vision of community across the country. Of these, 26% had never applied for Big Lottery funding before.

Our experience demonstrates both that communities want to celebrate their citizenship in a positive way, and that they are ready and able to do so, with only minimal support.

John Rose, Welsh Director, Big Lottery Fund: “Civic engagement is what makes places great places to be.”

Citizenship is reciprocal

There is strong evidence to show that reciprocal relationships deliver the best results for communities. Volunteering is a clear example of the benefits of reciprocity. It clearly helps those in receipt of services. A report by Action for Children found that the total value of volunteers to the charity and the families they support was £1,182,720 per year.⁶³ But volunteering also has significant benefits to volunteers themselves. These range from learning new skills and improving employability to improving health and wellbeing and strengthening community cohesion and engagement.⁶⁴

In a recent analysis of volunteering undertaken as part of our £54m, 6-year Headstart programme, which aims to improve the mental health of young people, participants of the scheme reported the multiple benefits they received from volunteering.⁶⁵

“[I’ve gained] socialising skills, like not being shy when, when talking to like people that you don’t know”

“I started getting more confident”

When citizenship is reciprocal communities benefit both from the receipt of support, and participation in its delivery.

Citizenship is diverse and non-exclusive

For communities to get the most out of citizenship and civic engagement, the barriers to participation should be as low as possible. The projects we support are replete with the positive contributions of those excluded from some definitions of citizenship (asylum seekers, ex-offenders and homeless people). For example, the Barnet Refugee Service highlights the incredible impact of Helal Attayee, an Afghan refugee who is now a qualified Doctor and a trustee of the charity.⁶⁶

The contributions that people on the outskirts of citizenship can make to communities are clear and powerful. By adopting a wide, and diverse definition of citizenship, we are able to access sources of expertise and lived experience that enrich the entire community. For example, our £112m 8-year programme to improve the lives of people with multiple and complex needs is partly delivered by ‘experts by experience’ – those who have been homeless, a substance misuser, or a prisoner – and can offer their support to others in a similar situation.

A recent report by Baljeet Sandhu,⁶⁷ part of the Big Lottery Fund’s Generous Leadership group, also found that a whole host of benefits result from including people with lived experience in all elements of delivery. These include:

- Strengthening the legitimacy and accountability of social purpose work;
- Improving the effectiveness of existing, and developing new, services and social change initiatives;
- Enhancing community cohesion and cultivating effective partnerships, action and collaboration; and
- Allowing innovation to flourish.

Further, our initial evaluation of our Stoke-on-Trent multiple and complex needs project stresses the importance of experts by experience in all elements delivery from designing services effectively to best communicating who and what the service is for.⁶⁸ In addition, many people who have accessed support from peers through the Inspiring Change Manchester Multiple and Complex Needs programme have become mentors themselves. A number have also gone on to use their experience to gain paid employment as trainees supporting delivery of the programme.

People in the Lead

At the Big Lottery Fund, we are working hard to embed the positive, reciprocal, diverse and open citizenship we would like to see in the world. Our People in the Lead approach, set out in our strategic framework 2015-21,⁶⁹ is the foundation of our efforts to embed that kind of citizenship across the UK.

We operate a strength based approach that recognises and builds on what communities are good at, rather than where they fall short. By inviting communities to share their unique strengths and talents, we invite also invite them to share their positive vision of citizenship. This is in marked contrast to approaches which require applicants to demonstrate how bad their lives are, or how much they need help, before they receive support.

People in the Lead necessitates the direct involvement of beneficiaries in project design. This approach has a proud history, in particular in the disability movement's slogan: "nothing about us, without us". By involving communities in the design and delivery of services that are intended for them, we embed a strongly reciprocal citizenship which asks for involvement, rather than requiring passive receipt. By involving beneficiaries directly, this approach also delivers better quality, better informed and more effective support. For example, Hyde Community Action,⁷⁰ which works with women from BME backgrounds, runs projects and activities that are driven by the community themselves, responding directly to what people want rather than dictating what people need. This includes English language classes, employment support sessions, bake sessions, and exercise classes.

Further, we endowed Big Local with £150m to enable people in 150 urban and rural communities to identify local needs, and take action to meet them. The trust puts residents themselves in charge of spending to improve their communities. Across the country they have invested in programmes offering training and employment support, tackling anti-social behaviour and providing more activities for young people.

People in the Lead also facilitates an open and diverse approach to community – one built on relationships between diverse and varied people. As Cormac Russel, the founder of Asset

Based Community Development (ABCD) outlines, relationship based approaches to change can deliver far more than individually driven change – no matter how exceptional the individual.⁷¹

Cormac Russell: “Relational power enables consensual ‘grouping-up’ or hive like behaviours to amplify and multiply the capacities of individuals, ensuring the societal whole is greater than the sum of its individual parts. This is not to say that the individuality of members does not matter, it does, but rather to point out that for us to have a good life there are certain things we need to do with each other, as we cannot do them alone, that is where relational power matters.”

By encouraging collaboration, and embedding new ways of cooperating, our funding seeks to bring communities together, so their combined strength can deliver impactful change.

Citizenship in Context

In the current political and social climate, citizenship is fiercely contested. A series of crises, including the tragedy of Grenfell Tower, dramatically declining public trust,⁷² and significant political shifts, including Brexit, have dramatically challenged our shared conception of civil society. This presents both a threat, and a call to action, to communities in the UK and those who seek to promote citizenship and civic engagement.

In some ways, community cohesion has never looked so weak. Trust in institutions – from the Government to banks to charities – is down, and barriers to citizen engagement seem to be increasing. But in other ways, these tragedies have revealed communities’ hidden strength. In the aftermath of the Grenfell Tower tragedy, the most effective help was delivered directly by volunteers, neighbours, friends and citizens across London. We see the same response after terrorist incidents, from cab drivers offering free rides to get people to safety,⁷³ to families offering beds and sofas for affected people to sleep on,⁷⁴ to mosques and churches opening their doors to rebuild communities and re-establish trust,⁷⁵ society pulls together.

The benefits which would be delivered by better connecting communities are immense. According to research undertaken by the Centre for Economics and Business Research for the Big Lunch (funded by the Big Lottery Fund) “disconnected communities could be costing society a potential welfare improvement valued at £32 billion and about £12 billion of this could be realised as a net economic gain (a boost to GDP) through improved productivity”.⁷⁶

In many ways, the National Lottery itself is a model of community collaboration. Every week millions of people across the country contribute to a significant prize fund, a large and important fund for good causes, and even tax revenue for the Government. Without players, the National Lottery would have no prize, and communities would have been £713m poorer last year alone. The simple act of buying a National Lottery ticket is part of a collaborative community efforts so embedded in our culture that it can go almost without mention on a weekly basis.

But despite citizens coming together to provide support when it is needed, the infrastructure that supports this involvement is often creaking at the seams. After the spontaneous response to the Grenfell Tower tragedy large amounts of donated money and support remain undistributed.⁷⁷ Local authorities, established charities and others remain too slow to react effectively, and unable to properly serve the communities they are intended to support.

There is also evidence of growing community tension. The most high profile example of this tension was the spike in hate crime following the Brexit vote,⁷⁸ but we can see evidence of this tension long before last year. For example, the Everyday Sexism project⁷⁹ has been capturing daily examples of sexism and misogyny for more than five years, while there have been increasing incidents of hate crimes against Muslims, recorded by Tell MAMA over a similar period.⁸⁰ Alongside this, concerns about immigration and integration have been raised repeatedly in recent years from local communities to political parties,⁸¹ and an ongoing debate around intergenerational fairness is being played out in families and communities across the country.⁸²

In this context, it is vital that we all do our bit to strengthen community cohesion. At the Big Lottery Fund, we work with communities across the country to break down barriers to citizenship and barriers between people and communities. Whether that means funding outreach to give culturally-excluded communities better access to the arts, working with faith communities to combat extremism and racism, or facilitating neighbours who have never spoken to share a meal, we strive to bring communities together.

Below are some of the hundreds of projects we fund each year to promote community cohesion and citizenship:

- Via the Young Vic⁸³ we fund the Neighbourhood Theatre project which gives everyone in Southwark and Lambeth the opportunity to go to the theatre and become part of the theatre family. A group of 70-80 local people from marginalised groups work with the theatre as ambassadors and help the theatre reach other disadvantaged people. They also come up with ideas for theatre projects and help to deliver them.
- We fund the Eden Project to deliver the Big Lunch⁸⁴ each year, which encourages people to talk to their neighbours, and address the rising tide of loneliness in our communities.
- We fund The Tim Parry Johnathan Ball Foundation for Peace⁸⁵ to develop skills in peaceful conflict resolution amongst young people vulnerable to radicalisation and survivors of political violence.
- We also fund Participatory City⁸⁶ in partnership with Barking and Dagenham Council, which will work with 25,000 residents to create over 350 neighbourhood-led projects, bringing people together with a renewed sense of community spirit.
- In Wales, our £12m Community Voice project supported citizens to have a greater influence over policies and decisions affecting their community; built their capacity to engage in planning and running services and projects that respond to their communities' needs and advance community benefit.

What needs to change?

There are a number of ways that we must all work together to embed a model of positive, reciprocal and open citizenship in the UK. Some of these changes are for funders (including ourselves), others are for charities and communities, and others are for society as a whole. We outline below our roadmap of these changes.

Funders

Funders, including the Big Lottery Fund, should be more open to funding 'risky' projects. In our UK portfolio we have trialled and rolled out a different approach to grant giving. We take a more conversational approach, with a strong focus on grassroots social innovations that address the root cause of pressing issues.

We have also taken a test and learn approach to funding, by supporting a cluster of projects around themes, including ageing, dementia and food, to find projects and interventions that work well. We have funded projects like Apps for Good⁸⁷ to provide young people with the technical, entrepreneurial, problem solving and life skills that will enable them to drive social change, and transform their communities through social technology. As a funding community, we must come together to support more projects like these.

The Big Lottery Fund, and other funders, should simplify funding application processes. Too often we create barriers to innovative projects and hard to reach communities seeking funding. At the Fund we are moving our small grants online, reaching out to new communities (e.g. by running funding fairs targeting rural communities in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland and talking about the Fund in Urdu on local Manchester radio) and cutting processing times. But more needs to be done.

The voluntary and community sector

The voluntary and community sector should better embed experts by experience in all aspects of their operations from service design to governance and decision making. We have outlined the benefits of including people with lived experience above, but too often this experience is not effectively used to drive positive change.

“Despite sector-wide appreciation that lived experience of social issues can help inform social change initiatives, the wider sector has been slow to recognise the full value and benefit of lived expertise in terms of ‘leading change’. In turn, organisational and leadership development in this area is largely unexplored and underdeveloped, and much needed.”

We are supporting the sector to do this in some areas – for example, in Northern Ireland, we have recruited a Young People’s Panel to inform the children and young people’s projects that we fund. But, there is much more to be done to embed this approach across the voluntary sector.

The sector must also better engage with the opportunities and threats provided by the shift to digital. The ever increasingly role of digital in UK life presents both dramatic opportunities for change, and poses significant threats to individual and collective wellbeing. The digital revolution has allowed people to build new communities and convene existing ones with ease.

If you were a disabled person with severe mobility restrictions, it would have been almost impossible 15 years ago to share experiences with thousands of people facing the same issues – but online communication now makes that as easy as pressing a button or speaking into a microphone. Similarly, the transgender community’s visibility and confidence has dramatically increased in recent years, due to the effective establishment of a positive and supportive online community.⁸⁸ At the same time, the rise of social media has been accompanied by both a significant rise in anxiety among young people, and a dramatic upswing in threats of violence, cyberbullying and racism, sexism and homophobia online.⁸⁹

But the voluntary and community sector has been slow to respond to, or effectively harness, these changes.⁹⁰ While most charities have websites, social media accounts, and online portals for donation, few have embraced digital as an effective service delivery channel. While some of our projects, such as Headstart, offer some online services (e.g. counselling) most are only just beginning to take advantage of the opportunities made available by digital.

Broader Society

As a society we must establish new ways for citizens to participate. The benefits of reciprocal citizenship and volunteering are clear. We must come together to identify new ways for people to get involved – with a particular focus on those who currently lack effective civic engagement. There are many examples of this engagement already available, but we must work together to create more. For example, South East Hampshire Community Outlook⁹¹ set up an arts centre in a social housing area in Fareham which has given local young people who are facing challenges in their lives together to create art (including window art, graffiti art, and website design) and build a positive community. Further, in London, the Bromley-by-Bow centre⁹² takes a holistic approach to community-health, delivering services that acknowledge that health is dependent on social, financial and emotional wellbeing which puts citizens at its heart. This approach reduces the strain on the health service, as well as empowering local people to drive change.

As a society we must celebrate our strengths more. Investing time and resources in bringing communities together around our skills, strengths and experience will offer the building blocks for a positive model of citizenship, and help break barriers down which are currently separating communities. For example, we are funding Friends of Shadon House in Blaydon⁹³ to run a story-making and creative writing course, bringing together local school children and patients with dementia. We also fund Home Share,⁹⁴ which links older people with spare rooms in their homes and who are in need of practical assistance with (e.g.) shopping or DIY with young people struggling with high housing costs. In exchange for help around the house, young people benefit from low rents in good quality housing, while older people are supported to be more mobile, more socially connected and more independent.

⁹⁴ We fund the Home Share programme by £1.3m from 2016-18

In summary, while there is much good work going on across the country to embed positive citizenship and civic engagement, the scale of the challenges we are facing means that more needs to be done. By taking a few simple steps, as funders, as the voluntary sector, and as society, we can transform community relations and deliver significant benefits across the UK. At the heart of these changes must be a positive, reciprocal and open model of citizenship which encourages participation and involvement, and does not undermine it.

We would be very happy to expand on the issues outlined above in future, in particular at an oral evidence session for the committee.

The Bingham Centre for the Rule of Law – written evidence (CCE204)

Introduction

The Bingham Centre for the Rule of Law (the Bingham Centre) is an academic research institution dedicated to the study, promotion and enhancement of the rule of law worldwide.

From September 2014 to July 2015, the organisation conducted a pilot education initiative called ‘The Rule of Law for Citizenship Education’ that drew content and techniques from the fields of public legal education, education for democratic citizenship and human rights education. This programme for Key Stage 3 (KS3) students comprised:

Educational resources,

Capacity building training for teachers,

Direct delivery of lessons by Bingham Centre staff, and,

Dedicated advice to eight pilot schools.

The resources incorporated a range of pedagogical styles including peer teaching and open-ended instruction. The content of the lessons saw the eight component parts of Lord Bingham’s definition of the rule of law filtered into digestible activities to help young people to understand their rights and obligations within a democratic society. We respond to this call to evidence with regard to our experiences in delivering education programmes.

This response was written by Michael Abiodun Olatokun FRSA. Michael leads the Bingham Centre’s Rule of Law for Citizenship Education programme. For more information visit bit.ly/binghamschools.

Executive Summary

The UK government made substantial progress in encouraging the ability of young people to participate in public life through the addition of Citizenship Education to the National Curriculum in 2002. Fifteen years on, this subject faces multiple challenges that encumber its practical delivery. These challenges will be explored below, referencing both the academic literature in the area and the experiences of civil society organisations assisting schools in providing Citizenship Education.

This response proffers institutional investment from national government in particular aspects of the Citizenship framework, such as the Fundamental British Values agenda, to enhance and protect the achievements of Citizenship organisations. It makes the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1- Introduce a Curriculum Guarantee for Citizenship in every primary and secondary school.

Recommendation 2- Make Citizenship a priority subject in teacher training with bursaries.

Recommendation 3- Establish ‘Beacons of Excellence in Citizenship’ which would link university Politics departments (experts in the content that would be delivered) with schools teaching Citizenship (using subject association bodies such as ACT as a point of liaison due to their expertise).

Recommendation 4- Stimulate the production of high-quality teaching resources to meet gaps and support high-quality teaching.

Recommendation 5- Benchmark best practice to highlight effective Citizenship Education with a special subject survey by Ofsted.

Recommendation 6- Contribute to international evaluative frameworks such as the Council of Europe Reporting Tool and the International Civic and Citizenship Education Study.

Recommendation 7- Consider allowing individual Department for Education (DfE) strategies to operate without shifts in focus or the announcement of new strategies so that sufficient time is available to monitor and evaluate their delivery.

Recommendation 8- Produce new guidance for all schools, in consultation and development with leading rule of law organisations such as the Bingham Centre, on the requirements of teaching the rule of law within a democratic society.

I The Role of Education in Encouraging Active Citizenship

Academic literature considering issues in civic participation has consistently established a causal link between the provision of education on the one hand and increases in active Citizenship on the other. Education has been described as the “universal solvent” for creating citizens that are “attentive, knowledgeable and participatory”.⁹⁵ Thus institutional support for education that improves citizens’ ability to engage with their democracy is crucial for the UK to overcome declining political participation and civic engagement.⁹⁶

This key concept of “education for democratic Citizenship” (EDC) is defined by the Council of Europe (CoE) as a process that equips learners “to exercise and defend their democratic rights and responsibilities in society, to value diversity and to play an active part in democratic life, with a view to the promotion and protection of democracy and the rule of law.” EDC goes further than addressing the content of education about politics because it creates “self-conscious members of a self-governing sovereign people.”⁹⁷ EDC combines civic knowledge with a perception of self-efficacy to act upon those rights and obligations.

EDC will be used interchangeably with the terms ‘Citizenship Education’ and ‘Citizenship’ in this paper. The devolved nature of education in the UK dictates that this response will focus upon the experiences and policy of England.

II Status Quo

The impetus for the current English EDC framework was provided by the Advisory Group on the Teaching of Citizenship and Democracy in Schools, which concluded that a statutory requirement on schools was necessary “to ensure that it is part of the entitlement of all pupils”.⁹⁸ Citizenship was subsequently introduced to the National Curriculum for Key Stage Three and Four (KS3/4) students in 2002. The subject has remained part of the curriculum since.⁹⁹

This was followed by a major development in 2010 as the UK became a signatory to the CoE Charter on Education for Democratic Citizenship and Human Rights Education.¹⁰⁰ This international agreement requires universality of the provision of EDC and HRE, commitments to training the educators that will deliver it and the building of mechanisms to evaluate its teaching.

Despite this new international obligation, existential fears about the continued prominence of the subject emerged soon after its adoption. A collaborative coalition of Citizenship organisations mounted a campaign in 2011 to preserve the subject's status following the announcement of a review by then Secretary of State for Education, Michael Gove. Educators were concerned that the subject would be removed from the National Curriculum in this process. The review saw the subject retained, with additional descriptors for its subject matter, and it remains a part of the National Curriculum.

Though the revised curriculum provides support for EDC at a political level, there is a prevailing sentiment that the coverage and quality of EDC teaching across England are diminishing.¹⁰¹ This decline is reflected in a number of factors which will be considered below, including reduction in coverage and quality of provision, the decreasing capacity of educators to deliver Citizenship Education nationwide and the lack of a central evidence base.¹⁰²

III An Action Plan for Citizenship

The aforementioned factors led the Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship (EAG) to devise a five-point action plan to ensure that Citizenship would be delivered systematically across England.¹⁰³ The Centre endorses the plan in its entirety as it aligns with our experience of delivering EDC, and we believe that the challenges it aims to tackle hinder the development of the subject.

The five objectives of the plan are summarised as follows:¹⁰⁴

Creation of a Curriculum Guarantee for Citizenship in every primary and secondary school and clear progression to further Citizenship education post 16 to support the National Curriculum for Citizenship,

Making Citizenship a priority subject in teacher training with bursaries,

Establishing ‘Beacons of Excellence in Citizenship’ linking University Politics departments and schools teaching Citizenship, Benchmarking best practice to highlight effective Citizenship education with a special subject survey by Ofsted, and,

Stimulate the production of high-quality teaching resources to meet gaps and support high-quality teaching.

These objectives are reactions to three categories of problem. Objectives 1. and 2. relate to the reduction in coverage and quality of provision of Citizenship Education (Issue 1). Objectives 3. and 5. relate to the capacity of educators to deliver Citizenship Education (Issue 2). Objective 4. relates to the need for an evidence base (Issue 3). A rationale and refinement for these objectives is discussed below, along with supplementary recommendations to aid their impact.

Issue 1- Reduction in coverage and quality of provision

The resources allocated by schools to the teaching of Citizenship compare unfavourably with the provision seen at the start of the 2010 Coalition government. This is due in large part to the substantial change in characteristics that secondary schools in England have undergone over the past decade. Academisation has reduced the universality of Citizenship teaching, which has shifted from being a compulsory requirement to a voluntary commitment for many schools. This has resulted in many schools opting to end their Citizenship delivery or allocate non-specialist teachers to deliver the subject.

All local authority maintained schools must follow the National Curriculum, but a significant majority of secondary schools are no longer bound by this obligation. At the end of the 1997-2010 government, local authority maintained schools comprised the majority of secondary schools, with very few academies in operation.¹⁰⁵ The 2010-2015 government oversaw a fundamental transformation of the legal status of secondary schools in England, which resulted in a 3150% increase in the number of academy schools from 203 in January 2010 to 6399 in 2017, with a concomitant decrease in the number of local authority maintained schools.¹⁰⁶

As such, 2,220,088 pupils (as of January 2017) attend schools without compulsory Citizenship provision. Many schools continue to use the National Curriculum as a guide to help their students achieve the wider developmental benefits that a ‘broad and balanced curriculum’ would provide, but the Bingham Centre is increasingly told that Citizenship in newly academised schools is a resource-dependent addendum to their main educational provision rather than a core educational subject.

The suggestion that academisation is detrimental to Citizenship teaching has not been robustly tested, but the coincidence of its decline and the emergent curriculum freedom that schools now enjoy points to a tentative correlation. Fifty-five percent of academies surveyed in 2014 by the DfE were reported to have changed their curriculum since academisation.¹⁰⁷ This is married with a simultaneous reduction in the volume of new Citizenship educators entering the profession. In a written question to the Secretary of State for Education, Stephen Timms MP was informed that there had been a 77% reduction in the number of new Citizenship teachers qualifying each year, down from 243 in 2010/2011 to 54 in 2016/17.¹⁰⁸

This is profoundly challenging for Citizenship delivery and the first two recommendations of the Action Plan are vital to ensure that schools adequately resource EDC and that there are enough trained educators to teach it.

Recommendations

Recommendation 1- Introduce a Curriculum Guarantee for Citizenship in every primary and secondary school.

Recommendation 2- Make Citizenship a priority subject in teacher training with bursaries.

Issue 2- Capacity of educators to deliver Citizenship teaching

A connected consequence of the drastic decrease in new Citizenship educators is a reduction in the capability of schools to teach the full spectrum of topics within the Citizenship curriculum. EDC is a multifarious introduction to social science.¹⁰⁹ The subject content for the KS3 and 4 Citizenship National Curriculum programmes of study extend to the fundamental aspects of law, (democratic) politics, economics and personal budgeting.

Citizenship is often delivered by teachers whose principal expertise lies in cognate subjects (Religious Education and English Literature teachers frequently lead our pilot programme). As such, it would be unreasonable to assume that all teachers tasked with Citizenship delivery will have intimate knowledge of all aspects of a curriculum so diverse. This is exacerbated by the ever-changing nature of contextual debates relevant to the curriculum. A key concern of Citizenship Education is informing learners of developing trends in world affairs to enable them to form their own opinions. The Bingham Centre has been repeatedly told that contemporary policy debates and political events can outpace the ability of individual teachers to keep up with political affairs whilst managing other educational and pastoral responsibilities.¹¹⁰

Knowledge gaps of this sort are most reasonably filled by high-quality educational materials that provide teachers with sufficient background in the principal areas of Citizenship teaching. By supporting civil society organisations and teachers' bodies in the production of EDC materials, policymakers can increase teachers' capability to deliver legal and political content. In the Bingham Centre's experience, this will lead to an improvement in students' ability across all areas covered by the Citizenship Curriculum.

The Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT) is an example of an organisation with great expertise that has filled this capacity gap with resources funded by the DfE.¹¹¹ In an environment where the number of new Citizenship educators dwindles, additional government support for the production of teachers' resources is essential to achieve systematic universality of Citizenship coverage.

Aside from organisations with a proven track record of delivering high-quality, accessible Citizenship resources, academic departments could meaningfully improve in-school educators' ability to teach Citizenship. University Social Science departments contain a wealth of subject knowledge and pre-existing materials for teaching. If these institutions were matched with schools in their local areas to provide capacity building training and resources, burdensome teacher training requirements can be similarly overcome.

Recommendations

Recommendation 3- Establish 'Beacons of Excellence in Citizenship' which would link university Politics departments (experts in the content that would be delivered) with schools teaching Citizenship (using subject association bodies such as ACT as a point of liaison due to their expertise).

¹¹⁰ Expert Subject Advisory Group, Proposed DfE Review of Citizenship

¹¹¹ <https://www.teachingCitizenship.org.uk/deliberative-classroom-topical-debating-resources-and-teacher-guidance>

Recommendation 4- Stimulate the production of high-quality teaching resources to meet gaps and support high-quality teaching.

Issue 3- Building the evidence base and celebrating best practice

The National Foundation for Educational Research (NFER) was commissioned by the Department for Children, Schools and Families to conduct longitudinal research into the delivery of Citizenship Education in 2001. This monitored the outcomes delivered to the young people that comprised the first cohort of statutory Citizenship learners.¹¹² The research has produced findings that are of crucial value to all seeking to deliver the subject, including the landmark conclusions that extensive EDC can override or mitigate environmental factors that might suppress later political engagement (such as socio-economic background).

There are few mechanisms for the dissemination of this evidence. If this information were widely shared there would be two benefits to the body of Citizenship educators. The first such benefit would be felt in terms of organisations' resources: access to this information could bolster requests of organisations in this space for funding (many civil society groups conducting Citizenship education are funded by grant-providing trusts), allowing them to continue to operate in economically tumultuous times. Secondly, such information provides reflective lessons for organisations to improve their delivery. Without sharing and highlighting of best practice, organisations of scant resource are likely to take on the burden for testing and refining their education initiatives incrementally. This is onerous for individual organisations involved and inefficient for the Citizenship Education sector more generally. The Democratic Life coalition suggest that OFSTED would be an appropriate vehicle for quantitative research conducted with schools, and that ACT could host examples of best practice online.

Aside from case studies illustrating best practice, multiple evaluation frameworks exist across Europe that ambitiously map the most efficient and scalable models for the delivery of EDC. The CoE runs an evaluation tool that facilitates comparison between European nations. The United Kingdom did not participate in the 2016 iteration of this process. The benefit of standardised evaluation tools, as expressed above, is that the information can lead to positive results for educators in their delivery. There are even greater benefits to be reaped in European-wide tools because these are more likely to capture the range of potential problems and issues that educators across Britain will face. The UK is also a notable omission from the leading ‘International Civic and Citizenship Education Study’.¹¹³

Highlighting successful initiatives and sharing positive case studies produce multiple benefits to the Citizenship community. Notification of best practice allows educators and resource-producing organisations to efficiently deploy their resources, helps stakeholders to avoid detrimental approaches, fosters effective Citizenship practice and increases the confidence of teachers to continue delivering the subject.

Recommendations

Recommendation 5- Benchmark best practice to highlight effective Citizenship Education with a special subject survey by Ofsted.

Recommendation 6- Contribute to international evaluative frameworks such as the CoE Reporting Tool and the International Civic and Citizenship Education Study.

IV Issues in Teaching the Rule of Law

DfE has promoted several initiatives in recent years to enable schools to discuss social and political issues. These initiatives have modified the attitudes and behaviours of Citizenship educators, as its malleable, diverse curriculum facilitates teaching these topics.¹¹⁴

These recent strategies have included:

Providing funds for initiatives that increase character and resilience training for learners,

A duty to have “due regard to the need to prevent people from being drawn into terrorism”, and,

¹¹⁴ Professor Lee Jerome, The Bingham Centre, Fundamental British Values and The Rule of Law, Accessed 6/9/17 <https://youtu.be/j5w2p7QPfZI>

The ‘Fundamental British Values’ agenda.

Anecdotal evidence collected by the Bingham Centre in its outreach work with schools suggests that the announcement of successive strategies within short periods of time can cause confusion amongst teachers about how such strategies will be implemented. This can cause disruption for an already ill-understood subject.

Though provision is patchy and inconsistent, there is a widespread understanding of the key political concepts underpinning the KS3 and 4 Citizenship curriculum. There is less understanding about the legal aspects of the curriculum. Legal knowledge is diffuse and sparse in comparison to knowledge about political institutions.¹¹⁵ This can be reflected in a topic at the cross-section of law and politics, human rights. A recent teachers’ poll saw 47.4% of respondents state that their students did not understand human rights (despite its presence on the National Curriculum for KS4).¹¹⁶

The same survey suggested that almost a third of teachers felt unequipped to teach their students about human rights. As this was a self-selecting group of teachers, the true average across England’s schools is likely to be higher than this. The difficulty that Citizenship educators have in teaching about legal matters was reflected in editor’s notes introducing an article written by the Bingham Centre for ‘Teaching Citizenship’ (the leading subject journal produced by ACT). The introduction stated that, “until we met colleagues from the Bingham Centre, we thought we understood what the phrase ‘the rule of law’ meant when it appeared in the government’s statement of Fundamental British Values. In fact, as this article shows, the concept is more nuanced and more useful than we thought.”¹¹⁷ This can be seen as a reflection of the lack of resources available to Citizenship educators in section III that cover the full spectrum of the curriculum, but it also undermines the extent to which educators understand a crucial concept that they are teaching, the rule of law, which is not defined in the DfE guidance.¹¹⁸

Comments gathered from participants in the Bingham Centre pilot study support this paucity of understanding around the rule of law. Qualitative responses to survey questions saw respondents comment that “existing Citizenship materials lacked information on law and justice”, that they “did not contain materials that could engage students and develop the required skills” and that there is “a lack of resources for law as a KS3 and KS4 subject.”

80% of surveyed teachers felt that the resources provided prepared them for delivering the lessons that they otherwise could not have conducted, emphasising the impact of rule of law-based resources in enhancing teachers’ capabilities.¹¹⁹

V The Benefits of the Rule of Law

The revised curriculum for Citizenship in 2014 introduced international law as a discrete requirement for Citizenship subject content to be taught alongside the pre-existing human rights requirement. Despite the apprehension that some teachers have expressed to the Bingham Centre about teaching international law at KS4, it is our view that legal content provides an enriching and suitably challenging environment for all learners. This is supported by the continued engagement of Citizenship educators in our work and our independent evaluation report. The Fundamental British Value of the rule of law, though currently misunderstood, can empower teachers at any level, promoting a positive vision of Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society.

The University of Warwick conducted a pilot education initiative applying the Fundamental British Value of the rule of law to primary schools. They taught a number of human rights-based lessons using the Fundamental British Values as a framework, the second of which focused on that of the rule of law. Though legal and justice content was challenging for the students, reference to wider human rights values such as universality negated any potential for the Fundamental British Value guidance to be interpreted in a way that was subversive or intolerant. The findings of this model are inherently useful to educators that seek further clarity on Fundamental British Values and suggest that with improved guidance the teaching community can bring students together in promoting engaged Citizenship through the use of the rule of law and human rights education.

Recommendations

Recommendation 7- Consider allowing individual DfE strategies (such as Fundamental British Values) to operate without shifts in focus or the announcement of new strategies so that sufficient time is available to monitor and evaluate their delivery.

Recommendation 8- Produce new guidance for all schools, in consultation and development with leading rule of law organisations, such as the Bingham Centre, on the requirements of teaching the rule of law within a democratic society.

VI About The Rule of Law for Citizenship Education

The Rule of Law for Citizenship Education is the Bingham Centre's headline programme. The programme teaches students about the fundamental aspects of the justice system to enable them to become active citizens. In 2016, an independent evaluation exercise was conducted which saw 97% of students report an increased understanding of the justice system as a result of this intervention.¹²⁰ This evaluation report raised a number of practical challenges for our own intervention and the delivery of Citizenship education more generally, and these will be raised throughout this response.

Since this 2015 programme, the Centre has continued to support teachers in the delivery of Citizenship Education, focusing on the Fundamental British Value of the Rule of Law. In 2017 we launched a new textbook, 'The Rule of Law for Citizenship Education, International Law and Human Rights' that was awarded the Citizenship Foundation Quality Mark. Our Citizenship teaching programme is now present in over 250 schools and education providers across England (as of August 2017). The Centre draws upon a wealth of expertise in Citizenship Education from the delivery of highly successful programmes and constant reflective evaluation.

Blakelaw and North Fenham Community Council – written evidence (CCE0099)

Submitted by V Rook, community councillor on behalf and with permission of said community council.

The constitution shows and gives direction to enable trust in each decision and future proof the word of parliament and those who try to establish a country where it is safe, caring and just. This balance is then illustrated in national, regional and local government and all the works of the nation for health education, and commerce. Giving the citizens the example of fairness and a just conscience to face the world.

The British Constitution is composed of parliamentary legislation, case law and precedent and common law dating back to beyond the Norman Conquest. The idea of checks and balances is uppermost in the structure. Any change needs to reflect and continue these checks and balances to provide a democracy and fair system.

The Community Council is foremost in promotion of the idea of equality and diversity locally, regionally and nationally. Individuals need to trust and have the opportunity to express their views honestly and trust these will be respected.

Many citizens in Newcastle and the Parish Community Council area have been involved in partnership committees set up by the City Council to encourage diversity and cohesion where members of the said committees had a voice in civic strategy and could inform their communities of the workings of local government. Representatives from many backgrounds and cultures joined together. This involved working with the community and voluntary sector which benefited all concerned, with training in administration, funding and representation and safeguarding being provided.

The Community Council consider education is the key to encouragement of citizens to be more actively involved. At the moment few are taught about Parliament and the methods of law making and how law is produced. There is a need to promote education of the British Constitutional structure and method similar to the publicity given to that of other countries such as the USA. This would provide understanding and positive comment. We therefore would indicate the following positive methods in regard to promotion of the basis of citizenship in the 21st century.

POSITIVE ENCOURAGEMENT OF ACTIVE CITIZENSHIP

Inclusion of how the state works in the National Curriculum throughout school lifetime- British Constitution and structure of laws, legislature, executive, judiciary at O and A level GSCE.

Mandatory involvement of all Councillors and Members of Parliament in regard to visits to schools annually.

Local and regional councils to have video links to Parliament and MP's to express residents views on some committee discussions.

Voluntary and community sector to play a role in connecting all citizens in society to play and active part in civic involvement.

Lifelong education should be encouraged also in regard to how other governments work and parliamentary visits by all citizens at least once upon gaining the vote-this would give a balanced view in regard to future developments.

Bite the Ballot – Supplementary written evidence (CCE0254)

Explaining the Data-sharing Process and Agreement

Last year, Bite The Ballot (BTB) facilitated positive conversations between the Electoral Commission (EC) and Experian about data sharing in order to gain insight into registration levels and the electorate. After many positive conversations, genuine interest and verbal agreements nothing has yet to materialise. This is largely in part because the current data protection laws and lack of a written agreement between the two parties, which we at BTB are striving to ensure is pushed through.

At this moment in time Experian is not working with the EC on anything explicitly in regards to the insights. Experian feel by helping to encourage all eligible members of society to register vote through BTB, they will be not only be supporting a great cause and help UK society become more politically aware, but also will benefit from being able to identify more UK consumers through the use of the Electoral Roll data. This, in turn, will improve automated identity verification services and credit applications by helping to fill a data gap that exists for people in society. However, if an agreement were possible then local authorities would be able access invaluable insights into the electorate.

Over the years, Experian has developed a system whereby using consistent attributes like name, address, date of birth as well as other less obvious attributes, they can look at the electoral data, data from lenders, some public data, and other data sets to form a view of a 'consumer' and assigns a particular identifier to link all the data together. By doing this Experian able capable for example to determine whether someone registered for the first time. Experian would use all data sets to match the electoral data to a particular identifier and then look to see whether that particular identifier has previous or historical electoral data link to it. If the answer is no, then the person is newly a registered person.

Notably, similar approaches can be applied to determine to a high degree of accuracy unregistered individuals, individuals registered incorrectly, and offer better insights into registered people i.e. age, ethnicity etc. The insight and data can be invaluable and assist the EC and to local authorities.

However, as mentioned earlier data protection laws are a barrier. The EC remains the data controller of electoral data and Experian can only process the data on behalf of the EC. Therefore, Experian is unable to share the data direct to BTB or local authorities. Experian and the EC are working on their relationship and there is hope that a solution can be found in the future, however, legislative assistance would be greatly appreciated. The benefits linked to this can be extended to:

- lower duplication of work i.e. applications;
- better targeted canvassing campaigns;
- and better value for money in maintaining of the electoral register.

British Heart Foundation – written evidence (CCE0121)

1. Introduction

1.1 The British Heart Foundation (BHF) is the largest independent funder of cardiovascular research, and the third largest charitable funder of medical research in the UK. We are working to achieve our vision of a world in which people do not die prematurely or suffer from cardiovascular disease. In the fight for every heartbeat we fund ground-breaking medical research, provide support and care to people living with cardiovascular disease and advocate for cardiovascular disease to be a priority.

1.2 Each year, thanks to the generosity of our supporters, we fund around £100 million of new research across all four nations of the UK, which accounts for more than half of the funding for independent cardiovascular research in the UK. Our funding portfolio extends from laboratory science to clinical trials and population studies. We fund people from PhDs to professors as well as investing in large programme and project grants.

1.3 Due to modern treatments built on our research, huge progress has been made in saving lives. Most babies born in the UK with heart defects now survive and 7 out of 10 people survive a heart attack. But cardiovascular disease still kills 1 in 4 people and affects 7 million people in the UK, so there is so much more to do.

1.4 The BHF welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement to demonstrate the impact of charities such as the BHF in fulfilling a unique role in fostering and supporting civic engagement. This submission will focus on areas where the BHF is active in promoting and stimulating civic engagement and discusses:

- The role that large charities, such as the BHF, play in modern civil society
- Tackling health inequalities
- Volunteering and Employability
- Fundraising and the Community
- BHF retail
- Trustees

2. The Role and Purpose of Charities in civic society

2.1 The BHF is proud to be part of the long tradition of the charitable and voluntary sector forming an essential part of fostering, creating and maintaining a strong civic society in the UK. The sector is uniquely placed to mobilise and support people and to undertake activities solely in pursuit of charitable aims and not for private gain or profit. The charitable and voluntary sector is a partner with government to encourage civil society and civic engagement, to contribute to economic growth, support the delivery of public services and help to shape and influence public policy for the benefit of the many thousands of beneficiaries represented by the sector. The voluntary and charitable sector makes a considerable contribution to the UK economy in terms of employment, volunteering and in the case of medical research charities, investment in scientific innovation and medical advancements.

2.2 Medical research charities invested £1.6bn in medical research in the UK in 2016¹²¹, the biggest proportion of public funding for medical research in the UK. As such, they play a vital role and unique role in supporting game changing breakthroughs in treatment and care for people living with conditions such as heart disease. For over 50 years, the BHF and its funded professors and researchers have pioneered life saving research and improved outcomes and survival rates for the people living with cardiovascular disease in the UK and beyond and we are proud of the progress we have made and the global impact our research continues to have, representing the interests of our beneficiaries.

2.3 As the sector grows in size and income, thanks to the goodwill and generosity of the public, modern charities must adapt their governance, accountability and management structures to keep pace. In order to continue to operate effectively and efficiently in the modern social, political and economic landscape, larger charities, such as the BHF which employs over 3,600 staff, works with over 19,000 volunteers and runs the largest charity retail network in the UK with over 720 shops, need to invest in their growth to achieve the outcomes that their beneficiaries deserve. Charities highlight and champion the importance of inclusivity, transparency and accountability of the institutions that serve civil society and take responsibility for shaping and fostering civic engagement.

3. Tackling health inequalities

3.1 The BHF's ambition is to continue to invest £100 million into lifesaving research each year until 2020 and we are making solid progress towards that aim, thanks to the generosity of our supporters and donors. In 2016/17, the BHF invested £107.5m in life saving research, supporting over 550 of the UK's leading cardiovascular scientists. Through partnering with other research funders and government, the BHF and other medical research charities can achieve great advancements in scientific innovations and outcomes for patients and represent those voices that need to be heard in society. Public investment in scientific research leads to economic growth through increases in private sector productivity and has positive economic and social impacts through successful collaboration between the academic and private sectors.

¹²¹ <http://amrc.org.uk/news/charities-funding-contributes-to-uk-medical-research-excellence>

3.2 The BHF is currently funding over 1,000 critical research projects seeking to make breakthroughs in all aspects of heart and circulatory disease and supports six Centres of Research Excellence across the UK, providing vital infrastructure for our world class researchers. BHF-funded research has led to the development of new drugs, treatment guidelines, policy change and scientific resources that have improved the lives of millions of patients and families in the UK and beyond. Through the BHF's contribution to the Whitehall Study that uncovered the link between social factors and heart health, it has informed the development of UK governments' public health policies and World Health Organization guidelines to tackle health inequalities and improve access to preventative interventions and treatment, helping to achieve social inclusivity and cohesiveness.

3.3 A major finding of the Whitehall Study, set-up in 1967, and its sequel was that those in the lowest employment grade were more likely to develop heart disease and die prematurely than their bosses. The studies have also shown that this inequality can't just be attributed to risk factors such as smoking and obesity but that factors like stress, job-control, and work-family conflict have also been shown to impact a person's risk of disease. These findings formed the basis for a report on addressing health inequalities by Professor Sir Michael Marmot for the Government in 2010¹²². This influential report, stemming from pivotal BHF-funded research, is now helping to shape UK governments' public health policies and showcases how the BHF is central to improving outcomes for disadvantaged and often underrepresented groups in our society.

3.4 The BHF's Hearty Lives programme aims to reduce these inequalities in heart disease through working in partnership with local authorities, the NHS and non-profit organisations to improve the health of people at greatest risk of CVD and since 2009, over 159,000 people have taken part in Hearty Lives activities. An external national evaluation took place in 2012, which undertook a review of the operation of Hearty Lives over its first three years. The evaluation showcases a variety of key findings, case studies and in-depth evidence of local impact and behaviour change as a result of these community projects being run across the UK.¹²³

3.5 Nation of Lifesavers

The BHF's ambitions are to take the findings from research and use them to drive the best possible patient outcomes in clinical settings, the community and at home. The BHF's approach to prevention, survival and support drives the implementation of research into practice to improve support for patients, their families and carers. To this end, the BHF provides information and guidance to everyone affected by heart disease and empowers patients and healthcare professionals to join the fight and engage in improving outcomes for all and to take part in supporting their community.

3.6 Across the UK, there are over 30,000 cardiac arrests outside of hospital every year but the survival rate is less than 1 in 10. The BHF aim to increase the rate of cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) and defibrillation through the Nation of Lifesavers campaign, reaching more schools and communities than ever before. Since launching the BHF's vision of a Nation of Lifesavers in October 2014, around 2.4 million people have been trained in CPR across the UK through the Heartstart and Call Push Rescue schemes, working with community groups and with secondary schools across the UK. Over 3,000 (46% of eligible) secondary schools in the UK have already received BHF CPR training kit and, to support European Restart a Heart Day in 2016, the BHF joined with three other major charities and ambulance services to support the delivery of CPR training across communities, managing to train over 150,000 young people on the day.

3.7 The BHF supports the introduction of Personal, Social and Health Education (PSHE) as a statutory subject for all secondary schools in England and, as part of the Every Child Lifesaver coalition, advocates that first aid and CPR training should be a mandatory component of a new, statutory PSHE curriculum. Teaching first aid as part of the PSHE curriculum for just one hour a year, each year would ensure all children and young people have the opportunity to learn this crucial life skill, building up knowledge and confidence over the course of their time in school and help to foster a sense of civic responsibility for helping to save lives.

4. Volunteering and employability

4.1 The BHF's volunteers continue to make an extraordinary contribution. To many people across the UK, volunteers are the public face of the BHF and they therefore play a vital role. The BHF's 19,600 retail and fundraising volunteers inform people about the BHF's work and services and also act increasingly as passionate and informed advocates, campaigning and helping to recruit more supporters. The BHF provides many volunteering opportunities to meet many different needs, including working in our shops, fundraising in the community and at events. The role of large charities, such as the BHF, in promoting and providing meaningful and varied volunteer opportunities is key to fostering and encouraging a society in which civic participation and engagement is welcomed and facilitated.

4.2 National Citizenship Service

The BHF has some involvement with the National Citizenship Service (NCS) which creates a welcomed opportunity for fundraising as part of the NCS volunteering project and it is an area of collaboration which it is hoped will grow over the coming years. However, the BHF does not support the notion of compulsion in volunteering as this does not help to create the necessary environment to foster meaningful and engaged volunteering relationships.

4.3 Retail Volunteers

Across the retail operation, the BHF plays a big part in helping to deliver employability and support many people referred for work experience from Job Centre Plus – in July 2017 this amounted to around 6,000 volunteering hours across the BHF retail estate. The BHF sees volunteering as a route to employment and is working with a consortium of large employers to provide work experience placements for the NEET (Not in Education, Employment or Training) population through the Movement to Work programme. In the last year, over 600 BHF retail volunteers achieved or were working towards an NVQ and over 2000 of the younger volunteers worked towards a Duke of Edinburgh Award.

4.4 In 2016, 20% of all paid vacancies in the BHF retail operation were filled by previous volunteers and following the introduction of the Apprenticeship Levy in April, the BHF has appointed its first Apprentice to the BHF Apprentice scheme, who was a former volunteer and winner of the South West Young Volunteer of the Year award. The BHF is working hard to establish a career path from volunteering to apprenticeships and beyond.

5. Fundraising and the Community

5.1 The BHF is almost entirely reliant on public donations to fund its lifesaving and pioneering research and does not directly receive any government funding for its research via contracts or otherwise. Without successfully achieving broad engagement and reach amongst the community in order to gain the support of the generous British public, the BHF would simply not be able to carry out its work and we therefore take our responsibilities to our supporters very seriously. The BHF is committed to ensuring that the charity sector values long-term relationships with donors and upholds a duty of care by charities to their supporters. Charities are the bridge between donors and beneficiaries, allowing the generous British public to help those people and causes they care about and engage in civil society through raising awareness and helping others.

5.2 Community Fundraising

The over 250 BHF Community Fundraising groups spread across the UK are at the heart of the BHF's fight for every heartbeat. They are the voice of the BHF in local communities across the UK and help the BHF to reach more people at a local level. BHF groups are made of empowered, dedicated volunteers who raise vital funds and awareness on behalf of the BHF, by hosting fundraising events and activities such as extravagant balls to bag packing, collections to ceilidhs, golf days to garden parties. BHF Community Fundraising groups often forge lifelong friendships and help to build social capital in their local communities by bringing together skills, experience, talent and knowledge to inspire communities for a common shared cause.

5.3 Mass Participation Events

Thousands of people across the UK also take part in our mass participation fundraising events, such as 'Dechox', where in March 2016 over 16,000 people signed up via our social media campaign to raise funds by giving up chocolate for a month, the London to Brighton

Bike Ride which in 2016 attracted over 14,000 cyclists and ‘MyMarathon’, another social media campaign which was successful in gathering over 30,000 people to raise funds for the BHF over the course of the year. It’s clear that by offering people opportunities to come together to engage and participate in events with a philanthropic cause, charities help to engender a sense of common purpose for the benefit of wider society and therefore foster civic engagement. The broad reach and engagement that the BHF achieves across the UK is testimony to the unique role that large charities, such as the BHF, play in encouraging and facilitating civic engagement.

5.4 Working with Partners

The BHF’s partnerships with industry and corporates are key to broadening reach and engagement and essential to helping meet fundraising goals. Through the National Charity Partnership with Tesco and Diabetes UK, the organisations worked to support people to make better choices and live longer and healthier lives. More than 17 million people have been reached through the ‘Let’s Do This’ campaign and 254,000 people have been helped to eat more healthily or become more active, helping to improve their health outcomes. A partnership with Nationwide, who funded CPR kits for over 220 schools, also resulted in CPR training for 3,000 of their staff, and training has also been delivered to other corporate partners – Airbus Operations, Travelodge and David Lloyd.

6. BHF Retail

6.1 As the largest charity retailer in the UK with over 720 stores, the BHF is taking the fight against heart disease into communities across the UK and the shops welcome around 60 million visitors each year. BHF shops contribute to the wider social fabric of local communities by being a resource centre that provides information and support to people with heart disease and a hub for volunteering and training opportunities. All BHF shops are professionally run and very well presented, playing a vital role in helping to develop thriving high streets and are an asset to the local community.

6.2 BHF shops provide invaluable additional services to the local community through a number of unique activities which mean that a BHF retail outlet is more than just a shop:

- BHF Furniture and Electrical stores offer a free furniture collection service and help to redirect over 65,000 tonnes of furniture a year that local authorities would otherwise have had to deal with, including 130,000 sofas and 5 million books
- Community Boards in all stores highlight information for heart patients, provide leaflets and promotion of our confidential Heart helpline staffed by cardiac nurses

- All shop staff and volunteers are trained in CPR through the kits held instore and which are also lent out to the local community. Some stores also hold training sessions for the local community
- Many BHF shops hold information on where defibrillators the BHF has helped place are located
- There are strong links to our thousands of BHF-funded researchers across the UK who often come to the stores to give presentations
- The BHF has an award-winning partnership with 80 top Universities and local communities through our 'Pack for Good' campaign encouraging students to donate unwanted items to their local BHF stores

The virtuous cycle of charity retail is one in which there are no losers and there are tangible benefits for wider society: through the reuse and recycling of goods, shared value is created which allows the generation of funds for the cause, regenerates local high streets, creates jobs and volunteering opportunities, which in turn helps to build awareness and an emotional connection to the cause for the wider benefit of all and a visible presence on the high street of the benefit of civic engagement and participation.

7. Governance and Leadership – Promoting Trusteeship

7.1 The BHF's ability to retain its position as the UK's heart charity and the biggest funder of cardiovascular research is underpinned by strong, effective governance and leadership. Every charity needs a strong board of Trustees to guide and shape it and becoming a charity Trustee is an important example of a significant commitment to civic engagement and participation. The BHF Board of Trustees is made up of 14 highly skilled volunteers who bring knowledge and insight from business, the voluntary sector and medicine whose breadth of experience ensure that the Board is well equipped to support the charity in moving forward with its strategic aims.

7.2 The increased scrutiny and attention to charity governance in recent times has highlighted the extent of commitment, expertise and personal dedication involved for charity Trustees of large, modern charities generating significant income and expenditure. In an increasingly complex regulatory environment where the risk to individuals is heightened and where the nature of participation is voluntary, the ability to attract and retain such talent in time may be a challenge. The BHF therefore welcomes further investment via the Charity Commission to bolster the recruitment, retention and ongoing support of Trustees and to promote the role to encourage civic engagement.

British Red Cross – written evidence (CCE0243)

Who we are

The British Red Cross is a volunteer-led humanitarian organisation that helps people in crisis, whoever and wherever they are, in the UK and around the world. We are part of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement, the world's leading and oldest humanitarian movement which comprises:

- The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC);
- The International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC); and
- 190 national Red Cross and Red Crescent societies worldwide.

The British Red Cross believes passionately in enabling people to respond to human crisis through human kindness – volunteering your time and talent to support people in need. One of our seven fundamental principles is voluntary service and we currently have 22,000 active volunteers throughout the UK.

Volunteering is a key element of civic engagement – individuals contribute to their communities while developing skills, connecting with people and communities they may not have a chance to do so with otherwise, and find the experience affirming and rewarding in non-financial ways.

Questions answered

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- 1.1. The UK has a vibrant civil society, respected internationally. It is hoped that civic engagement within the UK will continue to thrive in the future, providing an environment supportive of civil society organisations and activity.
- 1.2. The definition of “civil society”, and with it civic engagement, varies. Terminology changes and different phrases are used: volunteering, voluntary action, civic engagement, social action. We will use these terms interchangeably through this document.
- 1.3. British Red Cross’s vision is of a world where everyone gets the help they need in a crisis. Our mission is to mobilise the power of humanity so that individuals and communities can prepare for, deal with, and recover from crises.
- 1.4. Voluntary service is one of the Red Cross and Red Crescent’s seven fundamental principles. We are a voluntary relief movement which believes volunteering is at the heart of community-building. It not only helps in the immediate crisis, but also empowers and brings people together in the longer term. In this respect, the overall impact of volunteering can persist far beyond the provision of aid in the immediate aftermath of a crisis.

- 1.5. We think this matters because, based on almost 140 years of operational experience, we have an innate understanding in the importance of civic society in promoting another of our fundamental principles – that of humanity. Central to the humanity principle is the desire to prevent and alleviate human suffering wherever it may be found as well as to promote mutual understanding, friendship, co-operation and lasting peace amongst all peoples. We bring people together so that we can be more effective in our humanitarian work.
- 1.6. Our vision could not be realised without the passionate dedication of more than 21,500 volunteers and 4,100 staff working together for the British Red Cross. They help hundreds of thousands of people cope with all kinds of crises every year – from disasters and conflicts, to individual injuries and other personal challenges. Our people help both individuals and communities prepare for, cope with and recover from a range of crises.
- 1.7. For example, in the past three months we helped over 3,000 people in crisis as a result of the Manchester terror attack, more than 80 people after the London Bridge attack, and over 1,500 in the aftermath of the Grenfell fire. And we continue to offer our support to those affected by these crises as they rebuild their lives, including through continued distribution of the funds that we have raised: £16m for the We Love Manchester emergency fund; £2m for the UK Solidarity Fund; and £5m for the London Fire Relief Fund.
- 1.8. Furthermore, last year alone, British Red Cross UK-based services helped in the region of 112,000 people through our ambulance service, 27,000 refugees, 85,000 people to live independently at home, 100,000 people to access a short-term wheelchair, 250,000 people learn life-saving first aid skills and 16,000 through our emergency response service.
- 1.9. None of this would have been possible without the dedication of our volunteers – they remain the lifeblood of these operations, in which we work to create a society which is more resilient to crises when they strike. Indeed, many of our volunteers are former service users themselves. Those who once came to the Red Cross for emergency support now help others in the dire situation in which they once found themselves.
- 1.10. We tailor our volunteering offer to meet our different business needs and to suit different people. Volunteers are recruited for a specific role and a role description developed for each post. There is also a formal selection process. It is essential that all volunteers are appropriately skilled to carry out their chosen or allocated role. To this end, the British Red Cross offers an extensive range of training and development opportunities. This offer is a strategic approach in terms of our recruitment and retention.

- 1.11. We believe what makes our volunteering distinctive is that people get to give their time and talents in a way that is both meaningful for them and beneficial to our mission. Research carried out by the British Red Cross highlighting a number of motivations, triggers and barriers to volunteering showed that existing skills or training frequently influenced volunteers' motivations. These skills also shaped the role they sought to occupy. For example, volunteers in event first aid had often previously attended some first aid training and consequently were keen to maintain those skills, while those entering the fire and emergency response or support at home unit often had an employment or experience background that complemented their voluntary role.¹²⁴
- 1.12. We have impact due to the diverse nature of the work that we undertake, and our span of both rural and urban areas. We help people and communities recover from an emergency, provide practical and emotional support to refugees and asylum seekers, increase independence and well-being after a health crisis and support our partners overseas to prepare for and respond to crises. In more rural areas, our volunteers help hundreds of people each year cope with the effects of severe flooding, supporting them as they start to rebuild their lives. This translated to just under 16,000 people being supported and offered comfort, a warm place to rest and advice in 2015.
- 1.13. Our dedicated event first aid volunteers treated over 28,000 casualties at over 5000 events in 2015, from football matches to festivals. Almost 250,000 people learnt life-saving first aid skills through one of our courses. Our first aid education builds both individual and community resilience. It equips people with simple first aid skills that they will remember, builds their confidence to use those skills in an emergency and encourages people to step forward and help.
- 1.14. British Red Cross also provides invaluable support to people to help close the gap between home and hospital. Much of our service is delivered by volunteers. We currently provide over 200 hospital and community services across the UK. Working in partnership with hospital trusts and Clinical Commissioning Groups (CCGs) we form part of a multi-agency response to help a person avoid entering hospital, or to leave statutory care more quickly. This year we will help over 200,000 people through our support at home services in addition to offering over 100 A&E discharge services across the country.
- 1.15. Volunteers also help us deliver other vital services such as in areas where there are gaps in statutory provision. For example, our vital short term wheelchair loan service helped 103,810 people in 2015. As such, changes to the provision of statutory services have a direct effect on our service offer.

- 1.16. Over the last 140 years, our services have changed to coincide with the changing un-met needs of the population, and will continue to do so, so that we can ensure the needs of the most vulnerable in our society are met. For example, 2014 to 2015 saw a massive increase in the number of people using our refugee services across the country; an increase of 39% on the previous year, to support 27,645 people. The most common service delivered was destitution support, for those that could not meet their basic needs for food and shelter.
- 1.17. We believe that civic engagement is vital to society: it not only confers rights and responsibilities, fosters a sense of belonging, but can also promote inclusion, combating feelings of isolation and loneliness.
- 1.18. Community connectivity increases inclusion and builds resilience and results in the most appropriate responses to crisis situations. It is vital that individuals know how to bring about positive change in their communities.
- 1.19. This is especially relevant to youth volunteer groups. Under 25's are now the biggest growing segment of British Red Cross volunteers. The proportion of young people saying they volunteer has increased by more than half in recent years¹²⁵.
- 1.20. In 2010/11, 23% of 16-24 year olds said they volunteered formally (i.e. through a group or organisation of some kind) at least once a month. By 2014/15 that figure was 35%; a 52% increase, and in real terms it would mean around one million more young volunteers¹²⁶.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 The British Red Cross welcomes the work that successive governments have undertaken to encourage active citizenship.

6.2 The National Citizen Service has a well-established alumni programme, but this is weighted towards encouraging participants to return to the National Citizen Service (e.g. as recruitment ambassadors) rather than take up opportunities to extend/prolong civic engagement in the wider community.

¹²⁵ NCVO UK Civil Society Almanac 2017: <https://data.ncvo.org.uk/>

6.3 There are 100s of voluntary organisations and charities, including the British Red Cross, who engage every day with thousands of volunteers at all levels. Young People aged 15-26 make up 18% of the BRC, 22,000 volunteers throughout the UK. These young people volunteer across all British Red Cross services and activities alongside volunteers of all ages. They could be providing first aid at a public gathering; ensuring a vulnerable person can return home after a stay in hospital; supporting a newly arrived refugee to integrate into their new community; ensuring someone temporarily unable to walk receives a wheelchair or walking aid; selling donated goods in our shops; raising money through fundraising challenges amongst a range of other ways of volunteering their time and talent to support our work to help vulnerable people.

6.4 Our youth volunteers are a significantly active group who are integrated across our organisation appreciating that due to their particular ‘age and stage’ they may need additional support in some areas, as they might be doing things for the first time and are exponentially developing skills, experiences and networks as they give us their time.

6.5 The BRC has introduced RED (Recognise, Empower and Develop), a skills development and accreditation programme for young people. Our young volunteers have told us how important it is for them to have their skills acknowledged in a format that they can share with a prospective employer or for college/university applications.

6.6 It is critical that any programmes involving volunteering are optional and individuals participate of their own free will and not to gain access to state benefits. Forcing people to volunteer risks negative consequences, and in our opinion would be counter-productive.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1 Increasingly we are seeing communities arrange take part in civic engagement independently of formal organisations. This started with the London Riots clean up in 2011, and the rise in use of social media has enabled this independent engagement. We need to be aware that people increasingly want to engage on their own terms and may look to charities as enablers of civic engagement rather than agencies that signs up and direct people.

7.2 This also links to the need for the sector to strike a realistic balance between the highly regulated nature of what some charities are engaged in (and all the checks and balances that come with that) and people's reluctance to commit a huge amount of time and information in order to help their communities.

7.3 Currently, a young person wishing to volunteer for a year in the UK would fall under the NEET category – not in employment, education or training. However, if they are volunteering full time they are unable to actively job hunt, so cannot claim benefits or receive National Insurance credits.

7.4 This is a barrier to promoting diversity in volunteering, in the same way as unpaid internships are, as it limits volunteering opportunities to those young people fortunate enough to have financial support from other sources, such as parents or other family members. It also diminishes the contribution that volunteers make to our community and fails to recognise the vital work that they do.

7.5 We would welcome the opportunity to explore ways of overcoming these barriers in the future.

Fundraising

7.6 Society can support civic engagement in a myriad of ways. British Red Cross fundraising activities are a vital part of our civic engagement. Fundraising amongst the public is vital in allowing the British Red Cross and our supporters to make an extraordinary impact on the lives of people in crisis. Over half a million members of the public regularly donate to us every year, and this continued and generous support allows us to plan and to rapidly respond to disasters across the world as soon as they take place.

7.7 Alongside delivery of services, our fundraising activities are one of the primary ways that we come into direct contact with the general public and spread awareness of how they can help people in crises.

7.8 We have a range of fundraising activities that are tailored to engage with the community in the most appropriate and relevant way possible:

- Our passionate fundraisers provide inspirational and informed experiences to individual members of the public to provide an opportunity to support charitable causes, both local to the community and internationally;
- Our specialist fundraisers engage with corporate partners, trusts and philanthropists to fund individual projects, support our charitable objectives and express their socially responsible aims;

- Our community fundraisers and Presidents network and community fundraisers around the country work with communities to mobilise local networks and organise events tailored to each area; and
- Our charity shops provide a mechanism for the public to donate goods and support charitable causes in alternative ways, provide volunteer opportunities and a local face for the organisation. We have witnessed how important this is to local communities of late, with the incredible outpour of community spirit following the attack at Manchester Arena and the Grenfell Tower fire.

7.9 By providing a positive experience and showing evidence of the impact of donations and support, we hope to spread our values that encourage the public to continue support these causes – and indeed other civil society initiatives.

Loneliness and social isolation

7.10 In July 2015 British Red Cross and Co-op announced a new partnership to highlight and tackle loneliness and social isolation in communities across the UK.

7.11 Through our research¹²⁷ we found that loneliness is a serious and widespread issue – almost 80 per cent of people have experienced loneliness, and almost one in five (the equivalent of over 9 million adults across the UK) said they were often or always lonely.

7.12 In response to these findings, we have developed a new and broad ‘Connecting Communities’ programme. This includes 49 services in 39 communities across the UK, bringing together more than 50 dedicated staff and around 500 volunteers, who will support thousands of adults of all ages who feel they have nowhere to turn. This is just one of many examples of society becoming involved with civic engagement.

7.13 The programme goes beyond these new services, however. Partnerships will be key to delivering a long-term, sustainable impact on loneliness and social isolation, both for individual service users and on the issues as a whole. Our role as a partner on the Jo Cox Commission on Loneliness has shown the impact that can be achieved when organisations work together to as a broad social movement, amplifying the national conversation on loneliness and the everyday steps people can take in their lives to address it. We aim to build on this by working with partners to ensure services are available to people who need them most no matter how hard-to-reach, and by sharing the learning generated by our new services. At the end of this year, the Jo Cox Commission on Loneliness will be publishing its manifesto including policy recommendations on the role for government.

7.14 Our research also found that more than 80% of people agreed that ‘there are lots of actions that everyone can take in their daily lives to help those feeling lonely’. A key aim of Connecting Communities is to work with partners, in particular the Co-op and its existing community networks, to support, empower and inspire everyone across the UK to come together and take action in strong, thriving communities where people are supported to connect and stay connected.

Inclusion and diversity

7.15 Inclusion and diversity should be high on the agenda for civil society. It is only through considering and understanding the experiences of all groups in society – particularly protected groups under the Equality Act (2010) and those from working class backgrounds – that civil society can remain effective, relevant and able to represent the interests of all citizens.

7.16 These groups should be represented in the civil society workforce (in terms of both volunteers and staff). A recent British Red Cross report¹²⁸ outlines several recommendations to address this.

7.17 We believe that any reduction in civil society funding will mean that organisations may struggle to pay competitive salaries, or even the living wage. This risks leading to an increasingly homogenous workforce. This will impede our ability to harness the diversity of talent in society and most effectively support the diverse citizens civil society exists to support.

7.18 This lack of funding, or the insecurity of funding, may lead to a lack of innovation in civil society, leaving the sector stagnant and resistant to change and, potentially, at risk of losing relevance to the citizens we exist to support.

Volunteer retention

8.1 Recent internal research the British Red Cross conducted into volunteers, and whose findings may have learnings for the wider civil society, found¹²⁹ that it is common to volunteer for a number of different organisations, even within the space of one year. The majority of volunteers carry out volunteer activities at least once a week, and there is overwhelming satisfaction with volunteering roles, with over half of volunteers we sampled being very satisfied. Three quarters intended to continue volunteering next year, and about the same proportion would consider volunteering for a different organisation next year.

¹²⁸ British Red Cross:

¹²⁹ Internal research/management information – unpublished

8.2 The same research found that the factors that may drive volunteer retention are:

- Greater flexibility in regards to volunteer commitments – allowing a change in hours/location or informing volunteers of alternative roles that might be relevant;
- Ensuring that all volunteers feel valued for their time as well as the skills/expertise that they bring;
- Communicating effectively with volunteers; including on how different teams are working together;
- Ensuring volunteers only attend training that is valuable and explaining why each course is felt to be so;
- Clear channels and procedures to raise issues if problems are encountered;
- Retaining contact with lapsed volunteers outlining current volunteering opportunities; and
- Engaging volunteers when they decide to leave to discuss possible alternative arrangements.

8.3 It is the role of any organisation who works with volunteers to take these factors in to consideration.

The British Youth Council – written evidence (CCE0098)

The British Youth Council is the National Youth Council of the UK. As a youth-led charity, we empower young people aged 25 and under to influence and inform the decisions that affect their lives. We support young people to get involved in their communities and democracy locally, nationally and internationally, making a difference as volunteers, campaigners, decision-makers and leaders.

The British Youth Council runs a number of youth-led networks and programmes - including the UK Youth Parliament, the Young Mayor Network, the Local Youth Council Network and Youth Select Committee - which encourage young people to get involved in democracy and campaign to bring about social and political change.

- The British Youth Council believes that 16 and 17 year olds should have the right to vote in all public elections and referenda; by extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds, we believe that they will be meaningfully engaged in decisions that affect their lives.
- Young people believe that changes to the voting and registration process will engage more of the electorate. Young people are in favour of registering up until Election Day, and with voting online. Young people believe that both of these adjustments would make the whole process more accessible.
- For the last five years, young people voted the need to have a curriculum that prepared them for life as a priority issue. Education plays an important role in empowering young people to become active citizens, and in 2013 the Youth Select Committee found that both primary and secondary schools have a critical role to play in nurturing these skills. The Youth Select Committee also found that the quality of citizenship lessons varied across the country, and that in some cases teaching on citizenship was not effective as teachers who lacked expertise found it difficult to cover the range of topics in the citizenship curriculum.
- A lack of meaningful and sustained engagement by politicians can act as a barrier to young people's active citizenship. Young people feel like politicians only engage with them around election time. Democratic engagement programmes and initiatives need to be sustained – they should last longer than the duration of an election campaign.
- The UK Youth Parliament is a great role model of positive British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society. We are proud of the diversity of the programme and of the issues young people prioritise. In 2015, Members of Youth Parliament voted to tackle racial and religious discrimination as their national campaign – as part of this over 300 young people participated in social action for the campaign.

*This submission was written by Francesca Danmole on behalf of the British Youth Council.
This submission is supported by the Children’s Rights Alliance for England.*

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or voting registration process?

1. The British Youth Council has been campaigning to extend the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds in all public elections and referenda for the last 19 years. We are a member of the steering group for the Votes at 16 Coalition alongside the Children’s Rights Alliance for England (CRAE), National Union of Students (NUS) and the Scottish Youth Parliament. We have found that Votes at 16 has been consistently prioritised as an issue by young people.
 - 1.1 We have over 200 members ranging from national organisations such as the Girlguiding, National Federation of Young Farmers’ Clubs and St John Ambulance to local youth councils across the UK. In the run up to the 2015 General Election, we consulted our members to find out what priority issues they wanted the future parliament to address - Votes at 16 topped the poll.
 - 1.2 Since 2012, Votes at 16 has been voted as a priority issue for the British Youth Council’s members.
 - 1.3 The British Youth Council runs the UK Youth Parliament – in 2014 and 2016, members of Youth Parliament voted to make Votes 16 their national campaign.
 - 1.4 UK Youth Parliament coordinates Make Your Mark – the largest annual UK-wide consultation with young people aged 11-18. In 2016, over 975,000 young people (1 in 6 11-18 year olds) took part – Votes at 16 was voted as one of the top five issues.
 - 1.5 In 2014, the Youth Select Committee undertook an inquiry into whether the voting age should be lowered to 16 for all UK elections. After reviewing oral and written evidence from parliamentarians, young people, civil society organisations and academics, the Committee concluded that 16 and 17 year olds should be given the right vote. They also concluded that:
 - 1.5.1 Voting is a fundamental human right and that any restrictions placed on it should be the minimum to achieve their aim.
 - 1.5.2 There was no single age of maturity in the UK – a definitive age of maturity is difficult to prove and they received no evidence which suggested that 16 year olds were not mature enough to vote.

- 1.5.3 There needed to be a balance between rights and responsibilities. 16 and 17 year olds are able to make various contributions to their country. We believe that citizens who are seen as old enough to make such contributions should also be able to elect the representatives who make decisions about the effects of these contributions, like public spending and going to war.
 - 1.5.4 16 and 17 year olds are interested in and care about political issues and the World around them but cannot engage in formal political processes.
 2. We believe that extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds will meaningfully engage them in the decisions that affect their lives.
 - 2.1 Young people’s participation in the Scottish Referendum demonstrates that they are eager to engage. The Referendum gave 16 and 17 year olds a once in a lifetime opportunity to have their say in shaping the future of their country. It was necessary to ensure that this age group participated in the historic vote. The precedence set by enfranchising 16 and 17 year olds in the Scottish Referendum, and enactment of the Scottish Elections (Reduction of Voting Age) Bill are hugely positive steps towards a more inclusive and equal political system.
 - 2.2 In 2015, we delivered a consultation, in which over 270 young people aged 12 to 22 from North West, North East, London, East of England, Midlands, South East, South West Regions and Scotland participated.
 - 2.3 Participants concluded that 16 and 17 year olds deserve the right to influence policies and laws which affect their lives but, that they currently have no say on. They believe that the extension of the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds would enable this to become a reality, and empower them to actively participate in their future. To this end, participants proposed that extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds would ensure that youth voice is represented in politics, which would mean that politicians have to meaningfully engage with them. They further suggested that this could lead to an increase in the number of younger politicians. Participants also spoke about how they are often judged harshly by society; granting 16 and 17 year olds the right to vote in all public elections would promote mutual respect between young people and adults and would challenge negative stereotypes of young people.
3. Changes to the registration process
 - 3.1 In the consultation mentioned above, we also explored potential changes to the voting process and voter registration process. We explored registration to vote up until Election Day and online voting.

- 3.2 Registering up until Election Day: Life circumstances determine what makes something a priority, and unfortunately for some of the electorate, registering to vote was not a priority. They believed that voting is important and so there should be flexibility for people to register up to Election Day – they also believed that this would ensure that more people had the chance to participate. They considered the idea that political parties' campaigns intensified closer to the election, often after registration had ended.
- 3.3 Voting online: Participants concluded that voting online would be more convenient as people could vote from wherever they are; as society continues to develop it would be important that participating in democracy was not bound to a location (Polling station). They suggested that an increase in voting methods could increase voter turnout, and an option to vote online would have a positive impact on the environment as less paper would be used.
- 3.4 Participants expressed some concerns about how online voting could be susceptible to hacking and voter rigging. They believed that democracy could be compromised if people began making fake accounts, personal information of the electorate was unwillingly shared, and that online voting could bring in a new wave of voter fraud. However, they concluded that more people than ever before manage their lives online and used the security of online banking as an example to pacify their earlier concerns. Security systems needed to be in place that would create paramount safe cyber environments to protect the electorate; and agreed that for it to be a smooth process much ground work (education) would have to be done

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

- 3.1 We believe that good PSHE (Personal, Social, Health and Economic education) includes education on citizenship and political participation. Since 2012 – young people from across the UK (through the Make Your Mark Ballot) voted having a curriculum which prepares them for life as a priority issue. The calls for a Curriculum for Life include citizenship education.
- 3.2 In 2013, the British Youth Council's Youth Select Committee (in partnership with Parliament) led an inquiry into the role of the education system in England in supporting young people to develop life skills. They considered the development of different skills needed help young people realise their full potential.

- 3.3 The Youth Select Committee found that both primary and secondary schools have a critical role to lay in nurturing these skills. However citizenship lessons were not meeting young people’s needs.
- 3.4 Evidence gathered by the Youth Select Committee suggests that current teaching is not effective; they found that teachers who lacked expertise found it difficult to cover the range of topics in the citizenship curriculum – political literacy was particularly intimidating.
- 3.5 To ensure the quality of PSHE and citizenship, the Youth Select Committee recommended that PSHE teachers should be afforded the same standard of training and support as in any other subject. They also recommended that Local Authorities should monitor the quality of PSHE provision in schools and encourage schools to undertake further training where necessary.
- 3.6 We believe that young people’s education does not currently prepare them to adequately vote. We believe that to prepare for lowering the voting age, a comprehensive programme should be designed and implemented to improve formal political engagement amongst young people.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship? Are there specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups – white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

- 4.1 In the run up to the EU Referendum, the British Youth Council ran a voter registration campaign. As a general observation, young voters continue to turn out in low numbers in elections, though it was up from the General Election 2015 (64% from 43%). The additional challenge here comes with the fact that 18-25 year olds are not a homogenous group in that, within this demographic, there are groups from different backgrounds, socio-economic status, employment status and education levels. We have found a lack of meaningful engagement from politicians, acts as a barrier to young people’s active citizenship. Engagement is not just for election times – it must be meaningful and sustained over time. There are young people who believe that their vote is not valued, and who do not want to engage with politicians or democracy. Meaningful engagement takes time; and we have identified that the work the British Youth Council does through our programmes, initiatives and education can make a difference to young people.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role model that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

5.1 UK Youth Parliament is the British Youth Council’s flagship programme; we are very proud of the diversity of the young people who are engaged in the programme. Young people come together from across the UK to debate important issues, and when they disagree they do so in a respectful way. At the 2016 UK Youth Parliament House of Commons Sitting there were speeches from young people on a better and kinder democracy.

	UK Youth Parliament	UK Parliament
Female	51%	29%
Male	49%	71%
Ethnic minorities	29%	6.6%

5.2 In 2015, Members of Youth Parliament voted tackling racial and religious discrimination as their national campaign. The campaign aimed to

- 5.2.1 Change discriminatory attitudes of young people towards race and religion.
- 5.2.2 Raise levels of understanding about different races and religions, communities and cultures.
- 5.2.3 Challenge negative images of race and religion on social media.
- 5.2.4 Promote diversity and inclusion within communities.

5.3 Over 300 young people from across the UK participated in the campaign, coordinating their own social action projects to reach its aims.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship and civic engagement are about belonging within a shared community. This matters for many reasons. Citizenship confers a status with rights – and it is crucial to make clear when individuals meet criteria for citizenship so that their rights are given proper recognition. As stated in my book Becoming British:

‘Citizenship matters. Only a country’s citizens can enjoy the full rights of their shared political membership. To be a citizen is to have the most fundamental rights – or, as the philosopher Hannah Arendt said, ‘a right to have rights’. The right to live in a state permanently, the right to vote and the right to run for elected office are a small handful of the wide-ranging privileges that individuals have as citizens. But it is even more than that. Being a citizen is about belonging to a community’.¹³⁰

It is also important for setting immigration and integration policies. Clarifying the expectations for citizens and citizenship sets a standard by which other policies can be established. For example, English language fluency requirements for temporary residency should be no more stringent than for citizenship – setting the latter helps clarify how we set the former. To be without a clear idea about citizenship would be to lack a clear basis for how less permanent forms of residency (as workers, students, etc) should be assessed. I

Civic engagement is essential and the evidence is it appears in retreat. This is not unique to Britain. To be engaged civically is to recognise oneself as having a stake in one’s society. In my book Punishment, I discuss risk factors for criminal offending and how many, if not all, could be linked to alienation – both in a material and psychological sense – that can be easy to diagnose yet difficult to overcome.¹³¹

Citizenship relates to identity in a particular way. In Britain, it is best understood as a political identity. As I detail in my chapter ‘What is Britishness?’, previous attempts to link having a British identity with race, religion and language all fail.¹³² Being British started with ¹³¹ Thom Brooks, Punishment. London: Routledge, 2012, pp. 144–47. Citizens become more likely to engage in crime where they feel subjectively alienated from their community. the union of England and Scotland. Citizen-subjects who spoke only English, Welsh or Scots Gaelic were no less equal for it.

Of course, Britain is a multi-ethnic society and any attempt at identifying a common, unifying threat that is our shared identity must capture this fact. Past reports from Lord (Bhikhu) Parekh and Sir Bernard Crick have been inspiring, but in need of renewal.¹³³ When each looked to see what our common identity was, they found in public consultations that local communities often said being British was about having some regional characteristic – such as eating haggis or celebrating Hogmanay in Scotland – that said more about what made regions different than brought them together. Both reports conclude we should have a more civic and political conception of identity for citizens broad enough to capture these differences and include all citizens. Citizenship should look to shared civic values and knowledge of public institutions.

This is very much in need of renewal. It is now over 10 years since Sir Bernard's report – the last best official report into British citizenship available and published before the rise in migration numbers and rise in public concern about immigration. Its recommendations about the UK citizenship test and use of citizenship ceremonies have never been tested or re-evaluated to consider how they might be revised, etc to meet their original purposes. No naturalised citizen – me included – has been consulted on whether they improve integration. (In fact, my research into the citizenship test and rules show they appear more likely to damage integration than support it.¹³⁴) We urgently require a new body – like an Advisory Group or Commission – launched to take up this work and inform government policy – led by a naturalised citizen who knows the system first-hand.¹³⁵

There are ways we can strengthen identities around citizenship much more than we do. The first is to recognise that integration is not a one-way street. We rightly have expectations that migrants to Britain will meet certain thresholds, but we fail to do enough to ensure our expectations can be met. English language provision is subject to a post code lottery where it can be much quicker to join English instruction and complete training in some areas instead of others. My research found that it was possible to get onto some programmes in a fortnight, but others might take eight months or more.¹³⁶

As an immigrant myself, I first learned about the television license when asked by an inspector whether or not I had one. Much more must be done to inform and support migrants to Britain about our expectations rather than leaving it to migrants to figure out on their own (perhaps in the cynical hope that more will fail to jump the necessary hoops and be forced to leave).

Citizenship ceremonies can be a powerful moment for new citizens. I know first-hand because I took part in one in 2011 when I became a British citizen. But it is also the case that these ceremonies have been subjected to very little study or analysis beyond my own research.¹³⁷ For example, the ceremonies are meant to have a symbolic importance – that they no doubt do for many people – but there has been no study into whether or not the current framework achieves this outcome. The actual ceremony itself conferring naturalisation can take only a couple minutes. There are wide differences in how local councils manage these ceremonies with some offering gifts and others not yet all receive a set resource paid for from the citizenship fee to conduct ceremonies. These events are regularly hidden. Rarely is there any mention in the local or national press that citizenship ceremonies take place at all – and certainly a complete lack of political leadership in recognising and celebrating the achievement of new citizens. This is no way to treat or welcome new voters with full rights of citizenship into our shared community. It only seeks to alienate and push people apart.

This is very different from the approach in other countries like Canada and the United States. Ceremonies are welcoming events that regularly receive coverage in local news both television and newspapers. Political leaders routinely attend and offer their support. Only this week, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau met with newly inaugurated Canadian citizens in an event widely publicised. Britain should follow their lead.

Education can play a supportive role, although education alone will not be enough. More emphasis on civics and citizenship in the schools is welcome and understanding being British as a connection in values and political community rather than allegiance to a particular faith or ethnic identity. Part of this education might come through attendance at citizenship ceremonies raising awareness and perhaps speaking with new citizens about why they chose to become British. From my experience, the public can be shocked by the cost and the hurdles of becoming citizens. This can have a positive effect.

A key way I would recommend educating the public about British citizenship is to launch an Advisory Group or Commission into examining the Life in the United Kingdom citizenship test. The test is in its third edition and no more fit for purpose than at its start in 2005. I published the only comprehensive report into the test and its failings in 2013 – calling the test ‘like a bad pub quiz’ – that has been cited in several parliamentary debates.¹³⁸

My report found several problems with the current edition. It is impractical with about 3,000 facts including many that few, if any, British citizens know like the height of the London Eye in feet or who started the first curry house and what street it was on.¹³⁹ The test handbook does not require citizens to know how to contact the police, register with a GP or report a crime. The test is inconsistent. Individuals are not required to know how many MPs are in Parliament, but they are required to know the number of representatives in the Welsh Assembly, Scottish Parliament and Northern Ireland Assembly. No mention is made of the UK Supreme Court, but there is mention of most lower courts. There is widespread gender imbalance across all categories, spurious facts that ministers have since acknowledged that – despite being in the handbook which states that all information must be known – are not on any test, and there are a number of mistakes and omissions. For example, the handbook requires knowing the phone numbers to contact the House of Commons, Welsh Assembly and Scottish Parliament, but omits the Northern Ireland Assembly.¹⁴⁰

There are two key outcomes that would arise from a comprehensive, official review into the citizenship test. The first is that its design and implementation is meant to enable and foster integration. Yet there has been no review following any of the three editions published since 2005 into whether this has been achieved. My research detailed in Becoming British – and as someone who sat and passed the test in 2009 – is that the citizenship test has a counterproductive effect on new migrants.¹⁴¹ The test is regularly seen as the test for British citizenship that few British citizens can pass with many migrants seeing it as an opportunity by the Home Office to extract increasingly more expensive fees through a test of random trivia meant to make more fail. I have likened the move from the second edition to the third edition as a switch from a test of trivia to a purely trivial test. If my research is correct, then making no substantive change will not lead to the intended outcome of ensuring new citizens share British values and can engage constructively with public institutions. This must be changed. The failure to consult, review and get feedback from naturalised citizens who have undertaken and passed the process is alarming. So one key outcome of a review would be to ensure a fourth edition of the test, if it were to continue, is fit for purpose. I see no evidence that it is at present.

The second key outcome is educational. A national conversation about what knowledge new citizens should have ought to be welcomed. The public should be invited to take part and contribute – and through the exchange and challenge of views there can be a strongly positive, educational result as pinning down what should be on the test is easier said than done. The exercise would raise public awareness that there is such a test, the requirements new migrants must pass to stay and what policies are being implemented in the public's name to win their confidence. This is an opportunity to be taken immediately.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

I would advocate a new test for migrants to pass for citizenship. It is widely remarked how immigrants bring value to the United Kingdom through enriching the country economically, culturally and socially through the skills, talents and experiences they bring with them. Yet there is also some degree of public scepticism about this value. Some claim the benefits of immigration are shared only by an elite – or by the individual migrant himself or herself.

My new test would be a Contribution Test. If migrants bring new skills and experience that enrich the country and benefit Britain – and the problem is that the public has some doubts about how this benefits them and/or local communities, then migrants might be required to undertake some nominal number of hours (e.g., 4-10) for permanent residency and/or citizenship. These hours are to be spent supporting educational, governmental, charitable or religious organisations approved by the Home Office for this purpose of delivering support or training to the public. Instead of only benefiting themselves or their employers (in the eyes of some in the public), migrants can be shown to directly delivering benefits to reskilling and supporting employability of the wider public. Government can claim that a number of hours of career and employability support has been delivered at job centres, schools, charities and the like for the benefit of the British public. Crucially, not only can this benefit be claimed, but it can be seen – the public must be able to see it for themselves. If more saw the benefits for them from new potential migrants, this could have a powerful effect on citizens old and new.

I would also advocate an idea floated in Sir Bernard's The Old and the New report which I champion in Becoming British.¹⁴² I argue that newly naturalised citizens should be encouraged to act as mentors for migrants beginning their journey to citizenship. Who better than migrants who became British to show new migrants how to do the same and how integration is achieved as a migrant? This is a resource that is untapped.

I would also go further in requiring any council that runs citizenship ceremonies, in return for receiving funding for them, to organise drop-in integration surgeries open to citizens and migrants alike. Understandably, a large focus on integration has centred on English language instruction. But integration is about more than that – and some specified surgeries for it could benefit migrants, but also citizens who are newcomers to an area.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

No, they do not. Studies have been mixed on voting age and participation. Some suggest that lowering the voting age might have a counterproductive effect of making people early non-voters to be followed by a longer life of non-participation. But this is the past. There seems a reawakened interest in political events in Britain since at least the Scottish referendum vote that is welcome. I recommend lowering the voting age to 16 years of age.

Changes to the voting registration process are unwelcome because we should encourage more, not less, participation in our politics. The current process is likely to see more left out and this has negative effects not only on our democracy, but it fosters alienation and worse.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

I believe citizenship should be compulsory in schools. Universities should be encouraged, but not forced, to ensure its graduates are knowledgeable in becoming active citizens.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

I have not interacted with the National Citizen Service, but I am broadly in favour of such kinds of programmes. I cannot comment on specifics about this particular programme.

Professor Thom Brooks, Dean & Chair in Law and Government, Durham Law School, Durham University – written evidence (CCE0161)

As someone who took part in a citizenship ceremony, I believe they should be made more public and receive more publicity than they do with support from the Prime Minister, her Cabinet and all MPs (including their attendance).

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

I have commented on this above.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

I have commented on this above. I will add that ‘British values’ identified by the Home Office should not be a list drawn by a government department without thorough engagement with the public. This is another reason why I believe it is essential – and urgent – that a review of the citizenship test is undertaken. A national conversation leading to a more fit for purpose test can better deliver on integration and public understanding of what British identity and citizenship is that will be a marked improvement on where we are today. This would benefit all groups by being more inclusive and provide an opportunity for challenging unwelcome and anti-integrationist views.

In short, immigration law and policies are a moving target with changes made almost daily. It is moving so fast it can be difficult for specialists to keep up – and impossible for most of the public. Government ministers too readily tweak guidance or issue public statements in reaction to tabloid headlines rather than show greater leadership. This has left a political vacuum that a national conversation can and should fill.¹⁴³

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

I have commented on alienation above. I have made my greatest progress with the public who feel ‘left behind’ when in conversation. In public lectures outside the university, I will invite people to draw up a list of what should be required for new citizens – and then proceed to show, as an immigration law expert, how virtually every suggestion is already in force much to their pleasant surprise. I do not see the way forward as telling anyone what to think, but start from learning more about public expectations and working from there in knowledge of the relevant law and evidence.

Professor Thom Brooks, Dean & Chair in Law and Government, Durham Law School, Durham University – written evidence (CCE0161)

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

I have commented on this above.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

I have commented on this above. I would again highlight that if we expect migrants to undertake English language instruction, it is necessary for us to support provision so it is possible. My research (already noted) has shown that it is a post code lottery.

I would further recommend the following. First, English language requirements for new migrants are subject to some arbitrary exemptions such as on nationality. Not all Americans meet the English language requirement yet all are exempt from having to prove it. This is a mistake. The current nationality exemption list includes some, but not all, countries that have English as a de jure or de facto official language. This gives the appearance of an arbitrary list that is unfit for its stated purpose. I would end nationality exemptions immediately requiring all to pass some test not unlike with the citizenship test. In conversation with ESOL providers, I have been told that such a test exists, the fees paid would bring more resource into support those ESOL students requiring additional support.¹⁴⁴

Secondly, English language requirements are subject to arbitrary exemptions for graduates. All must pay a fee to NARIC to prove they have received a degree or degree-level qualification in English. All are accepted to exempt individuals from having to prove they meet English language thresholds – even if from higher education providers in countries not on the nationality exemption list. This should be scrapped and all required to pass some test.

Thirdly, it is unclear that English language proficiency alone is sufficient to enable satisfactory integration in every community. There are parts of the UK where Welsh, Scots Gaelic or Ulster Scots can be at least as effective (and perhaps additional languages). Since ¹⁴⁴ See Thom Brooks, Becoming British: UK Citizenship Examined. London: Biteback, 2016, pp. 121–48.

Professor Thom Brooks, Dean & Chair in Law and Government, Durham Law School, Durham University – written evidence (CCE0161)

the origin of the United Kingdom, fluency in English, Welsh or Scots Gaelic was accepted for citizenship. The citizenship test was available in any of these three languages – although sat only once in Scots Gaelic and never in Welsh. This remained true until October 2013 to my surprise without any objections in Parliament. Of course, these languages – plus Cornish – are acceptable for new MPs in making their oaths and taking their seats after election. I can see a value in giving Welsh and Scots Gaelic their equal standing once again with English – and Cornish now that Cornish has protected minority status in the UK. (I have further commented that this necessitates a change in the UK citizenship test which is inconsistent with the protected minority status of the Cornish since 2014.)¹⁴⁵

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

The examples of initiatives that come to mind are Lord Parekh's Commission and Sir Bernard's Advisory Group, but nothing with real prominence in the decade or more since.

In terms of role models, there are a number of individuals I find inspiring in this regard including Lord Parekh. As a migrant and naturalised citizen, I became very concerned about hostile media coverage of immigrants more broadly and have dedicated myself to challenging it in regular media appearances and columns for national newspapers.¹⁴⁶ But more much can and should be done, made visible and supported by government and opposition parties alike.

Roger Bysouth – written evidence (CCE0230)

I'm answering most of your questions. I see them all as important in current UK circumstances as well as in the long term. But you'll easily spot that the question that I most want to have my say on is no. 5. The issues raised there I think also have a bearing on most of your other questions too.

1. Does citizenship matter?

Yes.

2. Strengthening people's identity as citizens

Yes I think strengthening people's identity as citizens is a good thing and do not fear or mistrust it as tantamount to politicising people in an undesirable or partisan way. How this strengthening is done, of course has to be non-partisan and open to scrutiny. If people have a greater sense of themselves as citizens with some degree of power as well as a stake in the state, then there may well be more protest, voiced discontent and possibly a shake-up in voting patterns – at least in the shorter term. In the longer term there will also be a greater sense of ownership, agency and I think willingness to embrace pluralism and diversity.

It's easier for some sections of the community to have a sense of themselves as citizens: mainly those with wealth, education, rewarding work etc. – in short with power. For marginalised people that's much harder. They are more likely to see society and the economy as stacked against them and less deserving of their sense of responsibility. If some people's sense of citizenship relies on, or is reinforced by, continuing inequalities that mean others remain excluded. That isn't a sense of citizenship I'd support or see as positive in the long term. We may be seeing the effects of this with the issues raised in your question 9.

So for these reasons I think the issue is not just about a stronger sense of identity, but also the values bound up in that identity.

3. Citizenship rights and responsibilities

To me these are a central part of what a positive citizen's identity entails.

4. Laws and the franchise

I confess I'm not sure what issue you are getting at. Broadly I am in favour of reducing the voting age threshold to 16. I also think we should look at prisoners being able to vote. Yes it's a liberty which can be taken away. But it is a socialising factor and that's what we want for prisoners surely.

5. Role of education

I welcome citizenship education in schools. I can't prove it, but believe it is an effective way of giving or reinforcing knowledge about how the UK works and a positive and empowered attitude to engaging in it. I observe that young people are likely to have more “pro-citizenship” views and behaviour than their elders. Clearly it doesn’t always work. Probably it is exposure to adults with a less “pro-citizenship” culture that chips away at young people’s outlook as they leave school and interact with more adults.

Therefore my key interest is making some impact on educating adults about citizenship. I am beginning to make plans and contacts for trying out a model in South Manchester where I live, whose main elements are:

- citizenship education, for any adult who wants it, on how Parliament and local government, the judiciary and civil service; the economy, international trade and development work; international bodies like the UN and EU; the media; climate change. Like a GCSE Citizenship– but for adults.
- Maybe 8 weekly sessions, each about 2 hours long, close to where learners live.
- Nuts and bolts information (as unbiased as possible) with discussion and thinking critically about the information we get.
- Framed by learners – if they want to go into more detail in some areas, organisers can help get it.
- For some this would be an introduction; for some a refresher.
- The starting point is acknowledging each one of us may benefit from this, not just other people we think make wrong decisions!

Who could/should run it?

I think a civil society response is probably more desirable and effective than a response directly from “the state”, so:

- Community groups – to spread the word and offer venues. They represent local people; have the contacts and presence in communities.
- Local people – agreeing what they want to learn about.
- Higher education – to tutor. Universities are generally trusted as rigorous and impartial. And have a wide range of resources and areas of expertise, and usually a commitment to support the communities they are a part of.

Who’d pay for it?

- Main costs would be materials, tutors, publicity and venues.
- Universities may see it as part of their commitment to the communities they are part of – and so fund all/some of their costs themselves.
- At least to start with should be free to learners.
- Apply for voluntary/community sector grants

Why is now a good time to try this?

It is widely reported that we often:

- find it hard to make informed decisions – e.g. vote – on the increasingly complex and changing issues government – local and national – is responsible for;

- feel that politics and the economy have not worked in our interests and yet feel powerless to do anything about it (e.g. the “left behind” below);
- focus on opinions (often strongly or extremely expressed) about issues rather than dispassionate assessment of facts;
- mistrust “experts” and politicians for various reasons, including it seems because we are aware we do not have enough information to decide on complex issues independently;
- make individual and collective political decisions as a consequence of the above which we may later regret;

We cannot inform everyone about everything with the course described. Nor can we solve all these issues, but we can

- give a good grounding in core information and critical thinking;
- provide a “safe space” for politically-charged discussions;
- give opportunities for further exploration of issues – through universities;
- foster a climate where citizenship education is as normal as, say, learning to drive;
- start to redress the imbalance between the complexity of the modern UK and citizens’ information, critical thinking skills and confidence

6. Voluntary citizenship programmes

I see no benefit in making citizenship programmes compulsory for adults, including those coming to live in the UK. I think the voluntary nature of programmes is likely to make participants more active and receptive to them. Introducing compulsion for adults could damage the effectiveness of programmes.

7. Societal support for Civic Engagement

I think there does need to be “Societal support for Civic Engagement” depending on what this means in detail:

- legislation that helps reinforce a pro-civic engagement climate or culture- yes.
- legislation that introduces compulsion, especially for people already marginalised and facing hostility in society – this could be more destructive than constructive.
- non-government actions to foster civic awareness, engagement etc. – yes. I’d put my preferred model of citizenship education in this category (see q5 above)

8. Shared values

Yes we can have shared values without all believing identical things.

9. “Left behind”

I think this group is an important factor politicians and anyone interested in social integration and cohesion should now face. The phenomenon is a symptom of an inadequate culture of citizenship, not so much a cause of it. The kind of citizenship education I favour (q5) could be one useful way of addressing the issue, though action on many other fronts will be necessary.

10. Social cohesion, integration, diversity

I don't think they're mutually exclusive.

11. English proficiency

I think English proficiency is of enormous benefit to all citizens.

I have been told by recent migrants and others that much ESOL teaching is not effective: people stay in the same "learning group" for years, learning in the same way but making little or no progress in proficiency and use in wider society. This may not be a reflection on the teaching but on external factors in communities and wider UK pressures. Cultural issues or perceived hostility from the host community may limit e.g. migrant women's opportunities to use their English.

I think language learning should be as much as possible voluntary. For people near the point of settling long term in the UK and formally adopting citizenship there may be an argument for a compulsory language testing - rather than compulsory learning.

Immigrants are frequently criticised for not participating in language classes at the moment – when classes appear to be of limited effectiveness as suggested above, and also when language provision has been cut. I would anticipate that making language classes compulsory would worsen this antagonism to immigrants. The crucial issue about teaching is its quality. But teaching alone will not bring about integration, let alone assimilation.

12. Positive examples

Focussing on the issues I've raised above at question 5, I'd cite a number of examples of education for citizenship, none of which I am connected with. They are optional not compulsory, except in the case of school students. I think making them compulsory might jeopardise their positivity.

Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation (UK Branch) – written evidence (CCE0192)

1. The Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation is an international charitable foundation with cultural, educational, social and scientific interests. The purpose of the UK Branch in London is to bring about long-term improvements in wellbeing, particularly for the most vulnerable, by creating connections across boundaries (national borders, communities, disciplines and sectors) which deliver social, cultural and environmental value.

2. As part of this, we are currently conducting an Inquiry into the Civic Role of Arts Organisations. The Inquiry seeks to increase awareness of the valuable ‘civic role’ that arts organisations can and do play nationally and locally. By ‘arts organisations’, we refer to cultural organisations in a broader sense, including museums and other cultural institutions. We recently published our Phase 1 report, which includes case studies from 40 arts organisations in England and Wales that demonstrate good practice, and we are in the process of commissioning 40 more. We are now canvassing the sector for feedback, and scoping our Phase 2, which will involve supporting several local-based organisations to develop ‘next practice’.

3. We believe that the arts and arts organisations provide a unique offer for civic engagement, and are therefore responding to several of the questions asked in this Call for Evidence using the learning we have achieved to make the case for the importance of the arts in citizenship and civic engagement. Below, we respond to Questions 1, 7, 8, 10 and 12 with a specific focus on the role of the arts and culture.

Question 1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

4. On an everyday scale, citizenship is about engaging in one’s communities – taking part in society, whether it be making conversation with a neighbour, buying something in a shop, or taking one’s children to school. Also, communities are not always geographical – people can engage with virtual communities digitally. Civic engagement is not always overtly political.

5. How people relate to, and interact with, their communities can be an important factor for their identity. It has impacts for mental and physical wellbeing, and can affect one’s feeling comfortable and welcome in their environment. This is important in a climate where people are becoming increasingly isolated and digital interactions are taking the place of community environments: in 2012, the Eurofound European Quality of Life Survey found that 10.6% of Brits reported feeling lonely more than half, most or all the time. This is especially pertinent now, in a post-Brexit vote environment, where there were record levels of hate crimes in the first three months after the EU referendum, and there are significant concerns regarding social segregation in our society, with regard to ethnicity but also age and social class.

6. As well as allowing people to construct and express their individual identity, arts organisations allow people to connect with people who are different from them, tackling one of the key barriers to community cohesion. The arts can also provide an opportunity to connect with people who are similar to them, or going through similar life experiences as them (see Duckie). Engaging with different communities helps people to better understand themselves, in the context of other people, improves happiness and wellbeing on an individual and collective level.

7. Arts organisations can play a great placemaking role in the identity of an area or a community, building social capital and enabling cultural capital (see LIFT Tottenham and Grizedale for examples). The arts can improve aspirations on an individual and collective level, helping people to discover interests and talents. Additionally, arts organisations provide life skills to people throughout the life course: in particular, this can help to tackle inequalities of opportunity and improve social mobility.

8. On a different note, citizenship includes certain rights and responsibilities, one of which is political engagement. In our report, we make a comparison between some arts organisations and a ‘town hall’:

‘Art has always stimulated and reflected current debates about issues as diverse as human rights and strife between different generations based on wealth inequalities... Trust in organisations is waning and there is scepticism about experts... Arts organisations provide safe places for considering and debating difficult issues. They can present issues in their full complexity and give them a human texture. They can go further and mobilise campaigns.’

Rethinking Relationships, Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation (UK Branch): page 24

9. Importantly, the arts can be a valuable tool to bring the voices of people with marginalised identities, particularly people with protected characteristics, to society.

Question 7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should the government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

10. We believe that civil society and civic engagement can be improved through arts organisations working on a local scale, bringing all people within a community together, and working to bridge different communities. At a time of reduced public funding, we believe it is vital that partnerships between the civic and the civil are strengthened, so that communities are able to build their social capital and develop their cultural capital by shaping the arts and culture of their area.

11. In many areas, arts and culture provision supported by local authorities have suffered severe cuts. These cuts reveal two issues: that the arts need to be more open and relevant to society by enabling communities to shape culture; and that there is a lack of understanding of the value of the arts and culture by decision-makers. For more information on the value of the arts, see pages 12-14 of our report.

12. In our Phase 1 report, we identify a number of barriers to and levers for change with regard to arts organisations developing their civic role. We believe that the role of local and national government is both a funding and a convening role.

13. We have made two core observations regarding funding:

- there is a reliance on one-off project support (rather than long-term organisational commitments)
- there is a lack of deeper understanding of the funding ecology of the arts, and how different funding streams working conjunction with one another.

14. Going forward, we intend to further investigate the funding ecology of the arts, and expect to be able to make more concrete recommendations for both national and local government, and the third sector.

15. On a local scale, the role of local authorities has a great impact on the success and development of arts and cultural services in a community, and there are notable examples of inspirational practice, including the London Borough of Barking & Dagenham Cultural Education Partnership. Barking & Dagenham has significant levels of hardship, and a growing number of early years and school age children. Recognising the benefits of cultural education, the council seeks to improve the attainment of and opportunities for young people in the borough through investing in a collaboration with local schools, to embed cultural education and creative learning in the curriculum. LBBD is also investing in the arts and culture elsewhere in the borough, seeking to attract investment and cultural enterprise, to improve the community by becoming a ‘Creative Hub’. A devolved government approach, when implemented well, can enable local people to communicate what support and resources they need.

16. Part of the LBBD Cultural Education Partnership involves an investment in the development of leaders in the sector. This also emerged as a key ask of the sector through our Inquiry. Advocates for this approach are over-stretched and under-supported, yet they are the change-makers. These leaders require support to be able to think strategically and improve their capacity, or risk burn-out. In addition, the sector needs to be able to identify and support more diverse leaders, to combat the persistent norm of white, middle-class men.

17. The King’s College London report Towards Cultural Democracy makes a number of recommendations for national government, see here.

Question 8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

18. The value of creativity is often overlooked, but is central to British identity; a tenet of our economy, our culture and our national community. Creativity leads to innovation, and is essential to problem-solving and entrepreneurship. This is vital as the UK tries to capitalise on our tertiary sector economy and prosper after Brexit, to support our economy and secure our new place on the world stage.

19. King's College London identifies that there is a 'plethora of creativity' throughout the UK, much of which is not directly publicly funded nor commercially profitable, including a great amount that is 'invisible' to cultural policy and cultural organisations. For example, breakdancing in a shopping mall with friends would be hidden to cultural organisations.

20. Strong proponents of the value of creativity are Ben Payne and Lucy McNab, who founded the Ministry of Stories in 2010. The Ministry works to champion literacy in 3 of London's poorest boroughs, as Payne explains, "in the broader sense of literacy: that understanding that being able to write yourself into the world is a key skill, an important part of living a good life".

21. In addition to the intrinsic value of creativity, a creative education can have significant impacts on opportunities in life. The Cultural Learning Alliance found that participation in structured arts activities can increase cognitive abilities by 17%, improve attainment in Maths and English, and improve students' employability and likelihood of staying in employment. Cultural education, therefore, is an important tool for social mobility and ensuring equal opportunities. We are beginning to see evidence that the recent cuts to arts and cultural funding have been greatly detrimental. For example, DCMS reported that participation in arts activities music activities in schools dropped from 55.3% to 37.2% between 2009 and 2013/14. The arts have historically been a middle- and upper-class pursuit, because they require funds, and present cuts threaten to reverse the lengths that have been made to disrupt this.

Question 10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

22. We are responding only to the first part of Question 10, as the second and third questions are not within our remit.

23. Using the arts as an example of civic engagement, arts programmes that bring everyone in a community together can provide an opportunity to improve social cohesion by directly combatting the social segregation that creates disharmony and othering. A key example of this is Entelechy Arts, who bring together people who wouldn't ordinarily meet, let alone share a stage, such as elderly people and people with multiple disabilities. Arts projects, such as the performances that Entelechy Arts create, bring people together with a common purpose; co-creating can be used as a tool to improve relationships and communication.

24. We recognise the important role that arts organisations can play in placemaking – in particular, through harnessing the full range of assets (including communities, arts, local authority, social sector, and business) in an area to shape its future (see Derby Museums, Hull Freedom Festival).

25. In addition, arts organisations can create a space where people can understand difference in views through the arts: this is part of their role as a 'town hall', as discussed in response to Question 1. For some, this occurs on a person-to-person basis. Some address this political role directly, such as the National Theatre's National Debates programme. Arts organisations are uniquely valuable as a convenor of relationships, skilled at bringing together different sectors and parts of society.

Question 12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

From our case studies:

Fun Palaces

26. Fun Palaces is an ongoing campaign to instil culture at the heart of every community, which includes an annual weekend of action focused around arts, science, tech and craft events run by and for local people. Our case study interview with Carine Osmont and Alexandre Mendonca, who have curated three Fun Palaces in Farnham, highlights the value of getting to know your neighbours and feeling comfortable in your local community; particularly to them as immigrants. See civicroleartsinquiry.gulbenkian.org.uk/resources/fun-palaces.

Duckie

27. Duckie's goal is to make entertainment for 'ordinary people', having grown from a weekly gay club night started in 1995 to an organisation staging social events, performances and workshops across the UK. The group responds to the identified lack of suitable and stimulating entertainment for marginalised people – working class people, LGBTQ+ people, ethnic minorities, drug and alcohol addicts, homeless people – improving wellbeing and building relationships and communities. For example, Duckie run The Posh Club, a risqué cabaret/afternoon tea for working-class elderly people from mixed ethnic communities and lower-socio-economic backgrounds: '[We] try to make the party for the people that don't necessarily have the parties. We want to have fun and bring groups of people together.' See civicroleartsinquiry.gulbenkian.org.uk/resources/duckie.

28. Middlesbrough Institute for Modern Art (mima) strives to bring people into the gallery, to break down the perceived elitism of the art world, and other barriers that prevent people from accessing the arts. The gallery makes efforts to work closely with different community groups, not only to create exhibitions and give them a voice, but also to help develop sustainable resources for everyday use. For example, building an exhibition with local refugees led to the co-development of a regular programme, offering a weekly free meal, a food bank, free internet access, bespoke ESOL classes, clubs including crafts, film and gardening, and more. See civicroleartsinquiry.gulbenkian.org.uk/resources/mima.

Hull Freedom Festival

29. The Hull Freedom Festival began as a commemoration of the bicentenary of the Anti-Slavery Act in 2007, and has grown into a vibrant annual festival. The Festival has an important role in the regeneration of Hull City Centre, and played a key part in Hull winning 2017 City of Culture. Mikey Martins, artistic director and CEO, explains, '[it's] pulling the city back together: you're seeing a lot more people hanging out in the centre of Hull and very proud of their city centre and all the redevelopment that's happened. It's brought the city centre to life'. See civicroleartsinquiry.gulbenkian.org.uk/resources/hulls-freedom-festival.

From elsewhere in the sector:

Creative People and Places

30. CPP is an action research programme run by Arts Council England that seeks to bring the arts to areas where people have had fewer opportunities to engage. The programme involves funding and developing radically different approaches to improve participation at a local level, and includes a significant focus on partnership working, bringing together artists and local people. See www.creativepeopleplaces.org.uk/. Projects include Creative Black Country, a three-year campaign which aims to make the most of creative talent in the Black Country. Examples of their work include the Desi Pubs project: celebrating the 'East meets West story' of British Asians' reinvention of the English pub. See www.creativeblackcountry.co.uk/projects/desi-pubs/.

Get Creative

31. Get Creative is an initiative which celebrates and supports everyday creativity in and around homes and public spaces, from guerrilla gardening to acrobatics to storytelling. The programme is supported by a consortium of organisations – see a full list here: www.bbc.co.uk/programmes/articles/3P7n390cZc3VBpn7cPn0F5T/about-get-creative. For examples, see here: www.bbc.co.uk/arts/sections/get-creative.

Caritas Social Action Network (CSAN) – written evidence (CCE0147)

Introduction

1. Caritas Social Action Network (CSAN) is the social action agency of the Catholic Church. We represent a network 41 Catholic charities and diocesan agencies who work for the most vulnerable in our society.
2. This submission is a summary from various member charities of the Caritas network, responding to Questions 7 and 9.

Summary

3. The charities in the Caritas network reported that volunteering is an effective way to support civic engagement, because it not only fosters a sense of commitment to the local community, but also builds relationships between different people within that community. The role of faith groups in both supporting volunteering and maintaining inclusive community groups was highlighted.
4. Poverty was identified as the most significant barrier to civic engagement. There is a need for investment in local initiatives which provide those who are excluded by their poverty with material assistance as well as the opportunity to challenge their situation.

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

5. The charities of the Caritas network are dependent on thousands of dedicated volunteers who offer their time and talents for the common good of all. The charities have noted the impact that this work has on their volunteers' engagement with civic structures and wider society.
6. Volunteering creates a sense of commitment to wider society. It is an opportunity to express a natural instinct to help other people or put something back in to the community.
7. Volunteering also encourages inclusiveness. Relationships are built between members of society with very different backgrounds and interests. The knowledge that the volunteer has given up their own time for others creates an environment of trust and allows for a genuinely personal encounter between the volunteers and those they help.
8. This is possible because charities offer organised opportunities to offer help, regularising the relationship between those in need and those with something to give. Familiarity with and involvement in the lives of others challenges the prejudices which can cause division in society and lead to some feeling marginalised.

9. This engagement with disadvantaged members of society provokes an interest in social change. In our charities' experience, this has led to volunteers engaging with the civic structures which have the power to address the issues they have witnessed.

10. In a recent survey at the Cardinal Hume Centre, a homelessness charity in London, volunteers reported that they consider the greatest personal benefit of volunteering to be an increased appreciation of different cultures and an increased understanding of issues facing vulnerable people. They also reported an increased interest in being involved in more social action as a result of their volunteering.

11. Likewise, volunteers for CAPS (Catholics for Aids Prevention and Support) engaged with local authorities in South London to raise awareness of the importance of faith for many people diagnosed or living with HIV in the family (PLWH). Acting on what they had learnt through volunteering with CAPS, they attended several consultation meetings held to decide on the range of support services that are funded by local authorities for those living with HIV. As a result of this input in the consultation process, for the first time ever four local authorities in South London have commissioned faith-specific peer support groups as part of their Service Level Agreements with agencies providing a range of care and support for PLWH.

12. Local and national government should follow the charity sector's lead in encouraging volunteering to promote civic engagement and inclusion. Charities in the Caritas network promote volunteering through talks to schools and parishes, through faith networks, online via websites and social media, by attending fairs at universities and colleges and through engagement with local businesses.

13. Members of the network also suggested that funding for small community groups would support volunteering. The support should be given with the caveat that it be used together with other organisations on projects which reach out to all sections of society to encourage communication, understanding and tolerance among those of all faiths and none.

14. Caritas members also recommended that those with the responsibility for assigning funding to local projects take the initiative and seek out those projects which encourage inclusion and civic engagement, rather than challenging those running the projects to bid for and win financial support. The current requirements for local authority funding discriminates against smaller organisations and grassroots initiatives, often party-run by volunteers who do not have the time or expertise to engage with complex application processes.

15. Furthermore, there is a need for local and national government to listen "to those at the coalface". Caritas Salford, for example, recommended that a poverty truth commission, such as that seen in Leeds, be set up in every local authority. Through this learning, local and national government will gain an insight into how best to allocate funding.

16. Finally, the charities in the Caritas network are concerned that the contribution of faith groups to civil society could be underestimated. A recognition of the central importance of religious belonging in people's lives was identified by our members as a way in which local and national government might support civic engagement.

17. Faith groups encourage people to identify with their area as they are often linked to schools, local organisations and community events. There is also an ethos of encouraging involvement and using our gifts for the common good. This gives people the confidence to engage in voluntary work, and also makes clear that there is a responsibility to engage in community life. Many of our charities' volunteers are motivated by their faith and heard about the opportunity to volunteer in the Caritas network through their church.

Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

19. The Caritas members who contributed to this response cited poverty as the major barrier to active citizenship. Amongst poor or marginalised groups, the day to day challenges just to survive leave little time to devote to the needs of others in the wider community. Paying the rent, caring for a sick family member or working more than on job take priority. These issues must be resolved before somebody can dedicate their time to civil society.

20. This is especially true for those who are socially excluded by their poverty, such as the homeless. Without some sense of community and belonging, engagement in wider civil society is impossible. Caritas Jersey, for example, is "committed to the principle of 'subsidiarity', which is to say that decision making should devolve to the lowest practicable level. However, problems arise when that level of participation is not possible simply because of cultural attitudes, lack of education and poverty."

21. Caritas Jersey runs a Leaders scheme to enable those who face barriers to become more active in their community and in the wider Jersey society. Candidates are selected from the minority communities on Jersey to become 'leaders' and articulate their community's concerns and frustrations, helping them gain a voice in society and helping them campaign for what they believe in. They also attend an extensive six-day residential course on Community Leadership run by Citizens UK. In turn candidates are expected to offer their services to their community: on the successful completion of this leadership course participants will have undertaken 50 hours of approved work in their community and receive a Professional Certificate in Community Leadership, issued by Newham University, Birmingham. Caritas Jersey hopes that in time we may see some of these leaders in the States Assembly.

22. It was also recommended that specifically dedicated community and youth workers would help those who are excluded to overcome these barriers, because they have both a sense of belonging within the given community or group and the time and commitment to dedicate to mobilising local people in mutually supportive forms of local civic engagement. Social support which is provided with communities empowers local people to challenge those situations, structures and organisations which they identify as contributing to their alienation and exclusion from wider society.

23. Finally, our members have found that those who cannot speak English, of course, face a barrier to civic engagement. Offering free ESOL classes (English for Speakers of Other Languages) not only resolves communication issues but is a very effective civic engagement model, bringing together volunteers to help people acquire language skills that will help them, in turn, to engage with society and reduce their isolation.

Cllr. Mrs. Armored J. Carlyon – written evidence (CCE0234)

When I learned of the consultation in respect of Citizenship and Civic Engagement - I felt it necessary to respond especially Question 8 which I read as a determination by the House of Lords Select Committee to ascertain what these oft quoted BRITISH VALUES might be.

Both my husband and I were born in Truro, Cornwall.

I have lived in Truro all my life and am therefore in a position to reflect on the changes in Cornish society though some 70 years.

I was first elected as an Independent Councillor to Cornwall County Council in 1973,(I think there were only 7 ladies out of 89 Councillors) having served on all three tiers of Local Government and still remain an elected Councillor on Truro City Council. (My May election addresses enclosed with hard copy)

I am also a Cornish Methodist Local Preacher and run a flock of Poll Dorset sheep.

My husband and I have lived at 3 Strangways Villas, Truro TR1 2PA for the past 55 years. Members of the Carlyon family have been HM Coroners in Truro since 1837 and Mr. Carlyon was HM Coroner until his retirement and now our eldest daughter Dr. Emma Carlyon is HM Coroner for Cornwall.

We were both brought up in Christian families and surrounded by gracious kindly folk, where everybody knew one another - spoke to one another and cared for one another. In fact for the first 25 years of our married life we never felt the need to lock our front door. Almost every aspect of our lives has now changed and I welcome the determination of the House of Lords Select Committee which will have the ability to summon evidence from all parts of the country to analyse what has seemingly “gone wrong” and then to build on the present aspects of modern society which they deem to be successful.

My response is based on the market town of Truro in Cornwall which has a population of around 20,000 where I have spent the whole of my life and where I have devoted almost 50 years to the community influenced by my non-conformist Methodist background.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century?
Why does it matter, and how does it relate to the questions of identity?

To be able to address this question it is necessary to briefly review the changes that have taken place within the space of 50 or so years.

Truro like many other towns and cities in the UK was full of family run shops where everyone knew everybody. These have now largely been replaced by national companies. One can go shopping and not see anyone one knows.

I have watched the changes taking place in the City and since “developers” arrived in about 1967 and “ripped” the City apart for no other reason than for their own profit I resolved to be vigilant and to protect the remaining historic environment (this does not only involve the large developments but also attention to detail such as fenestration, down pipes, advertising). Truro has a vibrant Civic Society and a Truro Conservation Advisory Committee and I am a member of both.

I suppose within the historic environment within the City centre itself we have been reasonably successful - because I believe it is essential to preserve the historic environment to give the people who live here an identity and not another alien “catalogue” shopping mall. Our work has not been made any easier by the introduction of the NPPF and the lack of Government funding which has reduced the number of Conservation officers to TWO for the whole of Cornwall.

However there are many aspects to Civic Engagement.

In the first instance it is necessary for people to speak to one another.

There are three ladies, including myself, who promote as we call it the “Ministry of the Smile”! - we speak and smile at everyone we pass or meet everyday.

The response is varied - the majority of the young people are “plugged in” and do not hear or see you - others look at you and are obviously thinking “What have you to be happy about?” and JUST OCCASIONALLY there is a response but usually a very wary one. I often ask myself how can life have changed so much in such a short span of years?

I write this because here in Cornwall, although it is changing, we have not had to address the changes brought about by people coming to Cornwall from other countries on the scale being experienced by other large Cities but rather people coming to live from other parts of England - many of whom come to Cornwall to retire.

So I wish to highlight the basic fact which is that people, especially the younger generation seemingly have no interest in communicating face to face with people they meet and that the problem is not confined to towns/cities where there has been a large influx of people coming in from other cultures.

The plain fact is that we are no longer communicating with one another on a daily basis ... we do not know our neighbours and sadly they do not seem to want to know us.

Another contributing factor is that parents are both working and that there is no longer time for neighbourly chats.

Many English people have made their homes here in Cornwall but do not seem to want to be part of the Cornish community. There is also seems to be a trend where people spend much of their lives “going on holidays” this in turn means that they are not able to be committed to the community in which they live.

No doubt you already aware of these facts but I cannot see how people can become a citizen if their only means of contact is either on “twitter” or “facebook”.

Needless to say we have events in Truro such as the Festival of Lights, an annual firework display and Christmas late night Shopping which attracts many people to the City Centre and friends meet up on these occasions.

Personally I think it is essential that every community has a village hall/community centre at street level where people meet one another on a regular but informal basis. However, sadly in Truro, the City Hall has now become the Hall for Cornwall (a theatre) and if Truro wants to put on an event it has to erect a marquee on Lemon Quay!! The City Hall was a vibrant place where Dog Shows, the Christmas Livestock Show, the Conservatives and LD Christmas fayres(not on the same day!), Scouts and Guides all held events but there is no longer a place for local people to meet on an informal basis at street level.

In conclusion I would suggest that in the first instance efforts must be made to create stable communities - people need to know the people who are elected to represent them. At present we are constantly told that everyone in authority is “listening” to the people but it is quite obvious from the plethora of “consultations” that come our way are, on the whole, completely disregarded or the questions are framed in such a manner to avoid unwelcome points of view. This in turn leads to apathy and disillusionment - which is hardly surprising. Society has also become very mobile and which in turn means it no longer has any “roots” and little sense of “belonging” this naturally deters people from becoming involved in civic activities because they are only “passing by”.

Regretfully there is also a growing mentality of “pulling up the drawbridge” It is now noticeable that many people are choosing to live in isolation, installing, electric gates shutting everyone out from their lives that they do not want to see. This may be the result of fear, burglaries and for other reasons but seldom does one know who lives the other side of the gate!

I do not see any easy solutions but what I do see is that there needs to be a change of attitude from central government. We hear much about “localism” but if one analyses the problem - just take for instance the NPPF - ALL Local plans have to be drawn up in strict accordance with the NPPF - ALL Neighbourhood plans have to be drawn up in complete accordance with the Local Plan - except that St. Ives have bravely made a stand against any more Second Homes!!

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

As an Independent Councillor who has spent 46 years serving on all 3 tiers of Local Government one of the most important things I have striven for is DEMOCRACY. Democracy in my opinion is a very fragile thing and has to be guarded at every turn.

1. I think it was back in about 2002 there was an Act of Parliament that began to erode the responsibility of the elected Councillors and placed it in the hands of the paid officials.

This in turn gave rise to the Scheme of Delegation which as time has passed has left the elected members virtually powerless. The electorate are not stupid and appreciate that “democracy” is almost a thing of the past.

2. Then there is the establishment of LEPs (Local Enterprise Partnerships) up and down the country. I have stated publicly that these are no more than “an unelected, unaccountable Government Quango” who do the Government’s bidding using Council tax payers/ Income Tax payers money. Their meetings are held in private and they receive millions of pounds from the Government.

3. Everyone is aware who runs the country - the paid Civil Servants

I believe the name is "Sir Humphrey"!!

4. This country had the opportunity to vote as to whether they wished to "Remain" or "Leave" the European Union. The people of this country turned out in their droves. It was not a party political vote - It was a straight forward vote - "Yes" or "No". When the result was known and the majority of the people of this country wished to "Leave" we were then told that those who voted to "Leave" had not been given the facts, they did not know what they were voting for, they did not understand the consequences. But everyone I spoke to while canvassing at the recent elections, who had voted to "Leave" knew exactly why they voted to "Leave" and have in no way changed their minds.

They loathe the fact that Europe can impose laws on the UK. They regret that Britain has lost its Sovereignty which in turn makes Westminster no more than a "talking shop".

5. Devolution is yet another reason for disengagement.

To take a microcosm of Cornwall Council and Truro City Council

The responsibility of the Public Conveniences have been transferred to Truro City Council - it costs the Council Tax payers of Truro some £150,000 to run... the library alone will cost £120,000 and so the list goes on.

The Parish Precept in a Band D house in Truro is some £236.00 (and rising and the Parish of Kea (about a mile and half from the City Centre) the Parish precept is £45.

The people of Truro are having to pay "double taxation" because there has been no reduction in the Cornwall Council precept due in the main to the Government withdrawing Local Government Grants but at the same time there appear to be vast sums of Growth Point monies which are being spent on what many consider to be unnecessary and useless road schemes/improvements.

6. Planning - This is one of the biggest contentions. The Governments present "build ... build ...build" policy is devastating communities up and down the country and Cornwall is no exception. It is obvious that the word "Sustainability" is no longer in the dictionary - we cannot continue to "develop" on our agricultural land - we cannot continue to "develop" without the necessary infrastructure being provided. People expect services to be provided when they buy a house. Cornwall has only ONE District hospital which is on DAILY BLACK ALERT and yet we are building a further 52,000 houses plus student and sheltered housing.

The above matters are contributing to people becoming "disengaged"

"disenchanted" with the Government at whatever level - and who can blame them? To be honest I think it is fair to say that there is a complete lack of trust among the general public for those in authority whether they be officers or elected members. I personally continue to challenge and question at every opportunity but I make little progress I just look to the younger generation and hope they will come to have the pride in the place in which they are living and care of the environment which surrounds them.

7. Addressing the second part of the question regarding of the voting system.

There is generally mistrust in the present Postal Voting system and also in the registration system as to who can vote where and how many times?

This needs to be addressed and the findings made public.

In my opinion and that of many other people, is that the voting age should not be changed. It is unusual for someone at the age of 16 to have a grasp of the economic complexities which face the country unless they have had the opportunity to study political history in depth.

QUESTION 5 - What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship

I would not have become involved in Local Government at such a comparatively early age if it had not been for the example set by my Methodist Chapel leaders.

They generously gave of their time to us as young people. They sacrificed their precious leisure hours (most people were working five and half days if not six days a week) to teach and encourage us. They themselves were involved in the Truro City Council which before re-organisation in 1973 was a major authority. Probably unconsciously, we were inspired by their leadership and example - always putting others before themselves and speaking up for those who were in need of help.

We also knew our Magistrates and they knew us.

So I question why is the school expected to be wholly responsible for the teaching of good citizenship?

Britain at this time is still considered to be a Christian country.

Surely if the true history of our country is taught in our schools it is bound to awaken a sense of duty and pride in our country's long and amazing history but this appears to be sadly lacking and so too are the sound tenets of the Bible.

The Rev. John Wesley had such an influence for good up and down the length and breadth of our country preaching the Gospel because he lived the life he preached.

Many historians agree that this man alone saved England from a "French Revolution". So it goes back to adults setting the example for children to follow.

QUESTION - 7 - How can society support civic engagement?

There is no easy answer to this question.

Measures need to be put in place in order that "the government" at whatever tier can begin to regain the trust of the ordinary citizen. This is not going to happen overnight!

These are just a few examples where the Government and Local Authorities could begin to improve civic engagement.

Freedom of speech needs to be restored. The Government and Local Authorities have to begin to respect the views of the public - after all they are employed by the Council tax payer. The Council tax payer is also paying 18.7% of the total Local Authority salary bill towards their "copper bottomed" pension fund plus a lump sum which, as you are aware, is calculated at the triennial actuarial review, when sometimes their own pensions have been taken away.

Any public consultation, such as this one, requires action - people are weary of reports gathering dust on shelves.

On the whole there seems to be little enthusiasm for the main political parties and personally I feel disenfranchised as there is no longer a political party to represent my views and I cannot be alone.

Action needs to be taken to prevent the BBC from indulging in biased reporting both in their news bulletins and documentaries.

Parents bringing up children at this present time need all the support and help they can get - not constant interference from the state.

Schools need to respect parental religious beliefs and rights. Children should not be forced to partake in lessons on LGBT matters if it is not the wish of the parents.

QUESTION 8 - What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support?

In my opinion this is the MOST IMPORTANT QUESTION... Please, if nothing else will the Select Committee define BRITISH VALUES.

I have written to my MP Sarah Newton on three occasions requesting the Act of Parliament in which British Values were agreed and when HM the Queen gave her Ascent to the Bill. She is well aware that I am an avid follower of Parliament today! and so I met with Sarah Newton and learned that British Values have not yet been defined!

How can we go around talking about British Values if we do not what they are?

So where do we start?

My starting place is with the Coronation Service where the Divine Law is placed above the law of State. It reminds us of the source of all our law, in truth and in justice.

Lord Denning said -

“... if we seek truth and justice, we cannot find it by argument and debate, nor by reading and thinking, but only by the maintenance of true religion and virtue. Religion concerns the spirit in man whereby he is able to recognise what is truth and what is justice; whereas law is only the application, however, imperfectly, of truth and justice in our everyday affairs. If religion perishes in the land, truth and justice will also. We have already strayed too far from the faith of our fathers. Let us return to it for it is the only thing that can save us.”

Lord Atkin said ‘I doubt whether the whole of the law of tort could not be comprised in the golden maxim to do unto your neighbour as you would that he should do unto you.’

At one point in the Coronation Service the Archbishop goes to the Queen’s chair and says “Our gracious Queen: to keep your Majesty ever mindful of the Law and the Gospel of God as the Rule for whole life and government of Christian princes, we present you with this Book, the most valuable thing that this world affords.” And the Moderator of Scotland presents the Bible to the Queen, and says ‘Here is Wisdom; This is the royal Law; These are the lively oracles of God’.

I think we have to ask ourselves - are these meaningless words in today’s world? Have they relevance in our lives today? Are we governed by them any more? Is there a Government of God?

I hope there is because as Lord Denning said - “Let us return to it for it is the only thing that can save us.”

Almost everyone I meet is desperately concerned about the present state of the country. They feel the very foundations are being shaken - nothing is certain any more.

We are not encouraged to celebrate Christmas because we might offend someone and so we have “Winter” festivals.

Children are being encouraged to decide for themselves whether they are boys or girls - what untold anxiety this must cause.

The age of consent is 16 and yet in the Doctor’s surgery is a notice - “Free condoms - no questions asked” - what message is this giving to our young people?

In 2003 the Government changed the licensing laws to 24/7 - we shall never know what untold harm this caused.

The definition of Marriage is now no longer between one man and one woman and those of us who hold to the traditional view are called “bigots” and no longer is the voice of dissent allowed to be heard.

In a recent Court case OFSTED inspectors have been found to have no satisfactory complaints procedure often placing Christian and Jewish schools in “Special measures” because they happen to hold to their values and beliefs. - what if they heard the children in a Sunday School singing Baring Gould’s “Onward Christian soldiers onward as to war, with the Cross of Jesus going on before ...” unless they understood the Gospel of Christ how could they be expected to understand what the children were singing?

So as I approach the end of my life the saddest thing for me is that England is seemingly no longer permitted to be a Christian country and the values established in the Coronation service which have changed little since around 800AD are steadily being eroded.

My question is - what will replace them?

Catch 22 – written evidence (CCE0153)

1. Catch22 is a social business and charity, a not for profit business with a social mission. We design and deliver services that build resilience and aspiration in people and communities.
2. Our vision is a strong society where everyone has a good place to live, a purpose and good people around them. We exist to ensure these are achievable for everyone, no matter what their background.
3. Our 1600 colleagues work at every stage of the social welfare cycle, supporting 44,000 young people and adults from cradle to career. Today we deliver youth social action, children’s social care, alternative and SEMH specialist education, apprenticeships and employability programmes, justice and rehabilitation services, emotional wellbeing and substance misuse support.

ABOUT CATCH22 AND CITIZENSHIP

4. For the past 200 years, Catch22 has delivered services helping young people become active citizens; engaged with their communities, engaged with education, work and those around them.
5. Today Catch22 works with thousands of young people, helping them fulfil their potential. Many of the young people that we work with sit outside of mainstream education or have experience of the care or justice system; those most in need of citizenship programmes. Without being engaged with the world around them, they are unable to realise and fulfil their potential and in turn to help others to do the same. Voluntary citizenship programmes like the National Citizen Service are an accessible conduit for people from challenging backgrounds to engage with society and be an active player in their future.

Question 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

6. Our teachers and young people believe that teaching and learning about citizenship should be embedded throughout formal education from primary to university, as a compulsory subject.

This approach would:

- 7. Teach young people not only that politics plays a role in everything they do, but also that local and central government can be held accountable by them.
- 8. Encourage democratic participation and social action. If from a young age, young people see that they can affect real change in political processes and in their community then they are more likely to exercise that right.

- 9. Ensure that all young people, regardless of background, get a grounding in politics and volunteering. Many of the young people that we work with leave formal education before 16. By starting this education early, we would reach all young people.
- 10. Encourage teachers of all subjects to consider and highlight the political and social action elements of their subject. Currently citizenship, whether taught through PHSE or other modules, operates as a standalone subject, whereas we believe it sits at the heart of a strong society.

Taking citizenship out of the classroom

- 11. We also suggest that citizenship can be learnt just as effectively out of the classroom as it can be in one, and that schools must teach through practical and community based activity. Our evidence suggests that young people that learn from an early age how democracy works are more likely to engage later in life.
- 12. The National Citizen Service actively promotes hands-on charity and community work, during which young people learn how their actions can improve the local society around them. In 2016, 80% of our young people that took part in hands on community work stated that they felt “inspired that I can make an impact on my community now and in future.”

Practical examples of embedding citizenship education

13. The background of a student shouldn't be a barrier to building citizenship skills. Catch22's services embed citizenship in formal and informal settings for young people who may be harder to engage:

- 14. Our alternative provision schools use the VotesforSchools programme with our students, encouraging them to learn about and 'vote' on a subject in class each week. Our youth programmes meet in informal settings - coffee shops, for example - outside of class to discuss politics and learn to debate.
- 15. Our National Citizen Service delivery teaches young people how to lead change within society through Bite the Ballot sessions, visits from MPs, and social action week where students plan and deliver volunteering projects in their communities.

16. CASE STUDY: DELIVERING FORMAL CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION IN AN INFORMAL SETTING

Victoria Burnard, Tutor at a Catch22 Study Programme (working with young people excluded from mainstream education, who have additional social, emotional and behavioural needs)

“We ran a Democracy Café at a local Starbucks in March 2017. We had a relatively good turn-out, with a few students putting forward some interesting opinions. The main theme of the discussion was immigration, which tied in to the Functional Skills/GCSE English content from the week leading up to the session.

“I do think it was beneficial for our students. By nature, our students tend to be quite disengaged from their communities, and will often ‘turn off’ when it comes to discussing politics, but we did have a few students who made really thoughtful, considered contributions.

“Many just sat and listened, which I also think is just as important. Politics is such a huge topic, and it can be really intimidating to offer an opinion when you might not know what you think, or when you don’t understand the jargon. So, even for our quiet/shy/anxious students, and for those who just out-right say they don’t care, I still think we need to be including them in these conversations.

“It may sound silly, but I also think the process of going somewhere new, being included, being asked, and even given a free hot drink all promotes the idea that we care what they’ve got to say, and everyone is valued.”

Question 6: Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?

Engaging young people that feel ‘left behind’

- 17. No active citizenship education or training will be successful if it excludes the portions of society that feel like ‘the system’ isn’t for them. Programmes like the National Citizen Service are an essential part of this process and for bringing people together and promoting an engaged citizenship.
- 18. Not only does the National Citizen Service bring young people from different walks of life together for shared experiences, but it engages young people who often feel ‘left behind’, planting the seed of social action and citizenship. These experiences build essential skills for life and work, investing in our country’s future talent.

Catch 22 – written evidence (CCE0153)

- 19. Our graduates are living proof that the National Citizen Service is not a holiday camp for the privileged. We work with young people in care, outside mainstream education, in the criminal justice system. They don't come from families with strong traditions of volunteering. But the National Citizen Service changes that. It shows them a world bigger than them, inspiring them to take on an active citizenship role.
- 20. The positive impact the programme can also have on their families and carers, creates a wider ripple-effect across communities and society more widely.
- 21. The ability of the National Citizen Service to bring young people from different life experiences together for four weeks cannot be underestimated. Voluntary citizenship programmes like the National Citizen Service bring our country together by building stronger, more integrated communities and fostering understanding between young people from different backgrounds

Young people are not all on the same starting block.

- 22. For any 'active citizenship' programme to work, we must focus on the young people that have barriers to attending or who are not yet socially, emotionally, or behaviourally ready.
- 23. While the four weeks of the National Citizen Service can be enough to plant the seed of active citizenship for those young people that are ready for that experience, many more need extra time to get them to that stage.
- 24. Young people with challenging, or complex behaviour issues, particularly those 'at risk' (e.g. Offending/Exclusions/Substance Misuse) face multiple barriers to participation and completion of programmes such as the National Citizen Service.
- 25. Catch22 supports pre-National Citizen Service interventions to support those that feel most 'left behind' to enable them to receive the same shared experiences as their peers. There needs to be additional action and support to ensure that young people from more challenging backgrounds are ready socially and emotionally to take part and get the most out of citizenship programmes.

Give young people the toolkit to engage

- 26. It is imperative that at a young age young people are given the toolkit to engage in the political process and social action and, more than that, the confidence to do so.
- 27. Citizenship education, if done right, sparks the initial interest in democratic participation and social action. Some young people that come to the National Citizen Service need only that but for many, they need something more to develop the interest into active participation.

- 28. Programmes like the National Service engage young people in social action in their communities and the democratic process. It teaches them to take pride in their area and celebrate its successes. As a result of the National Citizen Service, they know they can have a role in that success by taking on activities as small as doing a favour for a neighbour or encouraging their friends to vote
- 29. On the first day of our National Citizen Service Social Action week, we give young people tasks (ie: contact your local MP/MEP/Councillor about an area of interest, thank a local hero, understand how businesses can help community organisations) that get them into their communities, learning the part they can play in affecting positive change as well as holding governments to account.
- 30. Catch22 supports follow-on programmes that empower young people to build upon their 4-week National Citizen Service experiences and develop their new ideas and explore existing opportunities to help them towards becoming lifelong active citizens.

31. CASE STUDY: THE IMPACT OF SOCIAL ACTION INITIATIVES ON YOUNG PEOPLE

After their week of social action at The Salvation Army, we asked one of our North West NCS teams to tell us about the impact it had on them. This is what we were told:

- During this week I've found the confidence to deal with new people. I have pushed myself to have a voice in my group and I have grown in self-assertiveness.
- Comments that I have received from both staff and members of the public have warmed my heart, made me feel like I have done something good for the community and only boosted my resolve even more.
- This week has made me feel more confident and made me feel proud of myself as I have made a positive impact upon my local community.
- Pushed me to do new things and I have really come out of my shell over the last 4 weeks. This experience has allowed me to feel much more confident in myself and it has given me a good feeling knowing that I have help others in need.

To complete this response, we surveyed young people, teachers across Catch22's schools, front line professionals and youth workers. We would be happy to facilitate further conversations with any of these groups for the Select Committee.

Mr James Cathcart – written evidence (CCE0253)

1/ Introduction: I am currently on an ‘adult gap’ year from F/T working to focus on research, writing and campaigning on youth policy, participation and citizenship. My last job was as a CEO of the British Youth Council. I started as a FT Volunteer 35 years ago and worked with children and young people ever since as a youth worker, juvenile justice worker, social worker, trainer, writer, manager, mentor, trustee and CEO. This submission is based on that experience and focuses on youth.

2/ Whilst at the British Youth Council until 2016, I led several initiatives, across a range of settings, to promote youth citizenship and civic engagement. In partnership with Government, Cabinet Office Democratic Engagement Team, The Department for Education, Office for Civil Society; Local Government and Devolved administrations across the UK, the Electoral Commission and others. I understand that the British Youth Council will also be submitting evidence so I would defer to them as the authoritative source for any good practice examples I highlight, for example:

- a. The successful work of the UK Youth Parliament in growing its reach, diversity and representativeness beyond the usual suspects and activists. It has been largely unreported but its building a foundation across the UK communities in partnership with schools, local Government and Parliaments, including devolved administrations.
- b. Local Youth Councils network (ongoing partnership with local authorities) which supplement School Youth Councils, and using a combination of local elections and reserved seats, represent a cross section of the community to inform and influence local government decision making. These, and young Mayors Network, work in together with the Youth Parliament and are coordinated by the British Youth Council.
- c. The British Youth Council Youth Select Committees (ongoing partnership with Parliament/Education and Engagement service and Clerks) to produce a series of reports based on a popular vote of UK teenagers. Recent topics include Mental Health, Addressing Racism and Religious Discrimination. Relevant to this Committee are their report on the feasibility of Votes 16 and inclusion of citizenship in a new Curriculum for Life.
- d. The Make Your Mark ballot of those aged 12-18 across the UK. This has grown from a few thousand in 2009 to nearly a million individual votes cast in 2016. The priority topics are debated in the House of Commons by the Youth Parliament. This generation of young people has been engaged in growing numbers of the last seven years, and growing into the adult electorate of 18-24. The numbers are all recorded per local authority, by turnout and by issue – an excellent data source.

3/ Also attached as Appendix: Copy of an Open letter from me, with recommendations, sent to the Prime Minister on youth engagement reforms: ‘Democracy is an ongoing dialogue with its citizens not just at elections. The health of a nation is measure by the value it places on engaged with its youth’.

1/ What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 The formal definition of citizenship, or legal status with rights and responsibilities, is a contract between the state and the individual. In the 21st century, its an imperfect model, challenged by globalisation, localism, technology, and individualism. We are going through a period of transition to determine a new contract, post Brexit in a new world.

1.2 ‘Civic engagement’ is the degree to which the individual chooses to freely ‘engage’ voluntarily with the community and nation. It can be incentivised, nurtured and indeed valued by the state. In the 21st century it has to adapt to the concept of global citizenship. It has the potential to mitigate war, poverty and the ill-effects of climate change, as well as give a moral compass to deal with new technological threats like robotics. We can’t direct the wind of 21st century change, but we can trim the sails. Civic engagement can not only, inform and influence decision makers, but will increasingly mobilise direct action. It matters if we are to steer in one direction and not to waste resources and time.

1.3 Civic engagement is the sum of the decisions, choices and actions we take to improve the community and world in which we live, for ourselves, families and fellow citizens. We are not just individuals striving to survive, but communities sharing to thrive. This may be self-evident to thinkers, visionaries and those responsible for good government, but it is the concern of us all, and in particular, the young who will inherit the consequences, This generation are better placed than previous generations, to adapt, innovate and partner up across nations and generations.

Why is it important now?

1.6 The world is changing fast, with the digital revolution fast-tracking communication, education and self-empowerment. Information. One no longer needs permission, but can increasingly ‘self-empower’ and connect with like minded individuals to mobilise, using the internet. This will become more evident with more youth people taking the initiative and challenging the status quo. So it is imperative that things that unite us in nationhood are nurtured, and harnessed for the common good, so that the potential of invention becomes the servant of the citizen, not the enslaver of it. The challenge is not to try and control these new powers, but embrace them, and underpin them with sound incentives and encouragement of people to ‘want’ to be active citizens and stakeholders for the benefit of all. Young people want to participate and partner now, and its important the older generation responds quickly and ‘talks to them not about them’.

2/ Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 Pride should be encouraged. In a post-Brexit UK this is not clear for citizens and immigrants alike. However, I predict after a period of angst and reflection we will discover a new Britain to be proud of, rather than trying to reinvent the past. To this end we should encourage and be encouraged, inspire and being inspired by young leaders to show the way.

2.2 Recommend exploring :

1. Declaration of citizenship at birth, as part of the Birth Certificate
2. Education emphasises the rights and benefits of citizenship, the right to vote, to represent, and be of service. Young people should have this underlined with the power to vote at 16.
3. Encourage youth citizenship
4. Give more honours (BEMs) to young leaders/role models
5. Appoint (or have reserved temporary elected seats) for young people under 30 in the House of Lords. This could be all ages and called Lord Senators, or Citizen Senators.

3/ Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1 We need a new Magna Carta for the 21st Century, a Bill of Rights, which articulate existing and new reciprocal rights and responsibilities in a post Brexit Britain, protected with the scrutiny and amended rights determined by the Supreme court. I hope this Committee’s report makes a significant step towards that outcome. Recommend bold progressive measures.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1 We need electoral reform. We need a step-change in practice and behaviour in politics to deliver good modern and efficient Government. These needs to starting with education of the future electorate, on the basics of democracy and how to vote. My target is youth because, time, this will embed through the all the generations.

4.2 Every young citizen should be auto-enrolled on the register in time to vote, rather like the issuing of a National Insurance number. It should be an automatic entitlement rather a right than you can opt into.

4.3 We should introduce votes at 16 alongside a curriculum of citizenship education that explains the mechanics of democracy and voting, monitored by Ofsted and the Electoral Commission, and reported to Parliament. This could draw on the excellent model of good practice of the Parliament Education and Outreach service materials and curriculum.

4.2 I also refer to the positive conclusions and recommendations of Youth-led Youth Select Committee report into the feasibility of Votes at 16, http://www.parliament.uk/education-resources/Youth-Select-Committee/BYC%202014%20Report\(WEB\)FINAL.pdfFINAL.pdf) and the experience of lowering the voting age in Scotland. Public opinion had been against this change before the reform was introduced in Scotland. It was alongside a year of preparation through school curriculums. The Electoral Commission follow up report and surveys of the public opinion afterwards showed a clear majority in all age groups in favour of continuing the right to vote. Its worth noting that in Scotland the charity YoungScot works to engage ‘all’ young people as citizens where every young person automatically receives a ‘Youth-Card’ strengthening their identity and opportunities.

4.3 I also commend the Youth Select Committee inquiry and report called for a new Curriculum for Life in schools, <http://www.byc.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/08/Youth-Select-Committee-A-Curriculum-for-Life-Report.pdf> (to include a range of practical and social subjects as well as academic).

4.4 I would recommend the establishment of a All party Youth & Citizenship Commission (similar to one set up in 2008/09 led by Professor Tongue, Liverpool University, to explore these ideas.

5/ What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1 There should be mandatory, audited and consistent citizenship education (refer to my previous answer and sources – Votes at 16 and Curriculum for Life reports by the Youth Select Committee) and growth of the Make Your Mark ballot and UK Youth Parliament elections in schools. Citizenship in the educational context includes democracy, but also about the causes, campaigns and charities and how to support them. Through schools, more could be done to incentivise youthled ownership of social action through participation school councils, youth councils and grant giving using the Youthbank model. The National Citizen Service have borrowed similar ideas from existing social action initiatives like the Prince's Trust, but I would welcome more investment in aligning NCS with school and FE provision and other learning environments.

5.2 Other evidence already shared with the Committee (6th Sept) from the Department of Education, referred to the encouragement of 'mock elections'. However, this overlooks the real elections of young representatives to school councils, local councils (shadowing local authorities) and UK Youth Parliament as well as the Make Your Mark ballot conducted largely through schools which reached nearly a million pupils in 2016. There are also similar initiatives in the nations – the devolved Scottish Youth Parliament and plans to develop a new Youth Parliament for Wales in 2017. Northern Ireland did have cross community direct elections through schools, until the programme was paused in 2016. It was commended as good practice during the visit to London by the President Higgins, of Ireland, when he addressed young Members of the Youth Parliament in 2014.

5.3 Further and Higher Education should include opportunities to study and prepare for community and citizenship leadership, and public service. There has been a emphasis on buzzword education – such as 'resilience' and 'character building'. These are ideas that I expect to already be part of the holistic learning experience already. Instead we should target resources to qualifications that include the skills and practice of civic engagement and public service engagement. We stress Health and Well-Being, Media Studies, Communication – why not civic studies, where pupils learn about local and national decision making, resources, priorities, choices, expertise, research, planning, manifestos, elections, voting, governance, scrutiny, accountability...

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 In my previous role as a strategic partner of the Cabinet Office, when the idea of NCS was first promoted, I inputted into development of this initiative, and I've monitored its progress ever since, most recently the committee stages of the NCS Bill and the Audit Commission report. I have met those involved including several Ministers for Civil Society, the CEO, young graduates and attended local teams. I am currently campaigning for the appointment of young trustees to the new Board.

6.2 There is plenty of existing evaluation of the impact of the NCS programme and on those taking part. In my view the programme has an impact on most of those it reaches, particularly on their personal, and social development in a team setting. It creates active citizens for a while (a few weeks) but we need further longitudinal studies to determine if it creates long-term active citizens for the investment it gets. It's a short four-week programme, much of which is about team building and planning and the time for citizenship input and community service is therefore less.

6.3 They are more of a taster programme than an ongoing creator and supporter of active citizens. That would require more service over a longer period (6 months to a year). The current model is more of a personal development programme, located in the community, which introduces young people to citizenship – not embedding it. As such it has potential but is relatively expensive and impractical to roll out. I would favour the investment being all year round, with greater integration into the school curriculum, the age range extended from 14-18, (and indeed a programme to include adults/retired!) and renaming it the National Youth Service, and a follow up version for Gap Year Students or post college or FT school at 19 – 20, as the National Citizen Service with more of a combination of skills, community work and public service – leading to a qualification.

6.4 It has the potential to follow up sessions on voter registration, democracy, and how to vote, with auto-voter registration.

6.5 NCS's evaluation reports acknowledge of the talent and potential of 16 and 17 year olds add weight to the case for lowering the voting age to 16. There is an opportunity for the current Government to introduce this, using the National Citizen Service to support it. Young people are earning their right to vote. But the main vehicle for citizenship should be schools and colleges and not holidays. These should be left for value added activities (sport music and arts) and family time.

7.1 As you may have surmised from previous answers I would advocate the great investment, profile and encouragement of youth participation at all walks of civic life, in particular through democratic engagement and youthled participation. There is an existing structure to do this – the British Youth Council and its partnerships across the UK, with Local Government, schools, youth services, Government Departments, drawing on its experience of successful engagement and inclusive projects. However it is a charity and could do with some investment on the scale of the National Citizen Service.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Shared values : truth, equality, inclusions, diversity, freedom of speech/free press, the rule of law, checks and balances, scrutiny, representative democracy, recognition and reward.

Threats: Ignorance, spin, the internet, greed, abuse of power, the divisive political model of Government, and the current exit process of the European Union.

Answers – education, Bill of Rights, Magna Carta, Constitution, the internet, innovation and technology, youth empowerment and leadership. Recognition. Investment.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Politicians need to talk to people not about them. Democracy is a dialogue not just an election, it needs to be nurtured between elections, starting in schools, continuing in communities, empowered in Board rooms.

Q 10 and 11 – No comment.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Appendix

Extract of letter sent to the Prime Minister 9th June 2017 by James Cathcart

“I believe that young people deserve an ongoing commitment from Government and Opposition after this election, to engage them in the democratic process.

Democracy is a dialogue between elections, not just a vote in them. There is a new opportunity, starting today, for more meaningful youth participation in that conversation. The 18-24 youth vote has earned the right to inform, influence and scrutinise, but we need new ways to respond to, and embed that. We should also be starting the process now, of educating, preparing and listening to the next generation, aged 13 -17, who will vote in the next General Election in 2022.

I’d therefore ask that, during this time of reflection, you take forward the following youth-inspired agenda, with input from young people and their leaders.

1. A new Youth Minister role at Cabinet level.
2. A new Department for Youth Affairs, and matching Select Committee.

3. Strengthened duties to consult young people on local/national Government policy and decision-making.
4. A new independent Youth Commissioner championing youth participation (up to age 25) across society in general.
5. A Youth Citizenship Commission to review and champion the following by 2022
 - a. Auto-enrolment of all young voters through schools, as the entitlement of every pupil.
 - b. A democracy curriculum, to prepare future voters aged 13-17
 - c. Votes at 16 to ensure equal voting rights UK
 - d. New powers and seats in decision-making committees for local youth councils and devolved national youth parliaments.

An increased #youthvote is a new opportunity for democracy. Please take it, and nurture it with an ongoing commitment to listen and engage”

Catholic Union of Great Britain – written evidence (CCE0117)

Introduction

1. The Catholic Union was established in 1870 as the leading Roman Catholic lay association in the United Kingdom. One of its purposes, which was informed by then recent historical experience, was to ensure that the interests of Catholics were properly protected in the law of the land.
2. We wish to respond to Question 8:
 - What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Response

3. One of the values we should share and support is religious freedom, which, in addition to being a fundamental human right (see Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights, Article 18 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the first amendment to the United States Constitution), is an essential element in a healthy pluralism.
4. There are potential threats to this value due to an apparently increasing lack of understanding of the nature of religion by those in public life and the media. This has manifested itself, in part, in the increased use of the label ‘extremism’ to describe views which are merely honestly held differences of opinion.
5. We also sense that there is an increasing lack of understanding of the importance of religious freedom to the liberal tradition that underpins our culture.
6. This is a potentially serious threat to our democracy where a significant proportion of the population regularly practises a religion.
7. We make clear that our support is for religious freedom as a political and social principle and that it must be religious freedom for all religions.
8. As good a description of the nature of religion as any is the one given by the Second Vatican Council in its document on religious freedom (the document was called: ‘On the Dignity of the Human Person’):

It is in accordance with their dignity as persons—that is, beings endowed with reason and free will and therefore privileged to bear personal responsibility—that all men should be at once impelled by nature and also bound by a moral obligation to seek the truth, especially religious truth. They are also bound to adhere to the truth, once it is known, and to order their whole lives in accord with the demands of truth. However, men cannot discharge these obligations in a manner in keeping with their own nature unless they enjoy immunity from external coercion as well as psychological freedom. Therefore the right to religious freedom has its foundation not in the subjective disposition of the person, but in his very nature... the exercise of this right is not to be impeded, provided that just public order be observed.

9. This passage explains why it follows from the nature of religion that its protection from laws that might impinge upon its freedom is essential to the dignity of all people.

10. That is also clear from the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances

11. It is significant that the founding fathers grouped religious freedom with freedom of speech, of the press and of assembly. All of them are concerned with an essential aspect of human nature which is to form and express opinions that others may disagree with (even strongly) and to act on those opinions in the public sphere.

Conclusion

12. Human beings are both spiritual and material, they are also moral beings whose nature impels them to search for truth by reason and experience. All cultures worth the name admire and protect those who act according to their honest conscience no matter who might disagree. Religion has social, familial and community aspects which imprint themselves on the very identity of individuals. There are therefore a wide variety of rights and freedoms that are affected once freedom of religion is denied or reduced. It should be recognized as an important British value.

The Challenge – written evidence (CCE0203)

About The Challenge

1. The Challenge is the UK's leading charity for building a more socially integrated society. We design and deliver programmes that bring different people together to develop their confidence and skills in understanding and connecting with others.
2. Alongside our role as a programme delivery organisation, we also develop policy ideas to forge a more integrated Britain. During 2014 and 2015, The Challenge convened the Social Integration Commission. Following the Commission's conclusion, we set up the All Party Parliamentary Group (APPG) on Social Integration, which is chaired by Chuka Umunna MP.
3. The proposals set out in this submission are informed by our experience of designing and delivering programmes which promote meaningful interaction and engagement between people from different backgrounds and growing them to scale; of discussing the issue of civic engagement and social segregation with young people, employers and parliamentarians; and of conducting original research.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

4. Across industrialised nations, including the UK, we are increasingly living in 'bubbles' made up of 'people like us' – whether of similar income levels and educational backgrounds, of the same culture, faith and ethnicity, or of the same generation. These bubbles have grown to reflect patterns of residential segregation, but are also formed through the social habits of people living in diverse areas. Research shows that Britons on average interact socially with someone of a different ethnicity less than half as often as would be expected if their social circles reflected the demographic makeup of their local area. This is the case even in our most diverse regions, including Greater London and the Midlands¹⁴⁷. This indicates that it is not uncommon for people to live peaceably alongside others from different walks of life but to meet, mix and connect almost exclusively with people from similar backgrounds. In the UK, this trend was arguably crystallised through the 2016 EU referendum campaign and its aftermath, during which it became apparent that many people – whether Remain or Leave voters – hadn't come into contact with a supporter of the opposing view in that debate.

5. This phenomenon – 'social segregation' – has been shown to fuel the sense that there is more which divides us than that which binds us together, preventing the development of the bonds of trust and the sense of belonging and rootedness which underpin successful communities and nations. Indeed, research demonstrates that a lack of contact between people from different social and cultural backgrounds feeds prejudice, breeds anxiety and fuels the politics of recrimination and blame¹⁴⁸. Divided societies suffer from poorer mental health outcomes and are more likely to experience civil unrest¹⁴⁹. There is also a growing body of evidence to suggest that a lack of ‘social mixing’ impedes life chances, inhibits social mobility, prolongs periods of unemployment and restricts economic growth¹⁵⁰.

6. Indeed, research by the Harvard-based sociologist Robert Putnam suggests that people living in diverse but divided communities tend to ‘hunker down’ and ‘withdraw from collective life’ – placing less trust in their neighbours, including those from a similar background; assuming markedly more negative attitudes towards their local areas; voting less; volunteering less; and giving less to charity¹⁵¹. This cocktail of increasing diversity and declining integration is, then, a clear risk to the health and strength our communities and negatively impacts on civic engagement.

7. Active citizenship can be the glue which binds people together and helps to foster connections across social faultlines. This is, in large part, as studies show that participating in volunteering programmes encourages individuals to actively engage with members of their community (both service users and fellow volunteers) whom they wouldn’t otherwise come into contact with¹⁵². It should, accordingly, be viewed as a vital component of a strong and healthy society. The Challenge would, furthermore, argue that active citizenship programmes should be actively designed so as to bring together and promote meaningful and positive contact between people from different ethnicities, cultures, social backgrounds and generations.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?

8. National Citizen Service (NCS) is an intensive programme open to 15 to 17-year olds across England and Northern Ireland, in which young people participate in team and personal challenges at an outward bound centre and whilst living independently in a university halls-style setting. Participants then plan and deliver a social action project in their local areas. The Challenge would argue that the programme does a very good job of creating active citizens.

9. In 2009 and 2010, The Challenge worked with the government to design and launch NCS, and we are now a major provider of the programme – delivering it across London, Birmingham, Manchester and Leeds as well as several other contract areas throughout England. Our NCS programme curriculum is designed to empower participants to become active citizens and meaningfully impact on their local community, as well as gaining skills for life and work.

Are they the right length?

10. The Challenge has specifically designed its NCS programme curriculum so as to create spaces and effective incentives for young people from different backgrounds to meaningfully engage with one another. The programme runs outside of term time in the summer and autumn and our aim is to impact positively on young people's attitudes towards those from different walks of life in a relatively short period of time. We do this through ensuring that our NCS curriculum is intensive – participants spend almost three weeks in one another's company throughout the summer – and cultivating a social atmosphere – they live, cook and eat together.

Should they be compulsory, and if so, when?

11. Young people sign up to NCS because of the immediate benefits offered: a fun summer experience, the chance to develop skills, and the opportunity to meet new people. NCS offers a space for people to develop shared identities through having shared experiences. Making NCS compulsory could potentially change this environment and the way in which young people approach the programme for the worse.

12. The Challenge is ambitious in its approach to the continued expansion of NCS but believes that this growth should be organic. Rather than making it compulsory, our aim is for the programme to become a rite of passage for young people across the UK.

Should they include a greater political element?

13. Our NCS programme curriculum already contains elements designed to promote democratic engagement and encourage voter registration. In evening sessions on leadership, we explore what it means to be an active citizen. Through these sessions, we aim to promote the idea that leadership is not about being in a position of authority, but rather about using skills and experiences to take an active role in society and taking responsibility for others.

14. This resource from Bite the Ballot informs the session we deliver to young people on democracy. The session challenges young people to speak with their peers about the issues they care about. The activities also get young people thinking about the extent to which young people are underrepresented when it comes to voting and political engagement – and how others making decisions on their behalf, without consulting them, makes them feel.

15. This is followed by an explanation of the ways in which government spending is allocated. Participants are then challenged to think about and justify how they would reallocate government money if they were in power. At the end of these evening sessions, NCS participants are encouraged to register to vote.

Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony?

16. The Challenge does not have a strong view on this issue. However, our NCS graduation ceremonies provide an opportunity for young people to celebrate their shared success alongside their parents, guardians, friends and families.

Are they good value for money?

17. An independent evaluation of NCS, carried out by Ipsos MORI, demonstrates the positive impact the programme has on levels of social trust and young people's attitudes towards mixing with people from different backgrounds.¹⁵³ This finding was echoed in the Casey Review, which concluded that NCS is 'having a positive impact in improving understanding and relationships between young people from different backgrounds.'¹⁵⁴

18 The independent evaluation by Ipsos MORI included a value for money analysis and found that the costs and monetisable benefits associated with NCS in 2015 could be estimated as follows:

The NCS spring programme is estimated to deliver benefits of between £5.0m and £8.8m, and between £0.70 and £1.24 of benefits per £1 of expenditure.

The NCS summer standard programme is estimated to deliver benefits of between £64.9m and £128.1m and between £0.76 and £1.50 of benefits per £1 of expenditure.

¹⁵³ <http://www.ncsyes.co.uk/sites/default/files/14-090747-01%20NCS%202015%20Evaluation%20Report%20Final%20PUBLIC%20v2%2031072017.pdf>

¹⁵⁴ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/the-casey-review-a-review-into-opportunity-and-integration>

The NCS autumn programme is estimated to deliver benefits of between £18.6m and £36.5m, and between £1.17 and £2.30 of benefits per £1 of expenditure.

19. It also concluded that NCS has the potential to deliver a number of benefits that are not currently possible to monetise, such as wellbeing. It is therefore difficult to assess the value of the programme in exclusively monetary terms.

What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

20. The Challenge supports NCS graduates to build on their involvement in their local community through organising alumni activities, and through two vocational education programmes: HeadStart and Step Forward. We designed these programmes to meet the needs and appeal to the interests of young people at different life stages, as they prepare for and undertake the transition into employment.

HeadStart

21. Through HeadStart, The Challenge recruits 16 to 19-year olds to complete a minimum of 16 hours of volunteering within their local communities. After undertaking one hour of voluntary work in a socially mixed setting through HeadStart, teenagers are invited to attend skills development, communications coaching and interview preparation workshops. After completing 16 hours of volunteering, they are guaranteed to be invited to interview for a part-time and seasonal job with one of the scheme's corporate partners (such as Starbucks, Nando's, Lloyds Banking Group and New Look.)

22. HeadStart was launched in London in 2013, partially in order to enable young people to continue their social action journeys following NCS. Initially only available to NCS graduates, HeadStart is now available to all young people in the areas in which we deliver the programme – Greater London, the West Midlands and Greater Manchester. By February 2018, we expect over 8,000 young people to have completed the programme. To date, over 100,000 cumulative volunteering hours have been logged by HeadStart participants.

23. External evaluations of the programme demonstrate its impact. HeadStart has been shown to prepare young people with experiences and skills which make them feel more prepared for their future lives as they move into adulthood. This is highlighted by the results of a pre and post-programme survey which shows that those young people who participated in HeadStart in 2015-16 experienced, on average, a 30% increase across all key outcome areas, including character development, trust and understanding as well as employability and job readiness. In addition, 83% of young people said that they were likely to continue volunteering in their community as a result of HeadStart; whilst participants reported a 51% increase in how connected they felt to their community.¹⁵⁵

Step Forward

¹⁵⁵ Carney, A (2016), HeadStart External Evaluation Report , London: InFocusStep Forward

The Challenge – written evidence (CCE0203)

24. Step Forward is an apprenticeship programme which brings together new school leavers from all walks of life. This programme provides eighteen-year olds with one year's professional work experience, training in highly transferable skills and the chance to build a professional and peer network across sectors including accounting, digital marketing and childcare.

25. The Challenge tailors the marketing and recruitment methods which we utilise to attract Step Forward associates to achieve a diverse mix of participants – supporting young people from different income backgrounds and ethnicities, and with highly divergent career aspirations, to apply (in 2014, over 400 young people applied for 48 places).

26. Through Step Forward, The Challenge engages with young people while they are still at school and can be reached en masse and actively encouraged to consider becoming an apprentice. Interested school leavers are matched to positions with a pool of employers with whom they then complete a one year Level 3 apprenticeship whilst also participating in classroom-based professional and personal development training.

27. In addition to working towards a qualification in their chosen area of work, associates are placed in purposefully mixed teams of 15-16 associates from across all training pathways in order to study non-subject specific skills and participate in social action projects.

28. The Step Forward model has succeeded in appealing to young people – in 2016, The Challenge received 40 expressions of interest for every place on this programme. We believe that this is in large part as we provide intensive support and guidance to young people at each step in the process of entering the labour market, and as the programme has been purposefully shaped to instill transferable skills in participants.

29. In 2016, 400 young people will take in the programme, which currently operates across London. The Challenge views this model as highly scalable and is exploring options to expand Step Forward into new regions.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

30. As outlined above, The Challenge believes that, as life in Britain becomes less uniform and we become a more diverse nation along a number of dimensions, active citizenship and civic engagement can be a means of fostering social integration, connecting communities and building trust amongst and between people of all ages, ethnicities and walks of life. Greater social integration in turn generates trust, improves people's life chances and boosts employment and social mobility.

31. Our common life has always been underpinned by shared institutions bridging social, cultural and generational divides – sustaining a vibrant ecosystem of trust – but the congregational spaces of the twentieth century are not equal to the challenges we now face as a post-industrial society. The organised church, civic organisations from the Women’s Institute to The Scouts to community social clubs and trade unions – all have declined in membership and affiliation as our society and economy have become more open and social trust has shrunk.

32. As a consequence, our defences against social disintegration have been eroded. In response, we, as a society, should seek to create more opportunities and incentives for people from all walks of life to meaningfully connect and build fellow feeling. Creating new civic institutions which bring together people in common cause across social faultlines is at the heart of The Challenge’s work. Policymakers might draw on our experience in this regard in order to promote active participation in community life and strengthen the ties that bind our nation together.

33. Research by the Social Integration Commission demonstrates that when people from different walks of life meet, mix and lead interconnected lives, trust grows and communities flourish¹⁵⁶. Through our experience of designing, delivering and rapidly growing programmes with social integration at their heart, The Challenge has identified a number of principles which we believe underpin effective and scalable interventions to build bonds of trust between people from different ethnicities, cultures, social backgrounds and generations and promote active citizenship.

34. It could be argued that policymakers within successive governments have too often overlooked the correlation between levels of trust within societies and measures of social and economic progress; and the potential power of action aimed at boosting social trust to achieve improved outcomes for communities and public policy. Through embedding the design principles set out in this document in our public services and building new civic institutions reflecting this approach, the new government might weave opportunities to connect with others from different walks of life into the fabric of everyday life in the UK – more effectively utilising social trust as a tool in its policy armoury

35. Social contact with people from different backgrounds can impact positively or negatively on our perceptions of difference, depending on the conditions under which interactions takes place¹⁵⁷. Policymakers should not only design active citizenship programmes so as to bring together a diverse group of people, they should also actively promote social mixing – intervening where necessary to counteract the tendency of participants and service users to cluster in groups of people from similar backgrounds¹⁵⁸. Furthermore, policymakers should ensure that the resulting programmes and institutions embody, to at least some extent, the following design principles:

36. Promote common goals. Confronting people with a shared challenge – an obstacle which can be more easily overcome through teamwork than individual effort – is a key element of inspiring previously unlikely friendships.

37. Facilitate equal status interactions. People are more likely to engage with others when they view them as peers. This can be achieved through rotating leadership roles within an initiative or institution, or purposefully designing an intervention to involve a range of different activities, pushing all participants out of their comfort zones.

38. Create intensive and/or sustained experiences. Building meaningful relationships takes time and work. People from different walks of life should be encouraged to meet and mix intensively over a short burst of time or to engage with one another repeatedly over a longer period. Young people participating in NCS live, cook, eat and work together over a period of four weeks. Teenagers who take part in our HeadStart incentivised volunteering programme, on the other hand, regularly engage with members of their community through completing a few hours of volunteering with a charity partner per week, generally over the course of 10–12 weeks.

39. Capitalise on transitions to drive behaviour change. In our experience, integration interventions which reach people at transitions in their lives are more likely to succeed. Starting school, becoming a young adult and entering the workplace, enrolling at a college or university, becoming a parent, experiencing your child starting school, moving to a new area, or retiring – it is during these moments of transition that we are most open to adopting new habits and identities.

40. Emphasise co-benefits. Through employing effective marketing techniques and offering meaningful incentives to participation, The Challenge designs products which appeal to young people from all backgrounds. Teenagers sign up to our programmes because of the immediate benefits offered, such as the chance to have a fun summer experience, find a job or to develop new skills – because they have a good and obvious reason to join in. From the perspective of most participants, the chance to meet new people and build a more diverse social network is either a bonus or immaterial.

41. Cultivate a unifying culture. Through encouraging participants to use distinct jargon, through creating team labels and emblems, and even through incorporating a degree of ceremony and ritual into our programmes, The Challenge fosters a sense of common identity amongst the young people who take part in our programmes.

The Challenge – supplementary written evidence (CCE0274)

1. The Royal Charter for the National Citizen Service Trust (NCST) states that it is the duty of that organisation to ‘provide or arrange for the provision’ of National Citizen Service (NCS) programmes. The NCST have said that ‘the need to focus on local communities and organisations to achieve long term social impact’ will be a guiding principle of the NCS delivery network redesign process which they are currently engaged in; and that they ‘will be encouraging organisations of all shapes and sizes that meet a clear set of minimum requirements, to review and bid for the opportunity’ to join this network. Indeed, this is – in our experience – an aim shared by the vast majority of organisations currently included in this delivery network, including The Challenge.

2. In 2015, The Challenge was contracted by the NCST to act as its Regional Delivery Partner (RDP) in seven of its 19 delivery regions. As an RDP, we are responsible for working with Local Delivery Partners (LDPs) – a role fulfilled in the main by smaller, locally-focused charities – to provide NCS across each of these geographical areas. At present, the NCS delivery network includes over 250 LDPs.

3. The Challenge has a track record of running high-quality programmes for young people – our NCS net promoter scores (as captured by the NCST in partnership with Rant and Rave) have been consistently high, whilst our HeadStart incentivised social action programme was recently recognised within a report by the Careers and Enterprise Company as *‘what works in volunteering’*¹⁵⁹. We do, accordingly, directly deliver NCS where we believe that this will result in the best possible experience for young people and the greatest social impact. Indeed, we also believe that the provision of NCS across the country is improved through the involvement of organisations operating at different levels of scale. In part as The Challenge delivers NCS within a number of geographic regions across England, we are well-placed to pilot innovative changes to the programme’s structure and curriculum – including in areas with divergent demographic and geographic characteristics, and through the use of control groups – and to run additional activities and services aimed at boosting its social impact. For example, during the summer 2017 delivery period, we employed eleven mental health advisers who worked to support young people with mental health needs to participate in the programme – this innovation was made financially viable as these advisers worked across geographical areas larger than those which many smaller charities operate within. Furthermore, like many NCS providers, The Challenge regularly convenes meetings of the LDPs which we work with so as to enable the sharing of best practice in areas such as inclusion and graduate engagement – we would contend that we are better able to lead these discussions as we are well-versed in the realities of programme delivery.

4. We do, however, believe that through partnering with organisations which are rooted in local communities, enjoy close links with local charities and community groups or possess specialist expertise in a particular aspect of youth programme provision, we are able to both improve the quality of the NCS experience for young people and to reach teenagers who might not otherwise choose to participate in NCS. We are, therefore, committed to increasing the number of NCS places which we sub-contract to LDPs within our delivery areas, and have made significant progress towards realising this goal in recent years. Between 2014 and 2017, the number of LDPs which we work with increased by 38%; whilst in 2017 we sub-contracted over 50% of NCS places to these organisations in four of the seven areas in which we operate as an RDP. The NCST is, moreover, working in concert with current and potential NCS delivery organisations to ensure that, by 2025 at the very latest, no RDP will directly deliver more than 40% of the NCS places which it is contractually responsible for.

5. The Challenge is, in addition, exploring whether we might be able to enter into contractual partnerships with organisations which are not well-placed to fulfil the full range of programme delivery functions usually undertaken by an LDP, but which may be able to contribute meaningfully to a particular aspect of NCS delivery. For example, we are currently in discussions with the Young Brent Foundation regarding whether youth voluntary sector organisations in that borough might be able to assume responsibility for the promotion of the programme to local teenagers.

6. Of course, NCS also meaningfully benefits civil society organisations of all sizes through the third and fourth phases of the programme, which see teams of young people run social action projects with and for local charities and community groups. In 2017, the young people who completed NCS in The Challenge's delivery areas (excluding those who did so through a LDP) raised £446,850 for a wide range of charitable causes through completing approximately 1,067,688 hours of social action and working in partnership with 1,633 charity partners.

Viewpoint and experience: I submit this response as an individual, based on long experience of working in the field of community involvement. I directed research and policy at the Community Development Foundation between 1981 and 2005, analysing a wide variety of community projects across the UK and in a variety of European sites. I carried out consultancies for numerous local authorities and was the main author of CDF's influential advice to government on integrating community involvement into regeneration policies in the 1990s. From 2005 to 2008 I was seconded to the Home Office and the Department of Communities and Local Government as a senior adviser on community empowerment. Since 2008 I have carried out a mixed portfolio of research, policy analysis and project development on community involvement. I directed, with Dr Brian Fisher, the Health Empowerment Leverage Project (HELP), which was commissioned by the Department of Health in 2010 to examine ways of measuring the economic value of community development in health¹⁶⁰. In 2010-12 I worked with Community Places in Northern Ireland on a series of contracts for the NI Government and the City of Belfast on strategies for social inclusion, community development and voluntary sector policy¹⁶¹. My book with Colin Miller, Rethinking Community Practice (Bristol: Policy Press, 2013) proposes a new synthesis of ways to energise communities and public services together. I was awarded an MBE for services to community development in 2009.

Focus. I am addressing especially your question 7, regarding how society, government, third sector organisations and individuals can encourage civic engagement, with implications for other questions.

Importance of the issue. It is vital for individuals and society alike that everyone has a sense of belonging to society in some way or other. For individuals, this is connected with mental health, social opportunities and life chances. For society it is connected with social cohesion, mutual responsibilities and political stability. Engagement cannot be imposed or required. It has to be achieved by people's free choices. But government, industry, voluntary organisations and individuals all have a part to play in creating the best climate for inclusive involvement.

The neglected layer of engagement. Citizenship and civic engagement are usually discussed in terms of the individual on the one hand and society or the state on the other. There is much less attention to the intervening layer which is vital to link the two, namely community activity. Much of this activity takes place on a local face-to-face basis, some also through wider networks and social media. Whilst family and household constitute the private sphere, community activity is the level of society where involvement begins and largely takes place. It is the level where personal and public issues intersect, and is also a stepping stone between private life and practical engagement in public issues. It can be seen concretely in community groups and activities of all kinds, such as tenants' and residents' associations, parent-teacher associations, environmental groups, health groups, social clubs, youth clubs, friends of parks, choirs, drama groups, art clubs, charitable activities based on faith groups and hundreds more. These can be called collectively the community sector. Whilst these activities amount to a huge area of national life, the fact that each of them is small and local consigns the entire sector to having a low profile. Its role is rarely addressed adequately in public debate and policy.

Not just the voluntary sector. It is widely accepted that a flourishing voluntary sector is one of the main vehicles for civic engagement. However, different segments of the voluntary sector have different roles in this respect. Large, professionally-run voluntary organisations sometimes mobilise numerous volunteers and represent wide public opinion on specific issues. But many of the larger voluntary organisations operate primarily as service providers rather than as vehicles for civic engagement. Local community groups and projects, on the other hand, involve people more personally and actively. To become involved in civic engagement, most people need a vehicle that is near at hand, unthreatening, and small enough for the individual participant to matter. Independent local community organisations are in fact the largest part of the voluntary sector, not only by numbers of organisations but in terms of volume of volunteering. But investment directed towards the voluntary sector as a whole is largely swallowed up by the service-providing functions of the larger, professionally-led organisations. There is little trickle-down to the community sector, other than through the small but critical stratum of ‘infrastructure’ organisations which specifically commit themselves to this role.¹⁶² A government policy aiming to support civic engagement must pay particular attention to boosting conditions for the community sector and its infrastructure.

Favourable and unfavourable factors. The volume and effectiveness of community activity and the groups through which it works are not purely spontaneous or random phenomena. To some extent they reflect, on one hand, general social and economic advantages and, on the other, availability of certain forms of help to combat disadvantage. The largest ever survey of the voluntary and community sector in England¹⁶³, commissioned by government in 2008, sampled all 149 local authorities and found that sheer numbers of organisations in this sector, large or small, ranged from 200 to 3000. Seaside town Brighton had three times as many organisations as Seaside town Torbay, though only a 16% higher population. The London Borough of Camden had eight times as many such organisations as the London Borough of Barking and Dagenham, though only a 30% higher population.

Positive factors and outcomes. A government report in 2004¹⁶⁴ identified five key types of help affecting the level and effectiveness of community activity, and five key outcomes of successful activity. All of these remain highly relevant. The five helping factors were:

- access to free or affordable meeting space
- availability of seedcorn funding
- availability of help from skilled community workers
- networks for mutual support between organisations
- opportunities for learning about active citizenship and engagement.

The five outcomes were:

1. a higher level of trust and co-operation amongst people in a locality
2. more confident, motivated and active citizens
3. more effective community groups and organisations
4. a stronger, more varied and inclusive local community sector
5. greater capacity of community groups and organisations to engage in joint work with public authorities .

Parallel studies showed that it was possible to measure these kinds of outcome¹⁶⁵, and a good deal of research into outcomes was carried out in the first decade of the century.

Moving in the wrong direction. Support for the community sector has, however, fallen sharply over the past few years, especially in England, due to the combination of a number of factors. Local authorities used to be the principal source of support, but since this function was discretionary, most of it has disappeared as a result of the cuts in local government funding. This is also exacerbating the pressures on healthcare. The ‘Big Society’ notion that voluntary and community organisations would function better without state support has proved to be badly mistaken. The Big Society concept was not even mentioned in the 2017 election.

Importance to the public services. The activities of the community sector are also vital to the functioning of the public services. It is increasingly clear that the health and care systems can only cope with 21st-century needs if more bridges can be built to community activity¹⁶⁶. The same applies in areas such as policing, education, environment and others. The health system is making efforts to find ways to boost community participation, but is at the same time suffering from the depletion of the key local authority role and loss of its expertise. Public services also need to change their professional cultures in order to engage better with the communities whom they want to engage with them. Aside from the question of whether they support the community sector, public service providers, whether operating in the public, private or voluntary sector, perform (or more usually neglect) a vital function in terms of their openness and responsiveness to community involvement. In the major government survey cited above (note 4) what community organisations primarily felt they lacked from public service bodies was not resources but contact, dialogue and cooperation.¹⁶⁷

Reforming practice. The practice which specialises in supporting the community sector, community development, was severely reduced in England during the ‘Big Society’ period. It was somewhat better sustained in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, which did not adopt the Big Society concept. Community development has also suffered from certain long-standing difficulties about clarity of objectives. It needs to be revived as part of a package to stimulate citizenship and civic engagement, but in a new form designed to squarely address the issues being discussed by your committee. Some of its traditional tools and practices remain vital, others will need to be modified or created. An area that needs new thinking is how to create genuine partnerships between public service providers and their user communities, such that disasters like the Grenfell Tower fire are prevented.

Action. A plan to revive and increase the role of community activity in promoting citizenship and civic participation urgently needs to be pursued despite the difficulties of present conditions. The following three elements should feature in any such plan:

(i) Allocation of ringfenced resources to local authorities to revive and amplify their role in supporting the community sector and its infrastructure. This could be achieved by a very small fraction of new government expenditure so long as it was genuinely ‘new’ money and was ringfenced securely to this objective.

(ii) Analysis of what all public service providers can do by changing practices within existing resources to engage with their user communities and be more responsive to their involvement, influence and cooperation. Experience suggests that the establishment of structured partnerships is necessary to make participation genuinely effective and overcome the recurrent tendency to invoke community involvement merely cosmetically¹⁶⁸.

(iii) Development and deployment of more coordinated and effective forms of community development, with clearer objectives, practices and measurement of outcomes on citizenship and civic participation.

Change That Matters Ltd – written evidence (CCE0208)

- 1. Citizenship and civil engagement in the 21st century mean being interested and actively engaged in questions of public life, not only how they affect people individually but as a wider society. The engagement comes not only from voting in local and national elections but participating in community meetings, public surveys, reading papers, watching the news, following social media channels, volunteering and online lobby groups like 38degrees.
- 2. Our identity is formed by what we are engaged in. If citizens have a way of contributing on local and national issues and are being listened to, they feel a stronger affiliation to where they live because they suddenly have a stake. They will also learn that the big issues such as climate change or social equality are complex and not easily achieved through policy changes in one area, due to their intrinsic interconnectedness with other issues. To engage as wide a range as people as possible, both face-to-face and other online means need to be found.
- 3. Engagement needs to go beyond informing and consulting and move into the realms of involving and collaborating in order to empower both citizens to be active and councillors and MPs to act in the public interest of a wider ‘We the People’ and not just the vocal resident who may divert the ever diminishing public resources onto matters not in the interest of the many but merely the few.
- 4. Citizenship does not necessarily equal identity. The importance is integration in the networks of the society – the professional and social links, accessing educational opportunities, volunteering, taking part in elections, being a good neighbour and more. Key is speaking the language at a sufficiently high level to make that integration possible as well as becoming bicultural. The current citizenship test does not increase the love of the country. Most British citizens would not be able to pass it. The love comes through shared cultural and social references, a shared sense of humour, shared values and more.
- 5. Wider citizenship education including sustainability and democracy should be part of compulsory as well as adult and higher education. Young people, of the age of 16, could then be given the right to vote. Schools and Colleges should encourage learners to participate in elections, many of which already act as polling stations. Participation in learner forums and debating clubs should give them the skills to value and respect other people’s view, give reasons why they may agree or disagree with certain views, and put their own points forward, supported by evidence.
- 6. The first past the post system is undemocratic in its own right and ought to be replaced by proportional representation. This would allow for more political parties to actually have a voice and get actively involved in decision making. The current two party state sometimes feel like a bipolar dictatorship. Neither is satisfactory but the options are limited. Politicians need to move away from point scoring against each other to win populist votes to pulling together, listening to the wider perspective of citizens, while keeping a wider view and the interest of the country and the planet under constant consideration. The country needs solutions to important questions such how to close the inequality gap, how to avert climate disaster, how to keep the nation healthy while providing the best medical care for those who become ill, how can we care for our elders, how to ensure food security and how to tackle political and religious extremism.

7. European citizens in this country as well as British citizens in the UK should be given the choice after a period of 5 years of living in their country of choice whether they want to continue voting in the country whose citizenship they hold or in the country of residence.
8. Rather than more laws, there should be a greater use of citizenship engagement methodologies such as Wisdom Councils which have been conceived of by the North American social innovator, Jim Rough and which are being used extensively in Austria, Germany and Switzerland.
9. Personal Social and Health Education, including citizenship, sustainability and resilience, should be a compulsory subject just like English and maths and should indeed be compulsory from primary to secondary and Further Education and should be embedded in all areas of study within Adult Education and Higher Education. Learning needs to be related to current affairs and to learners' personal experiences. Learning ought to take place out of the classroom as much as possible. Wisdom Councils should take place in every school and university up and down the country at least twice a year. This practical experience of participating in matters affecting learners, being listened to and seeing changes taking place on the basis of their contributions would renew the face that indeed everyone can make a difference.
10. There are many ways of engaging citizens in addition to elections. Citizens juries have successfully been used in many countries including the UK. These complementary means of engaging are however by no means commonplace. In Vorarlberg, the westernmost part of Austria, the Buero fuer Zukunftsfragen i.e. the Office for Future-Related Questions, embarked on finding an alternative to the rather expensive Citizens Jury process and came across Wisdom Councils, which they have successfully been using for the last 8-10 years. They run a number of Wisdom Councils regularly and a collection of a certain, modest, number of signatures by citizens can trigger a Wisdom Council on the question at hand. Wisdom Councils use Dynamic Facilitation, which reliably evokes choice creating, rather than decision making conversations. Choice-creating has been so aptly defined by its creator Jim Rough 'Decision-making uses judgement, weighing the available options, selecting the best, and discarding the rest. Choice-creating is a creative process, where we hold all thoughts, options and feelings in a creative space while new clarity emerges. Often this shift of clarity is 'just knowing what to do.’ And given that judgement will destroy creativity, decision-making and choice-creating are practically opposite.’ The many diverse and complex issues, including Brexit and the root causes which gave rise to it, need increased choice-creating conversations rather than more of the same type of decision-making conversations.

11. Freedom of speech, democracy, the rule of law, mutual respect, sanctity of life should be shared values as should be equality. However, the fact that all protective characteristics are equal in front of the law causes problems when it comes to religion. Some religions prejudice against women or certain sexual orientation, therefore it is not possible to equally promote the equality of religion and the equality of women. It therefore seems logical, that the characteristic over which an individual has no choice, notably gender, ethnicity and disability should have a higher value than religion, which is down to individual choice. An effective way of strengthening the citizenship of women and minority groups would therefore be a classification of protective characteristics with some, i.e. those an individual has no choice over, taking precedence over others.

Charities Aid Foundation – written evidence (CCE0180)

Author: Kim Roberts, Senior Campaigns and Public Affairs Officer, Charities Aid Foundation

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

The traditional notion of citizenship as being solely a citizen of a particular country is changing. In a globalised context, where many people live increasingly transient lives, the traditional notion of citizenship has become weakened, and increasingly people tend to adopt an identity that brings together a number of influences and identities that they feel are more relatable to themselves.

This changing notion is set against a political backdrop where, in some countries, nationhood seems more important than ever. The rise of nationalist politics in both Scotland and the rest of the UK is forcing people to think again about what it means to be a British citizen, and how that fits in a globally changing environment.

Citizenship is about more than just being a citizen of a country. It is about identifying with, and feeling a part of that country's wider community. Civic engagement meanwhile is about being an active citizen; participating in one's community through civil society and democratic institutions, usually to bring about a positive change or make a difference.

Both citizenship and civic engagement are vitally important for the UK's civil society sector and its hundreds of thousands of charitable and voluntary organisations. Charities very often rely on people feeling as if they want to give something back; often to a community or a cause that they feel an affinity to. Charities also rely on people's sense of civic engagement and duty that drives them to volunteer or donate, or simply support the actions of a charitable organisation.

The changing notion of citizenship does present challenges for the UK's civil society sector. In an increasingly polarised political environment, it can often feel as if communities are divided and there is a real sense that people are becoming increasingly attracted to more radical and polarised views, reinforced by echo chambers. Research published in 2016 by CAF found that in the aftermath of the EU referendum 14 million people felt that their community was more divided than it was at the start of the year.. Levels of community spirit were also worryingly low, with only 12% of people believing that a sense of community spirit in their local area was more noticeable than before the referendum campaign.¹⁶⁹

And yet, against this backdrop, we found that people were increasingly thinking about how to generate social change, with many turning to social action as a vehicle for achieving this.

Immediately after last year's referendum 30% of people said that they were more active in a political or social cause, whilst 9 million said that they felt more inclined to volunteer in order to help their local community. Membership of political parties is also on the increase, and there is a sense that debate around divisive political issues has at least reinvigorated enthusiasm for and participation in democratic engagement. There is a crucial role for charities in seeking to harness the passions and emotions that have arisen, and provide a platform for turning it into concrete action for a social purpose.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation. Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

A sense of membership, belonging and community is central to the concept of citizenship and, as explored briefly above, charities and voluntary organisations can play a vital role in giving a practical manifestation to these principles.

Citizenship can include the acceptance of and participation in core civic activities, including charitable giving. Charitable giving is a very strong tenet in Britain, and we are an incredibly generous nation, with people committed to using their resources to support good causes. About £10 billion is donated to charities in the UK each year and nine in ten people said that they did something charitable last year (defined as donating money, giving goods, sponsoring someone or volunteering for a charity), which in itself is important because it demonstrates that charitable giving is associated with much more than just financial donations.¹⁷⁰ It is therefore reasonable to suggest that supporting charity is a key part of citizenship in this country. But it is more than just a behavioural trait. Supporting civil society and the organisations that make up civil society is part of the very social fabric of the UK, and has been throughout the ages, and the diversity and reach of civil society organisations means that they can have more success in generating community spirit and engagement than state institutions. It is part of what makes our country so strong and so well respected globally, and is therefore a crucial part of what makes someone feel favourable to our country if they live here.

CAF would therefore suggest that encouraging people to support charitable and voluntary organisations could help to develop citizenship in the UK and bring down barriers that do exist. For both citizens by birth and by naturalisation, such organisations can provide a sense of community, provide people with an outlet in which to use their skills, and help to develop a positive concept of British values We would encourage government and other policy makers to continue to consider how and where charitable activity can be encouraged, and what more can be done to ensure that people have the access and opportunity to engage with charities across each of the different stages of their life.

¹⁷⁰ UK Giving 2017, Charities Aid Foundation: <https://www.cafonline.org/about-us/publications/2017-publications/uk-giving-report-2017>

At CAF we have been looking closely at ways to encourage charitable giving throughout the ages, not least through the cross-party Growing Giving Parliamentary Inquiry chaired by Lord Blunkett. We support the introduction of programmes such as the National Citizen Service which encourage young adults to participate in social action, but we believe more can be done to increase participation across other age groups. Just one in ten of people aged over 65 has volunteered in the past year with many others wanting to use their skills to support their community but lacking information about the best outlets, and we believe that the establishment of a Post-Careers Advice Service could help to signpost those in later life to opportunities including volunteering and community action¹⁷¹. Such a service would undoubtedly play a positive role in driving civic engagement and providing people with a strong sense of citizenship.

Recommendation: Government should engage with a wide range of stakeholders including representatives from the charitable sector, social care and health services, and financial institutions to investigate the possibility of establishing a Post-Careers Advice Service for those approaching retirement.

- 3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Civic engagement is an important right and responsibility for any citizen of the UK, and there has long been an informal implicit understanding between state and individual that the two are reciprocal.

It is difficult to foresee a situation where legally mandating civic engagement would be the most effective driver of participation. After all, one of the reasons that civic engagement is so powerful is that it demands of an individual some semblance of agency and allows them the freedom to choose how best to interact with the community in which they live. This freedom helps to create an environment where civic engagement is a positive, active choice, which strengthens the motivations underpinning it.

At CAF we believe that the onus should not be on mandating civic engagement via legislation, but rather should be about creating a positive legal and regulatory environment for organisations to operate in this space, and for people to be empowered to make an informed decision about how to exercise their right. Many countries across the world are seeing pressures on the operating environment for civil society – known as the closing space for civil society – and as a global leader, it is essential that the rhetoric that the UK utilises internationally is matched by practical action and policies at home.

In recent years, sadly a number of policies enacted in the UK have not met this standard. The worrying trend to curtail charities' ability to speak out publicly on behalf of their beneficiaries is not conducive to creating an environment where people feel that they have the freedom to take part in necessary, and legal, activity. The policy climate has seen the introduction of the Lobbying Act and the new grants clause which restrict civil society advocacy, as well as proposals to force charities to declare any income that they receive from overseas donors, and plans to force charities to pay an annual registration fee to the Charity Commission. These measures, individually and collectively, weaken civil society in the UK, particularly when negative policies are intertwined with rhetoric that calls into question the legitimacy of entirely legal and valid actions by CSOs.

In order to address these trends and to reiterate the important role that civil society plays in a vibrant democracy, CAF has called on the Government to repeal or exempt charities from the Lobbying Act, or at a minimum implement the findings of Lord Hodgson's report on it; consider other ways to fund the Charity Commission so that it is not reliant on funding from charities, and by implication donors; ensure that overseas donors are not discouraged from supporting charities in the UK, nor their important contribution delegitimised; and explore affirming the right of charities to speak up on behalf of their beneficiaries within statutory law.

The UK's civil society plays an important role in the soft power that our country uses to influence the global agenda. That, however, depends upon the UK leading by example, and many policies introduced or discussed in recent years are more aligned with those enacted by repressive regimes than those that should be adopted in flourishing liberal democracies. Charities would welcome the opportunity to work more closely and collaboratively with government, both to ensure that the correct relationship and climate exist to give civil society organisations the right balance of freedom and support that they need to make such an important contribution, and so that CSOs and government can share expertise and resources to tackle some of the challenges that the UK faces.

Recommendation: The Government should repeal or exempt charities from the Lobbying Act, or as a minimum implement the findings of Lord Hodgson's report on it

- 5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education has a vital role to play in teaching and encouraging good citizenship, and it is welcome that previous governments across the political spectrum have recognised this and initiated programmes such as NCS to reflect that.

CAF believes that the teaching of good citizenship should be introduced at an early age and encouraged through to university. Again, it is welcome that citizenship has been brought into the National Curriculum in England, but it is important to understand that citizenship is about more than just democracy, government and law making. As noted earlier, charitable and voluntary action is a vital part of the UK's social fabric, and that should be reflected by including it as a part of the citizenship curriculum. Students should learn about the role of civil society in the UK, including its history and role, how they can play a positive role in their community through social action, and the reasons why participation in civic engagement and citizenship can be beneficial to the future prospects.

We also believe that older students should be encouraged to participate in volunteering and charitable activity, not least because it will help to provide them with vital skills needed for employment and to become a fully functioning member of society. At CAF we have worked closely with UCAS to create guidance for young people applying to university and college through the UCAS system, which explains to them how social action experience can help make their personal statement stand out, as well as suggesting ways for them to get involved in their local community.¹⁷²

6. Do voluntary programmes such as NCS do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

We welcomed the National Citizen Service Act 2017 which made provisions to put NCS on a statutory footing. We believe that the Act will help to increase the scale and scope of the scheme, which could be particularly helpful in reaching out to young people from different backgrounds.

However, whilst we support the premise of NCS and its expansion, we do believe that are areas which could be developed or improved to ensure that there are lasting benefits for participants. For example, we believe that there is an opportunity for NCS to develop by ensuring that all participants who complete the scheme are given explicit information about the skills that they have derived from their participation, and how these skills could be used to their benefit. This would ensure that in addition to the Trust equipping young people with the skills that they need, it also provides them with information about how they can display those skills when seeking to enhance their academic or employment opportunities.

Young people with experience of participation in social action are well placed to go onto leadership roles at charities, either serving as trustees themselves or being placed in shadow leadership roles or on advisory boards to further develop their skills. We would urge the NCS to encourage participants to continue their involvement in community and charity support beyond completion of the programme, including by putting the leadership skills that they will have developed to good use.

We know that young people are incredibly positive about charities; 78% agree that young people should give up some of their time to help others,¹⁷³ but we also know that young people who are encouraged to participate in charitable giving at an early age - either by donating or social action - are likely to continue to do so throughout their life, so early engagement is essential.

We do not believe that programmes such as NCS should include a greater political element. The importance of teaching young people about social and community action has rightly been recognised, and we believe that such activity warrants its own stand alone programme. Young people already learn about government, politics and law through the National Curriculum, but NCS offers them a practical opportunity to learn new skills and to experience how beneficial social action is, we do not want to see that diluted, not should it run the risk of becoming politicised.

We would encourage policymakers to consider how the legacy of programmes such as NCS should be both measured and preserved. We hope that young people who have graduated from the programme will be more likely to continue to participate in charitable giving throughout their life, and in order to ensure that NCS continues to work well; we must ensure that it is serving that objective.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

There are a number of stakeholders who have a responsibility for encouraging civic engagement. The individual is one, civil society organisations like charities are another, but we believe that there are a number of ways that government (local and central) and devolved administrations can encourage civic engagement.

Central government already understands the value of active citizens and civic engagement, which is why programmes such as NCS now receive statutory backing, but more must still be done to increase participation further. As mentioned previously, the support of civil society is vital, and government's recent approach to curtailing the freedoms of charities is not conducive to a positive environment. We believe that charitable organisations have a vital role to play in a thriving democracy, and are key protagonists for developing an engaged civil society. But they cannot do that if they are operating in a restricted environment. We would urge the government to look again at its legislation around charity campaigning, and repeal or exempt charities from the Transparency of Lobbying, Non-party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014 as a positive first step.

The growing importance of devolution and of having power closer to people on the ground is clearly an important priority for government, with the establishment of the Northern Powerhouse, Midlands Engine and a number of City Deals across the UK. Many of these programmes prioritise investment, infrastructure and economic growth, but we believe there is a distinct lack of focus on how such programmes can contribute positively to the communities for which they are written; with very little mention of community engagement, promoting active citizenship or growing community participation. We would encourage government to work closely with devolved bodies and communities themselves to ensure that when any devolution policy or programme is published, it also includes provision for supporting and developing civil society in the area. This should include consulting with relevant CSOs as policies and programmes are being developed.

We also believe there is a vital role to be played by directly elected mayors, who will be powerful and influential figures in areas across England. CAF's recent report, Chain Links: The Role of Mayors in Building a Culture of Civic Philanthropy¹⁷⁴, launches our Giving for the City project, which is exploring the role of philanthropy in driving progress in our towns and cities and enhancing civic identity. The report sets out clear recommendations for Mayors to adopt including: establishing a Mayor's Fund to attract donations for addressing local challenges and issues; publishing a philanthropy strategy, detailing the approach of the mayoral office to civic philanthropy; appointing a philanthropy liaison to develop relationships with potential philanthropists and local charities; developing a clear narrative and vision about the role of philanthropy in their town, city or region; and using the profile and status of the mayoralty to bring together philanthropists, charities, foundations, companies and public sector bodies to encourage partnerships and identify shared goals. Whilst much of this exists purposefully away from Westminster and Whitehall, there is doubtless an opportunity for government and politicians to help shape the climate and ensure that directly elected mayors explore the contribution that local philanthropy can make in their area.

Beyond policymakers and civil society organisations, we must not forget that businesses also have a role to play in offering opportunities for employees to be active and engaged citizens. Many employees want to give back to the communities in which they work and live, with more than half saying they would be very or fairly likely to volunteer if their employer offered them help to do so.¹⁷⁵ The busyness of modern life means that people increasingly want to work for organisations who give them an opportunity to demonstrate a commitment to their local community or a good cause in the workplace. We would therefore urge employers to consider their role in providing their employees with vital outlets to contribute positively to society.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in diversity and schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

The current political and social climate is challenging, with clear divisions in society. At CAF, we believe that the expertise and reach of charities means that they are uniquely well-placed to bring communities together and build stronger, more inclusive societies. Charities are embedded within communities across the country and make up an integral part of our social fabric. They receive phenomenally high levels of support from the public, who believe that there is a role for charities in helping to strengthen communities. One of the most effective roles that charities can play is by strengthening social and community cohesion.

Previous CAF research found that public support for charities to play a role in community cohesion was high. When asked about who is most likely to provide effective support to those who need it at times of political and economic uncertainty, charities were the most popular response (55%), far more popular than central government (11%)¹⁷⁶. 46% of people believe that charities can help to improve community cohesion, and 40% agreed that charities can help to heal social divides. In addition, 63% agree that charities can provide support to marginalised groups

Set against a backdrop of rising hate crime, increasing political tension and growing social divide, it is important that action is taken to provide support to those most at risk from a breakdown in community cohesion. Charities are uniquely placed to monitor levels of threats to communities, to bring people back together, and to ensure that everyone has a stake in society. We believe that government - local and central - should now work closely with charities to monitor community cohesion, and to encourage active citizenship in an attempt to limit such division.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

The City of London, as the UK's capital, is one of our most diverse communities. There are over 300 languages spoken in London and over 3 million of the capital's inhabitants were born outside of the UK, and yet the city does an exceptional job of promoting a tolerant and cohesive society for all who live there.

The fact that London is open and tolerant is not a result of luck, there is much hard work done by citizens, businesses and civil society organisations who are based there, but credit must be given to City Hall, London's regional assembly, and to the Mayor of London, who have put a number of programmes and policies in place to enable such a positive environment.

For example, there is the Mayor's Fund for London – a philanthropic fund which is used to empower young Londoners from disadvantaged background. The city also operates Team London – the Mayor's programme for volunteering and social action in the capital. It comes as no surprise that a city which is open, tolerant and has strong community cohesion should spend so much time and energy on promoting and investing in its civil society. We believe the vital role that charities and volunteering organisations are playing in London contributes to making the city better, and we would urge other Mayors and policy makers to learn from this and consider following suit.

Charity Commission for England and Wales – written evidence (CCE0164)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?
 7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?
 10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?
1. The Charity Commission is the independent regulator and registrar of charities in England and Wales. We are constituted as a non-Ministerial government department, directly accountable to Parliament.
 2. The Commission is responsible for registering charities, promoting compliance by charity trustees with their legal obligations, promoting the effective use of charitable resources, and enhancing the accountability of charities to donors, beneficiaries and the general public. Fundamentally, the Commission works to increase public trust and confidence in the charitable sector, and to enable trustees to run their charities effectively.
 3. As of May 2017, there are over 167,000 registered charities with 950,000 trustee positions in England and Wales. The most reliable estimates¹⁷⁷ suggest that there are another 180,000 charities (mostly with income below £5,000) that are not required by law to register.
 4. Charities run some of Britain’s best-loved national institutions and perform functions that, in other countries, are the preserve of the state – education, medical research, children’s services, and legal advice are just a few examples. In many respects, citizenship is part of the wider agenda for much of the voluntary sector. Regardless of charitable purpose, the aim of many charities is to take responsibility for, seek to alleviate and provide solutions to a number of social, economic and political challenges.
 5. An element of this that is often overlooked is the fundamental and valuable role played by charity trustees. The basic role of a trustees is to govern, identify, manage and mitigate risk to the charity, and to make decisions in the best interests of the charity and the furthering of its aims. The vast majority of trustees are unpaid, so trusteeship is a form of strategic volunteering. The good governance and strong leadership provided by trustees is fundamental to a sustainable and resilient charitable sector.

6. The proximity between charities and the communities they serve, and the role of trustees in ensuring charities deliver for their beneficiaries (including the wider public), makes trusteeship an excellent example of active citizenship. Charities are in a unique position to deliver where the state cannot. The events of the past summer have shown the best of the charitable sector, who responded with speed and agility to atrocity and tragedy. The nature of charities, delivering in the interests of their beneficiaries, ties organisations more closely to the communities they work in; charities are often uniquely placed to understand the dynamics of the communities they serve. It makes their work, and the role trustees play in securing this now and for future generations, fundamental to a strong and cohesive society. It is because of the vital role charities play that the risk of poor governance, and of trustees failing to plan and govern effectively, becomes more acute.
7. The public role of charities makes good governance a shared endeavour. The Commission is working with the charitable sector to improve it. Trustees' Week,¹⁷⁸ now in its 8th year, is a joint initiative involving a range of partner organisations supporting charities. It aims to raise awareness of the valuable work of charities and their trustees, and to raise awareness of opportunities to volunteer as a trustee.
8. Much has been written about the need to recruit more trustees, and potential barriers to trusteeship, with significant contributions made to the debate by the Committee's chairman Lord Hodgson. Issues such as the usually voluntary (unpaid) nature of trusteeship¹⁷⁹, and perceptions of risk and personal liability¹⁸⁰, have often been cited. At present we lack a fully developed evidence base on which to form a judgement. The Commission's published research into trust and confidence in charities¹⁸¹ suggests that lack of public awareness of what charities are, the range of ways in which they contribute to society and how they are run may be a more significant factor. For example, the proportion of the public who are aware they have benefited from or used a charity's services rose from 19% in 2015 to 31% in 2017.¹⁸² This research also suggests that rising public awareness of charity may now be contributing to increased expectations of both charities and their regulator. It may therefore be an opportune time to raise awareness of the opportunity to make a positive difference to the effective governance of charities by becoming a trustee, rather than rely exclusively on others to do so on your behalf.

9. In October we plan to publish the findings of detailed research into trustee awareness in England and Wales. This will look at trustees' perceptions of their own knowledge and expertise, as well as shedding light on the characteristics and demographics of trustees, the turnover of trustees, the methods by which boards recruit trustees and the overall experience of trustees. The research will also highlight the significant contribution trustees have to the economy and society. We anticipate that this research will provide a much needed evidence base for the charitable sector to use to strengthen their own practice and improve the quality and breadth of trusteeship.
10. Charity trustees are now responsible for a total annual income of over £74 billion. In response to calls for more support for trustees, the Commission aims to focus more resources on enablement, supporting trustees to deliver for their beneficiaries. We are committed to ensuring trustees have access to the right information at the right time, developing our digital offer. The sector's infrastructure bodies also have a key role to play in order to support trustees to develop.
11. The Commission recognises lack of diversity of trustees as a potential barrier to good governance. Diversity on boards does not just help to offer a broader skills mix, it also provides for diversity of thought, strengthening overall governance. Some of the best decision-making is a product of board diversity, allowing trustees to challenge each other and offer conflicting perspectives to ultimately achieve the best outcome for their charity. The research we plan to publish in October will report on the gender, age, race and educational diversity of boards, the skills mix and competency levels, recruitment processes, and so on.
12. The charitable sector continues to grow; applications made to the Commission to register a charity have increased by 40% in the last four years, from 5,949 applications in 2012/13 to 8,368 applications in 2016/17. Those new charities require new trustees and, as the number of charities rise, so too does the need for active, engaged citizens willing to take on trusteeship.

Charity Retail Association – written evidence (CCE0055)

Who we are

The Charity Retail Association (CRA) is the only body in the UK which represents the interests of charity retailers. We have nearly 400 members encompassing around 80 per cent of all charity stores in the UK. Our members range from national chains, to individual hospice shops, and everything in between.

Volunteering in charity retail

Charity retail is the biggest source of volunteer opportunities in the UK, with 220,000 people currently volunteering in the sector. The UK's 11,200 charity shops can therefore play a key role in promoting an active and engaged citizenship. Charity shops provide people with an excellent way to learn new skills, enter or re-enter the workforce; in addition to helping to combat mental health problems and social isolation.

Therefore, we believe that any government plan to boost citizenship should take account of the role of charity retail. We believe the evidence submitted in this representation particularly addresses question 7 (on how society can support civic engagement) and question 12 (which seeks examples of initiatives that help to promote a cohesive society) laid out in your call for evidence.

The volunteer base

The pool of charity shop volunteers is huge. As noted already, nearly a quarter of a million people volunteer in the charity retail sector today. But this only tells some of the story. In addition, public polling carried out this year by the independent think tank Demos, demonstrated that 6 per cent of all adults have worked or volunteered in a charity shop at some point in their lives. This equates to nearly three million people across the country.

Given the size and depth of our volunteer base, there is no doubt that the charity retail sector can do a significant amount to harness civic engagement in this country.

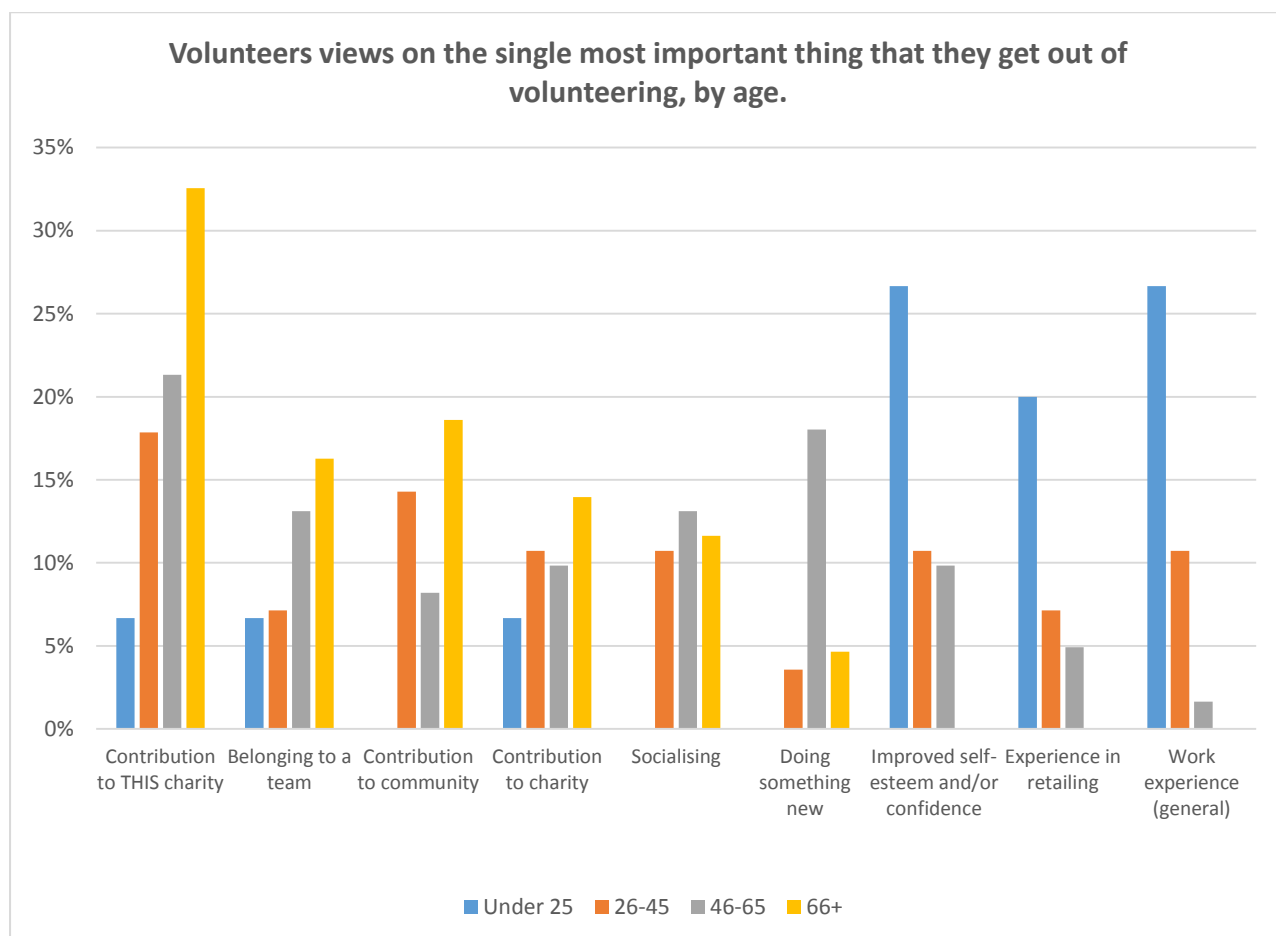

What is more, we know that those who do volunteer in charity shops find it to be a rich and rewarding experience.

Overall, 93 per cent of volunteers say they are satisfied with their current volunteering role, and 90 per cent say they would recommend their organisation as a 'great place to work'.

These positive feelings are consistent across all groups and ages of volunteers. However, we find the specific reasons that people volunteer, and the exact positive outcomes they get from doing so do vary considerably by age, as we will elaborate on below.

Young people and employability

As the chart below demonstrates, there is a strong divergence in what different age groups perceive to be the biggest advantage they derive from volunteering.

It is clear that young people perceive that the main benefits they will get from volunteering in a charity shop relate to employability – specifically work experience, and job skills and confidence building.

Supporting this kind of volunteering can therefore play a key role in helping young people to fully integrate into society by gaining the skills they need to find full time employment.

Older people and social interaction

By contrast, older people (in particular retired people who have no need to seek employability related skills) most commonly cite contribution to the charity they are volunteering for, and also the social benefits of their work.

It is clear that that volunteering can play a key role in combatting social isolation. 92 per cent of volunteers agree that a clear benefit of volunteering is the opportunities provided by social interaction and many have lived these benefits themselves. Over three-quarters of volunteers believe that their role has improved their self-esteem and confidence (77 per cent), and improved their physical and/or mental health (73 per cent).

Such positive outcomes are why Community Service Volunteers (CSV) estimate that for every £1 spent on volunteers, £3.38 of value was created including through improved health outcomes.

So, there are clear benefits to society - in addition to a payback for the economy – to be gained by encouraging this kind of volunteering. It has been proven that it helps people to continue to engage with their fellow citizens and lead fulfilling lives, right into their later years.

Concerns

Overall, when we talk about volunteering and charity retail, we are talking about a very positive picture. However, there are some concerns which interventions from policy makers could help to address.

For example:

- whilst the total number of volunteers has risen by 4 per cent in the last three years, this has been slower than the growth in number of shops;
- 55 per cent responding to a recent survey stated that volunteer availability and recruitment had declined in recent years;
- research by Charity Finance Magazine has concluded that recruitment of volunteers is the number one concern reported by charity shop managers.

Our members are also working hard to find ways to diversify their volunteer base. One such scheme has been set up by the British Red Cross and allows people to sign up for ‘short-term’ volunteering roles (limited to 12 weeks). This attracts a new kind of volunteer who previously felt unable to commit to volunteering over a longer period.

Conclusion – how you can help

Making it easy for people to volunteer in charity shops has clear benefits for civic society. The outcomes for charity are positive and the volunteers themselves gain a great deal.

This is why the CRA’s Manifesto for Charity Shops, published in June 2017, asked the next government to dedicate itself to creating a “volunteer revolution”. We believe your Committee can play a key role and making this vision become a reality.

For example, whilst charity shop volunteers are still most likely to hear about their role through inquiry or an in-store advertisement, the proportion of volunteers who found their role in this way is declining (down from 52 per cent to 46 per cent since 2013).

Were public sector workplaces to offer volunteer days and signpost their staff towards the opportunities in charity retail we believe that even more people would find out about the benefits and opportunities of this kind of volunteering.

Likewise, providing volunteers with an opportunity to formally recognise their new skills through a qualification can give a major boost to their employment prospects, self esteem and ability to become fully rounded citizens. The Government should commit to recognising this with appropriate qualifications accessible to all.

These are just a couple of practical ideas of how policy makers can help to boost volunteering in charity retail, something which as this representation has demonstrated leads to positive benefits to all of civil society. We would be happy to meet with any members of the Committee to discuss these issues in greater depth.

Children's Rights Alliance for England (CRAE) – written evidence (CCE0114)

1. The Children's Rights Alliance for England (CRAE) believe that human rights are a powerful tool for making children's lives better. So we fight for children's rights by listening to what they say, carrying out research to understand what children are going through and using the law to challenge those who violate children's rights. We campaign for the people in power to change things for children. And we empower children and those who care about children to push for the changes that they want to see.

2. We welcome the inquiry into citizenship and civic engagement and the opportunity to submit evidence. Our submission focusses on the participation of children and young people. CRAE would be very pleased to submit further information or give evidence to the Committee in person. We can also help to support children and young people to engage with the Committee directly.

1) What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

3. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), which the UK ratified in 1991, enshrines participation rights and respect for the views of children. It includes the right to express opinions, the right to information and freedom of association¹⁸³. Article 12 gives children a right to be listened to and to have their views taken into account in all matters affecting them.

4. However, these citizenship and civic engagement rights are often limited and not fully realised until adulthood. Article 12 is of particular importance as it is not only a right in itself but is a general principle of the CRC and plays a key role in the implementation of all the rights of children. Engaging these participation rights as children and young people mature also helps prepare them for lifelong active citizenship and civic engagement crucial to building a strong and stable society in the 21st century. Specific structures which seek to engage with children and young people are required to create meaningful opportunities for participation, where children and young people are able to make choices that shape their environment, direct their own development and have agency as responsible actors¹⁸⁴.

2) Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state?

How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

5. Currently children and young people aged under-18 have few formal rights of citizenship and their civic engagement is often overlooked entirely or is ineffective. In part, this is the result of a lack of compliance with Article 12 and a failure to take into account children's views. Recommendations made by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (the UN Committee) to the UK in its 2016 examination concluded that 'many children feel that they are often not listened to'¹⁸⁵ by professionals who they interact with in everyday life. These included social workers, independent reviewing officers, paid carers, and teachers. The UN Committee recommended that systems and structures be established to ensure meaningful involvement of children in decision making at both national and local level, including in education, leisure and play and noted: 'Particular attention should be paid to younger children.'¹⁸⁶ Such systems and structures would support civic engagement of children and give formal recognition to their citizenship rights.

6. To improve the civic engagement of children participation rights need to be formalized. The UN Committee has consistently advised that the most powerful driver for the realisation of children's rights within a nation comes through giving it direct force in domestic law. Since it ratified the CRC, the UK has been examined by the UN Committee five times and while some positive progress on implementation has been made this has been limited. In its 2016 Concluding Observations the UN Committee recommended the UK 'expedite bringing its domestic legislation in line with the Convention to ensure that the principles and provisions are directly applicable and justiciable under domestic law'¹⁸⁷. While there has been some examples where participation rights have been directly enshrined in our laws this is patchy and there is no overarching statutory right for children to engage in decision making, particularly at the national level.

3) Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

7. CRAE strongly supports lowering the voting age and is a founding member of the Votes at 16 Coalition.¹⁸⁸ In Scotland 16 and 17 year olds can vote in local election and elections for the Scottish parliament. In 2014 around 100,000 16- and 17-year-olds cast votes in the Scottish Independence referendum. Globally many countries already allow 16-and-17-year olds to vote including Argentina, Austria, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Nicaragua, East Timor, Ethiopia, Indonesia, North Korea and Sudan.¹⁸⁹ Yet, in 2016, 16- and 17-year-olds throughout the UK were denied the opportunity to vote in the referendum on the UK's membership of the European Union - the most significant political decision in a generation, and one which will affect them for the rest of their lives. While amendments to the European Union Referendum Bill to allow 16 and 17 years old to vote were accepted in the House of Lords these were subsequently overturned in the House of Commons. From our experience of working with young people we know that this exclusion has led to anger and disillusionment with mainstream politics. Key findings in research carried out by the University of Oxford¹⁹⁰ suggest that when 16- and 17-year-olds are given the vote, they become as politically mature as older voters. (CRAE supports the submission by the British Youth Council which gives more detail on this question).

4). What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

8. Citizenship education is likely to be more impactful in creating active citizens if it begins at a young age. For educational institutions providing compulsory education for children and young people up to the age of 18 in England, citizenship has been a compulsory part of the curriculum since 2015¹⁹¹. Changes in the education system with the shift to free schools and academies, which are not bound by the national curriculum in the same way as state schools,¹⁹² provides a challenge to guaranteeing consistent delivery of citizenship education nationally.

9. For citizenship education to be really successful, schools need to have an ethos which supports children's participation rights and offers meaningful opportunities to engage in democratic structures such as school councils. Of 840 children aged 5-17 who completed a survey carried out by CRAE in 2015, 44% reported they had no say in how their school was run and 1 in 5 said their school hardly ever listens to what children say, one 15 year-old commented: 'In school you're just a number...All they care about is your grades being top notch. They don't care about anything else'.¹⁹³ Unless the ethos of schools change to be of a participatory nature efforts to promote engagement and active citizenship though citizenship education will be undermined. The best way to teach this to children is through a lived experience of school life that fosters and promotes children's participation rights.

5) Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

10. The National Citizenship Service is one example of how active citizens can be created. However, smaller grass roots projects and initiatives for children and young people of all ages, which are built around developing self advocacy and providing opportunities for active campaigning and political engagement, are also very important. Such projects are often most successful if they run over a period of a year or more to allow children and young people to build skills and confidence and begin to take on leadership roles. Below is a case study of CRAE's See it, Say it, Change It project which provides an alternative example of a project that contributed to creating active citizens.

The See it, Say it Change it project was set up by CRAE in 2015 with funding from the Paul Hamlyn Foundation, a charitable trust. The project supported children and young people in England to tell their side of the story to the UN Committee as part of the 2016 examination of the UK Government. It supported them to engage in the UNCRC reporting process in a number of different ways including researching and writing an alternative report, attending meetings with the UN Committee in Geneva and observing the UK Government examination.

In February 2015 the See it, Say it Change it steering group was formed. A group of 22 children and young people age 7-18 from all over England who would lead the project. Many members of the group were new to children's rights and participation and we successfully engaged children and young people whose rights are most at risk including those growing up in foster and residential care; children facing homelessness; transgender children; children who had been in trouble with the law; disabled children; children with SEN; children from minority ethnic and religious groups; and children from rural areas. With support from CRAE this inspirational group of children and young people researched and wrote the report from children in England to the UN Committee.

The children's report was submitted to the UN Committee in July 2015 alongside other alternative reports. Submitting the report was a key milestone in the See it, Say it, Change it project and preceded some of the most important and inspiring examples of Article 12 being put into action by the project. In October 2015 17 members of the steering group travelled to Geneva to present evidence at the pre-sessional and attend a special meeting between children from across the UK and the UN Committee. At a meeting in the run up to the trip the children and young people had self-organised into working groups deciding who would attend the pre-session; the meeting between children and the UN Committee; and lead a social media and blogging group. This allowed the group to work effectively to support one another and share their experiences in Geneva more widely.

At the pre-session, CRAE and members of the steering group presented alongside other children, and representatives from National Human Rights Institutions, NGOs, and Children's Commissioners from across the UK. Four members of the See it, Say it Change it steering group attended the pre-session where they read out statements on children's rights issues highlighted in the report and were able to respond directly questions from the UN Committee. Key areas raised by the children at the pre-session were: life in care, violence against children and experiences of Islamophobia.

As well as participating in the pre-session, children and young people had their own private meeting with members of the UN Committee. This was attended by eight members of the steering group as well as by other children from across the UK.

The UN Committee released its Concluding Observations on the UK in June 2016. Though recognising some positive progress on implementing the CRC, the UN Committee made over 150 recommendations for action, many of which respond to issues identified specifically in the children's report and which had been highlighted by steering group members in their meetings with the UN Committee.

The recommendations made in the Concluding Observations provide a strong tool for advocacy on key children's rights on issues including housing, life in care and mental health. Children involved in the project have taken different kinds of action including written blogs and regular meetings with parliamentarians and government including the then Children's Minister, Edward Timpson. Two members of the group also attended the Government Examination by the UN Committee in May 2016. They group also increased their knowledge of human rights and how to take action and published a series of 'Children speak out' briefings on areas of concern highlighted in the Concluding Observations and the See it, Say it, Change it report including youth justice and life in care (CRAE, 2016/17).

In 2016 CRAE successfully gained funding from Comic Relief to continue the project into a campaigning phase, Change it! This project supports children and young people to campaign on an issue highlighted in the UN Committee's recommendations. Through deliberative discussion and voting the group selected homelessness as the focus of their campaign. In their recommendation's the UN Committee said that the UK needed to stop housing children in poor quality, temporary accommodation for long periods of time – an issue which had been highlighted in the children's report and is of public concern.

Increasingly members of the steering group have become active citizens; writing to MPs and engaging other children and young people to join campaign actions. Members of the group have gone on to study law, become community volunteers and join other participation forums including the Mayor of London's Peer Outreach team and these members have stated that participating in See it, Say it, Change it helped them build confidence and knowledge that allowed them to engage in these future opportunities.

6) How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

11. As stated above, Article 12 of the CRC gives children a right to express their views and have them taken into account in all decisions that affect them. In its General Comment on Participation, the UN Committee states that article 12 'addresses the legal and social status of children, who, on the one hand lack the full autonomy of adults but, on the other, are rights holders'.¹⁹⁴ An important way to realise Article 12 and for Government to support civil society initiatives to increase civil engagement of children is to ensure children have opportunities to be involved in national policy making.

12. This is especially important because:

- Children in the UK are not able to vote in national and local elections (with the exception of Scotland) and hold government to account at the ballot box
- Government decisions tend to have a particularly strong impact on children due to their dependence on public services, such as education. This is particularly the case for particular groups of children for example disabled children, children with mental health needs and looked after children.
- Research has also shown that listening to children and young people results in better decision-making by allowing relevant experiences and perspectives to be considered.
- It has many benefits to a child's personal development in terms of news skills and self confidence and self-worth and can help demonstrate the importance of active citizenship to them.
- It sends out a wider message of the value of respecting children and listening to their views which supports their civic engagement.

13. Despite these strong arguments for involving children in policy making there is currently a lack of commitment to this agenda by the Government. Positive developments such as the production of child friendly consultation documents and the 'youth voice' initiative, which helped to involve older children, are no longer in place. The 2013 Government report Twelve actions to Professionalise Policy Making includes an action that 'each Departmental Head of Policy Profession will champion Open Policy Making as part of their core responsibilities'.¹⁹⁵ Yet despite this, we have seen little action taken to include children as part of the policy making process. Unless there is a strong programme of work on this issue, children will remain excluded.

14. There are also many ways in which parliamentarians could further engage with children and young people. Examples include MP surgeries for children, child friendly versions of calls for evidence for inquiries and more opportunities for children and young people to attend meetings. Currently children regularly attend the APPG on Children but attendance of children and young people could also be extended to other parliamentary meetings.

7) What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

15. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights emphasises the inherent dignity and equal and inalienable rights of all people and provides an excellent guide for values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support. However the current policy context is extremely challenging for human rights, including children's rights. The UK Government has publicly stated that it plans to repeal the Human Rights Act and replace it with a British Bill of Rights, a move that will restrict protections to certain groups. This is part of a wider narrative suggesting an intentional move away from universal international human rights standards. In 2015 the revised Ministerial Code removed a reference to international treaty obligations. In contrast the previous version stated: 'overarching duty on Ministers to comply with the law including international law and treaty obligations and to uphold the administration of justice' but now it simply states that Ministers must comply with 'the law.' CRAE is concerned that the removal of this reference will mean that Ministers will take their obligations under the CRC and other human rights treaties less seriously, which of course includes children's participation rights.

8) Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

16. Age is a barrier to active citizenship. Despite some progress, on the whole children are still not given enough opportunities to have their voices heard and have their views taken seriously, which undermines the civic engagement of children. This barrier is magnified for children from marginalised groups, particularly those from poorer backgrounds, disabled children and refugee children Currently formal decision making processes, especially in relation to policy development and political decisions are not child friendly. It's crucial that child friendly processes and materials are developed. CRAE has demonstrated that even complex documents can be translated into child friendly formats, see for example, our child friendly version of the UN Committee's recommendations to Government:

<http://www.crae.org.uk/news/new-child-friendly-resources-on-childrens-rights/>

Recommendations

1. Action must be taken to further the implementation of the CRC, particularly their participation rights. Their access to active citizenship and civic engagement must be improved.
2. The voting age must be lowered to 16.
3. Citizenship Education should be compulsory for all primary and secondary schools.
4. Support must be given to schools to develop meaningful participation structures which can create an ethos of participation for children.
5. Central government resources should be made available to support children and young people to become active citizens and develop self advocacy.
6. Barriers to active citizenship should be addressed by developing materials that can help children understand and engage with democracy and Government policy making. For example a government commitment to involving children in policy making, sustainable mechanisms put in place, and child friendly versions of policies and consultations.

Children and young people are able to offer excellent insight into their own experiences of citizenship and civic engagement. We hope during the course of this inquiry the Committee will take evidence directly from them. CRAE can help facilitate this process, if helpful.

Christopher Santos-Lang – written evidence (CCE0014)

It is not controversial that different people are better than others at filling different social roles, but there is little general agreement about what those roles happen to be. Some people may even think that we get to invent the way society is divided into social roles—that we have no natural social positions.

I have gathered evidence about the natural structure of society, and it can be found at https://figshare.com/articles/Measuring_evaluative_computational_differences_in_humans/4003407/1

The summary is that humans divide into types that play different roles in a larger machine, much as cells are parts of a human body. The parts are equal in the sense of being interdependent, but not equal in the sense of having equal potential to fill all roles.

This evidence has profound implications for citizenship and civic engagement. Most importantly, what makes the machine we form together valuable is its ability to discern moral truth—individual humans are mere parts of that machine and therefore incompetent to discern moral truth and therefore incompetent to fill the roles usually assigned to them by typical models of citizenship. Of course, this evidence could be misleading, but that is a matter to be investigated, rather than assumed.

The first problem with this evidence is that it probably isn't final. The evidence is a lot like evidence that matter can be divided into elements—over time we may find many more elements than the original evidence could support.

The second problem with this evidence is understanding how to make practical use of it. Trying to respond to this second problem, I have recently written two articles about how the practice of social engineering would need to change to account for interdependence:

<http://grinfree.com/the-political-and-economic-philosophy-of-corporantia/>

<http://grinfree.com/marriage-employment-and-interdependence/>

If you are genuinely seeking an evidence-based understanding of the appropriate relationship between individuals and communities, then these articles are an appropriate response. When the British economy was entangled with slavery, it was inconvenient to genuinely seek an evidence-based understanding of the appropriate relationship between people of different races, and these articles may be inconvenient in a similar way, but inconvenient evidence is better known than hidden.

Church Urban Fund – written evidence (CCE0179)

1. About Church Urban Fund

- 1.1. Church Urban Fund's (CUF) vision is to see people and communities across England flourish and enjoy life in all its fullness.
- 1.2. We work relationally, inclusively and effectively to bring about change through three core programmes:
 - Together: A national network that resources local churches and other groups to respond to social and community issues collaboratively.
 - Near Neighbours: Building social cohesion by bringing together people of different faiths and none, developing leadership skills, and providing opportunities for people to work together to improve their communities.
 - Just Finance Foundation: Helping shape a fairer finance system, including through financial capability training, work with credit unions, promoting savings, and raising awareness.
- 1.3. As the Church of England's social action charity, we have unique access to local communities across England through the parish network. This ensures that all we do is rooted in and informed by real life experience.
- 1.4. Our submission focusses on five of the sets of questions raised by the Call for Evidence. We do not address all the questions in each set, but focus on those on which relate most closely to our work in, and learning from, local communities.

2. (1) What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- 2.1. For us, civic engagement or active citizenship means playing an active part in civil society. This can take many forms from volunteering through to fundraising, advocacy, community-building and political participation or activism.¹⁹⁶ For a healthy society and democracy, it is important that none of these forms are overlooked, or overemphasized at the expense of others.
- 2.2. Civil society can be understood as a space 'between the citizen and the state', characterized by freedom of association, the expression of diverse values and views and the socialization of individuals as 'citizens'.¹⁹⁷
- 2.3. We have identified four of functions of civil society which we believe are of vital importance for civic engagement in contemporary Britain:
 - Fostering cohesive communities in which people can belong, connect and contribute.
 - Building citizenship skills, and the motivation and confidence to use them.
 - Maintaining a healthy democracy by giving expression and representation to diverse views, beliefs, and experiences, including through political participation.
 - Bringing events, activities and projects into being in communities, for community benefit.

¹⁹⁶ Adler, R. P. and Goggin, J. (2005) 'What do we mean by civic engagement?', Journal of Transformative Education, 3, 236-253.

¹⁹⁷ Foley, M. W. and Edwards, B. (1998) Beyond Tocqueville: Civil Society and Social Capital in Comparative Perspective, American Behavioral Scientist, 42, 5-20.

- 2.4. Through our Together and Near Neighbours programmes, CUF is actively involved in furthering all four of these purposes in communities across England. For example, Catalyst, our youth leadership training programme, equips young people to work together to make a positive difference, giving them the skills and confidence needed to be influencers and engaged citizens in a multi-cultural, multi-ethnic society.
 - 2.5. Civic engagement matters because it occurs in an intermediate – and therefore a connecting – space between the state and the people that make up society. What happens in that space determines which voices are heard in public debate; who feels that they ‘belong’; who shapes local and national decision making; and, in turn, whether individuals and communities perceive themselves to be ‘of worth’ to wider society.
 - 2.6. CUF’s work in communities is underpinned by a belief in the dignity, agency, strengths and potential of each individual, and a recognition that everyone has something valuable to contribute within their community and to wider society.
 - 2.7. Civil society, then, is the poorer if any group is excluded (or self-excludes) from civic engagement, whether because of the way in which engagement is sought (or not sought), their education, social norms, lack of financial resources, time poverty, or a perceived or realistic sense that their involvement would make little or no difference.
 - 2.8. Voluntarism is an important facet of civic engagement. However, government and statutory bodies can play an important part in increasing the extent and depth of civic engagement, across all social groups (see Section 4).¹⁹⁸
 - 2.9. In the more deprived communities within which much of our work is focused, many people are accustomed to being ‘done to’, rather than being trusted to work together with professionals, politicians and others to contribute their own knowledge and experience to finding solutions, whether to personal issues, local decision-making, or national government policy. The trend towards co-production arguably has the potential to shift this balance of power in relation to service provision (if adequately resourced), but to foster the same effect in relation to public policy, people in local communities will need to see very tangible evidence of deep listening and responses to what they have to contribute.
 - 2.10. An important function of civil society is to serve as a space within which alternative narratives and perspectives about how we can live together well emerge, are formulated, and are shared and diffused within society. Civic engagement can help ensure that these alternative narratives are communicated in ways that reach into and shape political discourse and policy, ensuring that it is informed by a range of life experiences, beliefs, and understandings of the world that is reflective of the diverse society in which we live.
- 3. (6) Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? [...] Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? [...] What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

- 3.1. Seeing active citizenship as something that takes place largely within the domain of civil society is an important reminder that it is not something that can be imposed by government. It seems unlikely that a compulsory citizenship programme, beyond that delivered as part of school curriculums, would produce life-long ‘active citizens’: as with other components of compulsory education, there is the risk that those who don’t enjoy it simply feel resentful for being forced to engage, and thus become more entrenched in disengagement once the essential requirements have been dispensed with.
- 3.2. Over 430 young people have taken part in Catalyst, Near Neighbours’ exciting and inspirational (voluntary) programme for young people aged 16-30. Catalyst helps participants develop:
 - A positive identity for living in a multi-faith, multi-ethnic Britain.
 - The skills and experience to play their part in building a strong civil society.
 - The confidence and commitment to act as agents of change in their neighborhoods.
- 3.3. Catalyst gives participants practical experience of working towards shared goals with people of different faiths, ethnicities and backgrounds. An evaluation of Catalyst by Coventry University found that 87% of participants felt more prepared and enabled to take on leadership roles within their community. One participant, Jasmin, said:

‘The programme taught me so many new communication, leadership, social, and interfaith skills ... We are not often taught about parliament and politics in school and I must say the sessions we had really pushed my passion in wanting to become an MP and giving back to my town ... I have also been involved in many more initiatives, campaigns, programmes in my community that I would not have dreamt of doing before the programme.’¹⁹⁹
- 3.4. Another way to create active citizens is to give people opportunities to ‘give it a go’. Between September 2011 and March 2017 our Near Neighbours Small Grants programme, funded by the Department for Communities and Local Government, awarded grants to 1,433 projects bringing people from different faith or ethnic groups (including people of no faith) together to make a difference in their communities. Near Neighbours Coordinators can provide guidance at all stages of project development, making the programme a great way for people to ‘get started’ in their communities.
- 3.5. Near Neighbours is having a positive impact on civic engagement. 84% of project leads reported an increase in volunteering in their communities. 69% of projects stated that they would be continuing after the Near Neighbours funding had finished.²⁰⁰
- 3.6. CUF’s Together programme is revitalizing civil society by providing churches and other groups with encouragement, advice, assistance with applying for funding, and relevant training, as they seek to engaging effectively in their communities. An

¹⁹⁹ Church Urban Fund (2017) Impact Report 2016, <https://www.cuf.org.uk/impact-report-2016%20>

- 3.7. In 2016 Together Development Workers supported over 550 projects and activities, and assisted other organisations in securing more than £1,000,000 for community and social action initiatives. Our Together Small Grants scheme supported over 90 community projects in 2016, 69% of which involved local volunteers, helping people develop skills, confidence and experience as active citizens. One such project in the Tees Valley linked newly arrived refugees and asylum seekers with local residents through weekly friendly football matches. These have begun to generate real friendships, dispelling myths and prejudices and building social cohesion.²⁰²
 - 3.8. Places of Welcome, an initiative that emerged from Together, now sees over 150 community spaces being opened up each week to bring people together, encouraging them to actively participate. Some share a skill or interest with others who come along, others help serve drinks or clear up. These may seem like small steps, but they help nurture a sense of belonging, an important precondition for civic engagement.²⁰³
- 4. (7) How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?
- 4.1. We suggest three main ways in which government can support increased civic engagement, in collaboration with other sectors:
 - Resourcing citizens with the skills, inspiration and confidence to engage.
 - Receptivity and responsiveness to civic engagement, demonstrating that it makes a difference.
 - Reshaping culture in the public sphere.²⁰⁴
 - 4.2. Resourcing citizens: Associational activity is an important context for socialization into civic engagement.²⁰⁵ Besides investment in specific programmes that train young people and adults in leadership and citizenship skills (see Section 3), the resourcing of trusted civil society organisations that have strong relationships amongst social groups known to be less active in civic engagement is an important way in which government can help build social capital and civic capacity amongst these groups. The Near Neighbours programme exemplifies this approach.
 - 4.3. Such support needs to be targeted so that it contributes to greater equality of participation in civil society, whilst also deepening integration and cohesion. Supported groups should therefore be able to demonstrate active partnership and collaboration across more than one cultural, religious, ethnic or demographic group.

²⁰⁵ Putnam, R. (2000) Bowling Alone, Simon & Schuster, New York.

- 4.4. Receptivity and responsiveness: A vibrant civil society is a vital component of a healthy democracy, and a key role for government in sustaining such a civil society is to engender trust that it is indeed listening to the diverse voices emerging from it.
- 4.5. People need to see multiple, clear examples of ways in which civic engagement is ‘worth it’, both at local and national level. This is particularly the case amongst sections of the population who feel disconnected from, and poorly served by, the political status quo.
- 4.6. This might require a new approach to communicating with the public about policy decisions. This could involve something as simple as producing ‘You said..., We did ...’ graphics for use on social media, like those used by businesses to indicate that they are listening to their customers. Making the impact of community consultation on policy-making more transparent could incentivize future engagement.
- 4.7. Reshaping culture: ‘Public institutions and political systems need to include the identities and concerns of minority communities to encourage them to participate fully in society’.²⁰⁶ Some positive changes have already taken place in this respect: for example, we now have the most diverse UK Parliament in history. However, further progress is needed, particularly in relation to the representation of people from different socio-economic and educational backgrounds in society-shaping professions such as politics, law, and media. In addition, consideration needs to be given to the meta-narratives underpinning public debate. Whilst secularity has an important part to play in holding the public sphere open for all to participate, a lack of genuine engagement with alternative meta-narratives, such as those of Christianity, Islam and other faiths, can compound segregation and close down opportunities for greater mutual understanding and inclusion.²⁰⁷
 - 5.1. Socio-economic divergence: Many communities and groups feel ‘left behind’ because, in terms of access to financial, political and cultural power, they have been. Earlier this year the Social Mobility Commission reported that new divides have opened up geographically, across income groups, and inter-generationally, and that these are likely to widen.²⁰⁸
 - 5.2. Individualism: The construction of personal identity through achievement and consumption have become dominant cultural currents within our society. These currents inevitably exclude, marginalize and disempower those who are less able to consume, and who do not achieve highly in the particular ways that society has come to value.
 - 5.3. We are now seeing the unravelling of the illusion of the sufficiency of this individualistic narrative. Revitalizing civil society and rediscovering social cohesion will require us to rebalance a proper sense of individual agency, creativity and responsibility with a renewed sense of mutuality, reciprocity and inter-dependence in relationship with others. In this, there is much to be learned from the solidarity and reciprocity that are often more intuitively valued and sustained within more economically deprived communities, and amongst some migrant and ethnic minority communities.

- 5.4. Language and cultural barriers: Limited English skills and particular cultural or religious traditions and beliefs can affect people's ability to be active citizens. There are particular concerns, for example, about the limited opportunities that some Muslim women have to engage with wider society. Experiences of prejudice, discrimination, abuse, or harm – or fear that these may happen in future – can also prevent participation, particularly for religious, ethnic or other minority groups.
 - 5.5. Cultural effects on civic participation are not limited to religious or ethnic minority groups. The decline of the associational life that was once central to white working-class communities, for example, has seen many such communities becoming increasingly characterised by cultural norms that tend towards a lack of civic engagement.
 - 5.6. Economic pressures on households can reduce the time, resources and even emotional capacity for civic engagement by their members. Working hours, working conditions, housing costs and wage levels and the normalization of dual-income households all have a bearing on people's availability to get involved in voluntary activity.²⁰⁹
- 6. (10) How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? [...] How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?
- 6.1. We believe diversity is to be celebrated. It brings a richness and creativity to our workplaces, communities and national life that can benefit us all. However, growing diversity along religious, ethnic and cultural lines means that we all have to work harder at living together well, particularly during times of change.
 - 6.2. Where the lives of individuals or groups are shaped by divergent traditions, beliefs or life experiences, it is likely to take considerable time, effort and commitment for a sense of safety, mutual understanding and partnership to be built. This has not always been sufficiently acknowledged from a policy perspective. Many communities have undergone substantial change in terms of the ethnic and religious composition of their populations, with little recognition or practical support given either to help the pre-existing population adjust to, interact with and begin to understand incoming groups, and vice versa.
 - 6.3. Language barriers make integration much more difficult, and the provision of appropriate English language and cultural education is important. However, these are tools, rather than solutions in their own right. Integration itself is primarily a relational process, worked out at a local level, but in the context of national and international discourses and policies. In this regard, we need to concern ourselves

- 6.4. What seems to have happened is that a version of ‘tolerance’ coined by a liberal elite (whose experience of multi-cultural Britain has often been very different from that of people living in many deprived communities) has been imposed unthinkingly on wider society, particularly through mainstream media. This has closed down space – both in public debate, and to some extent in communities too – for the legitimate discussion of the pain, loss, conflict, competition, and sense of segregation that has resulted from the changing composition of some communities. For some, this contributes to a stronger sense of marginalization and alienation from wider society, whilst others turn to more extreme views and more damaging ways of expressing them.
- 6.5. Integration requires interaction across diversity, encompassing an honest acknowledgement of tensions and differences, a genuine desire to understand the experiences and perspectives of others, and a commitment to trying to see all people as valuable and unique fellow human beings. Through our Near Neighbours and Together programmes, Church Urban Fund are actively engaged in facilitating these kinds of connections and relationships in local communities, and our newest initiative, ‘Real People Honest Talk’ is designed specifically to generate the kinds of genuine interaction and relationships across difference that we believe are crucial to a more cohesive society.

CitizED – written evidence (CCE0119)

CitizED is an international network of academics focusing on many aspects of citizenship education with particular emphasis on research and scholarship about and for teacher education and school-based learning and teaching. An international journal published by Intellect (Citizenship Teaching and Learning) was launched by CitizED in July 2005 and allows for the publication of academic empirical and philosophical articles that are professionally relevant. It is the journal of the Children's Identity and Citizenship European Association (<http://www.cicea.eu/>) Since 2005 an annual citizED conference has taken place bringing together academics and professionals from around the world. Since 2010 our conferences have taken place at St. Andrews University, UK (2010); USA (2011); York, UK (2012); Japan (2013); Birmingham, UK (2014); Singapore (2015); Birmingham (2016); Seoul (2017). CitizED works in partnership with a wide variety of individuals and organisations (e.g., recent work has taken place at a character education and citizenship education seminar involving many of the key NGOs and professional bodies for citizenship education in England, hosted by the Jubilee Centre, University of Birmingham and citizED at St. George's House, Windsor in June 2017; the Children's Identity and Citizenship Education Association at their international conference in Bruges in June 2017; and also with very many national bodies through our international conferences). This statement is submitted following discussion and endorsement at the editorial committee of Citizenship Teaching and Learning.

1. Background to citizenship education

Although there were some exceptions, explicit and professional forms of citizenship education have developed only since the 1970s.

There are several factors that justify the need for citizenship education. Research shows that children and young people have the ability and interest to understand societal issues, need to know about the world around them and require support in order to understand and develop the skills to take part. Evidence of weak understandings and low engagement needs to be continually addressed.

The educational response to societal challenges has been mixed. Various forms of social studies education have been prominent at different points. This in part has been helpful insofar as it indicates dynamism and a willingness to innovate. It also indicates the risk of instability where there are shifting characterisations in the face of current political preferences without the achievement of an academically coherent, professionally established and broadly accepted body of knowledge. The 1970s saw the rise of political education and political literacy that focused on issues, procedural values and developing a proclivity to action; the 1980s witnessed the rise of adjectival or so-called new educations (global education, development education, peace, anti-sexist, anti-racist and others) which was seen by some as fragmented, and politically motivated (or engaged) and, in some cases, closely connected with the affective; the early 1990s saw a form of citizenship education that emphasised the so-called “4th dimension” of volunteering. Crick’s characterisation of citizenship education as social and moral responsibility, community involvement and political literacy was a refreshingly high status, well considered commitment. The version of the national curriculum for citizenship up to 2013 was informed by much research and professional reflection highlighting key concepts (rights and responsibility; democracy and justice; identities and diversity); key processes (critical thinking and enquiry; advocacy and representation; participation and taking informed and responsible action); and content (local, national and international). Until approximately 2013 citizenship education was researched and evaluated principally by the National Foundation for Educational Research (see <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/cels/>) and Ofsted (see <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/citizenship-consolidated-a-survey-of-citizenship-in-schools>) and many other organisations and individuals (e.g. see Professor Paul Whiteley’s ‘Does Citizenship Education Work?’ <https://academic.oup.com/pa/article/67/3/513/1457180/Does-Citizenship-Education-Work-Evidence-from-a>). Citizenship education has been retained as a National Curriculum subject since 2014.

2. Key issues

- Extensive research and evaluation (see above) shows citizenship education - up to 2013 - to be successful in helping young people to understand and develop the skills to take part. There has been only limited wide-ranging research or evaluation in England since 2013. The current characterisation of citizenship in the National Curriculum for England (UK government; UK law and justice system; volunteering; thinking critically about political questions and managing money on a day-to-day basis) is not based on research, not evaluated and low status.
- Since approximately 2008 and very noticeably since 2010 there has been an obvious decline in official support for citizenship education. This is in part due to a more precisely focused approach on other school subjects; significant changes in teacher training with less input by higher education where expertise is to be more easily found than in schools; and a more centrally directed and locally devolved approach to school governance in which attention is less likely to be focused on lower status subjects such as citizenship.
- The above policy changes have led to operational difficulties for citizenship education. There is regional imbalance in the availability of expertise; it is particularly difficult to develop work in the primary phase where subject expertise can be under-developed; the links between initial teacher education and professional development for serving teachers are weak.
- Challenges remain in relation to many areas in citizenship education e.g., assessment of young people’s understanding and skills of engagement; learning and teaching methods to support learning about and for and through diversity; learning how to use social media as new forms of democratic engagement; European and global matters; exploring connections with personal dimensions of public life through character education.

3. Recommendations

3.1 Strategic development

We believe there should be an explicit five-year strategy on citizenship education to develop work in this area. The strategy would cover issues related to initial teacher education and continuing professional development and ways of developing collaboration between key networks and groups within and beyond higher education, government departments and agencies and NGOs. This should apply to all phases of education from early years through to compulsory and post compulsory contexts. In our international network we are alert to the significant and possibly increasing challenges to education for democracy in many countries. It seems to us obvious that we need now perhaps more than ever before to improve citizenship education and there are clear opportunities for the UK to (again) take a leadership position in this important work.

3.2 Necessary investigations and initiatives

(a) Explore and clarify the nature of subject knowledge for teaching citizenship. This will help the process of selection and recruitment to programmes of teacher education as well as ensuring that tutors can assist the development of trainees' and teachers' understandings and practices with more skill than sometimes occurs currently.

(b) Develop understanding of assessment.

(c) Develop teachers' roles in promoting democratic understanding and practice appropriate for a diverse society.

(d) Emphasise international dimensions. This should be done to ensure an appropriate status for citizenship education and thus assist with the process of implementation. It will also ensure that we will develop citizenship that is appropriate within a nation state and elsewhere. (Recent work in Australia where a National Curriculum is being developed for the first time is of particular immediate interest and potential benefit to our thinking and practice). Notions of global citizenship are important within and beyond England.

4. Statement on citizenship education

We wish to draw to the attention of the Committee to a Statement on citizenship education which has been an indication of our core views for many years.

Citizens in a democratic society have a fundamental responsibility to engage in public life. Teachers and students have an obligation to promote equality, justice, respect for others and democratic participation.

These ideals should be integral to cultures of educational institutions and embedded within and beyond the curriculum beginning with the youngest age group and continuing throughout, and after, compulsory phases. Education for democratic citizenship is therefore a core purpose of teaching and learning within and beyond schools.

Citizenship education has a strong conceptual core. Subject knowledge for teaching is increasingly defined and distinctive and includes rights and responsibilities, government and democracy, identities and communities at local, national and global levels.

A curriculum for citizenship will be enquiry based, with students making connections between their own and others' experiences, learning to think critically about society and take action for social justice.

Educational institutions where this is achieved embody learning for citizenship in their organisational leadership and in their self-evaluation. Citizenship education enhances the professional values and practices of teachers and others.

Citizenship education requires students to consider public and individual issues of an ethical and political nature. These issues will be topical and often controversial. Effective education for citizenship includes the integration of conceptual understanding and the skills for civic engagement.

Citizenship education requires an integrated approach to assessment which incorporates evidence about knowledge, skills and understanding, values, dispositions and social action. The overall assessment must integrate learners' self-evaluations and reflections which take account of others' observations and the teachers' evaluations of pupils.

Citizenship education is drawn from a shared values framework and informs a wider educational strategy and ethos.

Specialist citizenship teachers thus possess distinctive knowledge, skills and dispositions. They have a strong sense of the specific potential of their work and through purposeful teaching, learning and assessment engage and empower young people.

Citizenship and Civic Engagement Working Group Faculty of Humanities, The University of Manchester – written evidence (CCE0171)

The Citizenship and Civic Integration Working Group is a group of academics within The University of Manchester's Faculty of the Humanities, convened to discuss the questions and wider issues raised by the Committee's call for evidence.

Summary and recommendations

Three key themes recur throughout our answers, and form the basis of three overall recommendations we would like to advance from the beginning:

- Diversity, of culture, language, and communities, is not only the truth of Britain today, but has been a central part of British society for centuries. A new approach to British citizenship must proceed from the recognition of diversity as a historical and contemporary norm of life in Britain and acknowledge that many of the values we celebrate today are neither exclusive to Britain, nor originated here. We recommend that policymakers move away from any backward looking attempt to derive 'British values' from an imagined mono-cultural and mono-linguistic past, and base this new drive toward a renewed civic engagement on the strength and connection to the world that our diversity gives us in the present, and in the future.
- We consistently return to the value of demonstration, 'showing, not telling'. Broadcasting values, whether through the television or the classroom, will not help them to take root in our society. People learn through lived experience. We recommend that the Committee prioritises activities and initiatives that allow individuals and groups (potential citizens, new citizens, and established citizens) to meet, interact, communicate, and practise the civic values we seek to encourage.
- Finally, it is essential that the Committee avoids making a responsibility to conform a concern only for 'problem' groups who do not 'fit in'. We recommend that the Committee pays particular attention to the measures it goes on to recommend, and ensures that, wherever possible, the obligations and responsibilities are identified as collective and the values we seek to promote derived from honest conversation between groups, rather than an imposition of one particular tradition or group of traditions over others.

Citizenship and civic engagement matter because there can be no functioning democracy without them. A democratic society cannot be sustained without a meaningful concept of citizenship, and a citizenry with the capabilities and opportunities to meaningfully enact it.

1.2

The relationship of citizenship to identity is complex, but it is essential that the former is not reduced to a question of the latter. Identity too often builds a common bond in opposition to, and at the expense of, an 'other'. For a concept of citizenship to genuinely build cohesion in a complex and diverse society, it must be a positive and unifying vision, not simply a repetition and legitimisation of an existing 'us and them' mentality.

1.3

We are concerned that too close a proximity between a concept of citizenship and the idea of 'national identity' risks excluding groups who do not subscribe to, or recognise, the vision of the nation contained within the latter. Further, we must remain mindful that civic engagement should include and be open to those who are not citizens but are long-term residents in Britain (who we may term 'denizens').

1.4

Any concept of a 'national identity' that seeks to privilege one aspect of that history, or the history of one of Britain's many cultural communities, over another will only result in the exclusion of citizens from participation on the basis of a misunderstanding of the United Kingdom's history and traditions.

The fact is that the United Kingdom has never existed as a mono-cultural or mono-lingual society; diversity has been a constituent part of our nation's history for the entirety of its recorded history. This diversity, and the wealth of connections to other peoples and places that it represents, should be the foundation for any modern sense of 'British' citizenship or identity.

2: Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Citizenship ceremonies developed from a broad-based perspective with a view to reconciling UK communities. However, we are concerned that making ceremonies exclusively for new arrivals has the unintended consequence of turning immigrants into a perceived ‘problem group’, who require additional measures to join the community of citizens.

2.2

Citizenship ceremonies also play into the sense that citizenship is prescriptive. That is, that it is the place of the state to define a series of political and cultural values to which people must conform in order to be citizens. We believe that there are better ways to confer, celebrate, and to deepen a sense of citizenship.

2.3

We recommend the British government plays a key role in showing, rather than telling, citizens about ‘British’ values. Leading by example, rather than attempting to teach a way of life ‘by rote’, would make for a more engaging and participatory approach to encouraging civic engagement among citizens.

Currently, citizenship ceremonies are private, but we believe that there is a role here for wider public engagement. We note the example of Canada, whose citizenship ceremonies often bring in the wider community. We recognise that this already occurs to a limited extent in the UK, but central and local government could consider a more systematic approach to, for example, bringing schools into citizenship ceremonies, both as venues and school-age children as attendees.

3: Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

We believe that the ambiguities surrounding contemporary citizenship reinforces the need for the United Kingdom to consider a codified, written constitution, with a clearly enumerated bill of rights and responsibilities.

3.2

This should proceed on the basis of a wide-ranging consultation exercise, developing into a constitutional convention. This exercise must be designed to take in the widest variety of viewpoints, opening a genuine conversation with the groups and communities that do not currently engage in formal political processes.

An example of how this could be accomplished can be found in Canada's experience of developing its "New Charter of Rights and Freedoms".

4: Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1

We believe that the extension of the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds, and the implementation of lifetime electoral registration, would both be positive developments for political and civic participation in this country.

4.2

‘Political literacy’ should be an important part of civic education. Young people and new arrivals should be taught about the structure and opportunities to participate in each different level of UK government, and also the political parties, ideas and issues that make up our political landscape.

Civic education should not be limited to schools and other educational and immigration-related institutions. We recommend that the committee investigate the ways in which civic engagement can be promoted and facilitated in the workplace and through existing social and civic spaces, for example, sports clubs, churches, trades unions. For a genuine commitment to civic participation to take hold, all citizens must have the opportunity and encouragement to continually practise, maintain and enhance their status as a citizen.

We would note that UK higher education has taken some positive steps towards facilitating these kinds of activities through their ‘social responsibility’ initiatives. We believe that these initiatives would be useful examples for the Committee to examine closely while developing proposals for encouraging political engagement.

5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education has a fundamental role in supporting all citizens to be active citizens. We must begin with the caveat that making children and immigrants the two focuses for citizenship education and intervention represents what is known in academic circles as a ‘deficit approach’. Through it, we risk identifying groups of people who are missing something and sets out to correct their deficit, rather than focusing on the wider obligations of the public sphere to those groups and the importance of participation and civic engagement among every class, group, or community in the UK today.

We would observe that the current form of citizenship education in schools is highly prescriptive, which is problematic in two ways; it attempts to teach, rather than to show (i.e. through participatory activity), and it funnels citizenship education into a curricular/qualification approach that may be appropriate for basic literacy, numeracy, and science skills but is wholly inadequate for the preparation of young people for civic participation.

We recommend restructuring our approach to civic education to prioritise activities that will give young people genuine experience of connecting with their communities and interacting with people from a diverse range of backgrounds and perspectives. We believe that these activities, with an emphasis upon mutual recognition and respect, will do more to give students the capability to exercise civic engagement than any amount of ‘broadcast’ lessons that set out values without offering any form of demonstration or experience to reinforce them.

5.4

Part of these activities should also be the discussion of political issues, even those of a controversial nature. Children must be encouraged to reflect on, and contribute to, the issues that face us all as a society. In the course of these discussions, the values of respect must be reinforced (both respecting the right of each student to their opinion, and ensuring awareness that each student’s right is based on their responsibility to respect that right for others). Of course, such discussions must be carefully and sensitively managed, but if we are to place the expectation of responsible citizenship upon our young adults, we have to treat them as adults and properly prepare them to contribute to our national conversations when they become citizens.

Finally, we would reflect that the power of example also has to extend to schools themselves. For example, the value of democracy is unlikely to grow deep roots in a learning environment that does not offer the opportunity for democratic participation. We believe that this example in the German education system show how schools could successfully begin to integrate more student participation into their organisations, and in so doing, mitigate the risk of an apparent double standard between the values taught in a civics lesson and the values practised every day in the corridors and halls.

6: Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1

Our main reservation with the National Citizenship Service, in its current form, is that the experience and skills required to build the capacity for civic engagement is being diluted by the Scheme's focus on job skills and UCAS statement-building activities.

6.2

The focus of the NCS should be upon the experience and commitments of citizenship as a specific aspect of people's lives, and the ways in which that citizenship can be enacted in society. What we actually appear to have is a National Volunteering Service, which is worthwhile in itself but is not a preparation for the rights and responsibilities of active citizenship. It is on this basis that we recommend either the abolition, re-branding, or substantial restructuring, of NCS activities to reflect the objectives it aims to meet – whether that is as a skills service, volunteering service, or citizenship service.

We would also draw attention towards more positive ways to celebrate citizenship. In Australia and Canada, for example, there are public celebration days that celebrate citizenship. Events which encourage all citizens to celebrate citizenship together should be commissioned and promoted by all levels of government in order to forge closer social bonds between different generations and communities.

7: How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Key to this question remains the kinds of activities that constitute civic engagement. Civic engagement cannot just be a euphemism for volunteer work, especially not if that work consists of traditional ‘employability’ skill-building, or as a free replacement for essential civic and social services that have been withdrawn as a result of funding cuts.

7.2

Essential to supporting genuine civic engagement activities is support for the spaces that enable citizens to meet and to act in common. Across the country, these spaces have been closed, but these closures preclude any chance for citizens (no matter how well educated in their rights and responsibilities) to realise their role as citizens and participate in the shared life of their communities.

8: What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

8.1

The framing of these values is of crucial importance. We believe that any attempt to claim values as distinctly 'British' will perpetuate the kinds of exclusionary, 'us and them' thinking, from which our country must move on.

8.2

We recommend recognising that the values that sustain citizenship in the United Kingdom as values shared by countries and cultures across the democratic world. Rather than imply a sense of distinctiveness, and risk generating attitudes of superiority, in the pursuit and enjoyment of freedom, we recommend anchoring the values of UK citizenship in the common pursuit of shared objectives with citizens of other countries. Building this connection will also engage our citizenry in the collective pursuit of maintaining and strengthening liberal democracy around the world.

We would caution against the language of 'threats' to values, which tends to become a tool for targeting and stigmatising groups within our society. Whilst there will always be criminal elements in every community who claim political and ideological justification for their actions, we believe that government focus should remain on the confident and positive demonstration of Britain's civic values, and not on the defensive pursuit of perceived 'threats'.

9: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

We have to recognise the implementation of spending cuts as a major barrier to civic participation. When the pressures of low wage growth, precarious employment, reduced state benefits, and reduced support services make subsistence a key day-to-day issue facing many families and individuals, it is not surprising that meaningful civic engagement comes as a low, if not non-existent, priority.

We must also recognise the challenges presented by evidence of increasing racism and xenophobia in Britain’s national discourse, and on our streets. Especially in the period following the ‘Leave’ vote in the EU referendum – although we must be clear that this was not the beginning of this trend. Hate crimes, hate speech, and the general perception of increasing discrimination in the UK, all inhibit individuals and groups from minority communities within the UK from entering the public space or from participating fully in the political life of our country. It is essential that this barrier, and its causes, are urgently recognised and overcome.

10: How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

We want to begin by emphasising that ‘integration’ needs to be understood as participation, not assimilation. Any attempt to think in terms of integration necessarily calls forth a monolithic concept of ‘society’ or ‘identity’ into which the particular individual must be integrated. This is a recipe for continuing exclusion, as no such monolithic entity actually exists and every individual, group, and community will constantly be under scrutiny to live up to a mythical and unachievable ideal.

10.2

British society is diverse. It is multi-cultural and multi-lingual. Social cohesion requires social and intercultural communication between the diverse traditions and perspectives that constitutes our shared society. It also requires resistance to stereotyping of how different communities or groups behave and the values that they hold and recognition of the multiple identities and affiliations that all of us possess in society. We recommend that the language of ‘integration’ be replaced by the language, and the objective, of ‘participation’.

The key to concurrent increases in diversity and participation is communication. Communication and interaction across cultural and social distinctions, such as class, race, religion, and so on. Cohesion can be achieved through communication, participation and interaction between diverse individuals and groups.

11: How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

We are concerned that the focus on English language skills is misplaced, and plays again into the ‘deficit discourse’ that forces a responsibility to conform onto individuals who don’t ‘measure up’ or ‘fit in’. It is regrettable that multi-lingualism is often viewed with suspicion, rather than being celebrated as an important asset in a globalised world.

11.2

We believe that that Britain’s status, centuries-long, as a genuinely multi-lingual country should be recognised and celebrated as one of our greatest values. Instead of painting multi-lingual Britain as a symptom of a fractured or divided country (often, on the basis of a history that is misrepresented as mono-lingual), the connections that our diverse language communities represent between Britain and the rest of the world should be seen and celebrated as a source of power and pride.

Nonetheless, the provision of ESOL classes is key for newcomers to the country. Local authority provision of ESOL classes has been cut drastically and this needs to be reversed. A model to examine would be that of Germany where newcomers have access to subsidised or free language courses and orientations to the country. This should all form part of a more holistic approach to language education for a diverse society in a diverse and interconnected world. It should not be seen as a remedy to manage assimilation or address deficits.

12: Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

We would draw attention to the 2012 Olympic Games as a stand-out example of ‘showing’ our values, not ‘teaching’ our values.

12.2

We also believe that great examples can be found in the artists, sportspeople, and leaders who have overcome exclusion and discrimination in their personal lives, but gone on to achieve great success and become role models for inclusion and openness in modern Britain; examples include:

- Mo Farrah
- Sadiq Khan
- Benjamin Zephaniah
- Ruth Davidson

We would recommend learning from these, and the hundreds of other great examples that exist in British public life. Once again, demonstrating values, rather than using the ‘bully pulpit’ approach of telling somehow ‘deficient’ individuals the values that they need to live up to in order fit into a preconceived notion of British society.

Finally, we would reiterate our belief that successful social cohesion in the contemporary UK cannot be achieved by ‘heavy duty civics’ lessons, nor by the expectation that it is the responsibility of the individual to change who they are in order to fit in. The values of modern British citizenship must be derived from an open and inclusive conversation between every individual, community and group that makes up modern Britain.

12.4

Those values will only be learned by shared experience and the focus of government efforts should be on removing the obstacles and creating the conditions for these experiences to take place.

Citizenship Foundation – written evidence (CCE0195)

Summary

The Citizenship Foundation is pleased to provide evidence to the Select Committee. For 28 years, we have helped young people become active, engaged and motivated young citizens – through our citizenship programmes and through our advocacy of high-quality citizenship education within schools. However, we live in extra-ordinary times, with faith in democratic society undermined and society more polarised. We are calling for Government to take the lead in developing a national consensus on action to breathe new life and confidence into democratic society, through encouraging active citizenship.

Recommendations:

Question 1

- (a) We recommend that action should be particularly focused to help younger generations become active citizens, especially but not exclusively through the education system.
- (b) We urge Government, alongside Parliament, to take a lead in developing a national consensus on action to breathe new life and confidence into democratic society, through encouraging active citizenship.

- (c) We urge that citizenship ceremonies and events do not become a distraction from the more important tasks of encouraging action and engagement, and equipping people with the tools they need to act.
- (d) We would like to see Government and others encourage pride in being an active citizen – making a positive contribution to your society to the best of your ability – whether that is be at a local, national, or global level, rather than focusing on encouraging pride in being British.

Question 3

- (e) We recommend that Government should consider setting down citizenship rights and responsibilities in the form of a Citizenship Compact.
- (f) They must include a responsibility for citizens to actively participate in their society; and a corresponding right to the education they need in order to have the knowledge, skills and confidence to actively participate.

Question 4

- (g) The vision should be for a society of active citizens where voting is the starting-point of engagement, rather than the end-point.

- (h) A review should be undertaken on the potential impact on attitudes towards voting if it became compulsory.*
- (i) We recommend that Government seeks mechanisms, for example, through the National Insurance system, to auto-enrol citizens on the electoral register. Colleagues and higher education institutions should be required to register all of their students en masse.*
- (j) Serious consideration should be given to lowering the voting age to 16, to encourage the habit of voting from the start.*
- (k) We urge the Government to reconsider extending the franchise to those residents who have demonstrated a long-term commitment to the UK and may be active citizens if not UK citizens.*

- l. We urge Government to fully commit to supporting citizenship education for all students, from primary through to university level.*
- m. Citizenship as a national curriculum subject should be extended to include primary level as well as secondary; furthermore, it should become a statutory right in the same way that religious education is – and thus include all schools regardless of their status. No child should be excluded from learning essential citizenship knowledge and skills.*
- n. Provision and promotion of citizenship opportunities for all students should become a requirement of further and higher education institutions, in the same way that it is a requirement on them to make provision for the prevention of extremism.*
- o. The content of the Citizenship National Curriculum Programmes of Study should be reviewed, to incorporate more opportunities for active citizenship experiences, and active learning.*
- p. The DfE should provide support for the development of Citizenship teaching, including: evaluation of current standards of teaching through a continuation of the longitudinal study, provision of support for citizenship teaching through training and resources for teachers.*
- q. Support should be provided to NGOs which support schools with active citizenship schemes, to relieve pressure on schools, and enable NGOs to help all schools regardless of their ability to pay.*

Question 6

- r. We urge that support from government for citizenship programmes should reach beyond NCS, to ensure that there are a multiplicity of opportunities at different points in young people's journeys rather than a one-size-fits-all approach which would reduce choice. Involvement in NCS will then be an important milestone on a continuous active citizenship journey.*

Introduction

The Citizenship Foundation is pleased to provide evidence to this Inquiry into Citizenship and Civic Engagement. In our view, it is very timely. There is an urgent need for co-ordinated action by Government, and others, to strengthen the opportunities for all people, and particularly young people, to engage in democratic society.

The Citizenship Foundation is a UK-based charity. We have 28 years' experience in helping young people gain the knowledge, skills and confidence they need in order to make an effective contribution to society, and help shape its future in a rapidly changing world. We work both in the UK and in partnership across Europe and globally. We deliver a range of projects and programmes to enable young people to have first-hand citizenship experiences. We also provide topical teaching resources, and training for teachers. We work alongside other organisations to advocate for a national consensus on the importance of high-quality citizenship education for all young people.

Examples of our work include:

- Our Mock Trials competitions²¹¹, which give tens of thousands of young people the opportunity to understand the legal justice system - held in real courtrooms, supported by legal professionals and overseen by senior judges and magistrates.
- Our 'SMSC'²¹² resources for primary school children, which help prepare young children for life in the modern world.
- Our child-led *Make a Difference Challenge*²¹³ social action programme for primary schools, which supports our youngest citizens in making a positive difference to their communities.
- Our Experts in Schools programmes²¹⁴, which support volunteers from the legal, financial, and political professions to go into schools to help pupils understand about aspects of the law, or the economy, or politics which are particularly relevant to young people.
- Our *Young Citizens Passport*²¹⁵, in its 16th edition, distributed to generations of young people, which is a succinct and accessible guide to young citizens' legal rights and responsibilities.

²¹⁵ Young Citizens Passport

- Our *Brexit for Young People*²¹⁶ pack, which helps young people decide what’s important for them from the Brexit negotiations, so they can articulate these as citizens.

We have focused our responses on the first six questions, which are most pertinent to our work.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 How we define Citizenship: When the Citizenship Foundation talks about ‘Citizenship’, we are referring to an activity - participation in society - rather than ‘membership’ of Britain by virtue of fulfilling certain criteria, or the passive holding of certain rights and responsibilities. In so doing, we set the bar for Citizenship at a high level. It entails the duty, as well as the right, to participate actively in the life of our democratic society to the best of one’s opportunities and abilities. Alongside this goes the right to the opportunities to learn the knowledge and develop the skills and attitudes needed to be able to participate.

1.2 We choose this definition because we believe the more that people are engaged and motivated to take action to improve their communities, the more effective our democratic society will become. The more effective our democratic society, the more our society will be fair and inclusive. Conversely, the more people become passive, disengaged and unmotivated to make a positive contribution, the less effective democracy will be, and the more fractured and unfair our society will become.

1.3 Why this matters: We are extremely concerned that this latter description has been the direction of travel in recent years. Our society is facing serious challenges, with many people’s faith in the way that our democracy operates being shaken. Healthy scepticism towards politics has turned into contempt and even hatred, and this has spread to other institutions including the legal system, the media and even charities. Society feels more polarised, and lack of opportunities for integration – as highlighted most recently by the Casey Review into Opportunity and Integration – make it less likely that people will engage with those holding different views.

1.4 The urgency of the situation means that urgent action is needed.

Recommendations

- (a) We recommend that action should be particularly focused to help younger generations become active citizens, especially but not exclusively through the education system.*
- (b) We urge Government, alongside Parliament, to take a lead in developing a national consensus on action to breathe new life and confidence into democratic society, through encouraging active citizenship.*

²¹⁶ Better Brexit for Young People

1.5 This will involve people understanding how our democratic institutions work, developing the sense of agency that they can make a difference, no matter who they are, and the confidence to take part. It will also involve them in developing the skills to engage in debates and the decision-making processes – and then taking action.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 Potential distraction of citizenship ceremonies/events: Whilst there may be a role for such ceremonies and events, and for encouraging people’s identity as “member-citizens”, we believe that this is not the solution to the great challenges described above. Indeed, because such events are tangible and easily organised/measured, they might be latched onto as easy fixes, and distract attention from the more difficult but infinitely more important tasks of encouraging action and engagement, and equipping people with the tools they need to act. It would be the equivalent of focusing all the attention on the degree ceremony and little on the work needed to get the degree. 2.2 There might also be a danger that a focus on highlighting ‘citizenship-as-membership/identity’, if overused, might raise barriers between people rather than promote integration.

2.3 Multiple levels of society, not just UK-wide: The focus of Citizenship should instead be about enabling people to play an informed and active part in their society. Different people will have different and overlapping ideas of what their society entails. For some, it will primarily be their local community or town. For others it might be their region, or their particular nation within the UK. For others it might be Britain. And for still others, they might identify more closely with international communities or global society as a whole – particularly for younger people, where they may feel members of global communities through social media. For many people, the reality is that it will be a combination of these. Playing an active and informed role in one does not have to be to the exclusion of another.

2.4 Pride in being an active citizen: Whilst there may be a place for encouraging pride in being British, in the context of the discussion around Citizenship, we do not believe that this is the correct focus.

Recommendations

(c) We urge that citizenship ceremonies and events do not become a distraction.

(d) We would like to see Government and others encourage pride in being an active citizen – making a positive contribution to your society to the best of your ability – whether that is be at a local, national, or global level.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1 Citizenship Compact: We believe that the process of leaving the European Union gives an opportunity for the UK to re-appraise the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. There should be a national debate led by Government on what constitutes the rights and responsibilities of citizenship in the UK, with the intention of producing a Citizenship Compact.

3.2 We accept that this will be controversial, and that there will be many views on what the extent those rights and responsibilities should be. However, the debate itself – in raising the questions of what explicitly should be expected of individuals to contribute, and how individuals can expect to be able to take part – will be extremely valuable. The Government has led a similar debate on what constitutes British Values. Whilst the values themselves are hotly contested, the debate has encouraged many to consider what values they would like Britain to have, and how they feel Britain measures up to them.

3.3 We also believe that such a Citizenship Compact would be useful within an education context, in helping young people to understand, and critically engage with, their rights and responsibilities.

3.4 As explained above, we believe that the rights and responsibilities should not be focused on a set of passive ‘rules of the club and rights of the club members’ – but should focus on active participation.

Recommendations

(e) We recommend that Government should consider setting down citizenship rights and responsibilities in the form of a Citizenship Compact.

(f) They must include a responsibility for citizens to actively participate in their society; and a corresponding right to the education they need in order to have the knowledge, skills and confidence to actively participate.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1 Voting: In line with our view that the focus of Citizenship should be active participation in society, we would encourage Government to review current laws to remove such restrictions on participation where they exist:

- We are struck by the apparent anomaly that it is a legal duty, as a citizen, to take part in a jury in a trial of a fellow citizen when called on to do so; but it is not a legal duty, as a citizen, to take part in the election of a government. We believe there is a strong moral responsibility to take part in voting, if not also the need for a legal duty to do so too. There are cases where legislation has helped to change long-standing social norms: compulsory wearing of seat-belts, and the ban on smoking in confined public areas are two examples.

- It is a disgrace that many citizens are not even registered to vote. This has been a particular problem affecting young people. We also note that in the Referendum on Scottish Independence, high numbers of 16-18 year olds were motivated to take part, and that this is likely to have a positive impact upon future voting turnout – because voting is habit forming.
- We are struck by the number of long-term residents in the UK, who are not ‘citizens’ of the UK in the sense of ‘citizen-members’ and thus do not have a vote in some elections, but are very much active citizens within society.

4.2 Voting as a start-point: Notwithstanding these comments, making it a responsibility (and as easy as possible) to vote is not enough. Recent concerns about the impact of fake news on elections shows that it is more vital than ever that electorates have the means to think critically about the information they are being given, to question why they are being told what they are, and to come to their own conclusions having weighed up the information. In short, the need for informed, engaged, politically-literate, and confident citizens has never been greater.

4.3 The Citizenship Foundation believes society should be aspiring for so much more from its citizens than simply putting a cross on a ballot paper every few years. That might be through volunteering, involvement in politics, campaigning, or another form of social action.

Recommendations

- g. The vision should be for a society of active citizens where voting is the starting-point of engagement, rather than the end-point.*
- h. A review should be undertaken on the potential impact on attitudes towards voting if it became compulsory.*
- i. We recommend that Government seeks mechanisms, for example, through the National Insurance system, to auto-enrol citizens on the electoral register. Colleagues and higher education institutions should be required to register all of their students en masse.*
- j. Serious consideration should be given to lowering the voting age to 16, to encourage the habit of voting from the start.*
- k. We urge the Government to reconsider extending the franchise to those who have demonstrated a long-term commitment to the UK.*

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1 Citizenship education for all young people – nobody excluded: The role of the education system is, in our view, pivotal to our vision of active citizenship. Every young person has a right to the high-quality citizenship teaching they need to develop the knowledge, skills and confidence to be active citizens. As a society we should no more accept exceptions to this than we would accept exceptions to young people having high-quality English or mathematics teaching. Nobody expects a young person to acquire numerical skills without being taught; neither should we expect young people to acquire citizenship skills without this.

5.2 We are far away from this ideal, and the direction of travel in recent years has been in the wrong direction. Whilst Citizenship has remained a National Curriculum subject at secondary level, the proportion of schools subject to the National Curriculum (local authority controlled) has declined rapidly with the growth of academies and free schools. Moreover, the Programmes of Study which have been in place since 2015 put a stronger emphasis on constitutional history and volunteerism, and are weaker on active citizenship and involvement in the political process. The regulatory focus on the new English Baccalaureate has meant a narrowing of the subject focus in many schools – not all National Curriculum subjects are treated equally. From 2001-10, the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study, run by the National Foundation for Educational Research (NFER) and funded by the Department for Education, was invaluable in assessing the quality and impact of citizenship education, and helping to raise standards. There is currently no national evaluation study, and this makes it extremely difficult to support schools to improve provision. The findings of the longitudinal study²¹⁷ had shown that where citizenship education was taught regularly and consistently from a young age through to 18, planned by coordinators trained in Citizenship, taught by specialist teachers, and included planned assessment, whether through GCSE or another means, it had the greatest impact on young peoples' confidence, engagement with local issues, future voting behaviour, and future participation in their community. Yet bursaries to train new citizenship teachers have been cut, and there is little support for training current teachers. Numbers of specialist citizenship teachers continue to decline. Support for organisations like the Citizenship Foundation, which provides resources, training and advice to teachers on citizenship education, has been withdrawn – and we now have to charge schools to help cover costs. With school budgets increasingly focused on the English Baccalaureate, many schools struggle to pay despite wanting our support.

²¹⁷ <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/cels/resource1/>

Recommendations

- l. We urge Government to fully commit to supporting citizenship education for all students, from primary through to university level.*
- m. Citizenship as a national curriculum subject should be extended to include primary level as well as secondary; furthermore, it should become a statutory right in the same way that religious education is – and thus include all schools regardless of their status. No child should be excluded from learning essential citizenship knowledge and skills.*
- n. Provision and promotion of citizenship opportunities for all students should become a requirement of further and higher education institutions, in the same way that it is a requirement on them to make provision for the prevention of extremism.*
- o. The content of the Citizenship National Curriculum Programmes of Study should be reviewed, to incorporate more opportunities for active citizenship experiences, and active learning.*
- p. The DfE should provide support for the development of Citizenship teaching, including: evaluation of current standards of teaching through a continuation of the longitudinal study, provision of support for citizenship teaching through training and resources for teachers.*
- q. Support should be provided to NGOs which support schools with active citizenship schemes, to relieve pressure on schools, and enable NGOs to help all schools regardless of their ability to pay.*

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 We agree that it is important that all young people have the opportunities to practice being active citizens from a young age. This active learning approach puts them in good stead to continue being active citizens into adulthood.

6.2 Since 2010, the National Citizen Service has been the focus of government efforts to support voluntary citizenship programmes for young people. We support the NCS, in being an important rite of passage for young people on their citizenship journey, and NCS evidence is that it is an experience which is valued by the young people who take part.

6.3 Notwithstanding this, we believe it is important that:

- NCS should not to the detriment of the many other excellent citizenship programmes which are run by voluntary sector organisations, and which in recent years have had government support reduced or withdrawn. The Citizenship Foundation’s Giving Nation programme, for example, has been running for 15 years but in the past few years has had to reduce its scope because government funding support has been withdrawn. It encourages young people to take the lead in devising projects to support a social cause, and then to run that project. Originally funded by the Cabinet Office, it involved giving £50 per class as a float to buy materials, with the aim of putting £50 back at the end of the project. (Indeed, the average class has returned £305 on a £50 seed capital). They would promote the success of their project via blogs and the website. 315,000 students have been directly involved in Giving Nation, £1.7 million (£259 per class) has been raised for good causes, and 1.6 million volunteer hours have been accumulated, and there have been more than 3,500 local, national and international intermediaries.

- The NCS experience should not be seen as an isolated ‘citizenship island’ for young people. We believe that the earlier that young people have citizenship experiences, the more effective they will be in creating lifetime habits of taking part. Indeed, it is never too young to start. The Citizenship Foundation runs the Make a Difference Challenge for primary school children, where classes of children choose for themselves an issue that they want to make a difference about – whether that be local, national, or international. They are then helped to draw up a plan to take action, which might involve fundraising, letter-writing, volunteering, or campaigning. They then carry out their action plan – and finally they review what they did, looking at the difference they made and what they learnt. In 2014 the Make a Difference Challenge was chosen by the Cabinet Office to participate in a randomised controlled trial relating to the impact of Youth Social Action²¹⁸. It was found to be very effective in increasing empathy levels, problem-solving, grit and community skills. Children who took part shared, on average, a level of empathy 6% greater than those who didn’t. These children were also adept in problem-solving, and showed a level of grit significantly above that of the children who did not participate. Similarly the level of community investment was considerably higher. The trial also found that those who took part in the project have a more positive outlook; stating that things in life are worthwhile more often than their peers, and also reported lower levels of anxiety (a decrease of 22%). Similarly, if there are opportunities beyond NCS, then young people can use the experiences from NCS to develop their citizenship skills still further.

Recommendation

We urge that support from government for citizenship programmes should reach beyond NCS, to ensure that there are a multiplicity of opportunities at different points in young people’s journeys rather than a one-size-fits-all approach which would reduce choice.

Involvement in NCS will then be an important milestone on a continuous active citizenship journey.

City Year UK – written evidence (CCE0105)

Executive Summary

1.1. City Year UK is a youth social action charity and throughout this paper will argue that full-time social action can help strengthen citizenship and civic engagement in young people and all of society. While it is acknowledged that full-time social action programmes for those aged over 18 may not necessarily create socially and civically engaged citizens, they most certainly do help to make these nebulous concepts real, consolidate them and give tangible experiences for young people to draw lessons from.²¹⁹

1.2. The Government defines full-time social action as volunteering on a full-time basis i.e. undertaking at least 16 hours a week social action for 6 months or more.²²⁰ Therefore, for the purposes of this paper when referring to full-time social action in the UK we will use these criteria.

1.3. This paper will demonstrate:

With reference to young people, what citizenship and civic engagement means in the 21st century and why it's important [question 1].

- a) That specific changes to electoral law (voter registration) and volunteering law (granting a legal status to full-time volunteers), would help improve citizenship and civic engagement [question 4].
- b) Full-time social action programmes in the UK have proven to strengthen citizenship and civic engagement. This response demonstrates that City Year UK's programme in particular has achieved this as well as improved school performance and the work-readiness skills and employment rates of its young volunteers [question 4]
- c) The need for balance between the role of formal education and youth social action initiatives in strengthening citizenship and civic engagement [question 5].
- d) While National Citizen Service does an excellent job in creating active citizens, but it cannot thrive in a vacuum. Government-backed national full-time social action programmes currently used in numerous countries e.g. France, Germany, the USA strengthen national cohesion, citizenship, civic engagement and promote social integration among their participants. We contend that the UK should establish a similar programme [question 6].

²²⁰ <https://www.gov.uk/government/news/call-for-more-opportunities-to-support-young-people-volunteering-in-the-community>

- e) While the Casey Review painted a worrying picture of social integration in the UK, youth social action can play a prominent role in countering this problem [question 10].

1.4. The paper will also give a brief background of the Department of Digital, Culture, Media and Sport's independent review into full-time social action by young people. The review will investigate legal and regulatory barriers to full-time social action in the UK, consider the merits of a legal status for full-time volunteers and recommend actions the Government can take to increase the number of participants and programmes. We urge the Committee panel to pay particular attention to the recommendations of the Review and seek the opinions of its Chair and panellists when making its own recommendations to Government.

Introduction

2.1. City Year UK welcomes the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement's call for evidence and would be delighted to provide further written or oral evidence if required.

2.2. City Year UK is a youth social action charity which challenges 18 to 25-year-olds to tackle educational inequality through a year of full-time voluntary service. As mentors, tutors and role models in schools, they support pupils growing up in some of the most disadvantaged communities in the UK, ensuring that no pupil falls behind education owing to their socio-economic background.

2.3. City Year UK launched in London in 2010 and has since expanded to the West Midlands and Greater Manchester. During this time the organisation has partnered with almost all types of primary and secondary state schools, including academies, free, community and faith schools. This year, 142 volunteers are supporting pupils in 23 primary and secondary schools.

2.4 City Year UK initially identifies potential school partner by the percentage of their pupil premium population - typically of no less than 30 per cent and often much higher.

2.5. City Year UK Volunteers become an integral part of each school, working in teams of between 6-10 volunteers in to help to make it an enjoyable place to be and a natural place to learn. They develop positive relationships with the children and support them by:

- giving one-to-one or small-group tutoring and coaching regularly late or absent pupils
- running before and after-school clubs and social action opportunities
- providing in-classroom support
- being a presence on the school playground at break times
- organising and leading events, celebrations and projects to unite the school and community.

- coaching to encourage positive character traits crucial to strengthen citizenship and civic engagement such as responsibility, sense of duty, optimism, perseverance, self-control, emotional resilience, confidence and ambition.

2.6. City Year UK also works alongside each school to identify 10 per cent of its population for closer support. Typically, these pupils exhibit poor attendance, disruptive behaviour and low achievement in English and maths. Evidence shows that the service provided by its full-time volunteers leads to improvements in the attendance, behaviour, grades and attitudes of the pupils they support.²²¹ Consequently, City Year UK has been praised in eleven OFSTED reports since September 2013.

2.7. Full-time social action helps volunteers to develop the transferable skills vital for transitioning from education to employment. Independent research of City Year UK's alumni from its first six years found an unemployment rate of 3 per cent, dwarfing the national figure of over 12 per cent. What's more, 91 per cent are in employment or full-time education within just three months of finishing the programme. Evidence within this consultation response will also show the programme's significant impact on strengthening citizenship and civic engagement of its participants.

QUESTION 1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

3.1. Citizenship is about understanding one's role and responsibility to others, as well as understanding society's challenges and working collectively to make a difference. A good grasp of what it is to be a citizen and a sense of civic duty are the key to an inclusive and prosperous society.

3.2. In a global and technological age, concepts of citizenship and civic participation are changing. Technology has made all corners of the world accessible for UK citizens and visa-versa. Social media and other digital technology have led to a rise in clicktivism (the word has even recently been added to the Oxford English Dictionary) meaning the way people engage in their society is changing. The Charities Aid Foundation found the proportion of people who said they had filled out a petition within the past year increased from 21 per cent in 2015 to 56 per cent in 2016.²²²

3.3. The role of citizenship and belonging in society has seldom been so important. Britons' sense of unity is being tested on a number of fronts. Brexit, Scottish Independence and terror²²³ are all highlighting our differences at a time when being united by a shared identity would provide strength.

²²¹ Statistics available on request.

3.4. While the traditional rhetoric of citizenship and civic engagement may not resonate with the public and especially young people, this does not mean they are disinterested in becoming active citizens. Annual levels of civic participation and civic consultation have increased from 33 per cent to 41 per cent and 16 per cent to 18 per cent respectively between 2015-16 and 2016-17.²²⁴ In 2016-17, 60 per cent of adults had engaged in some form of civic engagement (participation, consultation, or activism) and/or formal volunteering, an increase from 2015-16 (55 per cent).

3.5. Worryingly though, youth awareness and engagement of social action is much lower than older citizens.²²⁵ This is because unlike older citizens, young people are not given the time and space to explore youth social action, which is known to have a positive impact of citizenship and civic participation. As a part of The Scout Association's A Million Hands social action programme, a survey of 3,000 young people found that 82 per cent of 12-24 year olds across the UK believe it is important that young people help to solve some of the biggest social issues in this country, but only 36 per cent believe they were given that opportunity.

3.6. City Year UK believes and demonstrates below, that citizenship and civic engagement are strengthened through practical application of values and ideals and full-time social action can provide a impactful platform for this. There must be focus should be on helping young people to understand their communities and giving them the opportunities to express themselves and make a positive contribution independently.

3.7. While work is still to be done to strengthen the citizenship of the adult population, City Year UK feel it is imperative to place significant emphasis on targeting young people when seeking to improve citizenship and civic engagement. We believe that if real change is to be achieved, policy makers will require vision and must be bold. What we propose through our suggestion for a national full-time social action programme would undoubtedly require these traits.

QUESTION 4: Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

Electoral law

²²⁴ Department for Digital, Culture, Media & Sport: Community Life Survey 2016-17, 2017

²²⁵ 50 per cent of those adults aged 75 and over were aware of social action in their local area in last year compared to 27 per cent of those aged 16-24. This same disparity between the age groups can be seen in those involved in social action at 20 per cent of those aged 75 and over, compared to 11 per cent of those aged between 16 and 24.

4.1. There is always a temptation to use the legal system to encourage active political engagement. Compulsory voting is used for example in Australia and votes for 16 year-olds have long since been championed in the British system (and have indeed been used in Scotland).

4.2. City Year UK sees merit in an opt-out system of automatic voter registration. The current system of individual electoral registration (IER), introduced in 2014, discourages engagement in formal politics through elections. The process of registering to vote is intimidating and cumbersome and therefore reinforces all the worst stereotypes levelled at formal politics. Placing the onus on young people in particular, who can lack awareness of the need to register, risks them missing out on the right to cast their ballot. Although, this is not only a youth issue and the process of voting registration must be made easier for every citizen.

4.3. For example, in spite of the good levels of political awareness engaging in full-time social action produced among City Year UK volunteers, following the announcement of a snap election there was a significant level of confusion regarding whether they needed to register and how to do so. In spite of advancements in technology and social media, this level of confusion and uncertainty must not be disregarded. Furthermore, election campaigns often ‘heat-up’ within the last month of campaigning (demonstrated by the 2017 General Election campaign), but by this time those who thought they were disinterested and had not registered may well have become engaged, but ultimately would be denied their right to vote.

4.4. While it must be acknowledged that attempts were made by the Labour Government of 2005²²⁶ to implement automatic registration of voters via the CORE system, which were later abandoned, City Year UK believes that this is still the best option to enable civic engagement in formal electoral politics. Lessons must be learned from this attempt and the issue should be readdressed.

Volunteering law

4.5. Nevertheless, use of legal changes which explicitly focus on political engagement are just one option at the disposal of policy makers. City Year UK believes a positive change to the current law which has the potential to improve citizenship and civic engagement, without explicitly focusing on electoral law, is the granting of a legal status to full-time volunteers.

4.6. In order to create more active citizens and increase civic engagement, it is imperative that young people are shown why they should engage with the process and not simply given more opportunities to do so. Without underpinning civic engagement with the ‘why’, further measures will fall victim of the same flaws present in the existing system.

²²⁶ House of Commons Library: Automatic Registration in UK Elections, 2016.

4.7. City Year UK has demonstrated that full-time social action can encourage active and engaged citizenship in a UK context through its ‘year of service’ programme. Volunteers are issued a survey at the beginning and the end of the year that assess their development across a number of areas. Evidence from this survey showed engagement with the programme, helps to shape positive social attitudes and create engaged citizens. Volunteers reported impressive attitudinal shifts over the course of our programme such as an increased likelihood to vote and take a leadership role in civil society and improved attitude towards other social groups (age, ethnicity and religion). For example:

- There was a 22 per cent rise in volunteers who said they were very likely to vote in the next General Election.
- There was a 40 per cent rise in volunteers who felt people in society could be trusted.
- City Year volunteers are over twice as likely as their peers to cite a responsibility to their community as a motivation to volunteer.
- Volunteers are more over 70 per cent more likely than their peers to take on a leadership role in civic society.

4.8. Furthermore, a 2015 study²²⁷ of City Year UK alumni which compared their attitudes and behaviours to civic leadership with that of those who had not completed the programme but had taken part in the 2013 national Community Life Survey (CLS), showed that City Year UK alumni were far more civically engaged than their counterparts. For example:

- By and large, the alumni are 9 times more likely to complete a paper or online questionnaire and 10 times more likely to be involved in a face-to-face or online group about local services or problems in your local area than a young person from CLS.
- Similarly, 74 percent of the alumni, compared with 37 per cent of young people from CLS (2013) believe that they can influence decisions affecting their area.
- City Year UK alumni are three times more likely than a young person who has not done a ‘year of service’ to volunteer.

4.9. While it must be acknowledged that full-time social action programmes for those aged over 18 may not necessarily create socially and civically engaged citizens, they most certainly do help to make these nebulous concepts real, consolidate them and give tangible experiences for young people to draw lessons from.²²⁸

²²⁸ Renaisi: Shaping Civic Leaders: The impact on City Year UK alumni, 2015.

4.10. Despite this, current law punishes full-time volunteers and discourages participation in full-time social action because despite the hours full-time volunteers currently dedicate to serving their community, the Government classes them as NEET (not in education, employment or training). They are in legal limbo, categorised as part of a huge social problem and therefore denied even the most basic support enjoyed by the unemployed, students or those in work.

4.11. Below are a number of ways the law makes it difficult to do full-time social action and therefore limits the expansion of programmes:

- National Insurance Credits (NICs): Full-time volunteers are not entitled to Class 3 NICs. They make a positive contribution to the economy and their communities yet because they have no recognised status they are unfairly punished by not being automatically granted the NICs that would protect their pension entitlements. Contrastingly, those looking for work while on benefits, caring for children or sick relatives and doing jury service do qualify.
- Ill-health: Full-time volunteers can be given expenses by their charity, but charities are forbidden from paying those expenses if the volunteer is ill for a day or two. That makes it hard for people to sustain their commitment over several months or a year.
- Personal development training: Full-time volunteers are forbidden from receiving personal development training, or help from the charity they serve with when they look for jobs at the end of their programme, even though career progression is a major motive for, and benefit of, taking part.

4.12. If the barriers to engaging in full-time social action were removed, there is potential for tens of thousands—rather than several hundred—of full-time volunteers to serve in the UK every year, through which strengthening their citizenship and civic engagement. As will be explored in response to question 6, this has been achieved in countries including the USA, France, Germany and Italy, where governments have put ‘civilian national service’ on a proper legal footing; establishing it as rite of passage for young people.

QUESTION 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1. The role of formal education plays in encouraging good citizenship and civic engagement is undoubtedly important. However, policy solutions in this area have paid too great an emphasis on the role of the curriculum and teaching in encouraging good citizenship.

5.2. Teaching of citizenship and civic engagement should be available from the earliest level of primary school through to the end of formal education as a minimum. But it must be acknowledged that more of a balance can and must be struck between what can and should be pursued in and outside of the classroom. It is universally acknowledged, teachers are already overstretched. Demands are made of them to cover every conceivable topic - especially ones where they cannot be expected to be experts (such a Government and politics). An academic qualification in citizenship is of course to be encouraged, but choice is important. More can and should be done to promote citizenship and political studies among young people, but coercion might not the best route.

5.3. More creative policy solutions are needed. Policymakers must look outside of schools and towards the youth social action journey to help supplement what is taught in school and to make sure it will be practically applied. Youth social action demonstrates to young people the values of citizenship and civic engagement through practical experience. Through programmes run by the Scouts, Girlguiding, NCS, Volunteering Matters, vInspired and City Year UK, young people can mix with people from different backgrounds and work in teams for the betterment of their communities.

5.4. Increased Governmental support for youth social action through funding, promotion and recognition, in tandem and with equal regard with measures taken to improve and promote citizenship education and civic engagement through formal education, are much more likely to be successful in reaching the objective of strengthening citizenship and civic engagement in our society.

QUESTION 6: Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

NCS

6.1. City Year UK wholeheartedly supports the NCS programme and believes it does an excellent job in helping the process of creating active citizens.

6.2. Compulsion is not the way in which to improve citizenship and civic engagement. Coercing people to undertake an activity in order to strengthen their understanding of citizenship will only foster an environment in which resentment towards participation can grow and have the opposite effect to what is desired.

6.3. We also agree with Lord Blunkett when he stated during the passage of the NCS Act, that at least aesthetically keeping Government at arm's length of the NCS programme will encourage young people to participate.²²⁹ The moment the political element of NCS is noticeably increased, it will be transparent that this a Government-sponsored programme and risks turning young people off. The NCS brand is young, vibrant and celebrity-backed and in its own right now has reached 100,000 participants annually. It should be allowed the space to grow and develop organically without the added pressure to increase the political element of the scheme - especially since the NCS Trust is undergoing a period of change following the confirmation of the NCS Act and National Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee reports into its governance and delivery.

Beyond NCS

6.4. However, it must be remembered that NCS makes up part of a mosaic of volunteering opportunities for young people. It cannot thrive in a vacuum. It's vital, now more than ever, to give the next generation the chance to play their part in shaping our country and themselves through service to others. NCS at 16 should be the beginning and not the end of those opportunities to serve.

6.5. The governments of other countries have gone further than the UK has in relation to youth social action. Governments of France, the USA, Germany and Italy to name a few, have established full-time social action programmes to help tens of thousands of (mostly young) volunteers to pour 25 hours of their time every week, for up to 24 months at a time, into good causes and public services. Participants serve to help solve some of their society's biggest issues in areas such as:

- Health and social care
- Education
- Conservation
- Disaster relief
- Homelessness
- Drug and alcohol addiction
- Natural and man-made heritage

6.6. These governments usually establish such programmes through primary legislation and then set up bodies which; attribute a badged status to participant programmes that have passed quality assurance, monitor and scrutinise the programmes to maintain quality and, distribute funding to charities that run approved programmes so they can scale-up their service. Government funding typically goes towards the running of such bodies and to help fund charities pay their participants a ‘living stipend’, which is often set above the level of benefits they would receive for being out of work, but below the wage they would receive for undertaking paid employment.

²²⁹ Hansard: Rt Hon. Lord Blunkett - NCS Bill second reading, House of Lords, 2016 (<https://goo.gl/ckJw2X>)

6.7. While the emphasis of the programmes can vary and many report significant impacts on public services and participants employability, they all facilitate their young participants to serve in teams to tackle significant social issues and share the objective to strengthen national cohesion, citizenship, civic engagement and promote social integration among their participants. The below summary of programmes in France, the USA and Germany therefore focuses on the impact of the programmes on the aforementioned areas.

France

6.8. France has a Government sponsored full-time social action programme called ‘Service Civique’. The initiative was launched in 2010 and aims to strengthen national cohesion and promote social diversity among its 16 to 25 year-old participants, who can engage in the programme for a period of 3 to 12 months. It can be carried out in 9 main areas: culture and leisure, international development and humanitarian action, education, environment, crisis intervention, memory and citizenship, health, solidarity and sport.

6.9. Such is the success of France’s ‘Service Civique’ it is to expand to 150,000 places per year by the end of 2017. The programme prides itself on producing civically engaged young people:

- 57 per cent of the young people who were not registered on the electoral roll before their Service Civique year, had done so since completing the programme or intend to do so.²³⁰
- 80 per cent of the volunteers intend to vote the next elections.
- 89 per cent of volunteers feel useful to others and to society
- 93 per cent said the programme is a good way to meet people of different backgrounds.

USA

6.10. In the USA, 80,000 young adults participate in full-time social action annually as part of ‘AmeriCorps’.²³¹ AmeriCorps is a network of local, state, and national service programmes that connects young Americans each year in intensive service to meet community needs in education, the environment, public safety, health, and homeland security. Participants serve in full or part-time positions over a 10-12 month period. Upon completion of their service, members receive an education grant known as the 'Segal AmeriCorps Education Award' of up to $4,725 to pay for college, graduate school, or to pay back qualified student loans. Since 1994, nearly one million volunteers have contributed over 1.4 billion hours of service to local communities.

6.11. Research²³² demonstrates that service through AmeriCorps creates empowered and prepared leaders who are civically engaged and committed to strengthening their communities. Alumni believe that the experience improved their ability to bridge divides and solve problems, while also developing skills and expanding opportunity to advance their careers and education.

6.12. Key stats include:

- 80 per cent of alumni feel confident they can create a plan to address a community issue and get others to care about it.
- 93 per cent of alumni said that after serving, they felt comfortable interacting with others different than themselves, as compared to 72 per cent before. 94 per cent said that national service broadened their understanding of society and different communities.
- 79 per cent of alumni are involved or plan to become actively involved in their community post-service, compared to 47 per cent prior.
- 94 per cent of alumni are registered to vote, well above the national average.

Germany

6.13. Germany also offers young people from this age the chance to engage in full-time social action as a transition year through three federal organisations: the BFD, Bundesfreiwilligendienst (German voluntary service); the FSJ, Freiwilliges Soziales Jahr (voluntary social year); and FÖJ, the Freiwilliges Ökologisches Jahr (voluntary ecological year). While all the programmes cater for young people, the FSJ and FOJ are aimed entirely at young people from the age of 15-27. The FSJ alone allows 50,000 young German's the opportunity to undertake full-time social action each year.²³³ These programmes allow a young person to volunteer full-time for between 6-24 months on a community project close to their hearts for public good.

6.14. City Year UK is calling on the UK Government to create a similar programme, open to all young people. As demonstrated both at home through City Year UK and abroad through programmes in France, the USA and Germany, undertaking full-time social action gives young people a sense of civic pride and accomplishment, giving them a stake in their community and country, while also giving them the skills and experience to launch their future career.

6.15. Polling conducted by Censuswise on behalf of City Year UK of 2,002 people in December 2016 found overwhelming support for a recognised programme of full-time voluntary ‘civilian national service’ for young people in Britain. Over 90% of those polled think a recognised programme of full-time voluntary civilian national service should be on offer for young people in Britain. Furthermore, over half of 16-25 year-olds polled (1,000 in total) say it should definitely be an option for them, and nearly a third would consider signing up for such a programme, if it had a proper Government-backed status.

6.16. There has never been a better time to re-examine how the UK approaches full-time social action. In December 2016 the Department of Culture, Media and Sport announced the launch of the ‘Review of Full Time Social Action by Young People. This independent review is led by former CEO of National Grid Steve Holliday and featured Chief Economist at the Bank of England, Andy Haldane, as a panellist. It will investigate legal and regulatory barriers to full-time social action in the UK, consider the merits of a legal status for full-time volunteers and recommend actions the Government can take to increase the number of participants and programmes.

6.17. City Year UK, alongside the 10 organisations that make up the Full-Time Social Action Coalition²³⁴, believe this review is a once-in-a-generation opportunity to realise the potential of full-time social action and its impact on strengthening the citizenship and civic engagement of young people in the UK. The Coalition is calling on the review to recommend a legal status for full-time volunteers.

6.18. Commenting on the announcement of the review Dan Jarvis MP said:

“When the bonds of community are weakening, full-time volunteering brings young people together to serve the common good. This review provides an opportunity for the Government to be more ambitious with its vision for full-time volunteering and build on the foundations laid by the National Citizen Service. Service should be a lifetime mission rather than a month-long programme, and full-time programmes like City Year UK help achieve that ambition.”

6.19. Similarly, House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement member, Lord Blunkett, stated:

²³⁴ Made up of; City Year UK, The Challenge, The Scout Association, Mayday Trust, vInspired, #iwill campaign, Year Here, Student Hubs, Demos and Volunteering Matters.

“A year of service has the potential to fundamentally change the attitudes and values of young people in our society. Young people have already shown they can be part of the solution to some of our biggest problems, such as educational inequality, through programmes like City Year UK. This review could form the vital catalyst for the expansion of full time volunteering in the UK.”

6.20. The review panel is due to report its findings back to the Minister of Civil Society in December this year. As this Committee is not scheduled to report the findings of this inquiry until March 2018, we urge the Committee panel to pay particular attention to the recommendations of the Review and seek the opinions of its Chair and panellists when making its own recommendations to Government.

QUESTION 10: How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole?

How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

7.1. Citizenship and social cohesion go hand-in-hand. Sharing a common identity and values is crucial for the well-being of the UK. The Casey Review²³⁵ identified the six ‘British values’, such as respect for democracy, freedom of speech and the rule of law, which City Year UK would not dispute.

7.2. But one thing must be made clear - sharing a common identity and integrating does not require nor equate to homogeneity. A truly integrated society works to demonstrate and uphold its common values while celebrating its differences.

7.3. The Casey Review painted a worrying picture of social cohesion in the UK. For example, it demonstrated that recorded hate crimes are on the increase, socio-economic exclusion is particularly rife among British Muslims, high levels of segregation with poorer and immigrant pupils concentrated in the same schools and fewer social interactions than our population mix would suggest we should across ethnicity, age and social grade

7.4. Yet Dame Louise Casey did reserve special mention for ‘youth programmes that engage young people in altruistic activities’ regarding their ability to help people from different social-economic, racial and religious backgrounds to socially mix. The report pointed to evaluation of NCS which found that 84 per cent of young people on the 2013 programme felt more positive towards people from different backgrounds following participation - although it was observed that these programmes are yet to reach the scale where they can engage those in the most isolated communities.

²³⁵ Department for Communities and Local Government: The Casey Review: a review into opportunity and integration, 2016

7.5. Full-time social action through City Year UK is also proven to a positive impact toward young people's attitudes to those from different backgrounds. Over 50 per cent said that participation in the programme had positively affected their attitude toward those from different age groups and ethnic, religious and socio-economic backgrounds.

7.6. Nasima Akter, 21, City Year UK alumna, said:

"Serving in a school that's based in a small community, made us all become part of a close-knit community; where everyone knows each other and now about City Year and the bigger picture of why we are there. This has provided me with a sense of purpose; I know I am always welcome back here, and I know what I wish to do, which is to help young adults become integrated into society and have a sense of purpose and value. Being in a school that includes cultures and backgrounds different to what I have grown up around, furthered my knowledge and understanding of other cultures and perspectives. As well as this, I have broadened the mind of many students who are ambitious to learn. They were keen to learn about fasting in the month of Ramadan and some were inspired to experiment and try fasting for a day. This goes to show how eager they are to learn about different religions and traditions and accept individuals wholeheartedly."

7.7. Germany is a great example of where a Government has taken steps to improve citizenship, civic engagement and social cohesion and integration through its full-time social action programme. As well as having a national full-time social action programme for all, Germany has taken steps to extend this scheme to refugees to help them integrated into German society. In December 2015, the Bundesfreiwilligendienst (federal volunteer service) started a special programme for 10,000 refugees. This programme allows refugees people ages 17 and older to volunteer full-time for charity or state organisations for 6 to 18 months for over 20 hours per week, while the state pays for their health insurance and a small stipend to cover their living expenses. The programme is used to help refugees receive German language support, assimilate with German culture and demonstrate work experience in a German context.

Conclusion

8.1. Undertaking full-time social action gives young people a sense of civic pride and accomplishment, giving them a stake in their community and country, while also giving them the skills and experience to launch their future career.

8.2. We call of the Committee to recognise the role full-time social action can play in strengthening citizenship and civic engagement in its final report and ask that it pays particular attention to the recommendations of independent review of full-time social action by young people.

CIVICUS – written evidence (CCE0128)

Written Evidence prepared by Dr Dhananjayan Sriskandarajah, Secretary General and CEO of CIVICUS: World Alliance for Citizen Participation

Dhananjayan Sriskandarajah has been Secretary General and CEO of CIVICUS since January 2013. His previous roles have included Director of the Royal Commonwealth Society, Interim Director of the Commonwealth Foundation and Deputy Director of the Institute for Public Policy Research. Danny is the author of numerous reports and academic articles on international migration, economic development and integration issues. He sits on the boards of the Baring Foundation, Comic Relief and International Alert and was a member of the United Nations Secretary General’s High Level Panel on Humanitarian Finance.

Summary: In a time of growing and increasingly widespread curbs on civic freedoms around the world, there is a responsibility to protect ‘civic space’. Only by nurturing – not restricting – the conditions for citizens to organise, speak out and take action will democracy be buttressed. In the UK, we need to nurture new forms of active citizenship and everyday democracy, with a particular focus on promoting inclusion.

Civic space

1. There is a global emergency on civic space. Around the world, citizens’ fundamental civic rights to freedom of expression, association and peaceful assembly are facing unprecedented levels of restriction. In April 2017, the CIVICUS Monitor²³⁶ released civic space ratings for all UN Member States, as well as Kosovo and Palestine, the first time a global dataset has enabled us to visualise the true scale of what is happening to civic space around the world. Only 3 per cent of people live in countries with open civic space, where fundamental civic freedoms are fully respected. Almost one in ten people live in a country with closed civic space and over a third of people live in countries with repressed civic space. That means more than three billion people now live in countries where there are serious violations of freedoms of expression, assembly and association. Perhaps most concerning, this number includes established, mature democracies, including the United Kingdom (see <https://monitor.civicus.org/country/united-kingdom/> for our analysis of the situation in the UK).
2. Protecting civic space is vital to the health, stability and success of any open and democratic society. The restriction of fundamental civic freedoms undermines participatory democracy, sustainable development and efforts to reduce inequality. States have a duty - as a matter of principle and under international law - to respect, protect and fulfil people’s basic rights to organise, protest and speak freely. Yet the restriction of civic space has become the norm, rather than the exception.

3. As levels of trust and engagement in traditional party politics fall, many governments purport to be seeking new means of citizen engagement. Yet, at the same time, many are either actively contributing to the restriction of civic space, or at the very least, doing too little to prevent it. Governments need to find new ways to support and nurture civil society, including its lobbying, advocacy and campaigning functions, in order to unlock citizen action and reinvigorate our sense of citizenship. In the UK, the assumption that political life is shaped by political parties, and by the centralised democracy of Westminster and Whitehall, is becoming outdated. An 18th century model of political democracy is no longer fulfilling people’s thirst for engagement. We need, instead, to accelerate the evolution of next generation political institutions.
4. People need meaningful, direct ways to contribute to and affect governance, ways of aggregating local level action to national policy making. This kind of everyday democracy would amount to much more than casting a vote every few years; it would amount to a democratic transformation, an expansion and enrichment of our democratic experience that could revolutionise civic space and cross-community relationships throughout our society.

Inclusion

5. The need for such a transformation has never been more obvious. In the Global South and North, even in countries long considered to be consolidated democracies, recent political shifts have seen right wing populist and neo-fascist leaders gain prominence. These leaders are harnessing the genuine anger of citizens who feel left behind, or adversely affected, by globalisation; those angry at the growing gap between the very wealthy and the vast majority; those who see established ways of life and traditional values being eroded; those who see political elites as remote and unwilling to listen, and as serving the interests of economic globalisation rather than their country’s citizens, those who, out of frustration and disillusionment, have rejected the competition of conventional politics and instead embraced extreme positions. These leaders are positioning themselves as political outsiders, able to disrupt elite consensus; they are encouraging citizens to unravel existing political institutions and to blame minorities and excluded groups for their society's ills. Their politics and worldview is fundamentally opposed to a civil society seeking to promote human rights, social cohesion and progressive internationalism.
6. Rising populism and extremism are fuelling falling levels of public trust in civil society and providing convenient cover for attacks. At present, progressive responses to these trends are proving weak and too often dismissed as part of conventional, elite-driven attempts that are part of the problem and not the solution. In many countries, it’s becoming increasingly easy to portray progressive civil society as being against national interests, public security and traditional values. A stronger case needs to be made for why a diverse, resilient and independent civil society is a critical and constructive component of any polity.

7. The challenge for civil society - and for those governments seeking genuinely to protect and nurture civic space - is to understand the anger driving these political shifts, without appeasing racism, sexism or xenophobia and to build an alternative, positive message of hope, not fear. This will require the construction of broad-based, progressive alliances, bringing together citizens to promote an agenda of inclusion. CIVICUS' 2016 State of Civil Society report looked at how civil society needs to do more to promote inclusion. Much of civic life is about promoting inclusion. It is about amplifying the voices of the marginalised, tackling the causes of discrimination, and promoting equal rights and access to services. Put simply, civil society is often about people helping other people. But, for many millions of people exclusion remains a painful, everyday reality. And very few civil society actors have found effective ways of tackling exclusion. The Report contains 33 guest contributions that expose the common threads that characterise so many different types of exclusion, and also highlight the disproportionate affect that civic space restrictions have on excluded groups. The full report can be found at <http://civicus.org/index.php/socs2016>
8. One key challenge in the UK and elsewhere is to promote a better relationship between formal and informal civil society. Any healthy democracy needs both. We need citizens to be able to organise spontaneously and we need institutions to be there long after, continuing to press particular issues and to hold governments to account. We will need to harness the potential of new tools and techniques for mobilising, without losing touch with older forms of community organising. The successful civil society actors of the future will need to be able to combine the best of both. Governments will need to recognise the importance of investing in civil society platforms that can act as vital scaffolding for civil society space. Governments and other big funders have focused too great a share of their resources on discrete, time-limited programs and measurable, incremental change, delivered by fewer, bigger civil society actors. This has led to a siloed, corporatised civil society, weakening sector diversity, grassroots citizen action and innovation.
9. Another priority for UK civil society should be the promotion of minority inclusion. We know that minorities living in the UK have rich social capital and civic networks. Yet, too often, these networks exist quite separately to 'mainstream' British civic life, with no, or only very weak, links to the wider communities in which they are based. We need to create new mechanisms for bridging the civic life of different communities in the UK. The responsibility for tackling Islamic extremism, for example, must not be given over to the Muslim community, to be dealt with 'internally'. Instead, we must seek to meet such challenges by building bridges between communities, by integrating minority groups into wider social networks, and by sharing our social capital.

Civil Society Futures – written evidence (CCE0073)

Civil Society Futures is creating a space for a much needed conversation among those involved in all forms of civic action – from informal networks to large charities, Facebook groups to faith groups. The Inquiry runs from January 2017- January 2019. It is chaired by Julia Unwin the former chief executive of the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and is guided by an independent panel of people with perspectives ranging from theatre making in South Wales to tech investment in Gaza, local government in the North of England to the world’s alliance of civil society organisations. This Inquiry is powered by a collaboration of four organisations: Citizens’ UK, Goldsmiths, University of London; openDemocracy; and Forum for the Future. The Inquiry has been funded by the Baring Foundation, Esmée Fairbairn, Barrow Cadbury, Paul Hamlyn, Lloyds Bank Foundation, City Bridge Trust, Lankelly Chase and Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation. Research support has also been provided by NCVO.

Through a series of open conversations between people across England – face to face and online – we are discussing how the world is changing, how civic action is changing, and how civil society organisations can adapt in order grasp those changes and steer us towards a better society. Community organisers are hosting events across the country, giving people the chance to come together and discuss how civil society is being changed and how it needs to change, what’s working well and who we can all learn from. Qualitative and quantitative research is being undertaken by a team at Goldsmiths to help us understand what’s going on in civil society and what people think needs to happen. Together, this work will contribute to a map of the future of English civil society. The inquiry will host a ‘Civil Society Lab’ to experiment with new forms of civil society organisation and test constraints and enablers for scaling successful elements of civil society today with the aim of learning how to strengthen civil society in the future.

Through our research, conversations and workshops we are investigating how to maximise the positive effects of civil society including those of citizenship and civic engagement. Although our work is only 6 months in the making we have done a survey of relevant literature and begun our qualitative research.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 Citizenship and civic engagement relates to the ability of individuals to be members of the public and participants in society and its democratic processes. The ability to exercise citizenship and civic engagement is situated in concerns about a democratic deficit. Prominent reports have observed, ‘[t]he need for change; the need to seek the voice of marginalised and disadvantaged people in decision-making processes is of undeniable and acute local, national and global relevance’ (RSA and JRF consultations, 2017).

1.2 This points to a need to focus on democratic institutions and engagement: how to ensure that marginalised voices are heard in the mainstream and how to create safe places for public debate, at a time of apparently increasing polarisation. Twenty years ago Benjamin Barber (2004:11) talked of ‘the growing incivility of our public discourse’ (betokening an uncivil society), yet after Brexit, and the 2016 US election, as well as the rise of trolling and other abusive behaviour on social media, it could be argued that this ‘incivility’ has reached a new low. Strengthening civil society could help promote a discourse that allows for:

‘The development of shared interests, a willingness to cede some territory to others, the ability to see something of oneself in those who are different and work together more effectively as a result – all these are crucial attributes for effective governance, practical problem-solving and the peaceful resolution of differences.’

1.3 Yet in Britain, trust in political and other institutions is at a historic low. According to the Edelman Trust Barometer (2017), between October 2016 and January 2017 ‘trust in government fell from 36% to 26%; in business from 45% to 33% and in the media from 32% to 24%. The authors describe this steep plunge as a ‘crisis of trust’ and Britain itself as being ‘on a cliff edge’. Similarly polling by Ipsos MORI saw trust in politicians in the UK fall from 21% at the end of 2015 to 16% at the end of 2016.

1.4 Britain also has a significant ‘trust gap’ of 19% (second only to the United States) between ‘informed publics’ (‘in the upper income quartile, university educated and with a declared interest in politics and the media’) and those with an income less than £15,000. Moreover both groups have less trust in government this year than they did last year. Amongst the least affluent it has hit a new low of just 20%, but it has also fallen significantly amongst the wealthiest, from 54% in 2016 to 38% in 2017 (Edelman, 2017).

1.5 Citizenship relates to political participation. The Hansard Society’s 2016 Audit, undertaken before the Brexit referendum, found formal political participation had increased overall - with voter turnout in the 2015 general election at 65%, the highest since 2001, and more people claiming to be strong supporters of a political party (41%) than at any time since 2003 – but inequality had also increased: ‘there is now a 37 percentage point difference between the certainty to vote levels of those in social classes AB and DE, an increase of six points in 12 months’ (Hansard Society, 2016, p.6). The audit also highlighted a distinct generational divide, with more than twice as many people aged 65 – 74 years (80%) than 18-24 year olds (39%) saying they were absolutely certain to vote (ibid, p.55).

1.6 At the same time, overall confidence in the system, and especially in people’s ability to influence decisions, is low:

‘Only a third of the public think the system by which Britain is governed works well (33%) with those living furthest from Westminster most likely to be dissatisfied. Just 35% believe that when people like themselves get involved in politics they can change the way the country is run. Only 13% feel they have some influence over decision-making nationally although 41% would like to be involved in decision-making. More people (46%) would like to be involved in local decisions but just 25% currently feel they have some influence at the local level.'

1.7 This is the backdrop against which the EU referendum turnout of over 72% took place, apparently bringing to the surface deep divisions of class as well as generation that 'cannot be divided from the economic dislocation that has taken place since the 1980s' (Dorling et al 2016). Studies by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation (Goodwin and Heath, 2016) and the Resolution Foundation (Clarke, 2016) both find that low skilled and working class voters in the most deprived regions were more likely to vote Brexit. This suggests that the 'democratic deficit' is not a sign of apathy: people will turn out to vote if they think it will make a difference. 60% of all 'new voters' (who had not voted in the 2015 election) voted leave. As Unwin has argued, 'people in the overlooked and too often ignored parts of the country ... voted leave because they weren't satisfied with what they have. And they didn't feel able to change things' (2016:4).

1.8 In this context, the voluntary and community sector becomes a vital part of a much wider civil society – not only a collective term for providers of services or meeters of need, but also a catalyst for voluntary action and participation; a promulgator of social values and social justice; and a voice for marginalised and mainstream users, members and communities. Much of the literature posits that citizenship and civic engagement requires an active and vibrant civil society as a vital pre-requisite for a healthy democracy, enabling different voices to be heard and different ideas about the good society, and the values that underpin it, to be contested and debated.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 Our qualitative research with communities around England is revealing the importance of place as a site of belonging. But this is most meaningful where networks of trust are strong and people feel that systems of (national and local) government are sufficient to listen and respond to their needs. Citizenship ceremonies or events are likely to quickly be seen as hollowed out of meaning if systems of democratic participation are weak. Dalton (2017) argues that there is a participation gap: the better-off are more engaged in policy while the poorest vote less and lack the resources to lobby for change. Drawing on evidence from the International Social Survey Programme that measured citizen participation in established democracies in 2004 and 2014 he notes that:

The decline in voting is an obvious and very troubling trend. However, the good news is that democratic institutional reforms and citizen innovation have increased the number and variety of access points that people can use to influence political outcome. The expansion in citizen skills and resources also enables more people to engage in these more demanding forms of participation.

2.2 He goes on to describe new forms of collective action that point to an interested and involved citizenry – more engaged than their parents’ or grandparents’ generation. However, he is at pains to also point out that while opportunities for participation may have increased they are not equally available to all and there is a sizeable and growing socio-economic participation gap across all types of political action – those with higher levels of education and higher income possess the skills and resources to enable them to participate beyond the voting process. As these opportunities grow so the gap widens between the rich citizenry and the poor citizenry. Our research echoes these findings with all groups recognizing equality as central to community well-being and citizen engagement.

2.3 The participation gap is further aggravated by the processes of privatization in the provision of welfare. It is argued that an emphasis on out-sourcing of council services has detached them from democracy, depoliticising decisions about public welfare and the public good (Croft and Beresford, 1996; Prior et al 1996; Cornwall and Gaventa, 2001, Lister, 2001). If civil society is to offer ‘room for us to engage with neighbours, friends, citizens, strangers who must of necessity live together’ (Barber, op cit), then there also need to be mechanisms to enable people to identify and negotiate their common interests. This space is inevitably reduced when councils are overseeing rather than delivering contracts. Our respondents consistently state the importance of feeling represented and being able to participate in local decision making – both elements of civic engagement that they perceive as lacking

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1 Encouraging active citizenship has been a recurring theme in public policy over at least the last two decades, from New Labour’s ‘Active Citizens’ and its emphasis on civil renewal (Blunkett, 2003) and ‘double devolution’ (D Miliband, 2006) to David Cameron’s ‘Big Society’ and the ‘localism agenda’ (Department for Communities and Local Government, 2011). Yet there are inevitable limits to how much communities can do for themselves, as McCabe argues: ‘While communities can affect change, there are structural and global factors (from mass unemployment to the power of multi-national corporations and global warming) that cannot easily be solved at a nation-state level, let alone a “nano” community level.’ (2010:11). This is particularly true of those in more deprived communities as 50 years of regeneration initiatives has found (see for example CDP Editorial Collective, 1977; Faith in the City, 1985; Lister, 2002).

3.2 This new localism has been introduced against a background of austerity and resulting state retrenchment, with a predicted ‘black hole’ in local government funding of £5.8 billion by 2020 (Local Government Association, 2015). Cuts of 40% to core local authority funding and welfare reforms have had a cumulative impact, hitting people hardest where deprivation is greatest, with older, industrial areas and seaside towns worst affected (Beatty and Fothergill, 2013; Wilson et al, 2013; Corfe, 2017). It is difficult for people and communities to be ‘makers and shapers’ (Cornwall and Gaventa, 2001) when local authorities are needing to be ‘cutters and shutters’. And it is especially difficult to find equitable solutions to social problems when resources are unevenly distributed and scarcest where they are needed most.

3.3 Barber (2004) argues that the state plays a vital role in providing a legal and regulatory framework to support democratic engagement and help to create a level playing field for citizen participation. But a Big Society does not mean a small state. Indeed, strong democratic institutions help to make society more civil; they are also necessary to tackle deeper structural problems and manifestations of social injustice that citizens and communities cannot reach.

3.4 Over the last 50 years there has been a succession of government initiatives aimed at tackling economic decline in such areas. Notable are the National Community Development Programme (CDP) of the 1960s and 1970s; Urban Development Corporations in the 1980s; City Challenge in the 1990s; and the New Deal for Communities in the 2000’s. Some constructed disadvantaged communities themselves as the problem (in lack of skills, motivation, and community). Some focused on local agencies and partnerships. Others emphasised ‘enterprise’. But all failed to address the underlying structural causes and consequences of industrial decline. As Faith in the City reported, then as now: ‘Viewed against the magnitude of the problem, government action has been pragmatic: treating the worst evidence of economic decline and poverty by small-scale intervention’ (1985:173). These same post-industrial areas remain ‘overlooked and too often ignored’ (Unwin, 2016:4).

4.1 Current laws do not encourage active political engagement where this involves civil society organizations. In its 2012 report, Democratic Audit highlighted the role of independent voluntary associations in supporting and strengthening democracy, counterbalancing the power of the state and the market and holding both to account as well as ‘creating a space in which people can empower themselves in association with others’. The Audit included an assessment of outcomes for civil participation and engagement, including ‘a healthy and vibrant civil society,’ since 2002. It concluded that there had been a modest improvement under new Labour, but the rise of the ‘contract culture’ was a risk to the sector’s independence - something the Deakin Inquiry had pointed out six years earlier.

4.2 While austerity measures have had both direct and indirect impacts on the sector’s voice and independence - for example, through ‘gagging clauses’ in contracts (Independence Panel, 2015) - even more pervasive have been changes in the political environment. Since 2010 there has been mounting criticism of charity campaigning, not least from within government. Organisations such as Oxfam and the Trussell Trust have been much criticised for drawing attention to poverty in the UK today, with both organisations accused of being ‘overtly political’ (Butler, 2014), and the Trussell Trust being accused by the Department for Work and Pensions (ibid) of ‘drumming up business’. The Red Cross has been admonished for ‘meddling in politics’ after it spoke out about the crisis in the NHS (Phillips, 2016).

4.3 The Institute for Economic Affairs continues to accuse voluntary organisations that campaign of being ‘fake charities and sock puppets’ (Snowden, 2012), arguing that charities should be helping poor people rather than campaigning against the causes of poverty. This argument has carried weight with some parts of government, leading to the now (mostly) rescinded ‘anti-advocacy clause’. It also appears to have implicitly informed Charity Commission guidance on campaigning by charities in the EU referendum, which was much more restrictive than that produced by its counterparts in Scotland and Northern Ireland (Charity Commission for England and Wales, 2016; Charity Commission for Northern Ireland, 2016; Office of the Scottish Regulator, 2016).

4.4 Other specific threats to the sector’s voice and independence are identified by the Baring Foundation’s Independence Panel (2015, 2016) and include:

- Commitments to recognise the sector’s right to campaign, and to be consulted at an early stage on policy developments, set out in the Compact between the government and the sector, have been watered down (National Audit Office, 2015);
- The Transparency of Lobbying, Non-Party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014 (the ‘Lobbying Act’) has created a ‘chilling climate’ for charity campaigners and remains unchanged in spite of recommendations for reform identified by Conservative peer Lord Hodgson (2016); and
- Reform of Judicial Review, particularly the imposition of new financial restrictions, will make it much harder for voluntary organisations to challenge government decisions.

4.5 Civil society has long given rise to calls for social justice, from the abolition of slavery to the (on-going) campaign for the living wage. Its continuing ability to do so should therefore be of central concern to an Select Committee investigation into citizenship and civic engagement: If ‘the space for civil society is closing’ and developments in the UK are ‘helping to legitimise regressive trends in the treatment of civil society organisations globally’ (CAF, 2016:2) then any attempts to enhance civic engagement should make clear the possible consequences.

4.6 Our own research and that of others has pointed to the enthusiasm amongst young people for civic engagement alongside the frustrations of not being listened to. In this regard, we would support lowering the voting age to 16.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1 There is as much empirical evidence in support of the notion that civic education/citizenship studies leads to greater involvement in civic life and volunteering over time as there is against it (Edwards 2014). However, on the whole, those who participate in voluntary associations are more likely to participate in politics, especially if they do so at school or university. This would suggest that encouraging political engagement, citizenship and associational activities throughout education is important. Our respondents also regretted the demise of lifelong learning and felt this deflected from community tolerance and understanding difference. This should also be considered in light of research that points to the markers of poverty and low educational attainment as being the most important factors for civic engagement. Civic education may be useful but it can never replace political reform to alleviate poverty.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 In order to understand whether voluntary citizenship programmes work it is necessary to understand what the barriers to volunteering are. According to the Community Life Survey 2015-2016, commissioned by the Cabinet Office, the number of people volunteering has remained stable for many years. Other studies have shown that people are more or less likely to volunteer at different stages in their lives (Mohan, 2015, Brodie et al, 2011): students in full time higher education, are more than twice as likely to volunteer as other age groups (CAF, 2016).

6.2 Lack of time seems to be one barrier preventing more people from volunteering (or volunteering more), when people have busy lives and are already juggling paid work and carrying responsibilities (Charities Aid Foundation (CAF), 2013, Brodie et al, 2011). Our research shows that the reality of working life for most people today - insecure, low paid, zero hours contracts - makes it extremely difficult for people to commit to regular volunteering when they are struggling to survive. It also renders calls for time off work to do so unrealistic (Mohan, 2015, Buckingham, 2012, Coote, 2010). In the current economic climate, when resources are scarce, people in low income areas tend to give less priority to community-based activities (Crisp et al, 2016).

6.3 It is equally important to understand what motivates people to participate. The evidence suggests that they do so for personal and social reasons, because of their ‘faith or values, their sense of community, whether of identity, interest or place, or simply a desire for friendship and conviviality’ (Jochum, et al, 2005:33). Studies show that most people choose to volunteer in the areas of sport and exercise (54%), arts, hobbies and recreational activities (40%) and children’s education / schools (34%) (Buckingham, 2012). In other words, people participate for their own reasons and not in response to government initiatives (Patel, 2016), unless of course they are taking part in action opposing government policy (McCabe, 2010), such as anti-war demonstrations or encouraging people to welcome and support refugees (Citizens UK, 2017).

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1 Edwards (2014) argues that a strong, diverse and independent civil society ecosystem is most likely to make associational life “a handmaiden of broader social progress” (p.110). Ensuring a strong, independent and diverse civil society requires the creation of an enabling environment for all associational life alongside support for specific forms that are missing from the civil society ecosystem.

7.2 A clear theme in the literature is the need for an active and supportive voluntary and community sector infrastructure that can build relationships within and between communities and between civil society and these other sectors (Crisp, et al, 2016, Bolton, 2015, Moore & Mullins, 2013). The value of infrastructure bodies and LIOs has also been recognised by the Independent Commission on Local Infrastructure (2015), convened by the National Association for Voluntary and Community Action. Organisations that can help groups develop and learn, co-ordinate their activities, represent their interests and connect them to resources and decision-makers. This poses a compelling case for long term investment in local infrastructure that is relevant to the needs and circumstances of the sector, but this requires new models of funding and provision to adapt and change (Independent Commission on Local Infrastructure, 2015).

7.3 In recent years charitable foundations have shown an interest in developing programmes focused on local people and places (see for example, IVAR, 2017, Bolton 2015, 2013, Telfer, 2013, Phillips et al, 2011). Recent projects in this vein include the Big Lottery Fund's 'Big Local' programme, which gave residents in 150 local areas £1million to use to improve their local area, with minimal strings attached (IVAR, 2015) and the RSA's project within the Connected Communities programme, which aimed to research and strengthen relationships within communities (Parsfield et al, 2015). There is now a growing literature setting out the lessons that can be drawn from such initiatives. It is clear from these studies that place-based initiatives do little to compensate for the massive withdrawal of place-specific statutory funding such as the abandoning of Labour's regeneration programmes.

7.4 When people in more deprived areas have less 'community wealth' to draw on and face greater challenges in securing the necessary skills, knowledge and contacts they need to achieve change (Lindsey, 2013, Moore and Mullins, 2013, Aiken, et al, 2011), voluntarism alone will do little to ameliorate the impact of austerity or the experience of long-term industrial decline on civic engagement. Proposals that seek simply to increase volunteering as a means to build community capacity without recognising the consequences of long term industrial decline and deeply felt, multi-layered forms of deprivation will not be able to effect social change.

7.5 Long-term support includes on-going funding. As Matthews and Pratt note 'intermittent or poor funding' is one of the main reasons that initiatives 'fizzle out' (2012:iii). In spite of a growing interest in community enterprise, in practice it is very difficult for community initiatives to be financially self-sustaining (Crisp et al, 2016, Moore and Mullins, 2013).

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

8.1 If, as so many studies now argue, social, economic and political equality are vital for the health of our societies, our economies and our democracies then values that support equality such as tolerance, non-discrimination and non-violence are the ones most likely to engender trust, mutual understanding and cooperation. This has been broadly voiced by our participants who have focused on the need for more 'sharing and caring', for bridges rather than walls.

8.2 A challenge for future civil society may be to maintain a focus on human needs: not just recognising the assets within communities, important though this is (RSA, 2015), but developing people's capacity to be and do (Sen, 2010, Nussbaum, 2003) shifting attention from 'the means of living to the actual opportunities of living' (Sen, 2010:233). This draws attention to people's needs and aspirations and how these are shaped and constrained by 'often unjust background conditions' (Nussbaum, 2003:34) of social and economic deprivation, enabling us to ask different questions about how to promote human flourishing and the kind of society we want to live in. This might mean challenging the idea that economic growth is the ultimate goal for societies, and market mechanisms the most effective way of determining human affairs, and increasing the space for, and autonomy of civil society and voluntary action. How do we promote ties based on moral obligations and relationships, rather than contracts? These questions are particularly important at a time when both economic prosperity and environmental sustainability are so fragile, and the need for fair and just solutions, both locally and globally, is so urgent.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

9.1 Looking at who volunteers and/or participates in civic activities, the Third Sector Research Centre has shown that there is a relatively narrow ‘civic core’:

‘ a group constituting less than 10% of the population contribute between 24% and 51% of the total civic engagement, depending on which dimension is examined. ... The social characteristics of members of these ‘core’ groups are analysed and it is shown that members of the ‘civic core’ are drawn predominantly from the most prosperous, middle-aged and highly educated sections of the population, and that they are most likely to live in the least deprived parts of the country.’

(Mohan and Bulloch, 2013)

9.2 Charitable resources are also unevenly distributed with many more located in more affluent areas (Clifford, 2012) where they are more likely to support cultural activities, rather than ‘urgent needs’, and less reliant on statutory funding or paid staff (Lindsay, 2013). Both Lindsey (2013) and Mohan (2015) attribute this to socioeconomic segregation and varying levels of poverty and affluence with more people in more affluent communities having the time, skills resources and connections to engage in this way. Lindsey and Bulloch (2013) asked respondents if they felt that ‘the communities they live in have the capacity to meet their own needs through volunteering’. While no-one felt very confident, some in more affluent areas were aware that there were ‘capable and committed’ people (often retirees) with the wealth, skills and time to give to local causes in their community. In contrast people in more deprived areas were more doubtful (Lindsey and Bulloch, 2013).

9.3 However, studies also show that the poorest in society tend to give the highest proportion of their income to charity. In 2010/11, a study by Li (cited in Pudelek, 2013) showed that the poorest 20 per cent gave 3.2 of their monthly income to charity, while the richest 20 per cent gave just 0.9 per cent. This would suggest that the composition of the ‘civic core’ is not indicative of a lack of civic intent on behalf of the poorest in society but rather that you do not have the luxury of time at your disposal to ‘volunteer’ when you are struggling to get by.

9.4 Economic inequality also maps on to disability, ethnicity and age with the young, disabled and people from Black and Minority Ethnic communities experiencing multiple forms of socio-economic disadvantage and often feeling cut adrift, misrepresented and excluded.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

10.1 In the most recent Community Life Survey, 89% of people agreed that ‘their local area is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together’, an increase of 3% on the previous year - the highest level recorded since 2003 (Cabinet Office, 2016). While this finding is very welcome, it must be seen against a rise in reported hate crimes in recent years. Between 2014 and 2015 there was a 326% rise in reported street-based anti-Muslim incidents (Hansard, 29.6.2016). In the days after the EU referendum (23rd- 26th June 2016) there was a 57% increase in reported hate crime, with more incidents reported in areas that voted leave (Stone, 2016) a trend that was sustained for at least another month (Travis, 2016).

10.2 While some have linked a lack of community accord to the effects of spatial segregation, with high concentrations of minority ethnic communities living in separate neighbourhoods from their white British counterparts (Cantle, 2001; Cantle and Kaufmann, 2016), a recent comprehensive review of social scientific evidence has shown that income inequality and deprivation are far more important determinants of community discord in the UK (Demireva, 2015). In its response to the Casey Review (2016), the Runnymede Trust argued that these inequalities are ‘persistent and widespread’, they ‘remain a major barrier in modern Britain, and that responding to these inequalities and creating the condition for everyone to interact as equals should remain the starting point for any integration policy’ (Runnymede Trust, 2016).

10.3 In the media and elsewhere, diversity, integration and immigration are too often conflated in ways that are unhelpful (Demireva, 2015). Immigration has long been high on the list of people’s concerns, with successive polls recording significant majorities in favour of reducing the number of migrants entering the UK (Edelman, 2016, Blinder and Allen, 2016). However, ICM research on public attitudes towards immigration for British Future, undertaken after the Brexit referendum, suggest that ‘beyond the most vocal extremes’ public opinion is more nuanced with most people being ‘anxious reducers ..[...]..once one paints a picture of an actual person, rather than a generic figure, even if it is just by stating their job, people are more likely to give them a fair shot at joining our society’ (ICM 2016:12)

10.4 In response to this British Future suggests that a ‘national conversation on immigration is needed so that people’s views are heard and they can have a role in shaping policy in this area:

‘While immigration remains a high profile issue, we are not good at talking about it. This means we do not have the opportunity to put forward our views or to hear the opinions of others. Contested narratives are not articulated and renegotiated; communities are not offered a space in which to come to a consensus about immigration and integration. Talking about immigration and how we live together, and agreeing on what constitutes a decent debate, also helps communities to challenge hate crime and prejudice.’

10.5 It is unlikely however that this national conversation will be led by the commercial, mainstream media. This raises the importance of not-for-profit media operating in civil society and in the public interest to better represent the un/misrepresented and highlight important debates and providing a genuinely public sphere.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

[no response]

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

12.1 Faith Groups also have a long tradition of service and action in civil society spaces. Many traditions have organisational structures which respond to the local, for example in the diocesan structures of the Anglican and Catholic churches. These often mean that they maintain a long-term and very rooted presence in every area, even where many other agencies may have withdrawn. Others draw on their long histories as providers of community support through established charitable organisations. Their values and relationality are often regarded as underpinning effective civil society participation. On the other hand, widespread ideas of faiths as oppressive, sexist, homophobic, evangelical and violent feed in to an idea of them as best kept to the private, not public realm. This tension plays out in a context which depends upon faith groups to plug gaps in services and communities, whilst struggling to talk well about them (Dinham 2015).

12.2 Other new forms of activism are emerging that are much less dependent on formal ‘bricks and mortar’ organizations. Digital technology has enabled people to self organise, building and sustaining new social movements and grassroots campaigns. As Fenton states, this has led to ‘a new means of, and a new meaning of being political’ (2016:25). Social media has also enabled small producers, including local enterprises and small charities, to emerge and develop where previously this would have been difficult’ (McCabe and Harris, 2017a:13). This can be seen in local campaigns in the UK that have been enabled by digital communications, for example:

- Focus E15 is a campaign started in 2013 by young mothers threatened with eviction from the hostel where they were living, after Newham Council cut its funding, to be rehoused outside of London, away from their families and social networks. The campaign came to prominence in 2014 after they occupied a block of flats on a local estate that the council was planning to sell to private developers. Since then they have continued to be active, building links with and supporting tenants on other estates, including the Guinness Trust-owned Northwold estate in Hackney, a third of which is under threat of demolition, to be replaced by ‘luxury’ flats for sale at market prices.
- Acorn UK was founded in 2014 by private tenants in Easton, Bristol to campaign to ‘end evictions, rip-off tenancy fees and unhealthy housing’ and help communities to organise in support of more ethical housing. It now operates in 8 cities in England and has just successfully won its first national campaign, getting Santander to agree to drop a clause in its contracts requiring landlords to raise rents to the maximum.
- Just Space is an informal alliance of community groups, campaigns and independent organisations established in 2006. It aims to enable Londoners to participate in planning decisions and ensure that those decisions take account of community needs and not just the interests of developers. Recent actions include a public protest in Haringey against selling public assets to private developers (14.2.17) and working with the Chair of the London Assembly Economy Committee, encouraging people to tweet their views on the needs of small enterprises to inform the committee’s deliberations (21.2.17).

12.3 Digital technology changes the dynamics of communication, ostensibly facilitating opportunities for individuals to participate. But this on-line presence is most effective when linked to off-line activities and opportunities to build solidarity (Cammaerts, 2015, Gerbaudo, 2012, Taylor, 2015). For example, 38 Degrees, best known for organising e-petitions has begun to set up local groups, hosting events and organising meetings with MPs (Fenton, 2016). However, the internet and social media in particular, also stands accused of naturalising the segregation of society into echo chambers. Based on the notion that birds of a feather flock together the internet predicts who we are depending on who we follow on Twitter, who we ‘like’ on Facebook, the ads we linger over, producing network analytics that naturalises the segregation it finds and making a commercial and political virtue out of the fact that we tend to be similar to our friends.

12.4 Furthermore, connective activity online does not transcend social and economic inequalities. In the UK almost all of the wealthiest people use the internet while this falls to 58 per cent amongst the lowest income group (less than £12,500) (Dutton et al., 2013). Just as patterns of economic inequality are replicated in access to healthcare and educational attainment (Wilkinson and Pickett, 2009) so they map onto access to and uses of technology (Pew, 2015). There is a ‘digital divide’: internet users are still younger, more highly educated and richer than non-users, and more likely to be men than women, and more likely to live in cities. Furthermore, the Oxford Internet Institute point out that the one aspect of internet usage that correlates with social class and educational attainment is use for informational or political purposes (Blank and Groselj, 2015). Social media does not exist in a vacuum. While it has the potential to bring new voices into political debates, it can also reflect and reinforce existing social relations and patterns of privilege. The internet may be democratizing, but more often than not its effects are felt most strongly amongst the middle classes (Fenton, 2016).

12.5 New approaches that promote a more tolerant and cohesive society do seem to be emerging: Community Mutuels, Credit Unions, Community Land Trusts, Co-operative childcare, skills-share schemes etc. While such community action can be valuable, it is often by its nature small-scale ‘and cannot be expected to tackle area-wide disadvantage in isolation’ (Crisp, et al, 2016:i).

12.6 The overriding conclusion of much research in the areas of citizenship and civic engagement is that wider social, political and economic context impacts not only on local areas, but also on people’s ability to participate and their power to influence the wider determinants of poverty and disadvantage that affect their lives and the life of their community.

Dr Alistair Clark, Politics Department, Newcastle University – written evidence (CCE0081)

1. My expertise is in electoral integrity and administration in Britain, with several published research articles and reports on these themes, including an evaluation of electoral administration in the 2016 EU Referendum (<http://www.ncl.ac.uk/gps/staff/profile/alistairclark.html#background>). I write in a personal capacity, focusing on two specific aspects of interest to the committee: the impact of electoral law; and how civic engagement may be supported.

Impact of current electoral law

2. The government is committed to putting the onus on the individual to register. Recent registration drives and publicity around this at election and referendums have certainly helped increase the numbers of people registered to vote.
3. There remain clear issues with the system of individual electoral registration. The government have recently reintroduced annual canvasses for electoral registration. This is a system where electoral registration officers (EROs) write to the head of household to check who is registered at that address. This was already tried and tested before being abolished, and reintroduced. This will have added additional costs, both in staff time and financially, to local authorities who are already financially pressed.
4. The current system of individual registration has led to many people who are already registered reapplying, having seen publicity about registration during electoral events. In some cases this has been up to half of these applications. These duplicate applications still need to be checked by administrators; there is currently no way of individuals checking their registration status prior to reapplying. This leads to considerable pressure on electoral administration and registration teams.
5. Our research shows that the extension of the deadline in the 2016 EU Referendum after the Cabinet Office website crashed had a significant impact on the ability of 44% of electoral administration teams to deliver the referendum for example (Clark and James, 2016). Similar issues caused problems in the 2017 general election.
6. There should now be an urgent move towards establishing a system where individual registration can be checked. All publicity should state clearly that if you are already registered, there is no need to re-register. I would recommend investigating a secure online database, located with either local authorities or the Electoral Commission, but funded by the Cabinet Office.
7. Research by myself and Dr. Toby James into the experience of polling station workers in the 2015 general election found that the biggest problem they experienced was people turning up to vote, but not being on the electoral register for some reason (e.g. having moved house) (Clark and James, 2017). 69% of responding polling station workers highlighted this as a problem, with 39% experiencing between 2-5 instances of this, and a further 13% experiencing 6 or more instances on polling day. This was across eight local authorities in North East England and Norfolk. Scaling up, with around 380 local authorities administering elections, this difficulty with registration is likely to be a much wider problem. Polling station staff have no option but to turn away such individuals. This represents a missed opportunity to engage clearly democratically interested people for the future.

8. There is therefore a need for measures to resolve these difficulties. Automatic electoral registration should be investigated by the Cabinet Office, with pilot work being begun into which government datasets might be useful for doing so. Evidence on how this might be achieved may be drawn from American practice in some states where automatic registration is used.
9. Alternatively a version of the American ‘motor voter’ law could be investigated, with information on electoral registration being prominent in communications from other government departments, and the ability to complete registration forms when visiting government departments provided.
10. An additional proposal may help ensure those wishing to vote can be registered to do so. On the day registration is utilised in some American states. This has the benefit of leading to higher turnout. Investigation of this could provide a way of increasing engagement, with a longer term view to piloting it in local elections.
11. With the franchise devolved to the Scottish parliament for some elections, Scottish 16-17 year olds can now vote in local, devolved and other elections in Scotland, although not in those to the Westminster parliament. 16-17 year olds in England, Wales and Northern Ireland do not have such an opportunity, creating an anomaly in the franchise across the UK.
12. As an observer at the 2014 Scottish Independence Referendum, I personally observed many 16-17 year olds voting. They took the process extremely seriously. Research has shown that voting is habit forming. Once the habit is acquired, it is likely to continue. I would recommend extending the vote to 16-17 year olds for all institutions in England, such as PCCs, local government and Mayors, and provide the same powers over the franchise to Wales and Northern Ireland (when the institutions recommence) as Scotland. I would also extend the right to vote in Westminster elections to 16-17 year olds across the UK.
13. Many EU citizens living in the UK are politically engaged, voting in, for example, local and devolved elections and making substantial contributions to British society and economic life. Their electoral status has been thrown into extreme uncertainty after the Brexit result. Urgent clarity is required for such citizens as to what their future electoral and civic rights will be post-Brexit.

14. At minimum, existing electoral rights for EU citizens should be maintained. However, given their contribution to society and engagement more generally, I would argue most strongly for extending this to including elections to the UK parliament for all who have been granted Permanent Residency or equivalent status. This would go some way towards civic engagement and in creating goodwill among a section of society who have been little other than good citizens who have made the UK their home.
15. Our research into the EU referendum (Clark and James, 2016) demonstrated that there are problems with the system for British citizens overseas voting. Mail licences in some countries overseas are reported to not have been recognised, while dispatch dates do not always permit time to send the necessary documentation securely and in a fashion that it can be returned in time to be counted.
16. The government has promised to look at the franchise for overseas voters and the current 15 year limit. This is important. Much more important and pressing is enabling those registered to vote from overseas to do so in a reliable and timely fashion. Given the ubiquity of online modes of voting in some countries, research should be carried out into how such a system might be developed in the limited case of overseas voters, with extensive pilots and evaluation carried out before final implementation.
17. The government and Conservative backbenchers have placed considerable emphasis on the perception that there is considerable electoral fraud taking place across Britain. The Pickles Review into Electoral Fraud (which I contributed evidence to) recommended the piloting of voter identification. The Electoral Commission have also argued for and recommend voter ID. This is already practice in Northern Ireland. It is being implemented in local elections in parts of England in 2018. Many details are still to be arranged, such as which local authorities will take part.
18. Introduction of voter identification laws elsewhere, notably the United States, have in effect become a vote suppression measure with partisan consequences (Wang, 2012). Typically, groups which tend not to carry identification include lower socio-economic groups, students and minorities. There is no current legal requirement in Britain to carry any form of identification.
19. Our research into polling station problems in the 2015 general election suggested that electoral fraud was suspected on barely any occasion by polling station workers across the eight local authorities; 99% of respondents reporting no such problems or suspicions (Clark and James, 2017). While there may be localised problems in some areas, influencing an election by large scale personation is logistically highly unlikely. Research by the Electoral Commission has underlined the rarity of electoral fraud, even if some continue to perceive it as a major difficulty.

20. As noted above, electoral registration is a much bigger problem. I would expect that, under current voter ID proposals, a larger number of people turned away than usual because they do not have any identification with them when they visit the polling station. They are unlikely to make a second trip. There will also be suspicions of vote suppression for partisan benefit, with voter ID requirements likely to hit similar groups to that in the US and hitting Labour support hardest.
21. Implementation of voter ID needs careful and rigorous evaluation which is demonstrably independent from government. This will be carried out by the Electoral Commission. If this policy not to negatively affect citizen engagement, it also requires independent academic assessment, and a pause to its implementation until the effects can be properly established. If the effects are shown to have unintended negative consequences, it requires a commitment from the government to rethink its approach in light of the evidence that electoral fraud in polling stations is actually extremely rare.
22. Our research into the 2016 EU referendum showed an increasing problem with the use of emergency proxy votes, creating difficulties for election administrators (Clark and James, 2016). One view was that this had increased because busy people are not always attentive to electoral deadlines for options such as postal voting.
23. To minimise such difficulties, a further American innovation might provide an answer. This is the option of using early vote centres, where people can vote securely at selected local authority buildings in advance of polling day. This may be more secure than postal voting, which is often criticised for problems with ballot secrecy. It would also provide a way of minimising the numbers of emergency proxies granted by local authorities by allowing voting up to polling day itself. This should be investigated.

Supporting Civic Engagement

24. There are currently some very good efforts at engaging the public with civic affairs. The parliamentary outreach service runs an excellent Parliament Week and year round programme. The Cabinet Office and Minister Chris Skidmore also deserve praise for reforms aimed at hard to reach groups, such as those who need to register anonymously having been victims of domestic abuse. These efforts must continue.
25. Such efforts are also likely to be effective at local level. Yet, electoral administrators have complained of inadequate funding of their vital service. For example, it can take up to two years for local authorities to be refunded the costs of running national elections. Electoral registration activities are not reimbursed, even if the Cabinet Office did provide some funds for implementing IER.

26. Local authorities typically have small teams in their electoral services departments, with an average of around three members of staff (Clark, 2017b). This leaves them vulnerable to staff illness and pressure of work. This has been made worse by the recent cycle of electoral events. The Association of Electoral Administrators have complained about the physical and mental stresses on their members caused in part by inadequate resourcing of a vital service. Importantly, this limits considerably what electoral administrators can do to encourage civic engagement and improve the experience of voters with the electoral system.
27. My own data-driven research has shown that increased financial resource for electoral administrators leads to higher quality elections (Clark, 2014; 2017a; b). Much of this will be spent on staffing, but the physical provision of electoral infrastructure is also an important driver of electoral costs. The finding that more spending leads to better quality elections in Britain has come from two separate investigations into spending on the 2009 European and 2010 general elections.
28. Little is known about this. There is an urgent need for more transparency around how much is spent on electoral administration in the UK. Estimates are that spending on elections is increasing at a time where public spending in local authorities is being squeezed. Transparency and research into public spending on elections would enable efficiencies to be identified and best practice comparisons to be made across local authorities.
29. The Cabinet Office should review the system of election funding, to ensure that local authorities are not out of pocket as a consequence of providing this vital service to electors. This may include a review of time taken to settle accounts, transparency around allocated amounts and so on. Only with such a review will the link between capacity in electoral administration and its resourcing begin to be resolved.

Recommendations

30. I would make the following recommendations:
 - There is an urgent need for a system where individual registration can be checked. This should be investigated by the Cabinet Office and Electoral Commission.
 - All publicity on electoral registration should state clearly that if you are already registered, there is no need to re-register.
 - Investigation of a system where registration can be checked, which could take the form of a secure online database, located with either local authorities or the Electoral Commission, but be funded by the Cabinet Office.

- Automatic electoral registration should be investigated by the Cabinet Office, with pilot work being begun into which government datasets might be useful for doing so.
- A version of the American ‘motor voter’ law should be examined, to enable ease of registration when individuals interact with government departments
- Consider the possibility of providing on-the-day electoral registration and early vote centres
- Extend the vote to 16-17 year olds for all institutions in England, and provide the same powers over the franchise to Wales and Northern Ireland (when those institutions recommence) as Scotland. Extend the right to vote in Westminster elections to 16-17 year olds across the UK.
- Urgent clarity is required for EU citizens as to what their future electoral and civic rights will be post-Brexit.
- Extend the right to vote to include elections to the UK parliament for all EU citizens who have been granted Permanent Residency or equivalent status.
- Research should be carried out into how a system of online voting might be developed in the limited case of overseas voters
- Implementation of voter ID laws should be carefully evaluated in a manner which is demonstrably independent from government.
- Provide a commitment to transparency in election funding and a review of practices around the funding of elections to enable electoral administrators to encourage and maximise civic engagement

Conclusion

31. There are difficulties and inefficiencies in the UK electoral system which hamper civic engagement. This inquiry is therefore a welcome one. The recommendations provided may go some way to resolving some of the issues identified. We all want the best quality elections possible, where everyone eligible to vote can do so, with a minimum of difficulty. I remain happy to discuss these and related matters with the Committee or any stakeholder seeking to improve the operation of the electoral system. If I can be of any further assistance, or can elaborate further on any of these points, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Nick Clarke, Will Jennings and Gerry Stoker – written evidence (CCE0196)

Nick Clarke is Associate Professor in Human Geography at the University of Southampton, and has research expertise on popular understandings of politics, political engagement and disengagement.

Will Jennings is Professor of Political Science and Public Policy at the University of Southampton and a Trustee of the Political Studies Association, and has undertaken research on a range of aspects of public opinion, political discontent and participation.

Gerry Stoker is Professor of Governance at the University of Southampton and Centenary Professor of Governance at the University of Canberra. He has research interests in governance, democratic politics, public participation and public service reform.

This statement is made in a personal capacity, drawing upon both published and unpublished work, including a forthcoming book (with Jonathan Moss) 'The Good Politician: Folk Theories, Political Interaction, and the Rise of Anti-Politics'.

Executive summary

- Negative attitudes towards politics have increased over time, in scope and in intensity
- Many factors have contributed to this development but a key one is the changing processes of interaction between citizens and politicians
- Negativity towards politics is widely shared among citizens but there are variations between social groups in types of expressions of discontent
- Levels and types of political participation vary across demographic groups
- Solutions to anti-politics need to address its underlying causes. New opportunities for interaction between citizens and politicians need to be pioneered

Anti-politics is growing

1. Defining anti-politics as citizens' negative sentiment towards the actors, activities and institutions of formal politics, our research has taken a long view by combining evidence from Mass Observation material capturing directly the views of citizens and original and longitudinal survey data stretching back to the 1940s, as well as focus groups conducted in the last few years. We have established that no 'golden age' of political engagement existed in the UK²³⁷. A substantial proportion of citizens even in the 1940s were dissatisfied with government, thought that politicians were 'out for themselves', viewed politicians as 'not straight-talking', expected contradictory things of politicians, or at least found politicians difficult to judge.

2. Notwithstanding this lack of a golden age we show that anti-politics increased in the UK over the second half of the twentieth century in three respects: social scope, political range, and intensity²³⁸. Most citizens from across all social groups now judge politicians and politics to be flawed. Disillusionment with politics is not confined to one social group – such as, for example, those left behind by economic growth. Furthermore, anti-politics has increased in political scope. Citizens hold more grievances with formal politics. As the twenty-first century gets into its stride, they judge politicians to be self-serving and not straight-talking, but also to be out of touch, all the same, and a joke. There is an increased intensity or strength by which the criticisms of politics found expression with citizens now describing their 'loathing' for politicians who made them 'angry', 'disgusted', and 'depressed'.

3. There are complex generational factors at work here. Grasso²³⁹ argues: 'the extent to which members of a generation will engage in politics – through whatever repertoires of action available to them – and demand political change of the world ...will depend in large part on the dynamics and political characteristics of the era in which they came of age and experienced political socialization'.

4. Britain is not alone in experiencing a trend towards anti-politics²⁴⁰. There are four patterns of decline to consider. Most countries can be grouped under one of four headings. Some are steady decliners (Britain fits this pattern along with the USA and Australia). Some are steep decliners (Ireland, Iceland, Portugal and Spain fit this pattern largely on the impact of economic crisis and associated scandals). Some are decliners from an already low base (Italy and Greece would approximate this pattern). Finally, some are modest decliners (Germany and the Nordic countries would match this pattern). Crucially from the British perspective the rise of anti-politics predates both the parliamentary expenses scandal and the impact of austerity.

Explaining anti-politics

5. There are many possible causes of the rise of anti-politics. We would argue that the evidence of long-term slow decline suggests that the most plausible explanations are those that can match that pattern.²⁴¹

6. A neat distinction is sometimes drawn between demand and supply side explanations of anti-politics. The former focus on changes in the outlooks of citizens and one widely expressed idea is that anti-politics can be expressed by the decline of deference and its flipside the rise of critical or assertive citizens who are secure, educated, and keen to take the initiative in making societal decisions. But our evidence is that citizens were far from universally deferential in the 1940s and 50s and that their mood today is one of feeling terminally let down by the political system and frustrated by the behaviour of politicians. Supply side arguments stress how the politics on offer has changed. Here the most popular line is that a neoliberal consensus gripped formal politics from the late 1970s onwards and the more controlled and limited form of politics on offer pushed citizens away from politics. Yet the evidence of the 1940s and 50s tells us that citizens were not positively engaged with formal politics then, simply because politicians and parties were clearly distinguishable along ideological lines and partisan lines were more clearly delineated.

7. It is in the space between demand and supply side explanations that we think lies part of the answer to the rise of anti-politics. Popular images of the 'good politician' have changed and become more demanding, since these ask politicians to be not only for the people – to be honest, capable, moderate, and strong – but also of the people – to be 'normal' and 'in touch' with 'real' life and 'ordinary' people. In addition, the professionalisation of politics means that politicians are now less diverse as a group (in terms of career path), so they are less able collectively to represent the different virtues expected of them. Furthermore, the contexts of encounter between politicians and citizens have changed. The modes of interaction afforded by media events and professionalised campaigning (e.g. television debates and stage-managed events) make it more difficult for politicians to perform virtues, and for citizens to calibrate judgements.

Demographic variation in anti-politics

8. We also find important variation in the sorts of political discontent expressed across demographic groups – using questions fielded in two surveys in 2014-2015.²⁴² Older voters, interestingly, tend to be more negative in general. Men are more negative specifically about the technical knowhow, leadership capabilities and short-termism of politicians. In terms of social grade, professional/middle class respondents tend to be more sceptical about the capabilities of politicians. In contrast, their working class counterparts are more likely to consider politicians as self-serving and working in the interests of the rich and powerful. Disapproval of the EU (and presumably now support for Brexit) is associated with disbelief that politicians have technical knowhow, can make a difference or possess leadership, are short-termist and self-serving. In this regard, anti-politics was inextricably a feature of the Brexit vote.

9. Looking at survey data from the recent British Election Study (Waves 11 and 12), we find slightly different patterns. Older respondents are more trusting of MPs and disagree that politicians don't care about people like them, but do tend to think that elected officials 'talk too much' and don't get enough done. This points to a possible difference in generalised trust compared to evaluations of the behaviour of politicians. Additionally, those with a higher level of education tend to be more positive towards politicians in general, while those on low incomes are more likely to be distrusting of MPs, as well as being of the view politicians don't care what they think, and agreeing that elected officials talk too much.

10. It is evident, then, that while anti-politics is a widespread phenomenon, there is some variation in how deeply it is felt in different parts of society and against which criteria politicians are judged by citizens.

Trends and varieties of political participation

11. While it is widely accepted that anti-political opinion has increased in recent times, there has arguably been more debate over whether political participation has been in decline or has instead been reinvented in more informal channels (rather than voting). In historical perspective, there is some evidence to suggest that political participation is waning among the young, in particular compared to the post-war generation – especially when measured in terms of citizens contacting elected officials or taking part in protests.²⁴³ There is evidence, however, from the recent British Election Study (Wave 13) that the young tend to spend more time following politics on the Internet, and during the 2017 general election campaign were more likely to have shared political content on Twitter, instant messaging or other online platforms, though interestingly there no age differences for posting on Facebook (Wave 12). There is some prospect, then, of political participation moving online for younger generations – replacing traditional forms of civic engagement and activism.

12. Another important feature of political participation is whether it reinforces or reduces existing social and economic inequalities. Aside from variation in participation by generation, it is possible to consider levels of participation among working class and professional/middle class citizens, between ethnic minorities and white-British citizens, and also by Leave/Remain vote in the EU referendum of June 2016. Table 1 below reports the percentage of respondents to the British Election Study's post-2015 election survey (Wave 6) indicating they had taken part in each of the modes of participation, with the relevant demographic groups indicated by the column headings. Also included in the table are participation in various online channels during the campaign wave of the 2017 general election (Wave 12). Because survey respondents tend, on average, to be more politically engaged than the rest of the population,²⁴⁴ the percentages are best used for purposes of inter-group comparison rather than for estimation of absolute levels.

13. These data offer a range of interesting insights on how participation varies across social groups. Here the difference between younger and older citizens is less clear-cut, with the under-25s actually being more active in political parties or groups, and having boycotted products for political/ethical reasons. Interestingly, there are few differences by ethnicity, while in contrast there is a substantial divide between Leave and Remain voters, with the latter tending to be more politically engaged across a range of activities. As one might expect, those from the working class are slightly less likely to engage in the forms of political activity. When considering options for engaging citizens, then, it is important to consider their baseline level of participation, and the sorts of factors that might enable or discourage their engagement in particular activities.

Solutions

14. If we are right about the complex dynamics driving anti-politics and political participation we would suggest the need for the search solutions to move beyond the usual suspects. Better political education is probably a good thing but it does not allow for experiences to calibrate and judge politics differently. Constitutional changes often favoured by elites are often viewed by citizens as the equivalent of moving deckchairs around on the Titanic, it matters little to them if one group of politicians has more say than another. Multiple experiments in democratic innovation show that citizens can engage in policymaking effectively but there is little evidence that most want, or have the time, to do that on a sustained basis. We need to make representative politics work better and that means changing the way it works, the way that citizens can experience it and the way therefore they judge its inevitably flawed processes and practices. We have institutionalised a marketised, media-driven and shallow form of political exchange. As our long-view shows politics is unlikely to be comfortably embraced by but it could be better received, we argue, if it changed its institutional practices to make them more open, more engaging, richer, and more interactive. There is a need for a period of rethinking and experimentation to achieve that objective.

Victoria Clutton – written evidence (CCE0001)

My name is Victoria Clutton. I am a citizen submitting this document in a personal capacity.

1. I think citizenship is belonging to a particular a particular political system and associated set of social institutions. This encompasses both the benefits and responsibilities associated with that membership.

I think civic engagement is the ability to participate in the political process, run for political office, and make your issues and voice heard.

These things matter because if a political system does not honestly reflect the needs and wishes of the populace it governs then people aren't able to live the best, most effective versions of their lives. In the most extreme cases ignorance of the needs and wishes of the populace causes unnecessary suffering, death and loss of human rights. I think this illustrates the relationship between identity and citizenship or civic engagement. Identity is a useful concept as a short hand for a particular set of needs and beliefs and cultural norms. Identity has limits as a concept because most people don't fit neatly within the agreed modal incarnation of a particular identity but as base heuristic, making sure that the identities that make up your citizenship all have access to means of civic engagement is a really good idea. If you want to make sure a political system reflects the populace then a good start is having the political ruling class embody or at least engage with the full range of identities represented in the populace.

2. Speaking as a disabled person, you could take our human rights seriously, take including us in society seriously and engage with us better when making decisions about our lives. Accessibility to the political process is a problem, accessibility to legal support is a problem. If you want disabled people to feel more like citizens, giving them the same rights (not the same outcomes, the same rights) as other citizens would be a great place to start. For evidence that disabled people do not currently enjoy the same human rights as the rest of the populace, please see the UN report on human rights in the UK (accessible at: <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/HRBodies/CRPD/Pages/InquiryProcedure.aspx>)

4. I would like to see the voting age lowered to 16. If you can legally have a child and drive a car, you are deemed legally responsible for your life the lives of others. Voting is being responsible for your life and the lives of your fellow citizens, it doesn't make sense to me that we deem people responsible for those things at different ages.

Voting registration legislation should not be tightened, eg requiring a driving license or a passport to register. Voter fraud is a tiny tiny problem, well below the threshold where it could ever be expected to be statistically or absolutely significant. Tightening voter registration disadvantages the poor, the elderly, the disabled, immigrants and women through a combination of creating a financial and accessibility bar to entry for the right to vote and/or making it more difficult to vote if your name or personal details change.

I would like to see us move away from a first past the post system. It encourages 2 party politics, partisanship, encourages gerrymandering and decreases civic engagement because people know how much their vote matters depends strongly on where they live. Why bother to vote if you live in the safe seat of another party. At the very least I would think that a voting system that didn't so strongly distort the vote would give the government more information to go on and a better idea of what people actually want.

8. Freedom, tolerance, equal rights, human rights, fairness, openness, prudence, opportunity for all, innovation

Our Syria policy is a threat. Our welfare policy is a threat to the poor and disabled and elderly. Our general lack of tolerance is a particular threat to Muslim and disabled people if the hate crime statistics are anything to go by.

9. Please see everything I've said previously about the disabled, poor and elderly. Much of our welfare policy isolates people in these groups and punishes them, sometimes in ways that are arguably criminal. Stop doing that.

10. I think I've already defined my view of the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement. I think social cohesion is about defining our society in terms of what we care all care about (freedom, equal rights, opportunity, etc) and encouraging tolerance. Focus on what ties us together instead of cultural or religious differences. Explicitly define British values in our public discourse as a set of values that are independent of cultural or religious norms and show people that other differences don't really matter that much.

Kate Coleclough, Head of Religious Studies, PSHE and Citizenship, Sir Thomas Boteler CE High School – written evidence (CCE0029)

I have been a teacher since 1999 and as part of my PGCE opted for Citizenship to be a supplementary subject as I felt it would complement my Religious Studies training and give me a wider understanding of society beyond my own experience. I soon realised the value of Citizenship education and its role in promoting active members of society and socially responsible citizens. I have since been a firm advocate for the subject and have sort out many different learning opportunities for my pupils to participate in, even being involved in the creation and pilot of a Young Leaders Award endorsed by the Archbishop of York. Of course Citizenship is important, how on earth do we hope to inspire the next generation to become socially responsible and exercise their democratic rights if they don't understand what they actually are or have a skewed, self entitled approach to their place in the world?

Over the years I have seen cohort after cohort become involved in charity fundraisers as part of a school charity event often relying on non-uniform days and cake sales at break to raise funds for the local hospice, which in itself is admirable but there is so much more to being an active citizen and engaging with the issues which face us as a modern society. I have seen the rise in interest in the subject at my school, we offer it as an option at GCSE, I have seen individuals with bright ideas and idealistic values looking to make a difference in the world, some wish to go on to a career in public services or law and therefore hold a genuine interest in the topics covered. Then there are some, who at a loss of what to choose have pulled the subject 'out of the hat' to 'give it a go, my mate says its easy' and of course it is easy for some, but not all. Unfortunately, particularly since the focus on E-bacc subjects, I have had more of this pupil category in my classes as they have been 'encouraged' or steered towards my subject so as to not affect the results from another curriculum area.

Feeling a little bit like a last resort is a challenge but alongside the ones who have chosen the subject and are passionate about it some balance is created and an interesting climate for debate. It is therefore essential to engage the pupils and use whatever resources are available. I find it is essential that they all get the opportunity to visit Parliament and see where decisions are made, to participate in the workshops provided by the Parliamentary Education Centre and ask any questions they want without fear of ridicule. I offer this visit every year and although it is a long way to travel and I get very little sleep, it is a small price to pay for the experience the young people receive visiting the capital.

I have noticed over the years that pupils have been more willing to engage in active citizenship, at first it was because of the coursework project and something that has to be done, but now more and more projects are springing up and many more pupils asking for support with charitable actions and civil engagement. Where as in the beginning pupils would opt to do a 'campaign' about fair trade or litter, where they would do a survey of family and friends and interview the canteen and caretaking staff, I'm finding much more gritty topics being chosen in recent times. This past year I had two pupils visit a local primary school and deliver E-safety workshops to each class – extremely high quality workshops that made me very proud. In a similar way two further pupils looked at xenophobia in the town after being inspired to look at this after the Brexit referendum. They went so far as to write to the local press and had a letter published, this turned into a rather public debate where they were able to maturely and sensibly promote a balanced and well informed argument setting their opinions out clearly and diplomatically. One of these young men, as a result, has expressed a desire to work in politics in the future and in my opinion, he will be an asset!

Topics such as human trafficking, LGBTQ+ rights, race relations, xenophobia, foodbanks, the migrant crisis and other such contentious issues have replaced the airbrushing of models in magazines, recycling and litter as issues the pupils choose to campaign about. We filled a transit van full of supplies to be sent to Syria and the refugees in camps around Europe, another example of a pupils altruistic approach, she said that not only did she want to encourage others to change their views but also wanted to practically help at the same time. Seeing young people really step up to the mark and challenge those in the local community and within their families about some of the most important issues in today's world is what Citizenship is all about. The actions are taking place outside of school much more than ever before with very few taking the easy road of a class survey and interview with a member of staff.

Never have young people been more interested in politics and elections than in recent times. I always run a mock election to mirror the national ones, it is interesting to see how 'voter engagement' has increased in the last 2 years and how pupils are wanting to discuss in their form groups the different issues associated with the elections. It is interesting to see some pupils arguing (politely and appropriately) with staff the different social issues and the political parties approaches to them and disagreeing with each other, its challenging and inspiring to see so many young people with strong opinions and ideals, that respect the British values and are prepared to stand up for what they believe in. You see, citizenship is so much more than learning how voting systems work, what your human rights are and how the UK plays a part in the world, it is about how you can be all you can be and how you can contribute to society in a way that is much more than a good grade on a certificate. It's about how the law is there to keep us safe and enable us to achieve great things and change the world, justice is a thing to be celebrated as is democracy as citizenship enables us to accept the views of others, we don't necessarily agree with them, but they have their views just as I have mine and citizenship promotes respect.

Looking at issues that affect society in an objective manner enables young people to develop their own views and opinions, I have seen the pupils who have taken the subject on a whim become inspired and achieve so much more than a grade; confidence and resilience is developed as well as a sense of pride in our national values. No longer repeating xenophobic phrases about benefits claimants and migrants heard in the local communities these young people are asking questions for themselves and seeking out the answers they require from numerous sources and developing the value of tolerance as they realise the benefits of a multi-cultural society and recognise the perpetuation of negative media coverage as not necessarily representative of the issue.

Citizenship is an essential subject area, I know we deliver a full GCSE option but it is a subject that goes beyond the qualification, we have a strong school council and pupil ambassador program. Our young people are proud of the school and what to be a part of it, they are keen to give back and support those joining us in the future, both pupils and staff. Pupil voice plays a part in the school and representatives from the school council report to the governors regularly on what they are doing. Good citizenship education gives young people a purpose and opportunity to get involved with the things that affect them, gives them a voice and the chance to participate in change.

We are a very different society today from the ‘make do and mend’ Britain of the WW2 era but we have not forgotten the values that we have fought so hard to keep, our young people are valuable and citizenship education needs to be quality and engaging, not a ‘make do’ curriculum paying lip service to what once was. The pupils are the future and we have a duty to equip them with the very best of tools so when they leave us and venture out into the world they can be useful and contribute positively to society. Not all will respond positively to the issues and opportunities given but there are those who will and the seeds that have been sown may be cultivated well into the future and challenge those who disagree. In a modern world pupils are plugged in to what is happening, they are more aware of world events and different opinions perpetuated from different groups thanks to social media. It has been essential to address the issue of ‘fake news’ and explain that sources of information needs to be verified and supported with evidence. Pupils are becoming more discerning and question the validity of some articles and stories presented to them, however, this can lead to them questioning me and my information! I would much rather have this though, than blind acceptance of an inappropriate ideology.

As a society we are facing many difficult issues that young people have questions about that are not always easy to answer, the recent terror attacks are galling and as adults we are often unable to coherently articulate how we feel about this. In response to the Manchester bombing, not that far away from us, we painted 22 bees around school as a lasting reminder of those who lost their lives, the pupils helped select the locations for these. Many pupils knew people in attendance and needed some way to process what had happened, some staff struggle to deal with the questions generated by such acts, citizenship can help address issues but also enable pupils to make some sense of the world when it appears to be broken.

To conclude, my personal view is based on my experience and passion as a teacher to deliver the best citizenship education I can, I am enabled and supported by my school and

SLT in this as the subject is valued and timetabled well alongside other subjects. The best Citizenship education encompasses quality first teaching, the engagement of learners, visitors from the local council, MP's, the Mayor, Magistrates, Environmental Officers to name a few, in addition to visits to London, Parliament, the town hall and other appropriate venues. As much thought and planning needs to go into the subject as any other curriculum area, the pupils will see the value if the school celebrates the subject and promotes the value of Citizenship Education.

Community Channel – written evidence (CCE0213)

About Community Channel:

Broadcasting on free-to-air television 24 hours a day into all UK homes, Community Channel changes lives and communities, inspires new ideas, new conversations, volunteering and community engagement.

Launched in 2000, Community Channel audiences continue to grow, with over 10 million unique viewers watching Community Channel content last year. Our BARB-rated TV audiences are over 9 million a year, based on unique individuals who watch for at least 3 minutes, and on average 20 minutes.

In July 2016 following a successful ‘community shares’ Crowdfunder campaign, Community Channel moved out of Media Trust ownership to become a charitable Community Benefit Society (CBS), owned by its new community shareholders, who range from individuals in communities across the UK through to charitable foundations and media companies.

The Channel broadcasts free-to-air across the UK, on Freeview, Sky, Virgin Media and Freesat, and most content is available online. Media and digital partners donate bandwidth, content and marketing support. The demographic we reach (35+, and lower demographic) are still major television consumers.

“Watching Community Channel has literally changed my life. It inspired me to leave the house, to join a local group as a volunteer, and then to get a job. Now I in turn mentor others. Thank you.”

Response to the call for evidence to the Committee:

1. The Community Channel response emphasises:
 - the importance of the media and digital sector in promoting, reinforcing, inspiring and defining citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century
 - the importance of supporting civil society, communities and citizens across the UK to communicate through a range of media, from mainstream media to social media, to participate in content creation directly and indirectly, to ‘have a voice’, and to be seen and heard by as wide an audience as possible.

- The role of government and regulators in enabling, encouraging the media and digital sectors to play a lead role in bringing people together, at local and national levels, and promoting engaged citizenship through both face2face and digital activity.
2. Our experience of many decades working across the media and civil society, through Community Channel’s 17 years of existence, the 23 years of the Channel’s original parent charity Media Trust, and the social action broadcasting work of Community Service Volunteers that inspired Media Trust’s founding, underpins our belief that civil society, civic engagement, positive approaches to citizenship and identity, all rely immensely on positive reflection across media, and that media, whether mainstream or digital, national or local is a key, if not THE key, force that can create either positive or negative social values.
 3. It is vital not to take for granted the long-fought-for media ecology of the UK, with its old and new institutions. We urge the Committee to look seriously into the role and potential role of the media in encouraging and fostering citizenship and civic engagement as part of the report, and would be happy to provide further evidence in more depth. Below are just a few areas for consideration:

4. Public Service Broadcasting and The Communications Act 2003

4.1 Ofcom's principal duty, as set out in section 3(1) of the Communications Act 2003, includes “furthering the interests of UK citizens in relation to communications matters.” (1) Ofcom should be more actively involved in future discussions around citizenship and civic engagement and how its regulation of communications can support this area. Pressure on Ofcom and government from public service broadcasters to reduce their social action and citizenship roles, particularly on the high impact free-to-air UK-wide broadcast platforms, has led to a significant reduction in the visibility of positive civic engagement. Television remains by far the most watched, and influential medium in the UK, including among young people, and should not be disregarded by the Committee (2).

The creativity and resource that can be put into encouraging the UK to bake, thanks to ‘The Great British Bake Off’, could also be channelled into innovative content that inspires social action, volunteering and civic engagement.

4.2 Clearly the growing and widespread influence of digital, social and ‘user-generated’ content has enormous influence for both positive and negative behaviours.

4.3 We would like to encourage Ofcom and the newspaper (self-)regulators to play a more active role in countering and minimising negative portrayal of various communities across the UK, across mainstream media, and digital media, to minimise reinforcement of negative attitudes and behaviours, and to inform, and inspire, positive civic engagement, including formal and informal volunteering and social action. The ultimate extreme of ‘hate crime’, and related ‘fake news’ can be minimised through positive campaigns and engagement with the wider media and digital industry.

5. The unique role of The Department for Digital, Culture, Media & Sport (DCMS):

5.1 DCMS has a unique potential role to bring together the media and digital sectors, the lottery distributors, and the wide range of civil society organisations, from the tiniest community groups through to the largest charities, and the growing movement of social enterprise, co-operatives and mutuals.

5.2 We would encourage the Office for Civil Society to collaborate more closely and pro-actively with the broadcast, media and digital teams in DCMS with a specific purpose of inspiring citizenship and civic engagement. The power of bringing together the different parts of DCMS

5.3 We encourage DCMS to lead the way in supporting civil society organisations to have the resources to use media and communications effectively, to give a voice to the people and communities they support and represent, and to inspire others across the UK to engage in civil society, to develop new forms of mutual, co-operative and voluntary activity, using both mainstream and digital media to share best practice, tell stories and inspire social action and civic engagement.

5.4 We would encourage the DCMS and other government departments to widen their support to older people, indeed those above 25! The growing 50+ population has much to offer, both in taking active roles themselves, but also in inspiring, mentoring and supporting others.

5.5 A sustainable future for content creation and distribution, focussed on social action, citizenship and civic engagement:

We encourage DCMS to ring-fence a significant amount of the ‘Contestable Fund’, the new pilot £60m fund within DCMS created with BBC funds, for content that is related to education, religion, and social action (3). We expect that this fund will become available in early-2018, following the recent DCMS consultation on its purpose (see also Community Channel response to the consultation). Part of the fund’s wider purpose is to create public service content for broadcast (free-to-air), into all UK homes, creating content that reflects issues, voices and communities not seen on mainstream public service platforms. There is great potential to develop a dedicated high impact content fund for social action, with opportunities for co-production and co-funding from media and digital partners. We are also encouraging major funders, particularly across the lottery distributors, to add match funding to this fund, for both broadcast and digital content that reflects our shared visions and ambitions to support, strengthen and empower people and communities across UK.

6. Cross-government collaboration: We would welcome a more formal, regular, structured and influential cross-departmental activity around the areas of citizenship and civic engagement, to minimise duplication of effort and resources, and increase sharing of best practice.

7. The potential impact of Community Channel

7.1 We would encourage support for and investment in the Community Channel, to continue to grow its mainstream TV audiences and its digital and social media audiences, alongside its partnerships with mainstream and digital media. It is a unique UK platform for content and voices related to civil society, civic engagement, volunteering and social action, faith and ethnicity, bringing together the inspirational diversity of the UK communities and UK citizens, of all ages and backgrounds.

7.2 Amy, just one of our millions of viewers, told us:

“Community Channel connects me with local communities, not only my own but others around the country and the world. It makes real human lives feel like they are connected to me, no matter how far, everyone counts, alone we are nothing, together we are something. In a world of disconnection, mainstream media control, and faceless internet groups, the

Community Channel – written evidence (CCE0213)

Community Channel provides a connection to others and to community action, in a way no other media outlet has managed.”

Amy Rose Taylor, Community Channel viewer, aged 35-44.

Thank you for considering this response.

Community First Yorkshire – written evidence (CCE0075)

Q1 What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship and civic engagement concerns people feeling part of something and taking social responsibility. It enables societies to flourish by mobilising the energy of people within a particular community. It matters because people will have connection with one-another and feel part of a ‘home’ by birth, naturalisation or residency however long or short. It does relate to questions of identity and people identify with being part of different groups and communities. Not feeling part of or identifying with a community is less likely to engender civic engagement.

Q2 Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role?

Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Yes and pride needs to be rooted in part on a culture of respecting diversity.

Q3 Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Q4 Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Secondary school curriculum changes have seen the removal of hours devoted to extended school activities and extra curriculum time and teacher/support worker resources to broaden students involvement in outside school projects. School activities and initiatives should be extended to include young people furthering their study at FE colleges. The national and regional FE Review led by the Education and Skills Funding Agency, through LEPs and other partnership structures does not give any insight into citizenship and civic engagement activities for learners taking this route. The same message is relevant to young people taking Apprenticeships, with time and resources provided to engage in civic activities.

Q6 Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

From local experience of youth groups, the view held is that the active citizen agenda with young people needs to be more than just a few hours of volunteering that NCS provides.

Support for citizenship activities needs a wider focus and should acknowledge the role of work done by a wider range of organised group activities – youth clubs come through strongly and rightly so, but so should organised sport, arts etc. Any forum where young people can engage together in productive activities or social action and where they can move on to leadership roles is key. These organised activities also provide good role models – a young person may become a coach and latter support the village hall that is their changing rooms and eventually join the Parish Council etc. A gradual developing of a sense of citizenship. These wider groups should be linked in and seen as follow-on to NCS involvement to maintain young people’s interest and provide on-going activities.

For a significant number of NCS participants, the experience is really good and they produce some really useful social action but as with any programme that is so prescriptive a lot of participants will simply go through the process and some have a terrible time.

A colleague who was at a Police and Crime Commissioner Youth Crime Commission meeting a couple of years ago heard one young person say publicly to a sizeable audience:

‘that NCS was the worst experience of her life.’ Comment made at an event at The Priory Street, York in front of a large number of influential people.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?

Overall things like NCS are great as a standalone programme that young people can enjoy but to suggest that this would create more active citizens is not something that is actually occurring. Significant amounts of young people are not engaging with NCS (the amount of unfilled spaces each year evidences this) and with the reduction in youth work support they are being left on their own, potentially vulnerable and ultimately as the issues build are far less likely to be active citizens, and are likely to become those that need more active citizens to help them.

Are they the right length?

The issue with NCS is that it is over too short a period of time. The programme last around 6 weeks. It appears from experience on the ground and comments from young people, that six weeks is merely tokenistic and does not provide the opportunity for effective and on-going support to produce active citizens. Those that will become active will do it despite NCS not because of it. What is missing is a support mechanism to encourage further social action once the programme is over. If NCS is the first experience of volunteering for young person how do they continue? Who helps them find new opportunities?

Q9 Should they be compulsory, and if so, when?

No. Involvement by choice creates a far more motivated and participative learner.

The North Yorkshire and York Volunteering Strategy 2015- 2020 has specific actions to engage young people in volunteer as part of creating a longer term engagement in communities. This strategy was produced in partnership by members of the VCS Strategic Leaders group to provide a context for collaboration and planning. The table provides relevant extracts relating to young people and citizenship.

Government should look to supporting the development of strategic plans for communities (be they geographical or communities of interest), to bring together key partners involved in planning and funding work with people and communities to create stronger and more sustainable communities. This approach would mirror the economic plans of LEPs, and provide the social context to complement economic development activities.

Should they include a greater political element?

To help young people understand the political landscape and how to engage with decision makers would be useful but not sure NCS is the right vehicle to explore complex views – simply because of the timescales involved. The need to join up with appropriate curriculum subjects within local schools is important to provide this context.

Are they good value for money?

No. The money invested in NCS could be distributed across the country to support youth work (or other programmes) much more effectively. It would provide year round support and opportunities for young people to become active citizens and provide a significant amount of added value through the relationships that can be built up. Helping to spot things like CSE, Radicalisation, At risk of teenage pregnancy, at risk of entering the criminal justice system and so on. As an example the £8 million spent on advertising NCS would have kept a significant amount of youth services open. The audit commissions report on NCS said it all – too expensive what it provides. NCS certificated experience can be met through a number of infrastructure routes, which local your support organisations can make available and provide support to ensure achievement.

What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

To actually provide the support for young people to become active citizens the money should be invested into youth work or specific volunteering programmes such as Involved (previously millennium volunteers). The rational being that youth workers provide year round support and can run many volunteering events within the time periods that young people want – not just over the summer holidays (there are other options but again are quite prescriptive). The added benefit is that they can support young people with many other issues, they are well qualified, work across a variety of age groups (11 – 19) and therefore can create the active citizen habit. I started as a youth club member that was encourage to volunteer and I've volunteered in a number of roles since then, as an example.

Support for citizenship activities needs a wider focus and should acknowledge the role of work done by an wider range of organised group activities – youth clubs come through strongly and rightly so, but so should organised sport, arts etc. Any forum where young people can engage together in productive activities or social action and where they can move on to leadership roles is key. These organised activities also provide good role models – a young person may become a coach and latter support the village hall that is their changing rooms and eventually join the Parish Council etc. A gradual developing of a sense of citizenship.

A recent announcement is the NCS will now provide mental health training for young people on NCS – youth workers do this as part of the on-going support process and would start at 11, not 16 which by the press releases own admission is up to 2 years behind, as a lot of issues start at 14. It is also after the GCSE exams and there is no help earlier, especially for those young people struggling with exam worries etc.

Q7 How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Recognise and acknowledge the role of work done by an wider range of organised groups– youth clubs, organised sport, arts etc. Any forum where young people can engage together in productive activities or social action and where they can move on to leadership roles is key. These organised activities also provide good role models – a young person may become a coach and latter support the village hall that is their changing rooms and eventually join the Parish Council etc. A gradual developing of a sense of citizenship. Links to these in any local area should be part of the vision for NCS.

In York, North Yorkshire and the East Riding VCSE Strategic Leaders Group work together within a shared strategic context to make a difference in the civic/community life of our communities to make that difference. The Volunteering Strategy is a key document for the Group setting out the aims and priorities to 2020, and used as part of conversations with funders and planners to shape local investment. Government could look to supporting the development of strategic plans for communities (be they geographical or communities of interest), to bring together key partners involved in planning and funding work with people and communities to create stronger and more sustainable communities. This approach would mirror the economic plans of LEPs, and provide the social context to complement economic development activities.

A recommendation from recent research into the BME communities in North Yorkshire suggested funding should be available for a training programme to:

- provide information about how our health, housing, education and other civic functions work. These could be through ESOL learning programmes such as those designed by the Workers' Education Association, which also incorporate confidence building and empowerment approaches. They could have a wider application to more than BME groups,
- improve the 'voice' of BME groups by developing skills in advocacy, campaigning and articulating needs
- provide skills in group development for BME and other groups using the skills and resources already existing in local support and development organisations.

This programme of learning could usefully be delivered by some of the people already involved in running and supporting their own groups where they exist. This includes volunteers involved in the admittedly small number of formally constituted community groups. Provision could be made for Training for Trainers courses which would equip people representative of some of the groups mentioned above with the skills and knowledge necessary for empowering themselves and others.

Q8 What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Q9 Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Research conducted on behalf of the North Yorkshire Equality and Diversity Strategic Partnership into BME communities in North Yorkshire identified BME groups are often invisible to policy makers and service providers because their numbers are small and people are often not concentrated together. Invisibility is a barrier to all types of engagement. This lack of engagement in active citizenship and lack of visibility can lead to the absence of culturally appropriate approaches to engagement and services. Invisibility and absence of organised groups was reflected by the difficulty faced by the researcher to identify many organised groups, and the need to adopt other methods to find people to interview, which included attending children's centre groups and English classes. This led to a good depth of views from a diverse range of individuals, with very little reference to groups.

The statistics and views of the people and groups interviewed, showed a level of super diversity – of nationalities, races, religions, social class, age and reasons for living in North Yorkshire. This reflects the diverse nature generally as different districts of the county have attracted migrants and settlers for different socio economic reasons across the generations, all with different histories and needs. This diversity mitigates against a critical mass sufficient to influence and engagement. As a result of this super diversity, there is little scope for generalising about the experiences of people belonging to BME groups of receiving services and, in fact, it would be dangerous to do so. There were differential expectations about public services and different people and groups experienced different issues.

There were, some common themes and barriers including the complexity of accessing both health services and social housing, the cost of paying for ESOL classes for people very willing to learn English and, most importantly, the stressful working conditions that some people faced without recourse to enforcement and advice agencies.

The results of the research led to recommendations about a need for greater awareness of the needs of a very diverse population and adopting a ‘needs not numbers’ approach to service provision. The results provide intelligence to be used to inform planning to attract funding for a learning programme that can provide not only learning about how our systems work but also equip people and groups with a voice by developing their skills in advocacy, campaigning and articulating needs. This voice could be further enhanced by the forming of a reference group of people representing the groups visited and of individuals who took part in the research. Consideration will need to be given to family and work constraints of those who want to be involved and the costs of travelling across a county like North Yorkshire.

Rural areas have unique barriers to getting involved in social action or volunteering as a first point of citizenship. Transport, distance, sparsity of children, sparsity of people to lead activities and lack of places for young people to congregate and get involved are all very real issues for young people in rural communities, especially for those whose parents are for many reasons unable to take their children to groups and activities. Youth clubs and other groups help to counter this at a very local level. Public facilities such as village schools could be opened up more for use by wider groups in the communities.

Q10 How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Q11 How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Recent research among the BME community in North Yorkshire highlighted a lack of or the cost of ESOL classes in FE colleges and elsewhere were seen as a barrier to people learning English in order to feel confident to engage in community, social and economic activity.

Q12 Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

The idea of youth Parish Councils could be adopted more widely, where communities have one and take it seriously it gives young people a really good first taste of holding a role of worth and having their views heard and acted on.

Supporting process for parish plans to be developed with the aim of bringing together the views, needs and opportunities from across diverse populations, would help develop everyone's understanding of one another and involvement in shaping services and activities to suit everyone's interest and needs. Parish plans have in the past brought communities together and led to more civic engagement in local planning and activities.

Community Organisers Ltd – written evidence (CCE0200)

- 1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter and how does it relate to questions of identity?
2. Trust in the institutions that influence, shape and govern our society are at an all-time low. According to the Edleman Trust (2017) they identified that 53% of people interviewed felt that the system had ‘failed them’. This is unacceptable.
3. Over recent decades the destabilisation of industry, the erosion of geographic boundaries and the instability in the political sphere has led to people feeling more disconnected than ever before from those that affect their decisions.
4. Despite this, the underlying human condition that relates to the need for people to belong remains. Disillusionment with the ‘system’ means that people are seeking belonging in other ways. It is paramount that the ‘system’ seeks to rebuild trust with citizens. By rebuilding trust we can start to reconnect with people and reshape what identity, citizenship and civic engagement means in the 21st century.
- 5. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?
6. Citizenship is defined as being;

- the state of being vested with the rights, privileges, and duties of a citizen.
- the character of an individual viewed as a member of society; behaviour in terms of the duties obligations, and functions of a citizen

(source: Dictionary.com Unabridged. Random House, Inc. 6 Sep. 2017)

7. This definition suggests that citizenship is more about the legal rights and duties that an individual is entitled to rather than the sense of belonging that they might feel to a place. Belonging is derived from holding a personal connection to a common identity and shared interest determined by an individual's own perception of self in relation to the wider world rather than the rights ascribed to them.
8. Ceremonies, events and other activities may play one step in creating a connection between the individual and the state but to build a relationship where rights and associated responsibilities are widely shared and understood is part of an educative and ongoing process where all parties are part of the learning process.
9. The state needs to create the conditions for dialogue to enable a shared sense of understanding with those with whom it seeks to engage as citizens. It needs to act as a facilitator or enabler to create a sense of 'we' breaking down the dichotomies between I (as an individual), 'US' and 'THEM'.
- 10. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?
11. We live in a democracy in which power to effect decisions resides in the hands of people. We (as people) have the tools to change the decisions that affect our lives.
12. The General Election this year saw the highest voter turnout since 2001. Interest in the political sphere is growing amongst young people who are actively calling for change.
13. It is crucial, therefore, that the political system is reflective of the people for whom it makes decisions on behalf of.

14. It does seem obscure that you can get married at 16, pay taxes at 16 and drive at 17 yet not able to have a say over the laws that govern our relationships, how taxes are spent or on decisions on motoring until the age of 18.
15. The legislature of the United Kingdom has enshrined in law the Localism Act 2011 which has given greater power to citizens to influence, inform and take control of the assets, services, places in which they live.
16. However, despite the rule of law and such acts as the Localism Act, the determining factor that encourages active political engagement is the level of agency that an individual has to influence the decisions and world around them.
- 17. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?
18. Whilst Citizenship education is statutory for KS3 and KS4, 61% (2,075 out of 3,381) of secondary schools in England are Academies and consequently not bound to follow the National Curriculum. There should be more teaching and encouragement of active citizenship from primary school through to college and university. A KS5 option should also be available.
19. Schools, colleges and universities do not exist within a vacuum. If students can recognise that they are part of an institution, that the institution is part of the local area, and understand the ways in which they could influence what happens in the local area, they would feel more powerful. As well as a discrete subject this should be integrated into the curriculum of existing core subjects with teachers having a shared responsibility for delivering an active citizenship curriculum
20. Whilst acknowledging that citizenship education is vital, so is ensuring that the delivery of an active citizenship curriculum promotes politics with a small 'p'. Teaching in England is heavily unionised and it is paramount that the delivery is politically neutral and does seek to advance or promote a personal organisational agenda.
- 21. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

22. According to the NCS website, NCS provide an opportunity for those who participate to ‘live away from home, develop skills to boost your CV and meet amazing people’. And ‘make your mark and build skills for work and life’. This definition to attract participants is a highly personalised and individualised interpretation of the Programme (i.e. what is in this for me).
23. Active Citizenship is underpinned by the belief that a responsibility resides in citizens to engage in democratic process. By definition, it suggests that an individual has power and influence to shape the world around them.
24. It is perhaps too early to evaluate the impact of Programmes such as NCS in creating ‘active citizens’ particular when the primary objectives, as defined by its own website, seemingly are preparing people to enter the labour market rather than as citizens with power to influence and shape the democratic process.
25. Having said this, NCS does have a ‘social action project’ built into phase 3 of the ‘adventure’. Social Action is defined as, ‘young people taking practical action in the service of others in order to create positive social change that is of benefit to the wider community as well as to the young person themselves” (Young Foundation, June 2013).
26. This definition, and the use of the word ‘service’, is challenging to the definition of active citizenship. Active Citizenship assumes that we each hold power and agency as an individual to effect change in the world around. Service, assumes that individuals hold power to effect change for and on behalf of those less fortunate or powerless, doing for them to aid them to live a better life.
27. This approach to development can lead to imbalance of power and perhaps a reviewed definition of social action should be used to reflect power and agency and how power can be built to effect change.
- 28. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?
29. In 2010 David Cameron PM stated at the Conservative Party Conference that, ‘The goal of the Big Society is to transfer power from the state to individuals, neighbourhoods or the lowest possible tier of Government, in that priority. What remains of state power will be used galvanising, catalysing, prompting, encouraging and agitating for community engagement and social renewal’

30. Regardless of political persuasion this ambition to ensure that all people can participate fully in society and in democratic process is unquestionable.
31. To achieve this, the Coalition Government along with the establishment of such legislation of the Localism Act committed to training a new generation of Community Organisers.
32. The National Community Organiser Programme (2010 – 2015) built a new network of over 5000 individuals, who came from all walks of life and political background, to catalyse new forms of social action and leadership in communities. The legacy of this being The Company of Community Organisers. A national membership and training organisation to support local leaders to understand the values and principles of community organising.
33. Community Organisers begin by talking to local residents. At the heart of the approach is listening to residents about the changes they believe their local area needs; before bringing people together and supporting them to take action on the issues they care about. Community Organising is active citizenship and civic engagement in action.
34. This approach acknowledged that it is people and not government that hold the answers to tackling local problems. It set out the belief that no-one knows more about what an area needs to thrive than the people who live and work there. This inside knowledge and connection to their local communities that Whitehall just can’t rival. This is the reality that has driven Government’s ambitions for localism and devolution in the last six years – with more power, flexibility and control pushed out from the centre than ever before.
35. Increasingly organisations have been evolving their strategies to move towards using community organising approaches. Outcomes have been, mobilising local communities to take collective action on a given issue, or developing professional practice to work with people in a different way that focuses on strengths and assets rather than needs and deficits.
36. Community organising inspires community led action. It invites people to think about how they relate to each other and what collectively can be done to change the conditions in communities and organisations to enable growth in confidence and an ability to take control of their own lives.

37. Participatory approaches, community development and community organising should be supported by Government; not controlled by Government. Policy decisions and investment should continue to reflect the needs for power and control over decision making to reside at the most local level.
38. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?
39. There are a many reasons why some communities and groups feel ‘left behind’. In a recent study by the Resolution Foundation it says that a combination of stagnant wages, rising inflation and £12billion welfare cuts is seeing millions of families worse off with the poorest families having their income drop by an average of 2% by 2021. By contrast the richest fifth of households will see their wealth increase by 5% over the same period.
40. This, is perhaps, the biggest barrier to active citizenship. If economic policy is driving greater polarity between the richest and poorest in our society then, according to Maslow’s hierarch of need, if basic human need cannot be fulfilled then how can people effectively contribute as active citizens?
41. As individuals, seek to address basic need and ‘make ends meet’ by working multiple jobs at low pay then this is increasingly making individuals ‘time poor’ to contribute to wider society.
42. To overcome this there needs to be a commitment to ensuring that we, as citizens and government, take collectively responsibility to ensuring that we work collectively to alleviate the root causes of poverty and disadvantage.

The Conservative Muslim Forum (CMF) is an integral part of the Conservative Party. All CMF members are full members of the Party and we believe that the fundamental values of the Conservative Party such as recognising the importance of the family, scepticism of state control, a belief in private enterprise, low taxes and personal responsibility are values that appeal to British Muslims. 1 Being precise about terms

Citizenship and civic engagement are two separate issues and, an issue in their own right. Conflating them risks causing poor quality thinking.

1.1 Citizenship

Citizenship is an unavoidable legal concept that all states must deal with since the planet is divided into separate states, and each state must know which person are its citizens, and to be able to identify which foreign state a person may belong to. Some states permit dual citizenship while other states do not.

At its most fundamental, citizenship is purely a legal relationship. Becoming a citizen of the UK (whether by birth or naturalisation) gives an individual numerous legal rights set out in UK domestic law and in international law. At the same time, it causes the UK state to have certain rights over that individual such as the power to conscript that individual into the UK's Armed Forces.

These legal relationships exist and continue irrespective of the attitude that the individual may have to the state. An individual who is completely alienated and who spies for a foreign power (such as the famous Cambridge spy ring) continues to be a citizen even though he may be guilty of treason.

The word citizenship is also used to describe an individual's psychological and emotional relationship with a state. However, it would be better to use alternative wording such as "active citizenship" or indeed "civic engagement" to avoid confusing a clear legal relationship with an emotional relationship that varies from person to person and may vary within one person over time.

1.2 Civic engagement

Civic engagement is an entirely separate issue from citizenship. One can be a citizen of a state without having any level of civic engagement with it. For example, by virtue of his birth CMF Chairman Mohammed Amin is a citizen of Pakistan although he last set foot in the country in 1952, and his civic engagement with Pakistan is essentially zero. Conversely a foreigner residing in the UK can be involved in civic engagement while having no right of citizenship. However, in order to help society, flourish in a peaceful and harmonious environment civic engagement should be encouraged and things taught should help people in practical ways.

Civic engagement is clearly a moral responsibility of all individuals. People who have a religious belief are normally required by their religious beliefs to have concern for the health and welfare of their fellow believers, but normally also to have concern for the rest of humanity. That is certainly the case with Judaism, Christianity and Islam. However, we risk going wrong when we attempt to codify moral responsibilities into law.

Civic engagement is in part about the way that an individual residing in a state (who may or may not be a citizen) engages with the organs of that state (for example by voting in elections). Perhaps much more importantly, civic engagement is also about how individuals residing in a state deal with fellow members of their society and become involved in civil society organisations, such as political parties, trade unions, think tanks, charities, religious organisations etc. Civic engagement is protean and dynamic by nature and not compulsory. This means that anyone can take part even if they are not a citizen. Globalisation and the rise of social media now means that one can be halfway around the world and still participate in civic life. Furthermore, civic engagement is means by which citizens shape and redefine the relationships between them and the government. This can take the form of referendums, elections or by protesting.

There is in practice some linkage between citizenship and civic engagement since those who don't have citizenship rights can feel left out and excluded from society.

2 Promoting civic engagement

2.1 The role of education

Education plays a fundamental role in mentoring children from a young child into a good human being. Unfortunately, much of the educational system appears to have forgotten that with its obsessive focus on the transmission of factual information and commercially valuable skills.

At every stage of the educational system, focus is required to ensure that the education is contributing towards producing an individual who will be civically engaged and a “good citizen” in the classically understood meaning of that phrase.

It is with regret, recent evidence suggests the greatest impediment is the large-scale presence of left-wing teachers who are hostile to the state and hostile to civic engagement.

Good citizenship should be encouraged through the education system up to the age of 16 GCSEs. The education system does not actually ask you to think but rather to regurgitate facts.

As part of ‘good citizenship’ the CMF believes there should be more political engagement both in and outside the class. Politics controls and shapes the decisions we make through the policies and taxes that are implemented. As such, because it affects everyone it should be part of combined syllabus with citizenship.

2.1.1 In the classroom

The CMF proposes this could be implemented by enabling schools to put significant effort into developing debating societies so that pupils understand how to argue a point and learn how to see through poor quality arguments.

The CMF believes the curriculum should change so that it focuses on a smaller number of core subjects in order to create space for the teaching of active citizenship combined with history. It is impossible to teach more of something, without teaching less of something else.

The problem is that there is a general unwillingness to take tough decisions. An example is the level of outrage when the then Secretary of State for Education Michael Gove introduced the so-called English E-Bacc so that only a small number of specified subjects would count towards a particular league table for English schools. There were howls of outrage from teachers of subjects that were not included.

It is highly desirable that citizens of Britain should have a positive attitude to the state and a positive attitude to the generality of their fellow citizens. An essential part of this is appropriate teaching of history, which is why history in all countries is almost always the most contentious item in the school curriculum. In that regard, the Curriculum for Cohesion project which Mohammed Amin is a patron had much useful to say in its submission to the 2013 review of the National Curriculum for History. See their document “A Broader, Truer History for All” which can be downloaded via the link

<http://curriculumforcohesion.org/read/submission-to-national-curriculum-review/>

2.1.2 Out of the classroom

The National Citizenship Service has been a resounding success, notwithstanding its slow start. The writer Attic Rahmans’ daughter has recently attended an NCS programme which brings together many teenagers from all backgrounds all of whom are required to interact and solve problems through tasks which build on interaction and teamwork. Another example, is the Duke of Edinburgh awards. The CMF supports such programmes and, proposes more is done to encourage and support them.

Whether they should become compulsory, raises some very hard questions. For maximum effectiveness, citizenship programmes should be compulsory. Every Jewish citizen of Israel (apart from the Haredim which is a separate political issue) is required to serve in the Israeli Defense Force and this is a strong contributor to civic identification.

However, there is a significant cost involved, both in terms of direct government expenditure and in the lost earnings represented by the time spent during military service.

There would be much to be said for a six month compulsory UK National Citizen Service obligation, which took the individual away from their home and had them involved in social action combined with intensive absorption of history and political understanding. However, massive political objection can be expected to any such proposal.

2.2 Addressing the Electoral System

There is no panacea to achieving greater civic engagement. Instead, lots of specific actions are required at all levels of government. For example, many citizens live in constituencies which are very safe for either the Labour Party or the Conservative Party. It is perfectly rational for voters in such constituencies to not bother voting.

A change to the electoral system, preferably having larger multimember constituencies with the election being counted using the single transferable vote would dramatically change the situation because suddenly every vote would count. There would no longer be rational for any voter to not bother voting.

Similarly, some local authorities are dominated by one party or the other. Mohammed Amin lives in Manchester where every single councillor is a member of the Labour Party, and that has been the case for many years except when a Labour Party councillor defects for a limited period of time.

Accordingly, it is rational for voters in Manchester to abstain. A change in the electoral system to ensure that every vote mattered (as outlined above) would again produce a significant difference in voter turnout and in the engagement of voters.

2.3 Changing the voting age

As we mention above and elsewhere, political engagement should be encouraged from an early age, on the basis it invites debates and encourages participation in a process which has a fundamental effect on their lives and livelihood, both in the present and future.

The process from teaching in school to beyond the classroom can be put to effect, for example by lowering the voting age to 16. There is no evidence that today's 16-17-year-olds are any less well-informed than many much older people who may have had very little education when young and added very little to it during their lives. Indeed, the opposite was shown to be true in the 2014 Scottish Independence Referendum. Another example, and we say with caution, is the overwhelming support for Jeremy Corbyn in the 2017 General Election. Both examples showed, the younger generation are very much interested in politics and have a desire to play a part. Such enthusiasm is a credit to society and, our political leaders should bear this in mind when they are next invited to a live TV debate.

Lowering the voting age is a positive step towards encouraging young people to get involved in the world around them at a young age which bodes well for the long term prosperity of the UK. It also strengthens democracy.

2.4 Creating more diverse schools and workplaces

Building civic engagement beyond narrow ethnic and religious groups requires making more diverse the environments where people spend most of their time.

As far as workplaces are concerned, the law against discrimination set out in the Equality Act 2010 is excellent. However specific changes in practice are required. For example, building on points that David Cameron and Theresa May have made before, the law should mandate name-blind recruitment application forms throughout not just the public sector but also the private sector.

Regarding schools, the most pernicious factor reducing diversity is the overwhelming weight given to geographical proximity when allocating school places. This leads to clustering by wealth around successful schools. Furthermore, it means that schools amplify existing geographical residential segregation.

The CMF suggests a specific change. For each state school, a particular radius should be specified (different within cities and rural areas). All applicants for places who live within that circular radius should be regarded as having equal geographical proximity. The school should also be given the obligation when allocating places to achieve a diverse pupil body that matches, as far as possible, all of the young people residing within the specified radius. This would significantly increase school diversity.

2.5 Learning from other countries

The UK could learn much from the way Countries such as the USA have always promoted allegiance to the country through their written Constitution.

Such allegiance is practically implemented through their education system – learning the national anthem and reading of America’s history; flying the national flag outside all public buildings and outside individuals’ homes etc. The UK, by contrast doesn’t have a codified written constitution and, takes no such steps to build a sense of allegiance.

3 Vulnerable groups

It is the CMF’s view, there are no ‘vulnerable groups’ when it comes to citizenship or civic engagement. We refer to an attack on ‘British’ values below – they are two distinct matters. The way to strengthen the citizenship of say for example, women or minority groups is the same way that we should strengthen the citizenship of every citizen. Ensuring that people can exercise their rights, using the full force of the law against those who deny people their rights, and appropriate citizenship education.

The CMF as a forum engaging with the BAME and Muslim population, finds those who feel “left behind” do so because:

- They feel a sense of entitlement. Most of those who express this sentiment are white British people who feel superior to ethnic minorities and superior to European migrants.
- They are aware that their economic circumstances do not match their sense of entitlement.
- Expressing resentment at being left behind is an easier course of action than making changes in their own lives that would improve their economic circumstances.

There may also be some amongst ethnic minorities who share the same three factors, but in general ethnic minorities do not feel the same sense of entitlement that is felt by some marginalised poor white British people.

Barriers to active citizenship, are primarily those of perception. For example, making the English language a mandatory requirement led to some resentment, although there are sound reasons for having such a requirement. The CMF believes part of the problem is that the government has spent too much time talking about the importance of learning English while reducing funding for the teaching of English outside the school environment.

It is important to provide English classes without charge to everyone living in the UK who wishes to access them. This is relevant particularly to newcomers to Britain who chose to take up citizenship. Encouraging them to take up learning to read, write and speak the English language is much better way to achieve a tolerant society, than an arduous citizenship test, which many people born and brought up in Britain may struggle to pass.

As another example, if someone believes that they will be discriminated against are not accepted into a group, they will often avoid even trying to join that group. Mohammed Amin suspects that this is the main reason why ethnic minorities are less well represented in mainstream political parties than are people who are white British. The same point applies to young people. With a Conservative Party that is on average somewhat geriatric, it may appear somewhat forbidding for a teenager to seek to join that party.

However, the perceptions of such ‘barriers’ can be overcome by (a) teaching young people to be more self-aware and to be more self-confident. As indicated earlier, the education system appears to place insufficient emphasis on this; and (b) encouraging and supporting integration of people from different backgrounds, culture, beliefs in shared values in a tolerant and cohesive society.

4 Citizen’s rights and responsibilities

The fundamental rights of British citizens arise from UK law – whether such rights emanate from primary legislation and/or the common law. In addition, British citizens also benefit from rights that are set out in key international documents such as the United Nations

Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights. An example of why the ECHR is needed is that on many occasions British citizens have had to litigate under the ECHR because the UK state was attempting to deny them rights which it had promised under the ECHR to uphold.

The only legal duty a citizen owes the state is to obey the law – this is the primary obligation. Herein lay an argument for a list of “responsibilities”, for example, to pay all taxes due. However, this is nothing more than a repetition of what is already an obligation in law.

Everything beyond the primary obligation to obey the law, such as the moral responsibility to be civically engaged, and to care for other members of society, concerns things which are not suitable for legislation. Put simply, the rights of a human cannot be said, to be contingent upon their acceptance of responsibilities. A person has a right not to be tortured, regardless of whether he is generous to others or selfish, and indeed regardless of whether he is law-abiding or a criminal.

For these reasons, the CMF believes the state’s power to monitor and enforce must be limited to the law. We appreciate, the lines can sometimes be blurred when we consider the first priority of the state is to protect the nation and its people, both from threats within its territory and from elements who try to enter its territory. It is also right and proper however, in its exercise of such powers, the State must have regard to the rights of its citizens.

5 The voter registration system

The voting registration process and the voting process both need to balance two separate objectives. They need to be easy for the individual but at the same time they need to minimise the risk of fraud by the individual and also fraud by the state in the form of manipulation of the count.

6 British values

This is a very broad question. The Department for Education has published a list of values, and that list is reproduced below, quoting from the Department for Education’s model funding agreement for academies, September 2015 version:

“2.47. The Academy Trust must ensure the Academy actively promotes the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs.”

The list is fine although Mohammed Amin has explained at the link below why it is counter-productive calling them “British values.” Most fundamentally, there is nothing exclusively British about them and they are just as much French values, German values, American values or indeed Islamic values.

http://www.mohammedamin.com/Community_issues/Theresa-May-March-2015/Home-Secretary-Extremism-speech-23-3-2015.html

However, one chooses to describe or ascribe to “British values”, the CMF believes citizens should learn to accept responsibility for their behaviour, show initiative, and to understand how they can contribute positively to the lives of those living and working in the locality and to society more widely. For example, encouraging respect for other people, cultures, traditions. But also, respect for democracy, our public institutions and democratic processes.

This should lead to a further tolerance and harmony between different cultural traditions through an appreciation for and respect for their own and other cultures.

While authorship of the quote is disputed, few would dispute that “the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.”

Our society's values are today under threat from racist groups who seek to deny equality to ethnic minorities, religious bigots who seek to deny equality to adherents of minority religions such as Islam, anti-Semites, extremist Muslims seeking to impose a caliphate who vilify Muslims who vote in British elections, to name but a few. Such people are in the minority.

There are plenty of examples of role models promoting a positive vision of a tolerant and cohesive society, including the CMF's President, Lord Sheikh and members of the Executive Board (although less well known), Sir Mo Farah, and our former and current Prime Ministers, David Cameron and Theresa May.

Section 1: Introduction

1. One of the most pressing issues of concern in British democracy is the lack of public engagement in representative politics and democratic governance, which some have viewed as a crisis in citizenship (Stoker 2006; Hay 2007). The evidence presented here focuses on trends in the civic and political engagement of younger citizens. Young people are the ones who react most to the changing social, economic and political environment, and so offer us a glimpse of the future of our democracy.
2. On the one hand, younger citizens are interested in politics and engage in many forms of civic and political action (Norris 2003; Sloam 2016). On the other hand, they have low levels of knowledge about politics, low levels of trust in politicians and political parties, have little contact with politicians or government officials, and are reluctant to participate in representative democracy.
3. This submission concentrates on questions 1, 4, 5, 7 and 9 of the Committee's call for evidence: the civic and political engagement of young people; the current laws on the political franchise; the role of government, political institutions, schools and universities in promoting democratic engagement; and the particular barriers faced by different groups of young people (according to socio-economic status, gender and ethnicity) in participating in the British political system.
4. It makes specific recommendations about how interactions between young people and politicians and public officials might be intensified, and how educational interventions (through schools and higher education institutions) could better promote civic and political literacy. Together these proposals would increase young people's internal efficacy (confidence in their ability to participate in democratic politics) and their external efficacy (belief that they can make a difference) (Kisby and Sloam 2009, 2012).

Section 2: Youth Civic and Political Engagement in Comparative Perspective

1. Young people have become increasingly disenchanted with electoral politics. This is particularly the case in the UK, where younger citizens are much less likely to vote in general elections than older generations, previous generations of young people, and their peers elsewhere in Europe. Around 63% of 18 to 24-year-olds voted in the 1992 general election, but this figure fell to about 40% between 2001 and 2015. In other large European democracies, youth turnout in national elections ranges between 59% and 82% (Figure 1) (Sloam 2016).
2. Young people in the UK are interested in politics – as interested as their peers elsewhere in Europe – but are put off by the political system. They have developed new conceptions of 'citizenship' and 'politics' (Marsh et. al 2007), and have turned to alternative, issue-based modes of civic and political engagement (Norris 2003): from voting, to ethical shopping, to online petitions, to demonstrations, to poetry slams. These non-electoral forms of participation have been facilitated by new technologies, which have reduced the costs and increased the speed of political communication (Bimber et al. 2005). The challenge for politicians and government officials is to adapt to these changes in young people’s politics.

The 2017 UK General Election

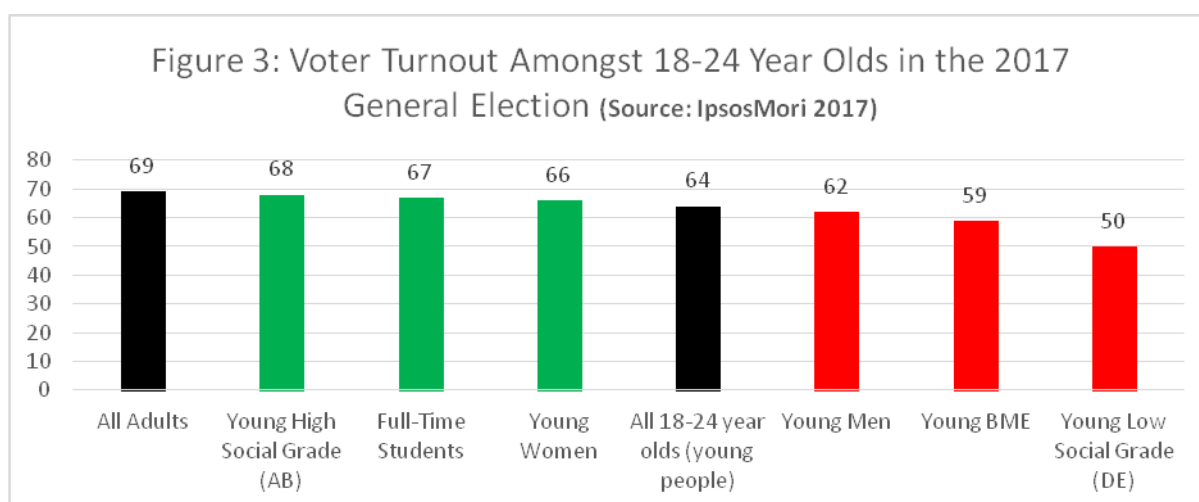

3. The increased youth turnout in 2017 can be seen as something of a success story.

According to IpsosMori data, the participation of 18 to 24-year-olds rose 21 points to 64% – from 43% in 2015 and a low of 37% in 2005. Figure 2 illustrates that youth turnout returned – for this election at least – to the levels of the early 1990s. 2017 was a youth surge rather than a general increase in electoral participation. So, the difference between the participation of 18 to 24-year-olds and all citizens shrank from 23 points in 2015 to five points in 2017.

4. However, it should be noted that youth turnout remains well below (by nine points) the turnout rates of 55 to 64-year-olds and over 65s (both 73% in 2017).

5. There are important intra-generational differences in voting patterns. Figure 3 displays turnout levels for 18-24-year-olds by social grade, student status, gender and ethnicity. It is immediately apparent that social grade has a significant bearing upon electoral participation. 68% of 18-24-year-olds of a high social grade voted, compared to 50% of those of a low social grade. As expected, full-time students were also more likely to turn out to vote than the average young person (at a rate of 67%). So, we might say there is no turnout gap between young people of high social grade or in full-time education and the average UK citizen. The problem, more precisely defined, involves the non-participation of young people from deprived backgrounds or of low socio-economic status.

6. The unexpected gap in participation between young women and young men (66% to 62%) is statistically small and may be explained by the strong support of young women for the Labour Party in 2017. The lower than average participation of young Black and Minority Ethnic (BMEs) citizens (at 59%) is a cause for concern, but the results are hard to interpret without separating BMEs into distinct ethnic groups.
7. The higher youth turnout in 2017 also reflected strong support for the Labour Party (62% of 18 to 24-year-olds), which mobilised young people by addressing the issues they cared about with concrete policy proposals, e.g. on housing, the NHS and higher education. The engagement of young people also reflected disillusionment and anger with the negative impact of public policy on younger generations after the financial crisis.
8. Despite the unprecedented levels of youth support for Labour in 2017, this state of affairs is not inevitable. In 2010, the proportions of 18 to 24-year-olds voting Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrat were almost identical (around 30% apiece). So there is no ideological reason why political parties other than Labour cannot (successfully) tailor their policies to appeal to younger generations.

Systemic Barriers to Youth Participation

Convenors of the UK Political Studies Association Specialist Group on Young People's Politics – written evidence (CCE0087)

9. In the UK, the first-past-the-post electoral system is problematic with regard to youth participation. Young people in the UK have less viable parties to vote for, and many constituencies can be seen as 'dead rubbers' where only one party and candidate have a realistic chance of winning. In other countries, with proportional systems of representation, turnout rates tend to be much higher, and resources for party campaigning are spread more evenly across the country.
10. Another factor that inhibits higher turnout amongst young people is the prioritization of older generations in public policy in recent years, e.g. the triple lock on pensions, the trebling of university tuition fees. If young people already feel detached from mainstream electoral politics, this is likely to make them even less likely to vote. If this happens, politicians are even more likely to ignore them. And so the vicious circle continues.
11. In Germany, by contrast, public policy succeeded in shielding young people from the worst effects of the financial crisis, e.g. youth unemployment actually fell during this period.
12. In the UK, there is also the additional issue of voter registration. With the introduction of Individual Voter Registration in 2014, over a million citizens \(disproportionately young people\) fell off the electoral roll.

Section 3: Pathways to Youth Civic and Political Engagement

Political Contact

1. In the existing body of research, one of the most interesting comparative findings is that young people in the UK have the lowest level of contact with politicians and government officials out of all established European democracies (Sloam 2013). This is problematic in that the existing literature also highlights the effectiveness of such direct engagement between citizens and political activists, politicians and government officials (Green and Gerber 2004).
2. Recommendations:
 - i. Each UK MP should commit to holding at least one interactive session (discussions over concrete issues) in each school (primary and secondary) in their constituency over the course of a five-year parliament.
 - ii. Each local councillor should commit to holding at least one interactive session (discussions over concrete issues) in each school in their ward over each term in office.
 - iii. The work of school councils should feed into these sessions and be monitored by Ofsted.

Political Youth Organisations

Convenors of the UK Political Studies Association Specialist Group on Young People's Politics – written evidence (CCE0087)

3. Political youth organisations, such as political parties' youth factions and the British Youth Council, are important pathways for young people to channel their political interest and learn the important civic and political skills they need to participate actively throughout their lives. For those young people under the legal voting age, it may also be the only way to express their political preferences and interests. However, recent research on the members of these groups shows some worrying results (Rainsford, forthcoming).

First, the members of party youth factions come from similar socio-demographic backgrounds. Unless the youth factions become more diverse we are likely to see a continuation of a non-diverse group of elected politicians at all levels. The political youth organisations themselves are therefore potential barriers for certain groups of young people to engage politically.

Second, parties' youth factions are less likely, in comparison to other organisations, to use their members for recruitment. The decline in their membership may thus have less to do with the changing attitudes of young people and more to do with their recruitment strategies.

Finally, even though the BYC has close links with Parliament, their members do not trust actors in the political system. This is concerning because these young people are engaging with politics, and many will have some experience of meeting politicians, but they still do not trust them.

4. Recommendations:

- i. Political parties' youth factions and the BYC should reflect on their recruitment and engagement practices to recruit and retain a more diverse membership.
- ii. Political parties' youth factions should use their members to actively recruit new members.
- iii. MPs and councillors should reach out to the BYC and their local youth councils or parliaments to build up a working relationship on important issues.

Political Literacy

5. Another problem that hinders youth participation in democracy is lack of civic and political knowledge. It is well known that citizens who know more about democracy and how it works are more likely to become engaged (Galston 2001). Yet levels of knowledge about politics and democracy in the UK are relatively low. This situation is made all the more problematic by the proliferation of news sources (online or through the social media) and the deliberate use of 'false news' by populists and even foreign powers. The EU referendum was a clear case where false or exaggerated arguments were used (unscrupulously) on both sides of the debate.

6. Citizenship education (which we strongly support) was introduced into all English secondary schools in 2002 through its inclusion as a compulsory subject in the National Curriculum. It was introduced as a means of promoting active and responsible citizenship, with 'political literacy' one of its three core strands (Kisby 2012). A clear aim of citizenship lessons was to increase levels of civic engagement and the evidence clearly suggests some success in this regard (see e.g. Keating et al. 2010; Whiteley 2014). Following a consultation exercise, a new slimmed-down citizenship curriculum has been taught in schools in England since September 2014. This represented a significant change, with a shift away from a focus on understanding political concepts and civic and political participation towards constitutional history and financial literacy, and an even greater emphasis on voluntary work (Kisby 2017).
7. In addition, although citizenship remained a compulsory subject in the National Curriculum, Academies and Free Schools have been given the freedom to opt out of following the National Curriculum. At the same time, the development of the English Baccalaureate (EBacc) and the focus on the EBacc subjects (English, mathematics, history, geography, the sciences, languages) has had the effect of undermining the National Curriculum and non-EBacc subjects, such as citizenship (Kisby 2017). In our view, all young people should receive citizenship lessons, irrespective of the kind of school they attend.
8. Preventing people from voting until they are 18 means that many citizens do not get a chance to participate in general elections until they are into their 20s. In our view, political literacy would be enhanced by lowering the voting age to 16, as it would provide an opportunity to re-focus citizenship education on electoral politics. If young people were allowed to vote while still at school, it would also increase the likelihood of them participating in electoral politics in later life. As voting is habit-forming (Gerber et al. 2003), this would have a positive, long-term effect on electoral turnout. Lowering the voting age would also mean that 'youth' issues and the views of young people would be more likely to be included in the policy-making process (Briggs 2016).
9. Recommendations:
 - i. Ensure that all schools provide citizenship lessons to secondary school pupils.
 - ii. Provide the resources needed to train significantly more specialist staff to deliver citizenship lessons.
 - iii. Strengthen citizenship education in schools by increasing the time that schools devote to the subject in general, and the teaching of political literacy in particular.
 - iv. Strengthen the role of Ofsted in inspecting citizenship education by providing distinct measures (including level of teacher training) that have (or need to be) reached.

Convenors of the UK Political Studies Association Specialist Group on Young People's Politics – written evidence (CCE0087)

- v. Provide resources to existing organisations, such as the Association for Citizenship Teaching, to establish a national network to monitor these changes.
- vi. Mandate that universities and HE colleges, as part of their widening participation and community engagement commitments, hold democracy days in local schools (and provide support to citizenship teachers) as a means of promoting civic and political literacy.
- vii. Lower the voting age to 16 for all elections.

Coram – written evidence (CCE0113)

Coram Children’s Legal Centre (CCLC), part of the Coram group of charities, is an independent charity working in the UK and around the world to protect and promote the rights of children, through the provision of direct legal services; the publication of free legal information online and in guides; research and policy work; training; and international consultancy on child rights. The CCLC’s legal practice specialises in education, community care, family and immigration law and CCLC operates several free advice phone lines including the Child Law Advice Service. The Migrant Children’s Project at CCLC provides specialist advice and legal representation to migrant and refugee children and young people as well as legal guidance and training to practitioners on the rights of young refugees and migrants. CCLC is chair of the Refugee Children’s Consortium, a coalition of over 50 organisations working for promote and protect the rights of young refugees and migrants.

Coram’s Young Citizens is a voluntary programme for young people from migrant and refugee backgrounds. It enables young people to work with children, young people and professionals to improve the experiences and integration of migrant children and young people and increase public understanding of their needs and experiences. The Young Citizens see the UK as their home and want to contribute to British society. They challenge discrimination and negative stereotypes by promoting positive messages and championing their contributions.

The evidence in this submission comes from the work of the Migrant Children’s Project, the views of the Young Citizens programme members and from research undertaken by Coram Life Education to inform the co-production with Young Citizens of resources for schools.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. When discussing citizenship and civic engagement, Coram believes it is important to acknowledge the place and importance of young people who have grown up in the UK, who feel strongly that they are British and who want to contribute to society in the same way as their British counterparts, but who are not citizens in law. Coram works with a significant number of children, young people and families who are prevented from fully being part of British life because the immigration and nationality systems in this country are complex, expensive and often unfair – blocking putative citizens from securing settled status even if they have lived most or all of their lives here.

2. Five years ago the University of Oxford estimated that there were 120,000 undocumented children in the UK, 65,000 of whom were born here.²⁴⁵ Despite growing up in the UK, thousands of children and young people are living in a form of legal limbo, unable to regularise and fully contribute to society, due to lack of free legal advice, high application fees and an inaccessible immigration system.²⁴⁶ Often these children and young people are in the UK with their families, but neither they, nor their siblings have made an active choice to come to live here. Some of those who are undocumented have been unsuccessful in their asylum claims, but many long-term undocumented children and young people are not in need of international protection. A young person who has leave to remain in the UK on the basis of their family or private life will usually be granted 2 ½ years leave, and will need to renew this four times, before they can apply for indefinite leave to remain (after which they can apply for citizenship). The costs for a family of four paying to reach settlement is equivalent to a deposit on a house: at current rates the ten year process would cost £33,000 in application fees alone.
3. If you have no leave to remain you cannot work, cannot access benefits, cannot open a bank account, cannot rent a property and cannot hold a driving license. Many children and young people with limited leave to remain are blocked from accessing further and higher education. Student loans and home fees for university, for example, are only available to someone who is over 18 if they have spent half their life in the UK and been able to regularise their status at least three years previously.²⁴⁷ Therefore a 19 year old who has lived in the UK since the age of ten may still be blocked from accessing higher education. The problems with the current immigration system mean that many young people fall back into undocumented status.
4. Case study

Agnes is 20 year old and has been in the UK since she was nine. She had lawful leave to remain for around nine years, had gone through the education system and was making plans to attend university. But her family could not afford legal advice and representation when she was turning 18 and needed to renew her visa. Her application was rejected and her leave ran out. Although she was later granted leave again, by that point she had been through a period of being undocumented, which means she now must wait another ten years before she can get permanent status. She has an offer of a place to study biochemistry, but has been blocked from going to university because her status means she cannot access student finance. In her words: “The impact of being undocumented for so many years weighs heavily. It’s stress, it’s heart-breaking and most of all you feel as though you don’t belong in the one place you call home.” British Citizenship is the most secure position for a child. If a person has British citizenship, they are not subject to immigration control: they do not need leave to enter or remain in the UK. They can apply for a passport and travel freely, enjoying protection from British embassies abroad. The stability British citizenship brings is important for the child’s development, wellbeing and sense of their own identity, and is important for children and young people’s political participation. Citizenship is permanent and can only in very rare cases be revoked. By contrast, if someone has indefinite leave to remain and they are convicted of a criminal offence, it is likely that the Home Office will consider revoking their leave and deporting them. Too many young people in the criminal justice system, including those who have been in care, face having their leave revoked and being deported, sometimes to a country they have not been to since they were an infant. Some of these young people could have obtained British citizenship if only the right application had been made for them.

5. While many young people face a long immigration process before they can naturalise as British, a significant number of children are already eligible to be registered as citizens but are unable to do so. Nationality applications have, since 2007, been subject to the same escalation of fees as immigration applications. As of 6 April 2017, the fee for citizenship applications is £973, of which £587 is profit to the Home Office. In many of these cases what is being charged for is a pre-existing entitlement under the British Nationality Act 1981, where the Home Office has not been asked to grant but is merely required to register the child’s citizenship – to recognise the child’s pre-existing right at the time of his or her registration application. Where an application is made for discretionary citizenship by children without a pre-existing right, then decision-making has also been found to be inadequate.²⁴⁸ Children requesting discretionary citizenship are often those who have spent long periods in care, and whose future is assessed as being in the UK, or whose parents and siblings are settled or are citizens. These problems block many children from registering as British Citizens.
6. The government view is that ‘citizenship can never be an absolute right, nor is it necessary in order for a person to reside in the UK and access our public services. A person who is settled in the UK is not required to become a citizen by a certain date: they can remain here until they can meet the criteria for doing so, including payment of the required fee.²⁴⁹ Yet, its own guidance states that ‘becoming a British citizen is a significant life event. Apart from allowing a child to apply for a British citizen passport, British citizenship gives them the opportunity to participate more fully in the life of their local community as they grow up.’²⁵⁰

7. Coram is raising these concerns because there are thousands of young people in the UK who are citizens in all but name: who have grown up in the UK and are socially integrated members of our communities. They are trapped in a vulnerable and precarious state by the laws and policies that determine their access to permanent status. Coram recommends increased support for long-term resident children and young people to engage with immigration and nationality systems which must be fair, efficient, affordable and accountable. Assistance in accessing routes to regularisation should be available to all children and young people through, for example, confidential support at college, within local authorities and through specialist legal advice. As a result, communities will benefit from the full economic and social contribution of newly-enfranchised and motivated young citizens already in their midst.
8. Identifying citizens by their entitlement to hold British nationality is exclusionary, and even where couched in positive terms, risks discriminating against those who do not hold citizenship. There are many children and young people who are born abroad living in the UK, including EU children, who do not hold British citizenship. In addition, a great many children have parents who were not born in the UK, and 28% of births in 2016 were to mothers born outside the UK.²⁵¹ Citizenship and nationality should be separated; many young people do not hold British nationality but feel strongly that they are citizens of the UK, and engage in their civic duties here.
9. Ambassadors on the Young Citizens programme were asked what ‘citizenship’ means to them. Their responses were: responsibility; help; security; belonging; identity; home; community; and shared interests and values. Although many of the young people on the programme do not have legal citizenship, they deserve to be seen as equal members of society, and to feel a sense of belonging, community and security in the UK.
10. With the vote to leave the EU, it is likely that young people from European countries who are unclear about the future relationship between the UK and the EU are unsure of their futures. Citizenship of an EU member state provides someone with the same protections in the UK as in their country of nationality, and this has meant that many EU families and children have not taken any additional steps to demonstrate their entitlement to remain in the UK. However, this reciprocity of citizenship will end with Brexit, and during the negotiation period, the Home Office has more strictly applied criteria for removal and hate crimes have increased.²⁵² Whilst there is a settlement offer for EU nationals, it is inevitable that some people, particularly those who rely on the rights of family members and may be third country nationals themselves, will find themselves forced to use the immigration system.

Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities?

11. CCLC cautions against any discussion of additional formal rights for ‘citizens’ of the UK. The post-war human rights framework recognises ‘the inherent dignity ... and inalienable rights of all members of the human family’²⁵³ and it is vital to remember that people have basic rights by virtue of being human. The idea of earned rights risks diminishing the rights available to the most vulnerable in our society. Rights are not earned by paying taxes to a particular government and do not come with possession of a particular passport. As the recent treatment of migrants and asylum-seekers across Europe has demonstrated, it is often non-citizens, in law and in practice, who are most often in need of human rights protection.
12. Human rights are universal in nature and are not dependent on the moral worth of the individual in concern. For example, a person cannot be denied a right to a fair trial because they are suspected of having committed a crime. The Human Rights Act already requires rights to be read together with Article 17 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which provides that the Convention does not give anyone a right to do anything that would destroy or unduly limit other people’s human rights.²⁵⁴ A wealth of criminal and civil law exists to ensure that people act in accordance with their responsibilities to the state and other individuals.
13. Past research carried out on behalf of the Ministry of Justice warned that the focus on responsibilities in the rights context may represent ‘an opportunity to introduce new restrictions on human rights’ and concluded that ‘[j]urisdictions with liberal democratic traditions tend, on the whole, towards implicit or rhetorical recognition of duties’.²⁵⁵ It warned that even rhetorical or aspirational statements about duties could ‘risk undermining rights by implying that the fulfilment of duties is an essential prerequisite to the enjoyment of certain rights’.²⁵⁶

14. A more effective means of encouraging civil engagement and highlighting the importance of individual responsibility would be to inform people about their existing rights and correlating responsibilities. Education of this kind would significantly improve public understanding and ownership of human rights. As part of its recommendation to lower the voting age, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended the use of ‘active citizenship and human rights education in order to ensure early awareness of children that rights are to be exercised as part of citizenship, with autonomy and responsibility’. It also recommended making ‘children’s rights education mandatory’.²⁵⁷ We would support those recommendations; education on rights, and on respecting the human rights of others, is an important part of citizenship and civic duty.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

15. As outlined above, universal human rights are a framework for rights and responsibilities within a value system. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights emphasises the duties towards ones community that is a part of respecting the rights of others.²⁵⁸
16. Values of mutual respect and tolerance of those with different ethnic origins, race, nationality and beliefs are important to promote from a young age. Personal, social, health and economic (PSHE) and Citizenship lessons can give students the opportunity to unpack viewpoints they may not have previously questioned. It is important that this type of education is given precedence within the curriculum. With increased attainment and financial pressures, these subjects can end up being deprioritised.
17. Members of the Young Citizens group have expressed concerns regarding misinformation about migrants and why they come here. This can lead to xenophobia and fear, as well as isolation of communities with different groups avoiding mixing with those from different countries. Many in the group have been on the receiving end of racist views or been affected by negative press around migration, which can be a threat to values of respect and tolerance. They feel that the public don’t hear enough about the people behind the numbers and that the voices of migrants need to be more prominent in the debate in order to give a true picture of the reality. This includes highlighting the skills and contributions of migrants in the UK and cultures and traditions that enrich the country.

18. Young Citizens group has also highlighted the importance of treating those new to the country with equal respect. During the immigration process, many experienced suspicion about their circumstances and age, and did not feel they were treated as individuals. More support is needed to help young people assert their rights, including explaining the law to them in their own language.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? How can diversity and integration be increased?

19. All the young people in the Young Citizens group want to integrate. One young person felt ‘you should learn about British people if you live here’. They felt the best way to learn about British people was to mix with them but for some they lacked the opportunities to do so: ‘I don’t have much contact with people who were born here in college. I haven’t had opportunities to mix as all classes are with ESOL students’. They observed that migrants do sometimes stick together – moving to areas with people from the same country and mixing with people from their own community. This was understandable as people want to be with those that are similar to them, who have the same native language and who relate to their experiences. People need to feel welcomed and have opportunities to meet people outside their own community. The group felt that the government had a role to play in running programmes to help people integrate, and then ‘people will then give more back to the country because they’re in a position to do so’.
20. Young people could benefit from guidance and support to help facilitate their integration. This could include supporting them to get involved in activities such as sport, youth clubs and places of worship that are core to the local community. Involvement in volunteering can also help build skills and facilitate integration, but should not be obligatory. They felt that by giving them responsibility, young migrants would feel empowered and able to take control of their lives.
21. One young person said that the government should ‘help the community not isolate new arrivals’. They said it was important for local people to understand what young people moving to the UK may have been through in order to have empathy for their situation. And felt it was the combined responsibility of everyone in the community to accept each other’s religion and beliefs. One young person said it was important ‘to increase the host community’s awareness of cultural issues, language issues and what it means to be a person of colour’. They suggested welcome events or local activities and enrichment days to share cultures. Within schools they suggested support that could be put in place, such as buddy systems, linking children up with organisations and activities, showing them around the local area and giving them information on their rights and entitlements.

22. The group also felt that young people from migrant backgrounds want to integrate, but that it is important they feel secure, settled and safe in order to be able to do so. To improve the situation, they felt that local authorities needed more funding to support migrants more fully to access their entitlements and enable them to settle. Access to English classes was also recognised as a key part of assisting integration.
23. Teachers have reported to us that minority groups can often feel stigmatised within schools, with children feeling fearful of disclosing their immigration status to teachers and their peers. It is important that a focus on citizenship does not become divisive, and stigmatise those without British nationality status. Teachers fed back that a mix of ethnicities and nationalities can be a real asset, as ‘students become part of the teaching resource and can learn from each other. A cultural mix in schools enables children and young people to thrive in the 21st century and progress’. Personal, social, health and economic (PSHE) and Citizenship education can help to increase understanding of different cultures and beliefs. However, it can be harder to make lessons meaningful in majority white British schools when students feel more detached from the topic and do not regularly come into contact with people from different backgrounds. This means it can be hard to truly embed it into the culture of the school.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

24. Coram’s Young Citizens network is an ambassador group of 16-25 year olds from migrant and refugee backgrounds. It is an example of a project working with young people who do not all have legal citizenship but who see the UK as their home and are involved in civic engagement, making an active contribution to UK society. They act as positive role models who are passionate about making a difference and using their experiences to improve the situation for children and young people new to the UK. Ahmed, one of the Young Citizens ambassadors has ‘always wanted to give back to the society’ and wants to use his stories ‘to motivate and encourage young people’.
25. Through public engagement at institutions including British Museum and Southbank Centre and through local and national press activity, the Young Citizens promote positive citizenship and a society where everyone can contribute and belong. They have co-produced a teaching resource with specialist educators Coram Life Education, requested by schools to increase social cohesion and inclusion. Interactive lesson plans and films explore what it means to belong from the perspective of children and young people born both in and outside the UK. The teaching resource enhances Personal, Social, Health and Economic education (PSHE) and enriches school values, including empathy for others and respect for diversity. Feedback from the pilot lessons has been overwhelmingly positive with one teacher reflecting that ‘Coram gave us the chance to reinforce [the school’s values] and helped us assess the children’s understanding of belonging and their part in making others feels welcome and valued.’

Professor Emma Crewe – written evidence (CCE0207)

Citizenship, civic engagement and shallow democracy

Both Houses of the UK Parliament have made huge strides in outreach and public engagement in recent years but need for deeper citizen engagement in politics remains urgent. These observations and suggestions are based on in-depth research on the House of Lords and House of Commons and on Parliament and public engagement in other countries (see E Crewe's Lords of Parliament, 2005, and House of Commons: an anthropology of MPs at work, 2015 as well as SOAS/Hansard Society project). I am only addressing the questions you pose in your call for evidence that relate to my research.

1. Conceptualising citizenship and engagement

Our political rhetoric often focuses on either individuals (e.g., citizens) or on structures and systems (e.g., society) rather than on what connects them (e.g., processes and relationships). Implicit in some of your questions is the idea that you are asking us to identify problems and solutions that will be delivered by Parliament or government in consultation with the public. But some aspects of citizenship are beyond your (and anyone's) control. Asking what values we 'should' have as British people conveys the idea that if we can name them, and promote them, people will fall into line. But 'values' do not develop in cultures in this way; they emerge over time in relationships between people. Unless we develop more sophisticated processes for improving the relationship between Parliament and citizens, we will remain a shallow democracy.

2. Innovating processes of engagement – Parliament

Parliamentary outreach has been transformed. The House of Commons website, outreach programme and education work are outstanding and their public engagement is innovative and world-leading.²⁵⁹ Parliament Week has 100s of partners and events throughout the UK.

Committees in both Houses expanded their outreach, holding sessions around the country, partly thanks to officials. Connections with higher education institutes have become far stronger, with at least two academic fellowship programme being established in recent years. The handling of the media (both traditional and digital) by Parliament has vastly improved, with far more and better informed coverage. All of these deserve still more investment.

However, the potential for a deepening of the relationship between citizens and politicians in both Houses is clear within all these activities. To take Committees as just one example (because I have observed them over some years):

- 2.1. Parliament aims to be inclusive. However, it was only when the LSE reported on the identity of witnesses to Parliamentary committees that details about progress on this aim became publicly available. In 2013 only 25% of witnesses to Parliamentary committees were female.²⁶⁰ Looking at academic witnesses specifically, 83% were male (and as many as 44% of them came from London). When committees in both Houses take evidence from witnesses they should monitor their not only their gender but other aspects of their identity such as, but not only, religion, age, ethnicity, where they travelled from, and profession. They should set targets to improve and report on progress.
- 2.2. Parliament has stepped up its efforts to broadcast calls for evidence across society. I would encourage both Houses to expand their partnerships to encourage other organisations not only to alert people to opportunities to express their views but also offer advice and guidance.
- 2.3. Inclusion is not just a question of numbers. How people engage should be considered also. Parliament should learn from witnesses about how they experience the process of engagement. The scholarly literature about the existing limits to participation and consultation in general points to its superficiality and tendency to collect opinions in lists, rather than enable discussion and debate. Participation tends to be dominated by elites. Furthermore, in my observation of encounters between politicians and citizens during the scrutiny of law, it was informal APPGs that often achieved far more useful discussions rather than formal committee sessions. While the court-style interrogation of witnesses is entirely appropriate for holding Ministers to account, a more gentle and (where possible) discursive style generates more interesting engagement. It is only lawyers who appear to be totally at ease in the court-like atmosphere.

Parliaments and Citizens, 2012, vol.18, 3/4, and Alexandra Kelso, 2007. Parliament and Political Disengagement: Neither Waving nor Drowning. The Political Quarterly, 78(3): 364–373.

- 2.4. In my personal experience of giving evidence to committees, the tone of the committees members has ranged from respectful to the opposite, despite my status as a 'friendly witness'. In one case this arose when I was expressing an unpopular opinion. Such bluntness is uncomfortable even for those accustomed to public speaking, which discourages further participation.
- 2.5. Committees could engage more openly with witnesses about the source and rigour of their evidence. Knowledge and evidence are produced in different ways by scientists, lawyers and social scientists, as examples, and they all tend to denigrate the kind of evidence produced by others. Flawed assumptions are often made about the value of evidence: e.g. randomized control trials are often described as the 'gold standard' but they are appropriate for some situations (e.g., testing medicines), and unsuitable for others; and personal testimony is treated inconsistently (sometimes as the only valuable knowledge, at other moments as invalid and partial). Officials, library researchers and committee specialists do an incredible job weighing up different types of evidence. But time allocated for politicians and citizens to debate and compare the value and rigour of evidence is inadequate.

3. Innovating processes of engagement – constituencies

Representation of up to 70,000 constituents by Members of Parliament is taken for granted by politicians and citizens. With MPs visiting their constituencies far more frequently than they did up until the 1970s, opportunities for new kinds of engagement have opened up and innovation is needed in how they engage with those they represent. MPs not only hold surgeries, and visit organisations and groups in their area, but some increasingly prioritise specific issues and discuss these with those concerned. However, they rarely account for how they spend their time in their constituencies, how they find out what their constituents need, want or demand and what they are doing to further their interests and concerns. Bearing in mind the fabulous diversity in any community, never mind a whole constituency, we need to know: who are they talking to and how and why are they prioritizing some issues above others? Explaining themselves to their constituents, and being available to debate progress and setbacks on their efforts both in the constituency and in Parliament (or, if relevant, government), could be relatively easily achieved through meetings, digital media and facilitation by partner organisations (such as schools, colleges, charities, enterprises and so on).

4. Innovating processes of engagement – schools

Citizenship and political engagement should be taught from primary school upwards and it should be compulsory at all levels (not just secondary). Some aspects of ‘promoting good citizenship’ are less contested. Young citizens recognising the rights of others is already in the curriculum and getting more practice at doing so in discussion would be an obvious place to expand further. Teaching people from a young age to learn about how to test the rigour of claims, and understand more about the source of different types of knowledge and evidence, is essential. The digital revolution has meant that far more information has suddenly become available, but our curriculum needs to ensure careful explanation throughout our education of the relationship between politics and knowledge. Young people need the skills to navigate the increasing complexity of plural and conflicting views and deal with uncertainty, accelerating change and the pressures of social media. But other aspects – such as what responsibilities we have to each other and how we deal with conflicting rights – are so complex and contestable that teaching could only be done by facilitating debate. MPs, peers and academics could be encouraged to support citizenship education in centres of learning even more than they do. As the world becomes more unpredictable, globalized and conflict-prone, learning how to develop democracy so that it keeps the peace rather than inflames tension, will become increasingly vital. A deeper democracy will not be possible until our education catches up with our aspirations and expectations.

Executive summary

The benefits accrued by an engaged and active citizenry are widely known and have a significant impact on society. For some time, scholars and policy-makers have recognised that a wide range of activities fulfil important social and political functions and can have a positive effect on the lives of the individuals taking part. Civic engagement of this kind is also a fundamental principle of citizenship, an underpinning element of a healthy democracy, and is important in the development of cohesive, tolerant communities.

Despite this, recent evidence points to a decline in civic engagement in many countries. In general terms, people are less likely to become involved in civic life across a wide range of different activities. Recent survey evidence has traced a decline in electoral turnout, civic activism, volunteering and numerous other settings for civic action.

This is troubling in itself but the real issue is the fact that participation is highly stratified in favour of the most affluent groups in society. Put simply, people living on lower incomes are far less likely to vote, volunteer, become involved in their communities, or participate in a number of activities that would be associated with an engaged and vibrant citizenry. This inequality in civic participation is supported by a wealth of research evidence and has serious implications for the health of democracy, and of society at large.

There are solutions to these problems. Recent evidence suggests that targeted initiatives focused on increasing civic engagement in deprived areas can have a positive effect on the level of engagement. Investment in the civic infrastructure of deprived areas can also pay dividends and help arrest the decline of civic engagement.

The evidence presented here suggests that:

- A significant and problematic divide in civic engagement exists on the basis of socio-economic status.

- This disparity in participation has a wide range of negative impacts on society, both for individuals, communities and for the quality of government.
- Previous attempts to encourage civic participation have met with mixed success because they generally fail to address the problem of inequality in participation.
- Some areas of the country maintain social structures which inhibit participation. These are usually areas of high deprivation.
- Targeting resources and democratic innovations on deprived neighbourhoods like these is essential if attempts to promote civic engagement are to be successful. A focus on developing the civic capacity of deprived areas might also prove valuable.
- A fuller account of the points made here can be found in Rod Dacombe, Civic Participation in Theory and Practice, London: Palgrave, 2017

I What is civic engagement? And why is it valued?

1.1 The foundation of a healthy democracy is the engagement of citizens in a wide range of activities which serve to underpin both the functioning of government and a cohesive society. Established thought on citizenship and democracy holds that it is only through engagement in civic life that individuals can realise their potential as citizens, and a high level of civic participation is prized as an indicator of strong democratic performance.

1.2 There are many forms of civic engagement. At one end of the spectrum we might think of formal political action such as voting, organised protests, signing a petition or writing to an elected representative. Other forms, such as participation in voluntary associations, engagement in community activities or informal civic action, are less obviously connected to the formal structures of democracy but are nonetheless still important to the proper functioning of society.

1.3 Coherent and effective democratic societies rely on a multiplicity of different kinds of engagement. Indeed, a diverse and vibrant civic life has been demonstrated to be essential to democracy – declining citizen participation is a strong indicator of poor democratic health. It is therefore a cause of concern that participation in many forms of civic activity has consistently fallen since the latter half of the twentieth century.

1.4 In order to understand the true extent of its importance, it is important to clearly spell out the range of benefits associated with participation in civic life. There are numerous values associated with an engaged citizenry that have been understood from the earliest writing on democracy. These have now been empirically-verified through decades of research and include (but are not limited to) the following.

1.5 Civic engagement has clear benefits for government. Where citizens are engaged with public decision-making the actions of government reflect a greater plurality of views resulting in better-designed and more efficient public services. Similarly, citizens involved in this kind of activity tend to have more confidence in the workings of public agencies and feel a sense of confidence that government officials are working for them.

1.6 There are also benefits that can be accrued by the individuals involved. Civic engagement has been associated with better employment prospects, educational attainment and health outcomes. It also has an educative function, and through involvement in civic life, individuals learn a wide range of skills which allow them to better engage with other areas of public life. In short, civic engagement makes better citizens.

1.7 Beyond this, there are also wider social gains that can be made based on the increasing the reserves of social capital in society that result from a more engaged populace. Civic engagement is associated with greater levels of tolerance, better knowledge of public affairs, and higher levels of trust and reciprocity across society. In all, the overwhelming weight of evidence points to a series of benefits associated with civic participation which are felt in numerous areas of social and political life.

II The Problem of Inequality in Civic Engagement

2.1 Despite the importance of these activities, it must be said that civic life in the UK is in poor health. Civic participation in the UK has dropped dramatically in recent years. For instance, interest in public affairs has declined markedly since the turn of the century. People are today less likely to attend public meetings, sign petitions and demonstrate a working knowledge of public issues. Voting and democratic participation has been experiencing a broad period of decline (particularly in local politics). Formal volunteering has fallen, declining by 15% in the last decade. Community activism can often be the preserve of a very few committed individuals, rather than diffused throughout society.

2.2 From a democratic perspective these indicators of declining civic participation might not be of particular concern if they occurred uniformly across all social groups. But the overwhelming weight of evidence tells us that this is not the case, and in fact civic participation is highly polarised. Although there are distinctions in the level of participation between a wide range of social groups, the most emphatic finding of the research in this area is of stark inequalities in civic engagement based on socio-economic status (SES). In short, people living on higher incomes, with higher levels of educational attainment, in white collar employment and exhibiting a wide range of other indicators of high SES are far more likely to participate in almost every form of civic engagement.

2.3 Research evidence suggests this is the case across almost all forms of civic action. People living in high income households are twice as likely to engage in civic activity than people on low incomes. Figures from the Office of National Statistics suggest that 57% of adults in England and Wales with annual household incomes of £75,000 or more participated in formal volunteering; nearly twice the proportion of those living in a household with an income of £10,000 or less. These inequalities in participation are deeply problematic, and constitute nothing short of a crisis in democracy in the UK.

2.4 When it comes to formal democratic participation, recent decades have seen the emergence of a significant divide in electoral turnout on the basis of social class. As is the case with other forms of citizen engagement, the distinctions between voters and non-voters on the basis of SES has increased significantly over recent years, and there are few indications that this is changing.

2.5 This is a fairly new phenomenon. Until relatively recently, turnout at General Elections was consistently high across all SES groups, exceeding 80 per cent in the 1980s. However, recent elections have revealed a stark, and increasing differentiation of the electorate, with turnout amongst the poorest in the UK declining at a faster rate than other social groups, and remaining consistently lower.

2.6 The corollary of all this is that civic engagement in the UK is increasingly polarised. This problem is supported by clear research evidence and should not be understated. Indeed, the worsening divide in citizen participation constitutes nothing more than a crisis of democratic and social life in the UK.

III The Consequences of Inequality in Civic Engagement

3.1 There are numerous consequences that follow from the situation sketched above. The underlying problem is obvious but worth restating: given the numerous benefits that recent research has associated with civic participation, it is deeply concerning that these are less likely to be enjoyed by the poorest groups in society.

Dr Rod Dacombe, Department of Political Economy, Kings College London– written evidence (CCE0174)

3.2 Low participation amongst deprived social groups results in clear democratic problems. At the 2010 General Election 75% of the richest citizens in the UK voted, in comparison with 53% of the poorest. The resulting lack of electoral voice given to the poorest has significant consequences: research evidence suggests that the preferences of the wealthy are more likely to be reflected in policy outcomes than other SES groups.

3.3 There are also effects of the disengagement of the very poorest that are felt on the structure of society in the UK. The most deprived citizens are less likely to enjoy the opportunity to develop the kinds of civic skill required to advance in public life. Consequently, the majority of elected officials, senior positions within the judiciary, the diplomatic service and FTSE 100-listed directors are comprised of people from high-SES backgrounds.

3.4 But this is not simply a matter of representation and democratic control. These issues actually raise wider problems for individuals, for society, and for good government. If the benefits associated with civic engagement are not enjoyed by the most deprived groups in society, then the development of the norms of tolerance, civic-mindedness and positive orientation towards the actions of government will similarly be concentrated amongst the wealthiest groups.

3.5 As a result, the social potential of people living in deprived areas is not realised, with the opportunities and voice associated with civic engagement concentrated amongst the best-off. Low civic engagement amongst the poor can be linked to health inequalities, educational disadvantage and disconnection from the labour market. Put another way, low civic engagement can be seen as part of the condition of poverty.

IV Tackling turnout inequality

4.1 Despite the weight of the research findings presented above, there are ways to effectively address these problems. The existing evidence points to a series of interventions which, if properly implemented, can encourage participation amongst the poorest citizens, and can develop civic infrastructure in deprived areas.

4.2 However, change is needed. Recent attempts to increase civic engagement have consistently failed to affect participation amongst the most deprived groups. A wide range of different initiatives have been put in place over recent years. Attempts have been made to promote citizenship education, specific social groups have been the target of initiatives aimed at increasing turnout, and nationally-focused attempts at increasing the level of volunteering have been put in place. Initiatives like these have failed to arrest the decline of participation amongst deprived groups.

4.3 Any attempt to encourage civic engagement needs to confront the issue of inequalities in participation. Broad brush initiatives aimed at tackling the decline of citizen engagement in general are unlikely to succeed and may be counter productive.

4.4 Civic education programmes, and participation schemes which are not focused in this way risk exacerbating the problem. Inequalities in civic engagement might actually be increased by such schemes as they are usually most effective amongst the wealthiest citizens. By providing more opportunities for participation, many public engagement schemes simply end up increasing levels of participation amongst these groups, widening the divide in participation between rich and poor.

4.5 Instead, attention needs to be focused on deprived communities. The evidence suggests that two strategies can be effective here: targeted public engagement schemes, and investment in civic infrastructure.

4.6 Participation schemes focused on deprived areas can be a low cost-high gain means of addressing these issues. They work when targeted on specific problems - evidence exists for the benefits of community policing schemes, participatory budgeting programmes, local school initiatives, alongside a wide range of other initiatives (Fung and Wright, 2001).

4.7 Each of these schemes shares similar features. First there is a commitment on the part of the public agencies involved to genuinely engage citizens in decision-making, rather than simply consult. This has been demonstrated to maximise the benefits of citizen involvement while increasing citizen confidence that their participation is making a difference (Fung, 2004).

4.8 Second, successful programmes generally involve a degree of co-design at an early stage. 'Top down' solutions do not work well in deprived neighbourhoods. Too often, participation schemes are presented to citizens as complete, with questions over scope, format, location and so on settled before local people are involved. Recent studies have shown that the design of civic engagement schemes is critical to the inclusion of disadvantaged people, and that many widely-accepted practises serve to exclude these groups (Dacombe, 2017).

4.9 Finally, such schemes need to be sustained over time, and citizen participation should become an accepted part of the work of public agencies. The most successful examples of such initiatives are able to make civic engagement a part of everyday life in deprived communities.

4.10 Maintaining regular participation over time in this way has a number of benefits. The results of participation can be communicated to participants, holding public agencies to account and increasing citizen confidence that their participation is effective. Sustained participation also means that initiatives can work as 'schools for civic engagement', increasing the participants' knowledge of the issues addressed and also developing a wider range of important skills such as public speaking, the ability to understand complex arguments, and budgeting. Successful schemes can also broaden participation over time, as more citizens come into contact with the work of the scheme.

4.11 Alongside targeted initiatives such as these, the potential for increasing civic engagement in deprived communities is increased by investment in the civic infrastructure of areas exhibiting high levels of poverty.

4.12 Research has shown that deprived areas can often lack the kinds of physical and social structure necessary to foster civic engagement: the number of voluntary organisational based in such areas tends to be low, communal facilities are often lacking and organisational infrastructure such as shops and leisure facilities are missing.

4.13 Deprived areas like these are often described as suffering from 'concentration effects' of the poverty suffered by their residents, where the cumulative effects of deprivation mean that the opportunities for engagement are far more limited than in areas where the social profile is more diverse. In short, it isn't simply having a low income that is the issue – rather, the root cause of the problem lies in the combination of factors affecting areas suffering from high levels of deprivation. This evidenced by the spatial data on deprivation, which indicates pockets of intense deprivation corresponding to areas exhibiting low levels of civic engagement.

4.14 Tackling this problem is complex but effective steps can be as simple as opening up public spaces and buildings for community use, or publicising volunteering opportunities to local people – both approaches successfully employed in recent years.

4.16 It might also involve investment in local voluntary organisations. Using local councillors' discretionary funds to provide grants to support informal community activities is one way to address this issue. Similarly, investment in the capacity of voluntary organisation through training in areas such as grant applications and accounting has proven successful.

4.17 Initiatives like these work because participation is a habit. Gains made in some areas of civic life can be felt elsewhere. People who volunteer are more likely to vote, become active in civic affairs and become more generally involved in community activities.

4.18 To conclude, the crisis in civic engagement can be addressed. But only if it is correctly diagnosed and the problems of inequality of participation positioned at the core of any attempt to tackle the decline in participation that has been traced in recent years. Introducing targeted programmes aimed at increasing civic participation in deprived areas can be effective, as can investment in civic infrastructure. But without steps such as these, the crisis outlined in this submission can only worsen.

DECSY Development Education Centre South Yorkshire – written evidence (CCE0120)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

As Osler and Starkey (1996) have usefully described, citizenship comprises status, feeling and practice. Citizenship means all people in this country becoming aware (from an early age or from being accepted as a Citizen) of their status as citizens with concomitant rights and responsibilities to their local, regional, national and global communities. They should also develop a feeling of belonging and identity within their communities at different local to global levels. They should then be aware of how to put citizenship into practice at these different levels. Civic engagement means finding different ways to engage people as citizens, from voting to online and face to face community fora. It matters because large sections of society feel alienated from the structures of the current political system, feel they do not have a voice and are likely to fall prey to those offering simplistic and extreme solutions. As implied in the definition of citizenship above, people need to feel a sense of belonging and acceptance in the communities they live in and inhabit, but also a sense of agency, a belief that their views matter, that they see themselves as active citizens, capable of making changes for the better in concert with others.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Identity as citizens could be strengthened through the education system (see Question 5). For those who become naturalised citizens, some form of induction should take place, but beyond the simplistic citizenship test. Some understanding of the journey towards democracy in Britain should be developed and an awareness of one's rights and responsibilities as a citizen locally to globally. A sense of pride in being part of an evolving story should be developed, but national citizenship should be balanced with a sense of the global and responsibilities to all of humanity and the planet we all share.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Civic engagement should be encouraged through education – all young people should have the opportunity to take part in voluntary activities in their community as part of schooling. A culture of civic engagement should be developed by experience and practical example, not by force of law. The government should investigate and implement the New Economics Foundation's '21 Hours' campaign²⁶¹, for the normal working week to become 21 hours, so more work was available for all, with more leisure time, as well as more time to volunteer in the community.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

In combination with more active and explicit Citizenship Education in the school curriculum, the voting age should be lowered to 16. The first-past-the-post system should be replaced with proportional representation to ensure a wider representation of political views and a more dialogue-based decision-making system.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Citizenship Education should be a compulsory subject at primary and secondary school, and should be available in Further, Higher and Adult education. It should encompass developing knowledge of local to global politics, but also skills for engagement and a much greater emphasis on active citizenship. Early Years and Key Stage 1 should develop skills such as dialogic learning, critical thinking and collaborative learning. From Key Stage 2 young people should have the opportunity to devise projects for active citizenship in their school and community. All schools should engage in discussion around topical issues (more should be done to promote Global Learning – see the work of the Global Learning Programme²⁶²) and should put into practice voting procedures for School Councils and practice Mock Elections, as these have been shown to improve understanding and develop a culture of civic engagement. Very few schools take Citizenship Education seriously and most secondary schools are failing their statutory duty to teach it (it is often hidden in PHSE and pupils are unaware of the difference between the two subjects). The number of trained Citizenship teachers is tiny and there is no incentive to encourage them in ITE or whilst in post. The E-Bacc has led to many schools dropping Citizenship at GCSE and there are no plans to continue with 'A' level Citizenship, so the subject has lost even more status. GCSE and A level exams should include assessment of active Citizenship projects. Ofsted should produce regular reports on how well it is being taught.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

The NCS should continue, but do more to encourage young people from all sections of society to take part, as well as encouraging more to take part in the International Citizenship Service. Better Citizenship Education and a broader culture of civic engagement (see Question 3) would lead to more active citizens.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

All organisations should encourage a culture of civic engagement and volunteering (this would be much easier if the 21 Hours campaign mentioned in Question 3 were adopted). It should be seen as part of work-life balance in all areas of employment.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

The so-called ‘Fundamental British Values’ should be re-named ‘the values to which we broadly subscribe as a society, as it is erroneous and divisive to call them ‘British’. They should also include the values of justice and solidarity. More needs to be done to break down the barriers of white, male privilege which prevent the advancement of many women and people from ethnic minorities. Good Citizenship Education should develop a greater sense of agency, articulacy and community engagement amongst all sections of society.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Many people feel removed from politics and civic engagement as they do not feel their views are represented or that the political process does little to help them. Many feel that the political system has been bought by corporate and vested interests. State funding of political parties who obtain more than 5% of the vote in elections should be brought in to create a more level playing field and restore faith in the lobbying system. Proportional representation would give more say to a greater number of views and reduce the binary nature of political arguments. More focus should be made on the work of Select Committees at national and local level, where people from different political parties and experts in the field have to work together in dialogue to find solutions. Members of the public should also be invited to take part. The promotion of PMQ-type exchanges in the media puts people off and trivialises politics. Methodologies such as Philosophy for Children and Philosophy in Communities can develop a culture of dialogue where people learn to be more open-minded and accept different perspectives and world-views. Such skills and learning are crucial for community cohesion and to begin to solve complex problems in a world facing an uncertain future.

Democracy Club Community Interest Company– written evidence (CCE0138)

4. Introduction

- 4.1. Democracy Club is a non-profit community interest company. Our vision is of a society in which democracy thrives through knowledge, participation and openness. Our mission is to use open data, design and technology to give every citizen the information and participation opportunities they need, in a way that suits them. We are non-partisan and we work openly.
- 4.2. We do not pursue a particular view of an ideal democracy; we aim to make constant iterative improvements to the democratic process based on the need of individuals or groups. We judge those needs based on what voters search for online, public research and the feedback we receive directly from voters. Currently our data and services allow people to look up their candidates online and, for ~60% of the UK, to find their correct polling station via searching online too.
- 4.3. Our response to this call for evidence is based on our experience in increasing civic engagement through technology. We are part of a growing field known as ‘civic tech’. The questions set out in the call have guided our response, but we have not followed them precisely. We believe that more and better civic education and engagement will help reduce feelings of disenfranchisement, increase trust in government and improve people’s belief in their ability to create change. The result will be increased wellbeing (see, e.g. O’Donnell, G. and Deaton, A. and Durand, M. and Halpern, D. and Layard, R. (2014) Wellbeing and policy. Legatum Institute, London, UK).

5. Modern civic engagement

- 5.1. In the 21st century we should expect a significant role for technology in civic education and engagement. At its simplest, we should expect engagement in our existing process of representative democracy to be improved with digital information. People should be able to receive notifications of elections, learn about their candidates, engage with those candidates, and find out where to vote, who won, and what happens next, via digital means. If, in the digital age, the UK is unable to solve these basic informational elements, then the value of a discussion about modern citizenship and civic engagement is questionable.
- 5.2. At a more complex level, interesting questions of digital civic engagement arise. As people conduct more of their lives online, as they build and curate identities online (e.g. how they represent themselves, who they ‘follow’, what they write/photograph or film) — what does that mean for civic identity? How does one act in a civic-minded way in the digital space? What role should the privately owned digital giants, like Facebook and Google, play?

6. Identity

- 6.1. You have called for evidence at a time of great political, constitutional and societal flux in Britain. A time of anger at the ‘political class’ and the ‘elite’. And a time of perhaps unparalleled technological change. This moment presents an opportunity to push digital civic engagement as a defining characteristic of a forward-focused, modern British identity. Today’s technology makes vast levels of always-on engagement inexpensive. It makes it easier to experiment, and to engage those not online (less than 10% of the population) too.
- 6.2. A parallel example can be seen in Switzerland, a country that only exists due to the commitment made to democracy at the point of confederation. Today, the Swiss’ methods of public decision-making are a critical part of what it means to be Swiss.
- 6.3. Participation in the democratic process could represent a modern British value. For citizens it represents both a right and responsibility. The state has a role to play in ensuring that this responsibility can be exercised in a way that’s appropriate to how people live their lives today, that it is receptive to modern means of civic engagement — and the people have a responsibility to take part.

7. Law

- 7.1. Democracy Club advocates some small legal changes that would improve civic education and engagement. One would be to update the requirements of ‘giving notice’, as in ‘the local authority shall give notice...’ to fit with a digital age. Today, this notice should be given in open, machine- and human-readable formats, which can help power digital services to boost engagement. When data on democratic engagement is available in an open digital format, not only by the posting of a sheet of A4 paper on a board outside a council office, Britain will be making progress.
- 7.2. Legal changes could also improve voter information. Currently, certain elections (e.g. Mayor of London, PCCs) require a returning officer to produce, print and deliver to all homes a booklet in which candidates can publish a message to voters. We believe this should be the case at every election.
- 7.3. Our polling station finder service would benefit — as would many potential new civic engagement services — from open address data, which the UK Government has previously committed to producing. We are unsure of the present status of this commitment.

8. Civic education

- 8.1. The websites run by Democracy Club give users the options to leave written feedback. This is always useful in keeping us grounded about the problem we are trying to solve: the lack of knowledge of the democratic process that such comments often demonstrate is alarming. Notably, the day after the EU Referendum, the top UK search term online was ‘What is the EU?’. The absence of quality nationwide civic, political or democratic education presents a significant barrier to civic engagement.
 - 8.2. Quality civic education in schools is vital, but adult civic education must also be considered important; political education should be seen as a lifelong process, a responsibility of both state and citizen as part of a fulfilling life as a member of society. We see some of the biggest current gaps in the public understanding of local government, but the needs will change over time — the goal should be to provide a holistic, practical education.
9. How to do it
- 9.1. Currently, civic engagement is not being taken seriously enough by the state, by most of the third sector — and apparently not at all by the private sector, which should not be excluded from this debate.
 - 9.2. Existing organisations, like ourselves, dedicated to improving civic education or engagement, represent a small group of underfunded, piecemeal efforts. If our shared aim is a modern British identity based on civic engagement, then this is not good enough.
 - 9.3. Our democracy is necessarily complex: people will always need education and assistance through the process. British society faces a range of global, continental, national and local challenges and if we want democracy to survive and thrive, all of us — every institution — need to consider how to protect and strengthen it. This is not going to happen without sustainable funding. A democracy with high levels of civic engagement is not a societal default; it will not happen by accident.
 - 9.4. Funding for civic education and engagement efforts must be sustainable and independent, likely funded by taxation, due to the difficulty of raising donations for a ‘meta-cause’ like engagement. The funding should be independent of government, to ensure its non-partisan nature.
 - 9.5. The Royal Charter that allows for the funding of the BBC may be a model to follow — or the BBC itself could undertake new activity in this space. Its trusted brand, audience, high level of resource, and its ability to innovate as demonstrated on projects like iPlayer, could be highly beneficial to the civic education and engagement. The budget requirements are relatively low; much could be achieved with an annual budget of £1-2 per head of population.

- 9.6. Alternatively, it may be necessary to consider an entirely new institution. Germany's Bundeszentrale für politische Bildung should provide inspiration. It has 200 staff and eight-figure budget with a mission to strengthen democracy from the ground up. It produces high quality, non-partisan content in all formats for a range of audiences. It runs training for journalists, students and teachers, as well as funding many third sector civic engagement projects. The idea of politische Bildung refers to something greater than education: the need for constant, lifelong training or self-cultivation towards becoming better citizens.

Democracy Matters – written evidence (CCE0265)

Written evidence submitted by Titus Alexander, founder of Democracy Matters, in personal capacity. Summary

Citizenship with civic engagement matter because they give people

- 1) A shared identity and values, making society more cohesive and resilient;
- 2) A constitutional framework (even if unwritten) for resolving conflicts by peaceful means;
- 3) Opportunities to tackle social problems and improve society.

Effective citizenship is created by 1) legal rights, 2) social conditions and 3) personal capabilities of confidence, skills, knowledge and contacts. Personal capabilities and social conditions are necessary for formal rights to be effective.

These three areas are part of the “social capital” which largely determine people’s life chances. They include the UK’s privileged position in the world, which gives citizens many benefits and makes it an attractive destination for people who fear persecution or destitution elsewhere. Differences in citizenship rights between countries therefore matters for our own wellbeing.

UK citizenship is being changed at all levels:

- a) Devolved assemblies and city mayors create unequal citizenship rights across the UK;
- b) Diffusion of accountability in many public services makes it difficult for citizens to know who is responsible for what and how to have a say;
- c) Leaving the EU will create a complex hierarchy of citizenship rights among residents, and give employers, landlords and public services more responsibility for policing citizenship;
- d) Powerful online tools enable some people to have a stronger voice and influence.

These changes are increasing inequality of influence between well-connected minorities and the majority, thus widening the participation gap. To address this, we need better education and support for citizens to learn how the system works and how to have an effective say.

Q2: A sense of citizenship and belonging begins within families, communities and school, so the state should create civic signposts and support at significant times in life.

Schools should become the constitutional foundations of a learning democracy.

Promoting “Britishness” is counter-productive, but national pride comes from achievement.

Q3: Serious consideration should be given to compulsory voting; to giving citizens an annual statement on what their taxes pay for, as well as national assets and liabilities; and to creating a national recognition scheme for civic contributions to public life.

Q4: Current laws, policy and social attitudes discourage civic and political engagement, particularly the Lobbying Act, for which there is substantial evidence.

I favour lowering the voting age to 16 and providing better political education in schools.

Q5: The UK should use the Council of Europe’s Framework of Competences for Democratic Culture to inform provision of education for democracy.

Democracy Matters has called for a new Speakers’ Commission on Learning for Democracy. We are holding a consultation on this with St Georges House at Windsor Castle and would like to make a more substantial contribution on this question following this event in October.

Q6: Constant changes in government support for community development and citizenship engagement has undermined trust in government-sponsored initiatives. We need a cross-party commitment to sustained investment and support for effective citizenship engagement.

Q7: We should learn from Germany’s Federal Agency for Civic Education (bpb) and create an arms-length agency for political education, possibly modelled on the BBC and British Council, funded through the license fee.

The BBC is not very good at supporting participation by the majority in the democratic process and should urgently be reviewed, while those interested in politics are well served.

Local Government should set up impartial “democracy hubs” to support civic engagement.

Q8: The biggest threats to our core values are

- a. people feeling that their voice is not heard so there is no point in taking part;
- b. a political culture which turns many people off from politics;
- c. a partisan press willing to distort information to support its editorial line. : a robust independent press is a vital part of democracy, but respect for evidence and pluralism within newspapers is as important as between papers, and should not detract from a strong and distinct editorial view.

Q10: Well-managed diversity strengthens social cohesion and Britain's role in the world.

Q12: Members of Democracy Matters will provide many examples from the St George's House consultation in October, but to mention just four major initiatives here:

- a) Family learning, Sure Start and neighbourhood family centres like Pen Green in Corby
- b) The national Community Champions Programme from 2001 to 2007;
- c) Cooperative schools, of which there are over 400;
- d) UCL's annual Global Citizenship programme to explore global challenges and develop skills.

Full response to questions

I. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. Citizenship with civic engagement matter because they give people
 - 1) A shared identity and values, making society more cohesive and resilient;
 - 2) A constitutional framework (even if unwritten) for resolving conflicts by peaceful means;
 - 3) Opportunities to tackle social problems and improve society.
2. Civic engagement is prior to formal citizenship, since citizenship rights are often created by people taking action, such as the women’s suffrage movement and Chartists in the UK, the civil rights movement in the United States, and the world-wide movements for democracy.
3. Formal citizenship rights are not enough to make citizenship meaningful or effective: the conflict in Northern Ireland and inner-city riots of 1981 and 2011 showed what can happen when people feel they do not belong and cannot resolve matters by peaceful means. The votes for Scottish independence, Sinn Fein and Brexit show how many people think our current political framework does not give them an effective voice or identity as citizens of the UK and EU. It is unlikely that leaving the EU will resolve many of the reasons why people voted to leave the EU, unless there is a massive increase in support for effective engagement.
4. When people are engaged in their community, they show their sense of identity through mutual aid and community activities. Engagement strengthens their identity with a specific place, faith, football club, ethnic group and other associations in which they are engaged. Community engagement and identity are often formed in adversity, when times are hard and people feel their backs are against the wall or others are against them. For young people engagement and identity can be expressed through youth movements like mods, rockers, hippies, punks, grunge, etc.; organisations like the Boys Brigade, Scouts and Woodcraft Folk; or gangs. Cooperatives, trades unions, evangelical churches, community organising and many other social movements are more sustained responses to adversity, creating identity through engagement. They also created political organisations and parties which still give people a voice in local and national government.
5. On the other side of the social divide, public schools, elite universities and social networks also create opportunities for engagement and access to the political process.
6. These networks of civic engagement, at all levels, are vital parts of our ‘social capital’ and more important for our collective well-being and prosperity than many realise.

Herbert Simon, a Nobel-prize winning economist, observed that differences in average incomes between rich and poor nations ‘are due to differences in social capital that takes primarily the form of stored knowledge (e.g. technology, and especially organizational and governmental skills). ... When we compare the poorest with the richest nations, it is hard to conclude that social capital can produce less than about 90 per cent of income in wealthy societies’ (Simon, 2000; see also Van Parijs, 2000). Thus, people in the UK are more productive and earn seven times more than people in Nigeria (in purchasing power; 18 times more in cash terms) because our social, political, legal and other institutions made possible the industrial revolution, trade, mass education and public services, not because we work harder.

7. The contrast between North and South Korea is the most dramatic illustration of the difference social capital makes to well-being and prosperity, but well-documented differences in life chances, health and mortality rates between rich and poor in UK also reflect wide disparities in social capital among British citizens.
8. Effective engagement and voice matters for the whole of society, because citizens’ action drives social improvement. No one would have been killed in Grenfell Tower if authorities had listened to residents’ concerns about fire safety. Like the Hillsborough families, Mid-Staffs Hospital action group and survivors of historic sexual abuse, their voices were not heard and people suffered as a result.
9. Effective citizenship is created by 1) a set of legal rights, 2) social conditions and 3) personal capabilities, which largely determine an individuals’ opportunities and their sense of belonging in society (see Annex 1 for more detail). Each of these three areas make a distinct contribution to citizenship.

Legal conditions for citizenship include:

- Political and human rights, enshrined in domestic and international law.
- Accessible, impartial rule of law and means of judicial redress equally available to all.

Social and economic conditions for effective citizenship include:

- Freedom from fear of destitution, exploitation and persecution, which in turn depend on enforcement of rights as well as social provision and protection.
- Civic associations through which people are involved in society, get support and express their voice, such as business associations, faith communities, pressure groups and trades unions.
- Economic opportunities and freedoms to find work, create enterprises, trade.
- Tolerance and mutual respect which enables people to be themselves.
- Opportunities to learn about the political system, rights and responsibilities.

Personal capabilities include a sense of personal power, confidence knowledge and skills needed to take part effectively.

10. If people lack one or more of these conditions it is difficult, if not impossible, to be a full and equal citizen. The relationship between these conditions is complex. People may lack legal rights of citizenship, like Nelson Mandela in apartheid South Africa, but he had the courage, knowledge and association to campaign for equal citizenship rights. Many people in the UK have legal rights but lack the confidence and knowledge to use them. Some people have the confidence to campaign, but lack the knowledge or skill to be effective, and conclude that they are powerless to influence society or take action which is counter-productive.
11. Differences in citizenship rights between countries matters as much to our peace and prosperity as differences between people in the UK, and between its nations and regions. When people fear persecution or destitution, they will risk their lives to find safety and opportunity, becoming refugees or migrants.
12. Nationality creates a hierarchy of citizenship among the world's people, so that UK citizens can visit 173 territories without a visa (out of 218), near the top of the table. At the bottom, citizens of Pakistan can travel visa-free to only 28 countries, Iraqis to 27, and Afghans to 24, (Henley & Partners Visa Restrictions Index 2017). Below them are at least ten million stateless people.
13. So long as the gap in global citizenship rights and opportunities is so wide, the UK will be a magnet for people seeking safety and greater equality of opportunity, following Norman Tebbit's injunction to "get on their bike" to find work. As one of the most privileged, and wealthy countries of the world, the UK has a choice about whether to enforce a form of global apartheid or to seek greater equality in conditions for citizenship worldwide.
14. When we were a colonial power, residents of colonies and dominions were subjects of the Crown and Britain drew up the national borders for many countries. British nationality and citizenship has evolved over centuries in response to globalisation and domestic political pressures. Decisions about UK citizenship must be made in relation to the rest of the world or we increase the risk of conflict within Britain and the UK.
15. British citizens belong to a small minority of countries which have the most extensive rights and freedoms in the world, including permanent representation in the UN Security Council, NATO, Bretton Woods Institutions and Council of Europe, as well as visa-free access to 80 percent of countries. But low levels of engagement and political literacy means that most citizens are not aware of their rights and privileges, or how these are being changed under the biggest ever constitutional reform of the UK now underway.
16. UK citizenship is being changed at many levels:

- a) Devolved assemblies and city mayors give some citizens more access to decision-making, alongside changes in funding for local government, thus creating even unequal citizenship rights across the UK.
 - b) Diffusion of accountability for public services in an unstable institutional landscape makes it almost impossible for citizens to know who is responsible for what or how to have a say in many policy areas: School Commissioners, the Education & Skills Funding Agency (ESFA), Ofsted, Local Economic Partnerships, Clinical Commissioning Groups, Health & Wellbeing Boards, Housing Associations, Tennant Management Organisations, and other bodies allocate a large proportion of taxpayers' money and exercise power without direct political oversight.
 - c) Leaving the EU will remove European citizenship from people who do not have an EU connection (e.g. Irish ancestry) and create a complex hierarchy of citizenship rights and identities among UK residents. Employers, landlords and public service providers will have more responsibility for policing citizenship. The UK is also likely to fall in world visa rankings (it has fallen from first to fourth tier since 2014; Germany is now at the top) and lose influence in international decision-making forums (which may not be a bad thing, but will affect on life in the UK).
17. At the same time, the internet offers citizens a growing number of powerful tools for engagement for those who know how to use them, including
- Official websites like Parliament.UK, GOV.UK and data.gov.uk;
 - Petition sites like Change.org and 38 Degrees,
 - TheyWorkforYou, WhatDoTheyKnow, WritetoThem, and Democracy Club,
 - Mobilising tools such as Meetup.org, Campaign Partner, Citizen Space, D-Cent, Ecanvasser, NationalField, NationBuilder and many more.
 - Google, Facebook, LinkedIn, Twitter and other social media.
18. This changing constitutional landscape increases inequality of influence. It makes it easier for lobbyists, think tanks, professional campaigners, pressure groups and activists to get information, mobilise support and target decision-makers. At the same, most people do not know how the system works and get lost in institutional labyrinths. Politicians themselves are often powerless to act on behalf of citizens grappling with officials following rigid procedures and appeals processes designed to protect them. People who know how to use the system are empowered by new rights while the majority are excluded by invisible barriers, thus widening the participation gap.

19. To address this, we need to increase education and support for all citizens to learn how the system works and how to have an effective say, as proposed in response to the following questions.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

1. Research shows that the sense of citizenship and belonging begins within families, communities and school, so we need to prioritize activities which support a sense of belonging through families, communities and school.
2. Most people do not feel the state and public services ‘belong’ to them, and that this is often their biggest area of expenditure after housing. Voting and civic engagement are how we collectively decide what the state and public services should do. The state should therefore empower people as citizens by creating “civic signposts” at significant moments in life, such as:
 - a) At birth, every parent could be given a ‘welcome bag’ with their Personal Child Health Record (or 'red book'), a summary of entitlements, support from the NHS and their NHS number and recognition as a new member of the community. Parents often get a ‘goody bag’ of commercial baby products and free books from Bookstart before school to help families read together, which should include information about the UK and meaning of citizenship.
 - b) When they start school, every child and their parent could be welcomed into their learning community, introducing parents to the ‘civic structure’ of education, from class meetings and the governing body, to the education authority or Multi-Agency Trust, Schools’ Commissioner, ESFA, Ofsted and DfE.
 - c) Before every election voters should get a factual summary of the powers, responsibilities and budgets their representative will make decisions about (council, assembly or parliament), and information about independent voter information sites, such as Votematch, Vote for Policies, etc.
 - d) When young people reach 18 they should get a letter and/or email from the Speaker, with an outline of their rights and responsibilities as citizens, the powers and responsibilities of Parliament, the name of their MP (about 700, - 800,000 per year) and an online guide to the role of their MP and Parliament, tax and spending.
 - e) Every school, college, university and apprenticeship provider should work with their local authority to organise high-profile “citizenship ceremonies” for young people reaching voting age, to celebrate and inspire democratic citizenship.

- f) Every citizen should get an annual statement on what their taxes pay for, as my local authority does; national assets and liabilities; and where to get more information, making it clear that decisions are the responsibility of politicians elected by them, as citizens.
3. Schools should become the constitutional foundations of a learning democracy, enabling people to develop confidence, skills and knowledge through participation in the school community, as proposed in Citizenship Schools (summary in Annex 2).
 4. Promoting “Britishness” and “British” Values is counter-productive, since it:
 - alienates citizens who do not identify with Britain for any reason;
 - promotes a sense of ‘them’ and ‘us’ between the UK and all other nations;
 - inhibits evolution in values and social attitudes: if adopted in 1986 it would have prohibited discussion of homosexuality in schools, while today schools are encouraged to prevent homophobia.
 5. People have multiple identities and can feel pride in them all. Pride in being British comes from actions by British citizens, in sport, arts or even international affairs. It also arises when the country does things well, or people take part something bigger than themselves, such as the Olympics or an election.
 6. It is ironic that young people are taught that democracy is a “British Value”, but often do not develop the confidence, skills and knowledge to take part in democracy, and have very few opportunities for democratic participation in education.
- 3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship.
Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?
1. Serious consideration should be given to compulsory voting, as a civic duty to share responsibility for our collective affairs, with the option of 12 hours community service rather than a fine for people who do not vote without good reason.
 2. Paying taxes is a reciprocal duty of citizenship and this should be made clear with tax statements, as proposed in 4.2.f above.
 3. We should create a national recognition scheme for civic contributions to public life, including volunteering; serving on a Parent Teacher Association, Governing Body or magistrates bench; and membership of a political party.

- 4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?
1. Current laws and policy as well as social attitudes actively discourage civic and political engagement. There is substantial evidence that the Lobbying Act has a negative effect.
 2. I personally favour lowering the voting age to 16. The experience of Scotland shows that young people do engage, and it will give schools a greater incentive to provide meaningful, impartial political education.
- 5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?
1. How we encourage citizenship starts at birth: the only question is whether we want to foster active, informed and effective citizens who shape their future together, as advocated in this response; or whether we want people to stay in the dark and get lost in the complex maze of modern life. The UK should use the Council of Europe's Framework of Competences for Democratic Culture to inform provision.
 2. Democracy Matters has called for a new Speakers' Commission on Learning for Democracy and is holding a consultation on this with St Georges House at Windsor Castle at the end of October, so we would like to make a more substantial contribution on this question following this event (Annex 2)
- 6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?
1. Constant changes in government support for community development and citizenship engagement, from the Community Development Projects (CDP) programme (1969-76) through Active Learning for Active Citizenship (ALAC) and Take Part to the Big Society and community organising from 2010 undermines trust in government-sponsored initiatives – for which I can provide evidence. We need a cross-party commitment to sustained investment in support for effective citizenship and community engagement. We need to encourage the spectrum of activity from volunteering to standing for office and taking part in governance at all levels of society.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

1. We can learn a lot from the German Federal Agency for Civic Education (bpb), which actively promotes political literacy for adults and in schools. The UK should aim to create an equivalent arms-length agency to provide political education, on the model of the BBC and British Council, possibly as a joint project. Joe Michell of Democracy Club has suggested that the BBC license fee could be used to fund it.
2. The BBC provides excellent current affairs news coverage, but its role in “Sustaining citizenship and civil society” was reduced in the last Charter review. Its purposes still include providing information and analysis so that audiences can “participate in the democratic process, at all levels, as active and informed citizens.” While people interested in politics are well served by the BBC, it has never done this well for the majority. A major review of the BBC’s role in supporting participation in the democratic process is long overdue.
3. Local Government should be encouraged to set up impartial “democracy hubs” to inform and support civic and political engagement: there are a few examples of prototypes (see outline in Annex 4).

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

1. The biggest threats to our core values are
 - a. people feeling that their voice is not heard and nothing they say or do can make any difference, so there is no point in taking part;
 - b. a tribal political culture which creates a perception of opposing gangs and turns many people off from politics;
 - c. a partisan press willing to distort information to support its editorial line: a robust independent press is a vital part of democracy, but respect for evidence and pluralism within newspapers is as important as between papers, and should not detract from a strong and distinct editorial view.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

No space to discuss this, but I hope some of these factors are addressed in the analysis above.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

No space to discuss this, but I hope some of these factors are addressed in the analysis above. When managed well, diversity strengthens social cohesion and integration, and benefits Britain’s role in the world, from arts and sports to security and trade.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

1. There are many examples from all areas, which we will include in our report from the St George’s House consultation, but to mention just four major initiatives:
 - a) Family learning, Sure Start and neighbourhood family centres like Pen Green in Corby
 - b) The national Community Champions Programme from 2001 to 2007;
 - c) Cooperative schools, of which there are over 400;
 - d) UCL Global Citizenship brings together students from across UCL for two weeks in June to explore our biggest global challenges and develop skills, from negotiation to presentation, photography and film-editing, through workshops, placements and projects;

Definitions of Citizenship

“The proprietor of stock is properly a citizen of the world, and is not necessarily attached to any particular country,” Adam Smith, 1776.

Citizenship can be defined in terms of nine distinct but interdependent elements:

Legal

1. A constitution, written and unwritten rules governing the place of citizens in society.
2. Political and human rights including enshrined in law and UN Conventions
3. Membership of a state, society and the world
4. Democratic values, eg freedom, fairness, social justice, respect for democracy and diversity.
5. Civic involvement and responsibility (‘active citizenship’). Rights create obligations on others and ‘duties to the community’ are part of the Universal Declaration (Article 29).
6. Accountability means those responsible for decisions are answerable for their actions.
7. Participation in democratic decision-making
8. A sense of personal power, self-esteem and confidence to take part.
9. Knowledge and skills needed to take part

[From Titus Alexander, Citizenship Schools, UNICEF-UK/Campaign for Learning, 2001

“Citizenship requires both legal rights and the ability to exercise those rights in practice. In international law there is no ‘world citizenship’, only citizens of sovereign states. In this respect, individuals are recognised only in terms of their group identity. As in South Africa, there is a hierarchy of group rights:

1. citizens of the USA, UK and France, with veto powers in the Security Council, NATO and IMF, World Bank and global economic regimes;
2. OECD and Western Alliance, who have the vote, access to courts and Western solidarity;
3. other independent states represented on a regional basis and party to human rights conventions
4. independent states which do not adhere to human rights conventions;
5. occupied territories and peoples without states;
6. refugees, asylum-seekers and stateless person.

Although not explicitly classified by race, this hierarchy is banded by colour. ... Nationality laws of most countries, and the European Union, explicitly enshrine this ‘classification’.”

Citizenship Schools:

Learning democracy, raising attainment, building community

By Titus Alexander, Convener, Democracy Matters, author of Citizenship Schools, Campaign for Learning, 2001

Every school is a community and political entity, through which people learn how to behave and take part in society. The school's ethos and 'hidden curriculum' has as much influence on pupils as the content of lessons. What most pupils and parents learn is that they must do what they are told, their voice doesn't count except when asked and they give the right answer, and management decides. However, many schools encourage some participation. These areas of participation could be developed to make schools the foundations of a democratic society.

Citizenship education should be more than a subject on the curriculum. It could enable all members of the school community to learn how to take part as active citizens, in the life of the school, the local community and wider society. An active school could enable local people to lead the democratic renewal of their area from the bottom up.

This article summarises the case for encouraging schools to put active participation and democratic citizenship at the core of their ethos, as described in my book of the same name²⁶³.

Citizenship and the cooperative schools' movement

In recent years there has been a rapid growth of co-operative schools which put democratic governance at the heart of schools and develop active participatory skills needed to build civil society, personal development and wellbeing. By 1 June 2013 there were 444 co-operative trust schools with about 100 more in the consultation stage. A unique characteristic of the co-operative model is that it enables key stakeholder groups to become members. This kind of bottom-up movement with national support from an independent, democratic agency is more likely to lead to sustain improvement in schools and their local areas than the top-down initiatives of the past 25 years.

Why citizenship schools?

When people lose their sense of civic duty and engagement, societies become vulnerable to extremism, as happened in ancient Rome, Weimar Germany and many other countries. Today the sense of powerlessness and disillusionment with politics is one of the greatest threats to our future as a society. But if we can inspire teachers and young people to recover their sense of power over their own lives, we can unleash creativity and innovation to transform our economy and society for the better.

²⁶³ Citizenship Schools: a practical guide to education for citizenship and personal development, Titus Alexander, Campaign for Learning, 2001

Although the national curriculum requirement to teach citizenship comes from central government, schools have considerable freedom to decide how it will be taught. This makes citizenship a way of improving schools and their community from the bottom-up.

Politicians on all sides of the political spectrum call for participation, empowerment and civic renewal. Local schools and colleges have the potential to play a major role in empowering people to take an active part in renewing society. Schools are one of the few institutions which can connect a large part of local communities, reaching people through children and their families. Extended schools connect even more services are through local schools. This gives schools the opportunity to become foundations of a democratic learning society, through which young people learn how to take part in decision-making and develop a real sense of civic responsibility.

Increasing participation in school also increases attainment and motivation. A study for CSV by Derry Hannan found that “in terms of low exclusions, good attendance, staff and student assessment and exam results” schools with high levels of student participation “performed better than might have been expected” by comparison with schools with a similar intake²⁶⁴.

Citizenship is about enabling people to develop the abilities, knowledge, and understanding to take an effective part in society. The citizenship curriculum explicitly aims to make pupils “more self-confident and responsible both in and beyond the classroom. It encourages pupils to play a helpful part in the life of their schools, neighbourhoods, communities and the wider world. It also teaches them about our economy and democratic institutions and values; encourages respect for different national, religious and ethnic identities; and develops pupils' ability to reflect on issues and take part in discussions.” It would be a mistake, therefore, to see the citizenship as simply another subject to be squeezed into the timetable.

Citizenship is an active discipline

Citizenship must be practised as well as taught. You would never teach football by getting people to study the rules and history or analysing games. You take them onto the pitch to train and play matches against other teams. So too with citizenship. The curriculum offers schools many opportunities to involve staff, pupils and parents in the life of the school and its community in response to our rapidly changing world.

Participation and democracy in school is not a soft option. It requires reflection, planning, training and implementation to ensure that all members of the school community are involved. They must experience it as a benefit, not a burden. To be effective, people must experience it as a way of making life better for themselves, the school and the local area.

Citizenship requires a shared vision, values and commitment based on fairness, mutual respect, democratic participation, human rights, social justice and diversity. These are values to which the nation aspires in signing the UN Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. But they are much easier to agree than to live them in practice.

²⁶⁴ The Hannam Report: The Impact of Citizenship Education, Derry Hannam, CSV (2001)

Every school is a political entity. Charles Handy compared schools with city-states (Handy, 1987), with every form of governance from dictatorship to the radical democracy of Summerhill.

Institutional change and school improvement require political skills to engage and persuade people to do things differently. The citizenship curriculum should give all members of the school community an active part in continuous and democratic school improvement.

What is a citizenship school?

Any school in which citizenship is practiced as well as taught could be called a “citizenship school”. A central aim of citizenship is to give young people the knowledge, skills and understanding to play an effective role in society. It aims to make pupils “more self-confident and responsible both in and beyond the classroom. It encourages pupils to play a helpful part in the life of their schools, neighbourhoods, communities and the wider world. It also teaches them about our economy and democratic institutions and values; encourages respect for different national, religious and ethnic identities; and develops pupils' ability to reflect on issues and take part in discussions.” If done well, it will equip young people to thrive in a world of constant change –starting with the introduction of the citizenship curriculum itself. It would be a mistake, therefore, to treat citizenship as simply another subject to be squeezed into the timetable.

But the timetable has a vital role in developing citizenship in schools. First of all, subject status is enshrined in the timetable. Citizenship has to be there, alongside maths, English and the rest. Second, the timetable tells pupils and parents that citizenship matters. Third, citizenship requires specialist skills and knowledge which need to be developed with a skilled teacher who knows the subject and how to teach it. This means setting aside time for teaching. Citizenship can enrich other subjects on the curriculum. At least 20% of the strands in citizenship can be developed through other subjects and a citizenship specialist can also provide issues, concepts and activities that enhance understanding of other subjects. In addition, citizenship has an important place in moral, pastoral, social and extra-curricular activities, such as form-time, assembly, behaviour policies and community links.

The concept of ‘citizenship school’ aims to bring these different aspects together into a whole school approach. It is drawn from schools across the country which give pupils, parents, staff and local communities an active role in school life. It is a practical embodiment of the citizenship curriculum, enabling pupils to “play a helpful part in the life of their schools, neighbourhoods, communities and the wider world.” A citizenship school aims to give every pupil an apprenticeship in active citizenship, by learning how the system works and taking part effectively. For this to happen, schools need to ensure that every member of the school community can be heard, have a say in decisions and influence school life.

A ‘citizenship school’ offers a sophisticated model of democracy, involving activities such as circle time, peer mediation, pupil responsibilities and parents’ councils. But the essential starting point is a commitment to use the citizenship curriculum to transform the way school is run by giving all young people direct experience of decision-making and the issues they face in growing up. These must be real decisions, with real consequences, in which young people have to seek compromise and consensus among themselves as well as with adults.

To be credible, the citizenship curriculum has to pervade all aspects of school life, including its culture and ethos; its approach to learning and teaching; and its decision-making processes. Teaching young people about the structures and processes of democracy without giving them an effective say in the life of their own school is a lesson in cynicism and powerlessness.

Citizenship schools could unleash greater creativity and commitment to learning in schools and their communities. As Derry Hannam's research shows, involvement in participatory activities enhances learning across the curriculum, leading to higher than expected levels of attendance and attainment at GCSE.

Elements of a citizenship school

The following outline describes the essential elements of a citizenship school, based on current practices in schools today. They are based on co-operative vision and values, the Rights of the Child and the citizenship curriculum.

1. Create a democratic constitution and ethos

Every cooperative trust school has a constitutional framework which consists of its legal status and obligations; its aims, policies and development plan; and is embedded through the norms, values and decision-making structures that govern the lives of its members while they are at school. The articles of association for co-operative schools include an ethos based on the globally shared co-operative values of self help, self responsibility, democracy, equality, equity and solidarity and the ethical values of honesty, openness, social responsibility and caring for others.

In making its constitution explicit, a co-operative citizenship school aims to:

- recognise all members of the school community as learning citizens, with explicit rights and responsibilities;
- build a shared commitment to a democratic vision and values;
- involve everyone in creating fair rules or boundaries consistent with those values;
- involve pupils in maintaining peace through peer mediation and conflict resolution;
- develop meaningful responsibilities for all pupils.

2. Create an empowering curriculum,

A co-operative citizenship school applies co-operative values and co-operative learning and citizenship across the curriculum. This means enabling all members of the school community to develop the ability to take responsibility for their own learning, which includes:

- Active development of a sense of self as a person, learner and agent in the world.

- Equal partnership with parents as a child's first educator.
- Shared responsibility for learning with pupils.
- Exploration of values and purpose in all subjects.
- Emotional literacy.
- Thinking skills, applied to real as well as hypothetical and historical problems.
- Learning to learn.
- Enquiry skills, including listening, researching, writing and discussing.
- Co-operative and collaborative learning skills
- Peer education and mentoring.
- Skills of participation and action, including negotiating, decision-making and planning.
- Participating in a campaign or project for change.
- Co-operative enterprise
- Political understanding, sustainable development, consumer education and financial literacy.
- Self-assessment and evaluating the work of others.

For a rapidly changing society, in which the total amount of knowledge is growing exponentially, it is particularly important that young people learn how to take responsibility for their own learning.

3. Develop active participation in decision-making, based on cooperative models

Citizenship has to be experienced as well as taught. For pupils this means:

- Learning partners and teams to develop mutual support and confidence.
- Circle time to develop empathy, relationships and values as well as resolve problems.
- A pupil council with elected representatives from each class and a meaningful role in all decision-making.
- Pupil representatives on the trust members forum and on the governing body.
- Co-operative enterprise
- Local and national representation by young people in decision-making.

4. For parents, participation takes place through

- Class meetings (or associations) of all parents of children in each class, meeting two or three times a year to discuss the curriculum, concerns about the class and issues affecting the school, as well as to socialise and support the class;

- Parents’ councils consisting of elected representatives from each class;
- Parent representatives on the trust members forum, the governing body and a whole school council;

5. The co-operative community school

The school's co-operative Trust will demonstrate a commitment to citizenship through its engagement with the wider local community - for example, provision of facilities for youth activities and adult learning, active involvement with local issues, regular review of the way in which the school is responding to local needs.

Staff are involved through staff meetings, joint working groups with pupils, parents and community representatives, the governing body and school meeting or council. For youth and community groups using the school premises, citizenship schools could create a community association or council to run facilities and activities.

Each of these elements takes time and skill to develop, because it is important that they are done well. But however well one prepares, they involve an element of risk, because real learning and real democracy is never risk free. Most of the time, creativity and innovation are stimulated, bringing about greater enjoyment and improvement in their wake. The Campaign for Learning, UNICEF UK and the Gulbenkian Foundation have published a practical guide by me on how schools can transform themselves into “citizenship schools”, drawing on the experience of schools across the country. Sometimes, however, it is best to start small.

Conclusion

The creation of citizenship schools could bring about the most important constitutional reform since the achievement of universal adult suffrage. Citizenship schools would give every young person the skills, knowledge, experience and confidence to use the democratic process to improve their lives. It will require, of course, inspired teaching of citizenship in the classroom, but it must rest on foundations of confidence forged through experience in the corridors of school and community. The creation of “citizenship schools” could herald a bottom-up process of change that will bring about both higher levels of attainment and more confident, capable and responsible citizens.

As active citizens, pupils, parents and members of the local community will also develop the skills and confidence to transform their school and local area, so that they become masters of their own destiny.

Skills for Democracy

Satellite event for the World Forum

20 October 2016, House of Commons, UK

This event was hosted by Lord David Blunkett of Brightside and Graham Allen MP, Nottingham North. It aimed to give an overview of the state of education for democracy in the UK and identify priorities. Speakers

- David Blunkett, Professor of Politics in Practice at Sheffield University, MP for Brightside & Hillsborough 1987-2015, Education and Employment Secretary, Home Secretary, Work and Pensions Secretary, Leader of Sheffield City Council, 1980 – 87.
- James Weinberg, Research Associate of the Crick Centre, and Chair of the Political Studies, Association Early Career Network, on the state of citizenship and political education in schools;
- David Kerr, Association of Citizenship Teachers (ACT,) and Professor at University of Reading;
- Samira Musa, Bite the Ballot, on engaging young people;
- Ruth Spellman, CEO, Workers Educational Association, on adult education;
- Sue Tibballs, CEO Sheila McKechnie Foundation on campaign training and support for civil society
- Sarah Allen, Involve, on participation for a stronger democracy
- Ashok Viswanathan, Deputy CEO, Operation Black Vote on engaging minorities
- Rosemary Bechler, Editor, openDemocracy about the young reporters at the World Forum
- Dan Gallacher, Parliament's Education Service;

The government was invited to send a speaker or comment, but has no policies on education for democracy.

Skills for Democracy survey

We surveyed participants beforehand and 68% had NOT heard about the World Forum for Democracy. Only 37% had heard of the Council of Europe's Charter on Education for Democratic Citizenship, although almost 60% said their work was about education for advocacy, citizenship, democracy or politics.

Key points and next step

The three main messages from the meeting were

- 1) The need for a movement to promote the right to political literacy, like Make Poverty History.
- 2) The sorry state of citizenship education and political literacy in schools today; and
- 3) The wide range of initiatives in adult education and civil society.

Summary

The presentations gave a detailed overview of education for democracy, including the following points:

1. Political knowledge and participation is very unequal, particularly among younger, poorer people, but sustained, focused work makes a difference, of which there are many examples;
2. Citizenship education in schools is disappearing, due to being merged with PSHE; the lack of specialist teachers, political support and support from school leaders; and the Progress 8 Indicator for school accountability, in which Citizenship is a third tier option competing with Art and Design, Drama, PE and other subjects. Citizenship ceases to be an A-level subject from 2017, although Politics A level will continue.
3. The government priorities of Prevent, British Values and character education could be addressed through good citizenship education, but they have a much narrower, more functional focus.
4. The National Citizenship Service offers young people aged 15-17 one residential week of adventure, social action and citizenship skills: David Blunkett is on the Board of the NCS Trust and the National Citizenship Service Bill goes to the Lords on 25 Oct (follow progress here).
5. The UK is going through rapid constitutional change without any coherence (the Queen and House of Lords are the most stable parts), which makes the need for political literacy greater than ever.
6. Universities need to revive their historic role of outreach to communities, through extra-mural education and community action.
7. Social movements need to engage with the formal political process to influence power structures.
8. The BBC needs to be bolder in providing political literacy.
9. Social media can engage young people on their own terms.
10. Bite The Ballot showed the importance of engaging young people from the beginning, so they can share their experiences and be part of the process of building the skills for democracy
11. We need automatic voter registration when people turn 18: Lord Roberts of Llanduluno has tabled a Private Members' Bill for Automatic Electoral Registration \(School Students\) – get email update here
12. Just 6% of government education spending goes on post-19s, including apprenticeships.
13. School premises should be used for education in evenings and weekends, including political literacy.
14. The Sheila McKechnie Foundation runs campaign training for charities and community activists, and an annual campaigners' award.

15. There is widespread lack of knowledge about how parliament works, how change happens and how to influence government, even among experienced campaigners.
16. The Lobbying Act has had a chilling effect on campaigning by charities and voluntary organisations.
17. Deliberative democracy promoted by Involve creates more inclusive ways for citizens to have a say in decision-making (see their Participation Compass and People and Participation programme, or the Open Government Network, the Participation Works Partnership, What Works Scotland and the Citizen Participation Network)
18. Operation Black Vote has championed political participation by black and ethnic minorities since 1996 and run an MP shadowing scheme since 1999: former participants include the Mayors of Bristol and London, MPs Clive Lewis and Helen Grant.
19. openDemocracy is organising a youth citizens' newsroom at WFD2016, where some of the 70 young people from around the world will work cover the World Forum for Democracy in November.
20. Young people can have a voice through organisations like Student Voice, Youth Councils, and the Youth Parliament, for which 11 – 18 year olds elect representatives to debate issues in Parliament chosen by ballot through Make Your Mark, involving 978,216 young people in choosing topics for debate on Friday 11 November.
21. Parliament's Education and Outreach services are a fantastic resource for schools, universities, adult and community education, providing training and support across the UK as well as in Parliament.
22. Use Your Vote is a new all-party and non-aligned national campaign to build political literacy and enhance democratic engagement and active citizenship across all age groups.

Parliament Week (14 – 20 November) is a programme of activities to connects people with Parliament and democracy across the UK.

What is a Democracy Hub?

A “Democracy hub” is an independent local contact point for advice, information, education and support for people to take part in democratic decision-making, as recommended by the Power Inquiry (www.powerinquiry.org).

A network of local agencies can form a hub by sign-posting support for people to have a say and take part in politics. A hub could be accessed through local agencies, cafes, health centres, libraries, supermarkets and schools, with a resource centre in a volunteer bureau, community venue, adult education centre or shop front.

Members of a local Democracy Hub would:

1. Encourage people to understand how the system works and get involved through Citizens' Days, Democracy Week, Speakers' Corners, election hustings, festivals and outreach as well as adult, further and higher education courses and workshops.
2. Promote opportunities to have a voice, including elections, public forums, campaigns, pressure groups and civic roles of school governor, magistrate, health forum, local councillor, mayor, MP etc.
3. Show people how to use democratic tools such as Councillor or MP surgeries, petitions, www.theyworkforyou.com, www.democracymatters.info, Freedom of Information, etc;
4. Provide independent information, advice and support for people who want to complain, campaign, stand for election or get involved in a public issue or institution;
5. Connect agencies which support participation in politics, including adult and community education providers, campaign training and support services, Civic Societies, community associations, Parliamentary Outreach, trade associations, unions and voluntary sector infrastructure bodies.

Since 2010 a great deal of support for local democracy participation has gone, such as Take Part Pathfinders, Empowerment Partnerships and Community Empowerment Networks. However, community councils, Councils of Voluntary Action and local authority democratic services do some of the things a democracy hub would do. For examples, see end of this document.

At national level Parliamentary Outreach has many of these roles in relation to Parliament.

What we need now is more active cooperation between agencies, greater visibility and much easier access and support for the public to take part.

Why Democracy Hubs?

Society benefits when all citizens are involved in the political process, including the poor, disadvantaged and disenfranchised who are under represented in decision-making and formal politics. When people are unable to have an effective voice, they often become apathetic or angry and express themselves through anti-social behaviour or aggression which may be counter-productive.

When people have a voice, they can influence society to take account of their needs and aspirations, and they are more likely to be involved in addressing problems effectively.

Principles for local democracy hubs

Democracy hubs would uphold Nolan's seven principles of public life: accountability, honesty, integrity, leadership, objectivity, openness and selflessness, as well as the principles of practical political education:

1. pragmatic: start from where people are and help them achieve what they want;
2. pluralistic in funding, forms of provision, content and values
3. participative to develop confidence, communication skills and critical thinking
4. practical, to include techniques, knowledge and analysis relevant to active politics
5. peaceful: violence is a failure of politics
6. pro-poor: prioritise provision for individuals and areas who have had the least chances.

How to set up a Democracy Hub?

The main steps to set up a hub are:

1. an individual or organisation takes a lead and sounds out local agencies such as adult and community education, WEA, CAB, Civic Society, Youth Council or Parliament, Speakers' Corner Trust, university politics department, students unions, Take Part Pathfinder, Chamber of Commerce, trade council or unions, Empowerment Partnership, Community Empowerment Network, advocacy services or networks, HealthWatch, CVS, Parliamentary Outreach and local authority democratic services, participation unit, equalities organisations, including people with disabilities and other marginalised or excluded groups to identify what provision exists;
2. recruit a few committed local champions from key agencies to form an action group and draw up a shared vision of a local democracy hub – its purpose, why you want it, what difference you want it to make and what it would do to achieve that;
3. identify what's already going on to support your vision in whole or part and see who you might work together;
4. identify what's missing and draw up a plan to make it happen, including easy, low-cost first steps and ways in which you will measure effectiveness;

5. consult and involve local people and agencies, to generate a sense of excitement and shared ownership, as well as improve your plans;
6. make it happen: organise, raise funds, and get the message out.

The hub need not be a formal organisation. A loose network and forum with a written cooperation agreement and strong shared branding and promotion are key.

Branding

All agencies involved in a local democracy hub could share a logo and materials to signpost support for active citizenship. We would be very glad to work with local hubs under a “Democracy Matters [your area]” and provide links to local areas through our website.

Elements of a Democracy Hub

Many areas had elements of a democracy hub under different names, although they do not do everything suggested here. For example:

- Southwark Democracy Hub was a Take Part Pathfinder, which has an excellent series of “how to” guides, which it is willing to make available for other areas to adapt.
- Sefton Community Empowerment Network (CEN) is a 'network of networks' that brings together voluntary and community organisations that provide services to local communities and enable them and under-represented communities to have a voice in local decision-making'
- York Democratic Services provides information on how the city council works, how to influence decisions and where to find out about other local agencies
- Thanet Knowledge Hub provides information on the area, including local democracy
- Rural Community Councils run community-led planning which aims to involve everyone who lives and works in an area to create a vision and action plan for it.

The Democratic Society – written evidence (CCE0095)

The Democratic Society is a not-for-profit organisation operating across the UK and Europe to achieve more and better democracy, creating opportunities for people and institutions to have the desire, opportunity and confidence to participate together. We work to create opportunities for people to become involved in the decisions that affect their lives and for them to have the skills to do this effectively. Yet we are acutely aware that what it means to be a citizen in the UK today is a complex and challenging question to answer. It is all too easy to generate a rose-tinted view of Britain and argue that the core principles of citizenship – and of ‘Britishness’ – remain static. In some ways they do, yet in many others the society we see today bears little resemblance to that previous generations would recognise; never in human history have we experienced such a rapid transformation of human civilisation, driven by technological as well as social change.

Our world is now smaller, due to air travel and the internet, we shop less on the high street but more in out-of-town malls and online, we no longer wait by the telephone, use paper maps, and we are as likely to meet our life partners online as at a party. Ironically, and despite the enormous rise in opportunities to hear different voices, we tend to seek out like-minded forums to reinforce our views, and the much-heralded democratisation of media has created the spectre of ‘fake news’ and an ever-more critical need for information literacy and civic cohesion. We are more connected, yet more of us report that we are lonely.

For many, the speed that we live our lives at has accelerated and with it so have our expectations, firstly, of getting a rapid (if not immediate response) and, secondly, to be part of the process. The world has shifted from passive to active, but where is democracy in this?

Citizenship in the 21st century means being actively involved in the things that affect our lives, not a passive bystander. And yet there is a tension in the competing world-views and the rich tapestry that our country has become; between our institutions and the public, between young and old, urban and rural, rich and poor, etc. Public institutions have not transformed at the same pace as society, they have been slow, often resistant. The public sees this and demands more. It demands more openness, greater access to information and genuine involvement in decision making. Parliaments and governments must respond, the democratic models of the past have reached their use-by-date and are ripe for renewal, indeed they must be reinvigorated if they are to retain their relevancy in the future. As a nation, we can build a more connected and participatory society but, to do so, our institutions must be willing to change and our citizens better resourced and supported.

In our submission, we hope to address these challenges and to put forward ideas that will support positive change, enabling greater participation to happen. We would, of course, welcome the opportunity to discuss this directly with Committee.

Dr Andy Williamson Managing Partner

Michelle Brook Director of Strategy and Development

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- 1.1. We have lived through an age of emerging individuality, the emergence of a multi-cultural society and the effects of globalisation, and yet there are some who feel uncomfortable and who feel left behind. Citizenship must be as much about cohesion as individuality. And, generally speaking, we have been poor at educating future generations in what being a ‘citizen’ entails. Now, more than ever, we must have these conversations.
- 1.2. The UK Parliament has a long-standing record in attempting to make itself more open and accessible to citizens, with the Puttnam Commission²⁶⁵ being the catalyst for much excellent work around outreach and engagement. Both Houses have recognised the need for a robust, multi-faceted engagement strategy that can strengthen Parliament’s reputation with the public, enhance respect for and trust in it as an institution.²⁶⁶ Looking at how Parliament can open itself up in the digital age, the Speaker’s Commission on Digital Democracy made some clear and far-reaching recommendations about the modernisation of the House of Commons, which we largely support, but note that follow-through has been at best slow and often non-existent²⁶⁷. This is unfortunate because actions will fix democracy, not words alone.
- 1.3. Identity today is multi-dimensional – family, faith, friends, personal interests, politics, location (at multiple levels and across time and even generations) and popular cultures all define who we ‘feel’ we are, identify as and with, and how we think about the world. It is impossible to model a system of civic engagement as a one-size-fits-all solution, this would simply end up as a mediocre compromise, unsatisfactory to everyone. We must consider civic engagement in terms of multi-channel, multi-media and across space and time.

Effective engagement is not just a cold church hall on a rainy Thursday night, but a range of physical and online spaces, where as many people as wish to be are engaged, informed and heard in ways that suit them.

- 1.4. The good health of civic engagement is vital for many reasons. Strong and effective civic engagement means that decisions will be informed by the lived experience of citizens and their active participation. It is possible for citizens to hear other perspectives, consider the complexities of decision making, understand the value of their input, and be better informed about how outcomes are reached. It means that citizens are more likely to embrace decisions, even when the outcome is not what they originally wanted.

- 1.5. Involving people early means that more options are considered. There are many opportunities where the ‘wisdom of the crowd’ can be advantageous over the current models of limited evidence taking from selected self-interests and consultations that appear far too late in the process to affect real change. Above all, seeking a wide range of views as early as possible lowers the chance of mistakes and therefore the cost of rectifying flawed policy decisions after they have been implemented.
- 1.6. Listening matters but so does transparency. If we are to rebuild trust in our public and political institutions (and we must if they are to retain their legitimacy) then citizens must be able wield their powers for scrutiny and accountability in an effective and informed manner. As society becomes increasingly complex and technology creates both the opportunity for and expectation of effective participation, ensuring that citizens feel they can shape their society and community is vital for trust, legitimacy and for citizens to feel that they are invested in a collective project to which they are inclined to contribute.
2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?
 - 2.1. We agree that citizenship, on one level at least, is about membership and belonging but it is not binary. We can feel ourselves to be citizens of multiple places and ‘citizenship’ is about more than a passport or a piece of paper. Many of us feel many loyalties and shared identities, whether it is to a homeland beyond the UK, to the nations of the UK or the towns, regions and even estates we live in or were brought up on.
 - 2.2. Citizenship ceremonies are certainly a way to instil a sense of pride and belonging for many new arrivals but it is more important to foster a wider sense of openness, tolerance and understanding. Culture lives on and can seed a positive view of citizenship, whereas a ceremony is but a single bloom. Belonging is about the long-term building of connection, trust and shared values; it is about building strong social capital, but this is a double-edged sword and can result in the rise of hatred and discrimination against others, especially when some people feel forgotten, left out and lack any sense of a future for themselves or their families.
 - 2.3. Education from an early age is critical to ensure that our society feels a joint sense of belonging, embracing its many differences as enriching and not closing-down to fear and a mind-set of scarcity and ignorance.

We must encourage and support our future generations to think critically, understand the information that they are presented with, discuss, debate and value dialogue.

This means teaching young and old that a society that works together, even through difficult choices, is ultimately stronger and that respecting a diversity of opinion is critical to this.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1. The latter part of the 20th and early part of the 21st centuries were marked by a dramatic professionalisation of the civic sphere; NGOs grew bigger and louder²⁶⁸. As the concept of a civil society was fractured by the advance of technocracy and the mantra of individualism, this monolithic approach suited the needs of both government and the sector. With the advance of digital and social tools and the normative adoption of the internet, however, society has changed. Small groups and individuals can now coalesce, quickly start campaigns and expect to be heard by those in power. They can equally quickly dissipate and vanish only to reappear somewhere else or for other purposes. This is the age of ‘loose ties’, when informal connections and networks are built across time and shared interests.

Broadly speaking, for governments and legislators, this is more of a process issue than a legal one. However, apart from Scotland, it can largely be said that the legal position on citizen engagement predates the digital age.

3.2. Scotland has recently introduced the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Act 2015, which attempts to strengthen and enforce the rights of citizens and the responsibilities of the public sector towards them. The UK could consider following suit. Whilst this would be a good thing, it does not fundamentally change the perceptions of the value of engagement nor the attitudes to it, at least in the short-term. Though we are largely positive about it, this Act might be seen as a stick rather than a carrot by some. Whilst it may prove to be useful, it is only ever going to be part of the solution.

Good law is needed but should remain a last resort for the intransigent or avoidant. It is much more effective to encourage and support the transformation of processes and services to be more citizen-focussed, open and transparent. Education and encouragement through demonstrable benefits (for both sides) is a better way to promote wider civic engagement and more likely to embed a cultural change and build trust.

²⁶⁸ Williamson, A. (2011). Disruption and empowerment: Embedding citizens at the heart of democracy. Journal of eDemocracy and Open Government.

- 3.3. We all have a right to participate in the democratic process and institutions have a responsibility to ensure that this happens. But it must happen in a timely and effective way, not pay ‘lip service’ or consult after decisions have been made. The question of whether citizens have a duty to participate is more difficult and nuanced; we would like people to feel that they can participate but we would be reluctant to suggest that this should be anything other than by choice.

Coercion and compulsion seem poor bedfellows for an active democracy.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

- 4.1. Active political involvement goes significantly beyond voting. Laws relating to the franchise relate to only one part of enabling and encouraging political (or civic) involvement.

We believe that the biggest weakness in the current UK democratic process is the lack of engagement between elections. That said, we would support widening the franchise for voting at all public elections throughout the UK to fall in line with electoral law in Scotland.

- 4.2. It has been suggested by some commentators that changes to the electoral registration process have caused a significant loss of enrolments and that this is most prominent amongst young people. Conversely, online enrolment has been demonstrably successful at getting people to register. However, the current online enrolment ‘system’ is a rather disconnected process and we would encourage the UK government to consider implementing a seamless end-to-end voter enrolment system.

- 4.3. Accepting that the devolved nature of electoral enrolment to local government presents some challenges to this, there are already systems in place (such as National Insurance) that could be used to automatically enrol voters as they reach the age of franchise. We note that such automatic voter enrolment is commonplace in other countries.

- 4.4. We also note concerns over postal voting but see the potential for fraud in this area as low and remain disappointed that the UK has failed to embrace more up-to-date methods of voting, such as online. Whilst we acknowledge doing so is challenging, we believe that this is about understanding both the risk profile and appetite for risk in the electoral system and that those who dismiss online voting as ‘insecure’ are naive, failing to compare like-with-like or understand the wider societal context and impacts.

- 4.5. In terms of civic engagement in the electoral process, we are seeing some small respite in the long-term decline in voting. However, we are also seeing an increasing distrust in the process and the perception of the misuse of processes by politicians. Most notably there is public scepticism about media bias, campaign tactics and campaign funding. The behaviour of some politicians in the Brexit Referendum was unfortunate, to say the least. We note that whilst a candidate for a Parliamentary seat is forbidden from intentionally misleading the public to get elected, the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 contains no such restriction on the official sides in a referendum campaign. This is unacceptable and it undermines the integrity of our democracy.

Referendums are a poor fit for the UK's system of representative democracy and appear more likely to be used as political tools rather than as a legitimate plebiscitary mechanism. It is hard to argue that a binary response is an effective way to settle a highly complex and contested issue.

- 4.6. There is ongoing debate about the 'fairness' or otherwise of the First Past the Post system used for elections to the UK Parliament. We do not particularly wish to add to this debate other than to note that the current system does not appear to effectively capture the views of the entire electorate and does privilege incumbency in a way that could be considered detrimental to a more open and representative democracy. Electoral systems can present confusion for the average voter too. They can be faced with a dizzying array of electoral systems. Voters in Scotland, for example, have in the very recent past engaged in two binary referendums (one binding, the other not), a first-past-the-post election to the UK Parliament, Additional Member election to the Scottish Parliament and a Single-Transferable Vote election to their local council (the same system used in Elections to the European Parliament). We would encourage Parliament to bring forward an independent review of the electoral system, such as in the manner of the 1985 New Zealand Royal Commission on the Electoral System. We believe that this is long-overdue.
5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?
 - 5.1. There has been little meaningful and coordinated national policy debate about what constitutes 'good citizenship' in the UK today, which makes it difficult to define a role for education. This is really where we should start. We would, however, strongly argue that there is a need to rethink the way citizenship and civic education is conceived and delivered, and that any initiatives to develop citizenship education actively seek the involvement of a diverse range of people in shaping it.

- 5.2. The challenge of educating for the complexities of the modern world and preparing citizens for participation in civic life should not be understated. Opportunities to understand how decisions affect your life, how you can help shape them, and how you can get involved, in addition to navigating difficult conversations with people that hold different views, should be available at every level of existing formal / compulsory education. Additionally, there are huge opportunities in further, higher, informal, digital and lifelong education settings, although this submission will not be able to provide the focussed attention that they each deserve. These opportunities might come in the form of information about political systems and representative democracy, but we would argue that this, in isolation, is not good enough.

The absence of public consultation in the formation of the British values cited in recent educational policy documents suggests that these values were not co-produced with the public. This makes it difficult to extract deeper understanding of public interpretation of what the values mean, or how they should be ‘actively promoted’.

- 5.3. There are some pertinent questions to ask when considering what form citizenship education should take, what British values mean, and how this is determined. It’s interesting that it is only England that has formally adopted a requirement for schools to actively promote ‘British values’ (of which there is no evidence the other countries governments have agreed to, although the Prevent duty also applies in Wales).
- 5.4. Citizenship has a range of competing identities to consider, which includes the hyper-local, regional, national and global. How schools navigate these complexities in practice to instil a sense of citizenship seems to depend on decisions made by the leadership, which are steered by Government guidance, but they are also influenced by external forces.
- 5.5. Current practice raises some red flags. Firstly, the imposition of values, instead of the co-creation of values following dialogue across the nations involving a diverse range of people, does not secure the necessary buy-in and trust from citizens to make it useful, or advance conversations about participatory democracy. Secondly, values and how they are played out can be subjective, which raises issues for school leaders and teachers, but also standards inspectors. Any future guidance around ‘good citizenship’ must be clear, and cognisant of Article 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights²⁶⁹.
- 5.6. Arguably, there is mixed messaging being given to young people across the UK as the result of a global educational agenda that is driven by increased individualisation, which plays out through “the rise of the measurement culture”²⁷⁰. We believe that education is crucial to strong civic engagement and that it cannot start early enough. Citizenship must be measured by active participation and engagement, not by awards and qualifications; it is inherently a practical and applied subject. Schools should embrace strong citizenship education as a core skill that our young people grow up with. Educational institutions can also draw on democratic principles and embed these into the way they function.

Raising a generation of children to become adults who understand why citizenship matters and how to take part in a constructive, connected and active way is vital. But we must not stop there, very few of us, whatever our age, have received sufficient education to take part in civil society with confidence and effect.

- 5.7. Life-long and just-in-time learning of civic skills remains critical too - people often engage in a democratic process because a problem has arisen, at this point they need right the knowledge and skills to be effective. Without these, democracy can feel like a ‘black box’ designed to work for others and this leads to disconnection and disenfranchisement.
6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?
 - 6.1. There is no evidence to suggest that NCS has delivered any significant benefits in terms of developing a culture of active citizenship amongst young people. As the Public Accounts Committee recently noted, current evidence “does not in itself justify the level of public spending on the programme, nor demonstrate that NCS in its current form will deliver the proposed benefits to wider society.”²⁷¹
 - 6.2. When it comes to other routes for creating active citizens there is much to be said for government, particularly local government, allowing and supporting citizens to take a more active role in their communities. Whether this is creating mechanisms for more and more meaningful involvement in local decision making or passing control of assets to local communities (a process already being enabled in Scotland).
 - 6.3. The barriers to engagement tend to be lower at the more local levels of government, yet the opportunity to create some real lasting and living change is greater. Building up local civic activism is a proven track record to both greater community cohesion and individuals becoming more engaged and empowered. It is critical in this process that the public body is receptive and open to new methods of participation. It is better still if they are willing to co-create solutions with communities and methods such as Participatory Budgeting are showing promise in terms of widening involvement and taking decisions back to the community. These participatory methods, when they are done well, serve too to build trust between actors, a cornerstone of strong democracy.

We must be cautious; We all too often lament ‘the usual suspects’ and lobbyists who dominate the conversations, but creating new models, and particularly new online ones, risks alienating some members of our communities and creating new [digital] elites. This must be guarded against and new democratic processes must be designed to be open and accessible to all who wish to participate.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?
 - 7.1. If we are to improve the quality and quantity of civic engagement then we must also change the way that decision-makers in government and parliament work. Civil society will not remain engaged if the outcome is the same, the process disappears into a ‘black hole’ or the decision-making process is not clear, transparent and auditable.

We do not support the idea of replacing representative governance, but we strongly agree that our representative system can and must become more accessible and participatory if it is to remain relevant.

- 7.2. Greater involvement can also encourage greater initiative from citizens ourselves. But greater involvement is also a vital part of building a more aware citizenry who can help scrutinise decisions and exercise accountability in an effective way.
 - 7.3. There are a variety of ways through which this can be done. Examples of good practice exist but more could be done to embed their use. This is true across all levels of government in the UK, and in the work of the UK Parliament, Scottish Parliament and particularly evident in the work of the National Assembly for Wales. When it comes to building a more collaborative and engaged relationship with citizens, local government is a particularly promising place to build this. This level involves smaller constituencies, more tangible areas of work, and matters which are directly relevant to the lived experience of citizens. However, effective engagement has a cost and it is critical to ensure sufficient funding is made available. Whilst there are long term cost-savings made possible by better, higher-quality engagement, the short-term cost of doing more (or of doing something where before it was missing) is always going to be higher.

- 7.4. It is worth drawing attention to some of the range of techniques available to government and legislatures at various levels within the UK to try and work in a way that is more open to input from citizens, and supportive of collaborative relationships with them. They range from enabling the public to raise concerns or suggestions in an open way; consulting early on plans; collaborate closely with stakeholders outside government to design and implement policies and services; facilitating feedback on services or new laws; and allowing citizens to take on more responsibilities themselves such as running services or managing local assets. Allowing people to deliberate peer-to-peer can be built into many of these settings.
- 7.5. There are many ways this can be achieved in practice. Often consultation is seen in a negative light: treated as rubber-stamping decisions that have already been made. Instead of this, effort can be made to consult at an earlier stage of policy development, and in such a way that those consulted can add more valuable insights and suggestions. A more deliberative format can also be employed, using peer-to-peer engagement rather than the traditional (and too often adversarial) 'us and them' style interaction with government.
- 7.6. Allowing comments on texts, the collaborative editing and drafting of documents online is a way that the wider public can be engaged with in a more involved, collaborative way. There are also tools to encourage engagement with evidence, such as embedding evidence in questionnaires, or using simulation to encourage people to play with different variables and consider their attitudes about how these should be weighed up.
- 7.7. Such approaches are not just available to government at different levels, but can also be used in the work of legislatures. Taiwan and France are examples of where civil society initiatives have received support from elected members. In both cases, allowing citizens to use online tools to collaboratively scrutinise and develop legislation. The legislatures of Brazil and Chile have developed platforms for allowing direct public participation in their legislative drafting processes. Participatory Budgeting is a technique for involving citizens directly in the allocation of public budgets. From its origins in Brazil it is now used extensively through the world, from large scale public spending programmes in Paris to the Community Choices fund in Scotland, that aims for 1% of local authority spending to be allocated by the public.
- 7.8. Digital techniques like these are often those that need most explaining to government and legislators, but this does not mean that offline engagement, and techniques needed to do this effectively, are not important. Using well-facilitated small-group discussions, targeted at key groups, increases reach. Approaches such as appreciative inquiry can help focus discussions on what opportunities there are to collaboratively do more.

We appreciate the potential of digital tools but strongly caution against the reification of them as a panacea for democratic renewal – they are not, and only become sustainably effective where they are used as part of the transformation of the underlying processes and the culture.

- 7.9. There is also more that civil society itself can do, and which government can support. A criticism sometimes raised of parts of civil society is that there has been a movement towards civil society operating in a way that treats the public as funders or numbers for petitions dealing with already defined, and narrow, political goals (many NGOs are in themselves inherently undemocratic and opaque in the way they operate). Civil society actors can encourage public awareness of evidence and debates, to take more active roles in sharing their own insights, developing policies and in taking direct actions to address issues themselves. There are promising examples of what this kind of healthy relationship between government, civil society and the wider public should look like. For example, a Department of Health consultation on unpaid carers made available a ‘DIY consultation toolkit’ to encourage people to run offline events where they could discuss this issue and feed ideas into the consultation; and during the consultation informing the Digital Britain report, a civil society activist actively helped enable people around the country to run their own discussions about the topic and feed in their views.
- 7.10. Having a conversation about how civil society could be helped to do more is a promising area of further inquiry. Though it will not happen overnight, strengthening and then making use of civil society relationships is one part of recognising how relationships and opportunities can best be used to reach out to the public. This kind of opportunism is important for building sustainable engagement and should come at a lower cost.
8. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?
- 8.1. Alienation - from the wider society and from democratic processes - is often the product of multiple identifiable characteristics of deprivation or exclusion, of which there are a considerable number of possible combinations. These diverse identifiers make it extremely difficult to precisely identify causes and challenging to develop strategies to engage with such groups. Some broad characteristics include: lower socio-economic status; low levels of educational achievement; geographic location; disability; and ethnic and linguistic minorities. Additionally, there invisible groups who are intrinsically hard to identify (often because they do not wish to be), such as the travellers, homeless, sex workers, criminal groups and non-openly LGBTQ people. Citizens who feel that the way politics is conducted, reported on and how public institutions engage are not relevant to them present a significant challenge.

Citizens' interests are more likely to be piqued by relevant, particularly local, issues and there is a symbiotic relationship between participation in the democratic process and everyday forms of civic engagement that can be harnessed over time.

8.2. In seeking a trigger point for engagement, it is important to recognise that this is likely to need a sustained approach and that there is no 'silver bullet'. There is, however, a clear causal link between interest and action. Those who are not interested and view political or social participation as a low priority are less likely to engage or become involved in civic activity. Though this is not some marginal group at the outside of society, virtual half of the people in the UK do not engage.

8.3. Those who are not members of interested and organised groups or experts in a field, those with low levels of internet access, those without a working understanding of the policy process, young people who are outside formal education or are disengaged from their studies, the geographically remote and those who feel alienated from mainstream political culture are all groups missed by current engagement initiatives for a variety of reasons. Research carried out by the Hansard Society identified six key factors that must be addressed when building sustained and effective engagement with democratic institutions²⁷²:

1. The importance of face-to-face contact;
2. An interest in becoming more informed about politics and democracy;
3. Overcoming a strong feeling that democratic institutions are not listening;
4. The importance of the local area;
5. The importance of institutions coming out to the people; and
6. The utility of placing information about democratic institutions in accessible places where citizens live out their daily lives.

8.4. Over time, the barriers to engagement can be overcome by increasing knowledge and awareness of democratic processes, increasing the citizen's level of confidence and helping the citizen to understand how engaging with public institutions will benefit them. However, this is not a one-way-street.

²⁷² Williamson, A., M. Korris, et al. (2011). Connecting citizens to Parliament: How Parliament can engage more effectively with hard to reach groups. London, Hansard Society.

Public institutions must adapt to become more open, accessible and willing to engage in genuine dialogue, demonstrating that public input to their processes is not only valuable but actively sought. They must adopt processes that encourage as broad a range of participation as possible.

Demos – written evidence (CCE0233)

Sophie Gaston, Deputy Director and Head of International Projects, on behalf of Demos think tank

1. Demos considers that citizenship in the modern age should encompass more than the rights and responsibilities we experience in our life in Britain, but also to extend towards education on global citizenship. In particular, to better emphasise learning about the value of positive international relations and connectivity, and the benefits these offer on a range of economic, social, cultural and diplomatic levels.
2. Citizenship education is often defined within the confines of the nation state, but the school system can play a stronger role in developing civic mindsets that extend beyond parochialism, to consider our individual and collective responsibilities and rights in a globalised world. There is an opportunity to develop an understanding of both our patriotic and dutiful citizenship as it pertains to Britain, and also our common interests and shared agency to address challenges on a global level.
3. In an age of truly international flows of information, greater physical mobility and interdependence between markets and national interests, it is critical that we ensure that all young Britons are able to develop an understanding of Britain's place in the world and our role in promoting global security and prosperity.
4. This knowledge will be valuable both in terms of fostering national support for our important multilateral institutions and bilateral relationships, and also to open the opportunities that international engagement offers to a greater proportion of the next generation. It is also an important pathway to empower citizens to feel agency around their individual and shared capacity to influence global outcomes. Moreover, educating young Britons about the importance of cultural and educative exchange for Britain will help to promote greater social cohesion, tolerance and understanding of the benefits that diversity can bring in communities at home.
5. The Global Learning Programme, funded by the UK Government 2012-17, has made positive strides towards embedding a global consciousness in its participating schools, yet its programme is largely focused on a lens of development and sustainability. While these are also essential learning areas, there exists a gap in the resources available to teachers and students to build knowledge around the importance of foreign policy, strategic cooperation and economic interdependence – in addition to the important humanitarian perspectives it currently promotes.
6. Demos recommends that greater cooperation is promoted between DfE, the FCO and the British Council, to support the development of a more comprehensive agenda of compulsory 'global citizenship' education in schools. As part of this initiative, we suggest that Britain's diplomatic corps and FCO staff, as well as Members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, could become more involved in making school visits – particularly to less socio-economically prosperous communities typically less likely to be able to participate in formal and informal international activities.

7. Furthermore, while Key Stage 4 requirements for citizenship education stipulate that students should be taught local, regional and international governance and the United Kingdom's relations with the rest of Europe, the Commonwealth, the United Nations and the wider world – Demos would like to see this explicitly include teaching about the value, both strategic and symbolic, of these relationships, as is made clear in the areas of the curriculum focusing on individual citizenship.

Department of Curriculum Pedagogy and Assessment, UCL Institute of Education – written evidence (CCE0166)

Response to Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee question 8

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support?

Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

1. The values that underpin public life in Britain are formally expressed in legal conventions that successive UK governments have committed to since the Second World War. In particular the UK has a formal binding commitment in international law to adhere to the standards set out in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and abide by the rulings of its court. The ECHR is administered by the 47 member Council of Europe, not the EU.
2. The UK is also signatory to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and this instrument also provides clear definitions of the principles, standards and values that inform education and services for young people.
3. In the absence of a written constitution, the most consensual formulation of the principles and values underpinning public life in the UK, and which all living in Britain should be expected to share and support is found in these international conventions. This was made explicit in domestic law through the 1998 Human Rights Act.
4. Since 2014 the Department for Education (DfE) has promoted guidelines that oblige schools in England to promote ‘fundamental British values’ of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs. However, in the absence of a formal definition of national standards and values set out in a constitution, the minimalist DfE definition may be perceived as expressing the opinion of a government at a particular point in time.
5. Citizenship education has evolved to meet the challenges of violent and anti-democratic ideologies through a focus on the positive liberal agenda of respect for human rights and open debate. However, ‘fundamental British values’ are expected to be promoted through a whole school ethos rather than through Citizenship where human rights issues can be discussed and debated.
6. ‘Fundamental British values’ may set up an unfortunate imaginary binary opposition between Muslim values and British values. Consequently a more inclusive frame of reference for fundamental values is required. Reference to human rights and fundamental freedoms is to be preferred.

Supplementary evidence from the Department for Education – CCE0268

Contribution for Citizenship Select Committee - FBV resources

The Committee asked about press reports concerning a letter from Lord Agnew about a “fundamental British values curriculum”. The background to this is that the Department for Education is currently considering how we can further support schools in meeting the requirement to promote fundamental British values (FBVs) by embedding teaching about values in the mainstream curriculum. This will involve analysing the existing programmes of study to highlight opportunities to promote FBVs through the teaching of mainstream subjects; identifying what resources exist to enable teachers to do so; and where necessary commissioning additional resources. Any resources and guidance would be designed to reduce teacher workload and provide material that could be adapted to the needs of individual schools. The Committee should note that this work will not involve imposing any additional requirements on schools: it is about providing support to schools rather than creating a dedicated curriculum or specifying what action they should take to promote FBVs. The Department firmly believes that individual schools are best placed to decide how to meet their responsibilities to promote FBVs in the light of their specific circumstances. DfE already makes a range of resources and guidance available to school via our Educate Against Hate website and the aim of this exercise is to enhance that support.

We want to develop our approach in partnership with practitioners and stakeholders. As a first step, Lord Agnew wrote to a small number of practitioners with an interest in this area to take part in an informal discussion about scoping the work. We will engage with other interested parties, such as the subject associations, following this initial discussion.

Dr Derek Edyvane, University of Leeds – written evidence (CCE0158)

I am submitting this evidence as Associate Professor in Political Theory at the University of Leeds. My research expertise lies in theories of citizenship, civic engagement and community, and civic virtue and public ethics. I seek to address the following two questions:

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?
10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

1. We usually think about citizenship in quite formal terms, as a legal status embodying a bundle of rights, or as a collection of civic duties, or again, as a condition of membership in the polity. And we usually fill out these dimensions of citizenship by reference to an ideal picture of the ‘good citizen’. But by thinking of citizenship in this way, we are likely to miss important aspects of its character and value. Namely, we are likely to miss much of the character of what might be called ‘ordinary citizenship’ – the kind of citizenship that most of us hope to enjoy most of the time. The ‘ordinary citizen’ is part of the political vernacular of democratic societies, and yet we have only a limited grasp of its meaning. In the context of our present uncertainties and anxieties about citizenship, it is imperative that we learn to make sense of what it means to be an ordinary citizen.

2. To understand ordinary citizenship, we do well to turn away from our idealistic pictures of good citizens and to take the perspective, instead, of those at the margins of citizenship – those who have been denied, or who struggle to enjoy, its basic decencies. By reflecting on what they lack, we will be able to appreciate more fully what ordinary citizenship is and why it matters. And we will also be able to shed new light on the character of civic engagement and on its relationship to social cohesion and integration.

3. Ordinary citizenship is not, as often portrayed, just a legal status or a membership badge, but nor is it the kind of dedicated participation cherished by republican political thinkers. There is what might be termed a ‘dignity’ of ordinary citizenship that consists simply in the normal participation in the routines of everyday life, and in a secure sense of one’s good standing (not just membership) in the community.²⁷³ It is the sort of thing we take for granted, at least until we are deprived of it. The ordinary day-to-day experience of citizens is typically not about voting, writing to MPs, community organising and participating in protest marches. It is more often a matter of everyday cooperation, modest sacrifices, and small-scale resistance to low-level injustice. These are the difficulties of everyday democracy in a free and diverse society, especially in urban settings: the way we dress (e.g. debates about Islamic veiling practices), the way we talk to each other (insulting speech, proselytism), the way we moderate our public behaviour (‘manspreading’ on public transport, spitting in the street), and the way we speak out for each other in the face of unfairness (everyday racism and sexism).²⁷⁴ It is ultimately a question of how we relate to one another: with kindness or suspicion, with respect or contempt. These mundane transactions and micro-encounters are easily overlooked, but they compose the raw fabric of a democratic culture and underpin effective engagement. Those deprived of citizenship, and those who have seen their citizenship emaciated by political change, only seldom seek the glamour of deep civic involvement. It is easy to underestimate ordinary citizenship, but its dignity has been appealing enough to those who have struggled and died in its pursuit.

4. And from the perspective of ordinary citizenship, there is an intimate link between citizenship and social cohesion, because a fundamental part of the work of the ordinary citizen is the work of getting along with one's fellow citizens. And it sheds interesting light on the familiar difficulty of increasing diversity and integration concurrently. It is typically thought that diversity must work against integration, and of course in practice it often does. This has led to a range of initiatives intended to promote shared national values as a way of securing cohesion in conditions of diversity. But diversity does not always work against cohesion – often enough in the cosmopolitan spaces of major cities, like London, we see cohesion and cooperation among citizens very different from one another. And that success has relatively little to do with a deep sense of shared values.²⁷⁵ It is much more to do with the successful practice of everyday cooperation and civility, irrespective of the divergent values upheld by the parties to the cooperation.²⁷⁶

5. There is an important implication here for the manner in which we seek to cultivate social cohesion in a diverse society. The promotion of shared values is doubtless part of any programme of community-building that is to have any chance of success, but it is not the only part and it is probably not the most important part. Far more fundamental on the ground of everyday living and ordinary citizenship is the development of the skills of everyday cooperation with people different from oneself, techniques of conflict negotiation and management, the will to find a way to live together and the recognition of society as a problem we share. The development of such skills is a key task for civic education, but also (albeit in a less immediate sense) for the designers of the public spaces that house the rituals of everyday civic life.

Ms Sue Devlin – written evidence (CCE0223)

Please note: I have only just found out about this call for evidence so, in the limited time available, I will provide free-form information rather than answering the questions provided.

1. I am writing about the ward where I live, Rusholme, in Manchester, Greater Manchester.

Rusholme has a fascinating history, having been the ‘neighbourhood of choice’ chosen by the wealthy Victorian merchants involved in the cotton industry during Manchester’s time as “Cottonopolis”. These merchants were followed by wealthy professionals – academics, medics and journalists. All of whom wanted to live close to, but not in, Manchester city centre. In recent decades, Rusholme has welcomed waves of residents from all parts of the world, most notably Asia, giving rise to the “world-famous curry mile”, and more recently from the Middle East, giving rise to what some now call “shisha mile”.

Rusholme ward straddles the Wilmslow Road, a main arterial road running south from the city centre. To the west there are tightly-packed terraced houses with small or no front gardens and a yard at the back opening into shared back alleyways. To the east the remaining Victorian villas and mansions remain, some still in their original large, landscaped gardens. These are mainly in institutional use now, in particular, as student halls of residence. Adjoining the Victorian area are streets of large Edwardian houses and large newbuild family houses.

I mention all of this because it has led to the situation where Rusholme is a very diverse community. Here’s one academic paper amongst many:
http://mlm.humanities.manchester.ac.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/12/How-is-language-choice-in-the-‘Curry-Mile’-district-of-Rusholme-Manchester-affected-by-different-domains_.pdf. In Rusholme, residents cover the full spectrum, from newly-arrived refugees fleeing war zones, to working and retired academics, medics and senior public and private sector professionals, all living in the same ward.

As a result, Rusholme probably has more “social capital” than is usual, working voluntarily to solve the social problems they see in the streets they live in and walk through, in the ward where they live.

As a result, there is a lot of activity aimed at increasing a sense of citizenship and civic engagement. I give examples in the following paragraphs.

2. “Imagine Rusholme”

A Rusholme resident introduced a group of us to the concept of “Appreciative Inquiry (AI)”, and a group of ‘active’ residents ran a pilot event, bringing international AI experts together with Rusholme residents, community group representatives and traders, Rusholme councillors, Rusholme council officers, Rusholme partners – police, fire and rescue services, health service, etc, about 30 people in all. The pilot event asked the question what did we like best about Rusholme, and how could we bring about more of what we like. The event was a great success and the room was ‘buzzing’ with energy and goodwill.

As a result, we ran two “summits” in Rusholme, each attended by around 70 people, and compiled two story books about the events. These are available via the following links:

- Imagine Rusholme! Summit 1 Storybook: Imagine Rusholme! Summit 1 Story Book G
- Imagine Rusholme! Summit 2 Storybook: Imagine Rusholme! Summit 2 Story Book G

Using a technique called ‘open space’, those present at the summits identified ten ‘discussions’ that everyone present wanted to take forward. These were:

1. Community Garden on Rusholme Grove + Joining Up Green Spaces, Hedgerows & Trees
2. Creative Rusholme
3. Litter Free Rusholme + Cleaner/Greener
4. On Our Bikes in Rusholme
5. Reducing Burglary
6. Respect for Rusholme + How to Work Positively with the Council for the Good of Rusholme
7. Rusholme & Wider World Issues
8. Rusholme Ward & District Centre Plans + Parking
9. Student Integration & Involvement
10. Sustainability

Some of the projects have progressed and continue today, largely based on the time available to each discussion’s team.

3. “Upping It”

A Rusholme resident living in the “Terrace Square” to the west of the Wilmslow Road got fed up of the amount of food waste going into the communal containers for general waste. The food waste was attracting squirrels who then tore the black bin bags and pulled the general waste all over the place, and, where the food waste either fell out of the container or was left on the floor close to the container, was attracting rats. She decided to do something about it. The result was “Upping It”.

“Upping It” started out as a project to stop residents putting food waste into the general waste containers and to encourage them to put it into the food waste containers. That way it would generate income for Manchester City Council (MCC), rather than incur a cost for its disposal as general waste.

What was unique about “Upping It” was that the Rusholme resident went door to door, introducing herself as a local resident. She explained the problem of food waste in and around the general waste containers and implored the resident to avoid food waste if they could, and if they couldn’t avoid food waste “never, ever, ever put it in the general waste container; only ever put it in the food waste container” (I can hear her saying it now!).

At the same time, she realised that many households weren’t fully up to speed on what type of waste goes into which bin – Manchester City Council has a quite complicated four-bin system: black = general waste; brown = glass bottles and jars, plastic bottles, etc; blue = paper, cardboard, drink cartons, etc; green = food and garden waste. So, the conversations with each household expanded to cover this information too.

As she went door to door, she came across all sorts of different cultures, and all sort of different languages were being spoken, but, also, she spoke to people who didn’t know their neighbours and had never spoken to other residents in their same street.

Having started to tackle the food waste problem, the Rusholme resident moved on the next problem – the overgrowth, litter and fly-tipping in the back alleyways shared by these terraced properties. The resident in question had already “greened” her own back alley by clearing the weeds, uncovering the lovely cobbles, building raised beds, planting flowers and food and creating a decked area for neighbours to come and go socially.

Joining up with a small team that had already started a similar project in the neighbouring ward of Moss Side – Avenues and Alleyways – and seeking to appoint a ‘street rep’ to lead on activities for each street, the team set about systematically tackling each back alleyway in the “Terrace Square”. In 2013, they were awarded Manchester City Council funding to expand their work:

http://www.manchester.gov.uk/directory_record/125687/upping_it_%E2%80%93_the_terrace_square. In November 2014, the “Upping It” team won the ‘champion of champions’ award at Manchester City Council’s annual “Be Proud” awards: <http://www.manchestereveningnews.co.uk/news/greater-manchester-news/pride-manchester-named-glitzy-town-8198465>.

This project has brought about an immense improvement, but key to it was going door-to-door and seeking to identify a “street rep” for each street. “Upping It” succeeded in upping the amount of food waste going into the correct bin and upping the cleanliness and greenery in the shared back alleyways, but also in “upping” community relationships and cohesiveness.

The Rusholme resident who started it all has since learnt Urdu and is now learning Arabic so she can really connect with members of her community. In her own street, residents organise welcome parties for new residents, celebrations for new babies, and goodbye parties for those moving on, all of which celebrate the culture of the arrivals, the babies, and those leaving.

4. Rusholme & Fallowfield Civic Society

This civic society, a constituted community group, was established in 1969 and is therefore coming up to its 50th anniversary.

As is to be expected, its role has evolved over time, however, the objects set out in the original constitution still stand:

- a) To stimulate public interest in and care for the beauty, history and character of Rusholme and Fallowfield and their surroundings.
- b) To encourage the preservation, development and improvement of the features which go to make pleasing conditions in which to live and work.
- c) To encourage high standards of architecture and town planning in the area.
- d) To pursue these ends by means of meetings, exhibitions, lectures, publications, other forms of instruction, study and publicity, and promotion of schemes of a charitable nature.

as does its original area of interest – Rusholme and Fallowfield wards, and surrounding areas.

A key aspect of the society's committee's work is scrutiny of the performance of the Rusholme (and Fallowfield) ward councillors on behalf of the society's members, in the context of the objects set out above.

To do this, the committee meets monthly with an agenda that includes the following items:

- Review of current Planning & Licensing applications
- Review of current Manchester City Council and other consultations
- Review of current Council Policy scrutiny.

This is 'grunt work' and quite a heavy workload for the society's committee of nine, but we do it because we have come across situations where Rusholme councillors either aren't aware of, eg, the implications of particular planning or licensing applications, or they are aware of the applications but aren't aware of the implications of the applications. Likewise, consultations and policy.

I would argue that they should be, but the fact is, they aren't. Many Rusholme residents consider that this is because 95 of 96 Manchester City councillors are Labour, and that Labour councillors don't have to work too hard to retain their seats. I acknowledge that these might be controversial statements, but factual nevertheless.

For example, the last time Rusholme councillors met with Rusholme residents to discuss ward issues was on 21st September 2016. Please note that the Rusholme councillors meet with the Rusholme Labour Group every month to give account of themselves, and hopefully receive scrutiny of their performance in the role, but this is a closed meeting and the content of the meetings aren't made public.

I'd be interested to know what the House of Lords thinks of this in terms of its likely impact on what Rusholme residents think about citizenship and civic engagement in our ward.

5. “Portrait of a Street”

Two members of a Residents' Association in Rusholme living in a street of Edwardian houses that celebrated its 100th anniversary in 2011, came to realise how unusually multicultural their street was.

One resident, a photographer, and another, a creative writer, decided to visit each property and, with the permission of the occupants, tell the story of how they came to be living in the street and take a photograph of them as a family unit in front of their property.

Their stories have been anonymised and shared, and the subsequent book aimed at 8 – 12 year olds serves to demonstrate the power of:

- Getting to know and learning about the residents in the street where you live.
- How fascinating, scary and sad the stories can be.
- How such an exercise has the effect of pulling everyone in the street together and generating a mutual respect for differences and similarities.

6. Other

If I had the time I could tell more stories about Rusholme – we have a friends of a park group, a forest school activity: “long term programmes within a natural space, led by a qualified practitioner [that] focus on developing personal, social and emotional life skills through learner-led, nature-based learning”: <http://forestschoools.com/what-happens-at-a-forest-school/>; three community centres providing childcare, youth services, age friendly services; a community forum focused on alleviating isolation amongst the older people in the ward, tackling dementia and supporting carers, so much to talk about...

7. The Role of Councillors

The Manchester City Council's Constitution describes the role of councillors as follows:

Roles and functions of all councillors. Key roles. All councillors will:

- i. collectively be the ultimate policy-makers and carry out a number of strategic and corporate management functions;

- ii. bring views of their communities into the Council's decision-making process;
- iii. effectively represent the interests of their ward and of individual constituents;
- iv. deal with individual casework and act as an advocate for constituents in resolving particular concerns or grievances;
- v. respond to constituents' enquiries and representations, fairly and impartially;
- vi. participate in the governance and management of the Council;
- vii. be available to represent the Council on other bodies; and
- viii. maintain the highest standards of conduct and ethics.

I wonder who is supposed to solve the problems in each ward. Rusholme has many problems. Is it councillors? Is the above description enough?

8. Learning from Private Sector Companies

Private Sector companies have to solve problems, and they have to ensure “citizenship”, ie, full employee participation; and “civic engagement”, ie, peak employee performance in their role. How do they do that?

- Careful recruitment/selection processes – not applicable in this context.
- Induction – how do we welcome new residents to their ward? Do we enthuse them with the ‘ward’s USPs’ – its unique selling points? Why they should be proud, excited and enthused to be living there? Is there a booklet, in their preferred language, enthusing them about where they live?
- Training – what do they need to know to be a successful citizen in their ward? Who are their councillors? What can their councillors do for them? Is there a residents’ association/civic society/neighbourhood watch scheme for them to join in their area?
- Facilities – what is available to them? Community centres, community groups, parks, etc.
- Mentor – who can help them succeed – their councillors?

9. Transforming the Role of the Councillor

What do councillors do at the moment? Reactive, bureaucratic, party-partisan work?

What should they be doing?

Proactive, personalised, door-to-door work to ensure every resident, trader and visitor to their ward is succeeding and enjoying wellbeing?

David Dixon – written evidence (CCE0015)

Clearly people will engage better if they understand the system, and how change can be achieved under it. A compulsory GCSE paper on levels of government and electoral systems, maybe covering such things as the judicial system and freedom of information as well, would be useful.

This would be important education prior to exercising the right to vote, if it remains from age 18: to lower this would result in people being entitled to vote before having learned what it is all about. Looking back, I recognise that I would not have been able at a younger age to make an informed decision on how to vote. I only had a vote when 21, and recall no sense of deprivation at not being able to vote earlier; but with the age of majority now 18, it is now the appropriate age from which to be able to vote.

Conversely, an upper age limit for voting should be considered: it caused some resentment among the young that the old – to whom it would make less difference - outvoted the majority of younger people who were of the view of that the UK should stay in the EU. In my view this resentment was justified, and one cause of distrust of politics. Perhaps 80 would be the right threshold: I say this despite being among the oldies!

Far more important if one wants greater involvement in the political process is abolition of “first past the post”. It has long been recognised that this gives the power to change governments only to those living in a minority of constituencies; if (say) 120, 80% of the population are effectively disenfranchised in parliamentary elections. Where I live, one party regularly has a large majority (18,000 in 2017); my vote had no influence on the outcome. It is hardly surprising that many people don't bother to vote.

I am aware of the wide choice of alternative voting systems, and that all have defects (albeit lesser ones than the present system); the method used for the Scottish parliament seems to reflect well the opinions of their voters as a whole, and I know of little criticism of it. It has the vital merit that every vote counts.

Such a system would be suitable for local government elections too, thus representing more closely the interests of local people. In my county in 2017, the leading party gained less than 54% of the votes, yet over 82% of the seats. The pattern in the District Council elections in 2015 was similar. This mismatch between voters' preferences and the resulting governance leads to disaffection with the political process.

A separate issue leading to disenchantment is the financing of local Councils. The substantial contribution of central government to these Councils is being reduced, but the Councils are severely restricted in the extent to which they can replace this lost income from local taxation. This inevitably reduces the effectiveness of local government, and thus the interest taken in it by local residents.

In summary, people need to know that their votes count. Under our present electoral system in England (and the rest of the UK for parliamentary elections), in most cases they don't. It is hardly surprising that this leads to lack of interest in the process, or frustration or worse. As a result we have too many powerless citizens. If we want more interest taken in good citizenship, reform of the electoral system for Westminster and English local authorities is vital.

Sunny Dhadley, Wolverhampton SUIT (Service User Involvement Team) – written evidence (CCE0008)

Sunny Dhadley, Wolverhampton SUIT (Service User Involvement Team) – written evidence (CCE0008)

More than ever, it is vitally important in the 21st Century that the views, opinions and thoughts of civic society are considered and listened to. Citizenship and civic engagement should take place in various forms and guises (especially with digital advances). Each citizen has a right to feel involved and appreciated within Britain, but due to varying reasons there is a feeling of discord and disconnection amongst society and I feel that it is the role of Government to address this situation directly. For example, with the cultural diversity that exists amongst our communities there is a need to increase the levels of diversity within public sector services, in order to mirror the cultural diversity within society as this would clearly demonstrate the commitment towards embracing diversity.

Foreign nationals will bring with them cultural ideologies and practices that may seem disconnected from the rest of society, but surely within modern Britain we can find ways for all citizens to feel that they are respected and their views are welcome in achieving a more harmonious society.

Now more than ever, we need to embrace online technology in order to allow communities to feed in to decision making processes, whilst also offering tangible opportunities for all pockets of society to have their voices heard (by utilising community connections).

I feel that certain reassurances are required and messages should be consistently disseminated. Recent challenges, such as Brexit, I believe were built on a lack of understanding and awareness of things such as immigration. This led to the voting community feeling almost obliged to vote to leave the European Union, without fully appreciating the gruelling processes that our Government are going through and will continue to do so in the foreseeable future. By contextualising things such as immigration and equipping the society with key information and knowledge on Global issues, such as displacement from conflict, then this will encourage active participation.

Education is absolutely crucial in creating social change measures, but there is inequality that impacts upon the ability of education to create the desired changes.

Strong, credible leadership is required within all aspects of public service and life as this instils confidence within society.

I manage a charity and have been classed as a Social Leader. Part of my role within public life consists of providing care, support and opportunities for those that are vulnerable within society (addiction, homelessness, mental health, illiteracy, unemployed etc.) and having suffered from addiction in the past, I am able to empathise in such a way as to connect, reframe and shape the lives of many.

Sunny Dhadley, Wolverhampton SUIT (Service User Involvement Team) – written evidence (CCE0008)

Another aspect of my role is to feed in the views and experiences of those suffering from addiction, in to arenas to bring about change. Quite often, I feed in to systems that work directly in the subject area and concentrate efforts in that work particular stream, rather than working systematically across a range of areas public life (rather than concentrating efforts solely in one area).

Interestingly, the service that I manage (www.suiteam.com) attracts people from all parts of society (LGBT, migrants, various ethnicities, professionals, those with disabilities, family members and carers etc.) as they feel that their views, opinions and issues will be listened to in a non-judgemental way and practical solutions offered.

We need to get back to the understanding that we are human first and this is a connection that should be honoured and appreciated. Of course there will be differing points of view, but we should make a concerted effort to re-harmonise our existence and face challenges together. This must be done in conjunction with civic society.

The Duke of Edinburgh's Award – written evidence (CCE0264)

The request:

The Committee are particularly interested on any information you could provide on: 1. how representative people who take part in The Duke of Edinburgh's Award are in comparison to the general public (the percentages from ethnic minority backgrounds, and the percentage who are entitled to free school meal would be useful) as well as information on 2. the costs per placement.

After the evidence session the Committee were interested in what other organisations were like in terms of value for money and reaching the hardest to reach. The Duke of Edinburgh's Award was raised by members as a possible comparator and it would be good to hear alongside your general information to what extent a comparison between your organisation's programme and the one run by the NCS trust would be a fair comparison.

Background:

The Duke of Edinburgh's Award charity (see Annual Report and Accounts attached) is engaging record numbers of young people in activities that develop them as individuals and engages them in positive action in their local communities and wider society, whilst recognising the very high level of commitment and personal progress required by awarding the young achievers with, what has become, the worlds leading achievement award for young people.

During the 2016-17 year a record 271,439 young people started their DofE programme.

A DofE programme will often take more than a year to complete so, at any time, there are around 420,000 young people doing their DofE activities across the UK.

A record 133,369 young people achieved their Duke of Edinburgh's Award in the year.

The DofE programme is run through 10,800 centres that are overseen by 2,601 DofE Licenced Organisations.

The DofE does not attempt to calculate the "social return" on the investment in its activities. We have not yet seen a reliable or consistent means of calculating "social return" that would provide useful comparable data for your committee or to steer our development. We do however attempt to place a value on the volunteering commitment of young people doing their DofE. Our 2016/17 cohort gave over 2.8 million volunteering hours to their communities. (this counts only those completing their volunteering section activity in the year – many more started or were continuing their volunteering section) If the thousands of charities and organisations they supported had employed a young person at just £4.05 per hour to do what they have done for them, this is over £ 11.4m of benefit to society. We have absolute confidence in our numbers as they involve neither subjective reports nor assumptions. They are based on hard data input by the young people themselves and signed off as being accurate by their Leaders.

This is of course just part of the “social return” on investment in the DofE. The benefits of engaged, motivated, employable, fitter, active citizens, resulting from their DofE participation is incalculable but palpable when you meet a young person from whatever background that has achieved a Duke of Edinburgh's Award. We can only look on in amazement at organisations that feel able to extrapolate and predict in £1s the savings to the Health Service, Benefit funding and long term civic engagement their activity purports to reap. Who would believe it!?

We see the value of DofE to society in every conversation we have with an employer that tells us they look for and value DofE on applications. Every Award participant that recounts the life changing experiences they have had and how DofE was the focus for their interview for a job, an apprenticeship or university place. And, every parent that recounts how the DofE brought their youngster out of their shell, gave them confidence and opened up new horizons.

1. How representative are people who take part in the Duke of Edinburgh Award in comparison to the general public (the percentages from ethnic minority backgrounds, and the percentage who are entitled to free school meal would be useful)

The DofE is probably unique as a youth charity that is active in all parts of the UK, being welcomed, encouraged and valued by governments, local authorities, education, community leaders, employers and parents everywhere. The DofE network is probably the UK's most comprehensive network of youth development related organisations. DofE programme delivery relies on around 40,000 volunteer leaders.

The DofE attracts and engages young people of all backgrounds and abilities. Participants broadly reflect the communities from which they are drawn.

DofE is delivered predominantly through schools; 60% from state secondary schools and academies, whilst just 18% are from independent schools. A further 10% participate through a uniformed youth group such as Scouts, Guides, ATC, ACF, Jewish Lads and Girls Brigade etc. The balancing 12% are made up of young people in the secure estate (YOIs, prisons), higher education, sixth form colleges and further education, special schools, community youth groups and trainees in businesses (a growing number of apprenticeship programmes utilise the DofE).

The DofE involves young people of all backgrounds and abilities. We believe passionately that the experience of doing their DofE programme enlightens and broadens the vision and prospects of each young participant. Starting from where they “are” and engaging them in a journey of self discovery unique to the individual. We do not require them to “break records” only to “beat their personal best” and demonstrate tenacity and commitment over a sustained period of activity in each of the sections of the Award programme. So, DofE is not easy but any young person can do it. Whether you are physically or mentally disabled, living in the squeezed middle, attending a top fee paying school, incarcerated in a young offenders institution or your average kid in your average school in your average town or village, the DofE can make a very positive difference to your life.

Ethnicity is not a barrier to participation in The Duke of Edinburgh’s Award. The table below presents the ethnic profile of the DofE participants who chose to declare their ethnicity. As you will see, we broadly reflect the population.

2011 Census England & Wales	DofE UK 2016-17
86% white	68.3 %
2.2% mixed	3.8 %
7.5% Asian/Asian British	6.3 %
3.3% Black / Black British	2 %
1% Other	1.7 %
Prefer not to say	1.63 %
Did not respond	16.2 %

Disadvantage:

We do not have access to statistics on Free School Meals for our participants but we do apply a “disadvantaged” measure to both our objectives and as a measure of our performance. We aim for 20% of our participants to have home post codes in the lower 30% of the IMD and/or be in the secure estate and/or are in special education and/ or are registered disabled.

A record such 49,453 “disadvantaged” young people started on their DofE programme in the last year.

2. Information on the costs per placement

The Duke of Edinburgh’s Award is a registered charity and Royal Charter Company. The annual operational expenditure of the charity was £10.5m in the 2016-17 financial year.

The Duke of Edinburgh's Award – written evidence (CCE0264)

The average cost to the charity of each individual starting on their Award is approx. £38

The fee charged to the young participants is: Bronze level - £20 Silver Level - £20
 Gold Level - £27

The balance of funds is raised (hard earned) by the charity through the usual range of charitable fundraising activity, commercial partnerships, licence fees and investments. Whilst there is no central government support sought or received by DofE, there are varying levels of devolved government funding support in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales.

Each participant is however required to fund their own activity. Whilst this is usually supported by their school/ centre, this is the greater cost of the programme for a participant. The type of activity a participant undertakes will often be dictated by the cost or the ability of their school/group to provide it.

3. to what extent a comparison between your organisation's programme and the one run by the NCS trust would be a fair comparison.

It is extremely difficult to compare NCS with other organisations and activities. Particularly when some (such as Scouts, Guides, DofE and others) are based on a dependency on the ultimate demonstration of active citizenship – an adult's free choice to use their time and commitment to volunteer, and then NCS is government funded to pay for all adult engagement.

We have studiously avoided superficial comparison with NCS. How would the committee like to compare organisations? Cost, outcomes, numbers of participants? From headline costs, we are many times cheaper and reach many more young people. A DofE programme requires young people to engage in a sustained commitment to their activities. NCS is a relatively brief experience. A DofE Award carries value and credibility. I don't think participation in NCS is viewed in the same way. But that's comparing chalk and cheese. Whilst the Residential element of the NCS programme could gain you the Residential section of a DofE Gold Award, the extent of volunteering would not achieve even a DofE Bronze volunteering section. But perhaps government designed NCS to achieve different outcomes to DofE? So, I'm not at all sure comparison is helpful. Government needs to be clear about the outcome it is looking for from its £1.2Billion investment and be sure that the NCS programme is the best way to deliver it.

The committee will not be surprised to hear that we believe DofE delivers better outcomes for young people and communities through the tried, tested and valued DofE programme and the currency of a recognised and valued Award. We are achieving high levels of youth engagement and have greater demand than we can serve. We have no need to spend on advertising to attract participants.

The NCS programme does not appear to be as cost effective as the Scouts or Guides or Jewish Lads and Girls Brigade or Outward Bound or DofE or many others. None of them requires so much public money to convince young people to do their programme or activity. Would they deliver a better outcome for society with that same funding? I'm certain they would.

Durham University Model Westminster Society – written evidence (CCE0050)

Durham University Model Westminster Society is an award-winning, new student group at Durham Students' Union. Model Westminster Society aims to empower students to have a meaningful voice in public and social policy making through a series of inclusive debates, workshops and addresses on issues pertaining to British local and national politics. The Society also aims to contribute towards the development of civil society by encouraging students to volunteer and fundraise.

Model Westminster Society was officially ratified by Durham Students' Union on 9th May 2017, making it one of the newest student groups at Durham Students' Union. The Society is led by a driven team of student leaders who are passionate about political education and social policy. Model Westminster Society is unique in the sense that it aims to empower student voice in social policy making through its outreach programme with the local community, as well as its research outlet which publishes a series of 'briefing notes' to governmental and community agencies, departments and organisations.

Our Submission to the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement:

Methodology:

We have developed a two-stage research approach for our submission to the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. Firstly, our online survey, the findings of which are included in this report, was launched on social media and promoted over several weeks with Durham student groups. Each of Model Westminster Society's student leaders were responsible for sharing a link to the online survey within their networks. We were very pleased that 100 respondents completed our survey.

The second stage of our research, which we will deliver in Michaelmas term in time for the later deadline, is to hold a series of focus groups that aim to draw out a more qualitative feel of how students understand citizenship in the 21st century. The Chair of Model

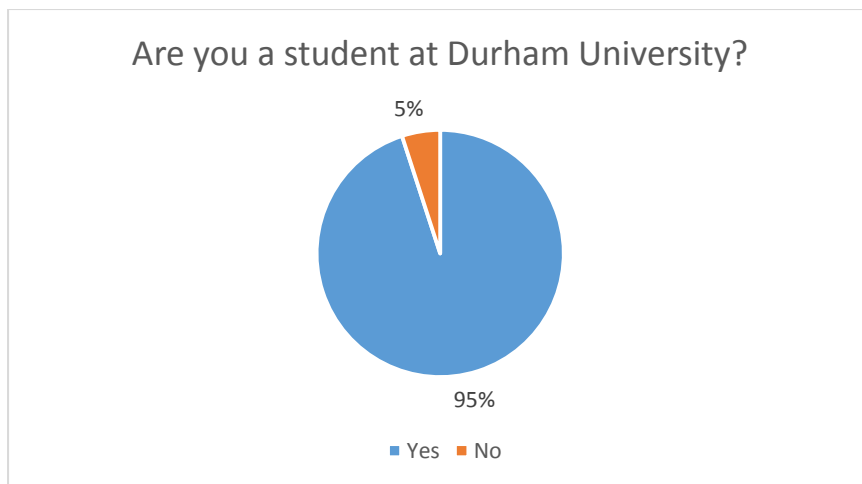

Westminster Society, Kyle Kirkpatrick, will lead these focus groups, and we hope to reach out to more members of minority groups.

Executive Summary:

- A. 100 individuals participated in our survey. 95% of these were students at Durham University. 40% reported they were in the third year of undergraduate studies. 71% reported they were aged 19 – 21 years old. 54% identified as female.
- B. 84% of respondents defined citizenship as voting in elections; 83% defined it as making a difference in the community. Only 14% identified citizenship as taking part in online surveys and polls.
- C. 55% of respondents felt that citizenship and civic engagement were somewhat important today. Only 1% of respondents felt that citizenship was not important at all.
- D. 60% of respondents felt that citizenship in the 21st century is different than in the 20th century. The most popular reason was globalisation and successive migrant crises.
- E. 55% of respondents felt some forms of citizenship are bound to the boundaries of one's own country and other forms are not. Only 3% felt that citizenship was confined to national boundaries.
- F. 40% of respondents felt the legal voting age should not be lowered to 16. Many cited that 16-year olds are not knowledgeable enough; lack experience; and/or are easily influenced by others.
- G. 82% of respondents felt that students should have a meaningful say on social policy issues.
- H. Only 6% of respondents felt that the current education system enables young people to be active citizens. Many respondents felt that political education should be made more impartial, widely available/accessible, and even compulsory.
- I. 75% of respondents claimed that knowing how to get involved was the top barrier to active citizenship.
- J. 72% of respondents felt that diversity and integration can be increased together.
- K. 77% of respondents felt that social media both enhances and challenges democracy.

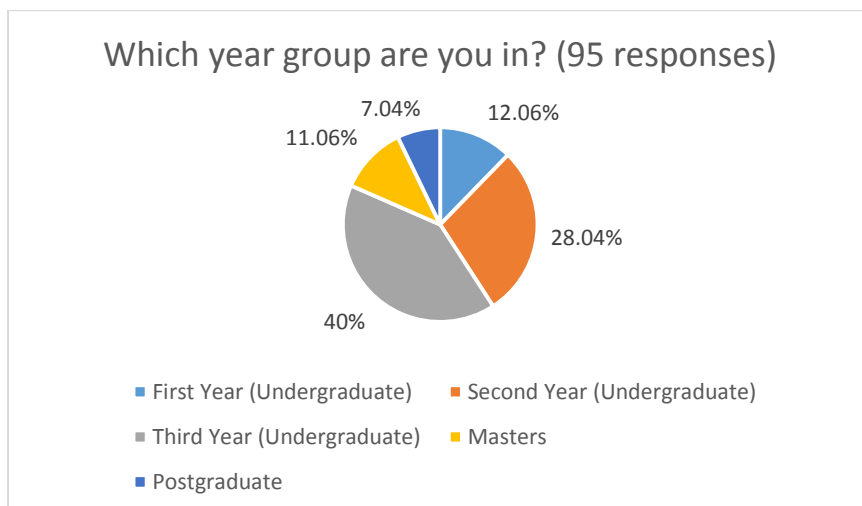

Section One: Demographic Profile:

Question 1:

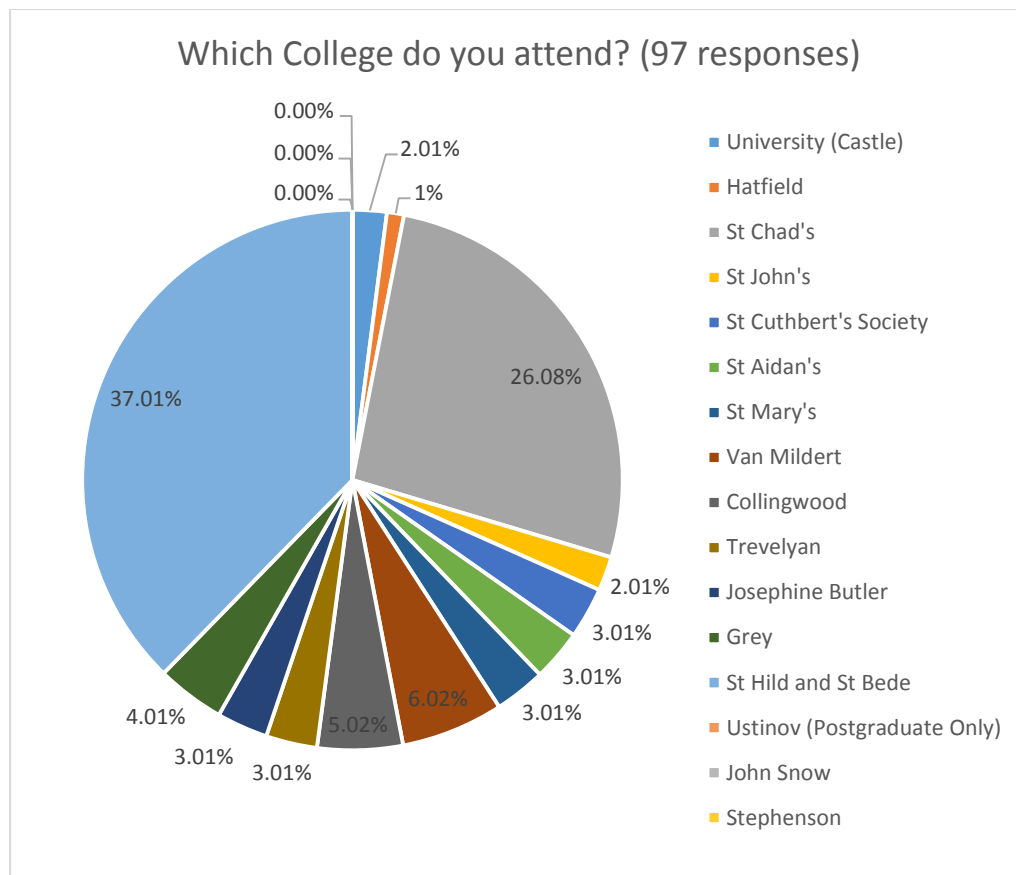

100 individuals participated in our survey. 95% of our respondents reported that they were students at Durham University (our target audience)

Question 2:

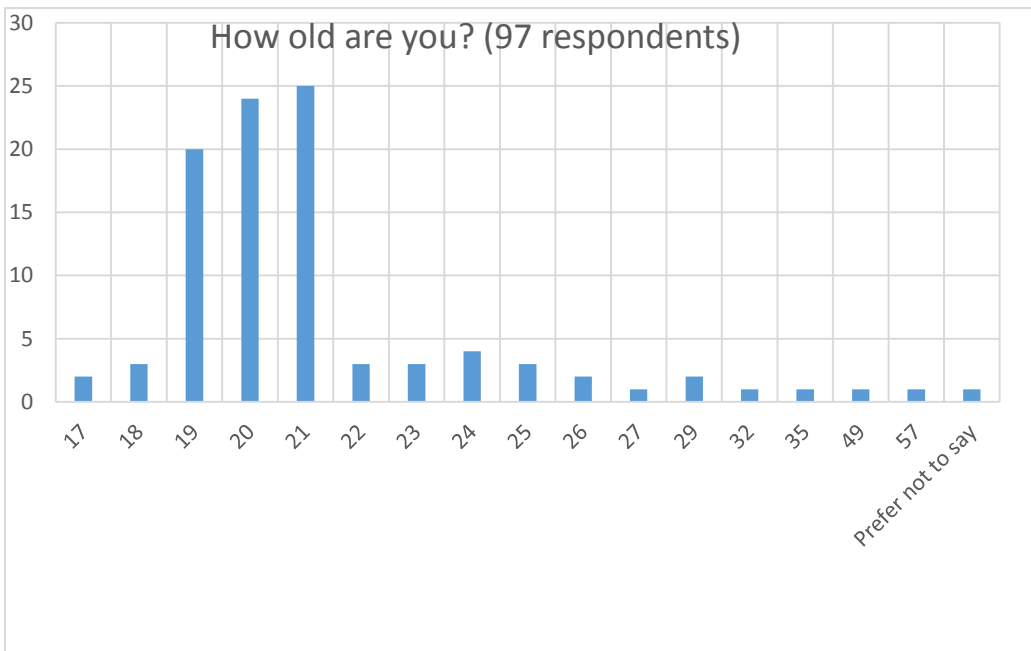

The majority (40%) of respondents who attend Durham University reported that they were in their third year of undergraduate studies.

Question 3:

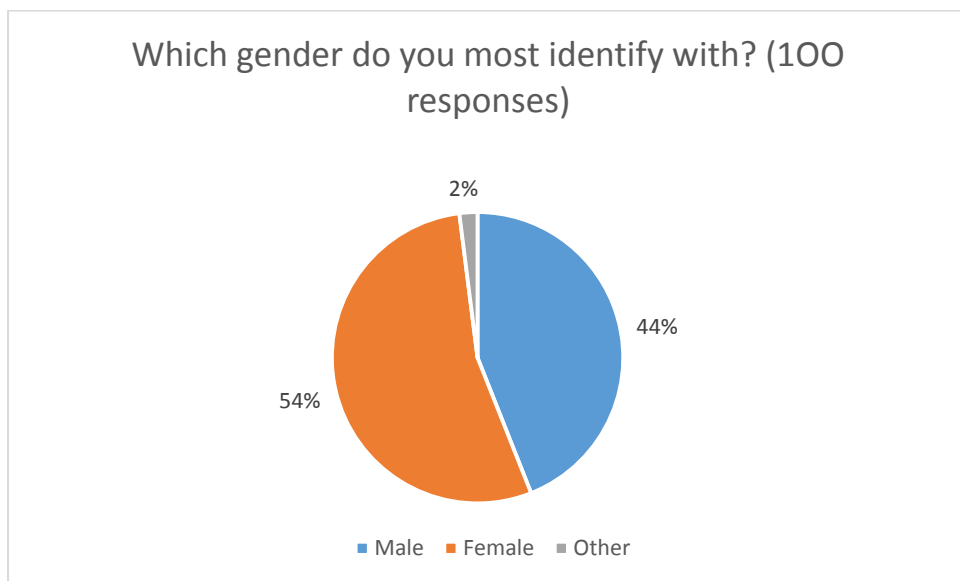

Most respondents were a member of the College of St Hild and St Bede (37%), with the second largest proportion from St Chad's College (26.08%)

Question 4:

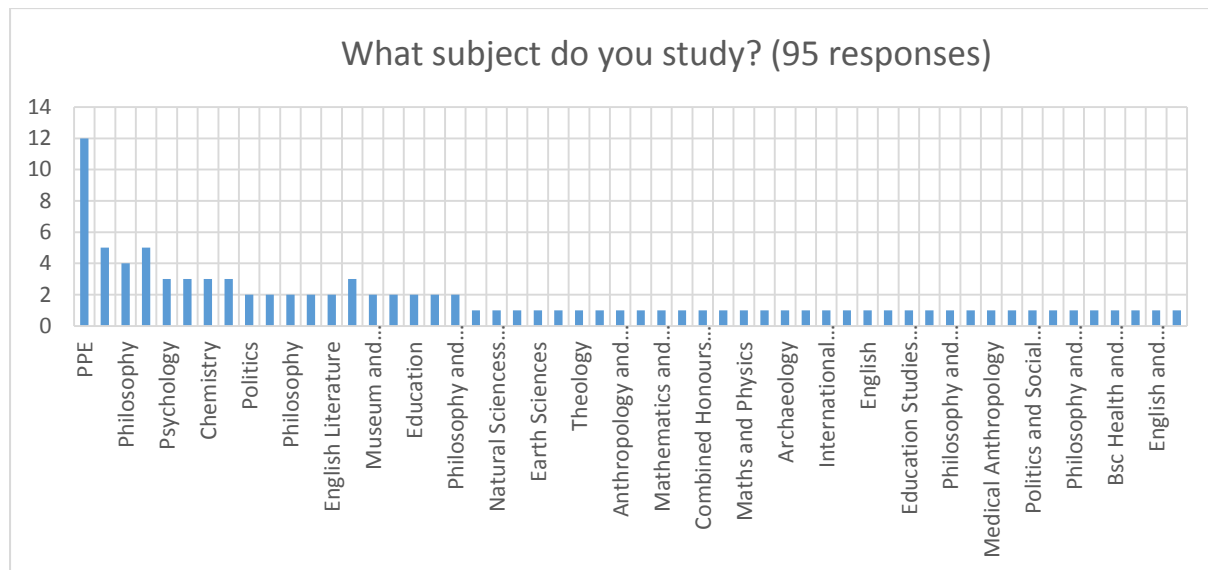

Almost ¼ of our respondents reported that they were 21 years old. Most respondents (71%) reported that they were aged 19 – 21 years old. 17 respondents reported that they were 24 years old or more. This shows that it is likely some mature students took part in our survey. 1 respondent preferred not to disclose their age.

Question 5:

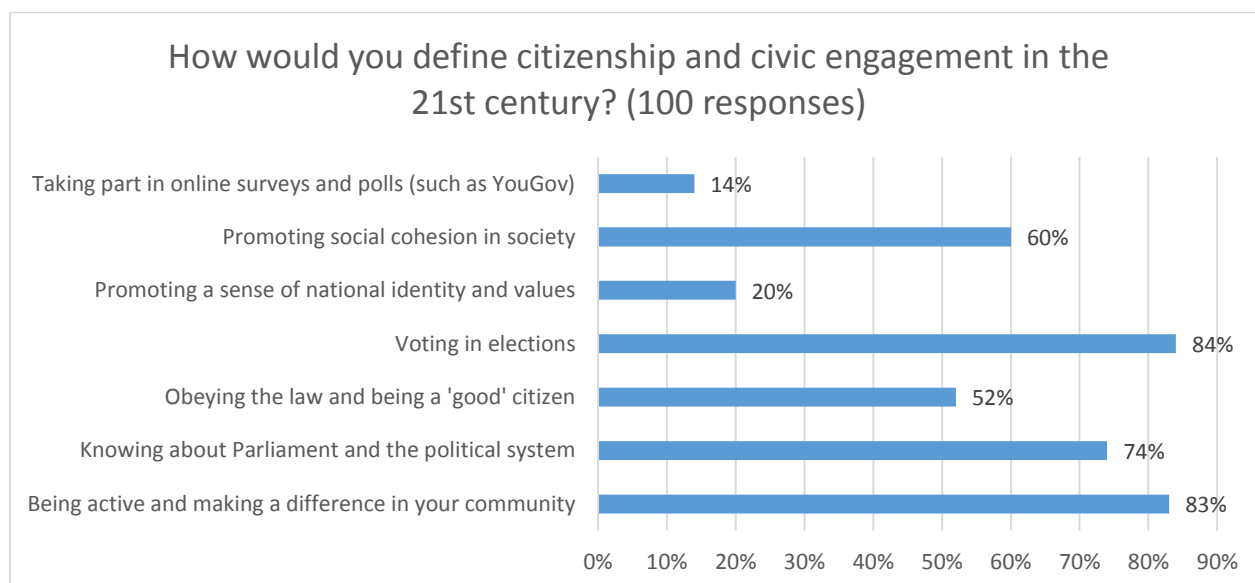

Most respondents (54%) reported that they identified as being female. The second largest proportion (44%) reported that they identified as being male. 2% identified as other when asked about their gender.

Question 6:

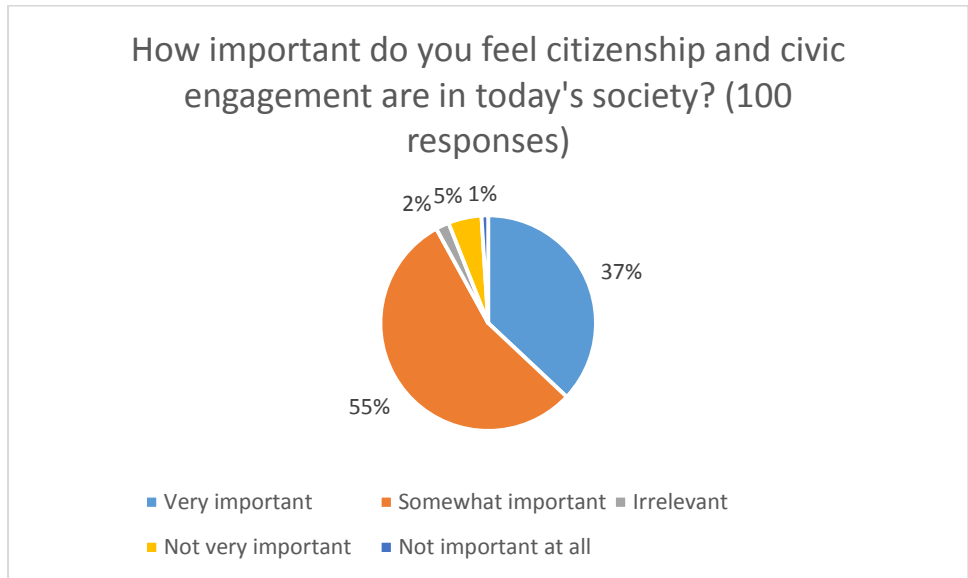

Section Two: Citizenship and Civic Engagement

Question 7:

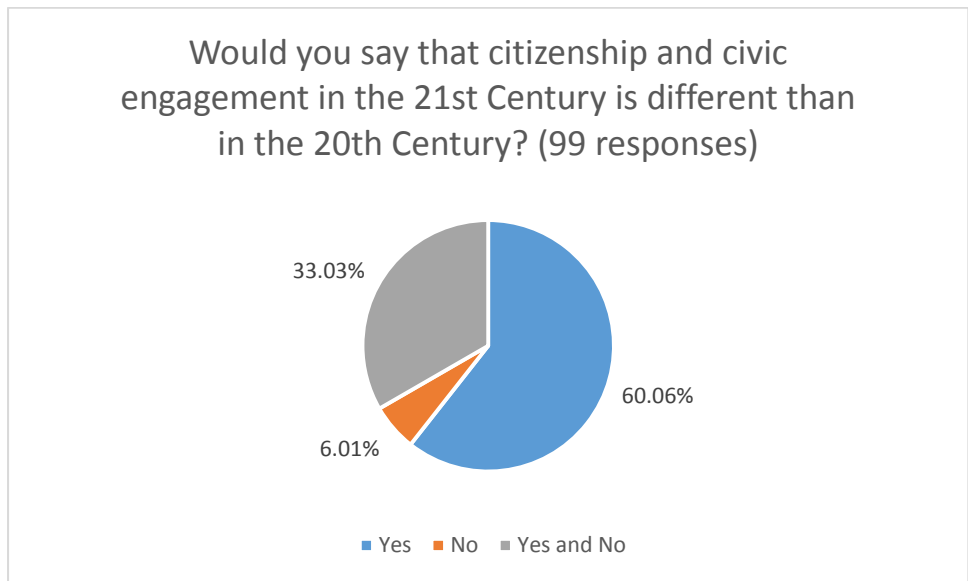

Most respondents (84%) defined citizenship as voting in elections. 20% related citizenship with national identity. Only 14% chose online activism.

Question 8:

The majority (55%) of respondents felt that citizenship and civic engagement were somewhat important. Only 1% of respondents felt that citizenship was not important at all, and 2 respondents felt that citizenship was irrelevant.

Question 9:

Most respondents (60.06%) felt that citizenship in the 21st century is different than in the 20th century. Only 6.01% felt that citizenship in the 21st century was not different than in the 20th century. The second largest proportion (33.03) thought that citizenship in the 21st century had both similarities and differences within citizenship in the 20th century.

Question 10: In what ways would you say that citizenship in the 21st century is different than in the 20th century? (68 responses)

- A. Almost half of respondents (33/68) claimed that globalisation has led to a new level of international connectivity where people feel ties to multiple countries and patriotism has declined within popular discourse. One respondent claimed that “the modern world is a global village now”, with others citing the rise of global cities such as London as shaping – and in some cases, blurring – modern identities.

- B. 25 respondents claimed that social media has reframed citizenship between the two centuries. Many respondents drew on how this dualism between globalisation and technological connectivity has structured and sustained a new form of global citizenship, which is shaped and made aware by non-direct social media networking sites.
- C. 9 respondents specifically referred to individualism, with the majority of these illustrating how social divisions have become more “volatile” and subjective, especially when it comes to voting patterns. One respondent argued that citizenship has become “less nationalistic but also more individualistic”, with political activity becoming an individual rather than group undertaking.
- D. 9 respondents referred to how social values have changed between the two centuries. For example, some claimed that the enfranchisement of women in 1928 had made the word ‘citizen’ become a “sexless” term. Others argued more generally that shifts in social values had made citizenship activities more available to a broader category of individuals – not just the privileged.

Question 11:

Most respondents (55%) felt that while some forms of citizenship were confined to national boundaries, others were not. Only 3% of respondents felt that citizenship was confined to the boundaries of one’s own country, its law and liberties.

Question 12:

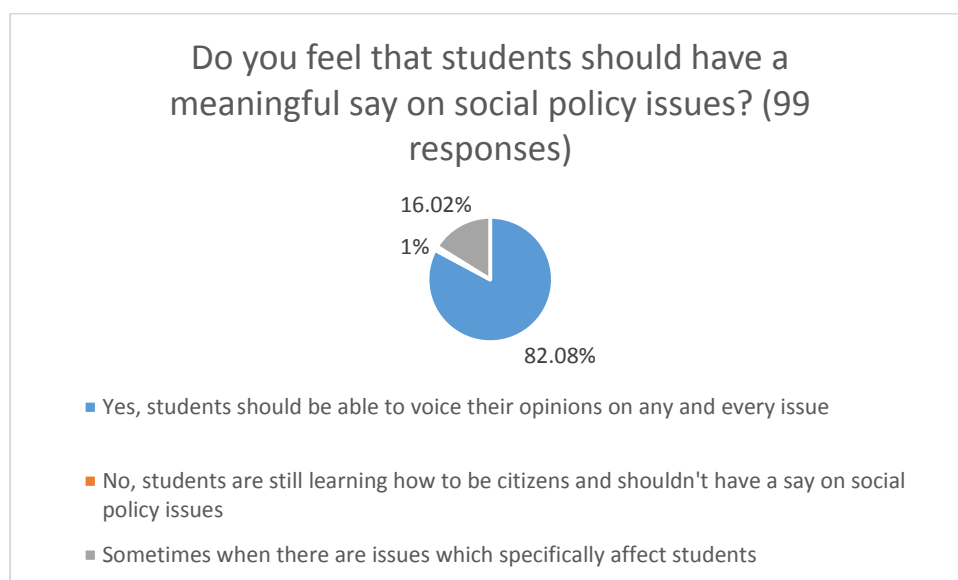

A close majority of 40% of respondents felt that the legal voting age should not be lowered to 16, with 32% of respondents feeling that 16 and 17-year olds should be able to vote. 28% of respondents felt that votes at 16 depended on other variables such as political maturity and/or education.

Question 13: What do you think about lowering the legal voting age to 16?

- A. Most (24) respondents claimed that 16-year olds are (a) not knowledgeable enough (b) lack experience and/or (c) are easily influenced by their parents and others in their social groups such as peers. They felt this made young people “ill-equipped voters.” Two respondents felt that votes at 16 was “gimmicky” and failed to be anything other than a simple vote-winner.
- B. 17 respondents claimed that votes at 16 should be complimented by an accompanying policy in schools to educate young people, including a “full and rigorous” education in citizenship that is balanced and unbiased. 3 respondents felt this should be compulsory, with one respondent feeling that this should include “substantive civic, historical and economic education.” One respondent claimed this should include resources on who/what they are voting for, and ways to get involved.
- C. 14 respondents claimed that votes at 16 would give young people a “vested interest” in who runs the country, and would “encourage” young people to take citizenship seriously, enabling them to become more “socially and politically conscious”. Two respondents identified that university fees and other matters such as paying taxes apply to 16-year olds as much as they do to older people.

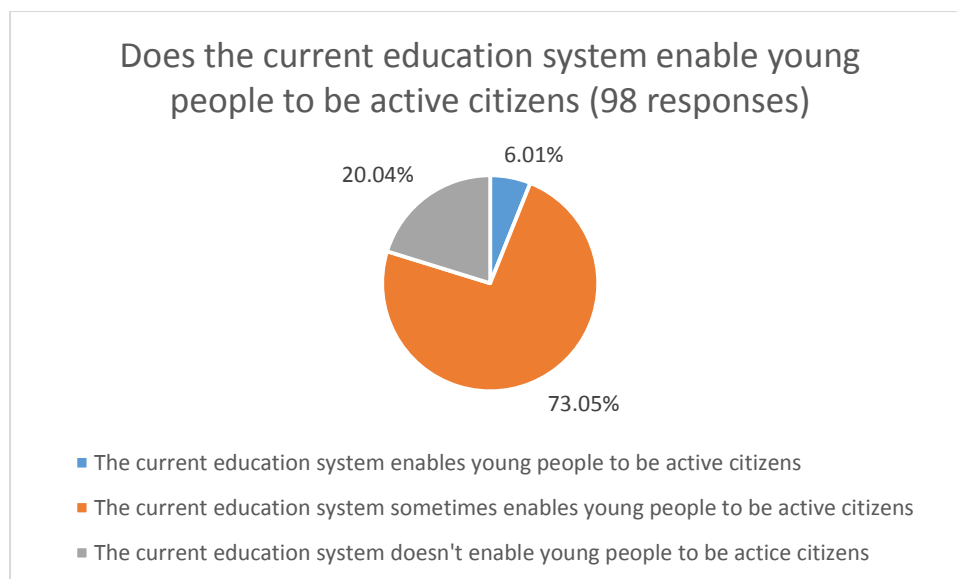

- D. 6 respondents claimed that votes at 16 was either (a) unnecessary, (b) arbitrary, (c) that 16-year olds were more concerned with other issues such as passing exams or (d) that 18 was a good cut-off point for voting eligibility.
- E. 4 respondents claimed that votes at 16 should only apply in major situations where there are “long-term ramifications” such as in the case of Brexit and Scottish independence. 1 respondent argued that votes at 16 should apply to local elections but not to national elections.
- F. 2 respondents identified a democratic deficit in allowing older and not younger people to vote. They believed this created an imbalance where younger people depended on older people to help them, with one claiming that this doesn’t always favour young people, such as the EU referendum.

Question 14:

Most respondents (82.08%) felt that students should have a meaningful say on social policy issues, with 16.02% claiming that this should be restricted to issues which specifically affect them. Only 1% felt that students should not have a say on social

Question 15:

Most respondents (73.05%) felt that the current education system only sometimes enables young people to be active citizens. A minority of respondents (6.01%) felt that the current education system enables young people to be active citizens

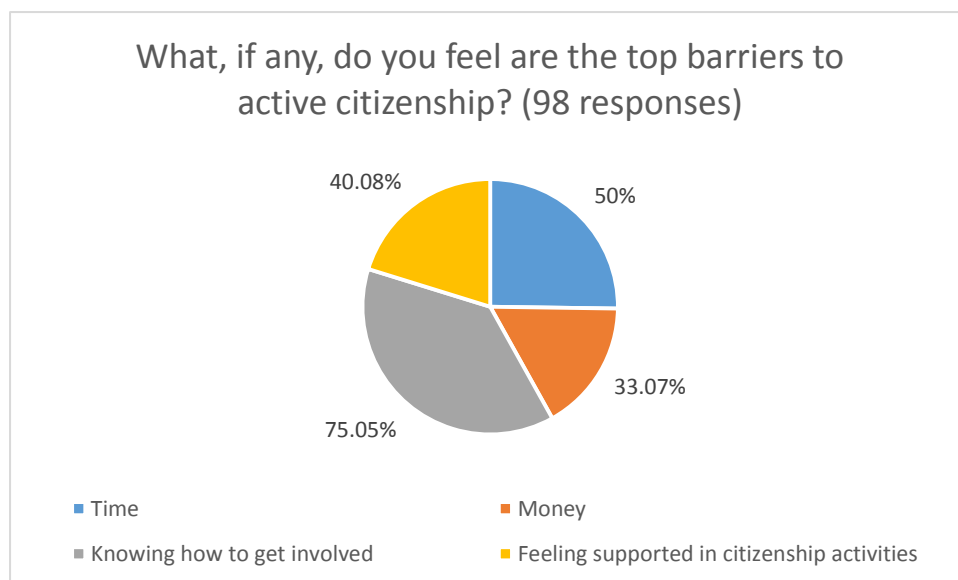

Question 16: What could be done to encourage more young people to be active citizens?

- A. Many respondents (39/65) believed that political education that was (a) impartial, (b) more widely available/accessible, and in some cases even (c) compulsory would encourage more young people to be active citizens.
- 13 respondents claimed that political education should be especially practical, and focus on how government works, the histories and standpoints of political parties, and what civil society is in the UK as well as in other nations.
 - 4 respondents claimed that political education should be compulsory and/or mandatory at secondary school level.
 - 2 respondents specifically mentioned that citizenship education should continue at universities, with elective modules in politics and modern foreign languages.
 - 2 respondents claimed that political education should also focus on 'information literacy', and help manage and assess the "non-stop deluge of information", including digesting party manifestos.
 - 3 respondents claimed that political education should also include studies in historical, philosophical, moral and civic issues too. For example, one respondent thought that political education should extend to case studies such as the history of the Second World War, Hitler, Holocaust and different interpretations like Carl Schmitt, Karl Jaspers and Hannah Arendt.
- B. 15 respondents claimed a sense of "feeling listened to" by MPs and others would encourage young people to be active citizens. This included showing young people are "wanted" in society, taking their investigations and projects "more seriously", and placing issues that are pertinent to students and young people higher on the agenda. For others, this included depoliticising the public arena and instilling a sense of community cohesion that encourage genuine, fair and unbiased debate.

- C. 14 respondents believed tangible participatory experiences would help more young people be active citizens. Respondents believed this should include creating and promoting opportunities to get involved in the community through intergenerational projects such as community gardens. One respondent claimed additional funding for schools that commit to extra-curricular leadership opportunities should be available too. Some respondents mentioned programmes such as Model UN, Model Westminster, the European Youth Parliament are important and teach young people to be “critical and analytic”.
- D. 5 respondents felt that digital technology had a prominent role to play in helping more young people to be active citizens, including using this to “amplify” the voices of minority groups.
- E. Two respondents said that there should be more awareness of what being an active citizen involves.

Question 17:

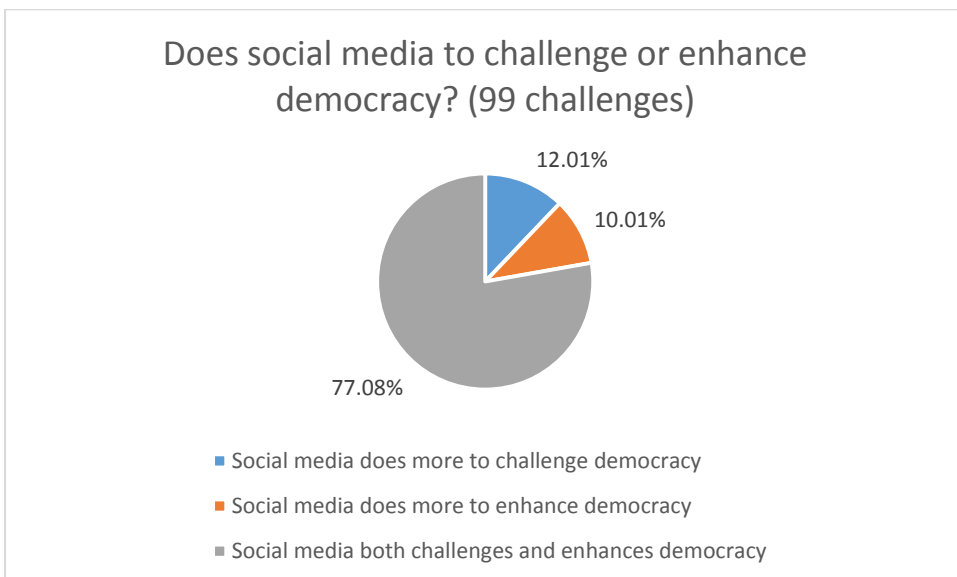

Most respondents (75.05%) claimed that knowing how to get involved was the top barrier to active citizenship. 50% of respondents claimed that time was the top barrier to active citizenship.

Question 18:

72% of respondents felt that diversity and integration can be increased together. Only 4% felt that they could not.

Question 19:

77.08% of respondents felt that social media both enhances and challenges democracy.

Section 3: Our Recommendations:

1. An educational framework together with a proactive, open and transparent political institutional consultation where public institutions have a responsibility to inform and educate others about their work in the community.
 - A. There should be taster sessions, critical thinking lesson starters such as ‘news reviews’, and politically themed deep learning days to draw attention to current political issues. Special classes during elections to inform and educate everyone.
 - B. Political education should be embedded and integrated across the curriculum, especially within the humanities, including history, ethics, and citizenship.
 - C. There should be a focus on research, critical thinking and interpersonal skills, with schools and universities being financially recognised for their efforts to develop social action opportunities.
 - D. An undergraduate citizenship short module should be introduced, where students can debate current issues to develop critical thinking skills. Universities should also be encouraged to offer more elective modules in politics and modern foreign languages.
2. Using digital technology to interact with decision-makers, cross cultural and social divides, exchange ideas, and grow campaigns.
 - A. A dedicated, youth-friendly, unbiased, concise website with useful tools, tips and information for getting involved, digesting information, and knowing who to contact for specific enquiries should be created and made widely available.
 - B. Digital technology should be used to amplify the voice of minority groups within social policy making. This could include an online network where members of minority groups can voice their opinions on current political issues to decision makers and political leaders.
 - C. There should be investment in internet connectivity so that more people can access information.
3. Creating and funding tangible opportunities for young people to experience politics first hand.
 - A. More should be done to support and grow participatory programmes where young people can develop diplomacy and negotiation skills, such as provided through Model Westminster, Model United Nations, and the European Youth Parliament.

EDEN City Outreach – written evidence (CCE0076)

- B. Information on opportunities to get involved with politics, social action and community projects should be more widely available, using digital services where possible.
 - C. Public investment should be made to drive initiatives that empower young people, and especially university students to lead positive social action in their communities.
4. Leading a cultural shift in attitudes – politicians and political leaders should be encouraged to take student voice more genuinely.
- A. An institutional shift in attitudes should be encouraged in how government agencies, departments and representatives engage with, and consult students and young people.
 - B. More should be done to equip workers in the public and voluntary sectors to incorporate events for students as part of their outreach programme, especially university students. This should include time, money and resources.
 - C. More opportunities for students and young people to communicate and exchange ideas with policy makers, advisors and academics should be made available, such as national alternative careers fairs.

EDEN City Outreach – written evidence (CCE0076)

[1] Citizenship reasonably translates to national identity, a sense of belonging and being a part of something bigger than yourself. It is not ‘culture’ specific, but is defined by being (recognised as) a valued contributor and stakeholder of your society. Civic engagement, therefore, becomes the means by which citizens are encouraged, invited and facilitated in participating and contributing to the effective running and governance of that society—at all levels. Ideally this would cover everything from grassroots engagement to informing policy decisions, and include both political and non-political activities. Being recognised and supported as a vital part of the community, local or national, is fundamental to achieving a sense of belonging, which in itself is key to establishing a healthy national identity. If one is made to feel excluded or inhibited from making a material contribution to the governance of his/her own life, the ability to identify with that country becomes impaired. As such, political disenfranchisement and the disarming and disempowerment of the average British citizen has the potential to fuel radicalisation.

[2] An overarching objective of citizenship should be to establish a nationally accepted standard of living and quality of life for all citizens. Within that standard civic engagement should be nurtured as an inherent component of developing healthy, integrated communities—the basic way of life. Without first establishing a solid foundation of protected civil and political rights, citizenship ceremonies, and such, becoming sticking plasters applied to stem the haemorrhage of the gaping wound that is the current political system. This call for evidence acknowledged the growing loss of confidence in this political system [the government]. Increasingly we are seeing public accessibility to the government and public accountability from the government diminish, along with transparency, precipitating a shift towards totalitarianism. This was demonstrated in the health secretary’s handling of the junior doctors ‘negotiations’; having failed to reach agreement the Department of Health simply threatened to impose new contracts. This sort of conduct reveals a government that has lost sight of its role as custodian of British life, a government that exists to serve and represent the interest of its citizens and therefore must find effective ways to engage meaningfully and democratically with them.

A priority in improving civic engagement is therefore urgent political reform to establish a framework(s) that facilitates effective grassroots engagement. Engagement should inform the political process, creating a demonstrable link between the views, needs, desires and aspirations of citizens and the corresponding response of the State. This is just one way of strengthening national identity—providing citizens with a legitimate voice within a truly democratic process. Another is the effective representation and protection of citizen’s (civil, constitutional and human) rights. Austerity measures have resulted in drastic cuts in welfare support, including legal aid. The impact was to severely limit access to effective legal assistance in all but a few circumstances. This reform diminished the ability of the average lay litigant in person [LLIP] to fully participate in judicial proceedings. In June 2015 former Justice Secretary, the Rt Hon Michael Gove MP observed a creaking outdated system that was the failing the majority whilst the rich received “gold-standard service.” Neither his acknowledgement, nor the practical, legal and psychological ramifications of the cuts had any demonstrable bearing in compelling necessary reforms to remedy what is inarguably an Article 6 violation of the Human Rights Act 1998. More recent court rulings and United Nations [UN] reports have highlighted how government policy have violated various human rights. The Supreme Court ruling July 2017 determined that increased employment tribunal fees were unlawful. The policy was introduced by government to limit frivolous claims but in reality prohibited the financially vulnerable from equitable access to justice, whilst inadvertently enabling unscrupulous employer conduct. Increasing criticism of government have done little to elicit any demonstrable contrition or restitution. The subsequent perception is of the government having contempt for its citizens, undermining any sense of valued citizenship or the efficacy of civic engagement.

The government affords its citizens no real opportunity or power over what is widely perceived as a political system that is no longer fit for purpose. It is in this ‘opportunity’ and ‘empowerment’ that the value of citizenship is established. To this end urgent legislative reform is required.

[3] Civic engagement is both a responsibility and a right, but it must begin with being afforded comprehensive, accessible and enforceable rights. British constitutional rights are not clearly identifiable, they are contained in various laws and principles, which for the average British citizen translates to ‘incomprehensible’. Further, we have a system of legislating that obligates the compliance of citizens across vast areas of life in a relationship that is clearly one between ‘citizen’ and ‘State’. However, when the process fails, the relationship inexplicably morphs into that of ‘private individual’ and ‘an organisation—that just happens to be the State’. The only recourse available to disaffected citizens, to what are essentially failures in governance and/or public services, is to instruct ‘private litigation’. That is a fundamental failure to ensure ‘equality-of-arms’ and to adequately provide for and protect the rights of British citizens. It diminishes the regulatory or moderating potential that could (should) come from powers to instruct ‘public interest’ litigation in response to public service failures. Subsequently, justice becomes inaccessible to the majority financially vulnerable, further undermining the citizen’s value or power to inform this political system.

In 2014 three Tower Hamlets residents successfully brought a private claim against former Mayor Lutfur Rahman, addressing electoral fraud and other associated local government corruptions. The litigation was clearly in the public interest with the stoic efforts of the petitioners benefitting the whole community, and perhaps indirectly all British voters. Claims of this nature should reasonably be available as state funded provisions, and not the ‘responsibility’ of citizens to privately remedy. Where individuals cannot afford the costs (psychological or financial) of instructing private litigation, fundamental failures in regulating, governance or public services are permitted to go unaddressed.

The law should freely and equitably protect the civil, constitutional and human rights of all citizens—equality under the law—including making adequate provisions for ‘public interest’ litigation and formal and effective engagement with the government, its agents and representative on matters of fundamental failing in governance and/or regulating. Additionally, the law makers must remain accountable to their citizens and their laws, where appropriate, subject to reasonable challenge to ensure fairness and efficacy.

Throughout 2016 to 2017 I submitted a number of observations regarding material omissions in the legislating of the Courts (and Tribunals) that leave average users of these services, in particular LLIP, vulnerable to abuse of process and miscarriages of justice. These I further perceived to be Human Rights violations. The Ministry of Justice [MOJ] and the Attorney General's Office [AGO] should be under a statutory obligation to engage on the issues raised and either a) evidence current legislating as sufficient and effective or b) make the necessary reforms to remedy the identified omissions. Instead, the AGO declined intervention on the grounds that 'The Attorney General provides legal advice to the government and is unable to give legal advice, assistance or support to individuals and so cannot intervene in or investigate the matters you have raised', thereafter deferring responsibility for responding to the MOJ. This decline failed materially to provide the requested clarity regarding the role and remit of the Attorney General previously cited as including the '...duty to ensure that the Queen's ministers who act in her name, or purport to act in her name, do act lawfully because it is his duty to help to secure the rule of law, the principal requirement of which is that the government itself acts lawfully' [former Attorney General, Lord Mayhew of Twysden]. And this third obligation established by another former Attorney General, the Rt Hon Dominic Grieve QC MP (October 2012) '...as guardians of certain public interest functions which include, for example, the role of protector of charity and of the administration of justice.'

The MOJ, to date, has failed to offer any response.

Civic engagement must include established, identifiable and exercisable rights, appropriate levels of empowerment and real opportunity to make a difference. These rights need to be protected in statutory powers that ensure 'equality of arms' between the State and its citizens. Though counter-intuitive, I believe an increase in legal powers for citizens, including the right to instruct stated funding 'public interest' litigation, will not result in increased legal action (in the long-term) but in more effective governance, legislating and regulating.

Civil Society Groups and organisation also have a hugely important and significant role to play in monitoring and enforcement, as an established part of a formally recognised framework of citizen-led regulating. Their roles, as independent representatives of their communities, or the general public interest (by areas of expertise), will greatly aid and improve public accessibility and accountability, increasing transparency and subsequently confidence in the government.

[4] My personal experience is that having the right laws in place is only part of the challenge. Another pressing need is to ensure that those laws and legal freedoms/powers are equitably accessible and adequately protected from abuse. The absence of the latter renders the former effectively redundant.

The whole election process is in need of 'liberating'. At each election the parties are permitted to dictate the key issues, only then inviting the country to pose questions within their imposed constraints. Having limited the electorate to playing within a pre-defined arena, politicians inadvertently field out what for some are pressing issues, such as the increasing lack of clear, honest, accurate or factual information from politicians (i.e. in the lead up to BREXIT), or government conduct increasingly contrary to the ‘public interest’. The remit of pre-election debates is not for government or the parties to dictate. It is for the electorate to advance what the primary issues are, and for the parties to respond accordingly. This sort of basic reform has the potential to greatly improve the election process and voter engagement/participation.

Similarly, more control and power is required post-election to allow citizens to respond to party or MP failures to deliver on pre-election promises. The electorate should reasonably have powers to hold the party to account and, albeit in the most extreme cases, to declare a vote of no confidence in the government, PM, Minister, MP, Mayor or local councillor. What is unacceptable is to force the country/constituency to tolerate substantial failures and broken promises for 4-5 years, until the next round of elections—where history suggest the same will reoccur. The current system completely disempowers citizens beyond the right to a vote, which alone is not ‘democracy’, and enables increasing unaccountability from the government.

[5] Citizenship is a way of life, it incorporates both the legal and the moral and should reasonably inform all aspects of how we do community life: how we engage with our neighbours; how we choose to serve and support our communities, etc. In that respect it is, in itself a ‘culture’ that needs to be nurtured within society and each community. How that occurs belongs both in the classroom and in effective community-based social support services that facilitate civic engagement, community cohesion and social interaction.

Realistically, it is not possible to escape politics or its impact on shaping our lives, directly or indirectly. Political engagement is therefore inevitable. The real challenge, then, is how to facilitate political engagement in ways that encourage participation from citizens across all walks of society and in a manner that compliments their political inclinations and aspiration. What is unjustifiably absent, and somewhat telling by its absence, is the legitimate voice of ordinary citizens within the current democratic process: An entire community, mourning the catastrophic loss of lives following the Grenfell Tower fire, are forced to express their concerns by protesting outside Westminster and their local authority—because that is the only legitimate voice afforded to them in 21st Century British governance.

Internationally, advances in technology are lauded for facilitating widespread ‘connection’; Connectivity, claims Facebook’s founder, is a basic human right. And still the British government has failed to evidence any demonstrable advances in developing an effective framework of grassroots engagement, maximising the potential of all this valuable technology.

[6] A first priority in establishing effective civic engagement and a real sense of citizenship and national pride is in building effective foundations: The Localism Act was passed in October 2011. This act devolved considerable parliamentary powers to local government in a move that was intended to facilitate grassroots engagement—encouraging collaboration between local communities and authorities. Subsequent to the act the government pruned its own powers, abolished the independent regulator—the Audit Commission and its portfolio of inspections/audits and also the ‘Parliamentary Standards Board’ that once regulated office holders’ conduct. What should have followed was the implementation of the infrastructure necessary to facilitate community groups and organisation assuming the powers of scrutiny, accountability and regulating vacated by Parliament and its agents. Had that occurred, localised vehicles for increased civic engagement would have naturally followed.

Instead, 6 years on, the powers of the community remain woefully underrepresented and inadequately legislated for. The Act has essentially disempowered parliament, and subsequently the local community. It has affording local government almost absolute power (in a material sense), increasing the exposure and vulnerability of communities to local government corruption. The Localism Act 2011 had the potential to facilitate and improve civic engagement. However, the lack of increased rights and powers afforded to the local community, particularly in holding local governments to public account, make this an illustration of how failed legislating has disenfranchised, disempowered and disarmed British citizens. In the absence of the solid foundation necessary to ensure the viability of the act, local government devolution has severely compromised the capacity of the local community for effective civic engagement.

[7] The emphasis is on the government to demonstrate a real commitment to its citizens, their quality of life and civic engagement as a means of protecting and enhancing it. Reasonably warranted, within this commitment, is a willingness to formalise working relationships with community groups and Civil Society Organisation as vehicles for community-led engagement and legislating. The government must provide ‘means’, ‘opportunity’ and most importantly ‘motive’. The means through effective legislating; opportunity through public accessibility and accountability to and from government—at all levels. And, the motivation of being afforded real powers to make a material difference.

The British government has recently come under strong criticism for austerity measures that are failing disabled people—in violation of their human rights. The UN report observes a government ‘evading’ the rights of disabled people, facilitating discrimination, and ‘[dismissive] of the lived experiences, views and interest of Disable people in the UK’ [The latter proffered by Disability Rights UK]. The observation of citizens’ rights being ‘evaded’ is not limited to Disabled Persons, Britain endured similar criticisms from the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights [UNESCR] in 2016 where again Austerity was cited as violating the human rights of financially vulnerable citizens. Throughout there has been a lack of any real evidence of a government willing to recognise its failings, the mood of its citizens or the need for more effective and formal engagement on the issues. The greatest barrier to effective civic engagement we are currently facing is a political system which divorces citizens from the democratic process through State imposed inaccessibility.

[8] The basic value of/for human life is all but eroded from political decision making, with statistics and perception taking greater priority over improving quality of life. One example of this is contained in the 2016 UNESCR report which, in spite of rising employment levels, raises concerns about the high number of low-paid jobs, especially in sectors such as cleaning and homecare. Government statistics portray economic and social stability, perhaps even improvement. The reality is that many continue to struggle following the 2008 crash; the decline in their standard of living buried in misleading statistics. In his 2015 documentary, 'The Super Rich and Us' Jacques Peretti, investigative journalist, observed that government statistics portraying strong growths in the GDP primarily reflected growth limited to the minority super-rich. The majority, he concluded, had seen no material increase in income since 2008. This sort of disingenuous reporting reveals a lack of real empathy to the diminishing quality of life of the many who continue to struggle to recover from the global financial crisis. It portrays a growing chasm between the rhetoric of government and real-life, an indifference to the detrimental impact of political decision on real-lives, and the loss of any sense of duty towards the British Public.

The most basic values should hold dear every human life (and quality of life), with a heightened focus on the vulnerable within our communities; it should ensure that all are treated fairly, justly and equitably; and should promote mercy and benevolence towards one another. One would have to completely discard these values, dehumanising the people behind the policies to behave the way the government now stands condemned of. Where conscience fails, the law should prevail which suggests equally worrying fundamental failures in the way this government legislates. It is this sort of unabashed disregard for the views and lived-experiences of the average British citizen (and even official bodies speaking on their behalf), that informs the sense of having been 'left behind'—that ours is a government that simply does not care.

[10] Civic engagement is both a 'right' and a 'way of life', it is facilitated by government (legislating) and realised through the activities of its citizens. It cannot be achieved in isolation, therefore where civic engagement occurs, social cohesion follows. As 'want' seems to fuel intolerance, empowering communities to positively impact the local economic and social landscape can only improve social integration.

[12] to that end I would like to propose a model with the potential to improve citizenship and raise the standard of living and quality of life in local communities—Community Support Networks [CSN].

The aim of the CSN is to support communities to support communities, facilitating a shift from individualisation towards communal support services and solutions. One of the primary objective is to encourage majority engagement. The CSN works by harnessing and pooling even the most limited contributions from the entire community, enabling every citizen to make a valued contribution. Each contribution is then co-ordinated, by the CSN, to achieve maximum impact: Collecting large volumes of small donations, co-ordinating limited voluntary support, or compiling individual knowledge and experiences. The co-ordinated output is sufficient funds to finance priority community –led projects that benefit the wider community, a scheduled programme of voluntary support that places minimal demand on the volunteers and, lived-experiences and knowledge augmented into valuable comprehensive information and insight. Together these become the mechanisms that afford every citizens a 'legitimate' voice within the local democratic process and opportunity to shape local life and/or policy, in ways that are both organic (in input) and formal (in output). Much like Facebook the CSN will enable individuals to effortlessly engage, connect and collaborate with their community on areas of shared interest, concerns and aspiration, through a user-friendly online environment. The model is self-financing through a combination of nominal membership fees and community fund generating—which also creates a physical presence within the community. One proposed method of fund-generating includes adopting public green space (under the provisions of the Localism Act 2011) for community development into edible communal gardens incorporating a restaurant and other retail opportunities. The CSN encourages communal support solutions, facilitates civic engagement, and creates vehicles for improved social interaction, community cohesion and effective political engagement in addition to creating a framework for community-led regulating.

Section 1: Focus on lowering the voting age (in response to question 4)

In the past studies focussing on a hypothetical lowering of the voting age had to rely on indirect investigations to assess its potential impact. However, we now have comprehensive insights from actual empirical experiences of voting age reductions, most comprehensively in Austria (where the voting age was lowered to 16 for elections at all levels in 2007) as well as Scotland (where the voting age was lowered initially for the Scottish independence referendum of 2014 and subsequently for all further local and Scottish Parliament elections). Based on studies on the empirical impact in those cases, we can preliminarily conclude that early enfranchisement can indeed have positive effects on civic engagement of young people. However, it is important to note that these positive impacts are also related to other relevant factors, in particular civic education. The following paragraphs will present more details.

Austria provides us with the longest-term European example of a lowered voting age. Researchers in the country identified both initially positive effects on civic engagement and attitudes of young people, characterised as a “first-time boost”²⁷⁷, but were also able to demonstrate the existence of long-term positive effects.²⁷⁸

The findings in Austria correspond closely to insights gained from research into the Scottish experience that was carried out by a team at the University of Edinburgh and coordinated by the author of this evidence submission, albeit on a much shorter timescale than the Austrian studies, of course.²⁷⁹ During the 2014 independence referendum itself, the research showed that prospective first-time voters

- Showed similar levels of interest compared to the average adult population in Scotland;
- Increased their engagement with a great variety of news sources on political issues;
- Did not simply follow their parents’ lead (with more than 40% holding a different view to one of their parents)²⁸⁰.

Traditionally, turnout amongst the youngest age groups was measured to be the lowest in most elections across Scotland and the UK.²⁸¹ However, in the Scottish independence referendum, turnout at 75% amongst 16- to 17-year-olds was greater than for the next older age group (18-24) at only 54%.²⁸² While it was still lower than the overall population average (85%) the gap was much smaller than in any previous vote, while the difference for the 18- to 24-year olds remained large. This provides an important insight countering prior work that was critical of electoral franchise expansion based on the study of adult first time voters aged 18 or above.²⁸³ Studies based on opposing early enfranchisement based on the observation that 18-24 year olds comparatively did not make as much use of their vote have to be called into question, as we see that 16- to 17-year-olds seem to behave differently to their slightly older counterparts²⁸⁴. Indeed, this mirrors findings elsewhere that younger first-time voters show higher participation rates than slightly older first-time voters.²⁸⁵ Voting at 16 or 17 seems to be a very different experience to voting at a slightly older age and seems to be engaged with more at this earlier age.

In addition to the age comparison in the context of the Scottish independence referendum, we also have carried out work to assess whether differences between young Scots and their respective counterparts in the rest of the UK (RUK), who had not previously been enfranchised at 16, existed in advance of the 2015 general election. Based on two representative samples of 16 and 17 year olds in Scotland and RUK respectively we were able to find the following²⁸⁶:

- Scottish 16- and 17-year olds were much more likely to say that they would be very likely to vote in general election if they were allowed to (67%) compared to their peers in RUK (39%).
- Furthermore, the young Scottish respondents were also more likely (57%) to have taken part in at least one form of non-electoral form of political participation (such as signing a petition, writing to a member of parliament or taking part in peaceful demonstrations) compared to their counterparts elsewhere (40%).

- 16- to 17-year olds in Scotland were also more likely to recently have used a wider range of information sources to get to know more about politics. While 60% in Scotland reported having used at least 3 of 6 possible information source types, only 43% in the rest of the country said the same.

In summary, previously newly enfranchised 16- to 17-year-olds in Scotland showed higher levels of civic engagement ahead of the 2015 general election compared to their RUK counterparts.

The differences between Scotland and RUK were not merely a consequence of the Scottish independence referendum. While some of the variation could be attributed to factors related to the referendum, some of the difference between Scotland and RUK are not explained when taking those into account.²⁸⁷ While the Scottish independence referendum presented a unique situation and is responsible for some of the uptake in civic engagement in Scotland generally, including for young people, some additional effects could be observed for 16- to 17-year olds specifically that are not exclusively linked to the referendum.

These findings were extensively acknowledged and cited by the Scottish Parliament's Devolution (Further Powers) Committee in their concluding recommendation to lower the voting age for all Scottish elections²⁸⁸, which was ultimately adopted unanimously by the Scottish Parliament. The research has also been acknowledged in a motion in the House of Commons²⁸⁹ and cited in further debates.²⁹⁰

In addition to measuring differences in the average degree of civic engagement, we also find differences in the social distribution between young people in Scotland and RUK. 16- to 17-year-olds in RUK showed the classic social class pattern ahead of the 2015 general election. Those in higher social classes were more likely to say they would vote, if they could, they also were more likely to have participated in non-electoral forms of engagement and tended to use a greater range of information sources compared to peers from lower social classes. In Scotland we were not able to find this pattern anymore in 2015. There were no statistically significant differences between young people of different social classes regarding their civic engagement.²⁹¹ This suggests that - in addition to higher levels of civic engagement amongst newly enfranchised young people in Scotland - also inequalities in civic engagement were lower compared to their RUK peers.

Section 2: Focus on civic education (in response to question 5)

Civic education plays a very important role in enabling young people to engage politically, both in terms of voting²⁹² and non-electoral forms of participation.²⁹³ Educational research has repeatedly demonstrated the importance of civic education and knowledge for supporting pro-civic political socialisation of young people with its effects complementing socialisation through the family.²⁹⁴

However, it is crucial to distinguish between different types of civic education and their respective effects. While the formal instruction of “civics” (such as the study of political structures and processes) is meaningful in particular to acquire knowledge, it is insufficient in achieving comprehensive support of pro-civic attitudes and behaviour in young people.²⁹⁵ In addition to formal instruction, researchers have shown repeatedly that engagement with political issues in the classroom in a discursive format is crucial to achieve greater political participation of young people.²⁹⁶

We found these findings confirmed in our own research of 16- and 17-year-olds in the UK.²⁹⁷ Pupils who had taken a class where political issues were studied formally were more likely to have

- participated in non-electoral forms of participation,
- been using a greater range of information source types, and
- said that they did not find politics difficult to understand.

However, only students who were in classes where political issues were actively discussed additionally were more likely to say that

- they would be very likely to vote in an election if they were allowed to do so,
- it made a difference who got elected to office, and
- 16-year-olds should be given the right to vote in all elections.

In summary, an interplay between formal civic education and active discussions of political issues in the classroom is required to achieve comprehensive positive effects for civic engagement and attitudes.

Our research, in accordance with previous work in the field cited earlier, suggests that formal civic education and qualified discussions of political issues in the classroom should be a mandatory part of school education for all pupils, as otherwise some would be better prepared to become active citizens than others.

There are substantial differences in the proportion of young people who are exposed to such classes across the UK. While 68% of 16- to 17-year-olds in Scotland said they had taken a class in school in which mainly issues about politics and society were discussed, only 50% of their peers elsewhere said the same. Young people in Scotland were also more likely to have discussed political issues recently with friends (65%) or family (63%) compared to their RUK peers (38% and 39% respectively).²⁹⁸

Young people who discussed political issues in class in Scotland were also more likely to discuss political issues with their family at home.²⁹⁹ This is an important insight, as it suggests that young people are not only affected by other agents, such as schools or parents, but may also become influential in shaping discussions with them, when being enabled. This finding is in line with previous research³⁰⁰ and suggests that earlier political socialisation of young people may have broader societal effects, including on their parents.

In line with these findings, we could also observe increased support amongst the general population in Scotland for 16-year olds voting in elections. While support was traditionally

The Electoral Commission – written evidence (CCE0152)

The Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees elections and regulates political finance in the UK. We work to promote public confidence in the democratic process and ensure its integrity by enabling the delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible. We also use our expertise to make and advocate for changes to our democracy, aiming to improve fairness, transparency and efficiency. We welcome the opportunity to respond to this call for evidence.

We recognise the importance of citizenship and civic engagement in enhancing our democracy and the centrality of voting and people’s wider involvement in politics in that context. As not all the questions in the call for evidence paper relate to issues within the Electoral Commission’s remit, we have focussed only on those that do; namely, questions 4, 5, 7, 8 and 9. In order to keep our response as brief as possible, we have included references and links to available research and analysis wherever possible.

Question 4

Academics and other commentators have tended to stress the importance of political participation, political information, and political trust in describing the characteristics of the “politically engaged” citizen.³⁰⁴ While evidence consistently emphasises that political engagement is influenced by a broad range of factors, there are several areas of electoral law and administration that may have an impact on the degree to which individuals or groups feel able or willing to engage politically. These include: the rules governing how people register to vote; the ways in which people may cast their vote; the rules around standing for election; and legislation relating to the provision of information to voters about forthcoming electoral events.

More generally, we strongly support the Law Commissions’ electoral law reform project to rationalise and modernise electoral legislation, which we believe will lead to a simpler and more modern law, enabling well-run elections and making it easier for candidates and voters to take part.

Electoral registration process

A system of individual electoral registration (IER) has operated in Great Britain since 2014, and a similar system has been used in Northern Ireland since 2002. People in Great Britain are able to apply to register online, a system which has significantly improved access to elections, particularly among young people and British citizens overseas.

³⁰⁴ Norris, Pippa (2000) A Virtuous Circle: Political Communications in Post-Industrial Societies. NY:

Our recent report on electoral registration at the June 2017 UK Parliamentary general election set out our proposals for further modernisation and improvement, including extending online registration to Northern Ireland; examining the scope for the integration of electoral registration into other public services; better use of public data to help identify potential electors; consideration of automatic or direct registration processes; and exploring solutions to identify duplicate registration applications and reduce the risk of people voting in more than one constituency at a UK Parliamentary general election (UKPGE).

These measures have the potential to make the electoral registration system simpler and more accessible for voters, and we will continue to work closely with the UK's governments to help support the development of new approaches to improve the accuracy and completeness of electoral registers.

Voting methods

Voters at statutory elections and referendums in the UK have a choice of voting methods: they can vote in person at a polling station, or apply to vote by post or proxy.³⁰⁵ Extending or changing the ways in which people can vote (for example, by allow electronic voting (e-voting), advance voting or weekend voting) is often cited as offering the potential to increase levels of political participation, particularly among under-represented groups.

Our evaluation of e-voting pilot schemes found that the majority of those who voted electronically were likely to have voted anyway via another channel, a finding supported by political science research.³⁰⁶

Our evaluation of advance voting pilot schemes reached similar conclusions: use of the facility was limited, and mainly confined to those already predisposed to vote. In addition, we are not aware of any evidence which suggests that voting on a Thursday is a significant reason why people do not currently vote at elections in the UK, or that moving to weekend voting would remove a significant barrier to voting. Our post-election public opinion research undertaken after the 2015 UKPGE found no strong evidence to suggest that weekend or advance voting would cause a change in behaviour; the case for online voting was improved, but far from conclusive.³⁰⁷ Any introduction of new voting channels would need to be based on robust evidence and justification before any changes were implemented.

³⁰⁵ Postal voting is available on demand for all elections in England, Scotland and Wales. In Northern Ireland, an elector must have a valid reason for voting by post.

³⁰⁶ See <http://www.internetvotingpanel.ca/docs/recommendations-report.pdf> p.12.

Disabled voters

People living with disabilities can face more significant challenges when registering and casting their vote. Everyone who is eligible should be able to register and cast their vote without impediment, and we take very seriously the need to ensure that all voters can exercise their rights. We provide guidance to Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) and Returning Officers to help them meet their electoral law and equality obligations and ensure that everyone who is entitled to cast their vote can do so.

We also work with disability organisations to identify whether changes to guidance, practice or legislation are needed to help those living with disabilities exercise their voting rights. We welcome the Minister for the Constitution's recent Call for Evidence on how people with disabilities experience registering to vote and voting itself, and we will submit evidence in due course.

Standing for election

The rules around standing for election determine whether someone is able to stand as a candidate. While these are of most direct interest to potential candidates and political parties, they are also important for voters since they help determine the range of candidates available to them. The rules should enable the widest possible access to stand for election, but should also ensure confidence in elections and election candidates among voters, campaigners and political parties.

Our January 2015 report on standing for election in the UK made a number of recommendations designed to help make the rules as clear, fair and up-to-date as possible, so that they both encourage participation by candidates and maintain the confidence of voters in the system. We recommended that monetary deposits should no longer be required in order to be nominated for election, because we do not believe it is reasonable to have a barrier to standing for election that depends on someone's financial means. However, we also recommended that requirements to collect supporting signatures from registered electors should be retained.

The franchise

We note that the Committee is also seeking views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age. The Electoral Commission does not take a view on the specific definition of the franchise, including the principle of lowering the voting age, as we recognise that these are significant constitutional questions which are properly the responsibility of legislatures to determine. However, we would comment on the practical implications of implementing any change to the franchise, including for electoral administrators, campaigners and voters themselves.

Question 5

Schools offer an opportunity to target information about political participation at young people who are approaching the age of electoral majority. The Commission successfully worked in partnership with schools and local councils ahead of the 2016 Scottish Parliament election and the 2017 Scottish council elections to target information at those 16 and 17 year olds who would be eligible to vote in these elections.

Our ReadyToVote campaign encouraged schools across Scotland to run registration and voting events with their students on 1 March 2017 and was supported by Education Scotland, Council Chief Executives and Directors of Education. We produced a toolkit to make it as easy as possible for schools to get involved. In total 293 secondary schools signed up to take part in the campaign, accounting for over 80% of all local authority secondary schools and our research with 16-17 year olds after the election found that they were more likely to say that they found it easy to access information about how to vote than 18-34 year olds.³⁰⁸

Electoral Commission campaigns

Before elections and referendums, the Commission runs campaigns to promote the key information citizens need to know, so they can vote.³⁰⁹

³⁰⁸ 84% of 16-17 year olds said it was easy to access information compared to only 69% of 18-34 year olds.

³⁰⁹ Further information about our voter registration campaigns can be found on our website: <https://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/find-information-by-subject/electoral-registration>

An important part of our campaigns is facilitating support from other organisations, including central and local government, charities, businesses and NGOs. We produce resources, provide advice, run specific initiatives with some organisations and put effort into ongoing communication through a dedicated public awareness e-newsletter. To support our recent campaigns Cabinet Office have mobilised government departments to share messages on their communications channels and they have added messaging across the gov.uk website, including at the end of transactions such as driving licence and passport applications. In our experience, working as a sector with specific organisations investing in and co-ordinating support centrally for particular areas, helps deliver value for the public purse and makes the best use of limited resources.

In 2016 the Commission undertook a strategic review which involved asking external stakeholders for their views on a range of areas, including engagement with elections. Of the 120 responses to our consultation, several mentioned declining engagement as a particular challenge, especially among young people, and that education programmes (to help people understand how politics affects their lives and learn what elected representatives do) would help to meet this challenge.

The Commission has therefore started a project to scope and define the landscape of public democratic engagement in the UK. This project will explore what different organisations are already doing, identify where there are overlaps or gaps, and enable consideration of what more the sector could do to improve democratic engagement. We aim to complete this project by early 2019.

Information about elections

In most UK elections with large geographic constituencies, candidates are provided with some state-funded support to help them communicate their policies and encourage people to vote in the area where they are standing for election. This includes the right for candidates to send an election leaflet free of charge for postage to every registered elector or every household in constituencies for UK Parliamentary elections. Candidates in directly-elected Mayoral contests in England (including elections for the Mayor of London, Combined Authority Mayors and local authority directly-elected mayors) can include a statement in a single booklet distributed to households across the electoral area, subject to the payment of a contribution towards the costs of producing and distributing the booklet.³¹⁰

³¹⁰ Mailings free of charge for postage are also available for candidates at elections to the European Parliament, Scottish Parliament, National Assembly for Wales, Northern Ireland Assembly and local councils in Northern Ireland.

At Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) elections in England and Wales, candidates are entitled to include a statement on a centrally hosted website, but there is no free mailing. We have recommended to the UK Government that electors should be sent printed information about candidates at future PCC elections in the form a booklet containing information provided by each candidate. Our public opinion research for the November 2012 PCC elections found that the most commonly cited reasons for not voting in the elections related to a lack of awareness (37%), primarily a lack of information about the elections and not knowing who the candidates were or where to find information about them.

Our report on the May 2016 PCC elections reinforced our concerns about the lack of candidate information available to voters to enable them to make an informed decision about how to vote, with 72% reporting that they knew not very much or nothing at all about the elections.

Question 8

Electoral fraud undermines democracy and weakens the United Kingdom’s strong tradition of free and fair elections. It takes away from individuals the right to vote as they wish, it distorts the results of elections and weakens the legitimacy of elected bodies, and it causes mistrust between communities.

We published two research reports in January 2015 focusing on the vulnerability of electors in the British Pakistani and British Bangladeshi communities. These highlighted that a mix of contextual, cultural and electoral process factors may create electoral fraud vulnerabilities.³¹¹

Addressing these vulnerabilities will take careful, locally managed work by police forces, Returning Officers/EROs and – crucially – political parties, candidates and campaigners, to raise awareness of what is and is not acceptable activity by family or community members or campaigners, and to build confidence that concerns can be raised and will be dealt with appropriately.

³¹¹ See Elections, voting and electoral fraud: An exploratory study focusing on British Pakistanis and Bangladeshis - January 2015 and Understanding electoral fraud vulnerability in Pakistani and Bangladeshi origin communities in England: A view of local political activists - January 2015

Question 9

Our research on electoral registration has found that the main drivers of lower levels of electoral registration remain age (young people 18-34 are less likely to be registered), recent home movement and whether someone rents their home. Our campaigns target the whole of the population eligible to vote, with a particular focus on these and other under-registered groups. We also provide comprehensive guidance for EROs, including examples of approaches and tactics for engaging under-registered groups.

Our research study on elections, voting and electoral fraud within British Bangladeshi and Pakistani communities identified a number of barriers to political participation among these groups, including low levels of literacy and a lack of English language skills and understanding of UK electoral processes, particularly among older British Pakistani and Bangladeshi voters, new migrants and women. Without direct access to information regarding candidates or electoral processes, and unable to vote by themselves, these types of individuals were likely to rely on others to help with voting.

The same study also found that disinterest in politics among all age groups and across all communities came from “disillusionment with politicians failing to follow through on promises once elected”.

Electoral Reform Society – written evidence (CCE0136)

The Electoral Reform Society is an independent campaigning organisation working to champion the rights of voters and build a better democracy in Britain. Securing a fairer franchise and deepening public involvement in politics are two of the Society's key aims which are particularly relevant to this inquiry and which have informed this submission.

- Political engagement is central to citizenship but growing generational gaps in turnout create a problem for sustaining a healthy democratic and civic life.
- The Society strongly supports extending the franchise to 16- and 17-year olds. This long overdue reform has benefits for registration as well as engagement.
- Improving electoral registration by lowering the barriers and making registration part of everyday life is a simple but effective way of improving political engagement.
- ERS has a longstanding commitment to youth engagement. We report on the findings of our roundtable on the state of citizenship education and our democratic schools initiative.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. For a number of years declining turnout and declining rates of party membership and other forms of political activity have been a cause to doubt the health of democratic life in the UK. Though membership of charitable and special interest groups has increased and engagement in other aspects of civic and associational life have remained buoyant, political engagement has waned. We believe that political engagement is central to citizenship and civic engagement and the latter cannot be achieved without the former.
2. Being an active citizen is not just about voting – but it is important. Poor political engagement is particularly evidenced in the persistently low levels of turnout amongst younger age groups. Whilst the last general election saw a turn up in voting amongst younger cohorts, the turnout gap between the youngest and oldest voters has been growing. The difference in turnout (of the eligible electorate) between 21- to 35-years-olds and 66- to 80-year-olds, grew to 28 percentage points at the 2015 general election. In 1992 it was less than 10. Differences in turnout between generations are becoming more marked and there were clear turnout generational gaps in both the Scottish and EU referendums despite high overall turnout. A generational gap in turnout has the potential to imbed generational inequality in the future.

3. The relationship between the state and the citizen is evolving. Power is shifting, and citizens will increasingly take responsibility for shaping more of the decisions that affect their lives. Technological developments have resulted in an increasingly informed but much less trusting public and enabled the spread of ‘fake news’. In these circumstances the need for a more engaged citizenry increases. Ensuring people (especially younger people) are informed, engaged and able to navigate the increasingly complex political world is therefore essential to creating a healthy democracy.
4. Political disengagement is not a terminal problem. Dissatisfaction with politics does not reflect a lack of faith in democracy or representative politics. There is great opportunity to create a democracy that engages and supports citizens. Ensuring that all citizens’ votes count at the ballot box is a principal means of improving democracy. Engaging younger citizens in and embedding participatory practice early is another way of helping reverse the growing turnout gap and improving electoral registration and the mechanics of voting can also help engagement.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

Votes at 16

5. The Electoral Reform Society strongly supports enfranchising 16- and 17-year-olds for all elections and referendums. We see lowering the franchise as vital to nurturing more active citizens for the future health of our democracy.
6. The next generation of voters are the first to have received citizenship education, yet are being denied their full rights as citizens. This is the first generation to have ever needed to study our democracy, our electoral system and the importance of voting. Lowering the voting age to 16 would allow a seamless transition from learning about voting, elections and democracy to putting such knowledge into practice. Research shows that voting habits entrench - those that vote when first able to do so go on to vote regularly, whilst non-voting can also become habitual. If young people are registered early and get into the habit of voting, we will see lasting improvements in turnout.
7. There is a constitutional precedent for lowering the franchise to 16- and 17-year olds. In June 2015, Holyrood voted unanimously to give 16- and 17-year olds the vote in Scottish Parliamentary and local elections. Similar measures are being considered in Wales.

Better registration and engagement

8. Younger citizens (18- to 24-year-olds) are much less likely to be registered than older voters. Owner occupiers are more likely to be registered than renters, and social renters are more likely to be registered than private renters. Young people are more likely than the general population to be resident in either temporary or short-term lets, making up a greater proportion of the private rental market than the general population. Reaching young people when they receive their National Insurance number and whilst they are likely to be still living with their parents could massively improve registration rates for this age group.
9. Over 89% of 16- and 17-year-olds registered for the Scottish independence referendum. Lowering the voting age to 16 will improve registration rates and engage younger voters, developing better political relationships that will be carried through to later life.

Turnout and political interest

10. It is a myth that 16- and 17-year-olds are insufficiently interested in politics to deserve the vote. Evidence from the Scottish independence referendum substantiated by research from Austria and Norway, showed – aided by the encouragement of families and schools – 16- and 17-year-olds have higher rates of turnout than 18- to 34-year-olds.
11. Research from the Scottish independence referendum shows 16- and 17-year-olds accessed more information from a wider variety of sources than any other age-group during the referendum campaign; discussing political issues in schools greatly increased their confidence in their political understanding and, in addition, far more 16- and 17-year-olds polled after than before the independence referendum campaign felt closer to a political party: these young people are the party activists of the future.
12. We do not support the notion that improving turnout among young people who already have the vote is a prerequisite for considering votes for 16- and 17-year-olds. Increased turnout in younger age groups in the 2017 general election is a positive development but extending the franchise and improving turnout are goals that should be pursued together.

A constitutional precedent

13. The enfranchisement of 16- and 17-year-olds in Scotland was such a success that the Scottish Parliament has introduced Votes at 16 for Scottish Parliament and Scottish local elections. This legislation was supported by many people who had opposed Votes at 16 before the independence referendum, including Leader of the Scottish Conservatives Ruth Davidson.

14. Now 16- and 17-year-olds in Scotland can vote, it is unacceptable that their peers elsewhere in the United Kingdom cannot. Something as basic as the franchise itself should not be another wedge driven between the nations of the Union.

Voter registration

15. Electoral administration should work first and foremost for the voter. With rapidly declining citizen participation in elections we need to look afresh at how elections are run. There are a number of improvements to registering and voting that could help make the process easier and more engaging for citizens.
16. The introduction of individual electoral registration makes it now possible to integrate registration into other day-to-day transactions with the government. To increase registration in the UK, the government should consider providing registration forms at government offices and Post Offices, and electors should be reminded to register to vote in official transactions such as when applying for a passport, driver's licence, social security and registering for council tax. Other groups such as landlords can play a role with at-risk groups such as private renters.
17. We also recommend introducing Election Day Registration which would allow voters to turn up at the polling station, register and vote all in one go. Groups with lower registration rates see the largest gains through Election Day Registration, especially among those who have recently moved address. In addition, we recommend allowing voters to cast their vote at any polling station in their constituency.
18. We need to make registration easier and more in line with everyday practices instead of introducing new barriers such as steeper identity requirements.

Missing Voices

19. This summer, ERS Cymru launched a project called 'Missing Voices' consulting Welsh citizens on voting and how they feel about politics. It is examining the recent increase in political engagement and asking how it can be sustained. While the project aims to consult as many people as possible in Wales, it has a particular focus on seeking views from people who do not vote (or vote sporadically) and hearing their stories. ERS Cymru is collaborating with partners who provide services to groups who tend to be overrepresented among non-voters.
20. The project has over 20 partners at present including the Welsh Government, National Assembly for Wales, the Muslim Council for Wales and national charities such as Llamau and Chwarae Teg. The project is using a variety of methods, such as online surveys, online group chats and focus groups. The findings of the project will be reported in the autumn and we are happy to provide the Committee with further details of these findings.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

21. The Society is firmly of the view that high-quality citizenship education is important – both as a means of deepening public involvement in our democracy and as a way of equipping tomorrow’s voters with the knowledge and skills needed to play a full role in civic life. In January of this year the Electoral Reform Society hosted a roundtable with organisations involved in citizenship education from across Great Britain, including the Association for Citizenship Teaching, ClearView Research, Bite the Ballot, the Political Studies Association, DemSoc, the British Youth Council, the Modern Studies Association, the Scottish Government, University College London, the Educational Institute of Scotland, the Citizenship Foundation, National Citizen Service and Beijing Normal University. In our responses below we outline some of the issues raised at that roundtable.

State of play in England, Scotland and Wales

22. There are national differences in citizenship curriculum frameworks. Citizenship education in Wales is not a stand-alone subject. It is delivered through Personal and Social Education, Education for Sustainable Development and Global Citizenship and the Welsh Baccalaureate. School councils are compulsory in Wales – a measure supported by the Society.

23. Scotland’s Curriculum for Excellence has an aim to develop ‘responsible citizenship’ with a focus on educating for citizenship, not citizenship education. Space is given in Scottish classrooms to discuss political issues – and this has been key to future participation. The independence referendum was a tipping point for political literacy. Votes at 16 has made a big impact on interest in having vibrant, informed discussions in Scotland’s schools.

24. It is at present difficult to assess citizenship education in England. Ofsted reporting on citizenship (and other subjects) has stopped. QCA used to survey schools but it closed in 2010. The Department for Education longitudinal study on citizenship has ended.

25. Roundtable attendees viewed the Government’s focus on National Citizen Service as positive.

Citizenship education in practice

26. Practical issues raised in our roundtable regarding the teaching of citizenship education included the time and status given to citizenship education in schools and the spread of qualified citizenship teachers and quality of teaching.
27. Roundtable participants felt that citizenship education should be issue-led; that young people need to see reasons why active citizenship works. Getting people practised at doing democracy is important and needs to start as young as possible. It was also felt that there is an opportunity to connect young people to citizenship through devolution and new institutions. Brexit and the introduction of new laws present another opportunity to engage young people with current affairs they find interesting. Skilling young people to look at news sources more critically is particularly important in the ‘post-truth’ context.

Democratic Schools Initiative

28. A further recent undertaking of the Society’s is the ‘Democratic Schools Initiative’ led by ERS Scotland. Students can get the best experience of democratic participation by seeing it affect one of the most important parts of their lives: their school day. Across the world there are hundreds of examples of democratically run schools, where students make collective decisions about the way that their classes, their curriculum and their school buildings are run. The ‘democratic school’ is about empowering students to take an active stake in their schools, fostering a culture of participation and trust in the life of the school, and student leadership. It is informal learning, so it does not need to be branded as ‘doing politics’. ERS Scotland will be developing this stream of work over the next year and would be happy to provide further details to the Committee.

Citizenship education – inside and out with the classroom

Summary

The evidence here highlights the potential of mini-publics to enhance inclusive citizen engagement. Mini-publics assemble small groups of randomly selected citizens to deliberate, and make recommendations, on a policy issue. They help overcome significant barriers to achieving more inclusive citizen engagement:

1. Many citizens lack the inclination to participate. However, because mini-publics use random selection and invite specific citizens they are more likely to participate. If they decline the invite they are replaced by someone with similar demographics.
2. Citizens also lack the time to participate, but mini-publics can lower the barriers to participation. We all have other commitments including work, family and a social life and understandably many people are reluctant to sacrifice their limited and valuable time to participate in politics, especially when their participation may be inconsequential. Paying participants (which is often the case in mini-publics) helps them find the time, and mini-publics are usually held at weekends to make this easier.
3. There is a socio-economic bias to political participation with white, middle-aged, middle-class men generally most likely to participate, although the key determinant for political participation is education. The more education a person has undertaken the more likely they are to participate in politics. Random sampling removes the socio-economic bias. The whole point is that the participating citizens are descriptively representative of the broader public.
4. When citizens do participate, they are usually uninformed. This is partly due to the fact that if their participation is unlikely to be consequential there is little incentive to make the effort to become informed. However, this potentially enables politicians and the media to unduly influence and manipulate public opinion. Mini-publics provide participants with information from a range of perspectives, and gives them the chance to question experts and discuss the evidence. The incentive and opportunity to become informed is also created as citizens in a mini-public can influence policy if connected to institutions like Parliament.
5. Due to a combination of all these factors, when opportunities to participate beyond the ballot box are extended to citizens, specific interests mobilise their support and capture these processes, meaning they are not representative of the whole public.

Random sampling means mini-publics tend to include non-partisan participants and the possibility of capture by special interests is reduced significantly.

6. There are problems of scale. In the UK the numbers of citizens, geographically dispersed, present significant logistical challenges to ensure inclusive and meaningful political participation in the public policy process. Through random sampling an economy of scale is achieved as only a relatively small number of citizens are required to participate, but this sample is representative of the broader public.

1. Introduction

1.1 This paper introduces a range of democratic innovations known as ‘mini-publics’ and outlines key features, how they work, and how they may improve opportunities for citizens to engage with parliament.

1.2 The idea of mini-publics was first proposed four decades ago by political scientist Robert Dahl (1989). Inspired by democratic ideals and social science principles, Dahl envisioned an innovative mechanism for involving citizens in dealing with public issues. He called it ‘minipopulus’: an assembly of citizens, demographically representative of the larger population, brought together to learn and deliberate on a topic in order to inform public opinion and decision-making.

1.3 A growing number of democratic innovations have flourished around the world based on this idea (see Elstub 2014; Grönlund et al 2014; Elstub and Escobar forthcoming), from Citizens’ Juries, to Planning Cells, Consensus Conferences, Deliberative Polls and Citizens’ Assemblies (see Table 1). Mini-publics have been used to deal with topics ranging from constitutional and electoral reform, to controversial science and technology, and myriad social issues (e.g. health, justice, planning, sectarianism).

1.4 In this submission of evidence we highlight how mini-publics are particularly suitable at addressing questions 7 and 9 in the call for submissions. Namely, how can parliament help increase civic engagement and in particular how can those less inclined to participate be engaged to ensure diversity.

2. What is a mini-public?

2.1 Mini-publics are made up of randomly selected citizens, for instance, chosen by lot from the electoral roll or a similar source that may function as a proxy for the relevant population. The principle here is that everyone affected by the topic in question has an equal chance of being selected, and this underpins the legitimacy of the process. Participants are typically selected through stratified random sampling, so that a range of demographic characteristics from the broader population are adequately represented –e.g. age, gender, ethnicity, disability, income, geography, education, religion, and so on. The purpose is to use social science methods to assemble a microcosm of ‘the public’, a mini-public, with each citizen having an equal chance of being selected. Smaller mini-publics are not intended to be statistically representative of the population, but are still demographically diverse. Participants are remunerated, the discussions are facilitated, and experts provide evidence and advocacy of relevant information and positions and are then cross-examined by the lay citizens. They are usually issue specific, and dissolved as soon as the issue has been deliberated on. Despite these common features, there are a variety of types of mini-public, covered briefly in turn below.

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

Citizens' Juries

2.2 Citizens juries (CJs) were first established in 1971 in the USA by Ned Crosby of the Jefferson Centre, but have been employed in many other countries since then including the UK, Netherlands, Ireland, France and Australia. They can cost between £10,000 and £30,000 depending on various factors (e.g. duration, geography). Approximately, 12-25 participants are assembled for 2 to 5 days to discuss an issue and produce a collective recommendation or 'verdict'. CJs can be designed to provide jurors with some control over the process including choice of witness experts and the nature of interaction with them.

Consensus Conferences

2.3 The Danish Board of technology devised Consensus Conferences (CCs) in the late 1980s in order to advise parliamentarians on science and technology issues. Although they originated in Denmark, and the vast majority have been held there, they have been employed in a number of countries including Australia, Argentina, New Zealand, Korea, Israel, Japan, Canada, UK and the USA. They cost between £30,000 and £100,000 and involve 10-25 citizens selected by stratified random sampling. Danish consensus conferences, are divided into two stages. Firstly, citizens meet for a series of preparatory weekends to learn about the topic, the process, and the group, and to select the experts and interest groups from a list to advise and present to the citizens in the second stage of the conference. The second stage lasts around four days and the citizens hear the presentations from their selected advocates and experts before questioning them and then compiling a collective report which outlines their collective decision. Both consensus conferences and CJs (at least in the USA) use an external advisory committee that selects the citizens, compiles the list of experts from which the citizens choose, develops information packs and selects facilitators. This committee tends to be made up of academics, practitioners, issue experts, and interest group representatives.

Planning Cells

2.4 Planning cells (PCs) originated in Germany and were created by Peter Dienel, of the Research Institute for Citizens' Participation at the University of Wuppertal in Germany in the 1970s. PCs have predominantly been held on urban planning in Germany but also in Austria, Switzerland, Spain and the USA. They cost between US £90,000 and £120,000. A series of Planning cells, usually 6-10, with about 25 citizens participating in each run concurrently on the same issue for about four days, usually resulting in 100-500 citizens participating in total. This is not exclusive to PCs as CJs have also been run concurrently on the same issues, but where it is the norm with PCs it is an exception for CJs. They are also facilitated differently to CJs and CCs, with the facilitators more likely to be issue rather than process specialists. The planning cell convenors then aggregate all the preferences across all the cells into a report, which is then approved by a selection of the citizens from the various cells, before being published and distributed to relevant decision-makers and stakeholders.

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

Deliberative Polls

2.5 The deliberative poll was first set up by James Fishkin and the Center for Deliberative Polling in 1988. A deliberative Poll (DP) with its more representative 130-500 sample is designed to show what the public would think about the issues if it had time to learn about them and consider a range of perspectives. The first ever DP in the world was held in the UK in 1994, since then they have been run in many countries including Canada, USA, Denmark, Hungary, Bulgaria, Greece, Brazil, Australia and China, as well as in transnational contexts (i.e. European Union). They cost approximately £200,000. The process involves taking a probability sample of voters, surveying their opinions on an issue, sending them balanced information about the topic in question, gathering them together to discuss the issues with each other in small groups and with a balanced range of experts in plenary sessions, and then surveying their opinions again. Ideally they are televised, or at least receive broad media coverage to contribute to informing the broader public. The participants' preferences are aggregated, as they are not required to come to a collective decision themselves, through deliberation, as in CJs and CCs.

Citizens' Assemblies

2.6 Citizens' Assemblies (CAs) are the newest (since 2004) and potentially the most radical and democratically robust of all the mini-public types developed to date. They are difficult to assess as there have only been a handful of cases, notably in British Columbia, Ontario (both in Canada), the Netherlands and Ireland. The two Canadian cases preceded a referendum on electoral reform, for which the assembly determined the options on the referendum, as well as making recommendations for the referendum outcome. In the Dutch case the citizens' recommendation was passed to the government for consideration. The Irish case is the most recent, and it was innovative because it included not only citizens but also parliamentarians working with them. One of the well-known outcomes was the referendum on same-sex marriage. An assembly can last months or even a year. The cases so far have typically assembled 100-160 participants. In all the assemblies the citizens were selected randomly from the electoral register, a further random selection is then made from those who express an interest in participating, meaning they are not strictly a random sample. Nevertheless, it is still considered that all these assemblies were representative of the broader population in terms of age, gender and geographical location. The process progresses in three phases: the learning phase which takes several weekends and enables participants to get to grips with the complexities of the issues under consideration, the consultation phases where the randomly chosen citizens run public hearings in their local constituencies to gather information and opinions from other members of the public, and the deliberative phase when the citizens discuss the evidence and agree their final proposal. Following the deliberation, a vote amongst the participants is usually conducted to decide a final outcome of the assemblies.

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

3. How do mini-publics work?

Typically, a mini-public comprises five stages:

3.1 Planning and recruitment. Usually, a Stewarding Committee oversees the process to ensure its quality and fairness. For instance, in the Canadian Citizens' Assemblies on Electoral Reform, the Committee included academics and public figures from a range of backgrounds and opposing views. Often, mini-publics deal with divisive topics, and thus their legitimacy and impact hinge on the buy-in from a range of voices across divides – as well as the public standing of their guarantors, stewards and funders.

3.2 Learning phase. Participants are supported to learn about the topic from diverse perspectives. This can be done by combining time for individual learning (e.g. citizens receive information packages agreed by the Stewarding Committee), with time for group learning. During the latter, they are exposed to a range of evidence, views and testimonies covering the topic from various angles. Depending on the topic, this may include experts, officials, politicians, activists, and stakeholder representatives of various sorts (e.g. business, third sector, communities). Participants are empowered to interrogate these 'witnesses', and sometimes to choose them from a list prepared by the Stewarding Committee – who oversees that the mini-public is exposed to a balanced range of evidence and views.

3.3 Deliberative phase. Aided by impartial facilitators and recorders, participants then engage in small group face-to-face deliberation where they reconsider their initial ideas on the topic in the light of the evidence and testimonies from the learning phase, but also with respect to the arguments and experiences of their fellow deliberators.

3.4 Decision-making phase. The learning and deliberative work from previous stages enables participants to engage in considered judgement and informed decision-making. Depending on the topic, and the type of mini-public, this may lead to a particular recommendation or decision, which must be articulated through reasoned arguments in the final report or statement. That is the case in consensus-oriented mini-publics such as Citizens' Juries – which, like court juries, respond to a 'charge' – as well as Consensus Conferences and Citizen Assemblies. In research-focussed mini-publics, such as Deliberative Polls, the aim is not to reach consensus, but to measure through pre- and post- surveys how citizens' preferences may change through learning and deliberation.

3.5 Follow up. The focus in this stage is impact. Ideally, the mini-public has already been in the 'public eye' from its inception. One way to ensure impact is to involve key public figures and broadcasters in the process and Stewarding Committee. In this final stage, the outcomes and outputs of the mini-public are shared through all relevant networks, thus informing broader public deliberation and decision-making.

4. What is the point of mini-publics?

4.1 Mini-publics seek to answer a fundamental question: How would the public deal with an issue if they had the time and resources to learn and deliberate about it in order to reach an informed decision? As a method, it counters the criticism that survey research only provides snapshots of uninformed opinion by members of the public who may know little about an issue, or may not have even thought about it. Surveys are excellent to aggregate individual knowledge and opinion, but don't help to foster evidence-informed public deliberation, nor provide insight into the development of citizenship skills and social learning. Mini-publics can also avoid some typical pitfalls in public engagement processes, including:

- Self-selection and lack of representativeness. Most engagement methods attract self-selected participants of certain demographic characteristics, and struggle to reach a cross-section of the population.
- Poor quality of interaction and communication. In mini-publics, expert facilitation is instrumental to avoid the usual problems of many forums: dominant voices, silenced views, confrontational dynamics, lack of thinking time (reflex responses), shallow exchanges, rehearsed monologues, pre-packaged arguments, lack of opportunities to learn about diverse views, and so on (see Escobar 2011).
- Need for division of labour. Not everyone can participate in everything all the time. Mini-publics can function as proxies for the broader public, and citizens can use them as points of reference for their deliberations, e.g.: 'I don't have the time to engage substantially with this issue, but these recommendations were prepared by citizens like myself, so...' Good examples of this are the recent Citizens' Initiative Review model in Oregon and California, where citizens examine new proposed legislation and distil the pros and cons into a booklet that goes to every household prior to a ballot.

4.2 Mini-publics can also contribute to the development of a range of other democratic goods such as encouraging longer term levels of civic engagement; developing the capacity (self-efficacy) of 'ordinary' citizens to learn, deliberate and decide on complex issues; and providing an opportunity for citizens to learn and consider evidence on complex public policy problems. Our own research findings (having conducted 7 mini-publics³¹²) resonate strongly with a core message from decades of research on such participatory processes. Namely: when citizens are given the time, resources and support to learn and deliberate about public issues, they can engage with complex debates and collectively make considered judgements.

³¹² See for example Roberts and Escobar (2015) or more recently: <http://www.healthinequalities.net>

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

4.3 If citizens' capacity is not in question, how about institutional capacity? Are our institutions fit for involving citizens? Here we face the problem of scale, or what Dahl (1998:109) calls the "law of time and numbers": "The more citizens a democratic unit contains, the less that citizens can participate directly in government decisions and the more that they must delegate authority to others". This partly explains why our democracy relies so much on intermediaries – i.e. people who speak on behalf of others.

4.4 This is not a problem in the case of elected representatives insofar they are deemed to have a democratic mandate to speak on behalf of citizens. However, there are myriad other influential players involved in contemporary policymaking, including those who claim to speak on behalf of certain publics or communities of place, practice and/or interest. Their role makes consultation somewhat easier because it provides identifiable interlocutors that can be brought around a table. Another advantage is that they can develop specialist knowledge and expertise on the relevant issues. How else can the undefined and (sometimes) uninformed public be brought into the process? Nevertheless, citizens in democracies around the world are becoming more educated, more critical and less deferential to traditional notions of authority – the level of civic aspiration and expectation is on the rise (Norris 2011) and citizens may feel underrepresented or misrepresented in a democracy overly reliant on intermediaries.

4.5 Decision makers willing to collaborate directly with citizens and communities thus face the challenges of scale and expertise. Mini-publics are one of many democratic innovations that seek to overcome those challenges. Mini-publics address the problem of scale by involving small but diverse groups of citizens. They are selected by lot, so that everyone has an equal probability of participating, which reduces the self-selection bias that gives undue influence to small sections of the population. Mini-publics also address the challenge of expertise by including an Information Phase to enable participants to develop an understanding of the issues to engage in informed deliberation. These features give mini-publics a democratic edge over traditional public consultation processes.

5. Using mini-publics in Parliament

5.1 Mini-publics can provide a unique bridge between citizens, experts and law makers. On the one hand, mini-publics can work as a direct advisory body to parliamentarians, articulating judgements and recommendations based on deliberation that draws on diverse views, knowledge and experiences. On the other, mini-publics can support communities to engage with decision-making in at least two ways. As part of the process, participants can be supported to act as facilitators of public forums in their communities, thus bringing into the mini-public a range of local perspectives. In this way, the deliberative process is expanded beyond the group of people serving at the mini-public. The mini-public thus becomes a catalyst for a broader public engagement process, which contributes to enrich the pool of arguments considered, while stimulating deliberation in communities. Mini-publics can also support communities by functioning as ‘trusted proxies’ or ‘honest brokers’ that clear the ground by distilling the pros, cons and trade-offs of an issue or law into balanced information that can be shared with local communities as a resource and stimulus for participation. A similar logic has been applied in Oregon as part of their ballot initiative system for new legislation (Gastil et al 2014).

5.2 This triple function (advisor, catalyst, honest broker) may be a starting point for institutional design. We avoid being too prescriptive here, because adapting and embedding mini-publics into existing democratic procedures will require the know-how of institutional entrepreneurs grounded in the context of Parliament. Some of the existing generic suggestions that Parliament could consider include utilising mini-publics to contribute to the preparation of draft legislation and to supplement parliamentary debates, with the hope that the mini-publics will have ‘a significant influence on the outcome of parliamentary debates’ (Steiner 2014). In addition, they could also scrutinise the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government (Leib 2004) and review and revise government legislation. This could be achieved by enabling mini-publics to formally feed into the select committee process (Hendriks and Kay 2017).

6. Frequently asked questions

How do citizens feel about mini-publics?

6.1 A recent study by Chwalisz (2015) suggests that citizens are open and supportive of the idea of using mini-publics. In our research (Roberts and Escobar 2015), the citizens involved became enthusiastic supporters of the process. This is no indication of what non-participants may think, but suggests that using mini-publics more frequently may foster a virtuous circle of support for using mini-publics. In our research, after experiencing the process, 93% of participants thought that citizens are able to make decisions on complex issues. Participants highlighted three necessary conditions for their trust in the process: diversity of views, quality of evidence and effective facilitation. These are conditions that can be approached to a high standard in mini-publics.

6.2 Our research also shows that participants had confidence that another group of citizens involved in a similar process would produce similar recommendations. Participants placed great trust in fellow citizens and also indicated that if authorities used mini-publics in decision-making the outcomes would be fairer. It appears that people may well accept an outcome which they did not agree to if they have confidence that it was reached through a fair process. Similar findings are seen in experimental research on (court) jury deliberations, which indicate that ‘procedural justice’ – i.e. the perception that the decision-making process was fair – leads to increased support for the group’s decision (Delli Carpini et al 2004:327).

How do interest groups feel about mini-publics?

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

6.3 A key aspect of mini-publics is that they seek to recast the role of interest groups in decision-making. The goal of public deliberation is “to improve the legitimacy of democracy by making democratic institutions systematically responsive to reasons, not just the weight of numbers or the power of interests” (Parkinson 2012:170). Mini-publics use random selection to ensure diversity and thus “reduce the influence of elites, interest advocates and the ‘incensed and articulate’” (Hendriks 2011: Location 945). However, mini-publics should not be seen as a way of bypassing, co-opting or placating activists and advocates. Indeed, interest advocates play a central role in this type of process, as Stewarding Committee members and/or as witnesses who present evidence and arguments. What changes in mini-publics is the interactive setting where advocates scrutinise each other and the mode of engagement between advocates and citizens.

What is the role of elected representatives?

6.4 Elected representatives have a crucial role to play in convening and working closely with mini-publics. For instance, elected members may commission a mini-public as the advisory body and focal point of a broader public engagement process for the scrutiny or development of new legislation or policy. Elected members would be responsible to take the recommendations into parliamentary committees to inform deliberations and final decisions at Westminster.

6.5 Another option is to include representatives working alongside citizens in the mini-public. However, this may present risks to the quality of interaction and deliberation. For instance, the risk that some politicians may dominate the discussions, that citizens may feel less comfortable contributing and that interaction may become characterised by partisan competition and rhetoric rather than meaningful deliberation. Nonetheless, some evidence that mixing citizens and representatives can work well has been found in mini-publics in Italy (Fiket and Memoli, 2013:139) and Ireland (Honohan 2014), but this is an area that deserves further research.

6.6 Mini-publics may offer welcome assistance to elected members facing the multiple challenges of representing citizens in a context of declining trust in politics and public institutions. Collaborating with mini-publics may add transparency, accountability and deliberative power to their work, and potentially build public trust and perceived legitimacy for their decisions. Deliberative public engagement may also help to overcome the challenge of ensuring that citizens judge legislation and decisions on their merits, rather than on partisan cues. Arguably, mini-publics could increase deliberative quality by functioning as ‘honest brokers’ that citizens and communities can rely on to evaluate competing arguments – and this offers an additional resource to the cues that citizens already receive from their preferred political party.

And what about accountability and legitimacy?

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

6.7 Is it democratic to give such powers (e.g. knowledge brokering, direct advice to legislators) to citizen forums without traditional lines of accountability? Deliberative theorists understand accountability as a matter of ‘giving an account’ for the reasons that underpin a decision (Gutmann and Thompson 1996: Chapter 4). Accountability is thus underpinned by the principle of justification, which presses those engaged in deliberation to make decisions that can be reasonably justified to those bound or affected by them.

6.8 If mini-publics are used as part of a legislative process, at least four lines of accountability can be at play. Firstly, participants scrutinise each other’s arguments and reasons thus holding each other accountable. Secondly, they can also be made accountable to their communities by having to publicly justify the mini-public’s conclusions. If, as mentioned earlier, participants are supported to facilitate forums in their communities, and feed broader views into the mini-public, then a crucial step is to return to the community and give a reasoned account of the results. This publicity and transparency thus makes the mini-public more accountable. Thirdly, organisers and facilitators can be accountable to the Stewarding Committee that oversees the fairness of the process. Finally, the Stewarding Committee and the participants are ultimately accountable to the convening body – and if this is a representative institution like Parliament, then the circle of accountability can be formally closed with the ultimate decision-making power in the hands of elected members. Therefore, mini-publics can be designed to ensure accountability, both in deliberative and representative terms. Nevertheless, the lack of traditional accountability (i.e. a principal-agent bond between an individual and a constituency) can actually give an advantage to mini-publics in terms of deliberative quality: “randomly selected participants have few or no obligations to a constituency and are therefore free to consider the arguments on all sides of the debate” (Hendriks 2011: Location 950).

6.9 Ultimately, the perceived legitimacy of mini-publics as democratic bodies will depend greatly on how the story of legitimacy is told. And here is where the role of the media is essential. Unfortunately, there has been scarce attention to the importance of the media in developing democratic innovations. New democratic practices require new media narratives, and these may be prevented if mini-publics are covered using the tropes of traditional political reporting (i.e. ‘winners and losers’, ‘governing by focus group’, citizen involvement as an ‘abdication of responsibility’). The value of mini-publics is amplified when their work and conclusions can become a stimulus for broader public deliberation via the media. Otherwise, they can be rendered as isolated instances, rather than integral parts of a deliberative system. The more mini-publics are used routinely in Parliamentary activities, the more media attention they are likely to attract. The media have an important role to play in terms of scrutiny – but again, the standards for this must be appropriate for deliberative processes, rather than simply borrowed from the world of partisan politics.

Aren’t these innovations too expensive?

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

6.10 Mini-publics have been used in the UK before, but have not become part of mainstream public engagement. As Smith (2009:106) explains, there was some enthusiasm at the start of the 1997 New Labour government, but the Cabinet Office responded to increasing calls for mini-publics arguing that they are too expensive. In 2001, the House of Commons Select Committee on Public Administration reiterated support for mini-publics arguing that the government’s argument “fails to take account of the cost – sometimes a very high cost – which can be attached to rushed decisions based on contested scientific judgements” (quoted in Smith 2009:106). However, price must be placed in the context of value. If mini-publics are framed and designed as ‘add-ons’, rather than as integral part of the parliamentary system, then they can be seen as expensive

6.11 There are ways of reducing the price of mini-publics. They are costly partly because they are not systematically used. If they were to be mainstreamed, there are economies of scale and savings to be made by developing in-house expertise and resources on the most expensive aspects (e.g. recruitment; facilitation; design; logistics). Besides, it may be also a question of shifting the overall approach to public engagement – i.e. instead of carrying out hundreds of consultations, resources could be shifted to fewer but higher quality deliberative processes on the most pressing issues. Moreover, if they help improve decision-making, as the House of Commons Public Administration Committee argued, the price tag may become small compared to the return on investment. In this vein, institutional entrepreneurs may be able to reframe ‘price’ as a matter of ‘investment’ in deepening democracy to achieve better outcomes for the UK.

And how about public apathy?

6.12 There is an ongoing research debate about the extent to which citizens are actually willing to participate more actively in politics and policymaking –or whether they would rather leave it to trusted elites and intermediaries (see Hibbing and Theiss-Morse 2002; Neblo et al 2010). Sometimes ‘public apathy’ is invoked to justify the status quo although, as Eliasoph (1998) has argued, public apathy is not a natural occurrence and takes hard work to produce. From this perspective, the problem is not that citizens are apathetic, but rather that our democratic systems may have become proficient at generating apathy.

6.13 Our research (e.g. Roberts and Escobar 2015) has shown that citizens of all backgrounds can enjoy addressing complex issues when they are adequately supported to do so as part of a fair and engaging process. This echoes research showing that people “really do like politics, if given the chance to properly engage with it, at least under deliberative contexts” (Curato and Niemeyer 2013:375). The UK has a vibrant public sphere, rich in political talk across civic networks, public forums, church halls, pubs, kitchen tables... The question is whether the benefits of public deliberation can and should be harnessed more systemically to improve parliamentary work.

7. Conclusion

Stephen Elstub (Lecturer in British Politics, Newcastle University) & Oliver Escobar (University of Edinburgh & What Works Scotland) – written evidence (CCE0125)

7.1 Mini-publics can provide citizens with new opportunities to participate in the parliamentary process in the UK. Because they use random selection to recruit citizen participants they are particularly successful at ensuring a diversity of participants are engaged including those from BME groups and others that are typically less politically engaged. Different types of mini-public can be used in different contexts, for example different policy issues or various stages of the legislative process. The mini-public model offers the only way we know to answer a key question: How would an informed cross-section of the public assess new legislation after balanced learning, substantial deliberation and considered judgement? This is not to suggest that mini-publics are the only relevant type of innovation that can increase citizen engagement and open up opportunities for citizen influence on public policy and legislation. Nevertheless, they do provide distinct and unique advantages and can be used in combination with other new and traditional forms of participation and representation that already exist in the UK.

7.2 In terms of broader impact, mini-publics can contribute to raise the level of public dialogue and deliberation in various ways. In current debates, it is common to hear concerns about the ‘uninformed public’, the ‘distorting media context’, and the lack of opportunities to ‘get a fair hearing’ for all perspectives. Furthermore, citizens can also feel uninspired to engage with public issues due to a lack of safe spaces for learning and deliberation, and the absence of new and trusted points of reference to guide their judgements. A robust mini-public can provide that ‘safe space’ and ‘trusted point of reference’. The impact of a mini-public is not necessarily limited to the selected citizens, those involved through internet channels that feed into the process, or those reached by outputs or through the media. There is a ‘capacity-building’ dimension that can further multiply the effects of the process. For instance, everyone involved (participants, organisers, experts, witnesses, etc) can learn new ways of working through collaborative inquiry and deliberative communication, and take that back to their respective workplaces and communities. In particular, there is scope for including a training programme in facilitation skills not only for the facilitators but also for everyone involved. In the British Columbia Citizens Assembly on Electoral Reform, for example, participants were encouraged to facilitate public hearings in their communities – spread across the province- so that they could then bring a range of other views to inform deliberations at the mini-public.

7.3 In sum, mini-publics are innovative in their principles, methodology and outcomes, and can help to improve citizen engagement and deliberation at Westminster and beyond. Drawing on existing evidence from the UK and around the world, the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement is uniquely placed to consider how these deliberative innovations may deepen and strengthen our democracy.

Equality and Human Rights Commission – written evidence (CCE0183)

Executive summary

1. The Equality and Human Rights Commission (the Commission) welcomes this opportunity to contribute to the call for evidence of the Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. Our submission focuses on the role of human rights and equality in education to encourage good citizenship, and sets out recommendations to enhance the curriculum in this regard.
2. The Commission considers that human rights provide a comprehensive global framework of universal values that we share in the United Kingdom. Human rights underpin a society that respects the dignity and worth of every individual, and are at the heart of the values we hold dear as a country. Britain has a long history of upholding people's rights, valuing diversity and challenging intolerance. At this moment of significant constitutional change, it is vital that the government sets out a positive vision for the kind of country we want to be after we leave the European Union, and puts in place measures that build on our heritage of respect and inclusion and ensure we are a country that benefits everyone.
3. Education about human rights and equality creates space in schools for students to learn about rights and responsibilities, and to discuss decisions made by public bodies that will impact on their lives. Human rights and equality education can enable and encourage young people to take a full part in our democratic society and promote meaningful civic engagement. Learning about rights, such as freedom of expression and the right to free elections, helps individuals better appreciate the role they can play in a democratic society.³¹³ Moreover, an essential element of human rights and equality education is the understanding and valuing of diversity, which can foster intercultural dialogue and promote social cohesion, a pursuit which is vital in the context of the divisions generated during the EU Referendum and the subsequent spike in hate crime incidents.³¹⁴

4. The Commission considers that comprehensive teaching of human rights and equality can help instil shared values in young people, tackle prejudiced attitudes about difference, and give children an understanding of the value that human rights can bring in building a society based on fairness and mutual respect. Whilst there are examples of good human rights and equality teaching, we believe there is a need for better and more comprehensive coverage of these issues in the school curriculum.

Creating a rights-respecting culture in schools and beyond

5. As we prepare to leave the EU, it is important that we consider the kind of country we want to be and set a positive vision for our future and prosperity. Building on our heritage of respect and inclusion, the Commission is encouraging all political parties to protect and promote equality and human rights in the UK. Our ‘5 point plan’ for equality and human rights after Brexit sets out concrete steps to build on the UK’s strong legal framework and bring the nation together behind shared values.³¹⁵ In this context, it is vital that we also work with young people to show that our values of respect, fairness and challenging intolerance are central to our national identity. Human rights teaching can provide a more comprehensive framework for achieving this than a sole focus on ‘British values’, which are narrowly defined as ‘democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs'.³¹⁶ This restrictive definition implies that those outside of Britain may not share these values, and that the full range of universal human rights are not British values, to potentially harmful effect on social and community cohesion at home, and our reputation abroad.

³¹⁴ There was a 57 per cent increase in reporting of hate crime to the police online reporting portal, True Vision, compared with the same period in the previous month, with 85 reports made from Thursday 23 June to Sunday 26 June compared with 54 reports in the corresponding four days in May. True Vision is a third-party hate crime reporting website supported by all police forces in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. (Karen Bradley, 29 June 2016. Unfortunately, no national statistics on the prevalence of racist/religiously motivated incidents in English schools have been available since 2010/11, when the Department for Education removed the requirement on schools to report racist incidents to their local authority. We have consistently called for improvements in the recording and reporting of all forms of identity-based bullying in all schools across Great Britain.

6. Recent evidence suggests that children are still victims of prejudice-based bullying, in particular because of their race, ethnicity or religion.³¹⁷ The United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child has expressed concern that identity-based bullying is a widespread problem in the UK. It has highlighted the need for awareness raising and training to ensure the school environment reflects the principles of human rights, peace, tolerance, dignity and respect, and that efforts to tackle bullying and violence in schools should be intensified, including through human rights education.³¹⁸ This is particularly important given the rise of cyberbullying, particularly on the basis of people's protected characteristics.³¹⁹

7. Human rights education aims to build an understanding of and appreciation for human rights that can instil young people with positive and open-minded attitudes, which is increasingly important in our ever more diverse society. It enables learners to acquire the knowledge and skills to defend their own rights, and settle disagreements in a manner that respects the rights of others. Human rights education can create a valuable framework for good inter-personal relations and for helping young people become active citizens and make balanced, informed choices. For example, research suggests that, where schools have adopted a rights-based approach to education (focusing on rights, respect and responsibility), it has led to enhanced citizenship values and behaviours,³²⁰ and that a ‘child rights approach’ in particular can “empower both adults and children to take action to advocate for and apply these at the family, school, community, national and global levels”.³²¹

8. Education about equality is also essential, so that young people can learn about their rights, and understand both how they should be treated and how they should treat others as part of an open, democratic society. Teaching these topics in schools creates a safe place for students to explore, discuss, challenge and form their own opinions and values. Analysis of Unicef’s ‘Rights Respecting Schools Award’ contains strong evidence that the knowledge and respect of rights that students gain from this, combined with understanding, respect and tolerance for difference, can empower them to tackle prejudice, reduce bullying and prejudice-based bullying, improve relationships and make the most of their lives.³²²

9. Teaching human rights and equality also helps schools and teachers to deliver their legal duties under the Equality Act 2010 and Human Rights Act 1998. Under the Equality Act 2010, maintained schools and academies, including free schools, must have due regard to the public sector equality duty. This means that they must take active steps to identify and address issues of discrimination where there is evidence of prejudice, harassment or victimisation, lack of understanding, disadvantage, or lack of participation for individuals with protected characteristics. They must also have due regard to advancing equality of opportunity and fostering good relations between different people when carrying out their activities. Under the Human Rights Act 1998, public authorities, including schools, also have a legal duty to act in a way that is compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights. Developing students’ understanding of human rights and equality can help to tackle prejudiced and harmful behaviour such as bullying, helping schools and teachers to deliver their legal duties and nurture a generation of rights-respecting citizens.

10. In the context of schools’ duties to put systems in place to identify and address extremism,³²³ human rights teaching can be an effective tool to protect young people’s safety and freedom. Concerns have been raised that the Prevent duty is sometimes being implemented in ways that could undermine fundamental rights and freedoms, and stigmatise or alienate segments of staff and student populations.³²⁴ Schools should raise awareness of different cultural and religious practices and beliefs, and address the bases of prejudices and stereotyping, including through training on relevant and applicable equality and human rights obligations, in order to fulfil their duties in an effective and proportionate way.

Issues with current teaching

11. Citizenship is often taught alongside personal, social, health and economic (PSHE) education in schools, and the two subjects collectively are the main way in which human rights and equality issues are explicitly incorporated into the school curriculum. However, in England, citizenship is only a compulsory subject at local-authority schools at key stages 3 and 4, and a non-statutory subject with a national framework in primary schools. PSHE education is not currently compulsory.³²⁵ The Commission regrets that citizenship and PSHE are non-statutory at key stages 1 and 2, as it is never too early for children to start learning about identity, respect and tolerance, and healthy relationships.

12. We also have some concerns about the curriculum content as it stands. At present, there is no explicit teaching of equality other than ‘diverse national, regional, religious and ethnic identities’. This is not an accurate reflection of the protections against discrimination set out in UK law, since the Equality Act 2010 establishes nine protected characteristics as age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex, and sexual orientation. Department for Education guidance is largely restricted to issues of religion or belief,³²⁶ which is insufficient if teachers are to effectively address discrimination and intensify their efforts to tackle bullying and violence in schools.

13. At key stage 3, the citizenship curriculum covers ‘the precious liberties enjoyed by the citizens of the United Kingdom’. Taken alongside the teaching standards which oblige schools to promote ‘British values’, and the lack of explicit human rights coverage, the wording could be interpreted to suggest that certain human rights are not universal. We are concerned that this may encourage students to believe that those who are not British citizens are not entitled to the same human rights, that it implies that human rights consist only of liberties (and not also positive rights, such as the right to education), or that describing some universal human rights as British constructs creates a form of cultural supremacy. There is currently no mention of human rights in the Department for Education advice on British values.³²⁷

14. Students only learn about ‘human rights and international law’ as part of citizenship education at key stage 4. Research for Unicef suggests that where teaching does not make the link with children’s own rights, they may not learn about what it means to be a rights-holder or duty-bearer.³²⁸ In the absence of such clarity, children may not understand that they enjoy universal rights, including those contained in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), on the basis of simply being human and a child. If children are taught about their own rights, they are less likely to have “the impression that human rights are rights of adults and are mainly violated in faraway regions of the world”.³²⁹

Integrating human rights and equality education into the citizenship curriculum

15. Improvements should be made in order to ensure comprehensive coverage of human rights and equality elements in the school curriculum. We believe that the Committee should strongly consider recommending making citizenship education compulsory in all schools, from key stages 1 through 4, before children begin to formulate stereotyped views of the world, which may limit young people’s aspirations and participation, and propagate inequalities.³³⁰

16. Effective human rights education should help students develop the knowledge and skills, as well the attitudes and behaviours of human rights. Since citizenship education is the main way in which children and adolescents come into contact with human rights and equality in education, it is important that the quality of teaching and resources is enhanced.³³¹ It is vital that students are taught about the universality of human rights so that they understand that these rights belong to everybody, and to dispel the misleading and potentially harmful impression, created by the focus on ‘British values’ and ‘precious liberties’, that non-UK citizens do not enjoy the same human rights. This will help ensure that children understand their own rights and the complexities of balancing rights.

17. Students should be introduced to the principles of equality and non-discrimination as fundamental elements of international human rights law, but also explore in detail the nine protected characteristics contained in UK law to protect people from discrimination and promote equal opportunities.

18. As a signatory to the CRC, the UK is legally obliged (in international law) to teach about children’s rights, yet this requirement is not fully reflected in the school curriculum. UN human rights treaties like the CRC should be given further effect in UK and devolved law to enhance the domestic legal mechanisms for the protection of rights. The UK Government should give due consideration to the CRC when developing new policy or legislation in a way that is adequate and enforceable.³³²

19. Rooting human rights education more firmly within the context of the CRC may also encourage children to engage directly with their own rights, as well as with the rights of others.³³³ Explicit teaching of equality, diversity and non-discrimination within the citizenship curriculum is one way of achieving this.

20. Teaching children about their human rights empowers students to respect the rights of others locally, nationally and globally, and makes them more likely to make informed decisions and be active citizens.³³⁴ For example, Amnesty International has found that engaging schools to make equality, non-discrimination, inclusion, respect and dignity central to their school lives extends beyond the classroom and out into the community, changing the way people think about, and actively participate to address, human rights issues.³³⁵

About the Equality and Human Rights Commission

21. The Equality and Human Rights Commission is a statutory body established under the Equality Act 2006. It operates independently to encourage equality and diversity, eliminate unlawful discrimination, and protect and promote human rights. It contributes to making and keeping Britain a fair society in which everyone, regardless of background, has an equal

The Commission enforces equality legislation on age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex, and sexual orientation. The Equality Trust – written evidence (CCE0091)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

A sense of citizenship and an ability to take part in civic engagement are essential elements of social cohesion. The opposite of this would likely be a sense of alienation and an inability to take part in society which is damaging both for those who suffer this and for wider society at large. At its worst, alienation and disengagement can lead to ill health (mental and physical), poor choices and even violence. In broader societal terms, alienation and disengagement can lead to social fragmentation.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

The best way to encourage a sense of membership and belonging as well as a constructive, tolerant pride in our society would be to reduce the material differences between us. Vast amounts of academic evidence show that materially more equal countries have a higher level of trust than those that are more unequal as well as being healthier and less antisocial or violent. Trust is the essential bedrock for promoting civic engagement as it creates an atmosphere where people want to leave their homes and socialise with others. Good health is also massively important as it is much harder to travel beyond the front door and feel socially confident when in poor health. Fear of violence, discrimination, and anti-social behaviour is also a huge inhibitor of social interaction.

The UK urgently needs to embark on a national mission to reduce inequality and we strongly advocate that the government commits to a comprehensive Inequality Reduction Strategy, across all its departments, to deliver the fairer, better society we all need. This strategy should also be supported by a public-facing, national, Inequality Commission that can collect and collate evidence from the public and experts on how inequality affects people's everyday lives and how it might best be tackled.

See: <https://www.equalitytrust.org.uk/trust-participation-attitudes-and-happiness> and: <https://www.equalitytrust.org.uk/about-inequality/spirit-level>

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

We do not think that citizens can – or should – be compelled towards civic engagement. It is hard to think of a bigger admission of national failure than a state having to compel its citizens to be sociable. Such ideas are best left to totalitarian regimes, not democracies. Citizens should want to be engaged with their society and if they're not then the state should worry and seek to find out why. As outlined above, we think inequality is the major barrier to civic engagement and we therefore advocate a comprehensive, national, Inequality Reduction Strategy as being the best, long-term policy to promote civic engagement. At a time when there are threats to many employment and other human rights and when the UN Declaration of Human Rights is not being upheld, then it is surely incumbent upon the state to seek to attend to basic human rights before seeking to advocate a new conditionality.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

We support the introduction of proportional representation and an elected second chamber, as evidence shows that fair voting systems promote greater equality and greater political engagement.

See: <https://www.makevotesmatter.org.uk/proportional-representation/>

We would also support expanding the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds on the basis that many other entitlements are given to 16 year olds, not least the right to join the Armed Forces.

We also note that the continued existence of the monarchy perpetuates the notion of British people being subjects rather than citizens - and that the current constitutional construction of the UK includes all sorts of inequalities between the home nations. A new, written, federal constitution of equal states that redefined the role of the monarchy could helpfully promote a sense of equal citizenship, and therefore civic engagement, across the UK.

The current electoral system is open to fraud and abuse, we think digital options ought to be explored. The system's aim ought to be to enfranchise the largest number of those eligible to vote.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Some practical and age appropriate political education ought to be included in a statutory PSHE curriculum, to be mandatory (including RSE/SRE) across all types of primary and secondary schools, regardless of status. The proposal to drop Citizenship A Level, suggests that there is currently a lack of serious commitment to this subject.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Voluntary citizenship programmes can have a role to play but their likely success, in terms of the numbers and diversity of people attracted and the quality of work they do, is more likely to be related to the underlying health and wellbeing of the UK population. Confident and able volunteers are more likely to be found from populations that have high-levels of trust and are well-resourced, educated and healthy in the first place. A materially more equal society is the essential pre-condition here.

We would not support any element of compulsion and would question the value of a public citizenship ceremony as potentially prizing form over content. Political education around the institutions of the UK, the role of democracy and the importance of voting should be considered but we recognise the challenges in doing this in a fair and balanced way.

We question the term ‘active citizen’ and would like to see a definition. We suggest that many of the population are indeed, ‘active citizens’ but are not being measured or evaluated as such. For example, the caring duties family and other members undertake without payment, community action, informal sharing economies etc, all contribute to society.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

The national level Inequality Reduction Strategy that we called for earlier in this document could and should be mirrored by Fairness Commissions at local authority level and we note that there have been many such commissions set up in recent years. All policies at national and local level should be designed, wherever possible, to redistribute wealth, income and opportunity as widely as possible so these are not just enjoyed by a relatively small, affluent section of society, which is the case currently.

The Socio-economic Duty (struck out of the Equality Act 2010) that requires public bodies to have regard to socio-economic inequalities should be implemented immediately.

<https://www.equalitytrust.org.uk/%E2%80%98word-must-go-back-legislative-agenda>

Third sector organisations, campaign groups and individuals have a role to play in lobbying for such progressive changes and we are in the process of developing manifestos for national, local and individual level action to encourage this. We have also produced a general activist pack to this end:

<https://www.equalitytrust.org.uk/inequality-not-inevitable-our-new-guide-activists>

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Any society should strive for the maximum tolerance, kindness and respect between its citizens and communities as possible. We believe that the best guarantor of such values is to achieve greater material equality between its citizens. Income and wealth determine where people live, where they go to school and what sort of work and life chances they have.

Currently, our material inequality is actively corroding any sense of fellow-feeling as people's life experiences diverge so sharply and they find it difficult to relate to each other. In these circumstances, distrust and suspicion can grow and people and communities can turn in on themselves and become detached and/or resentful.

However, we do not subscribe to the idea of 'Fundamental British Values' that has been promoted by the Government, particularly within education. These values were not particularly British and were in contradiction to the Equality Act 2010. There was also no transparency about how Fundamental British Values had come to be defined.

The big threats to values and to the citizenship of individuals with protected characteristics and those of a lower socio-economic status, are structural racism, sexism, disablism, homo-, bi- and transphobia and discrimination which are embedded within institutions and some parts of society. Some aspects of the media play a part in amplifying structural discrimination and the UK's entrenched inequality embed them further within our society.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Many communities and groups feel left behind because they are, in fact, being left behind. The richest 1,000 people in the UK have as much wealth as the poorest 40% of households and FTSE 100 CEOs routinely earn around £5million a year while the average UK wage is £28k. With the rungs on the ladder this far apart it is little wonder that social mobility is severely lacking according to the government's own Social Mobility Commission. Citizenship is a two-way process; in order for people to engage in a positive way with the state, then the state must engage with its citizens in a positive way and protect and respect them.

This vast material inequality is now beginning to seep through to matters of life and death with life expectancy levels stalling and infant mortality rates beginning to rise. The fact that so much of the nation's wealth is (and is very acutely perceived and felt to be) concentrated in London and the South-East also aggravates this sense of being left behind in other parts of the UK. This is also compounded by disparities in income and wealth between old and young, urban and rural, white and BME communities as well as between men and women – all of which are component parts of our overall economic and social inequality.

The only way to overcome all these divisions between us is to actively plan to reduce them. We need the government to commit to a national mission of economic and social renewal based firmly on reducing the gap between rich and poor in the UK.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

The level of civic engagement is a function of the society around it. Evidence suggests that a materially more equal society is more conducive towards greater civic engagement and this, in turn, is supportive of closer communities.

The less economic inequality there is, the more diverse schools and workplaces will become and different communities will be brought together in common spaces. However, for this to happen at scale, it will require the creation of more mixed communities around those schools and workplaces. And this will only happen if material differences are compressed such that social segregation, by area, is reduced. Both ‘exclusive’ gated communities and so-called ‘sink’ estates must become relics of the past. We need to aim for genuinely mixed communities where income and wealth differences are not stark enough to be noticeable and are therefore unlikely to create misunderstanding, suspicion or resentment between people.

In addition to this, more diverse schools and workplaces (and we would add colleges and universities too) are unlikely to materialise unless our chronic social immobility problem can be fixed and the social classes can mix more than they do now. As the Institute for Fiscal Studies reported in 2011, it will be very hard to improve social mobility without tackling inequality first. We must also tackle structural discrimination in order to break down the hierarchies of power within workplaces and educational establishments. Fewer than 5% of school heads are non-white, and only 13% of teachers are from BME backgrounds.

See: <https://www.ifs.org.uk/publications/5541>

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second-generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

We think that ESOL classes are vitally important to help immigrants settle in the UK and we deplore the cuts to ESOL provision that have occurred in recent years. We support the call for a national, co-ordinated ESOL strategy as demanded by leading educationalists earlier this year:

<http://feweek.co.uk/2017/02/03/education-leaders-call-for-co-ordinated-national-esol-strategy/>

The major problem facing immigrants to the UK at the moment is the poisonous, xenophobic and racist atmosphere generated by some politicians and sections of the media. While these deserve special censure, we also note that very unequal countries, such as the UK, more generally provide a fertile breeding ground for intolerance and downward social discrimination (or scapegoating). In conditions of great inequality, people are forced to consider their own status within the social pecking order and in order to preserve or advance their status there can be a tendency to kick down on those around or below them. Immigrants to the UK tend to suffer from this.

Evangelical Alliance – written evidence (CCE0245)

SUMMARY

- Definitions of Citizenship (Q1-2). Evangelical Christians are highly engaged in our society, alongside a range of other groups with different views. Such respectful diversity of opinion, rather than uniformity, is an essential part of twenty-first-century citizenship.
- Rights and Duties of Citizenship (Q3). Reasonable accommodation of religious practices and respect for conscientious objection help religious believers to participate in society. We support the inclusion of a principle of reasonable accommodation in guidance to employers on faith and belief. Free speech is also an essential right for all citizens.
- Citizenship Education (Q5). Citizenship education must avoid an ideal of citizenship that sets itself in opposition to other identities. Instead it must engage with questions of shared citizenship mindful of the traditions and backgrounds of those being educated. Religious literacy is vital to modern citizenship and should be promoted.
- Citizenship Programmes (Q6). Voluntary civic activities are essential for strengthening good citizenship. However, any compulsory national programmes should only be explored after substantial consultation. Any reflection on citizenship should also emphasise strengthening families, within the context of civil society.
- Civic Engagement (Q7). Faith groups make a massive contribution to civil society through social action, as has been widely recognised. They also encourage people to volunteer in other civic roles and participate in our democracy. The Government should celebrate and collaborate with these efforts.
- British Values (Q8). While there is support among evangelicals for reflection on shared values, there are also concerns over any threat to fundamental freedoms. The language of ‘values’ contrasts with tolerance of diverse opinions in the wider UK population. A better focus may be on shared virtues and norms of behaviour.
- Marginalised Communities (Q9). While fierce disagreement is essential to our democracy, the place of religious believers in public life is sometimes questioned because of their views. This is profoundly alienating for the many UK citizens who share these religious views, and must be resisted.

- Citizenship and Integration (Q10). We believe that integration should focus on equipping people with the knowledge and skills needed to thrive in the UK, and on obedience to the law. This vision of integration is compatible with diversity of opinion, unlike terms such as ‘extremism’ and ‘British values’, which are less conducive to such diversity.

BACKGROUND

1. The Evangelical Alliance UK (hereafter ‘the Alliance’) is the largest and oldest body representing the UK’s two million evangelical Christians. Formed 170 years ago, in 1846, today we currently work across a diverse constituency of 81 denominations, 4,000 churches, 600 organisations and thousands of individual members. Members include those from reformed, charismatic and Pentecostal traditions, and are drawn from both denominational and independent churches. The growth of evangelical and Pentecostal churches in the UK despite the decline in established denominations has been noted by many, including in the Woolf Report.³³⁶
2. The Alliance is the founding member of the World Evangelical Alliance, which unites evangelical alliances based in different countries around the world, representing anywhere from 300 million to a billion evangelical Christians. This global reach reflects the influence of evangelical faith, which can also be seen in the huge social and ethnic diversity in British evangelical churches. The Alliance has sought to reflect this ethnic diversity and the concerns of such a diverse membership in networks such as the One People Commission (representing ethnic minority churches) and the South Asian Forum (representing some 75,000 British Christians of South Asian origin).
3. Throughout its history, the Alliance has been at the forefront of campaigns for Christian unity, religious liberty and social transformation. For example, in 2012, the Alliance facilitated a report by the All Party Parliamentary Group for Christians in Parliament, entitled ‘Clearing the Ground’. This report engaged with some of the challenges Christians faced in participating in the life of the UK.³³⁷ More recently, the Alliance has also published What Kind of Society? a document which seeks to encourage Christians to get involved in shaping society for the better.³³⁸

³³⁷ The report can be accessed here: <http://www.eauk.org/current-affairs/publications/clearing-the-ground.cfm>.

³³⁸ This can be found at www.eauk.org/wkos.

Q1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

4. As evangelical Christians, we believe ourselves to be good citizens in an authentically plural society. We recognise the importance of our democratic institutions and the rule of law, and celebrate the rights and freedoms we enjoy through them. This is reflected, for example, in a significantly higher proportion of evangelical Christians who vote.³³⁹ However, evangelical civic participation is not restricted to the political sphere, but also extends to supporting a wide range of social action initiatives, both nationally and locally (see paragraph 14 below).
5. Given that we are citizens in a diverse country, we affirm the need for a culture of civility and respect for others, regardless of ethnicity, religion or sexual orientation. We may disagree with those of other religions or lifestyles, but we do so courteously, acknowledging the rights allotted by law to different groups as much as our own freedoms. Opponents of religious faith sometimes characterise these disagreements (e.g. on same-sex marriage or the truth of different religions) as contrary to good citizenship. However, this assertion makes citizenship into an unrealistically uniform ideal in the UK in the 21st century, in which there is great political and religious diversity as well as diversity of background. A more robust and sustainable view of citizenship will allow for and celebrate religious and political diversity, and judge good citizenship by other criteria.

Q2: Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

6. Membership and belonging presuppose a distinctive construct to which one can belong. The values and identity of Britain as a society, shaped as they are by the historic contribution of Christianity, offer an obvious foundation for articulating a positive common vision of citizenship, from which a distinctive hospitality can be extended to the newcomer. Ceremonies which acknowledge the historic roots of British values and identity: the sovereignty of the Queen, the role and authority of parliament/s, assemblies and democratic institutions, and the immutable nature of fundamental freedoms and civil liberties would be welcome. In addition, the original citizenship education curriculum framework emphasis upon community engagement, political literacy, and civic and moral responsibility is a helpful categorisation of the expected roles and competencies in civic life.

³³⁹ A 2014 survey of evangelicals conducted by the Alliance revealed that 80% of those surveyed said that they were certain to vote in the next election, compared to 41% from a similar survey of the UK population as a whole. See <http://www.eauk.org/church/resources/snapshot/upload/21st-Century-Evangelicals-Faith-in-Politics.pdf>; page 6.

Q3: Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

7. Reasonable accommodation and wide-ranging respect for conscientious objection are how a mature society responds to religious and political diversity in its citizens. Britain has a proud history of religious and political toleration. This freedom of religion and conscience has historically been essential for safeguarding a diverse range of religious believers as active citizens. For example, the repeal of the discriminatory Test Acts in the nineteenth century led directly to increased Roman Catholic and Nonconformist participation in British life. Evangelicals value this latter heritage of marginalised dissenters, and have always been committed to fundamental freedoms as a result. Other faiths and their practices were also accommodated successfully, allowing members of these faiths to participate fully in civic life.
8. However, a significant barrier to civic engagement for many religious believers today is the failure to accommodate religious views when they differ from the majority. A report published by the think tank Respublica in November 2016 highlights cases in which this has happened (e.g. the subordination of religious belief in alleged ‘clashes’ of rights in a legal, academic or other context).³⁴⁰ The report then noted the significant costs to society of this marginalisation of minority viewpoints, including in the realm of civic and political participation. It argued that:

[I]ncursions on the fundamental freedom to manifest religious beliefs in a public context privatises religion. Worse still, they initiate a process that leads communities to seal themselves off from wider society. Direct or indirect limitations of religion to the private lives of believers sap religion of its power to orient believers towards civic participation.³⁴¹

³⁴⁰ James Orr, Beyond Belief: Defending Religious Liberty through the British Bill of Rights. Available at: <http://www.respublica.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/11/Religious-Liberty-Digital.pdf>.

To counteract this tendency, the report recommended introducing a duty of reasonable accommodation on employers and others. This duty would recognise that religious faith is a natural and normal part of life in the UK in the twenty-first century, and that religious positions (e.g. on conscience) can and should be accommodated rather than suppressed in the event of a clash. We note that there has been strong support for accommodation in Parliament, in contrast to imposed ‘neutrality’ in the workplace.³⁴² We support the principle of reasonable accommodation, and suggest that such a principle should form part of the guidance on faith and belief issued to employers by the Equality and Human Rights Commission.

9. The right to share one’s faith, and convert to any religion, are essential to good citizenship and fundamental for other rights. They must therefore be protected vigorously. The Alliance and the Lawyers’ Christian Fellowship recently published a report called Speak Up, which was welcomed by the Prime Minister,³⁴³ and which highlighted the freedoms we have in the UK to speak about our faith and core beliefs in different contexts.³⁴⁴ Historically, upholding this right has helped to ensure free speech more generally for those of all faiths and none, and the freedom to speak about one’s core beliefs is a foundational characteristic of citizenship and political engagement in a free and democratic society. By contrast, any legal or cultural pressure for someone to remain silent must be seen as an attack not just on their views but on their equal citizenship. We therefore recommend that future Government discussions of integration or citizenship include an explicit defence of free speech against those who would restrict it for unpopular groups.

Q5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

10. Good citizenship education will avoid creating an ideal of citizenship that sets itself in opposition to other identities, including religious ones. Children are capable of holding a religious faith, and will engage with the issues of citizenship and civic participation from the perspective of that faith. As Professor John Milbank recently wrote: ‘To deny that there can be Muslim or Christian children is to deny that we live unavoidably within time and tradition.’³⁴⁵ Such tradition is often immensely beneficial in bringing up children to be active citizens and participants in society. However, any insistence on a non-religious default position on citizenship is flawed. It needlessly antagonises children from religious families in the education system, and gives the false impression that the best civic participation is in opposition to faith. We therefore recommend that citizenship education include explicit reflection on citizenship from the perspective of different religious traditions.

11. Religious literacy is a fundamental requirement for citizenship in the 21st century world. Religious literacy is the knowledge and empathy required to understand what religious believers think and do, even if one does not follow their religion. In a report by the APPG on Religious Education, entitled Improving Religious Literacy,³⁴⁶ Fiona Bruce MP wrote ‘It is my hope that religious literacy will enable communities and individuals to understand each other better, to communicate with one another on a more informed basis and promote community cohesion within a more inclusive and holistic society.’ The implications of such a goal for good citizenship are clear. In a society with great religious diversity, religious literacy should be an essential requirement of citizenship and education, and its importance has been noted by religious and non-religious writers alike.³⁴⁷ Such literacy should include understanding conservative, mainstream religious views with which one may disagree.

Q6: Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

12. Both formal and informal voluntary civic activity create common bonds, social capital and community resilience that are essential for promoting good citizenship. However, the creation of compulsory citizenship programmes should only be considered after extensive research and substantive consultation with civil society groups such as churches, schools and youth organisations. In the absence of such consultation, apparent replacements for church and civil society-run groups by state-sponsored schemes may appear coercive to many already engaged in this area.

13. In a free society, the family is the primary point of socialisation for children – the place in which positive social values are fostered, where relational respect is learnt and where rights and responsibilities are first understood. Therefore, the Government should consider supporting family cohesion and marriage as a way to enhance citizenship. For example, we note the recent Manifesto to Strengthen Families,³⁴⁸ launched in Parliament with several significant policy proposals. We suggest that the recommendations in this manifesto form a part of further reflection on strengthening citizenship and civic participation.

Q7: How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

14. Evangelical Christians make a massive contribution to this country and engage with civil society through social action, as do many other religious groups. The Cinnamon Network Faith Action Audit shows that faith groups contribute to thousands of social action projects in the UK which benefit millions of people.³⁴⁹ This contribution of religious groups has often been praised in debates in Parliament.³⁵⁰ Most recently, an exhibition by the network Serve Scotland highlighted that voluntary work from Scottish faith groups produces almost £100 million a year in economic impact: an estimated 9000 faith-based groups contributing money and over 11 million hours of voluntary service to their communities. The Cinnamon Network also encourages participants to volunteer in other civic roles, including as local councillors, school governors, magistrates or special constables. In addition, such social action informs Christian political participation and engagement with campaigns for justice. The Government should look for further opportunities to cooperate with and encourage such faith-based social action across society.

Q8: What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

15. Research among evangelical Christians shows that while there is support for the Government's desire to promote British values, there are also concerns over the implications of such language for human rights and fundamental freedoms. In a poll,

³⁴⁸ http://www.strengtheningfamiliesmanifesto.com/assets/Family_Manifesto.pdf

³⁵⁰ See for example this debate: <https://hansard.parliament.uk/Commons/2016-05-05/debates/160505103000001/VoluntarySectorFaithOrganisations>.

we found that the Government attempt to define British values was supported by 71% of surveyed evangelicals. Around 57% also thought that such a project was a reasonable response to extremism. However, 81% of evangelicals also believed that policies designed to counter extremism (i.e. opposition to our ‘shared values’) risked making it harder for Christians to express their faith, and 75% thought that freedom of speech needed greater protection in this context.³⁵¹

16. The attempt to define peaceful, lawful opinions as ‘extreme’ or contrary to British values is deeply problematic, and is out of step with the high tolerance of diverse opinion which we see in the UK population. Surveys show that we are comfortable with high levels of political and ideological diversity of belief, and resist attempts to label many views unacceptable or ‘extreme’. In a recent poll conducted by ComRes for the Alliance and others, more than half the public (54%) said that ‘extreme’ was not a helpful term in discussing social and political views, while just 32% thought that it was. There was widespread disagreement and confusion in the same poll over which views should be considered ‘extreme’.³⁵² It would be a great hindrance to Government attempts to promote integration and combat extremism if it were seen as insisting on greater uniformity than the wider population.
17. More productive reflection could focus on defining common virtues rather than common values. A report from the think-tank Theos argues: ‘The problem is... that these [British] values are treated as essential rather than procedural – about “who we are” rather than about “how we do things”. This can’t but set up a tension between religious and other identities.’³⁵³ In contrast, common norms of behaviour or a respect for shared institutions can be found in those of widely diverging beliefs, identities and moral codes, even when these different groups consider each other to be wrong. We would therefore urge the Government to focus on obedience to the law and shared norms of behaviour in discussion of what we have in common, rather than ‘values’ which may threaten freedom of expression or belief.
18. Attempts to codify British values in an oath for citizens or holders of public office only sharpen the problems with seeking to define British values and should be abandoned. The recommendation to create an oath to integration or British values appeared in the Casey review and received some attention in that context.³⁵⁴ However, given the concerns around British values highlighted above, such an oath may end up excluding the views of some citizens, including religious believers, rather than being a focus for unity. While the desire for unity is commendable, the language of common values is more of a hindrance than a help.

Q9: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

19. The Alliance has argued in the past that while Christians are not persecuted in the UK, there is a danger of Christians being marginalised in modern society. Clearing the Ground, a report published by the APPG for Christians in Parliament in 2012, argued that ‘Christians in the UK face problems living out their faith, and these problems have been mostly caused and exacerbated by social, cultural and legal changes over the past decade.’³⁵⁵ We stand by this judgement, and the recommendations in that report.

20. Recent events show a particular danger of political figures having their place in public life questioned because of their religious beliefs. For example, former leader of the Liberal Democrats Tim Farron was repeatedly asked about his personal beliefs in the election, and resigned on the grounds that his position had become incompatible with his faith.³⁵⁶ Conservative MP Jacob Rees-Mogg was recently attacked on similar grounds.³⁵⁷ Such scrutiny is not unique to Christians: in last year’s London mayoral election, Muslim mayoral candidate Sadiq Khan was falsely accused of sharing a platform with a supporter of Daesh.³⁵⁸ Attacks on believers of many different faiths in politics can also go hand in hand with racial and other stereotyping, hindering community cohesion.

21. Such attacks on prominent members of different religions in politics can have a devastating impact on the sense of belonging of religious believers more generally, and on their motivations to participate in civil society. Strong disagreement and open challenge of all views is an essential and non-negotiable part of our democracy.

This can take place while acknowledging someone's right to be in public life. However, the incidents described above often went beyond informed criticism, instead creating a climate of fear around politically engaged religious believers. For example, attacks on the figures above were often made on the assumption that they would 'impose' their views on the rest of the country when they explicitly denied that this was the case. The common assumption was that these politicians were less capable of democratic participation – and acceptance of democratic outcomes – because of their religious beliefs. This is a prejudiced line of thinking which denies the equal democratic citizenship of religious believers.

22. This must be countered with a clear statement from the Government, potentially in the forthcoming integration strategy, that religious people and others with conservative views have a rightful place as equal citizens in society. The Government has been admirably focused on tackling the problem of prejudice and discrimination across a range of protected characteristics. Such prejudice is a refusal to recognise the equal citizenship of other groups. However, there must now be more awareness, in light of the incidents above, of exclusion from the public space based on diverse social and religious opinion, rather than simply on background. It must also be recognised that such exclusion on grounds of opinion can offer a thin veil of respectability for older and uglier forms of exclusion on grounds of background.

Q10: How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

23. We would urge the Government to make a distinction between practical integration and political, religious or ideological similarity. We believe that too often these are confused, which has a negative impact on the ability of all to participate in society. An adequate level of English, knowledge of life in this country and willingness to obey the law are all vital aspects of integration into British society. In these cases, it is surely right to insist on greater uniformity, allowing newcomers to this country to live alongside their neighbours and take the opportunities afforded by life in the UK.
24. However, some portrayals of citizenship go further than this (e.g. many discussions of British values – see paragraphs 15-18 above). They appear to demand conformity in terms of belief as a matter of integration alongside these other criteria. With this in mind, the Joint Committee on Human Rights has criticised the Government's vague notions of 'extremism' and 'British values', as legislation built on such uncertain concepts could be used against conservative religious groups.³⁵⁹ Similarly, a concept of citizenship or integration based on ill-defined values could end up excluding legitimate participants in society. Uniformity is an unrealistic goal for citizenship in the modern world, and as a high-functioning diverse society we must instead learn to tolerate an uncomfortable level of political and religious difference.

25. We therefore believe that increasing both diversity and integration is best served by keeping the two distinct. Integration (i.e. in the Government's integration strategy) should be focused on the practical skills which people need to integrate in society (for example through a national ESOL strategy and a renewed emphasis on education). At the same time, there should be greater recognition of the country's religious and political diversity, with an explicit statement that this is a positive part of life in the UK. We believe that this acknowledgement of the equal citizenship of those with conservative religious views will itself encourage integration.

Dr Sami Everett, The Woolf Institute – written evidence (CCE0003)

Across much of western Europe rapid change has been imposed in particular by the economic and cultural challenges arising from the 2007 financial crash and mass migration due to war in the Middle East. The effects of these challenges on public trust, often unhelpfully termed ‘crises’ implying chaos, emergency and danger, became patently clear in 2015. European governments struggled to respond convincingly to the pressures of refugee arrival, in particular to Berlin, the geopolitics of terror, in particular in Paris, and record numbers of foodbank users in the UK. In a globalised world, these challenges are interlinked. They are transnational in cause and effect, but they are felt and responded to by people on a very local level. Citizenship and civic engagement are best and most effectively developed and nurtured at the local level rather than through central direction and control.

Author, Institution & source of evidence: I have been employed by The Woolf Institute for the three year Trust in Crisis research project 2015-17 alongside a team of researchers working in Berlin, London, Paris, and Rome. We investigated how a perceived crisis of trust—in, for example, the truth of media news cycles and the ability of the state to provide a brighter future—affected relations among faith and minority communities. To this end I undertook an ethnographic examination of community-based initiatives engaged in inter-religious and intercultural encounter. I explored how cooperative action and local solidarity were hindered or supported by the perception of crisis in London and Paris.

Over the last decade the Woolf institute has produced high-quality, far-reaching research into important societal issues such as Religion and Belief in British Public Life and End of life care for faith communities. As a continuation of this, the Trust in Crisis research formed part of an ongoing appraisal of public trust by the Woolf Institute, dedicated to the study of Christians, Jews, and Muslims. The full report of the research project can be found here: Trust in Crisis.

1 / 12. 21s century citizenship and civic engagement are grounded in shared social values and combine faith community resources and a strong local identity. Austerity, terror, refugees and the difficulties of centralised government to cope with these challenges constitute the prime motives for civic engagement today. Such activity often revolves around socially driven common causes that utilise the pre-existing networks and infrastructure of faith communities and bring people together through a shared sense of local-level belonging.

Initiatives: In London we saw this through the efforts of community-building initiatives in tune with realities on the ground. Notable among these were Pecan, an organisation associated with local churches in Peckham that hosts a foodbank which meets the needs of many local Muslim families. The encounter between a Christian organisation and local Muslims strengthens understanding that local solidarity exists and often transcends religious identity. Similarly multi-faith, the Refugee Welcome group in Lambeth is currently in the process of repurposing part of the South London Liberal Synagogue to house refugees. The culture of hospitality on which this initiative is based underlines core social values explicit in each of the monotheistic traditions. Both of these initiatives build trust at a grassroots level and develop inclusive spaces. They are based primarily on the shared social values of local volunteers but they draw strongly on faith community resources and dovetail with the ethos of their social action.

European comparator: Islamic Relief France provides relief to Paris's poorest citizens (of all backgrounds) in one of its most difficult neighbourhoods. Though the idea of laïcité (French secularism) is politically prevalent, on the ground realities of austerity mean that local authorities have integrated Islamic Relief as a provider of state assistance.

Finding: Though the challenges of austerity, refugees, and terror can be connected, the way they are experienced is intensely local. In the wake of these challenges, faith groups are becoming more engaged in public life and in responding to crises often show social solidarity before religious exclusivity. These groups are also among the most organised drivers of local level social cohesion. We found that their religiosity and dedication to civic life are not mutually exclusive.

Recommendation: Because of this we would recommend that these forms of emergent religious citizenship that are inclusive and operate at a local level from a sense of empathy with wider transnational crises such as those enumerated in point 2 should be acknowledged and supported.

Nota: These challenges have a particular draw for BME and other minority groups since they relate to for example the social housing of austerity, refugees and migration as a whole, and the police scrutiny associated with counter-terror measures. Minority community involvement is a supplementary factor in the necessity for central government to channel resources towards, promote and reward particularly outstanding individuals key to these local level initiatives.

7. Investment in local structures that are civically engaged has a great impact on the management of the multiple and interlinked challenges of today. Local-level volunteer-led organisations administer provision and confront direct and immediate needs in particularly challenging times, particularly where state institutions are unable to provide. These often draw on the resources of faith groups.

Initiatives: In response to the Grenfell Tower fire the local St Clement's parish church and the Al-Manaar Mosque served as a hubs for relief work and continue to be sanctuaries for certain Muslim families affected by the fire. In the response to the Finsbury Park attack Rabbi Gluck of the Jewish-Arab forum gave solace and showed cross faith solidarity against the violence of discrimination. Both of these examples made a difference to how people felt and, taking into account misgivings towards local authorities, that local people did care. Using these experiences as a guide, our evidence shows that when public administrations manage and address new challenges, such as multi-faith landscapes, or the integration of migrants, these are more likely to be achieved by integrating civic engagement at a local level with local government.

European comparator: In order to address local authority failure to manage the flow of migrants seeking refugee, one measure Berlin City government took was to create a full-time position responsible for the Dialogue of Religions. This coordinated activities among local faith groups and providing them with platforms for dialogue and exchange.

Finding: The question is not so much how can society support civic engagement but rather what can be done to harness, improve and help pre-existing engagement. Coordination and communication between faith communities, civil society actors and civic authorities benefits the larger community while providing a tangible form of support to minority groups.

Recommendation: The ad-hoc organisation of post-crisis associations cannot continue to cope without proper investment and structuring. Many providers and users are frustrated by the ongoing lack of state resources. We recommend an increased investment in local-level civil society organisations demonstrating civic engagement either ad-hoc such as after Grenfell or longer term. We also recommend improved coordination with such groups for local structures, especially in times of crisis. Both are vital and can fill the void of resources and care that centralised structures are not always able or willing to fill.

Nota: The Berlin example of a socially minded Dialogue of Religions position has allowed better communication among faith groups and civic authorities. This could also be harnessed to better tackle issues related to violence, discrimination and the integration of refugees as well as enhance responses to long-term effects of austerity.

Exeter City Community Trust – written evidence (CCE0086)

Background

Exeter City Community Trust (ECCT) has been involved with the National Citizen Service (NCS) since the spring of 2014 when it was, initially, sub-contracted to run the course for about 30 individuals. In subsequent years, ECCT has dealt directly firstly through Engage for Life in 2015 and, when it lost the NCS contract, direct with the Regional delivery partner (NCS/SW2) since summer 2016 and the numbers of candidates has risen from 135 in 2015 to 455 in summer 2017.

Exeter City Community Trust

This Charity, founded in 2007, is an adjunct to Exeter City Football Club, which is one of only four football league clubs that are supporter owned in the UK. Previously known as Exeter City Football in the Community Trust, the charity has expanded substantially over the last ten years as its remit to reach out into the community has been extended. Annual turnover is now in excess of £1m and it employs 32 full time staff, 70 part-time and 60 on a seasonal basis. It is Exeter's leading health and well being charity, working in partnership with the football club. The recent change of name reflects that the health, education, wellbeing and physical activity programmes reach over 45000 members of the community each year and around 48% of these programmes are not football related.

We provide below the charity's answers to the questions raised under Section 6 of the Call for Evidence.

1. Does the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?

There is no doubt in our minds that this programme has had a positive effect on the lives of those taking part by creating citizens who have more self-confidence, more social awareness, better life skills, interview techniques and ability to communicate in public. It provides Young People (YPs) with a sense of self-esteem and self-efficacy.

The programme also provides YPs with exposure to parts of the community which they might not otherwise be aware through the projects which every group undertakes. This helps in the transition to adulthood and the creation of a more socially active citizen.

An example is the group who recently transformed a rundown children's play area at the visitors' centre at Exeter Prison into a brighter more inviting place through creating colourful murals, clearing the ground area and bringing in old tyres, painting these white to create giant plant pots filled with flowers. Chalk boards have been hung up and toys provided obtained through fund raising appeals and the generosity of the public. This particular project was picked up on Twitter by the chairman of NCS, Stephen Greene.

Another project which is being finalised at the moment is by a group that has produced a short film highlighting mental health in the young. This contains interviews with youngsters who have suffered mental health issues and also interviews with families and friends and how they deal with the issues raised. The completed film will be shown on a loop at the YES (Youth Enquiry Service) charity in Exeter and will also be shown in schools in the area.

The difficulty is being able to measure how the skills learnt during these programmes translate into full adulthood and whether these skills are temporary or permanent. Within the financial constraints of the charity, it is not possible, for example, to monitor the progress of those who took part when ECCT first became involved in the programme in 2014. This is where help from the centre would be beneficial in order for us to understand whether the work we do has translated into success or failure and whether the government is spending its money wisely.

2. Are the programmes the right length?

This year, ECCT requested to run three week programmes rather than the traditional four but this was turned down. One of the issues arising from the popularity of the programmes is obtaining sufficient trained staff to run these. Most of the individuals employed to help run the programs are teachers or students working during the traditional summer or autumn breaks. If the programmes were three weeks long, many of them would be able to commit to helping out on two different programmes but, with four weeks, there is not sufficient time available to them to help out on more than one if they are to have any holiday of their own.

From the YPs point of view, there are some who, after the two week residential course, find it difficult to adapt to the less structured second half of the course. This can cause some to drop out while there are others who relish the freedom which comes after their schools' much more disciplined approach to learning.

The four week course run by ECCT this summer was made up as follows;

Week 1 – Outward Bound style residential programme in Brecon Beacons – an adventure week of team building and social mixing

Week 2 – Educational style residential programme at Bicton College, Exmouth consisting of workshops providing lifestyle, financial and social skills which are engaging whilst preparing the YPs for the planning in Week 3.

Week 3 – The YPs live at home but spend their days at Exeter College preparing a social project which they undertake in Week 4. On the Friday of this week, ECCT runs a Dragons' Den style event where the groups present their projects and are given advice, guidance and criticism by a group influential people within the City, a lot of whom have a business background, who give up their time to help ensure the projects succeed. This formula has been exceptionally beneficial this year and, although we believe some other NCS regions also use this format, it is not universal. We think it should be and that, if it was, each region would be able to select its best projects to be presented national with the finalists fronting a real Dragons' Den show. The publicity from this would be very useful in widening the appeal of NCS. We understand there is a 'Social Action Stars' programme for the best six projects nationally but this should be extended and all YP groups aware of the exposure they could receive.

Week 4 – The delegates carry out their project in the community (examples given earlier). Each YP must undertake 30 hours of social action.

It should be noted that ECCT runs 'Keep Warm Events' in advance of the programmes being run. This year this included an Open Air Cinema evening at the football club in March and a social event in a marquee in May, once again at the club, with Dominos Pizzas, live music and photo booths to ensure the social mix process starts well before the YPs get on the coaches for the first week of the residential course. These events are important for the retention of YP and also help to reduce anxiety leading up to the start of the programme. ECCT also deliver a series of parent guardian evenings which provide more details on the programme and the benefits along with areas in which PG can support.

September – Those delegates who complete the programme attend an awards ceremony. ECCT has made this into a big event at one of the largest halls in Exeter with stalls outside providing food, live music being played and dignitaries invited to attend (see later in submission for more).

3. Is it right that the programmes are voluntary or should they become compulsory and, if so, when?

There is a universal opinion within ECCT that the programme should remain voluntary. At the moment momentum is building and, within some schools, it is regarded as a rite of passage after GCSEs. Apart from the logistics of trying to find venues and staff to operate a compulsory programme, it is important that the attendees are those who want to take part. Having YPs on board who do not wish to be there would create a disruptive element which would detract from the learning process. The statistics for summer 2017 in respect of ECCT are that 539 YPs signed up (paying their £50 to NCS), and 455 started the programme. There were inevitably a few drop-outs during the program but about 445 will graduate this month. This figure compares with a target of 405 given to us by NCS South West.

4. Should they contain a political element?

This has been discussed by those on the courses but there was a sense within the delegates that they do not want the programme to 'feel like school' and thus anything that might overlap with courses in the classroom are to be avoided. It was felt that anything political would inevitably end up being biased and, as such, should be left off the curriculum. However, it was suggested that the NCS ethos and its efforts to create better more active citizens could be included in schools' curricula as a way of introducing the concept and, at the same time, promoting NCS programmes. We have tried to involve our local MP either through a visit to see NCS in action or as a judge on Dragons' Den but, to date, this has not been successful.

5. Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony?

ECCT hold a ceremony in the second week in September at The Great Hall at Exeter University. The large number of YPs graduating means that this has to be split into several different sessions and, as a result, can last for several hours. As mentioned above, there are stalls outside the hall providing food and drink as well as live music with the aim to help YPs continue the sense of bonding experienced during the programme. Parents/guardians are invited to attend and see the results of the programme for themselves. Last year, the Lord Lieutenant of Devon attended the ceremony as well as other dignitaries and trustees of ECCT. We do not feel that, given the numbers involved, it would be practical to open this ceremony out to a wider public.

6. Are they good value for money?

While we do not have all the statistics, we understand that the cost to the taxpayer of a YP turning to anti-social activity is in the order of £200,000 to £250,000 by the time they reach 25. While we appreciate that not every YP attending the programme is in danger of becoming anti-social, this does indicate that, if just a few YPs are diverted away from an anti-social lifestyle, there would be a financial benefit to the taxpayer from funding these courses.

As the £50 YP funding is normally met by the parent/guardian, it tends to be at the awards ceremony that we meet up with these individuals to obtain feedback. There has been universal praise for the quality of the courses and the value for money involved given that it included two weeks accommodation and meals. There is also acknowledgement that the main benefits have been increased confidence, ability to socially interact outside of their normal circle of friends and enhanced life skills.

Although most families can afford the £50 charge, ECCT are in a position to wave or refund this fee in the event of mitigating financial circumstances. While we appreciate that £50 is a nominal payment, we would be concerned that, if there was a rise in the cost to the young people or their parents, it would disrupt the social mix that is at the heart of the programme. However, it is sensible to require a deposit as this concentrates the mind of the parent/guardian/YP and, hopefully, leads to fewer no-shows on the programme itself and thus provides easier administration and less wasted accommodation costs.

From the point of view of the provider, ECCT is still able to fund the costs of staffing, accommodation, food and travel costs yet achieve a small surplus despite the drop in funding levels this year. ECCT has the cash balances that allow for the fluctuations in cash flow that can result from delayed payments from NCS but we can imagine that smaller organisations might find this difficult to manage. We would be concerned if the funding levels were to drop further given the infrastructure that needs to be in place to ensure the programmes are professionally run. Good quality staff are key to running successful programmes and this can only be achieved by having stability in the way these programmes are run.

ECCT run pre-programme training weekends for their NCS staff as well as additional training for Group Leaders. ECCT has created these courses themselves but, to ensure consistency in NCS programmes nationally, we think that more prescribed training courses or availability of resources from the Centre would be useful.

7. What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

The Duke of Edinburgh awards are an alternative route. In that case, there is Bronze, Silver and Gold awards. An extension to NCS would be to create two levels, first an introductory programme covering Year 8/9 YPs who are typically harder to engage with followed by the full NCS programme for those who have finished GCSEs. The introductory course could cover basic information about the full course to include citizenship issues which could then be fully covered in the main programme.

8. Is there more that the local authority could do to help facilitate the courses?

ECCT have very close links to the local authority, Exeter City Council, partially because Exeter City Football Club is community based but also because ECCT liaises with the local authority in respect of social programmes which may be capable of being supported by the charity when it is no longer financially feasible for this to be carried out by the local authority. The local authority supports an awards programme within ECCT which provides grants to local sporting groups and one of our trustees is employed at a senior level within the authority. The local authority also helps provide judges for the Dragons' Den events and is also of help when teams are looking to set up social projects within the city.

ECCT has built up a good relationship with schools and colleges in the area and, as a result, is able to access YPs within these schools to promote NCS. Head teachers and year 11 leads are becoming more aware of NCS as it builds in reputation although more could still be done nationally to promote these programmes within the schools. As mentioned above, the third week of the programme is undertaken at Exeter College which provides further education facilities for students post GCSEs and approximately 70% of YPs taking the NCS programme continue their education at this college. Thus the third week of the programme is a good initiation into their future education establishment and supports this transition.

Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship – written evidence (CCE0090)

Introduction

1. The ESAG for Citizenship was established by the DFE in 2013 to provide strategic advice to the DFE on the implementation of the reformed National Curriculum for Citizenship 2014. A full list of members is provided at the end of the submission. The Group continues to run on an independent basis. The Group itself has published strategic advice to schools via the ACT website on teacher assessment, primary citizenship and Teaching Controversial issues and the Prevent agenda.
2. Since 2014 the Expert Group has continued to press the DFE for resources and action in support of high quality Citizenship education. In March 2017 the Group developed a National Action Plan for Citizenship – ‘Citizenship for All’ with specific ideas about how Citizenship organisations and Government could work together to ensure high quality Citizenship education is a reality for more children in more schools. The Action Plan is supported by the membership of the Association for Citizenship Teaching, the Crick Centre for understanding politics, members of the Political Literacy Oversight Group who advise the APPG on democratic participation, and Active Citizens FE.
3. The Expert Group wrote to the Secretary of State seeking a response to the Action Plan in July 2017 and we await her response. The Group asks that the Lord’s Committee consider recommending the Action Plan is adopted by the DFE in response to enquiry question 5.

The need for action on Citizenship

- i) Children and young people today are growing up in a complicated world where technological, political, social and environmental change is affecting us all. Many young people are concerned about the future and find it difficult to navigate through the many forms of information they access. Some feel excluded and question whether our political system and democratic values are working for them and their communities and some are being drawn towards extremism.
- ii) Citizenship is a subject that teaches children and young people about how democracy, politics and law work in practice and develops understanding of how society has developed and is changing. Citizenship helps young people make sense of the world around them by giving them the concepts and knowledge to think critically about challenging political and social issues and space to explore difficult and sensitive topics. The subject builds understanding, critical literacy and practical skills to think, question, explore and debate, to speak out on issues of concern and take action with others to address problems and contribute positively to democratic life.

iii) Citizenship has been a part of the National Curriculum in England since 2002. Yet since 2010 there has been a decline in the provision for Citizenship and quality of teaching in too many schools. There has been some ambiguity about the role and status of Citizenship in primary and secondary education and this together with pressure to focus on a narrow, academic core of subjects that excluded Citizenship has led to some schools dropping the subject altogether.

iv) Every child deserves high quality, well taught Citizenship as a guaranteed part of a broad and balanced curriculum that properly prepares them for the challenges and opportunities of life and work.

v) With this in mind the Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship and a range of citizenship organisations have come together to call on the DFE to support A National Action Plan for Citizenship – ‘Citizenship for all’ with five key objectives to strengthen the subject. We welcome your comments and support. It is time to reverse the decline in Citizenship education. It is time to take action.

A National Action Plan for Citizenship – ‘Citizenship for All’

1. A 'curriculum guarantee for Citizenship' in every primary and secondary school and clear progression to further Citizenship education post 16

Every school in the country, primary and secondary, should be required by statutory order to offer a programme of citizenship education as part of a broad and balanced curriculum. Citizenship is a National Curriculum subject at key stages 3 and 4 and this must continue but currently not every school is required to follow the National Curriculum. Citizenship Studies is a GCSE but it is not part of the Ebacc. There should be clear progression to opportunities for further Citizenship education post 16 and links with the National Citizen Service. The current ambiguity around the role of Citizenship in the curriculum has negatively affected the provision, status and quality of Citizenship education in too many schools.

2. Make Citizenship a priority teacher training subject with bursaries

In 2016 just 54 teachers were trained in Citizenship (compared with 243 in 2010). In part this is because Citizenship has no bursary to provide financial support for those wishing to specialise in the subject. Training fees of £9000 plus living costs, means potential Citizenship trainees with relevant degrees are looking to other teacher training subjects with bursaries or are being put off teaching altogether. We know where schools employ trained Citizenship teachers there is a more coherent and well-planned Citizenship curriculum and better outcomes for pupils. We believe every school should have at least one trained Citizenship teacher by 2030. Citizenship must be given priority subject status with training bursaries.

3. ‘Beacons of Excellence’ through Citizenship subject knowledge enhancement

We urge the DFE to support a programme to establish of ‘Beacons of Excellence’ aimed at increasing the capacity of teachers through Citizenship subject knowledge enhancement and CPD programmes. This would involve creating links between University Politics departments and schools to build Citizenship subject knowledge, supported by the relevant Subject Associations - the Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT) and the Political Studies Association (PSA) and other Citizenship organisations.

4. Benchmarking best practice to highlight effective Citizenship education

Ofsted should be asked to undertake a special survey of the Citizenship to find examples of best practice and include comments on Citizenship within Section 5 inspection reports. The subject association, ACT should provide a digital collection of best practice online. The DFE should also re-instate England as a participant in the International Civic and Citizenship Education Study, which takes place in about 30 nations every 5 years. England was a leading participant until 2009. <http://www.iea.nl/iccs>

5. Stimulate high quality teaching resources for Citizenship

Building on the work undertaken to identify gaps in the market by the DFE Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship in 2014, the DFE should commission Citizenship organisations to develop high quality resources that are free of charge and meet the ACT Citizenship Quality Mark for teaching resources. Given the large number of non-specialists who currently teach the subject these resources will help raise the quality of teaching and learning across schools in the immediate term.

Facing History and Ourselves – written evidence (CCE0193)

‘The changing nature of the UK and potential for tension to arise now makes it ever more pressing for us to work towards community cohesion, fostering mutual understanding within schools so that valuing difference and understanding what binds us together become part of the way pupils think and behave.’

Curriculum Review: Diversity and Citizenship, Sir Keith Ajegbo, 2007.³⁶⁰

1. Facing History and Ourselves (FH) is an international educational and professional development organisation that has worked with teachers and students in countries around the world since 1976. We have worked in the UK (with concentrated work in England and Northern Ireland) since 2001. Facing History’s mission is to foster a compassionate, informed citizenry. We believe that education is an essential medium for developing prosocial participation and for countering prejudice, identity-based divisions, violence and hatred. Indeed, education is the only institution that reaches the majority of UK citizens. In addition, FH takes a multigenerational approach by working with both adolescents and adults. FH supports teachers of adolescents, administrators, educational leaders, and civil society organisations in the creation of a more inclusive and just society. We do this by providing professional development, bespoke follow-up support, and access to rigorous, high-quality resources. FH has a strong evidence base, including two randomised controlled trials and over one hundred evaluations (both by our evaluation team and external evaluators), that demonstrate our programme’s effectiveness. Key outcomes include components that are essential to the development of citizens who can uphold democracy and support an inclusive, participatory, prosocial civil society. Students gain improved critical thinking skills, empathy and tolerance, civic responsibility, and the belief they can make a difference in the world. Teachers are more confident and skilled at fostering students’ academic, civic, and social and emotional learning. Classrooms and schools are more respectful, reflective, and participatory – necessary conditions for deep learning.³⁶¹ According to the Ajegbo report of 2007, many teachers lack confidence in these areas: ‘The main challenges to promoting discussion and developing shared understanding were considered to be teacher knowledge, experience and confidence in handling such discussions...high quality training, therefore, is crucial.³⁶² Staff training is central to Facing History's approach, offering a range of ways that teachers can be trained in its content and pedagogy. Our commitment to staying with teachers after they have been trained shows the importance in which FH holds teacher efficacy and confidence as part of successful citizenship education.

2. Our approach is to explore key moments of history from the 19th to 21st centuries where societies have experienced division, hatred or violence. Through examining the choices and decisions of people in such times we encourage teachers to enable their students to make essential connections to the moral and ethical dilemmas they face in their own lives today. In this way, we help teachers foster in their students an awareness of their own agency and the opportunity they have to participate positively in the world around them.
3. The model we employ is a journey of learning known as our 'scope and sequence'. It begins with an exploration of identity, in particular focusing on the fact that we all have multiple aspects to our identities. We contrast this with the fact that often we can see the other as having a 'single story' based on a dominant single, and often negative, identity. Students next explore questions of membership and belonging and the formation of 'in' and 'out' groups. We consider how easily people can resort to 'we and they' thinking, in which groups of people labelled by single identity markers are attributed negative values. We look at the dangers for society of this kind of thinking. In a detailed historical case study, such as the events leading to the Holocaust, we consider the ways in which issues of identity and belonging have played out historically, and how in this case they led to mass murder and genocide. However, as well as understanding the role of perpetrators and bystanders in the Holocaust, we also seek to understand and learn from those who stood up, those who put their lives at risk to rescue and save Jews at this time. Our journey continues by exploring how societies repair themselves after mass violence and genocide, through examining aspects of justice, memory and legacies of the Holocaust, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Finally, we ask students to reflect upon what they have learnt in the course and then to consider how they might participate to prevent such atrocities happening again. Our core resource that supports this approach is called Holocaust and Human Behaviour. It is an approach that can be used in History, Citizenship, RE and English classrooms, or in a cross-curricular way. Importantly, FH's content helps students to recognise a range of choices and decisions, to engage each other in thoughtful discussion and to consider what it means to act in light of a common good. Our goal is prevention. We want to help young people recognise the ways they can protect and nurture democracy. This means standing up for the rights of self and others in prosocial, nonviolent ways. As Eleanor Roosevelt said, 'Where, after all, do universal human rights begin? In small places close to home - so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any map of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person: the neighbourhood he lives in; the school or college he attends; the factory, farm or office where he works.' For Facing History, the work of prevention of violence and division exists in these seemingly small, everyday acts.³⁶³

4. The intellectual and pedagogic framework of Facing History and Ourselves is built upon a synthesis of history and ethics for effective history education. Its core learning principles embrace intellectual rigour, ethical reflection, emotional engagement and civic agency. Its teaching parameters engage the methods of the humanities: enquiry, critical analysis, interpretation, empathetic connections and judgment. Facing History and Ourselves teachers employ a carefully structured methodology to provoke thinking about complex questions of citizenship and human behaviour. Building upon the increasing ability to think hypothetically and imagine options, they stretch the historical imagination by urging delineation of what might have been done, choices that could have been made and alternative scenarios that could have come about.
5. Underlying this approach is the goal to create a safe classroom space where difficult, emotive and controversial conversations can happen. We see the classroom as a microcosm of society. It is a place where we want to model belonging and allow expression of opinion within limits, even if we disagree with each other. It is a place therefore where we want to explore the concept of 'critical respect', where we can agree as a group what we can tolerate and what we cannot, and where we learn ways to challenge respectfully that with which we disagree. We believe creating a class contract is a crucial part of the process if we want the classroom to be the model of a truly reflective and civil society. The classroom is a space where students can practice and develop the skills, dispositions and behaviours that are essential for mature democratic citizenship in a multicultural society.

6. FH believes that citizenship education should be compulsory throughout a student's schooling, whether this be as an explicit subject or integrated into other subjects such as History, RE and English. Current research in neuroscience, such as that by Sarah-Jayne Blakemore, Professor of Cognitive Neuroscience at University College London, suggests young people's capacity for empathetic thinking develops in crucial ways during adolescence.³⁶⁴ We would therefore contend that it is essential they encounter curricula that encourage discussion about identity, belonging, empathy upstanding and prosocial participation in order that we create truly compassionate global citizens.
7. Facing History and Ourselves offers a range of resources that speak to these questions, including a new resource designed to prevent violent extremism through the promotion of democratic thinking and engagement. This resource, which will be released by the end of 2017, is designed to support teachers with the Prevent agenda and with Fundamental British Values. It is also a resource that can be integrated into a range of courses including Citizenship, SMSC and History. The sequence of thirteen lessons uses ideas from the FH scope and sequence and such theorists as Professor Hugh Starkey, Professor Lynn Davies and Dr Sara Savage, as well as the Ajegbo Report.³⁶⁵ It helps students develop a more complex and integrated appreciation of identity, and enables them to understand the process of 'othering' that can happen when we see people as having a 'single story'. It supports students in developing ideas about what an inclusive democracy can look like. The resource offers examples from history to model how people have used nonviolent means to stand up for their rights and the rights of others, and provides students with a set of eight tools that they can become more skilled in using as they consider their choices to participate.
8. The pedagogical approach we take - that we listen to what students have to say and work with their ideas inductively in a safe space - is key we believe in helping to develop ways to improve a sense of belonging in this country. Our resources ‘Identity and Belonging in a Changing Great Britain’ and ‘Stories of Identity’ contain accounts by people in Britain and Europe more broadly from a range of ethnic backgrounds who describe dilemmas of belonging in multiethnic societies.³⁶⁶ These resources can serve a range of purposes. They can contribute to the creation of a welcoming classroom and school, enabling young people who are new or recently settled in this country to find themselves represented in the texts, providing them with a touchstone by which they can better articulate how they are feeling about the challenges they face. They also give voice to people who have lived in the UK for generations. Some people in these communities, as has been well documented, are feeling the stress of change and transition. They are questioning their own sense of belonging. Similarly, the voices of longstanding populations, too, must be heard, as the UK and Europe experience a period of mass migration. These, and other resources developed by Facing History, offer the opportunity for students to make connections to their own lives in a safe and reflective space. They raise questions about the ways society can operate when there is major demographic change, exploring models of assimilationism, multiculturalism and other ideas about integration.

9. Facing History not only works with teachers to offer training to develop their ideas and practice in helping students to be positive participants in society, but also works directly with students at both primary and secondary level. Currently in the London borough of Islington, FH is delivering Peace Assemblies directly to primary and secondary students in 17 schools. Facing History is also involved in a student leadership project in a number of boroughs in north-west London under the aegis of John Lyon’s Charity. This project involves five students from nine schools working both together and separately on projects about issues of belonging in their community. They are taught the skills of leadership, negotiation and participation as they consider an issue, research it, consider solutions and then present their findings and ideas at a student conference. The latter project’s evaluation has revealed that students develop their sense of what leadership and community can mean in profound ways during the period of the project. Anecdotally, those working on the project and the students themselves reveal growing confidence in themselves and their ability to influence others for the greater good. Essential to the student leadership project was the underlying philosophy of how we worked with the students. The facilitators created a context and prepared students so that they could become the leaders of the project. For example, one group of students wished to look at the concept of ‘minorities within minorities’. Another group looked at ‘othering’ of South American students in modern language classes. Yet another considered the dangers of social media in the context of bullying and ways to counteract this. Examples such as these showed the seriousness with which students involved in an extra-curricular citizenship activity took their responsibility to examine current issues of belonging in society. We would like to see an expansion of this type of programme for more students in more schools.

10. Facing History and Ourselves has been the object of numerous evaluations throughout its 40 year lifespan, conducted by both independent researchers and internal teams.³⁶⁷ Amongst the proven programme outcomes documented in more than one study, Facing History training and courses demonstrate the following:

- Teachers develop self-efficacy;
- Students become more engaged in learning;
- Students develop and value empathy for others, including those who they feel are different from themselves;
- Students experience a climate of respect in classroom and school;
- Students strengthen their sense of agency;
- Students describe learning and valuing perspective taking;
- Students report valuing and choosing prosocial behaviour;
- Students report greater tolerance for groups with whom they disagree and for people from other ethnic groups;
- Students report and demonstrate increased self-awareness (for example, with identity, making choices);

Facing History's practice in Holocaust education, civic education, character education, and social and emotional learning is evidence-led, based on the quality and rigour of its evaluations. Through our many resources and our journey of learning, as well as our practical student leadership and other student engagement projects, our evaluation shows we help teachers and students successfully grapple with the most essential question of citizenship education, how can we live together for the benefit of all?

Professor Laurence Ferry – written evidence (CCE0229)

I welcome this opportunity to submit written evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. This reply draws on my personal senior level experience and recent published academic work on financial sustainability, accountability and transparency in the central and local government arena that specifically addresses aspects of citizenship and civic engagement regarding budget processes.

Overall, the main focus of my response concerns addressing Point 7 of this Committee's work being, 'How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?'

Following the worldwide financial crisis of 2007 and 2008 and subsequent recession, by 2010 the UK current budget deficit had skyrocketed to £103 billion from £20 billion in 2005, representing about 6.9% of Gross Domestic Product in 2010 compared to less than 2% in 2005 (UK Public Spending, 2017).

To address the budget deficit the Conservative-Liberal Democrat Coalition government in the United Kingdom proposed severe austerity cuts and between 2010 and 2015 they pursued a policy termed 'austerity-localism' for English local government that has been largely continued by the Conservative government since 2015. In this context, local authorities had more power to make their own decisions through the Localism Act 2011 but set against significant budget cuts from austerity and existing constraints on raising funding themselves. For example, in the field of English local government the cuts were especially harsh with austerity measures rolled out across several budget iterations, resulting in a 37% real-term reduction in core central government funding equating to a 25% reduction in income/spending power (including council tax) between 2010/11 and 2015/16. This was even though during this period changes in government policy created over 160 new burdens on local government, with an estimated value of £11.5 billion, many of them unfunded (Jones, 2017). In addition, local government cuts were relatively more severe than for other parts of the public services and arguably fell relatively disproportionately on Labour politically controlled, urban, metropolitan councils than 'leafy' shire, wealthier, rural Conservative politically controlled councils (Ahrens and Ferry 2015, 2016). Furthermore, local government's reliance on central government grants left authorities vulnerable to funding cuts during the current austerity programme (Ferry, Eckersley and van Dooren, 2015), with central funding for English councils set to fall by 56% between 2010 and 2020 (Lowndes and Gardner, 2016) despite rising demand for local public services (Hastings et al., 2015). As a result, the cuts led to challenges concerning the institution of democracy itself as over the following years there have been various high level protests against the cuts from local government, business lobby groups and citizens, including those that called for a more radical politics (Ahrens and Ferry, 2015, 2016; Ferry and Ahrens, 2017).

With regards to local government, from 2010 the Conservative led coalition government not only adopted a policy of ‘austerity localism’ but also announced abolition of the Audit Commission and scrapped the centralised performance management arrangements. The National Audit Office (NAO) was now given responsibility for reporting on the financial sustainability of local authorities and there was an expectation that performance would be largely policed by citizens acting as an army of armchair auditors through raw data made publicly available as part of a transparency agenda (Ferry, Eckersley and Zakaria, 2015; Ferry and Eckersley, 2015a, 2015b; Ferry and Murphy, 2015a, 2015b, 2017).

Unfortunately, armchair auditors have not materialised in significant numbers and the accountability landscape remains fractured and fragmented (Ferry, Eckersley and Zakaria, 2015; Ferry and Eckersley, 2015a, 2015b; Ferry and Murphy, 2015a, 2015b, 2017).

During this period, some local authorities have been actively engaging with the public as part of citizenship and civic engagement initiatives although often not without controversy, especially concerning the politics of the budgeting process.

Newcastle City Council (NCC) provides an example of a local authority that embraced citizenship and civic engagement. They established a Fairness Commission, Let’s Talk consultation process, 3-year budgeting, budget simulator and accounting arrangements that had aspects of public value accounting, which gave interest groups and citizens a voice in not only deciding on budget options but constructing what they should be, and getting involved in the governance, delivery and funding of services (Ahrens and Ferry, 2015, 2016, Ferry and Ahrens, 2017). At NCC, the Fairness Commission was launched in 2011 to provide guidance on fairness and equality as a vision for change at a time of facing challenges of making hard decisions with shrinking resources. Various institutional representatives sat on the Commission with the approach being to define some principles to improve decision-making and provide guidance. To further engage citizens, NCC also devised ‘Let’s-talk’ as “a new conversation with our city” for defining outcomes, priorities and funding allocations. This involved four types of activities. ‘Talkabout’ was a series of conversations with stakeholders about what they think the future priorities should be. ‘Walkabout’ consisted of politicians’ and senior officials’ visits to local authority wards and local services in order to get to know local issues. ‘Thinkabout’ sought information and advice from people about NCC’s strategic issues. ‘Decideabout’ gave local people the opportunity to be involved in decision-making, for example, through ward committees, and public meetings. ‘Let’s-talk Newcastle’ online also provided a web based community engagement tool. Additionally, stakeholders could get involved online through email, Twitter, Facebook, and by telephone, in writing, and in person. Stakeholders became more engaged with the process. For example, in its first year, Let’s-talk involved over eight thousand citizens in debates about the future of the city, which thereby helped to define outcomes and determine interventions. A 3-year budgeting framework was employed instead of traditional annual budgeting not merely to highlight the scale of cuts to citizens, although it had this effect, but to improve planning, priority setting and marshalling resources as a means to both strengthen resilience against austerity and combat short term salami slicing cuts that would undermine financial and service sustainability of the council. The online budget simulator gave citizens a range of potential policy options for cuts and growth and also around funding choices, including increasing or reducing council tax. With regard to budget changes the impact assessment templates – a form of public value account - specifically recorded the financial cost of a budget proposal and the department that spent the money. They also recorded the efficiency and effectiveness of performance measures and how the proposals linked back to the Fairness Commission principles to assess the benefit to certain client groups or broader community. Within the context of cost-benefit analysis, all processes of public deliberation relating to the proposals were recorded as part of the democratic governance arrangements. The impact assessment templates were also monitored and an audit trail showing how decisions evolved through democratic deliberation was made available on-line for public scrutiny. As part of these processes there was an amount of controversy given the nature of budget cuts deemed necessary. This included protests from the grassroots that got local and national media attention and reflected a momentum for protests against austerity and cuts across England more generally, especially relating to central and local government relations. However, in contrast to the protests, NCC were also able to enrol citizens in helping with for example governance for adult services, service delivery for libraries and funding for the arts, and with other institutions for investment in the future of the city such as Newcastle University regarding the Science City development.

The changes at NCC were not unique around civic engagement, and indeed are more reflective of a broader field level change across English local government (Ahrens and Ferry 2015, 2016, Ferry and Ahrens, 2017; Ferry, Coombs and Eckersley, 2017). For example, other local authorities also established fairness commissions or similar arrangements that were grounded in localism ideas. From mid-2010 to mid-2013 there were twelve fairness commissions established that included members from councils in core cities of Newcastle, Liverpool, Sheffield and Bristol. There were also similar developments in other areas such as the establishment for Greater Manchester of a poverty commission and at Birmingham of a social inclusion consultation process (Sillett and O'Donnell, 2013). Many areas have replicated the process since with Greenwich announcing at the end of 2016 it would establish a Fairness Commission headed by Sir Bob Kerslake (Former Head of the Civil Service and Local Authority Chief Executive). Also NCC was not the only council to engage detailed consultation and a form of impact assessment template with Liverpool, Sheffield and Birmingham for example employing similar accounting and accountability technologies to varying degrees. Since then other councils have followed this process such as Manchester for example who have begun detailed public consultations in 2016 and embraced 3-year budgets running from 2017-2020, which is something NCC had already undertaken (Ahrens and Ferry, 2015, 2016; Ferry and Ahrens, 2017). Beyond the field level change of English local government there were also implications for institutional change at the level of democracy. This is best expressed through the significant local government, interest group and citizen protests against the central government's austerity policy that were highly visible throughout England and questioned their democratic mandate to govern in such a way. Austerity is therefore also tied up with other big issues concerning devolution and Brexit that have engendered questions around citizenship and civic engagement (Ferry and Eckersley, 2017).

In an attempt to stimulate further debate around austerity and prosperity, and responsibilities for encouraging civic engagement, the research of Professor Laurence Ferry (Durham University) into accounting for austerity and related citizenship, civic engagement and accountability practices at Newcastle City Council and in English local government, alongside that of colleague Ileana Steccolini (Newcastle University) who considered similar issues in international settings, is being made into a theatre jazz musical play ‘The Austerity Playbook’.

This is to be performed at Northern Stage Theatre Newcastle on 1 November 2017 as part of the international Freedom City festival that marks 50 years since Martin Luther King was awarded a doctorate, and gave a speech that highlighted the problems of racism, poverty and war. The play in particular tackles the issue of poverty in the context of austerity within the North East and is located in the mythical city of Burnside where characters come together in a space where the human cost of austerity brings its playbook into stark view. The performance features the collaboration between jazz composer Andrea Vicari, writer Mark O’Thomas and director André Pink, presenting a new piece of musical theatre in a workshop performance that will demonstrate how the arts can work alongside ground-breaking components of research. The workshop performance will be followed by a post-show discussion with the artistic team and researchers.

In addition, to generate meaningful discussion around accountability issues concerning local government that engender citizenship and civic engagement, Professor Laurence Ferry’s research has been made into a short animated video on local accountability for public money in a post-Brexit world that can be viewed on u-tube at: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GDAZEicHGU4> (Ferry, 2017a). This suggests the current accountability framework for local government is geared to prevent financial failure, with the consequence of ongoing financial pressure leading to service, rather than financial, failures. As a starting point to strengthen the arrangements, it is suggested a more holistic model is needed to ensure ‘all’ key elements of effective local government are assessed including financial sustainability, service performance, governance and culture. With regards to citizenship and civic engagement, culture is especially important here (Ferry, Coombs and Eckersley, 2017) as every region has its own unique history, geography and politics. One area for further consideration is greater emphasis on place based accountability rather than hierarchical levels of accountability per se, as part of a move from ‘tiers’ to ‘spheres’ of accountability (Ferry, 2017b).

In summary, it can be seen that much work is ongoing concerning citizenship and civic engagement in the arena of local and central government relations around the politics of the budgeting process and accountability practices. An issue of some importance is should a more holistic framework be in place to strengthen accountability arrangements.

Five Nations Network – written evidence (CCE0160)

About the Five Nations Network

1. The Five Nations Network is a unique forum sharing practice in education for Citizenship and values in England, Ireland, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The work is generously funded by the Gordon Cook Foundation, and managed by the Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT). The Five Nations Network is also recognised as a Council of Europe Regional Network of the Education for Democratic Citizenship and Human Rights Education programme.
2. Each year an annual conference brings together teachers, policy makers, NGOs, academics and others from each nation to explore and discuss citizenship and values education. In January 2018 the eighteenth conference will take place on the theme of 'Democratic talk: from debate to deliberation'. Information on previous conferences is available at www.fivenations.net/annual-conferences
3. Since 2009, the Five Nations Network has also supported teachers and educators to take forward development projects on citizenship and values education. The purpose of each is to support the development of effective citizenship practice and to support teacher's own professional development. Information about these projects can be found on the Five Nations website at www.fivenations.net/research-funding
4. The work of the Five Nations Network is overseen by a Strategy Group. The group comprises two 'country leads' for each nation, the Five Nations lead trustee from the Gordon Cook Foundation and staff from the Association for Citizenship Teaching. The group meets several times each year.
5. This submission is made by members of the Strategy Group and in response to the Committee's enquiry questions 5 and 12.

Citizenship education in the Five Nations

6. There are different definitions and approaches to citizenship education across the jurisdictions in the Five Nations Network. However, there is considerable agreement about what is at the heart of citizenship education and that every young person has a right, as well as an entitlement to high quality citizenship and values education. The aim of citizenship education is to equip young people to work together to take action on issues of common concern in their communities and in wider society. This requires knowledge and understanding for example, about how democracy works, and developing skills to work with others and take informed and responsible action. The different approaches to citizenship education are summarised below.
7. In England, Citizenship is a compulsory National Curriculum Foundation subject in secondary schools and must be taught to all pupils aged 11-16 in maintained schools where the National Curriculum must be followed (currently 35% of secondary schools in England are maintained). Non-state maintained schools can choose whether they provide Citizenship in their curriculum and this has led to a decline in citizenship teaching. In primary education Citizenship has a non-statutory national framework which schools can choose to use to plan their provision. GCSE and 'A' level qualifications in Citizenship Studies are used in some schools to recognise student achievement.

8. In Ireland, Civic, Social and Political Education (CSPE) includes Citizenship and Human Rights Education. It is compulsory for Junior Cycle students until the summer of 2019. The Junior Cycle programme (pupils aged 12-15) has been completely revised and CSPE has now become part of a Wellbeing suite of subjects (CSPE, SPHE and PE) which has been implemented for students who commenced secondary education in September 2016. September 2016 saw the introduction of Politics and Society as part of the Leaving Certificate, the Senior Cycle (aged 15-18) curriculum. This new course in Citizenship, Politics and Sociology is being rolled out over a number of years in schools. Citizenship Education is part of the primary school curriculum in Ireland - an integral part of Social, Personal and Health Education (SPHE), particularly Strand 3: Myself and the Wider World.
9. In Northern Ireland Local and Global Citizenship is a statutory component of the post-primary curriculum (at Key Stage 3 and 4 age 11-16). It is part of a learning area called 'Learning for Life and Work', which also includes Personal Development and Employability. In the primary curriculum, citizenship issues are covered in the statutory learning area 'Personal Development and Mutual Understanding'. The Council for Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) offer a GCSE qualification in 'Learning for Life and Work' which serves as one route for fulfilling the statutory requirements at Key Stage 4.
10. In Scotland, citizenship is understood as a cross cutting theme that permeates the whole curriculum and school life. It is taught in some schools as part of a Modern Studies programme. Citizenship can be seen as being embedded in the Curriculum for Excellence framework. Recently Learning for Sustainability has been described as an entitlement for all school children in Scotland and this includes a range of citizenship themes.
11. In Wales citizenship education has been a non-statutory part of Personal and Social Education (PSE) and Education for Sustainable Development and Global Citizenship (ESDGC), where the main emphasis is on skills development, in particular critical thinking skills. Both active and global citizenship feature in the Welsh Baccalaureate Qualification which has a Global Citizenship Challenge as part of the newly designed qualification. Following the 'Donaldson Report' and review of the national curriculum, a new curriculum for Wales will be available in 2018. As yet it is unclear whether and where citizenship education will be included in the new curriculum.

Citizenship education across the Five Nations – issues and action

12. While there are differences in the culture, the context for and the development of citizenship education in the different jurisdictions of the Five Nations, at a general level, some of the issues facing citizenship education are very similar. These include:
 - policy uncertainty leading to issues of the visibility and status of citizenship education
 - a need for greater clarity about the role and purpose of citizenship education among teachers, so that the ambitions and aims of the curriculum translate into high quality provision with clear learning expectations

- a lack of training to support both new and in-service teachers in citizenship education.

Issues

13. A number of more specific issues have been identified in each jurisdiction and these are set out below.

England

14. Citizenship education in England has suffered a series of setbacks in recent years. The impression that the subject was under threat in the curriculum review, meant momentum was lost. This led to fewer teachers being trained, fewer identifying as citizenship teachers, fewer students being entered for citizenship studies exams, and in many schools this has led to subject being marginalised in a busy curriculum where other priorities prevail. This neglect has been compounded as other related agendas, such as fundamental British values, SMSC, Prevent, and the National Citizens Service have all been promoted separately and not embedded within a citizenship education framework. In reality these separate initiatives would be strengthened if they featured within an overarching framework for promoting democratic citizenship.
15. Whilst citizenship remains in the national curriculum at key stages 3-4, it is still not an entitlement for all students because the rise of academies and free schools, with freedoms to interpret the requirements and devise their own curriculum, means they can ignore or underplay citizenship; the emphasis on EBacc encourages schools to emphasise other subjects; and Ofsted has a limited role in monitoring such a specific entitlement. In addition the restricted version of citizenship represented in the current curriculum means full implementation would be inadequate for developing informed and active citizens. This requires a greater focus on skills and conceptual development. Similarly the non-statutory guidance at key stages 1-2 insufficiently describes effective citizenship and does not prepare students adequately for further learning. This needs to be updated and it would make sense to write a coherent curriculum across all key stages.
16. Against this backdrop of policy problems, it is important to remember that a number of schools have consistently developed high quality citizenship education since the subject was introduced in the national curriculum in England. There is therefore a wealth of expertise and models of good practice to draw on in order to improve this situation. Some of these teachers work through established networks such as the Association for Citizenship Teaching, the Five Nations Network and the Expert Subject Advisory Group for Citizenship.

Ireland

17. In the 2009 International Civic and Citizenship Study (ICCS) across 38 countries Ireland was placed seventh overall demonstrating that young people has a reasonable knowledge and understanding of Civic and Citizenship issues in Ireland, in Europe and around the world.
18. The Junior Cycle curriculum (for pupils aged 12 to 15) is undergoing reform at present and being re-shaped and re-purposed to include a greater focus on the development of key skills and critical thinking and reflection³⁶⁸. Within this curriculum reform CSPE is now part of the Wellbeing area³⁶⁹ of learning. Some would argue that this strengthens the status of CSPE within the curriculum as Wellbeing demands a whole school approach and a sizeable amount of curriculum time (growing from 300 hours to 400 hours in the period 2017 to 2020). Others would argue that it may be losing its identity in an area of learning that is perceived as being predominantly about mental health and physical wellbeing, as society reacts to increased rates of teenage suicide and childhood obesity. Only time will tell!

19. In the reformed curriculum the Action component has been strengthened in the new specification. Students are required to undertake one Action in each curriculum strand – meaning a total of three actions compared with two in the old Syllabus. How meaningful/political/radical these Actions may be is largely at the discretion of the teacher and his/her students.
20. However, one major change is that CSPE will no longer be part of the national assessment carried out but the State Examinations Commission from 2019. It will then be assessed at school level with a Classroom-based Assessment (CBA)³⁷⁰. Many would argue that this is a fundamental weakening of the status of CSPE.

Northern Ireland

21. Whilst citizenship education in Northern Ireland is statutory, the subject is afforded low status within schools, evident in the limited curricular time given to the subject and the lack of specialist teachers delivering it.
22. In initial teacher education there is some provision for some student teachers to be supported in the delivery of citizenship education, but there is no provision for continued professional development and support. Recently however, schools involved in the Shared Education initiative have been able to avail of training related to citizenship, provided by the Education Authority.
23. The location of citizenship education within the learning area Learning for Life and Work has resulted in citizenship education becoming overly conflated with personal development and education for employability, resulting in a dilution of the political aspects of the curriculum. As such young people are not receiving a sound grounding in ‘political literacy’ aspects of the citizenship curriculum particularly in relation to democracy and human rights, and report superficial engagement with more controversial aspects of citizenship associated with living in a divided conflict affected society.
24. The citizenship curriculum in NI is over 10 years old and whilst most of the content remains suitable, a review would be appropriate, particularly in relation to encouraging active citizenship and children and young people’s exercise of their civil and political rights. There is a need for consideration to be given to progression in citizenship education i.e. how content for Personal Development and Mutual Understanding (in the primary curriculum) relates to content for Local and Global Citizenship at KS3 and KS4 and to both the new GCSE in Politics and its relationship to the existing GCSE in Learning for Life and Work. Further, greater support needs to be given to teachers in the delivery of controversial issues.

Scotland

25. There are four overarching capacities within Curriculum for Excellence (CfE); one of these being Responsible Citizens. Whilst Citizenship is not a discrete subject within CfE, it is a responsibility that all teachers in Scotland have. As citizenship is a cross-cutting theme teachers have a degree of flexibility to embed citizenship themes, values and skills into their teaching, whatever their subject area is.
26. The term ‘learning for sustainability’ is relatively new in Scotland. However, the substance of what it represents will be familiar. Many schools, early learning and childcare settings will know this as global citizenship and will rightly connect it with the work they are doing in, for example, outdoor learning, children’s rights, sustainable development education, international education and education for citizenship. The extent to which meaningful citizenship education will feature as part of this entitlement remains unclear.

Wales

27. Citizenship in Wales has been included in one of the four purposes of the new curriculum ‘ethical informed citizens of Wales and the world’. However, there are concerns that its explicit reference (in terms of curriculum content) may be lost within the areas of learning and experience.

Action

28. In 2009 the Five Nations Network published ‘Citizenship and values education to the rescue! A call to action by the Five Nations Network’³⁷¹. The rationale for this call to action remains highly relevant today:
 - that children are growing up in a complex, changing and uncertain world;
 - public distrust in politics and politicians continues; and
 - the rise of extremism and far right politics is a concern across the Five Nations.

In addition, the UK and Ireland is facing a range of highly charged political and citizenship issues following the decision of the UK to leave the European Union. Many children and young people are concerned about the future and what this means for them and their communities. The need for high quality citizenship education is greater now than ever.

29. The Five Nations call for action sets an agenda for citizenship education much of which still needs to be realised, including:

Fixers – written evidence (CCE0191)

Submission by Chris Podszus – Policy, Research & Public Affairs Officer

Introduction

The purpose of this submission is to offer insight and evidence to the Select Committee by providing a perspective on ‘voice’ as the agent of social change, integration and civic engagement. Of interest will be how ‘left behind’ groups, especially young people and ethnic minority communities, can be integrated into the wider civic culture through empowering them to articulate their voices – not merely as a form of communication but also as a tool of positive social change and civic engagement. This submission will first introduce Fixers as an organisation before proceeding to address each of the three subject areas while answering questions where applicable. Due to our unique approach to youth participation this submission will focus on our experience of enabling social integration as a youth social action charity.

As a UK-wide not-for-profit charity, Fixers works with a range of organisations and social groups in 86% of local authority areas across the UK. Since it was established in 2008, there have been over 20,000 young people who have become ‘Fixers’, 44% from the ‘top’ 20% of areas of multiple deprivation across the UK. (What is Fixers?) This speaks to Fixers’ commitment to working with young people in the 16-25 age range, from a range of backgrounds, providing they want to improve people’s lives and are committed to social change for the better.

The core to Fixers’ philosophy is our ‘Voice as Value’ approach to engaging with young people, especially socially isolated and underrepresented groups. Fixers’ mission as a charity is to help these young people get their voices heard by the key individuals, institutions and organisations who can help make change happen and society at large to change attitudes – thereby instituting change when their voices are valued. As our Voice as Value \(2015\) report indicates, there is a positive outcome for both audience and communicators in the articulation of voice – both benefit from young people obtaining recognition of their lived experience and point of view. For the audience (often practitioners/policy makers) there are benefits in listening and learning from young peoples’ perspectives articulated from the lived experiences (of migrant and/or service user). Fixers helps young people communicate their voices free from any organisational agenda or pre-conceived notions of what young people think. We are only interested in getting young people’s voices heard and valued by those who make decisions effecting their lives; because we believe that the real experts are those that know the most about the lives of young people – the young people themselves.

Communicating Citizenship: Voice as a Tool for Integration

As stated above, the ‘voice as value’ approach to youth and civic engagement focuses upon placing marginalised voices at the forefront of integration by creating the space for hitherto ‘left behind’ groups or individuals to articulate their voices to an institutional audience thereby creating better understanding, improved self-confidence amongst participants and higher levels of trust – all essential for overcoming the social capital deficit within such groups and enabling both the ‘left behind’ and the ‘institutions’ to come together around a shared understanding of the others’ lives and respect. This is important because of the well documented declining levels of trust amongst ‘left behind’ groups – and society more widely – of institutions and the much derided, but nebulous, ‘Establishment’.

The process of articulating voice and, more importantly, receiving recognition from the wider society, builds social capital (defined here as increased trust levels, greater self-confidence and empathy between participant and audience) that is essential for any individual or community to thrive in society. As Fixers’ own research demonstrates, experiencing voice as value changes the way young people ‘think about their own identity, the way they think about others and the way they feel they are perceived and understood’ (Voice as Value, 2015). Indeed, research has shown that social action has many positive outcomes for young people who participate, including empathy, cooperation and a sense of community. (Birdwell et al. 2015) The establishing of empathy and trust between participants and decision-makers is an essential part of building relationships and effecting social change through collective action – all of which helps integrate ‘left behind’ groups into a larger sense of belonging. As Marshall Ganz has observed, the communication of young people’s voices and stories (or ‘narrative’) can engender ‘empathetic experience’ between participants in social action and those in positions of authority. (Ganz, 2017) Fixers’ voice-led approach to social action creates the social space in which empathy can emerge between participants and this lays the foundations for the effective creation of social cohesiveness and .

Evidence of the Impact of Voice on Citizenship, Integration and Civic Engagement

Social Integration

Fixers acts on behalf of 16-25 year olds, often from marginalised or ignored groups in society, by helping them to communicate their voices across a wide range of platforms aiming to achieve new levels of understanding and empathy, increase our understanding of others’ lives and create positive social change.

As a charity, we offer a unique approach to social integration through empowering young people to overcome disadvantage, inequalities and ensuring society responds to what young people are saying; through communicating the voices of young people, to better inform the public's understanding of the lived experiences of young people, we increase institutional knowledge and awareness about issues they are facing and we communicate alternative viewpoints to a wide array of audiences across all parts of the UK and all demographics. This allows groups of young people – whether they come from an ethnic minority community or a disadvantaged social grouping – to engage with wider society and provides a means for achieving integration through the articulation of voice.

Our culture is based on listening and telling stories, unlocking real life expertise of the young people we support. Several aspects of the Fixers programme justify the word 'unique': Fixers does not turn away, or filter, anyone; the young people lead and choose their own issues; Fixers highly skilled staff turn their ideas into powerful, high-quality authentic content which is delivered to key audiences; we take the content to where people are rather than expecting them to come to us which guarantees delivery and we are not restricted by issue: we work on every subject as identified by the people living through them stimulating understanding around cultural and heritage issues, issues of stigma, community and identity, diversity and alternative viewpoints, reflecting diversity.

Fixers has previously worked with young people collectively on health issues such as eating disorders, mental health and gender identity. In each of these issue areas Fixers has assisted health practitioners and policy makers understand these issues through the expertise of marginalised groups and the inclusion of their voices in decision making structures has allowed them to gain a sense of empowerment and ownership as they become active participants. The benefits of the voice as value approach to participants and society is evidenced in the positive impact it has beyond the immediate participation in social action. Each young person that participates becomes better connected to the society around them, they gain a greater understanding of their obligations as citizens and the positive contributions they can continue to make to their society. (Edwards, 2015) Further to this, as recent research has demonstrated, 85% of young people that take part in Fixers social action campaigns continue to play an active role in society, campaigning on the issue they worked on with Fixers or branching out into other issue areas. (McKenna, 2016) Fixers, as a social action charity, is able to achieve this through our voice-led approach to youth participation; we are able to provide disadvantaged and socially isolated groups in society the means to participate, and those overcome their isolation, by putting them in contacts with wider social and professional networks, like-minded organisations and direct, one-to-one support from a team of Fixers personnel ranging from young people coordinators (YPCs) assisting them from the start to communications officers helping them get their voices heard by institutions and decision-makers.

Recently arrived migrants

In terms of the integration of recent migrant arrivals, Fixers has worked on numerous projects with young refugees and migrants in the 16-25 year old age bracket. From projects seeking to challenge myths about asylum seekers in the UK to Skhumbuzo Khumalo's campaign about LGBT women refugees from Zimbabwe; each Fixers project with migrant communities or individuals provides a platform for the articulation of their voices within the process of naturalisation, settlement and integration. By allowing migrants to communicate their voices, it allows for the flow of dialogue between stakeholders, communities and the migrants themselves which in our experience forms an integral part of the process of integration of new arrivals as this serves to increase understanding and breakdown barriers to socialisation.

The success of these projects speaks to how Fixers' 'voice as value' approach can serve as a means for achieving integration through communication – a key part in any process of assimilation. As previously noted, our voice as value approach has both positive impacts for both the communicator and audience – in this case, the migrant/refugee and society/service providers respectively. For the migrants, the positive outcomes stem from them having the opportunity to articulate their voices and receiving recognition of their lived experiences or point of view; for those working with migrants or for the wider community, they gain an invaluable insight into the lived experience of the communicator free from organisational agendas or pre-conceived notions.

A further benefit of this approach is that recently arrived migrants can communicate their voices via a range of media platforms – ranging from social media to regional television – and directly to audiences that may not be usually receptive to a migrant's message unfiltered by institutions or societal preconceptions. In turn, this allows the communicator to challenge stigma, preconceptions and harmful stereotypes in a way that would be difficult through institutional media. Without the support of an organisation like Fixers, such voices are left unheard and neglected from policy debates that directly affect migrants but which presently do not properly represent them. This is true for many other 'left behind' groups on a whole host of issues.

Settled ethnic minority communities

As with recent migrant arrivals, Fixers has worked with many young people from across a wide range of minority groupings on issues relating to discrimination, racism and social isolation. Fixer projects such as Terrain Watte-Lee's campaign, which aimed to challenge negative stereotypes of black youths, or Lyla Asif who led a Fixers campaign challenging attitudes within the British Asian community towards people with disabilities. In particular with the latter example, Fixers have sought to provide a platform for the articulation of voices from socially isolated groups existing within ethnic or racial minority communities – arguably the least socially integrated groups due to their positions within their communities which are themselves less integrated.

As with all Fixer projects, we aim to empower unheard voices through obtaining recognition and value regarding their views and experiences. By empowering socially isolated ethnic minority groups through the articulation of voice, in our experience, this breaks down barriers to social integration by allowing certain groups to speak for themselves rather than through community or institutional voice – which often comes with its own agenda and priorities that can often be unrepresentative of those they are meant to represent. It is through the articulation of voice that minority groups can be integrated into society by giving them a sense of empowerment, engagement and buy-in to society that more traditional institutionalised integration processes often fail to provide. Indeed, our experience in helping socially isolated groups communicate their voices to institutions demonstrates that by allowing them to articulate positive narratives, based on their lived experiences, is beneficial for both them and their audience. By challenging established narratives and preconceptions, while increasing understanding and empathy, both groups benefit through open dialogue and positive communication – this is essential for any process of integration as both need to understand, empathise and communicate as a prerequisite for social cohesion.

Foundation for Social Improvement – written evidence (CCE0063)

The FSI represents 5960 small charities (local, regional, national and international) and community group organisational members across the UK with an income under £1.5 million per annum. We have three clear aims, which are:

- a) Champion the role of these organisations within civil society, providing a collective voice to influence locally and nationally through engagement, campaigning and collaboration. Working with our membership, we listen to their issues and raise these with decision-makers
- b) To build skills, knowledge and expertise within our member organisations through the delivery of online webinars, training and information videos and resources, face to face training, workshops and conferences, remote and face to face advice and qualifications. We cover a wide range of subjects, fundraising (all methodologies), impact measurement, governance, case for support and strategy.

Our overarching aim is to build a more efficient, effective, accountable and sustainable small charity sector recognised for the contribution it makes in delivering a stronger civil society across the UK.

Executive summary

We surveyed our members for this call for evidence and all respondents supported the broad aims of the National Citizens Service of social cohesion, social mobility and social engagement. However it should be more explicit that social cohesion encompasses the acceptance and appreciation of differences. Young people should not only seek to integrate with other young people from different backgrounds but should also include different inter-generational groups and those with disabilities.

Programmes should be aimed at young people as they become more self-aware, not only of their own capabilities but of how they interact and could integrate with their counterparts and the wider community.

More opportunities should be created to encourage volunteering, whole community engagement and for young people to understand the power of community involvement and their voice in civic engagement.

Everyone should play a part in encouraging young people to become active in civic engagement and that small local charities (third sector organisations) be at the centre through the provision of forums, work experience, engagement with educational institutions and by supporting their beneficiary groups to be active citizens.

National government plays a crucial role through providing funding, training and facilitating collaboration.

Questions: 1/2/3/4/5 No response

Question 6

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

80 per cent of respondents believed that the aims of the National Citizen Service would achieve the goal of creating active citizenship.

96 per cent of respondents believed that the overall aims of the National Citizen Service were appropriate and played a positive role in creating active citizens. Respondents also believed that as well as fostering understanding about different backgrounds, cohesion should also encompass the acceptance and appreciation of differences, and the integration and understanding of different inter-generational groups and those with disabilities.

When asked if participation in the National Citizen Service should be compulsory 52 per cent felt that it should not be compulsory. Those who felt it should be compulsory (48 per cent) said the programme should start with students at Key Stage 4, year 10 to 11 and be incorporated in the PCSCE subject syllabus, when students are becoming more self-aware and aware of their counter parts and how their involvement with others, from all backgrounds, could make a positive change in their communities. Participation in the National Citizen Service would continue through to Key Stage 5, Years 12 to 13.

A majority of respondents did not favour adding a greater political element to the National Citizen Service programme (59 per cent), and a more public citizenship ceremony would be welcomed by 68 per cent of respondents.

When asked if the National Citizen Service provided good value for money 23 per cent agreed, 28 per cent disagreed and 49 per cent said they didn't know.

Three key areas emerged in respect of opportunities that exist to create active citizens:

- Volunteering: Encouraging young people to get involved (volunteer) with local civil society organisations. Civil Society organisations should make community volunteering opportunities available for younger people that take advantage of their experiences as well as building their skills for future life.

- Community Engagement: Schools should engage with more local civil society groups to showcase the value of their work. Encourage younger people to collaborate with local civil society groups to develop in school projects to deliver against a local challenge.
- Understanding: Community programmes be developed that encourage young people to believe that their views matter and support them to become aware of the power of their voice if they make it heard locally, regionally, nationally and internationally.

Question 7

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

92 per cent of respondents believed that charities (third sector organisations) should promote and encourage civic engagement. Many of our respondents stated that many small local charities offer opportunities for civic engagement to young people and, through their (small local charities) understanding of local communities, know how to move young people in the correct direction towards a life of civic engagement. Specific engagement opportunities that could be provided by small local charities (third sector organisations) included:

- Provision of short work experience opportunities that would provide a wider view of local communities and the opportunity to mix with people from different backgrounds, ages and abilities.
- Provide forums for young people to engage in local democracy by amplifying what is important to them and guiding them to responsible activism.
- Attending school, college and university career events.
- Be commissioned to provide engagement opportunities for young people to experience, reflect and learn about civic engagement.
- Work proactively with their beneficiary groups to understand the extent to which they can play a specific role in the promotion of civic engagement through spreading awareness of the issues they face and by making links with other parts of the community.

Many respondents commented that both central government and devolved and local government are not proactive enough in recognising the huge contributions that smaller local organisations make to community welfare. They could improve this through a more focussed programme of supporting volunteers and volunteering:

- Local government provide a platform from which small local charities can promote their work and opportunities for involvement with local communities to young people.
- Local government to provide forums where young people from all sections of the community can come together to focus on respect for others and pride in their local area.

Respondents were keen to suggest a number of ways that central government could support small local charities to increase civic engagement within their local communities:

Funding:

- Provide funding for programmes that can demonstrate that they facilitate civic engagement and that the programmes result in an increase of civic engagement that delivers positive outcomes within the local community.
- Meet overhead costs for the provision of programmes that promote, facilitate and deliver civic engagement i.e. transport, venue costs etc.
- As suggested above, provide seed funding for the co-production of school and civil society organisation projects that meet a local challenge.

Training:

- Support local civic engagement events/programmes etc. through the provision of training on how to raising awareness through marketing and communications activities, project management, leadership etc.

Collaboration:

- Promote meaningful collaboration between local young people and small local civil society organisations.
- Involve small local civil society organisations at all levels when exploring, developing and implementing. Involvement in co-planning events through their knowledge of and reach into their local communities.
- Use of local data, held by small local civil society organisations, to provide a local narrative to national statistics.

Question 8/9/10/11 no response

Question 12

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Members were asked what initiatives they were aware of that supported young people to be active citizens:

- Girl Guides, Scouts and other similar organisations
- Youth projects delivered through Volunteer Centres
- Educational establishment volunteering programmes
- Organisations like ACT and the Citizenship Foundation
- Eastside and Southside Young Leaders Academy (London)
- Creative Youth Network, Babassa, Princes Trust (Bristol)
- Valleys Kids (Tonypandy)

Members were also asked to put forward suggestions of role models for young people who were aspiring to be active citizens. Whilst there are role models out there, who you choose would depend on the interests of the young people you were trying to engage, therefore responses focussed on groups:

- Young activists and campaigners can be a great example to young people to encourage involvement
- To look to themselves (young people) to be role models at community level, encouraging their peers.
- It was commented that the use of celebrities and public figures can be seen as being either too far from reality for some young people or can raise unrealistic aspirations.

Good Things Foundation – written evidence (CCE0206)

Summary:

1. This response focuses on three key areas:
 - Good Things Foundation and the Online Centres Network as an example of an organisation which supports both civic engagement and social cohesion and integration
 - Some of the barriers to active citizenship faced by adults, and our Theory of Change
 - Our experience of delivering a major English language programme - English My Way - supported by the Department for Communities and Local Government, and its impact on community integration.

We have also put forward recommendations for consideration by the committee.

Good Things Foundation and the Online Centres Network as an example of best practice

2. Working with a hyperlocal network of 5,000 community partners, Good Things has a significant reach and scale. Set up originally as a network to tackle digital exclusion by providing free or low cost support in using the internet, it has evolved to become a network which supports disadvantaged people in some of England's poorest communities to come together in vibrant and positive ways, creating more socially cohesive and engaged communities. We believe we have a model for community cohesion and civic engagement which could be built on.
3. This is demonstrated through the range of outcomes we support individuals to achieve. In 2016-17, we supported 266,910 people, of whom we helped:
 - 230,484 (86.35%) individuals to achieve digital outcomes, helping them to improve their basic digital skills and use the internet on a regular basis
 - 216,245 (81.02%) individuals to achieve economic outcomes, helping them progress to further learning or better employment, and improving financial literacy
 - 230,729 (86.44%) individuals to achieve health and social outcomes, helping them to improve their health, wellbeing, and social connections.
4. All of the 5,000 Online Centres are different to one another. There is no formula; it is not a franchise. Each one is separate from Good Things Foundation; they are all independently owned, managed and funded. The common bond is a shared vision of a 100% digitally skilled nation, a commitment to provide free or low cost support to help people learn how to use the internet, and a passion for social change within their local community.

5. All Online Centres do something else as well as digital skills support, such as run a community venue, host a youth club or older people's club, offer other informal or formal learning, or loan books. There is no cost to join the network, and most Centres will not receive any funding or financial support from Good Things Foundation. It is not primarily a financial bond.
6. Online Centres are often found in community centres and public libraries, but they can also often be found in village halls, places of worship (churches, mosques, synagogues and temples), cafes, social housing, old people's homes, on mobile buses, in pubs, clubs and bingo halls. One began as a fish and chip shop in Stockport, whose managers were determined to help local people find work. Many are local community organisations who also support people through other learning, for example learning to speak English as a second language, or learning other computer skills. The vast majority are open to the public, although some aren't - for example those based in factories, or Women's Hostels. The definition of a Centre is not fixed - it could be a computer in a village hall, four laptops or tablets taken into a pub on a Friday morning, or 50 computers in a school lab being used in the evening. Each Centre is based on the needs of the individual community it serves.
7. Simply put, we reach the parts of the UK that other organisations don't or can't reach, by creating a movement which small, hyperlocal and committed groups and organisations want to be part of.
8. We power a movement of public sector partners, corporates, community organisations, volunteers, and the Online Centres Network, and together we tackle some of society's toughest problems. We make lasting social change happen through empowering and embedding new behaviours and relationships. Our local partners are very important; they are grassroots organisations who understand the experiences and needs of the people they support every day in their local communities, and who are passionate and motivated to make change. Our collective impact, across all our partners, is greater than any one would achieve alone. We provide the energy, the openness, and the drive to pull it all together to make it work.
9. We lead a movement for social change. We create a long-term, meaningful and sustainable relationship with everyone in this movement based on shared vision and social action. Bringing partners together with a common goal has succeeded for digital inclusion, now we want to achieve this success with social inclusion more broadly, solving some of society’s most intractable problems.

Barriers to active citizenship

10. Through our research, we’ve uncovered that a major barrier to achieving outcomes - including civic engagement - relates to poor mental and emotional wellbeing and lack of support. Our theory of change is about supporting resilient people and communities. Over the past two years we carried out a Longitudinal Learner Study which demonstrated that our centres deal in relationships with learners, often over a period of months or years - rather than shorter, more transactional services.
11. Recognising the importance of these relationships and emotional support as fundamental to learning, Good Things developed a theory of change based on people’s emotional willingness to engage at different levels. We worked with centre managers and learners to develop a theory of change in participation with those people affected by the change. In general, people arrive at a centre distressed, and leave happier and more able to cope with the rest of their day:

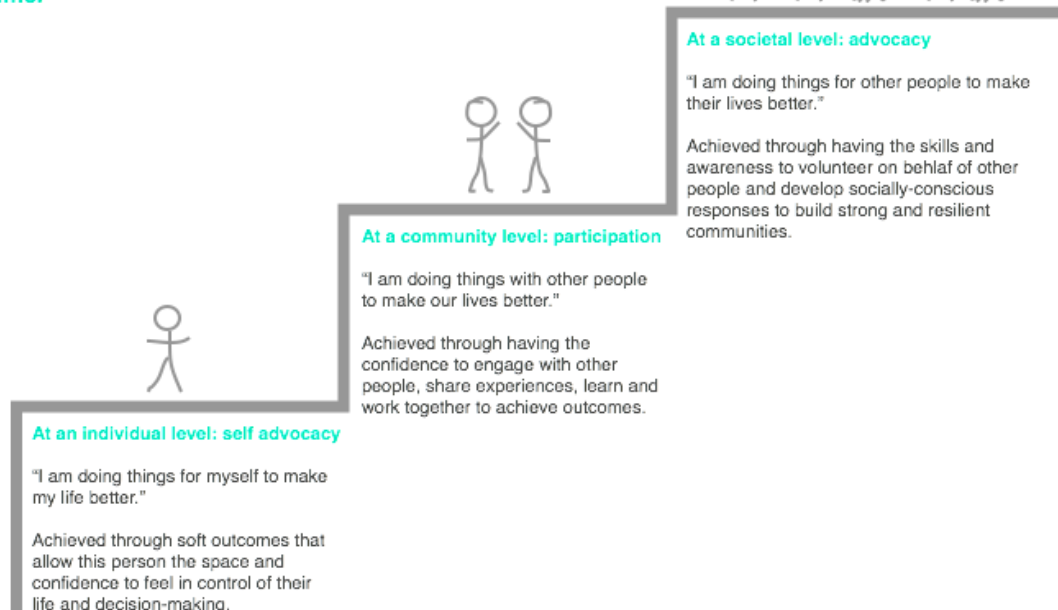

12. We have pin-pointed the triggers that affect a person’s emotional state:

13. From this, we developed a theory of change based on engaging at three levels: an individual, community and societal level.

We think people come together to create powerful and resilient communities. Resilient communities start with resilient people. We want to support people to be active agents in changing their lives, communities and society, one step at a time.

14. In order for change to occur in the lives of individuals, Online Centres need to be able to respond to whoever comes through their door, whatever challenges they face. This is not an easy ask. In times of austerity, where funding streams continue to shrink, the divide between those who not only survive but flourish and those who struggle to exist, continues to grow. Online Centres have an open door policy. This means that they are seeing more people whose needs are desperate and complex.

15. Knowing and being able to negotiate the system, or the systems, in which the people have to operate is crucial. Individuals may have physical and mental health needs, face language barriers, be at risk of losing their home and have no personal support networks to draw upon. They also rely on public services, but often struggle to meet the demands that these place on them. Many centres support individuals to navigate and resolve interlinked and complex problems.
16. They do this with very little resource, through persistence and personality. However this places them in a position of vulnerability. Their funding is often precarious and short-term, but they are being expected to absorb more. Even if centres have fantastic staff and volunteers, it is often very difficult for them to sustain themselves as businesses.
17. But some Online Centres have found a way to not only meet the range of complex needs that people present with, but to flourish. This is the networked network. A network of Online Centres who work participatively with other centres and wider organisations in their local or regional area. These include centres who have relationships with other Online Centres, health professionals (including CCGs and GPs), job centres, social housing providers, CVS, other third sectors specialists, local businesses and national charities. Accessing funding together they are also able to treat the person as a whole. This means understanding that one area of need in a person's life will impact another i.e. poor mental health due to housing worries will affect someone's willingness and ability to engage in learning and apply for work. Being outward looking and participatory also means they demonstrate positive organisational behaviours, they're keen to test new approaches, to draw learnings from others and to share ideas across a wider platform of activity, often online. We believe this approach is critical in order to support citizens to play a more active role in society.

English language skills as a gateway to social integration

18. The Casey Review, published on 5 December 2016, places a high priority on the acquisition of English language skills as one of the keys to better social integration and social mobility. In Newham, 11.1% of women are not proficient in English, with a similar proportion in other London boroughs including Tower Hamlets and Brent. As well as recommending greater government investment in community ESOL provision through central government and local authorities (via the adult skills budget), the review also noted that “greater digital awareness may also be a protective factor in improving knowledge, understanding and access to public services” and recommends investment in improving IT literacy for parents in segregated areas.

19. The most recent census data from 2011 shows that 863,000 people in England and Wales are ‘non-proficient’ in English - 726,000 can’t speak English well and 138,000 can’t speak English at all. People with low levels of English are more likely to report worse health and are three times more likely to have no educational qualifications. Of those who are employed, people with low levels of English are twice as likely to work in lower skilled jobs as those with high English proficiency.
20. Current demand for English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) provision is far greater than supply. As a result, people who want to learn English are regularly being turned away, losing out on the skills that would help them integrate into their local community and improve their life prospects. We therefore need to look to low-cost, innovative and scalable solutions.
21. Good Things Foundation’s belief that everyone should have the opportunity to participate fully in society means that our work often focusses on those who face profound barriers. This includes people who have little or no English language skills, which can make it very difficult for them to navigate British society and integrate with their wider communities.
22. For the last three years, Good Things Foundation has led a community-based English language project, called English My Way, in partnership with the BBC and British Council, to support adults with no or low levels of English language skills.
23. Funded by the Department for Communities and Local Government, the project provides pre-entry level ESOL skills through a structured 24-week blended learning programme, improving English language skills to help people better integrate with their local communities. This fresh, community-based approach to English language learning combines tutor-led sessions, rich multimedia online learning, and volunteer-supported ‘Learning Circles.’
24. English My Way has reached people with the lowest levels of English language skills, especially women, working in areas of England with high demand for English language support. The programme is currently delivered in 58 areas of the highest language within England, 23 of which are in London. During the first two years of the programme:

- 9,172 learners benefited from ESOL learning
- 70% of learners progressed to an Entry Level 1 ESOL course.

25. The English My Way website was developed as the online home of the ESOL learning programme, making flexible tutor resources and session plans available completely free. Learners in our English My Way programme reported improved self-confidence in using English with acquaintances (65%), in public (68%), and with doctors (61%), supporting greater social cohesion and community integration.

Recommendations

26. Online Centres provide opportunities for people of different faiths and cultures to come together in an informal community setting to learn new skills and build friendships. They are currently supported by around 20,000 volunteers, many of whom have started as learners within the Centres. We believe these Centres represent an untapped resource to build bridges within and between communities.
27. Our recommendation is that Government works with Good Things Foundation to consider how the Online Centres Network could be much more widely promoted to support people who are marginalised or excluded, and increase their levels of civic and community engagement. We already have a close referral relationship with Jobcentres - 36% of UK online centre users are referred by their local Jobcentre - and this referral model could be extended across other public services.
28. We also recommend that the Department for Communities and Local Government continues to invest in, and to expand, its English language programme - through which English My Way is funded - which has helped thousands of migrant women to develop the language skills they need to become more integrated within their local communities.

The meaning of citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century

The meaning of citizenship is quite broad. I think it is about belonging to a nation that values its citizens and will look out for them. Protecting them and their families and making sure that everyone within the community is heard and represented. This may be through protecting a minority's rights to exist, to healthcare and education. I feel that this should be done through engagement with the public through a variety of resources from consultation meetings and councillors, MPs etc. talking directly to the public. For the 21st Century this communication is becoming increasingly important through social media channels as much as traditional methods.

The rights and responsibilities attached to citizenship

As a citizen you should have the right to a good education standard, good healthcare, employment, a home to live in, a good environment and for your views to be able to be expressed through the political system. You have a responsibility to respect your fellow citizens and to do your best to look after your 'neighbours' and to adhere to the laws that have been granted as part of living in a co-operative system. As part of your rights, if a law is not working then you should have the opportunity to question it, raise it and see if others agree to change within a moral framework.

The state of citizenship education and the role that it plays in creating active citizenship

Citizenship education not very strong. How can people get involved in helping society? It should be taught to people how to get involved in your local community. How you can help a community, and how the community can help you?

The role of voluntary citizenship schemes such as the National Citizen Service

I think voluntary citizenship schemes are incredibly valuable in installing values within people and also letting people see other groups' points of view. Having worked with many charities this is important. For instance if you work with disabled people you learn what obstacles they have in daily life. This can mould you in decision making for the future, both in your personal life and quite often in your working life. In terms of the environment, working with an environmental group can make you appreciate the damage something simple like littering can do, or pollution. The engagement with groups you would not normally interact with is also an opportunity that breaks down barriers, like working with the homeless, religious groups that are not your own, or minority groups from other nationalities, disabled, homeless, people with additional problems etc. It helps you get an understanding of other people's issues/lives and if everybody had access to services like this it would lead to more social cohesion and a better country to live in, for them and yourself. It also opens people to new ideas and activities that they would not normally come across.

and fuels people's imagination leading to people being happier with themselves, more productive and open to new experiences, reducing problems like depression and loneliness. The question need to be asked though if the scheme is open to all or just the privileged that can let their children go? Could it be used to include other things to get children more involved like music or football?

The ways society can support civic engagement and the role of government and parliament in supporting that

For society, government and parliament to get people more engaged in civic duty it has to be made more approachable. It needs to engage people at all levels and aspects of life. People can not be led to think they are too poor or lack the education to be actively involved in creating a better environment. People need to know they can get involved in local projects and do things that can make a change not just for them but others they care about. This needs to be done more readily through more modern engagement of social media, clubs and talks and then leading onto active participation/discussion meetings and/or related activities. Communication is a strong lead in engagement, and often overlooked. People often say, I would have said something about an issue, but I found out after the event. Engaging all interested groups, even via a email, or social media invite at least would go some way in trying to get people more involved in what goes on in the country, especially when it comes to the youth. Local authorities getting the public's opinion on what they want to do to improve their area is a great start, but then when projects get up and going to get people to volunteer to see the project through and have some sense of ownership has a big impact. They then have time and effort invested in ideas and therefore tend to pay more respect to what is going on around them, often leading to engagement in future projects.

Time to get involved is often an issue, as most people work, getting actively involved in civic engagement has to be done outside a normal working life, or time needs to be made to allow people to take part in activities.

The values that all of us who live in Britain should share and supporting

To be able to be a citizen regardless of ethnicity, race, sexual orientation, religion, age, politics, class, economic standing, nationality and gender, and to have equal opportunities.

To be accepting of other even though they may be different from ourselves

To create a community where we all bond together making a safer, happier and freer environment.

To reduce obstacles of inclusion so that we can all live an easier life and all have a say

Ensure the country is left in a good state for future generations.

The relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion

A cohesive society is integral to active civic engagement. Listening to people issues/problems can give you ideas about how to help them. This can be done through civic duties like engagement with say the planning of a town centre environment. Issues that a disabled group may have can be brought into the political planning realm and overcome through dialogue with planners to make sure that all groups are included. Within a town plan different religious groups, environmental groups, disabled groups, sexual orientation groups, youth groups, healthy living groups, homeless etc. can all be included and catered for. Helping with the local political system can make sure a bit of wild area is left for a rare species, or that street furniture is placed right for say those with visual impairment. Often those in local government making the decisions are unaware of the problems groups face and these can not be heard unless the public gets engaged in the decision making processes. By working this way as previously stated you also engage with other groups that you may not interact with in your normal life. It is good to get people from all walks of life involved in dialogue together to create a country they are happy and proud to live in. Working together breaks down barriers, and in the case of the current mood in the UK reduces fears of groups of people who often have exactly the same values as yourself but different religions, sexual orientations etc.

It is important for the authorities to help people get more engaged in their local communities to create a rich social infrastructure and make a more valuable and cohesive community and environment.

This evidence is submitted in a personal capacity.

1. The shifts in the modes of civic engagement, and in public attitudes towards the political system and democracy at large, are the result of patterns and deep sociocultural changes that have been unfolding over a very long time within liberal democracies, including the UK. These include, amongst others:

- (i) the rejection, challenging or by-passing of authority and hierarchy as concepts and organising principles, which has a knock-on effect on political institutions as agents of representation
- (ii) a shift from civic duty and collective responsibility to individual identity and fulfilment (or 'self-actualisation') as the primary driver of engagement
- (iii) globalisation, which is the symptom and cause of complex, interdependent global challenges, diffused (and occasionally less transparent and accountable) networks of experts and stakeholders, and a perceived gap between the loci of decision-making and the electorate as a collective body
- (iv) digitisation, which not only favours a radically different mode of public and political communication (faster, less considered, more aggressive, more informal, potentially anonymous) but, also, fundamentally challenges the relevance of affinity with local and national communities and identities.

2. These phenomena pose fundamental, existential challenges for citizenship as we've known and defined it over the last couple of centuries because they alter the terms and conditions of the 'social contract' and blur the geographic and political boundaries of the community and of the demos. Perhaps the most important of these phenomena is the challenge to representation, i.e. the idea that individual citizens delegate power to groups of representatives chosen in a formalised, orderly manner on the basis of geographic collocation (constituencies).

3. While turnout in recent UK elections shows evidence of resilience, and while the work of parliament remains important, the challenge to representation as a concept, and the preference for more direct forms of democracy in which individuals feel like they have more control, are likely to only become more intense. Furthermore, partly due to the increasing role of affect (emotion) in public communication, we are likely to see a further intensification of personalisation – i.e. citizens having the need to identify with / vote for individual leaders, as opposed to being part of collective institutional aggregators, such as political parties.

4. Citizenship is increasingly structured and performed through ad hoc issue-oriented campaigns and identity politics. As national narratives have been declining, and as both the European Union project and institutions of global governance are facing a crisis of legitimacy and effectiveness, citizens desperately seek narratives, values and frameworks around which they can anchor their identity and assign meaning to their existence. The decline of nationalism – especially in metropolitan centres and amongst more cosmopolitan demographics – has enabled the development of vibrant multicultural communities. However, it has also created an emotional and symbolic void, that is now being covered by demographic traits (race, ethnicity, gender, sexuality), lifestyle choices (religion, dietary preferences, attitude towards animals etc) or – for a small minority of younger people – association with extremist ideologies.

5. The shift to affinity with identity groups creates multiple moral, logistical and social challenges for citizenship: it creates ‘echo chambers’ in which people are less likely to encounter the Other (these ‘filter bubbles’ are also facilitated by digital algorithms); it encourages an identity potentially built around victimhood and grievance, as opposed to enterprise and responsibility; and it positions interest and identity groups against each other in antagonistic pursuit of maximum cultural, political and economic capital.

6. The post-war rules-based framework of human rights, civil liberties and state-provided welfare, and the more recent shift towards framing citizens as users and consumers who are entitled to the provision of choice and service, has created the expectation that the political system will always continue to provide these rights and entitlements automatically, as a default position, regardless of the economic and political context. Less emphasis has been given to cultivating a sense of civic responsibility, duty, compromise, coexistence and active participation in maintaining and nurturing those values and entitlements; and to demonstrating how civic action or inaction can lead to them being taken away.

7. Based on the above analysis, changes to the nature of civic engagement and the social function of citizenship are likely to be radical and long-term. It is, therefore, unlikely that “quick fixes” or “local patches” would be able to have a substantive effect on nurturing the civic culture and citizenship as part of a balanced representative democracy. The course of civic engagement in the 21st century mirrors that of other sectors and human activities (such as journalism, travel, consumption, spirituality etc): it is becoming more individualised and fragmented. The body politic is increasingly amorphous, pluralistic and constantly shifting. The in-group/out-group distinction of the political community depends on engagement with issues and identity groups, rather than solid national citizenship or local residence.

8. That is not to say that the nation-state is irrelevant as a legal and emotional framework; but that it may well face significant challenges and the need to reassert its authority and governability, especially as we move towards a period of “crisis governance” due to insufficient global governance structures, complex global problems and inadequate resources (Goldin 2013, Malloch-Brown 2011, Micklethwait and Wooldridge 2014). Thus, it is important to invent ways of maximising consent and civility, so as to protect the resilience of communities and of the democratic system as a whole.

9. Political science has historically shown that political and party systems are built around cleavages – whether these are socioeconomic (e.g. class), religious (e.g. majority v. minority), ethnic (community A v. community B) or cultural (e.g. liberal v. authoritarian). One such cleavage that was important in the past and has become salient again – and perhaps just about to become by far the most important one – is that between globalised, multicultural urban centres and (re)nationalised rural peripheries. This is something that is happening across many western liberal democracies. As an increasing number of people move to cities and conurbations, large sections of society on the one hand feel economically left behind (as most income generation, infrastructure projects and business activities take place in urban areas), and on the other hand do not have the opportunity of regularly and meaningfully interacting with demographic and social groups that are substantially different from them. This creates widespread feelings of resentment, alienation and victimhood, as expressed in both the Brexit referendum and in the 2016 presidential election in the United States.

10. One potential cause of cynicism and perceived inequality that has not yet been adequately researched, but could be potentially playing a role, is the fragmentation of opportunities. The multiplication of schemes, grants, benefits and resources – such as the piloting of civic innovations, tools, apps on a microlocal scale – may be reinforcing, rather than tackling, patterns of inequality and disengagement, as these opportunities are likely to be taken up by those who are already engaged and have a basic understanding of how the system works, whereas those who are traditionally marginalised, cynical or less civically literate are unlikely to actively search for, or be aware of, them. The state is finding itself having to invest considerable resource in trying to “sell” policies, initiatives and opportunities to its own citizens, with these policies usually only ending up reaching people who are inclined to listen. In that sense, opting for less but bigger-scale, more visible, universal, nation-wide schemes, reforms of opportunities has a much greater potential of raising awareness and engagement, as well as ensuring that citizens feel that they are being included.

11. The media and information landscape provides us with a similar, albeit somewhat different, case. Past media research showed that the multiplication of TV channels and the fragmentation of media outlets led to the loss of the sense of shared experience (TV having traditionally acted as “the altar of the living room”). For example, increasing the number of channels in Israel led to less people watching the news across both channels, as opposed to when there was only one channel, because people felt less motivated to engage (Katz 1996). While social media (Twitter in particular) have assumed part of this role of bringing audiences together into a quasi-public sphere, the civic experience is going through profound changes. As “the public” becomes more fragmented, and as democratic institutions have to compete for the public’s attention, it is important to reflect on whether a unified body politic (whether we call that “British society”, “community”, “demos” or “the public”) is still a relevant concept – something to be retained – or whether we should fully embrace its segmentation into interest and identity groups. If we are to maintain it, then we ought to agree on the unifying principles – i.e. the values or concepts around which that public is to be united.

12. However, there is also another – symbolic, but no less crucial – aspect to this: by appearing keen or desperate to be “liked” by citizens-consumers, the state is then perceived as just another service provider (and not a particularly good one, especially when compared to some of the better-resourced tech providers). Its core role as provider of other civic functions (survival, civil protection, education, social order, social cohesion, national unity) is, thus, weakened.

13. Therefore, the state should be more proactive and dynamic in reasserting its role, otherwise there is the danger that the social fabric, civic culture, formal political participation and perceptions of fairness will all continue to decline. That does not mean micromanaging or inspecting every aspect of our lives, but providing citizens with robust frameworks of commonly accepted values and ground rules that they can identify with. Strengthening the meaning and relevance of citizenship is key to making democracy sustainable in the long term. Here are a few practical ways in which this could be facilitated:

14. – Enhancing the importance of citizenship ceremonies, not just for migrants, but also for first-time voters. The citizenship ceremony should be a rite of passage; a cause for celebration; and an opportunity for the citizen to be aware of their rights, but also of their responsibilities to the community.

15. – Requiring that all incoming refugees and migrants demonstrate proficiency of, or take up lessons in, the English language is key to social cohesion; not only does it empower incoming citizens to participating equally in social life, but it can also be perceived by native populations as a sign of bona fide determination on the part of incoming migrants to integrate.

16. – Making citizenship a core element of the formal curriculum throughout the educational cycle, but also ensuring that the content of that curriculum addresses current issues and challenges, incorporating: (a) civics, institutions, rights and responsibilities, (b) contemporary history, (c) coexistence skills (listening, debating, compromising, empathy), (d) environmental education, (e) digital and media literacy, (f) awareness of the role, resources and processes of local authorities, including mandatory participation in community engagement projects. Therefore, by the time a young person is eligible to vote they would have been systematically exposed to civic stimuli and they would have acquired vital skills of political socialisation that are currently facing a severe threat due to current patterns of digital/social media use.

17. – Introducing universal and compulsory National Civic Service, perhaps during the summer months, which would include training and voluntary work in the community, as well as getting a first-hand experience of the difficulties and challenges of managing public services, projects, budgets, teams and organisations, and an understanding of the role of structures and hierarchies in social organisation. This is key to radically shifting public perceptions about the process of government and the role of citizens as stakeholders and co-owners of their communities.

18. – Moving elections and referenda from a Thursday to a Saturday or Sunday, which could boost turnout and enhance the perceptions of elections as civic occasions; and giving all young people the opportunity to engage – as volunteers or assistants – in the process, so that they get invested in this from early on.

19. – Considering the introduction of a written constitution that would clearly articulate fundamental civic principles and values that define what it means to be a UK citizen in the 21st century. These would include both fundamental rights, as well as basic responsibilities. The process of creating the written constitution itself should be framed and celebrated as a turning point in the civic life of the UK. Major political parties, civil society organisations and local communities ought to play a key role in leading this conversation and creating a consensual and engaging framework. In other words, this should be seen as an historic moment of articulating civic values, as opposed to a cause for antagonism along narrow party-political lines, although robust debate around particular clauses and provisions is to be expected and welcomed.

20. – Encouraging a sense of civic pride that is not founded on jingoistic nationalism (as is often the case with supporting national sporting teams), but on fundamental shared civic values, such as the unique heritage of the UK's parliamentary system, the framework of legal protections and civil liberties we all enjoy, the successes of UK scientists and scholars (which might also restore trust in the importance and function of experts, experience and bodies of accumulated knowledge), while not shying away from reflecting on past mistakes and the values of foreign Others.

21. – Facilitating the integration and assimilation of migrants and refugees, as well as dialogue across diverse demographic groups through innovative methods, such as the Human Library and the Living Library. Diversity is the wealth of a society, and interacting with other people from diverse backgrounds can have a very positive effect. However, a series of studies have shown that excessive diversity (or “superdiversity”) leads to fear, withdrawal and segregation into formal or informal ghettos (such as gated communities or monocultural urban enclaves), which in turn leads to disintegration, strife and echo chambers (Putnam 2007); even in high-trust environments, ethnic diversity has been found to undermine social trust amongst native-born adolescents (Loxbo 2017). Therefore, it is precisely in order to protect and nurture diversity, pluralism and tolerance that we ought to promote and ensure integration.

22. – Public and community art, memorials, festivals, workshops, concerts, town hall meetings and open debates are all key to engaging citizens with public affairs, global issues, their local communities and with each other. There is no single path to renewing citizenship or nurturing engagement, and each one initiative or event on its own may have a marginal impact in the short term. It is the aggregate effect of political socialisation opportunities over times that creates a nurturing environment for the civic culture.

23. - The latest research on campaigning and political communication (e.g. Gerodimos and Justinussen 2015, Bartlett 2017) shows that microtargeting and personalisation algorithms in social media are very potent factors that have been playing a decisive role in a number of recent elections, including the 2008, 2012 and 2016 presidential elections in the United States, as well as possibly the 2016 EU referendum in the UK. As the bulk of our civic interactions and political communications shifts from the local (doorstep, local associations) and the national (TV and newspapers) to privately owned, globalised social media, it is paramount for the health and survival of our democracy to increase the transparency and, if necessary, to regulate the function of algorithms, advertising and microtargeting through social media.

24. – At the same time, the blurring of the boundaries between fact and fiction, and the ease of using social media to spread fake news and influence domestic audiences pose monumental challenges for democracy, as is the case with the interference in the domestic politics of Western countries and the cyber-attacks carried out by Russian agents throughout the last few years (Gerodimos, Vertegaal and Villa 2017). While the full effects of current campaigning and propaganda practices are yet to be fully studied and understood, algorithms, fake news, microtargeting and advertising in social media collectively pose the single most significant threat to democratic citizenship since its modern inception, precisely because there is currently no oversight of their architecture, design, operations, reach and objectives, and no universally accepted mechanism of checking and verifying facts. The expansion of tech companies' power and the emergence of hybrid warfare have the potential to cause massive disruption to democratic representation (see also Bartlett 2017).

25. While citizenship and civic engagement are fundamentally about the process – “the rules of the political game” – as opposed to individual issues or policies, my research (Gerodimos 2008, Gerodimos 2012) shows that younger people in particular only engage with causes or processes that (a) clearly signpost the issues at stake and (b) clearly signpost the effect or benefit that a citizen's participation will create. This somewhat utilitarian or functional conceptualisation of engagement does create tensions and problems: firstly, it is unrealistic to expect that one individual's actions will always, often or at any time, have a tangible impact; secondly, it creates the expectation that citizens will always “win”, i.e. that they will always more or less get something out of the political process, whereas participating in a democracy includes the possibility of losing, being in the minority or compromising; thirdly, this individualistic perception of engagement goes against the principle of coexisting with others as part of a collective, organised society. However, in reality, these are the terms and conditions under which political engagement has to operate in an environment of accelerated pluralism, infinite outlets of consumption and opinion, and multiple stimuli oriented towards individual self-actualisation.

26. Therefore, citizenship and civic engagement have to be oriented towards solving actual problems and addressing real people's needs – and to be seen to be doing that. Creating generic process-oriented participation opportunities is unlikely to succeed; research has shown that young people are less likely to engage with process-driven outlets, than issue-driven ones (Gerodimos 2008). As millions of jobs are about to be displaced due to automation, as Artificial Intelligence and nanotechnology are about to pose unprecedented moral and logistical dilemmas, as climate change, terrorism, forced migration and organised crime disrupt more and more communities, the only way for democracy to survive is for citizenship structures to be effective at aggregating citizens' concerns, as well as at maximising consent for legislative agendas, policies and legal frameworks. Ultimately, civic engagement is not an end in itself; but a means to a resilient, peaceful and well-functioning community.

The Glass-House Community Led Design – written evidence (CCE0054)

1. As a national charity supporting great placemaking that involves and empowers communities, our response draws on our experience of supporting civic engagement in how places are shaped – our streets, community buildings, parks and open spaces, housing and neighbourhoods.
2. Changes to the places where we live, work and play are governed by a range of rights (and their associated laws – e.g. Housing and Planning Act 2016) and with them responsibilities as citizens to act with care for those places and spaces (e.g. not to vandalise or litter). While “civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship” (Call for Evidence, p.3), it is one thing for citizens to have rights and another to have agency – the knowledge and confidence to act on and engage with those rights. Education can play an integral role in this – both formal education and capacity building and training in other contexts.
- 3.0 The education system provides a limited citizenship education for children and young people. Since 2002, the subject of citizenship has been a statutory subject on the National Curriculum at secondary level. There is no statutory citizenship curriculum at primary level. The curriculum provides for building knowledge, skills and confidence relating generally to our political and social structures and engaging in these domains as citizens. However, there is little to support pupils’ knowledge and engagement with their built environment and changes to the shape of their neighbourhoods. These gaps in education at both primary and secondary level have been supported to some extent by organisations like The Glass-House Community Led Design, regional architecture centres, CABE and other local and national charities and non-profit organisations.

3.1 In 2013 and 2014, The Glass-House worked in partnership with the Citizenship Foundation (an independent charity championing civic participation) to develop the Make it our Neighbourhood project to provide an educational programme of resources and training to empower young in placemaking. The pilot project focused on engaging young people in new developments to their neighbourhoods, introducing them to the principles of design and planning within a context of active citizenship and supporting their involvement with live built environment projects. While regeneration processes deliver new infrastructure and can encourage social wellbeing in communities, local people are sometimes alienated rather than engaged in the process through a lack of or poor meaningful and transparent engagement. We have observed and heard from young people that very often they lack the opportunity to have a role in these developments.

3.2 One example of this kind of project in practice, was a partnership programme we delivered with developer St James and White City school Phoenix Academy to empower over 30 young people (Year 10 pupils), many of whom are from the White City estate, one of the most deprived areas in the borough

(<http://hamunitedcharities.org.uk/grants/reports/supporting-communities-preventing-social-exclusion-and-tackling-need/2-background-information-on-hammersmith-and-fulham-and-the-targeted-areas-and-wards>) to inspire and empower young people to become more active citizens. Students learned about regeneration and the development process through exploration and analysis of their local area, visited inspiring spaces and a live construction site, developed a vision and design ideas for a new public green space and presented and discussed their ideas with local businesses and community organisations, as well as the Board of Directors of St James. It helped to grow students' confidence and skills in participating in civic life, as well as in their classrooms and career development and empowered them to share their views and ideas with other stakeholders.

(<http://www.theglasshouse.org.uk/project/white-city-green-empowering-young-people-through-new-development/#1470311221219-3d715457-1849>).

4. Empowerment through the design process can act as a route to wider civic engagement that can help shift citizens' attitudes to seeing their places, for example, as a responsibility that they have a hand in, rather than something that is managed solely on their behalf by their local authority or other agencies. With over 15 years' experience of supporting communities to meaningfully engage in and lead design processes to transform their spaces and places, we hold many stories that demonstrate how transformation extends to personal development and people's relationship with their communities and environments. These include the unemployed, isolated man who participated in a tenant-led project to create a gathering space for young people (story told in Dredge, L. (2014) 'Crap places kill people' – how local involvement in place-making aids health and wellbeing, Town & Country Planning Journal, TCPA available at <http://www.theglasshouse.org.uk/project/crap-places-kill-people-how-local-involvement-in-placemaking-aids-health-and-wellbeing-town-country-planning-november-2014/>). The experience helped the man to re-engage socially in his local area and gave him the confidence to seek training in youth work which led him to becoming involved in working with young people on his estate. There are so many isolated people who need a route back in to society and participation in a process such as the design of new spaces or buildings can provide a transformative opportunity that brings much wider benefits to the individual and their role as civic actors. This is not easy to quantify, but is hugely impactful.

5. As a society, a huge cultural shift is needed from being reactive in civic life to proactive. In the realm of our built environment, the growing movement of community-led housing is a clear example of communities saying the market offer isn't working for us and let's do something that works for us. However, the way central and local government and other civic agencies invite citizens to contribute to shaping and engaging is still quite often as commentators rather than as contributors and collaborators. Civic engagement is a role we are expected to embrace largely in a voluntary capacity - a responsibility as citizens. Can we give back in return for this contribution? Capacity building and training can be opportunities to support people to engage and to gain skills that will not only support them to engage in civic life, but also provide employability and life skills. This is particularly important with communities who are marginalised. The question asked by Maxwell Ayamba of SHEBEEN – Sheffield Black & Ethnic Minority Environmental Network at a 2014 debate organised by The Glass-House, echoes this point: "The Big Society was created to encourage social action but how can people play an active role if they are not empowered?".

6. In our work, we have explored the value and impact of employing creative approaches to help people of different ages, abilities and backgrounds to engage in civic life, through a number of collaborative action research projects with higher education and community partners (<http://www.theglasshouse.org.uk/stories/#1469709886645-b7a3030f-cd72>). One example of this is the Unearth Hidden Assets through Community Co-design and Co-production project which involved four sub-projects working across health, play, housing and neighbourhood development. The projects employed a range of different creative approaches that all had the aim of helping to unearth and mobilise assets that helped to advance community action, connect people, build confidence and ownership through the process. Our sub-project worked with voluntary group, Tidworth Mums, who were supporting army and civilian families by providing soft play activities not already available locally. With support from partners in the project, the group were given space to explore the impact of their contribution and build confidence and skills as a community support group. Their journey revealed to them the value of their contribution as civic actors and helped them to connect with other organisations and networks, becoming a voice for the community in local decision-making arenas. See:

7. It is important that we review how we evaluate the policies and programmes supported by central and local government and other public agencies, which are often short-term approaches with very strict frameworks/boundaries. What happens at the end of these cycles? What are we learning from them? Where does this learning sit and how can we make it useful to as many people as possible to support and enhance civic engagement?

Should we be using different parameters for evaluation, which are less about target numbers, and more about demonstrating impact? We have explored impact and legacy through the Starting from Values – Evaluating Intangible Legacies research project led by the University of Brighton: <http://arts.brighton.ac.uk/projects/starting-from-values-evaluating-intangible-legacies> The project looked across a number of action research projects supporting community action that were funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council to investigate the impact of projects on individuals, groups and communities. Using values-based frameworks, the approach sought to move beyond the notion of target-driven deliverables to assess the real impact that projects had on people and organisations, and their ability to act as supporters, contributors and leaders of civic action.

8. The nature of policy-driven funding, and funding projects to deliver a prescribed set of outcomes and processes (such as a Neighbourhood Plan) can also limit people's abilities to lead civic action on their own terms. In the Scaling Up Co-design Research and Practice (<http://www.theglasshouse.org.uk/project/scaling-up-impact-and-reach-through-co-design/>), we explored how collaboration across civic society organisations can scale up their impact and reach in supporting and empowering communities. We discovered that with a simple infrastructure for supporting ideas generation, asset mapping and project development, new collaborations could emerge that extend the reach and impact of the contributing organisations. Furthermore, initial collaborations led to the development of networks that could continue to generate projects and civic actions through mobilising their collective assets to support shared values and ambitions.

Mr Philip Gleeson and Mr Jagdeep Passan – written evidence (CCE0092)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

In times of economic pressures, difficulties and public services buckling under pressure it is critical we all have an understanding that engagement, citizenship and involvement of the public is important to ensure appropriate engagement with people is maintained and not for people by professionals. In 21st century the support of lay people, citizens and volunteers can offer additional capacity both paid and unpaid, a movement of people power if undertaken properly to create civic ownership and aspirations of the need to be “wanting” to part of and participate in civic duty is core to sense of belonging. This should apply to all communities from all socio-economic groups.

The meaning of citizenships and civic engagement – these two terms have become interchangeable and without clarity. 1) Citizenship is about you and your rights e.g. living in a country, having rights to participate in democracy and right to be equal. This extends to rights to live legally without concern. This is about your entitlement and you being here, you receiving the privilege 2) Civic Engagement is about people contributing to society, or being involved in a public or formal matter when one is being asked to participate or be involved – doing the right thing but being requested to by others as it’s a public function e.g. attending the event at Town Hall, being given an award, doing something and giving back to society in your local area.

Clearly, it matters as at present civic duties do not extend to all communities and it this concept with the public to have a have a greater role, a duty to be included in “local” life. Examples are Neighbourhood Networks in Leeds, Board roles of charity sectors to volunteering is poor. However, within the context of an Ageing population we need to gain support of citizens rather than seeing citizens as a threat. We should be utilising our community assets to be civic leaders working alongside people, be involved, and be active and contributors in society like our resources as co-workers.

It matters as clearly there is a mistrust of the public, the way we involve them, the outcomes of the recent activities in Scotland, the referendum, we must re-examine polls, existing mechanisms and processes that exist to involve people as from our experiences its always the usual “professional” suspects as opposed to usual “people” suspects as people do not get invited unless the Leadership (only few exist) ensure people are involved. How do we share what this role means, how do we co-design with public this understanding in language they understand (easy read), how do we promote the message and be seen as one of the “people.” This relates to Identity of the public and professional.

Private sector/other industries

Private sector e.g. supermarkets seem to get it right to know consumers as they will match demand and maximise profits in the sector. However, in this areas we have no sector leaderships as we are consumed by old metrics e.g. satisfaction surveys, complaints and concerns policies with little for service user involvement to shape or be civic citizens.

There needs to be a radical rethink, as in Leeds there are examples locally of good work where civic engagement is happening to co-design, get results and less public outcry. Leeds examples include joint working with council, third sector to develop a sense of shared outcomes e.g.

- Access usability Group – partnership with council, citizens and private sector to involve people to shape and design highways and planning i.e. John Lewis Partnership, closure of pedestrian streets, railways and new build;
- Better Lives Board – Leeds city council Adults and health and LIP, co-chaired with a councillor and citizen of Leeds;
- The Expert Transport Advisory group where Leaders of the council have identified people (2 independent people) have to be partners to shape future planning of transport;
- NHS and Maternity services where local people have been involved and then plans developed to change services at scale 2,000 people involved; and
- The Leeds mental health framework was developed by citizens jointly with NHS/LCC and now has led to people led contract specifications being devised called “I statements”

Self-care and reliance – this does require support, citizens are not ready provided the opportunity or resources to” roll” out to wider communities how they support each other, its isolated and restricted to certain people who have sadly often the ability and education to develop such network, leading to a vicious cycle of dependency and isolation.

Organisations play a significant ref:- <https://vimeo.com/42332617?ref=em-share>

Action/recommendation: There is no single vision or consistent leadership that wants to address in a bold risk managed approach of harnessing communities.

- 2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

The sense of belonging does exist but common themes tend to bring people together e.g. exclusion, obesity like attending weight management clinics, smoking cessation clinics. The referral tend to be via health professionals – so are these the roots to ensure people understand their roles? Are people or peers the way forward e.g. hairdressers plays a huge role in peoples life, 30 mins with them every 4 weeks – can be of impact to share and hear real stories, wisdom and plays a higher role than my medical staff or council staff. The role of the OT, therapist is of good wisdom and confidence as a “gatekeeper”, does not judge and are clearly knowledgeable to all people.

Mental Health Together We Can – is an example of people in Leeds being involved in developing the Leeds Mental Health Framework that is bottom driven by people with people, led by LCC and NHS and the 3rd sector, this led to the creation of sense of belonging, involvement and setting up policy as “togetherness.” This is hailed as an example of great partnership and then developed further as it developed MINDWELL a portal for people with mental health created with professionals and people to educate people through the complexities of the mental health system – with people and professionals.

Strengthen people identity – is this a question of definition, again have we undertaken different survey methods, at Leeds Involving People we work with all communities to ask local people what they understand by the services could be replicated in Leeds e.g. case study – Independent Access Usability Group Leeds – works with citizens, council and private sector to shape John Lewis Centre Victoria Gate, people felt a sense of belonging, being a part of the planning for the design of this building and as such people promote this without question across the country. A sense of identity, pride and meaningful involvement leads to ownership “perceptions” of people that will lead to people having an association of having worked within Leeds, their city and contributed as part of their civic duty.

How do we measure this “britishness” and demonstrate this value in public life and what actions do we take to ensure polite behaviours e.g. neighbourhoods, check on our people is enshrined in UK values, is it the British flag – this is still seen in some Asian communities as being affiliated to the National Front, EDL, is this confused with patriotic values as in USA.

Leadership systems and visibility

Like Grenfell Towers, the fall out created by lack of a visible compassionate Management led to a huge failure by the council then having to re-establish and re-profile their role after gaining a bad reputation. It is clear there are a only few Leaders who want to genuinely meet with people, are concerned about people and do meet people outside the formal board structures, where they are presented with orchestrated people who will sing the usual good, bad and indifferent case study or user experience. Re-establish Trust and confidence indicators; measures that will make public bodies work in communities as part of their role or with independent organisations by setting up new:

- Set Indicators to show how professionals values are demonstrated e.g. communication, and ability to relate to the public and what outreach did you undertake in the community;
- The current leaderships models ensure focus on outcomes, as we move towards local based work, the systems need to change e.g. supervision notes to include how do you

Speak, make contact and connect with local people as part of your work (all public bodies need to measure this);

- Encourage commissioner to think collectively and with right organisations e.g. self-run groups, Are we maximising on these community “anchors” roles, and creating local roles for local people that are new and have power and established respect as these people are from those communities – bottom up approach

We need to rethink what people think as their role changes as they grow older, new communities and then question what attracts communities to engage or belong to some groups: LIP experiences are people get involved because:-

- Identify with the community and the topic, with support of peers. Often safety in numbers and the feelings the time invested is worthwhile and they will be valued as time as we get older is recognised as a commodity
- Ensure opinion or views have chance to be voiced in safety –use an independent body e.g. not a provider
- Targeted efforts need to be made with a need to go places where people do attend, with risk management with care and safety, yet we stand around supermarkets in the cold and ask questions that entice as there is nothing to “sell” no blurb only the people sharing their priceless experiences – in confidence away from the point of service delivery

Recommendations/Action: “Peoples Chief Officer” to be developed led by people for people in each city, where people can relate and connect to a “real” person?

Recommendations/Action: Develop a recognised qualification (co-designed with People and local university like NVQ level) to be provided that says an achievement in “civic duty” award not only about language but how you integrate and are committed to living in Britain; Have we asked families what and how they can be involved to shape this agenda? Or is it the usual organisation and same people that provide feedback, what are the lessons are we radical to make strong position statements from Leaders political and community?

- 3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing le.g.al framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

The laws need to be re-enforced, with guidance as at present there is no parity of user rights between health and council. This power balance needs to change with the citizen as the consumer, the relationship is different if you are phoning the council or health, the tone changes e.g. consumer tends to have “more” rights with the council e.g. bin collection, and less with NHS services as this service is fixed as a “take it or leave it” service offer

The duty to involve laws around engagement must be a pre-requisite not after thought as a tick box e.g. NHS Institute asks before you can apply for a grant the question have you “consulted”, usually no guidance exists as to how or what and that extends to CQC that asks question “have you involved the patient” but what does legislation is subjective.

Information to the consumer as to rights is unclear when can they raise a concern, who is the lead person and with more integration this will blur boundaries and roles, system changes mean nothing to people, who has communicated the new service offer? It is in the usual manner postcards, letters, we are excluding new communities, the hard to reach or people with sight, impairments e.g. case in example is the accessible standard – not enforceable but good legislation to have in place

I believe the need to show, share case studies of the economic benefits to people and financial benefits of strong relationship with the public – these include Hospital To Discharge in Leeds with Age UK working with key partners inc :

- added value arising from patient/public ideas about how services could be improvement
- Accountability to local people – strengthening quality of governance and obtaining mandate

Civic engagement needs to be formal perhaps not social responsibility or a contract (not clearly worked in main around CSR) not a “memo of understanding” or a “code of compliance” as they all have not materialised. We suggest strong actions that move beyond rhetoric to action being demonstrated e.g. how seriously you have undertaken this role,

People do have rights in the NHS Constitution and Involvement duties but can be ignored e.g. changes are happening where only professional bodies are consulted but this right extends to the public and no one is able to exercise the right to challenge as they do not have the confidence, skill or support to undertake this huge role without reprisal. How do we encourage people to undertake this role, enabling and ensuring they are supported to know the impact of the changes, being briefed and able to participate and ask questions as “Lay” people to professionals?

ACTION/RECOMMENDATIONS:

1) There should be a people Inspector Directorate (Peoples) created with additional duties working alongside regulatory bodies – where people have their say actioned with clear accountability and not “collusion” or conversations behind closed doors. This should be led by people for people with people, who reports regularly on behalf of people to the people e.g. a role like a Chief Officer- People should have the role to monitor and inspect services as this would be stronger than the current systems that involves only low ratios of people: people e.g. Healthwatch are becoming professional lead and are unable to challenge the council or health as they are funded by those bodies. This should be centrally funded and controlled centrally to be effective.

2) To encourage to collaborate and not competition in the sector by creating a team spirit – Team that is real and connected, extends to involve staff, patients, carers, citizens and communities, There is a growing interest in the people agenda, yet not co-ordinated and with a lack of thinking by commissioners

It does mean a review of how we are organised, how we work, how we are held accountable and how we are measured? Too often we try to adopt new ways of working without changing the environment in which we work – same outcomes models, metrics often old fashioned.

We need to invest and plan, get people to be Involvement ready, assets are “our” people not them and us culture, no divides.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process? here

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

People should be encouraged to be involved by understanding there is a fundamental need to understand and be active from school age to further education by creating new training modules as core on what standards are expected of people as part of citizenship targets for all students in all courses from

Curriculum could include, as part of delivery:

- Explain what does communities and neighbourhoods means, how to work within them, be focussed –relationship – they are focus on building relationships with people – not just with people who a Local Area Coordinator may “walk alongside” but also with those in a community who have strengths and assets.
- employers have a role too e.g. like corporate social responsibility all leaders, staff should be assigned to Lead on communities not just usual activities of painting but outreach into communities, seen as part of the community e.g. having tea with homeless people.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

There are challenges for involvement of the public and government:

- 1) No money to support and work with groups as the current metrics do not meet government targets or health targets as community work is not seen as an asset or an indicator. It used to be Trust and confidence for Police Forces, Cohesion targets or community workers are less seen as we eroded youth workers, real community workers to call them health trainers, improvement specialists yet they tend to be barriers e.g. eligibility is inflexible
- 2) Most vol sector organisations do not fit into the service industry that is being created for the commissioner around this work except loosely “cohesion” sector e.g. social prescribing which is shifting demand from GP’s to VCFS but yet it reduces demand – does it or stops people accessing GPS who have less money less education etc.

The approach should be to work alongside the people, provide training and support and to understand people’s agenda, and have good relationships, building this takes time and time is often not allocated or factored in by commissioners, or time lags too short to start this work for a purpose:

- “Go” to them – and not just turning up when we want something, we spend time with communities. We walk among them.
- We must as public bodies, VCFS and other recognise CDW principals have been eroded and investment diminished over decades in communities. It is only at times of “cost reduction” we tend to ask peoples view, we must understand the architecture of communities, existing and new champions, the grass roots organisations supporting their vulnerable members, changing communities, their third places
- We design our work to fit around communities, to go to speak and obtain information in a non-judgmental approach with a street-level local knowledge by combining outreach, face to face an truthfully going where others don’t want to go, we go places that are risk assessed and over complicated to avoid these areas, the SOA’s, the “no go” areas

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

The government need to invest as we did in regions and in communities to be able to be self-reliant, resilient and are capable, we need to be able to be know who to go to when there are issues of concern by:-

- Creating roles of local co-ordinators to operate at ward level can be people jointly with professionals leading them in communities at grass roots;
- Create “Trainee” roles of community people that can work alongside who live in a community who have strengths and assets of local areas ,not new people established connectors; and
- Target work – the aim is to be responsive to people who have slipped through the net and are not part of the system as life goes on more of these people will be “us” too, alone and without support

The government must create 1) trainers, 2) Encouraging professionals to work 7 days a week attending venues using groups like LIP; 3) hiring community people as opposed to setting high bars and excluding people as they do not possess certain skill sets of being Price qualified and project management skills

Third sector – the government needs to expand the role of the smaller groups and work within confined parameters or specific areas e.g. peer support, mentoring, substance or mental health and usually do not have the pre-skills to empower and enable people but usually to come of substance, seek housing or benefit advise but not creation of self-run groups, supporting people to have “coffee clubs” or free space

The need to consider the voluntary and community sector as “helpers or connectors” to statutory services to considering what types of services need to be in place to respond to a variety of needs. I believe this is the future co-working and co-designing and see nil examples of this however, there are a number of places that are beginning to try to understand the scale and contribution of the VCS e.g. in Leeds

We can reach mass number and diversity of voices and this is invaluable in and of itself. But also clear value in influencing service redesign to meet diverse needs and preferences of mosaic of communities. Example Care Closer to Home – original proposal about telephone support, rich feedback about people with English as second language, Deaf and Hard of hearing etc.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Review why the lack of shared responsibilities in the UK and increased tensions – is it parental failures to set high standards of all people to be hospitable and tolerate? Is it mistrust of Government Policy and their failure to communicate well intended actions?

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Try and bring people with the system changes in Leeds having a good culture of partnerships, distinction of roles and clarity in the sector. Then clear improvement can be made creating a sense of inclusion by working with all communities across Leeds in all areas and where professionals do not target

1) St Gemma’s hospice care – NHS CCG Leeds

This was another innovative collaborative way of reaching communities to understand why diverse communities do not access hospice care. This bid was jointly developed, with people and an application for funding to local NHS CCG grants panel being made. This bid required leaders being able to be open to listen, and embark on accepting some difficult conversations may need to take place with communities directly.

Community Forum – BME Forum Adults and Health Leeds City Council. People are engaged with the council facilitated by the 3rd sector i.e to ensure people develop the trust and confidence, are attending, and devise joint agendas on various live key issues such as end of life, council one stop shops etc. This forum is chaired by a Chief Officer and co-chaired by people, selected by people and all meetings held in community services and its role is now expanding to ensure health plays a key role.

Cohesion is alive in Leeds and people sit around the table, no power as citizens to talk and share and learn- all are invited to these meetings

Guild HE – written evidence (CCE0068)

1. GuildHE is an officially recognised representative body for UK Higher Education. Our members include universities, university colleges, further education colleges and specialist institutions from both the traditional and private (“for profit” and “not for profit”) sectors. Member institutions include some major providers in professional subject areas including art, design and media, music and the performing arts; agriculture and food; education; maritime; health and sports.

Opening Statement

2. GuildHE believes that citizenship and civic engagement are attributes which should be continuously developed throughout the lives of members of society. In particular, GuildHE believes that higher education can play a key role in developing students as ‘active citizens’.

3. GuildHE has developed a Charter for Active Citizenship, containing six elements: volunteering; democratic engagement; environmental sustainability; community engagement; global citizenship; and reflection and development (GuildHE, Active Citizenship: The Role of Higher Education, 2016).

Citizenship and Community Belonging

4. GuildHE believes that individuals need to feel a sense of belonging to a community in order to participate as active citizens within it. A focus on the immediate community may foster a stronger sense of personal belonging than large scale national events. This is particularly important for students, who are often likely to be entering an institution in a new community, and therefore need to feel engaged on a local level to feel confident in civic participation.

5. Many higher education institutions have ‘student-led teaching awards’, which recognise excellent teaching; in 2016, the Anglo-European College of Chiropractic (AECC) developed ‘staff-led student awards’ (GuildHE, 2016). Such awards processes bridge gaps between the student and staff bodies to create a more cohesive communities. The AECC’s ‘Staff-led student awards’ focus on academic engagement, practical skill development, professionalism and community, fostering other key values, and encouraging deeper staff-student interaction, which is known to improve academic outcomes (Gibbs, Dimensions of Quality, 2010).

6. Practical activities that focus on forming a relationship with, and making a positive change within, the local community outside of the education environment are also important for developing a culture of active citizenship. Leeds Trinity University (LTU) work in partnership with the Leeds branch of St. Vincent’s de Paul (a charity supporting people in poverty). This partnership has developed a six month graduate internship within the charity. (GuildHE, 2016). Graduates not only learn practical skills to take forward into future roles, but also develop an awareness of the challenges facing their local community.

Political Engagement

7. Higher Education can play a key role in encouraging voting. Each year, 250,000 students vote in students' union elections, and research has shown that voting is habit forming, so that people who have voted previously are more likely to do so again (e.g. Coppock and Green, Is Voting Habit Forming?, 2015). This is supported by high rates of graduate voter turnout (74% at the 2015 General Election, 6% above the national average, according to YouthSight).

8. The introduction of the Individual Electoral Registration (IER) in 2014 prevented higher education institutions from block registering eligible students in their accommodation. This posed a significant barrier in students registering to vote, and subsequently 1.8% of voters dropped from the electoral register - particularly in student areas, as students were unsure of how or where to register.

9. However, GuildHE championed for, and welcomed the inclusion of, (Section 13 (1) (f)) of the Higher Education and Research Act 2017, which poses a condition 'requiring the governing body of the provider to take such steps as the Office for Students (OfS) considers appropriate for facilitating cooperation between the provider and one or more electoral registration officers in England for the purpose of enabling the electoral registration of students'.

10. Some institutions are already innovating in this area - Ravensbourne and Ravensbourne Students' Union have co-created a culture active citizenship through a series of mentoring and leadership programmes and developing a Civic Action student society. Students were taught the value of civic engagement, and high turnout at events (6,000 attended the London Mayoral debate) demonstrates the success of such initiatives (GuildHE, 2016).

Society and Civic Engagement

11. GuildHE believe that engagement is at its best when it is performed in partnership, and that partnership is formed on the basis of understanding the respective strengths of the participants.

12. This is exemplified in the relationship between York St. John University and the York NHS trust, who have formed Converge. Converge offers high-quality educational opportunities to people who use mental health services in the York area, and students who teach the courses benefit from interacting with people who use mental health services. Converge presents a model of collaboration between a university and a mental health service provider that can make a real difference in the lives of users of mental health services, full-time students and the university community. In 2014/15, 93 students were involved in Converge either helping to deliver courses or by supporting participants (GuildHE, 2016).

13. Higher education institutions and government, third, and public sector organisations should be seeking out mutually beneficial partnerships to encourage participation in civic society - particularly from young people.

Education and Fostering Values

14. The National Curriculum, Ofsted and the PREVENT strategy define Fundamental British Values as “democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs”. GuildHE does not contest these values. However, the term has not gone without criticism (GuildHE, the Cathedrals Group, World-class Teachers, World-class Education, 2017).

15. The Curriculum gives teachers an explicit role in developing these values in students and pupils. According to the Citizenship Foundation, these can only be arrived at effectively ‘through mutual exploration and understanding’; that is, through the creation of a community encompassing staff, students, and families within a given institution (GuildHE, the Cathedrals Group, 2017). These values are often laid out in institutional mission statements, but can be developed at all levels.

16. Government guidance since 2014 has focussed on the duty placed on schools under (Section 7 (B)) of the Education Act 2002, to promote the ‘spiritual, moral, social and cultural development of their pupils’. More recent policy encompasses the role of staff in protecting children from extremism and radicalisation, a role which depends on relationships of trust between staff and students.

17. How this relationship is developed, and how staff will conceptualise and explore values with students will vary, meaning that ‘Fundamental British Values’ can be little more than a broad set of principles. It is important that staff are able to form and develop communities in which these values can be explored and fostered.

18. The key question is; what feeds into teachers’ and students’ conceptions of community values? Values may be the direct products of ethical education and exploration. Teachers’ values may be developed through training and CPD, or through the support of colleagues. Crucially, all the aspects of active citizenship explored above can also tacitly support these core values, making a mutually reinforcing circle in which values encourage certain participatory actions, which in turn further underpin those core values.

Conclusions

- In order to develop a culture of civic engagement, people need to feel a sense of belonging to a community or place.
- Laws such as IER represent a barrier to students in participating in civic duties. However, GuildHE welcomes the inclusion of (Section 13 (1) (f)) of the Higher Education and Research Act which encourages institutions to facilitate voter registration of students through the OfS.

- Education has an explicit role in fostering ‘British’ values (although that term should be treated with caution), and this is best achieved through creating a culture where these are explored, adopted and developed with students, as opposed through top-down enforcement.
- Partnerships between education institutions and government, public and third sector organisations should be encouraged and built upon mutual strengths.

Hampshire Association of Local Councils – written evidence (CCE0066)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

In today's society, citizenship is about having the right and freedom to express one's own culture and beliefs, as well as having responsibility to accept the right of others to express their views and values.

Civic engagement should involve communities working together to address public concerns and promote the communities quality of life.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Pride in being/becoming British should be encouraged, but so should a 'sense of belonging'.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?
4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The current process is out dated in this digital age; voters should have more option as to how they vote with introduction of electronic voting.

Should the voting age be lowered, then political parties need to broaden their canvassing process to reach the younger generation as door knocking will not suffice with this age group.

Reducing the age to 16 may allow schools to encourage voter registration and assist pupils in doing so.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Encouraging ‘good citizenship’ is the responsibility of both home and school life. Teaching from an early age, sets in motion an idea that ‘good citizenship’ is part of normal everyday life. More emphasis should be given to politics both inside and outside the classroom. Schools should be supported and encouraged to partake in more community focused activities to encourage greater understanding and engagement by children within their locality, in turn setting a foundation.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?
7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Parish and Town Councils are the closest tier to communities, therefore perhaps more likely to achieve success in encouraging civic engagement. They are increasingly providing more services and should therefore receive the support from higher government in recognition. They are well placed for creating a sense of belonging by the inclusion of residents within local projects to improve their locality and therefore create a sense of inclusion and pride amongst individuals. Parish and Town Councils are more aware of hard to reach groups, local needs and organisations and are well placed for bringing a community together.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Values should comprise of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect for and tolerance of other faiths and beliefs.

Threats include extremism and intolerance.

All citizens should have equal opportunity irrelevant of gender, race, faith or belief.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?
10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Being proficient should allow easier integration and remove a sense of exclusion on both sides of any language barrier.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

My work is mainly in the field of history education, where I have worked in schools and more recently in Initial Teacher Training and Higher Education. My research is on issues related to the curriculum, and I have done work in the field of citizenship education and have worked on a number of projects with the Council of Europe to promote democratic culture in education.

Most of the responses here reflect findings from a study I conducted in a large sixth form college and therefore portray the views of the 17/18 year olds who replied to the survey. For interest I have attached a copy of the study which has been published in: C. Broom (2017) (ed) Youth Civic Engagement in a Globalized World: Citizenship Education in Comparative Perspective. Palgrave Macmillan

1. For most of the students citizenship was seen as linked to paying taxes, voting, being law-abiding and 'neighbourly'. Few students had any experience of civic engagement and were unclear how they could influence decision making and become involved in the political process – in that sense there is a 'democratic deficit' in the mindset of young people and a very narrow conceptualisation of citizenship, with young people not being aware of their potential responsibilities or power to bring about change.
2. I am wary of promoting pride in being British as there is a danger of creating a 'them' and 'us' scenario – this was something that was apparent in some responses to the survey, with some students stating pride in things such as Britain's armed forces, but others urging caution about the dangers of nationalism. I think there should be more focus on developing the relationship between individuals and the state – at present it seems that the state is being whittled away and a growing mistrust of authority. This requires a fundamental shift in how government currently works and is seen as being in the interests of the people – if that could be achieved then I feel this would naturally strengthen people's identity with the state.
3. I do not feel they should be any degree of compulsion – as stated above I think there needs to be a recognition of the reciprocal relationship between the individual and the state.
4. The current 'first past the post' system does not appear to be engaging young people in my personal experience of young people – it serves to make them feel disenfranchised if they live in an area which is staunchly supportive of a particular party.
5. Surprisingly given that citizenship has been a compulsory part of the school curriculum since 2002, around half of the students who completed the survey in my study could not remember being taught citizenship in school. At present it would seem that much teaching is inadequate, there are few specialist teachers of the subject, it is not a priority in the curriculum, and the recently reformed National Curriculum for Citizenship has seriously denuded the subject of its potential. The Council of Europe has for many years been promoting democratic citizenship through its education programmes, and these are evident in places such as the Balkans and Cyprus, and there is much that we could draw on from such work. For me one of the problems with the latest version of the curriculum and how it is taught is the emphasis on knowledge per se – young people should learn citizenship through education, not simply learn about citizenship. Richard Pring, the educational philosopher at Oxford University, has long argued that young people need to experience citizenship. Findings from my study show that students felt engaged with their school community through school elections, schools councils and so forth, but schools need to have more developed ways of engaging with student voice and making students feel genuinely part of a process.

6. My response here is through current experience of one of my daughter's involvement in NCS and both of them doing the Duke of Edinburgh scheme. Both schemes are helpful in developing a sense of resilience, community involvement, and pride in achievements. Both are focused on personal development and community involvement – yet this is something students generally (as suggested by my study) are comfortable with, as it is on a scale they can perceive and see an outcome. Where such schemes are weaker is in empowering young people to feel that they can engage with the political process.
7. The few students in the study who identified some form of civic engagement did so largely due to the example of their parents - schools had minimal influence on young people's civic behaviours, so it would seem that education is a key area that needs to be developed. The other thing that needs to be recognised is that young people are not apathetic, they are genuinely interested in the world around them and know they have a stake in the future but they feel powerless in the face of big business and political bureaucracy to influence change – in that sense one of the most important things that government and other organisations can do is to encourage young people that their views genuinely matter and to be responsive to such views. This does also mean that young people need to feel properly informed about issues in order to make decisions – the current climate makes this difficult – e.g. the rise of 'fake news', and the ridiculously ill-informed debates about Brexit makes it hard to know what to believe. One area that government could support is a free press, but also one that has strong ethical commitment to providing news and information rather than soundbites. Over the past few years there appears to have been an erosion in standards of reporting that means that people like President Trump are able to attack the media.
8. Values are not taught explicitly in schools and there is much debate about the role of school in 'teaching' values, as there is evidence that teachers are wary of being seen to tell young people what to think and believe – there are interesting approaches to values education but these are not common in schools. I think it is difficult to talk about what values people should have, but people should be aware of the debates surrounding values and their place in society, and see that there are no easy answers – democracy is not perfect, but it has many strengths, yet it cannot be taken for granted that it will continue – it needs active support and for people to see that participation matters. The sense of powerlessness and disenfranchisement that people feel is probably one of the greatest threats to democratic values.

9. I feel the issues raised above answer this question.
10. I think these issues are entwined – strong civic engagement should aid social cohesion and integration and vice versa. In my experience in schools with diverse populations there are good relationships between students from different ethnic backgrounds – there are however a couple of issues: the teaching population does not adequately reflect the student population profile and schools often (and unconsciously) have a ‘white’ curriculum; there are disparities in terms of student outcomes by ethnicity and socio-economic background, which then tend to become perpetuated in later life. Some schools are effective at addressing these issues but more effort needs to be put into developing good practice in addressing these issues – it is a complex area and is influenced by issues such as teacher expectations, the nature of the curriculum, the pressures of the performativity culture in schools, teacher training and so forth.
11. I do not feel sufficiently knowledgeable to respond to this question.
12. I would hesitate to talk about British Citizenship, as I feel we are talking about issues that apply to democratic society generally.

My favourite example of empowering young people and allowing them to feel as if they are able to influence matters is the ‘Room 13’ movement that started in a Scottish primary school through art education (<http://room13international.org/> and http://www.room13hareclive.org.uk/resources/NESTA_report_MM_May_07.pdf).

Although it is less about tolerance and cohesion, it is an example of giving young people responsibility and a voice, which in turn makes them feel as if they have a stake in what is happening.

Exploring Youth Civic Engagement – a view from England

A brief outline of citizenship education in England

Citizenship, as a school subject, in England has had a chequered and difficult history; it has never traditionally been taught as an explicit subject prior to 2000 (Kerr, 2005) and the attitude of the UK government has historically been very laissez-faire in terms of outlining any form of curriculum requirement. It was not until the 1988 Education Reform Act, that a national curriculum in England was developed. This identified subjects that were to be ‘core’ and those that were to be ‘foundation’ ones. At this stage citizenship was merely part of the ‘basic curriculum’, included as one of a number of cross-curricular themes that were also to be covered.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

It was not until the late 1990s that the New Labour government of Tony Blair took steps to change the status of citizenship. Following the Crick Report of 1998 (QCA, 1998) citizenship became a ‘foundation’ subject, which meant teaching it became statutory, with a compulsory programme of study (DfEE/QCA, 1999). The development was prompted by growing concerns over the social, moral and political fabric of society (Harris, 2006). The aim of the new curriculum was ambitious, striving for:

no less than a change in the political culture of this country ...; for people to think of themselves as active citizens, willing, able and equipped to have an influence in public life and with the critical capacities to weigh evidence before speaking and acting; to build on and to extend radically to young people the best in existing traditions of community involvement and public service, and to make them individually confident in finding new forms of involvement and acting among themselves. (QCA, 1998)

Schools however faced numerous challenges implementing the new curriculum; for example there were few subject specialists to teach it, it was supposed to occupy five percent of an already crowded school timetable and there was confusion over the precise nature of the subject (Kerr, Cleaver, Ireland & Blenkinsop, 2003; Ofsted, 2004, 2005).

The model of citizenship as outlined in the curriculum was heavily influenced by the thinking of T. H. Marshall; thus the curriculum was underpinned by the ideas of developing young people’s political literacy, social and moral responsibility and community involvement. It was however criticised on a number of fronts. Some have questioned whether it is a subject to be studied (Pring, 2006) whilst others attacked its commitment to the (essentially elitist) political status quo, (Faulks, 2006) and its narrow, nationalistic conception of citizenship (Faulks, 2006; Kiwani, 2008).

Subsequent reviews of the National Curriculum (DfE, 2013; QCA, 2007) have seen the statutory content of the citizenship curriculum altered. Following the review in 2007 the curriculum document focused on the concepts of democracy and justice, rights and responsibilities, identities and diversity, and the processes of critical thinking, advocacy, and taking informed and responsible action. The biggest change here was the introduction of the idea of identity, with a focus on the idea of multiple identities. However the curriculum review instigated by the Coalition government in 2010 seriously questioned the place of citizenship in the curriculum. The expert panel, which advised the government, recommended that citizenship revert back to being part of the basic curriculum (DfE, 2011).

However the subject has retained its foundation status, but there has been a shift towards a knowledge-based curriculum, with a particular focus on knowledge of political systems, especially the UK’s system of government and the ‘precious liberties enjoyed by the citizens of the United Kingdom’ (DfE, 2013). The consequences of this are yet to be fully seen but Ofsted \(2013\) noted some schools have already starting to pay less attention to the subject.

The impact of citizenship education in England

Given the importance attached to the introduction of citizenship education, a large-scale longitudinal study was conducted by the National Foundation for Educational Research (NFER) from 2002-2010. Over 24,000 students from 169 schools were invited to complete questionnaires in 2002/3, 2005, 2007 and 2009 as they progressed through school. An additional 2,500 students were sent questionnaires biennially to capture views from other schools not involved in the longitudinal study, and interviews with staff and teachers were conducted in 12 schools every two years. In part the study focused on how schools were implementing the new curriculum but the reports from 2003 (Kerr et al.), 2006 (Ireland, Kerr, Lopes, Nelson & Cleaver), 2008 (Benton et al.) and 2010 (Keating, Kerr, Benton, Mundy & Lopes) focused heavily on the students’ attitudes towards citizenship, community and participation, and provide rich insights into the thinking and experiences of this first generation of students to receive statutory education in citizenship.

Generally speaking the study found that attitudes towards many issues were relatively stable, and that changes in attitudes were likely to be related to the age of the students rather than the impact of citizenship education per se (Keating et al., 2010, p. 61).

This is similar to a wider international study reported by Isac, Maslowski, Creemers and van der Werf (2014), who found schooling had a negligible impact on students’ civic knowledge, attitudes and behaviours. Few students showed any interest in political activity (beyond voting), being more inclined, if at all, to engage in civic activities such as fund raising and volunteering. This promoted Benton et al. \(2008\) to worry about a ‘democratic deficit’ amongst young people. The only area where there were signs of increased political engagement through the NFER project was within the school community, where students showed a strong commitment to their community and had more opportunities to participate in things like elections for school councils. Generally students reported low levels of efficacy, persistently feeling an inability to bring about change, either within school, the local community or at a national level (Benton et al., 2008; Ireland et al., 2006; Kerr et al., 2003), It was also evident that students had a limited sense of what citizenship entailed. Invariably ‘good’ citizenship revolved around voting, being law-abiding and making a positive contribution to the local community.

These findings seem to reflect attitudes more widely; a large government survey (Home Office, 2004) revealed that only 38% of adults felt they could influence decisions in their local area, which fell to 19% when applied to the national scene, and although around 38% of adults had engaged in some form of civic participation or informal volunteering in the previous 12 months, only 3% did so on a monthly basis.

The current political climate

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

Prior to the election of 2010, politics in the UK were dominated by New Labour under the premiership of Tony Blair, then Gordon Brown. The economic crisis saw a shift in the political landscape; in 2010 a coalition government of the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties was formed, a highly unusual situation in the UK.

These recent elections have been characterised by low turnouts –less than two thirds of the electorate voted (significantly lower than other elections since the end of World War Two), with only around 44% of those aged 18-24 exercising their right to vote (UK Political Info, n.d.).

Explaining this decline in turnout is difficult. It could simply be apathy amongst the younger generation, but equally it could be disengagement as a response to the current political and economic climate. The period around 2009-10 saw considerable public anger surrounding an expenses scandal involving MPs. Trust in the political system has been further shaken by the financial crisis of 2008 and subsequent economic downturn. Austerity measures introduced by the Coalition government have seen massive cuts in public spending. Youth unemployment has been stubbornly high. Those on low incomes have been badly hit by government policies, whilst tax cuts for those on higher incomes has helped to fuel a growing wage gap. Claims of tax avoidance, especially by large global corporations, such as Amazon, Google and Starbucks, also sparked widespread public anger. Taken together, these events have served to make different sections of the community feel disempowered and disconnected from the political system.

Major educational reforms have also affected those under 18 and have included an overhaul of the curriculum and examination system. Arguably, the most controversial change has been to university tuition fees; the Liberal Democrats had in particular pledged prior to the election to resist any increase in fees, but then supported a huge increase in annual fees, which rose from £3000 to £9000 for students.

The one issue that did positively capture the public imagination was the referendum on Scottish independence. This saw a massive turnout, with 85% of the Scottish electorate voting (including those aged 16 and 17 who were allowed to vote on this issue).

The political landscape following the 2015 election changed in unexpected ways. The Conservative Party won an unexpected small majority (with the UK's 'first past the post' electoral system they were able to do this with 37% of the vote). The Scottish Nationalist Party, given a major boost by the referendum campaign, won 56 out of the 59 seats in Scotland (having previously only had six seats). The Labour Party did badly, especially in Scotland, whilst the Liberal Democrat Party was virtually wiped out (having attracted a lot of criticism, especially over their position in tuition fees).

It was against this background of civic engagement that this study was conducted, with the intention of drawing upon international comparisons to see whether the issues identified in earlier studies continued to be seen in England and how this compared to young people in other nations.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

Exploring youth civic engagement and disengagement in England

Students at a sixth form college in the south of England were invited to participate in an online survey. The area, according to the government's Income Deprivation Affecting Children Index (IDACI) data which is used to identify the socio-economic nature of an area, is ranked 17310 out of 32482 (with 1 being the most deprived area and 32482 being the most affluent) therefore indicating this area is firmly in the middle ground regarding socio-economic status. Young people aged 16-19 attend the college, where the majority study for their A level examinations. Not all students in England attend a sixth form college, as most tend to study for their A levels in a school for students aged 11-18, but in this particular region, schools tend to take students aged 11-16, and students then choose from a number of sixth form colleges. This means that the students at this college come from a number of different schools within the area and so have different experiences of citizenship education from those schools.

The online survey site only allowed for a maximum of 150 responses, and this number was reached very shortly after the survey was opened. Details about the demographic profile are presented in Table 1. In terms of cultural affiliation, the majority chose British, but the remainder came from a range of African, Asian, European and Pacific nations. However 87% (131) said their nationality was British. The majority of the sample identified their first language as English; other languages included Nepalese, Polish, Marathi, Italian, Hungarian, Mandarin, Spanish, Gujarati, Dutch, Tamil, and Tagalog.

Table 1 provides details of responses to many of the questions asked, which will be referred to as appropriate during the following discussion of the findings.

Citizenship education

Although citizenship education has been compulsory in schools in England since 2002, so all the students should have been taught the subject, fewer than half said they had learned about government structures and processes at school, whereas the majority had either not studied it or could not remember (see Table 1). In one way this is surprising as political literacy was part of the first curriculum and democracy was part of the revised 2007 curriculum, however the Ofsted (2010) report, Citizenship Established?, showed that where school provision was weak it tended to be in the area of government and politics. In addition one of the issues facing schools was how to find space in the curriculum for this new subject. Some schools taught it as a discrete subject, but the majority combined it with Personal, Social, Health and Economic education (PSHE) and used non-specialist teachers, a model which has generally been associated with weaker outcomes for citizenship education (Keating et al., 2009; Kerr et al., 2007; Ofsted, 2010) because students (and some teachers) are sometimes unclear as to the difference between PSHE and citizenship (essentially PSHE covers issues that fall within the personal sphere, whereas citizenship relates to the public sphere). So it is entirely possible that the way in which the curriculum has been presented to students has inhibited their knowledge and understanding of citizenship issues.

When asked whether they had found the material on government useful, only 51 students agreed it had been. Many students clearly had had a positive experience at school; in response to an open question about their experience of studying citizenship at school, 40 students spoke about how relevant they had found learning about citizenship or could identify why it was relevant. However others had had a poorer experience; 10 students felt the lessons had been poorly taught, so they had failed to engage with the topics, whilst 21 responses explained that the lessons in school had lacked detail, leaving students with little insights into the political system. This lack of knowledge was evident in response to a direct question asking student to indicate how knowledgeable they felt about government and politics; only around a quarter said they were knowledgeable, with nearly two thirds claimed to have some knowledge, whilst the remainder felt they lacked any knowledge (see Table 1). This does beg the question where do students learn about political issues, and it seems from the survey that students gain their knowledge largely through the media.

Most students said they followed the news regularly, with many others doing so occasionally (see Table 1). The vast majority of respondents, nearly two thirds, were interested in global news issues, about one sixth were interested mainly in national issues and a couple focused more on local matters. Just over half obtained their news online, with TV being the next most favoured means, used by just over a third of the respondents. Print and radio was cited by hardly any students as a source of news.

Personal experience of political matters

Relatively few students had personal experience of political matters, either directly or indirectly (see Table 1). Respondents were also invited to explain their answers further and detail their experience of political matters. Twenty eight students did respond. The issue most readily identified was education. Eleven students were angry about changes to the education system introduced by the former Coalition government (formed by the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties), and in particular the large increase in university tuition fees, which would affect these students as they were studying courses that would allow them access to university. The following comments illustrate the concerns raised:

If I had to pick one area the government has control of which has affected me, it would be education. They need to consult students before making any major changes because at the end of the day we are the ones who are benefiting from it, not the government (student 14)

Nick Clegg [leader of the Liberal Democrats] promised to cut tuition fees in the 2010 election and he didn't (student 150)

There were five comments about equality issues, mainly related to racism and LGBT issues, and five comments about the political system, particularly distrust of politicians (especially in the wake of the 'expenses scandal'). Three students expressed concern over environmental issues and the remainder covered individual points. In all cases the students focused on the way that political matters had impinged on their lives or attitudes, rather than ways in which they had engaged with the political system.

Students were also asked to provide open-ended responses to explain their views relating to family engagement in political matters and 27 chose to do so. Of these 11 indicated that their family's level of political activity was restricted to voting. Only three responses showed any further degree of political participation; one said their parents had signed petitions, one had been involved with a protest over marriage equality (presumably gay marriage rights given the timing of the survey, although this was not made clear) and one had actively campaigned for a political party in the locality.

Civic engagement

The students were asked to indicate how important it was for someone to be actively involved in improving their communities, to which the responses were overwhelmingly positive (see Table 1). Yet their personal levels of activity were much more limited. Only around half of those who said it was important to be actively involved described themselves as active, whilst over a quarter said they had no active engagement in civic matters (see Table 1). When asked what types of civic activity they engaged with the main responses were donating money, volunteering and being neighbourly (see Table 1). These are either relatively simple acts to engage with or are community based rather than political in nature.

Although many students felt civic engagement was important, few were active themselves and this may be linked to their sense of personal efficacy and the ability to influence change. As can be seen in Table 1, only a quarter of the respondents felt they could effectively influence change, whereas nearly a third thought they had no influence at all. Looking at the more detailed reasons why students felt this way, their comments demonstrated the youth to have a strong perception that individuals were powerless; 61 comments specifically focused on either the weakness of individuals to change things or stressed that only collective action could achieve anything.

A small group of people can't make much of a difference you have to have a lot of people working together to get a proper impact (student 8)

Because the general public although have perceived control actually has very little control, government decides most of what happens whether that be regional or local - for example students didn't want exams to change but the government made a decision to change it (student 43)

A further 14 responses also showed that the students felt that they were either too young, too unimportant or simply not trusted for their views to be taken seriously:

I feel I'm too young to be taken seriously (student 39)

I'm a teenager. We are seen as vandals and hoodlums who have nothing but bad intentions (student 42)

Although as the following response suggests, some young people feel they could make a positive difference if only they were listened to:

If myself and other youth like me were to have the means and power to speak their mind in a way that would reach the whole community, I feel that a lot of social issues would finally be brought to light and addressed. In order for us to make a difference we need to be given that chance, and when given that opportunity I believe that we would make the most of it and make a positive change to society (student 40)

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

Only 31 more detailed responses suggested that individuals could make, or at least make some, difference to society.

Anyone can make a difference, even alone (student 71)

Because to make a real difference on a large scale it takes more than one person to speak up but locally sometimes it only takes one person (student 104)

These findings support earlier studies, which show young people have low to moderate levels of efficacy in bringing about change (Benton et al., 2008; Keating et al., 2010).

Attitudes towards government and democracy

The vast majority of students were positive about democracy per se, but less supportive of the UK system of government (see Table 1). The concerns expressed about the UK system were that it does not always fairly represent the views of the people:

Our system benefits the rich elites, ignoring the majority of the population (student 41)

It's a good idea but most people are not represented (student 50)

democracy is a good concept, but when there are only 3 main parties people can choose from, all having similar plans for the country, it seems like there isn't really a choice in our democracy (student 65)

As with levels of civic engagement, many students felt that it was important for them to be active in the political arena. Generally speaking the responses to the open-ended question asking students to elaborate on their answer showed that they felt everyone's voice needed to be heard:

If you don't participate, you can't change things you don't like (student 16)

If you don't use your voice, you can't complain if it's unheard (student 137)

But there were signs of either cynicism or a lack of personal efficacy:

Sometimes I think it is worth speaking out but a lot of the time realistically voices don't get heard and nothing actually changes (student 113)

At the end of the survey students were invited to add any comments regarding any of the issues and some chose to write about their views on government, a number of which were heartfelt and showed an awareness of issues within society:

The current system we have is clearly not working; it's designed to benefit the "ruling class" who are centred around greed. I don't know what the new system would look like or what it should look like. However I know it should not socialise the upcoming generations into becoming blinded, obedient slaves that use up their lives to line the pockets of the rich, it should not create vast economic disparity, it should not cause massive, irreversible damage to the environment all in the name of profit and it should provide everyone with a free and fulfilling life regardless of race, gender, sexuality or beliefs. I am only a 17 year old boy, and even I can see the problems within our society, so surely highly educated politicians can see it too. So why are, these people who are meant to represent us, not doing anything about it? (student 46)

Generally the findings from this survey resonate with earlier studies. Nelson, Wade, and Kerr \(2010\) concluded that young people in England were broadly supportive of democracy and were willing to vote, but their level of interest in political issues and willingness to engage in political activity was much more limited. Lopes, Benton and Cleaver's (2009) study suggested that young people's levels of engagement were largely dictated by perceived self-benefit from participation. Given the low levels of efficacy in bringing about change identified in the findings from the survey, it could be argued that these young people do not see they have much say in how things could change and therefore see little personal benefit from political engagement.

Perceptions of what makes you a citizen

The respondents were asked to identify particular attributes and actions which would be necessary conditions for being a citizen of their country. The most popular responses were:

- Paying taxes – 83% (although this was in the context of much media attention at the time about big corporations avoiding paying tax in the UK)
- Being interested in the common well-being – 68%
- Speaking the language of the country in which you live – 60%
- Being a good neighbour - 50%
- Knowing the history of the country and rules of government – 43%
- Being born in the country – 29%

These suggest that the students regard citizenship overwhelmingly in terms of what an individual can contribute to the community, and that they are expected to be caring and law abiding. This fits very strongly into the idea of civil and social values, rather than defining it in political and legal terms. Interestingly only two students chose sharing the same religion, whilst ten chose sharing the same lifestyle, which suggests that these young people are accepting of different lifestyles and belief systems, and do not see the need for others to accept a particular set of customs as a prerequisite for citizenship.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

An open-ended comment box at the end of the survey allowed participants to elaborate more fully on some points. Some students were concerned that existing institutions in the UK should be respected and that loyalty to the UK should be a key aspect of citizenship:

There should be an understanding between all cultures but I'm pretty against sharia Law. The head of the UK is the monarch not religion and if they feel sharia law is the way to go then why come live in the UK? The British have their own law and regulation. Also the British citizenship should have that key question that asks "Would you fight for the UK" and if answered no they should fail the test instantly. If there is no attachment to UK then they are most likely here just for benefits and if shit hits the fan they will be the first to leave while I will gladly fight till the end (student 135)

However more responses stressed a positive view towards immigrants, but raised concerns about how people within the UK were being manipulated into more negative views towards them:

I think there should be as little requirements as possible to get citizenship somewhere. Immigration should be actively encouraged - I think it is good for our economy, society, culture and wellbeing for it to be as diverse and varied as possible. Also, people should have limits on them where they can and can't live. As long as they pay the taxes for that country, then I think it is fine for them to live there (student 9)

The recent events that have taken place in the Middle East have heightened racial tensions. In the UK I have seen many scenarios of Islamophobia for example. Organisations such as UKIP (UK Independence Party), BNP (British National Party) and the EDL (English Defence League) have all gained support because of this closed mindedness and lack of understanding and knowledge to be quite frank. Education is one of the best ways to fight this cultural change, yes, I do think this cultural change should be fought. Nationalism and patriotism are being used as excuses for closed mindedness and sometimes racism. Educate children on world affair, from all sorts of different views, ensure they are given many perspectives on current affairs. Teach them not to be easily persuaded by bias, teach them how to formulate independent views that take into considerations the situation from many angles (student 30)

I feel that it is wrong to expect a person to 'share the same religion and lifestyle' as the country when our country is so diverse. It's unfair and prejudiced. There are also plenty of British citizens who are not 'good neighbours' or interested in the common wellbeing and not everyone knows the history of our country. Even less people know the rules of government. So I think it's unfair and elitist to expect this of people trying to get citizenship when a percentage of our own citizens can't fulfil these requirements. A basic, general understanding is of course necessary I think (student 53)

Although only a few students commented on issues relating to immigration, the general responses regarding attributes and actions for people to be granted citizenship suggest a more tolerant and accepting position from the students who responded to this survey, which runs counter to findings in other studies. For example Kerr \(2005\) and Nelson et al. \(2010\) found that pupils were broadly intolerant of immigration. Although further work would be needed to explore this issue further for a stronger claim to be made.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

The relationship between ‘internal’ factors and civic engagement

Overall analysis of the data did not reveal strong correlations between a range of internal factors and the levels of civic engagement, although some trends were discernible.

Knowledge of politics and government and attitudes to civic engagement

Students’ knowledge of politics and government did not reveal any statistically significant correlations, although there were some noticeable trends. Those who claimed to be knowledgeable about political issues were more likely to feel they could influence change. This was most noticeable when analysing whether the respondents felt they could not bring about change. Amongst those who felt knowledgeable approximately 19% felt as individuals they would be ineffective in bringing about change, for those who had some knowledge the figure rose to 30%, and for those with no knowledge the figure was higher at 45%.

Regarding support for democracy and the type of government in the UK there was an inverse relationship between the level of support and degree of knowledge. Those with higher levels of knowledge were twice as likely to support the type of UK governmental system compared to those who said they lacked knowledge of the political system, and a similar pattern was discernible for democracy generally. When analysing how important it was to participate in civic activities there was a similar trend as described above between the degree of knowledge and the perception that participation was important. A mixed picture was evident when respondents were asked about how actively engaged they were a range of civic activities. The most active were those with some knowledge of political issues, with a quarter claiming to be active and nearly half saying they were occasionally active. Of those who claimed to be knowledgeable and of those with little knowledge, few were actively engaged in civic activities but around half were occasionally involved.

Personality type and civic behaviour

Previous studies (Dinesen, Nørgaard, & Klemmensen, 2014; Metzger & Smetana, 2010) had suggested that personality type has an influence over people’s disposition towards civic participation. The findings from this study lend some support to this idea, but are not strong. Those in the ‘leader’ and ‘friendly’ categories were more likely to demonstrate civic behaviours, but the figures only account for 11% of all responses.

Generally those in the ‘leader’ category were more likely to be knowledgeable about politics (29% said they were knowledgeable and 53% said they had some knowledge), more likely to support the UK system of government (56%), and feel they could influence change (31% said they could, and 40% said they would have some effect). Overall they seem to have a higher sense of engagement with aspects of political activity, although in all cases the figures are not statistically significant.

Those who identified as ‘outgoing’ were more likely to be engaged in community focused activity (63% said it was important to be involved and 31% said they were actively involved), but also recognised the importance of supporting democracy as a form of government (both generally – 77% - and in the UK – 43%).

Altogether the four personality types were generally supportive of democracy, but support for the UK system of government was weakest amongst those who were ‘introverted’ (37%) and ‘friendly’ (26%). Those who felt least able to effect change were the ‘friendly type’ (16%), and the level of engagement in the community was lowest amongst ‘introverts’ (12%).

Gender

Comparing responses by gender shows some trends, but again revealed nothing statistically significant; males generally reported higher levels of political knowledge whereas females were more likely to be involved in community issues; 43% of males said they were knowledgeable and 45% said they had some knowledge; for females the figures were 16% and 70% respectively. Both genders reported a similar sense of efficacy in bringing about change, although girls were slightly more positive; 48% of girls felt they could be somewhat effective with 30% saying they would not be able to influence change.

Females were also slightly more likely to feel it was important to be involved in improving the community and be more active; 52% said it was important to be involved, compared to 42% of males. Females were almost twice as likely to claim they were actively involved in the community, with 24% claiming participation, compared to 14% of males.

Sense of efficacy

As noted above, students generally revealed a low sense of personal efficacy in terms of influencing events in the local community or society more broadly. Factors such as knowledge of the political system, personality type, gender, social class did not have much bearing on young people’s sense of efficacy.

However analysis relating involvement in civic activity did reveal a statistically significant relationship between the level of activity in civic processes and sense of personal efficacy ($p=.001$). What is not clear is how this relationship operates, i.e. whether higher levels of self-efficacy lead individuals into civic activity or involvement in civic activity promotes higher levels of efficacy.

The relationship between ‘external’ factors and civic engagement

As with the internal factors no clear or strong correlations were found between young people’s level of civic engagement and external factors, although there were evident trends.

School

It has been claimed that schools do influence the ways that students engage with citizenship and civic activities (Keating et al., 2010; Ofsted, 2010, 2013) and this study provides some evidence to support these. For example, those who remember being taught about politics and government were more likely to follow the news (70%) compared to those who were not taught this in school (55%) or could not remember being taught (58%). Also students who had been taught about politics and government were more likely to be supportive of the UK system – 48% as opposed to 37% of those who were not taught and 17% of those who could not remember.

There was also a trend regarding levels of participation. Nearly 60% of those who were taught about politics and government thought it was important for people to be actively involved in their community and 65% thought it was important to participate in civic activities. The corresponding figures for those who claim not to have been taught or could not remember being taught about politics were much lower.

This would suggest that education in school does have an effect on how students perceive the importance of participation, yet the actual levels of participation were low across all three types of response, with between 20-25% saying they engaged in civic activities.

Family and prior political encounters

It would be reasonable to assume that family influence and personal experience would shape young people's attitudes towards civic engagement. Although the data show there is a positive relationship between these factors it does not appear to be a strong one.

A third of those who claimed to be knowledgeable about politics had families who were politically active (although as discussed previously this often does not extend beyond voting), which is reduced to a fifth where families were not active. However there were some surprising results. Students whose families were not active in politics felt more strongly that they could be 'somewhat effective' in bringing around change compared to families considered active (45% compared to 29%). Also respondents were more likely to be active in their communities if their families were not politically active, and to be more supportive of the UK system of government, than those who were more active.

There was a similar positive, if not strong pattern in regard to prior political experiences. For example a third with such experience felt they could influence change, whilst a quarter of those without prior experience felt they could do this.

Discussion

Despite citizenship being a compulsory part of the school curriculum in England, and despite the focus on creating politically literate and active, responsible citizens, the findings from this survey tend to illustrate a lack of knowledge on the part of many students, and a gulf between attitudes and actions. To an extent it may be that this reflects the findings of

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

Keating et al. (2010); in their large-scale longitudinal study of citizenship education in England from its inception, they conclude that the young people in the study were more likely to have a positive attitude towards civic and political participation if they had received a lot of specific citizenship teaching, both in terms of curriculum time and specialist teaching; in addition they noted that there was a cumulative effect, with attitudes strengthening over time based on prior attitudes, i.e. positive attitudes aged 16, became more positive for students aged 18. Conversely those who reported having had little or no citizenship education were significantly more likely to have poor attitudes to participation. Given so many in this study could not remember having been taught citizenship, Keating et al.'s (2010) findings may explain the attitudes reported here and the relatively low levels of participation (although it should be acknowledged that Keating et al.'s study looked at attitudes towards participation and intention to participate rather than actual levels of activity).

On the positive side, the majority of students are generally supportive of democratic structures (if slightly less enthusiastic about the system of government in the UK), are aware of the importance of engaging with civic activities and with the community, and are keen to be informed about the world in which they live. However it is not clear from where students develop their views. The number of students who claim not to have been taught (a statutory subject) or cannot remember it is relatively high, plus few come from families which are politically active and few have direct personal experience of politics. Most are keen to keep up to date with news, are interested in a range of issues, and so it would seem that many teach themselves what they wish to know, or try to make sense of things as best they can. It would appear from this sample that young people want to know more about civic matters but have not received sufficient education or experience from external support systems. Although it is a positive thing that young people wish to be informed and it would appear have to do this independently, it is not clear to what extent they are able to examine a range of views, critically engage with issues and so develop well-informed opinions.

Without sufficient knowledge many feel unable to influence matters. Other studies, such as Nelson et al. \(2010\), have found a connection between high levels of civic knowledge and support for democratic values, and the findings from this survey suggest an association between higher levels of knowledge and positive attitudes and levels of participation. Although students feel participation is important, the majority do not believe they have the ability to influence matters, and consequently it can be argued they find reasons not to engage in activities. Given a healthy democracy needs active participation by its citizenry this should be a concern, and reflects findings in other studies (e.g. Keating et al., 2010). Overall there is a strong sense of disengagement from participants from the civic and political community. The qualitative comments suggest that young people do not feel trusted or respected, whilst in turn their perception of politicians means they do not trust them. Although there is a sense that democracy is a 'good' thing, the levels of support for the UK system of government is perceptibly lower.

Dr Richard Harris, Associate Professor in Education, Institute of Education, University of Reading – written evidence (CCE0028)

The lack of political engagement is also seen in the conception of a citizen; most students defined citizenship in terms of community engagement and contributing positively to society and a good citizen was defined in relation to personal qualities, such as being kind and caring. This stresses what Geboers, Geijsel, Admiraal and ten Dam (2013) see as a model of 'civil society' where there is an emphasis on social cohesion, coexistence and personal development; this model of citizenship has been criticised by Mead (2010) as a form of communitarianism, which could easily be found in various dictatorships and does little to promote the values of democracy and participation in the political sphere. Although civic engagement is clearly an important element of citizenship, it is a very different conception to models that emphasise a more classical, political model. Part of the problem, as Geboers et al. (2013) imply, is that young people do not yet see themselves as citizens because of the way in which their engagement in the political world is restricted (in the UK young people are not allowed to vote until the age of 18).

It would seem that citizenship education in England needs a careful reappraisal. It seems clear that young people generally see the importance of political and civic engagement, yet feel unwilling and/or unable to participate. The resolution to this situation is complex. At one level it seems there is an argument to develop students' knowledge and understanding of the political, social and community elements of citizenship as envisioned in the original National Curriculum documentation. The range of responses from the students in this survey may reflect the range of approaches different secondary schools are likely to have adopted towards citizenship in the curriculum – schools may teach it as a discrete subject but others may well have combined it with PSHE, taught it through cross-curricular approaches or specific theme days. It is also highly likely that there are few specialist teachers in these schools. The obvious solution would be to advocate more clearly defined citizenship teaching in the curriculum, taught by specialists. Yet on its own these are simply 'tinkering' around the edges.

It seems there needs to be a deeper philosophical debate if young people are to value, protect and promote democratic participation in society. The Council of Europe's (2015) educational manifesto questions whether we are doing the right things, in the right way when it comes to education; if, in future, we wish to live in a democratic society, then this must be a fundamental aim of education. As such, citizenship should not simply be a curriculum subject that is 'squeezed' into an overcrowded school timetable; it needs to be one of the driving forces behind curriculum design. It also means that young people should experience democracy in action in schools and the local community; the idea of 'student voice' is not new, but the extent to which young people have a genuine say in their lives, or are given the means and support to allow their voices to be heard is questionable. At present the findings from this small survey raise questions about the health of democratic society in England, but the findings resonate with other studies, which in turn suggests the issues raised here need careful and serious attention from all levels of the educational system.

Helen Haste, Angela Bermudez, and Mario Carretero – written evidence (CCE0226)

How we think about civic participation has changed dramatically in the last decade. This affects research education, practice and policy. These changes derive in part from changing perspectives on democratic processes. In summary, the definition of ‘civic’ has expanded considerably beyond voting behavior in conventional parliamentary elections. ‘New civics’ includes ‘unconventional’ forms of voice, including both legal and illegal protest, and the wide variety of communication routes now available for making one’s voice heard. It includes organization designed to challenge power, whether local macro or global. It pays attention to volunteering, it also recognizes the importance of single issue activism, not only partisanship. Particularly striking is that ‘new civics’ discussion has made explicit the inherent tension between the goal of creating citizens who will be actively involved in sustaining the existing socio-political system, and the goal of creating citizens who are equipped to challenge critically the status quo a tension which is evident in public discussion of civic education.

What has contributed to these changes? First, the radical upheavals of late twentieth century led to recognition that social movements were a significant aspect of political life not anomalies of extremism; protesters became agents of democracy not pathological deviants.

Second, social media have had a huge impact. Traditionally, the citizen could influence government policy indirectly through voting or pressure group membership, their voices heard through petitions, letters to newspapers or radio phone-in programs. The sense of agency was limited; influence was constrained. Social media has transformed the traditional hierarchies and gatekeepers of communication and voice. Digital media democratizes, in the sense that anyone can – in principle – gain a worldwide audience. This has its dark side as we all recognize, and also there is the ‘echo chamber’ effect: on the whole people tune in what is familiar and also largely consonant with their existing views.

While having ‘voice’ does not necessarily mean having ‘influence’ we have seen massive evidence of the ‘bottom-up’ power of media to mobilize, recruit, organize and publicize social movements with great impact. We see also the effect on participants. Exercising voice, especially when this has a tangible outcome, builds a sense of efficacy in participants and equips them with new civic skills. Quite small investment in technology enables formerly marginalized or disempowered groups to develop and implement strategies for impacting power structures and institutions, and in particular linking with collaborators across regional and national boundaries. Use of media has enabled young people in very deprived contexts, such as favelas and refugee camps, to tell their own story through the use of cellphone videos, also in so doing, acquiring basic technical skills; both enhance efficacy and competences. Finally, a major democratizing factor of digital media is the pressure for public accountability that it places on people in power and in the public eye.

Traditionally, civic education has been conceptualized as, and researched as, school-based, defined by what is feasible within the school environment, especially classroom practice. There has been a particular emphasis on civic knowledge, especially knowledge relating to the structure and processes of the country's government, and also to the history narratives that sustain national identity. An emphasis on civic knowledge reflects a cognitive primarily of fact-based model of learning with the assumption that understanding how laws are made and how governance is structured will motivate young people actively to sustain the system by voting. New civics challenges much of this and expands the agenda.

How conceptualizing 'democracy' directs education

Underlying any conception of civic participation and the goals of civic education are assumptions about how democracy does, and should, function. We can identify four conceptions informing different emphases in civic education programs: procedural democracy, deliberative democracy, democracy as social justice, and democracy as a mode of living. Each implies different goals for civic education and different learning processes.

Procedural democracy implies a system of political organization and decision-making based on representative and participatory procedures that are grounded on principles of freedom, equality, and the rule of law. Civic education aims to provide students with the knowledge necessary for voting in elections or campaigning for parties. In practice however, procedural democracy privileges majority views, achieving consensus, compliance with convention, and keeping order in a stable system. This may marginalize minority, controversial, novel, or particularly complex alternative views on public issues.

Deliberative democracy shares the principles of procedural democracy, but also emphasizes the pervasiveness and importance of conflict, moral controversy, and dissent in social and political life. Therefore, it is important that citizens actively engage in the deliberation of public issues. Civic education for deliberation focuses on developing the capacities for critical inquiry, moral and political argumentation, and participating effectively in controversial dialogue.

Proponents of democracy as social justice argue that focusing on political procedures does not adequately represent the complex, unequal, and conflictive nature of citizenship in contemporary societies. An “authentic” or “deep” democracy must be committed to equality and dignity in equal terms for all. Unless socioeconomic (distributive) justice is guaranteed, the essential values of democracy are at stake. Civic education programs informed by democracy as social justice stress developing students’ capacity to critically understand the multiple forms of systemic violence, oppression, and exclusion, preparing them to analyze power relationships, investigate the ambiguities of political issues, and embrace opportunities for social change.

In a fourth conception, democracy is a mode of living founded on values of inclusiveness, pluralism, fairness, cooperation, dialogue, and non-violent resolution of conflict. This requires developing sensitivity, habits, and capacities to build and preserve relationships and connection across lines of difference.

While all these require civic knowledge procedural models views emphasize knowledge of political institutions and constitutional procedures, deliberative models add knowledge of current public issues, and social justice models add knowledge of socioeconomic dynamics. Procedural models emphasize cognitive skills for effective analysis of information, whereas deliberative and social justice models emphasize skills for critical inquiry and controversial dialogue. Democracy as a way of life requires cognitive and socio-emotional skills necessary for resolution of conflict.

What makes civic education effective? The centrality of culture

‘New civics’ participation needs more than transmission of factual knowledge and conventional values, primarily aiming to socialize students into the existing sociopolitical order. The growing individual actively processes information and experience, successively restructuring and reflecting, producing increasingly complex and abstract understanding. What elements of civic education are necessary to scaffold active learning and deep understanding? What happens in civic learning with increasing age? How is what happens in civic learning helped by opportunities to engage with civic issues? Education should foster increasingly sophisticated understanding of civic matters, and provide experiences and contexts to facilitate active, effective, and meaningful processing.

Learning results not only from information, but also from individuals’ action and interaction within a social context. Meaning and understanding are co-constructed and negotiated in social and cultural interactions, through dialogue with others and with cultural resources for example, linguistic and institutional messages about ethnicity, power, and norms of behavior. Effective civic learning needs to use such cultural resources to facilitate interaction, critical reflection, and negotiation. This includes paying attention to classroom and school climate, community experience, service learning, family interactions, cultural narratives, norms and expectations, socioeconomic factors, and increasingly, social media.

The components of civic competence

Four strands of skills and competence contribute to the effective citizen, each has distinct educational implications. These are: civic knowledge and understanding; civic skills; civic values, motivation, and identity; and civic action.

Civic Knowledge and Understanding

Teaching facts about democratic institutions and national history is being challenged by a growing consensus that citizens also require knowledge and understanding about controversial issues, intergroup relations, local and community affairs. Further, civic knowledge alone is not enough to foster active and responsible civic engagement. An active civil society requires also understanding of concepts and principles, the skills for reflective and responsible action, willingness to engage, and commitment to democratic values. Knowledge is more meaningful when integrated with conceptual understanding. For example, students may “know” the list of core human rights, but they may not understand what the concept of “rights” actually entails, why they were codified in a particular historical time, or how they relate to specific conceptions of state.

Civic Skills

Civic skills are often divided into intellectual skills, participatory skills, and socio-emotional skills. Youth are expected to make sound political choices, to take part in collective decision making, conflict resolution, and negotiation, to discuss controversial social and political issues, or monitor government action on behalf of public interests. Knowledge and conceptual understanding are about ‘knowing what’; civic skills are procedural – ‘knowing how’: the capacities to analyze and synthesize information and arguments, as well as to evaluate, reach conclusions, take and defend positions. Examples include considering different perspectives, interrogating and interpreting political communication, and supporting positions with evidence and good argumentation. Participatory skills are capacities for working with others, building coalitions, seeking consensus, negotiating differences, and managing conflict. There are skills for communication (public speaking, petitioning, lobbying, protesting), organization (mobilizing, securing funding, leading meetings), and collective decision making (coordinating perspectives, evaluating alternative solutions, etc.) and also skills for group membership and for conflict resolution.

Socio-emotional and interpersonal skills include handling oneself in healthy relationships with family, peers, and community members. Examples include dealing positively with peer pressure, developing non-abusive relationships, avoiding risky behavior, and coordinating one's needs with the needs of others.

Civic Values, Motivation, and Identity

A third dimension of civic learning comprises values, motives, and identities that promote effective democratic practices, such as taking responsibility voting and helping others, upholding the law, monitoring current affairs in the media, tolerance and respect for diversity, and concern with rights, welfare, freedom, or justice.

Value development is rooted in active meaning making and social negotiation. Discussion of moral and civic dilemmas fosters development of moral judgment and social values. Moral values motivate civic action because they make issues personally relevant. While young people express very little interest in conventional "politics", they are concerned about and active in many community and environmental issues especially single issues that are affectively experienced as morally charged, contributing to a sense of personal responsibility. For effective education it is essential to start from where young people's concerns and interests are, and to understand what motivates them to engage. Individual and collective identities are increasingly recognized as key features in the definition of civic motivation and commitments.

Civic identity is an active and fluid psychosocial process through which citizens make sense of their social reality. It includes agency and efficacy; feeling one is a meaningful actor, responsible to one's community, having confidence in one's ability to take action, and achieve results.

Civic Action

Long before they become formal political citizens, young people experience civic environments which provide learning opportunities, for example situations that call them to stand up against prejudice, discrimination, and harassment. School government affords opportunities for civic voice. Families, peer groups, and social media are sites for discussing controversial issues. Real-life authentic civic action experience contributes to civic identity; motivation, purpose, responsibility, agency, and efficacy.

Youth organizing and how community-based civic action are particularly salient among marginalized communities. Participation requires and fosters coming together, working with others, mediating differences, managing conflict, and establishing shared goals in order to regulate, direct, and develop common affairs. Community activism is characterized by social responsibility and commitment to partner with others in understanding problems, and developing and implementing solutions.

Implications

The broadening definitions of ‘civic participation’ gives both researchers and practitioners far more scope for understanding what contributes to being a citizen, recognising that citizenship is far more than voting behavior, and that civic identity is as much a part of the self as moral or national identity. It challenges the long-standing distinction between our public and private lives, a distinction difficult to maintain once we understand the origins and contexts of motivations for civic action and engagement. This recognizes that civic competences, reasoning, affect and behavior are not explicable only in terms of individual characteristics, nor can effective civic education be achieved if the learner is seen as isolated from the social context. The roles of cultural experience, resources and dialectic are inherent in all aspects of civic competence, expression and the education for their development.

Joe Hayman – written evidence (CCE0059)

As the former Chief Executive of the PSHE Association, the national body for Personal, Social, Health and Economic education (a school subject taught alongside citizenship education) and the author of two books on public perspectives on identity, belonging, community and citizenship in modern Britain, I welcome the committee's call for evidence on this crucial area. I set out below my responses to the committee's questions.

1. As British society has grown and developed, new challenges have been posed to our 'social contract'. Large scale migration has brought people from all over the world to the UK and enabled British people to travel all over the world; these changes, combined with technological advances in relation to global communications, mean many people in Britain have an increasingly international identity and global perspective, and that our population is no longer defined by a single ethnicity, heritage or faith. We also live in a more cynical age, with deference to leaders, experts and institutions diminished and our faith in one another frequently challenged. While the principles of citizenship and civic engagement, of shared rights and mutual responsibilities, remain crucial in the 21st century, it is essential to re-examine them in this changed – and still changing – context.

In this submission, I argue that we should not simply re-examine our notions of citizenship and civic engagement in 21st century Britain but that we should explicitly set out to strengthen the ties that bind us. For the reasons set out above, we cannot take for granted that the people of a country like Britain will feel a strong sense of citizenship, and if our notions of mutual responsibility do drift, then we will all feel the consequences: our politics will be weakened as the mandate and legitimacy of the state and other national institutions is threatened; our social contract will be undermined because a view may form that British people have little in common and therefore have no responsibility to share with or to look after one another; concerns about immigration may drive us to make counter-productive decisions; and fear, mistrust or misunderstanding of our fellow citizens, with whom we might share a nationality but may feel we have little in common, will atomise our communities, reduce our quality of life and leave us all vulnerable.

The question of identity and affinity to nation is inextricably linked to this debate. In Britain, we face twin threats of Islamist and far-right extremism, ideologies which prey upon alienated individuals who feel disconnected from modern British identity; a similar mindset informs the religious and racist hate crime which so troubles our society. These issues stem in significant part from a 'them and us' mentality which breeds fear and division. In response, we must urgently seek to create a genuine sense of 'us' – a true national community – in our increasingly-diverse society. I set out below how strengthening our collective sense of shared values, shared endeavour and a shared future could provide a more meaningful sense of 'us' in a multi-cultural, multi-faith society.

In short, the committee's inquiry could not be more timely: we are going through a significant social and economic transition as a country, and recent events have laid our divisions bare. Strengthened notions of citizenship could play an important role in addressing some of the biggest challenges we face as a society and prevent internal divisions from spilling over and colouring our politics into the future. If our notions of citizenship are to be strengthened, we need to re-examine them in a 21st century context and, as I set out in response to the committee's final question, develop a new institution to respond to the challenge of building 21st century citizenship in the UK.

2. There are two 'entry points' through which one can become a 'full' member of British society: either as a young person progressing into adult citizenship or as a naturalised citizen who has come to the UK from abroad. It follows that the same expectations of citizenship should be set for both groups and the willingness of these 'new citizens' to meet those expectations should be articulated in the same way. This is what makes citizenship ceremonies and the oaths which lie at the heart of them so important: pledges increase our confidence in each other and the idea of a society in which every single member has pledged their commitment to one another – either as a young person becoming an adult or as a naturalised citizen – has the potential to build trust and help to address some of the divisions that we face. Having the same ceremony for naturalised citizens as for young people who grew up in the UK would also send a powerful message about the UK welcoming people from abroad as equals and having the same high expectations of them as any other citizen.

On the question of pride, I believe we should encourage our citizens to be critical thinkers who work towards making the country a better place for us all to live. With this in mind, a blanket pride which ignores the country's past mistakes and current iniquities should be avoided. Yet it is in all of our interests for people feel positive about the UK, so we should encourage celebration of and gratitude for the special things about our society and about one another. True modern citizenship combines this celebration and gratitude with recognition of mistakes and iniquities and acceptance of shared responsibility to address them. It helps in this respect to think of society not as something fixed but rather as an ongoing endeavour which every citizen works together to build and improve.

3. Further formal rights and responsibilities beyond those already articulated in our legal framework are not required in order to enhance our conceptions of citizenship and indeed might undermine the liberal society which we are trying to build. Our legal rights and responsibilities are covered in existing legislation³⁷⁴ and what we are exploring here is a social contract, not a legal one. However, a better articulation of what modern British ³⁷⁴ It is worth noting that if our post-referendum deal with the EU alters our commitment to the European Convention on Human Rights then this will need to be re-examined and a British Bill of Rights or equivalent will be required. This would not need to create additional powers but simply to articulate existing rights and responsibilities and give them grounding in British rather than European Law.

citizenship means could help both new and existing citizens to understand more about their rights and responsibilities. This could be covered outside legislation through, for example, citizenship education textbooks, information on life in the UK for those new to the country and in an enhanced citizenship oath covering not just rights and responsibilities but also capturing a sense of shared values, shared endeavour and a shared future.

4. If we are to encourage greater political engagement amongst our citizens, all young people should automatically join the electoral register on completion of schooling/national citizenship service, as should all newly naturalised citizens. Compulsory voting would be a further step forward: often seen as a draconian or illiberal measure, there is evidence that it ensures that historically underrepresented groups have their voices heard in the political process³⁷⁵. A ‘none of the above’ (NOTA) option on the ballot would be necessary if compulsory voting was to be introduced, since it would not be acceptable to force people to vote for a candidate they did not support, and while it would not be ideal for the NOTA option to be widely taken up, it would at least send a strong message about public dissatisfaction with modern politics. At present, political apathy is often understood as contentment with, or at least acceptance of, the status quo and the fact that around one third of citizens do not vote in general elections often passes without comment: a strong ‘showing’ for NOTA would provide a powerful imperative for change in the political process.

The current inconsistency between the age at which young people can vote and the age at which they can exercise other ‘adult’ responsibilities (for example, getting married) is difficult to justify. An innovative response would be to try to harmonise the age at which young people can vote with the age at which they can marry, leave compulsory education, drink alcohol and qualify to drive – all of which, one could argue, require an adult level of maturity. Another option could be to keep the voting age at 18 but allow young people who have completed their citizenship education or National Citizen Service before age 18 to qualify for the electoral register early, perhaps once they have completed a citizenship ceremony. Combining citizenship ceremonies with some kind of ‘citizenship card’ which provided an entitlement to new freedoms for the young people would make the ceremony much more meaningful for those young people and provide a powerful incentive for them.

5. Despite the best efforts of the citizenship education community and its supporters, the subject has long been a poor relation in schools. The Department for Education’s annual workforce survey, which details the amount of time allotted to every different subject in secondary schools in England, shows that citizenship education makes up on average just

³⁷⁵ As Shane Singh of the Political Studies Association notes, “compulsory voting decreases disincentives for turnout among underrepresented groups and, as such, their participation rates typically begin to approach those of more mainstream groups”. See <https://www.psa.ac.uk/insight-plus/beyond-turnout-consequences-compulsory-voting>

0.3% of teaching hours in Key Stages 3 and 4 in schools across the country³⁷⁶. This compares to 3.6% of teaching hours for Religious Education and 5.1% of teaching hours for ‘mainstream’ subjects like history. 0.3% of teaching hours equates to less than three hours over an entire school year, an insufficient amount of time for meaningful learning. My experience from leading the national body for PSHE education, the subject often taught along citizenship education in schools, is that provision is even weaker at primary level.

The question from headteachers in response to calls to give subjects like citizenship greater curriculum time is always ‘what should we cut?’ and there are no easy answers. Schools are extremely busy as it is and there are strong arguments for a range of subjects to get more curriculum time, as there are for established subjects to maintain their curriculum time. However, for the future health of our society, more time could and should be found in schools for the teaching of citizenship, and many schools with excellent results already find time to teach citizenship well³⁷⁷. Schools should be open to the idea of giving the subject more space on the timetable since high-quality citizenship education creates a positive environment for learning in which pupils understand their responsibilities and the expectations upon them and seek to contribute to the success of the school.

In order to improve citizenship education in schools, not only will the curriculum need to be updated and resources and teacher training improved, but the subject will also have to be made compulsory across all key stages, including at primary level. This is the only way in which things change in schools, and while terms like democracy may be challenging for younger children, understanding of the importance of participation and listening to others can be built from an early age. Making the subject compulsory means that there should be no exemptions from citizenship education: we want our children to learn that the same rights and responsibilities apply to all citizens and it follows that every child should have the opportunity to learn about those rights and responsibilities.

6. The National Citizen Service (NCS) is an increasingly-important part of life for British young people. Ultimately, our aim should be that it is a rite of passage which every young person in the country goes through: all young people should have the opportunity to build on their school-based citizenship education with the opportunity to practice citizenship in the real world through NCS. We should seek to avoid becoming a two-tier society where some young people have had an opportunity to practice and demonstrate their citizenship and others have not. As set out above, completion of NCS should lead to public citizenship ceremonies in the same style as those for naturalised citizens.

³⁷⁶ The full data is available at Row 48 of Table 11 of the DfE workforce study November 2016: <https://www.gov.uk/government/statistics/school-workforce-in-england-november-2016>

³⁷⁷ Ofsted holds 8 case studies of schools with excellent citizenship teaching and outstanding inspection results on its website:

<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20141115234447/http://www.ofsted.gov.uk/inspection-reports/our-expert-knowledge/subject-survey-feedback-letters-schools/citizenship-subject-survey-visits>

NCS is not the only opportunity for young people to practice good citizenship, of course: many young people will have been volunteering or playing a role in their communities long before their NCS experience; some will have been involved in the youth democracy movement or campaigned on other issues which matter to them. We should be pleased that young people have multiple routes to civic engagement but it is important for community cohesion and our sense of nation that all British young people have one ‘shared experience’, creating commonality between young people of different backgrounds and ensuring that no one misses out. NCS is the obvious way to deliver this.

7. One straightforward step government could take would be to require businesses over a certain size to give mandatory volunteering time to their employees. It is a reality that many people do not have the time for civic engagement because of work and family commitments: making civic engagement part of ‘work time’ would be one way to address this, and while it would be costly for businesses, it would help to ensure that those with the most time and money are not the only ones making a civic contribution. Government could also work with civil society to reduce the bureaucracy involved in volunteering, making it easier for a range of people to get involved. Flexible volunteering initiatives designed for working people such as North London Cares³⁷⁸ provide an insight into how to do so.
8. We should seek a minimum set of values which all members of our society share and understand as a basic expectation of British citizenship. These should cover democracy, the rule of law, rights and responsibilities, individual liberty, equality, mutual respect and the challenging of prejudice. Yet the real question is how we interpret these values and what we do if they conflict with one another. When talking about democracy and the rule of law, for example, we need to articulate how as citizens we need to abide by collective decisions even if we don’t agree with them but that we can also influence the decision-making process both by voting and campaigning, and explore the obligation of citizens to challenge if the state overreaches and uses law to infringe on citizens’ rights or individual liberties. When discussing rights and responsibilities, we should explore whether we have the right balance between the two, acknowledging that there is no ‘correct’ answer to this question; we also should explore the tensions between group rights, security and individual liberty, acknowledging that the state may at times infringe on our freedoms in order to protect society as a whole. We should acknowledge that there are different interpretations of equality, with some in the country committed to equality of opportunity and others to equality of outcome. When talking about tolerance, we should ask whether respect is the correct response if individuals or communities hold prejudiced beliefs or practice customs that are not in line with shared values like equality.

The tension between our rights as citizens, our shared values and respect for difference is perhaps the most difficult challenge for the interpretation of British values in the modern context: in a free society, we want to protect the right of people to hold different views and we want to challenge discrimination, yet we also want to promote equality and individual rights. If these principles run counter to one another, a problematic tension is created. Such instances help to clarify the fact that our shared values are not simply a randomly-ordered list of words and that the relative priority we attached to different values is crucial. As an example, our national response to concerns about forced marriage suggests that our rights as citizens and of shared values like liberty and equality have primacy in British society over tolerance for different cultures. Having spaces such as schools or community settings, as well as online, for people to explore these questions is essential to build our collective understanding of modern British citizenship and to build a more cohesive society.

In short, rather like the law, values need to be continually discussed, interpreted and explored as they are tested by a changing world, and it is in that discussion, debate and negotiation that values come to life and become more than words on a piece of paper. While this will inevitably lead to challenging discussions and debates, the imperative to build a sense of shared citizenship in a diverse, pluralistic society requires us to do so, enabling all citizens to understand Britain's values and the hierarchy within them.

9. According to the Edelman Trust index³⁷⁹, 60% of people in the UK feel 'the system is failing them', while the government's own Social Mobility Commission (SMC) says that the UK "has a deep social mobility problem which is getting worse."³⁸⁰ It is not surprising, therefore, that people feel disengaged from a society which does not work for them. The SMC sets out a range of measures to give all people in the UK a fair chance, such as a ban on unpaid internships. To their recommendations I would add blind initial recruitment processes for both paid and voluntary positions in order to ensure that there is no discrimination during initial sifts of applications; I would also recommend improved careers guidance both for young people and for adults, and better, low-cost English language classes for those who need them. Such measures would help to prevent people being left behind, and coupled with efforts to make volunteering more accessible for all (see response to Question 7 above), would help to support the civic engagement of 'left-behind' groups.
10. The concepts of citizenship, civic engagement, social cohesion and integration go hand in hand. As set out above, we live in an increasingly diverse society in which people do not share a single ethnicity, faith or heritage. We therefore need to establish other commonalities if we are to build an integrated, cohesive society. Unifying values, a sense of common endeavour and a vision of a shared future can provide the basis for that shared identity, and can form the basis of a modern social contract which applies to us all no matter

³⁷⁹ Full report at: https://www.slideshare.net/Edelman_UK/edelman-trust-barometer-2017-uk-results

³⁸⁰ The report goes on: "The impact is not just felt by the poorest in society but is also holding back whole tranches of middle- as well as low-income families - these treadmill families are running harder and harder, but are standing still. The problem is not just social division, but a widening geographical divide between the big cities - London especially - and too many towns and counties across the country are being left behind economically and hollowed out socially". where we were born, what our ethnicity is or what religion we practice. From that renewed social contract, a stronger sense of citizenship can emerge. Civic engagement is important in this respect as it not only provides the opportunity for citizens to fulfil their responsibilities to society but also enables them to meet others from communities outside their immediate circle. Further, it provides the opportunity for people to work with others towards a shared goal, the essence of citizenship and an opportunity to bridge divides between communities.

It is not impossible to imagine circumstances in which diversity, integration and citizenship increase concurrently but building a new ‘civic nationalism’ in the UK will require significant effort, both from the state and from civil society. Yet, as set out below, our institutional response to this challenge is weak, with the responsibility for developing a more integrated society with a stronger sense of shared citizenship falling through the cracks between state and civil society institutions. I argue below that we need a new institution focussed on building 21st century citizenship in the UK.

11. Those who do not have a basic level of spoken and written English – including both those who are first- or second-generation migrants and those who were born in this country – are unable to fully participate in society, fulfil their responsibilities to their fellow citizens or avail themselves of the rights to which they are entitled. Ensuring every British citizen is proficient in our national language is, therefore, a priority in terms of citizenship, making it imperative that English language lessons are central to the naturalisation process.

The Citizenship test could also be improved: it currently tests factual knowledge, but it does not cover the notion of citizenship in detail or look at the values which underpin British society explored in question 8. When new citizens give their oath, they should understand what British citizenship really means and the values to which they are subscribing (as set out above, I recommend that this should apply to both young people becoming adult citizens and naturalised British citizens).

12. In terms of role models, I believe British Olympic team captures the essence of the country I think we are trying to build: diverse and valued for their unique talents, working together under a shared flag; respected equally no matter their background, working hard to improve themselves, and not letting pride prevent them from acknowledging where things could be better. Proud of their country, but humble and committed to making Britain better, they set an outstanding example for us all.

There are also important initiatives, like the British Youth Council³⁸¹, which encourages young people to participate in the democratic process and to get their voices heard. The truth is, however, that we lack a strong institutional focus on this agenda: while state action is required to address some of the issues explored above, many of the actions needed are focused on a social contract, suggesting that civil society should take the lead. However, community organisations typically focus on specific localities rather than the nation as a whole, the church does not play as strong a role in society as it once did and few civil society organisations see promoting a positive vision of British citizenship as part of their remit. The UK lacks an equivalent institution to, for example, the National Australia Day Council³⁸², which has a specific responsibility for organising that national event and encouraging the positive sense of citizenship which surrounds it. The formation of an equivalent institution for the UK, working not just on one day but all year round, would help to address the issues the committee is exploring as we enter a potentially-turbulent period in our history. I would be happy to provide further information on what this institution could do if this would be of interest to the committee.

Health and Social Care Alliance, Scotland – written evidence (CCE0165)

1. November 2017 marks the 75th anniversary of the publication of Sir William Beveridge's landmark 1942 report "Social Insurance and Allied Services" (1) which prepared the groundwork for the introduction of the NHS and welfare state some six years later. In making his vision a reality Beveridge asserted the need for individuals to rise above personal interests and 'stand together' to improve the lot of everyone in society. Beveridge recognised that achieving this aim would require an immense act of 'national unity overriding the interests of any class or section'; a task which he thought attainable due to the unique sense of solidarity engendered by the world war in which the nation as a whole was then engaged. The deal therefore was that the state would provide comprehensive healthcare and a level of 'social assistance' with individuals, as part of the social contract, participating in a system of collective citizenship where everyone contributed and benefitted.

2. In the 75 years since Beveridge, the role of the 'citizen' in respect of public services has varied from passive recipient in the early days of the welfare state to consumer under the market tenets of New Public Management. Increasingly however, the role of the citizen as co-producer is recognised as the means of responding to the challenges of increasing demand and austerity as well as addressing the perceived democratic deficit in the planning and provision of health and social services.

3. Scotland has largely rejected the most stringent aspects of market ideology in the governance of its public services, yet in broader society consumerism is rife and this itself impacts on the perception and expectation of roles in the relationship between citizens and public services. If we leave aside the enormous contribution that carers, volunteers and the third sector make to the health and wellbeing of our society this begs the question - does an appetite exist in our society today for individuals to act, as Beveridge put it, in the 'common interest of all citizens' or in other words as citizen co-producers rather than simply passive consumers of health and social services?

4. Malby and Turbitt in their 2011 Guardian article (2) illustrate that that the social contract envisaged by Beveridge remains relevant in our consumer age i.e. '... Co-production and self-help are the best options we have for improving public services. Both would be much easier in a world where we were all citizens and co-owners. The NHS needs a rich, mature relationship with patients who perceive themselves as citizens, who feel an intrinsic responsibility not only for their own health but towards others who need help ...'

5. Whilst there are many fine examples of citizen co-production both at individual/practitioner level and in the co-design and commissioning of public services we have some way to go before we live in the world aspired to by Malby and Turbitt. We are also fortunate not to face a national crisis of the magnitude of a world war that might unite us around the step change necessary to produce this paradigm shift in the short term. So given this, how do we progress towards a more citizen co-produced health and social care system?

6. As suggested by Loeffler and Hine-Hughes (3) we need to ‘... focus strategically on the areas where co-production is likely to work best and be the most cost-effective way of achieving outcomes ...’

7. Pestoff (4) suggests two factors are important in determining these areas of strategic focus; the ease with which citizens can get involved in public service design and provision and the importance or salience placed on the service by the citizen?

8. Ease of service access depends on things such as availability of information and transport, location, and opening times whereas salience reflects the degree to which the service impacts directly on the day to day lives of a person and their loved ones. The more vital a service is to an individual’s life the greater the motivation to engage in co-producing it. In this respect Pestoff distinguishes between enduring and non-enduring services. Enduring services, associated with the management of long term conditions, require that those with lived experience of a condition i.e. in the role of service user or carer, combine their knowledge, skills and resources in a continuing relationship with those who have professional expertise in order to achieve the best possible outcomes over the longer term. Such exchanges offer opportunities for co-production on a collective basis due to the solidarity engendered by shared health challenges and interest.

9. To our mind citizens today are willing to act as co-producers rather than passive consumers, albeit conditionally. Where there are common challenges to overcome and benefits to be achieved from collective co-operation then citizens will engage in co-production with one another and public service providers.

10. Whilst consumerism is pretty well rooted in our 21st Century society, shifting the balance towards a more citizen co-produced health and social care system is not impossible. It is however incumbent on policy makers and strategists to focus on and invest more keenly in promoting citizen co-production in those service areas in which longer term relationships make its success more likely.

Healthwatch England – written evidence (CCE0168)

About Healthwatch England

Healthwatch England is the independent champion for people who use health and social care services. We exist to ensure that people are at the heart of care.

We listen to what people like about services, and what could be improved, and we share their views with those with the power to make change happen. We also help people find the information they need about services in their area.

We have the power to ensure that people's voices are heard by the government and those running services. As well as seeking the public's views ourselves, we also encourage services to involve people in decisions that affect them. Our sole purpose is to help make care better for people.

Role of local Healthwatch

There is a local Healthwatch in every area of England, one in each top-tier local authority area. They provide information and advice about publicly-funded health and care services. They also go out and speak to local people about what they think of local care, and share what people like and what could be improved with those running services. They share feedback with Healthwatch England so that we can spot patterns in what people are saying about care, and ensure that people's voices are heard on a national level.

Importance of civic engagement/volunteering

- 1.
1. Healthwatch England and the Healthwatch network were set up under the Health and Social Care Act 2012, with the intention of providing local communities with a way of influencing local health and care provision.
- 2.
2. Local Healthwatch organisations:
 - 3.
 - Have the legal power to carry out Enter and View visits to health and social care providers, so they can see these services in action and advise those in charge about how to improve.
 - Represent the views of people who use services, carers and the public on the Health and Wellbeing Boards set up by local authorities.
 - Report feedback about the quality of health and social care to Healthwatch England, which can then recommend that organisations such as NHS England, the Care Quality Commission and other arms-length bodies take action.
- 4.
3. The activity of the Healthwatch network and Healthwatch England is dependent on civic engagement, both as a source of information and in order to carry out its statutory duties.

- 5.
4. Although we as a network have around 800 staff, the network could not make a difference without people being prepared to give up their time to help improve health and care services.
- 6.
5. This volunteering takes the form both of people formally giving up their time to help gather local people's experiences and views and providing signposting advice, and of people 'micro-volunteering' by offering their views and experiences of health and care services.
- 7.
6. Our volunteers outnumber paid staff by a ratio of over 5:1, with a voluntary base last year of nearly 5,000 people from a range of backgrounds, including an active cohort of youth volunteers. In addition, last year over 300,000 people volunteered their views and experiences of health and care services.
- 8.
7. This engagement makes a real difference to people's experiences of health and care. Our most recent public awareness campaign, #ItStartsWithYou, highlighted the effect that individual stories could have on changing the way things work and sought to encourage others to come forward. As one example, Rebecca Loo, a mother from Staffordshire, successfully campaigned for health commissioners to redesign the local equipment ordering services when her son's long wait for a foot brace meant he had to have avoidable surgery – wasting precious money and resources and causing her son needless additional pain and discomfort. Working with her local Healthwatch, Rebecca has now been able to spread this approach around the country helping to improve services for many more patients than just her son. This way of working has been identified by NHS England as having the potential to save the NHS tens of millions of pounds.³⁸³
- 9.
8. In this sense, civic engagement has the potential to play a crucial role in the work of the public and voluntary sectors through helping to ensure that public services work for all members of the community.

10. Barriers to participation

9. Last year Healthwatch England commissioned a poll to better understand the reasons why people volunteered, or the barriers that prevented them from participating. 44% of people polled said that they have given up their time in the past for a community they belong to or are currently doing so. Amongst those who do not currently volunteer 49% said that they are willing to do so, with the majority (74%) of this group saying that they would be prepared to donate an hour or more of their time per week.

³⁸³ <https://www.england.nhs.uk/commissioning/wp-content/uploads/sites/12/2015/11/orthcs-final-rep.pdf>

10. The main barriers appeared to be time, awareness and relevance. 53% of those who said that they don't currently volunteer feel like they don't have enough time, while 18% were unsure of the organisations or causes to which they could contribute. 17% said that none of their local organisations or causes felt relevant to them.
11. We also asked adults in the poll what factors might make them more or less likely to choose a particular issue to get involved with. The most influential factors seem to be whether an issue had touched their lives or their family (63% said this would make them more likely) or if an organisation aims to help members of their community (57% said this would make them more likely).

11. Civic engagement in the 21st century

12. In order to make the most of people's willingness to volunteer, and to maximise the benefits of civic engagement, organisations need more flexible approaches to provide opportunities that fit individuals' needs and remove the barriers that impede people's participation. For example, one student volunteer from Healthwatch Sheffield highlighted how she appreciated the opportunity to fit in volunteering around her studies.³⁸⁴ Similarly, Healthwatch Staffordshire worked with Keele University to create a number of bespoke roles for medical students, who have to spend time working in the community in order to complete their course.³⁸⁵

- Relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion

13. Local Healthwatch work to help ensure that health and social care services meet the needs of all users. By sharing the voices and experiences of people who may not otherwise be heard, Healthwatch embody the relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion. Engagement from every section of the community is key to ensuring that public services are right for those using them, and do not exclude anyone. Organisations like Healthwatch can help to facilitate this engagement to ensure different groups, not just those who "shout the loudest", are able to contribute to decisions about services that affect them. As one example, Healthwatch Islington trained a group of young adult volunteers to interview their peers from a range of backgrounds about their mental health and the support services that they would find most useful. This research helped change the way that local mental health services for young people were being delivered. One volunteer was also asked to sit on the procurement panel that decided who would deliver these new services.³⁸⁶

³⁸⁴ <http://www.healthwatch.co.uk/news/meet-our-student-volunteer-becky>

³⁸⁵ Healthwatch Staffordshire Annual Report 2016-17, p.7.

14. Volunteers also help to reach people who are isolated, or who may have difficulty in accessing services. Another Islington volunteer undertook a ‘mystery shopping’ exercise to discover how many GP surgeries offered interpreters for those who spoke little or no English. Their report then led to an increased number of practices being aware of, and offering, such services.³⁸⁷

Responsibility of society for supporting civic engagement

15. Supported by central government, funded by local authorities and run as social enterprises, the organisations that make up the Healthwatch network represent just some of the ways that third-sector and public sector organisations can support civic engagement. Through enabling people to share their experiences of health and care services in order to affect change, Healthwatch supports a model of civic engagement with health and care services that more closely fits the ways in which people live their lives, by making engagement timely and relevant to them. This model demonstrates just one of the ways in which volunteering and civic engagement underpin public services, and provide a route for those who may otherwise have little contact with community groups to contribute to wider society.

Healthwatch Essex – written evidence (CCE0032)

Introduction

In March 2016, Healthwatch Essex published the first SWEET! report, which engaged seldom heard young people living in areas of recognised deprivation in South Essex. This work was produced in partnership with sport-for-development charity, Achievement Through Football, to understand these young people's lived experience of health and social care.

The SWEET! Report informed local and national conversation; informing the Essex Health Oversight and Scrutiny Committee's task and finish group, the Suicide and Selfharm Prevention Working Group, and the 'Open Up, Reach Out' young people's mental health transformation plan. As well as this, it has reached a whole host of organisations and events, including the Social Mobility Select Committee, NELFT Nurses' Day, Southend Youth Council, and beyond.

Healthwatch Essex has continued to gather the lived experience of seldom heard young people for this SWEET! 2 report, this time in a different area of recognised deprivation in the county. This has allowed us to recognise similarities in lived experience within the two areas as well as identifying where there may be issues unique to the area, and why this might be.

Jaywick, in the Tendring area of North East Essex, is consistently named the most deprived area in England. Healthwatch Essex partnered with Tendring Enterprise Studio School (TESS) whose students included those who had been absent for large parts of their schooling, had been excluded from mainstream education or had left their previous schools due to issues such as bullying; as well as young people from other seldom heard groups such as gypsy, traveller and Roma communities, looked after children and young carers. Regrettably, TESS closed down in the summer of 2016.

Throughout this report, Healthwatch Essex provides a snapshot these young people's lived experience, and explores the different factors that impact on their health and social care needs. SWEET! 2 collates these findings in a way we hope will allow the needs and experiences of these seldom heard young people to be considered by commissioners, providers and practitioners when making health and social care decisions.

How we engaged

Healthwatch Essex recognised the importance of establishing trust and rapport with SWEET! 2 participants, many of whom had become mistrusting of services and authorities. Therefore, partnering with TESS, who had built strong relationships with their students, was crucial to the success of our engagement.

Staff and students considered the Jaywick area to be over-engaged; telling us that numerous consultations and documentaries had taken place there, but feeling that nothing changed as a result. This meant it was important to show participants that Healthwatch Essex would work hard to make their investment of time and trust worthwhile.

We began the SWEET! 2 project with an informal introduction to the school, where we chatted with students and observed them in class. We later came back to present an assembly on the work of Healthwatch Essex and the importance of listening to young people. We used this opportunity to talk about the great outcomes our young people's engagement had already produced to highlight our record of using lived experience to influence decision making. We asked TESS students for their permission to undertake SWEET! 2 at TESS, and all were in favour of this.

The majority of TESS students were taking vocational classes and considering their future careers so Healthwatch Essex organised a panel of local health and social care professionals to speak to students. In the first event of its kind, these young people, working towards gaining employment after education, were given the opportunity to converse with health and social care professionals about the types of roles available in these fields, and why they should consider them. In doing so, Healthwatch Essex was able to show students they could form part of the solution to a challenging health and social care landscape, and that they were valued. The film of the SWEET! Debate is available to watch at: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8ET1Hso1IE8>

Through these activities, Healthwatch Essex became familiar to, and trusted by, the young people, who would greet us by name and talk freely to us when we visited the school. It was only then that we began our engagement sessions with the young people, knowing they would feel able to open up about their (often difficult) lived experience. These sessions consisted of small groups of 3-8 students who felt comfortable with one another, taking place in familiar areas of their school.

In the final stage of our engagement, self-selecting students had the opportunity to speak to us on a one-to-one basis. It was often these sessions that were the most powerful, and the most valuable to our study, showing the importance of a considered and personalised model of engagement.

Zoe told us she was initially planning on speaking to us about her experience of calling an ambulance, but went on to open up about a number of difficult experiences across a range of health and social care issues. She said "I wasn't expecting to tell you what I told you, but you gave me a friendly approach and I felt I could just open up."

As well as this, Zoe clearly felt empowered to help drive our engagement by recommending friends of hers in the school who were known to be quite guarded around adults, but had lived experience that would be useful to our study. She advised us how we should approach them, and to let them know she had already spoken to us, so they would know we were trustworthy.

Healthwatch Essex also interviewed staff at TESS to gather their understanding of the health and social care issues affecting this group of young people, as well as the unique support they felt their school was able to offer.

Through SWEET! 2, we engaged with 59 students and 13 members of staff. All names have been changed.

Key findings

Though our engagement covered a broad range of health and social care topics, a number of themes emerged from the young people's lived experience that seemed consistent across these subjects.

- Disengagement and distrust: SWEET! 2 highlighted that many young people simply felt they were not listened to. Across a range of services, young people felt that they would not be taken seriously, that their opinion would not be considered, and that they were not involved in the planning of their care. This led to feeling victimised by services that were there to protect them, and in turn resulted in disengaging with services to the detriment of their health and wellbeing.
- Someone to be there: Young people wanted to feel confident that they could find support when they needed it but often felt let down by the difficulty in making health appointments, a high turnover of social workers, and the closure of services that had previously supported them. The best outcomes seemed possible when a trustworthy adult could provide consistency in their work with a young person, and could guide them across multiple agencies.
- The role of education: Through our partnership with TESS we were able to observe a model of joined-up working in practice, where Student Advocates liaised between home life and education, and support staff worked closely with a range of services across social care, mental health, youth offending, safeguarding, health, and employment services to secure better outcomes for their students. Improved health and wellbeing led to improved educational attainment which bettered the young people's prospects of escaping poverty and the associated factors of poor health and wellbeing.
- Lower awareness, higher need: As we discovered in the first SWEET! report,³⁸⁸ young people engaged in SWEET! 2 showed less awareness of services and public health messages compared to more mainstream samples of young people.³⁸⁹ Despite this, these young people were likelier to engage in risky or unhealthy behaviours - and at an earlier age. Participants told us they wanted the relevant information to make informed decisions for themselves and earlier in their lives before they had adopted behaviours they learned from peers or family that became hard to break.

- Seeing the whole puzzle (and not just the piece): Every person's health and social care needs are multifaceted, but SWEET! 2 participants in particular had needs across a range of health and care areas that could not be addressed simply by looking at an isolated part of a wider picture. Lindsay's story involves drugs and alcohol, safeguarding, education, justice, social care, mental health and the broader health of her family:

When Lindsay was 12, a family friend took her to the supermarket and bought her alcohol. She drank the alcohol at his house, where he spiked Lindsay's drink and made her smoke marijuana (although she did not know that was what it was at the time). He then sexually abused her.

Lindsay confided in a school friend and said that within hours news of the incident had circulated round her school. Lindsay told us: "No one believed me. Everyone turned against me." Several pupils made threats of violence towards Lindsay, and the police were called due to concerns for her safety. Children's Services were also called, and Lindsay was asked to repeat everything she had disclosed to her friend.

Lindsay arrived home to find Children's Services had already searched her house and questioned her mum. Lindsay felt that her case had been "handled really badly," which had "broken" her mum. Before the incident, Lindsay's mum had given up smoking, but the stress of being questioned with no knowledge of what Lindsay had been through caused her to start chain smoking. Lindsay blamed herself for the effect this has on her mum, explaining "it's all my fault," and that "she was terrified she was going to lose me."

Later, Lindsay had to give a statement in court, but a 'lack of evidence' meant that no charges were made. After voicing concerns for her safety, she was told a restraining order was in place to protect her from this man...though she later found out this had never been the case. "I was lied to," she said.

Lindsay said that the incident "crosses my mind every day." She began counselling shortly after, but felt the counselling "made it worse" as the counsellor became frustrated when she was unable to remember events of her early childhood. This experience caused her to say "I am done with counselling. I would never have counselling again."

Lindsay went on to have a boyfriend who pressured her into taking drugs, and was abusive if she did not comply with his demands. She told us he controlled who she could talk to, and what she could wear. She wanted to leave, but because she lived with him most of the time, she felt herself unable. Despite still being deeply affected by this period of her life, Lindsay now has an understanding boyfriend, though she sometimes panics when he shows physical affection. She hoped to achieve good grades at TESS that would allow her to work towards starting her own catering business.

Achieving better health and wellbeing outcomes for young people like Lindsay won't be possible if we only seek to improve isolated fragments of a person's health and social care journey. Lindsay wanted to be listened to and treated seriously, to work with services rather than have them make decisions without her input. When we look at Lindsay's experience as a whole we see that her health and wellbeing is determined by a whole host of factors beyond physical and mental health. The need for services to work together to share best practice, identify risk and exchange information to secure improved outcomes for both vulnerable young people and the broader population alike becomes evident when we recognise that, as the Mental Health Taskforce (2016) has said: "Helping people lead fulfilled, productive lives is not the remit of the NHS alone. It involves good parenting and school support during the early years, decent housing, good work, supportive communities and the opportunity to forge satisfying relationships. These span across national and local government."³⁹⁰

Recommendations

Meaningful engagement

Ensuring that seldom heard young people have their voices heard can take time, trust and the right method of engagement. Yet the benefits from this investment will be exponential, and understanding the needs of those that stand to benefit from services the most is the first step to securing better outcomes both for them and for future generations of health and social care users.

Healthwatch Essex is delighted that organisations across the county are increasingly seizing the imperative to engage with young people, in line with the CQC's recommendation that "all children are involved in giving feedback on and co-designing their local services, ensuring they are as accessible and relevant as possible."³⁹¹ With a county-wide move toward co-production and transformation, now is the time to embed the lived experience of all young people into the services they use. We must be mindful that our engagement is meaningful, and extends beyond the usual platforms of youth parliaments and patient forums in order to find the 'hidden voice' of the most vulnerable young people in our county.

Healthwatch Essex continues to gather and report on the lived experience of young people in our county, and welcomes continuing partnerships with health and social care organisations where we may represent the voices of the young people we engage with.

Establishing trust

Many young people who need the services the most often feel they have been let down in the past, and it will take hard work to overcome their reluctance to engage with these services. Establishing the trust of young people who feel disengaged or apathetic toward their health and social care is crucial to improving outcomes for this group.

We recognise the mounting pressure that health and care professionals face, making it difficult to build relationships. We want services to push for a system where all health and social care staff are enabled to invest the time needed to build trusting relationships with the young people they see in order to uncover issues that might be hidden from view, understand the young person's perspective and allow them to make informed decisions about their care.

Seek to empower

Every child and young person has the protected right to be involved in all decisions affecting their lives. This includes the right to make decisions about their care,³⁹² but SWEET! 2 participants rarely reported being given this opportunity. Young people who have been taken into care, who have relatives in prison, who care for others, and so on, can feel powerless. Yet the CQC says "Children want to be respected, involved in decisions and plans, and informed of the outcomes of assessments and decisions that affect them. This empowers them and gives them confidence and competence. The extent to which children are listened to significantly influences how safe and happy they feel."³⁹³

Health and social care professionals working with young people should take a person-centred approach that recognises the individuality of each young person and what might work best for them, working with young people at every stage of their health and social care planning.

Two-way communication is essential in empowering the young person both by allowing them to express their views, and to receive an explanation as to why certain decisions are made in order to be involved in an understanding as opposed to feeling decisions are intentionally made in spite of their opinions.

Joined-up working

The integration of health and social care services is gathering pace due to the challenges of resourcing and the changing nature of the population's needs. We must seize this opportunity to identify how services can work together to transform outcomes for young people with the most complex needs, such as SWEET! 2 participants.

³⁹² PEN (2015) 'Improving Patient Experience for Children & Young People.' London: PEN: p. 4

³⁹³ Care Quality Commission (2016) p. 9

Increasingly, the case is being made for multi-agency teams within services that can provide expertise or experience across a range of issues in spite of mounting pressure on time and resource. As the CQC has said, “health professionals are in a strong position to address children’s health and welfare needs and identify safeguarding concerns, but no single person can have a full picture of a child’s circumstances.”³⁹⁴ Through working with TESS, we were able to see first-hand the effectiveness of a team of staff with contacts and knowledge across mental health, social care, home life, safeguarding (and so on) and how this allowed for a connected pathways for the young people.

Investment in the area

We heard from SWEET! 2 participants that the Jaywick area was over-engaged, with little change coming about as a result of their feedback. We recommend that further engagement in this area is considered, and takes place within a clear framework that will bring about actual change.

In the current economic climate we understand a prevailing savings-based focus, but without investment in the most deprived we can expect to see increased social and economic costs, which we know that investment can reverse in the long-term.³⁹⁵ Since the closure of TESS, we are unaware of any similar provision for young people in the Tendring area where the young people we spoke to demonstrated a very real need for information and awareness on a broad range of health and social care topics and surrounding services.

“It would be good to know more about smoking, sexual abuse, illness...we need more advice about it all.”

Children’s Services and family life

Children’s Services

Participants had largely experienced a form of intervention with Children’s Services. More than half of SWEET! 2 participants identified themselves as having had contact with these services, compared to 1 in 10 from the more mainstream participants engaged in our YEAH! 2 report.³⁹⁶ We learned of the young people’s experiences of family intervention, social workers, and being taken into care.

Some of the young people we spoke to were able to reflect on the positive impact these interventions had had:

³⁹⁶ Fletcher (2016) p. 25

Leah recalled 6 interventions from Children’s Services from a young age, saying their assistance in managing various aspects of her life (such as moving to a new home) had “made life better.”

Maisie told us that while “it was hard to be taken into care,” she now realises it was the best course of action, and has allowed her to lead a “better life.”

Katie said she was grateful for Children’s Services intervening in family life, as their concern for her safety assured her that it was unacceptable for parents to be violent towards their children. Their actions justified the upset she experienced in her home life, as she described previously feeling as though she was overreacting and it was “all in my head.” She also felt that without the intervention of Children’s Services, she may have gone on to repeat these behaviours to her own children one day, had it not been confirmed that this was unacceptable parenting.

As we found in our SWEET! and YEAH! 2 reports, SWEET! 2 participants still referred to Children’s Services as “Social Services,” and often participants felt afraid or mistrusting of these services. These feelings came from the widely-held belief amongst participants that Children’s Services were simply an agency that intervened to separate children and young people from their families.

“I’m scared of Social Services because they might take me away.”

Pastoral support staff at TESS were frequently in contact with Children’s Services, which they told us was usually beneficial, although it could be frustrating when cases reached no resolution. They explained the presiding fear among students that Children’s Services would destroy the family unit, saying that this took the form of an “us and them” attitude which had resulted from negative experiences of the services in the past, or from overhearing negative experiences from friends and family members.

Staff told us that the mention of Children’s Services evoked a panic response in the young people, who feel guarded about their experiences and want to avoid contact with the services. We heard from some participants who had previously disguised the issues they faced at home in fear of being separated from their families.

Kaya’s mum had been physically and verbally abusive to her, and Kaya described an incident where she said “the verbal abuse was so painful, I told her I’d rather she hit me instead.” Children’s Services came to Kaya’s home on numerous occasions after concerned relatives had contacted them. But because of Kaya’s role as a young carer, she felt her younger sibling needed her at home and therefore convinced Children’s Services there was nothing to worry about.

This anxiety around Children’s Services was also fuelled by the perception that services could act on false accusations which had created a fear of families being separated without cause. It was not only the young people who were affected by this fear, but their parents too:

Children’s Services visited Ethan’s mum’s house during a custody dispute following their separation. Ethan told us that because the visit was unexpected and the house looked untidy, he and his siblings were almost removed from the home. Ethan told us that his mum phoned the school, who were able to convince Children’s Services to let the family stay together, as they were able to vouch for his mum’s parenting. While Ethan was grateful for the part played by the school, he said the fear of having her children taken away caused his mum to have a nervous breakdown.

Lindsay was sexually exploited by a family friend when she was younger, and through confiding in a friend Children’s Services came to her school and asked her to repeat what had happened. Before Lindsay could tell her mum, Children’s Services searched her home and questioned her. Lindsay told us she felt the services had “handled it all really badly,” which had “broken” her mum. Before the incident, Lindsay’s mum had quit smoking, but following the stress of the intervention started to chain smoke. Lindsay told us that this was because her mum “was terrified she was going to lose me.”

Interventions such as these had a lasting impact on the young people, and often caused them to view services as “unfair.”

When Tia’s uncle went to prison her cousins were taken into care, and were not allowed contact with Tia or her family until they turned 18. She found this unfair, and as though the whole family had been “punished” by a father’s criminal activity; a theme that also arose in our first SWEET! report.³⁹⁷

We understand that every case is unique, and that our study only provided us with a part of the picture. However, it is clear that the young people with positive experiences of Children’s Services were those who understood that interventions from services had been in their best interest. Those who had disengaged with services, or were mistrustful, were those who feared services would not consider their point of view, or allow them to make decisions about their care.

“My social worker doesn’t listen to me, so I don’t communicate with her.”

“My brother was abusive towards my mum because he has ADHD. We had a social worker come round every few months, but not anymore. Now they don’t do anything for him. He was more calm when they came to see.”

The Children’s Commissioner has noted that “Too many children are not consulted about decisions about them and are not able to understand or influence what happens to them.” And that there is a need to “...secure a seismic shift in ambition for all children in care which puts the voice of the child, continuing and constant relationships and a focus on recovery at its heart.”³⁹⁸

Some participants acknowledged that Children’s Services were there to protect them and felt that if young people felt more informed and involved in every aspect of their care it could resolve some of the fear and distrust that leads to disengagement.

The NSPCC estimates that for each child identified as in need of protection from abuse, there are another eight who suffer in silence.³⁹⁹ The CQC iterates that “trust in the professional is crucial and [young people] won’t open up about issues unless they feel that the person actually cares.”⁴⁰⁰

We recognise that the current social care landscape is wrought with challenges that include a high turnover of staff, stretched resources and difficulty in ensuring all young people are given the time they need. But if staff are enabled to take the time to build trusting relationships with the young people they work with, the benefits of which would seemingly be exponential.

Adoption and foster care

It was uncommon for SWEET! 2 participants to live in a traditional two-parent home, with many living in single-parent families, with grandparents or in foster care. When we asked these young people their experiences of foster care, we mostly heard from young people whose parents fostered. They told us about the effect this could have on family life. For some participants, their families had agreed to short-term emergency placements, but a shortage of suitable placements led to them having to foster these children long-term.

Clare’s foster-sister will now live with the family until she turns 18, but her parents had initially only agreed to a short-term emergency foster placement. Clare told us she felt “pushed out” of the family by her foster-sister (who she does not get on with), and felt that her family had not been given a choice in this long-term arrangement.

Gary’s parents initially agreed to foster 2 young children over one weekend, but the children have been in their care for over 18 months. It was 9 months until Children’s Services processed the paperwork for the family to receive payments, and it took a year for his parents to be granted protection of the children. These delays had made family life stressful.

Families who foster provide a vital service to improve the safety and wellbeing of many children and young people. At a time when more foster carers are needed, services should work with families to ensure that the prospect of delayed payments and protections does not deter families from fostering. It is vital that both the voice of the young person being fostered, and the young person already in the family, are heard and considered when making decisions.

Young carers

It was not uncommon for SWEET! 2 participants to have caring responsibilities for a family member, although the majority of these young people did not always realise they were young carers. Participants spoke to us about their experience of helping care for others affected by a range of issues such as disability, mental illness, and addiction.

Several participants told us that caring for their siblings frequently impacted their educational, employment or social availability, often combining seeing friends with childcare.

When Gemma lived with her family she explained that every morning she would wake her brother up, make him breakfast and get him dressed for school. She would then make a coffee for her mum, and wake her up too, before getting ready herself and walking her brother to school. Gemma told us that although her mum had been abusive to her, when Children's Services intervened she pretended that everything was okay in order to remain caring for her brother.

Martha and her mother were responsible for the care of her grandfather. Martha's mother worked night shifts, and so Martha stayed at her grandad's house overnight. She would wake up many times in the night to check on him, and to give him his medication. She said it was a lot of responsibility for someone her age, but that it was worth it because it gave her the chance to repay her grandad for taking care of her when she was younger.

For many of the young people at TESS, the ability to participate in vocational education was regarded as their pathway out of deprivation. We know that young carers are more likely to live in a household where no adults are in work, and on average live in households with an average of £5,000 a year less than families without a young carer,⁴⁰¹ but that caring responsibilities are a risk factor for being NEET.⁴⁰² As the eligibility requirement for carer's allowance requires a person to be 16 or over and not in full-time education or earning more than £110 a week⁴⁰³ the odds of breaking the cycle of deprivation seem stacked against young carers.

More must be done to identify and support young carers in order to minimise these odds. More flexibility is needed to allow young carers to participate more in education, employment and training opportunities without impacting their eligibility to receive an allowance. As CentreForum says, "A young carer becomes vulnerable when the level of caregiving and responsibility to the person in need of care becomes excessive or inappropriate for that child, risking their emotional or physical wellbeing or educational achievement and life chances.”⁴⁰⁴

Housing

SWEET! 2 participants often lived outside of the family home in foster care, with grandparents, in social housing, on a friend’s sofa or with a partner. These participants frequently felt they had no space that was their own, and often spoke about the types of homes they would like to live in “one day.”

The idea of having a stable and suitable home was, for the young people, interconnected with broader stability in their lives across mental health, employment prospects and general health. It is not surprising that they felt that these things often suffered as a consequence of unstable home lives, as the Mental Health Taskforce states “Stable employment and housing are both factors contributing to someone being able to maintain good mental health and important outcomes for their recovery if they have developed a mental health problem,” and that “Children living in poor housing have increased chances of experiencing stress, anxiety and depression.”⁴⁰⁵

Abigail ran away from her physically abusive home life. Later, she explained to her grandmother “I’m not worried about the beatings I’ve had, I’m worried about the beatings I’m going to get” and Abigail has lived with her grandmother ever since. However, Abigail says her grandmother can be hostile and make her aware she is unwelcome, and even though she now gets on better with her mum there is no longer room for her in the family home. Abigail felt she had always been a burden to others, and wanted to experience a home of her own.

Despite often living in temporary arrangements, most of the young people were unsure what support existed to help them find housing, and how to access it, which contributed to their feelings of instability and anxiety.

For some female participants, their planned route out of troubled home life or unpleasant social housing (particularly homes with multiple occupants) was to find a wealthy boyfriend to move in with. The concern for TESS staff was that this made it harder to safeguard these young people against abusive relationships and exploitation. On top of this, female students had often been advised by their parents to get pregnant in order to access social housing and welfare. These attitudes made it harder for TESS staff to incentivise these young people into education and employment, which would help them breaking the cycle of deprivation.

Staff told us earlier intervention was needed before these attitudes become so ingrained that young people consider them the most reliable route to housing.

⁴⁰⁴ Frith (2016) p. 60

⁴⁰⁵ Mental Health Taskforce (2016) p. 6

2 participants told us they were grateful for their safe and pleasant social housing placements. 6 others commented on the negative stigma attached to social housing. This, combined with the fact that permission was often needed before they could add their own decorative touches to these properties, caused a feeling that they would never feel they had a “proper” home.

We must not underestimate the benefits of safe and suitable housing for young people such as these, whose lives are often chaotic and filled with uncertainty. A stable home environment can be a huge step toward stability in education, employment and health management, and the Mental Health Taskforce has acknowledged that “Housing is critical to the prevention of mental health problems and the promotion of recovery.”⁴⁰⁶

Young people, such as SWEET! 2 participants, living in areas of deprivation are more likely than their peers in mainstream environments to need earlier alternatives to living in the family home. Unless we ensure they have a stable and safe home environment, they may be left exposed to exploitation, poorer mental and physical health, and poorer educational and employment attainment.

Gangs and offending

Unlike participants in our first SWEET! report,⁴⁰⁷ SWEET! 2 participants were less willing to engage around their lived experience of offending (although we knew from staff that a number of participants had previous involvement with the Youth Offending Service). We found that this was because in the same way SWEET! 2 participants felt fearful or mistrusting of Children’s Services, they felt similarly towards the police and the justice system.

We heard from several participants whose male relative (such as a dad, uncle or brother) was in prison, or who had been...most commonly because of misusing or supplying illegal drugs. These participants typically appeared more withdrawn and mistrusting than their peers. As we learned in the section on Children’s Services and family life, having a relative in prison often led to young people being separated from their families.

Despite their disengagement from our sessions, we know that these young people have experiences that can shape our understanding of their needs. CentreForum has said that:

“Prisoners’ families face high levels of stigma with nearly three quarters missing out on local help despite having multiple needs. They are often considered a ‘hidden group’ in local

⁴⁰⁶ Mental Health Taskforce (2016) p. 17

⁴⁰⁷ Fletcher (2016) p. 20

service provision with historically poor national and local accountability for the wellbeing of prisoners' children and families."⁴⁰⁸

Some of the young people were able to explain their mistrust or fear of the police by sharing their experiences:

Stuart lived with his dad, and his mum has a mental health condition that causes her to experience paranoia. Stuart says she falsely accused his dad of harassing her, and went to the police. Stuart remembers the police coming to arrest his dad and keeping him in a prison cell overnight. His dad received a criminal record which meant he lost his well-paying job. This had been a distressing time for Stuart and his dad, and he feels their lives are worse off now.

Harry, who came from a traveller community, told us the police had not intervened when his family were targeted for hate crime. He had missed several years of education due to behavioural issues and discrimination, in keeping with the findings of the Children's Commissioner who says "Many Gypsy, Traveller and Roma children miss out on school with a disproportionate number reporting bullying and exclusions."⁴⁰⁹

Harry told us he was constantly harassed in the community, and that any girlfriend he has will be harassed by association. For this reason, he finds it difficult to integrate with non-travellers who are often prejudiced towards his culture. Before moving to the area, Harry's family were frequently targeted for crime and violence, until they eventually retaliated and fought with one of their harassers. This resulted in Harry and his family being in trouble with the police.

Harry was currently involved in a dispute with a non-traveller who he had invited to fight him. Even though he fought unarmed, he thought the other boy might bring a knife, and TESS staff were working to discourage him from fighting. However, Harry told us he gets bored easily and engages in risk taking behaviour which has led him to conclude "I will be dead by 20." He is known to the police in the area, and feels he is unfairly targeted for being a traveller.

While several participants had moved to the area from London and felt it was comparatively safer, many others were concerned about the increasing presence of gangs in their community. Gang members operated in their estates and were present in the surrounding town centres, which made them feel unsafe and wary out in the community. Participants commonly attributed the increase in local gang activity to the relocation of people from London.

TESS staff told us that because many of these young people were vulnerable they were more likely to be enticed into crime, and were therefore targeted for recruitment by gangs.

⁴⁰⁸ Frith (2016) p. 58

⁴⁰⁹ Children's Commissioner (2016) 'In Brief: Issue 6.' London: Children's Commissioner: p.5

When it was announced that TESS would be closing, staff noticed that gangs had started to congregate in the area that had not done so previously, and that gang-related incidents affecting TESS students were increasing.

With the school closing, staff were fearful that students with fewer alternatives into education or employment would be exploited by gangs making false promises of wealth and safety.

Investment is needed in the most deprived areas in order to provide alternative opportunities to crime in order for young people to break the cycle of deprivation. When young people in such areas reach working age, many employment opportunities take them out of the locality. This perpetuates deprivation as the area is disproportionately inhabited by those who cannot find work.

Both staff and students commented on the negative impact caused by numerous documentaries about Jaywick's deprived status, which had a knock-on effect on housing prices and negative stereotyping of residents of the area. The only positive that could come from these shows, staff felt, was that it would make it harder to ignore the need for investment in the area.

The Children's Commissioner says "We want to see new investment in children in the poorer areas of the country to turn around the odds through practical support such as children's centres to help children and their parents escape poverty."⁴¹⁰ Without this investment we know that the cycle will only continue – those eligible for free school meals are more likely to be NEET, as are those who have turned to crime and had contact with youth offending services.⁴¹¹ The cost of this goes beyond the direct experiences of the young people themselves, as we know each young person who is NEET is estimated to cost the economy £56,000 through benefit payments, lost tax revenue and youth crime and healthcare costs.⁴¹²

Additionally, more research is needed around the health and social care lived experience of young people with a family member in prison. Prisoners' families are likely to miss out on local provision, but as long as their voices remain hidden we will fail to understand how we can reverse these odds.

Mental Health

1 in 10 young people are believed to have a diagnosable mental health condition,⁴¹³ but this applied to more than half of SWEET! 2 participants. This difference may be explained by the fact that young people living in deprived areas are more likely to report lower life satisfaction,⁴¹⁴ and that those who are looked after or adopted, victims of abuse or exploitation, have been involved with the justice system or are members of gangs are particularly vulnerable to developing mental health problems as well as having a parent who has had mental health problems, problems with alcohol or has been in trouble with the law; having parents who separate or divorce; having been severely bullied having been physically or sexually abused; living in poverty or being homeless; experiencing discrimination perhaps because of race, sexuality or religion; acting as a carer for a relative, taking on adult responsibilities; having long-standing emotional difficulties.⁴¹⁵

As CentreForum states:

“Social disadvantage and adversity increase the risk of developing mental health problems. Children and young people from the poorest households are three times more likely to have a mental health problem than those growing up in better-off homes.”⁴¹⁶

As we found in our first SWEET! report,⁴¹⁷ many SWEET! 2 participants spoke about the mental health of their parents, with several assuming a pivotal role in the care of their parents and siblings.

SWEET! 2 participants spoke about their experiences of living with mental health conditions such as depression, anxiety, addiction, eating disorders and OCD.

“The counselling was good, but I don’t get that anymore so I can’t vent my emotions and my friends are getting the bad end of it.”

Staff at TESS worked closely with the Emotional Wellbeing and Mental Health Services (formerly CAMHS) to broker referrals on behalf of students, and were concerned about the impact the school closing might have.

Zach told us he had known for a long time that he was gay, but had always been unsure of how to deal with his sexuality and the stigma surrounding it, or where to find advice. Because of this, Zach spent a number of years feeling “completely alone” with no idea of who he could approach. He described reclusive behaviour and a deep sense of unhappiness.

Eventually, Zach approached the school counsellor who was unable to give him any advice or signposting. Confidentiality was a worry, and it took Zach a great deal of courage to approach the counsellor. He said that not everyone in his situation would have that courage.

While Zach has many questions on this topic, he has told a few trusted people that he is gay. He said that had he not done this his sense of isolation would only have increased. “Being gay is a big part of me,” he said, “and it was bad for me to keep it hidden away because of fear.” He felt that everyone should be informed about LGBT relationships and identities, rather than individuals having to try to find support. He also felt this would go a long way in reducing the negative stigma which can have a sizeable impact on the mental health of young LGBT people.

Zach spoke about the discrimination and bullying he experienced at his previous school, and the negative impact this had on his mental health and therefore his education. Zach’s experience shares similarities with Harry’s, whose we looked at earlier on in this report. Harry missed several years of education because of the harassment he faced as a member of a traveller family. Marginalised groups such as LGBT people and those from Gypsy, Roma and Traveller communities are at greater risk of mental illness,⁴¹⁸ perhaps in part because of the negative stigma these groups face.

Not only can bullying contribute to mental illness, but mental illness can lead to bullying. A survey by Time to Change found that a quarter of young people with a mental health condition avoided education because of stigma and bullying.⁴¹⁹

Megan was also bullied in her previous school to the extent that she was now fearful about applying to college in case she will face further bullying.

Megan also attributes her mental illness as a consequence of the physical and verbal abuse she had once experienced in her home life. Her symptoms include paranoia, anxiety and hearing voices. While she has a counsellor now, it has taken her many years to access this support – in the past she went to her GP in hope of a diagnosis, but after a blood test her GP never got back to her.

Body image was a concern for female participants who often told us that their physical appearance was the biggest contributing factor to their sense of self-worth. Some went so far as to say that looking good was more important than academic or career success, and insecurity prevented them from exercising outdoors or participating in team sports. Staff recognised that this low self-worth contributed to the young people being vulnerable to eating disorders and exploitative or abusive relationships. However, with the local eating disorder charity overstretched and facing closure there was uncertainty of where these young people could be referred in future.

National findings have recently emerged showing that the wellbeing of girls has deteriorated in recent years.⁴²⁰ A large-scale study by Ipsos MORI found that girls were more likely than boys to have low levels of life satisfaction, with 46% of girls seeing themselves as “too fat”...and we know that there is a link between body image and the levels of life satisfaction young people report.⁴²¹

Despite being at higher risk of mental ill health by a number of factors, the vast majority of SWEET! 2 participants (a higher proportion than their mainstream peers)⁴²² had not received information on mental health and the surrounding services. Understandably, participants unanimously agreed that it was crucial for them to be informed on this topic in order to seek timely support and reduce the negative consequences poor mental health could have on their lives.

“I would like it if there was more help to deal with emotions. I’m currently shut off from the outside because of recent bullying.”

“I think children and young people should be educated from a young age about mental health...but not with school friends....they should mix with other schools and have small workshops, therefore they won’t be judged by school friends.”

We know that mental health impacts the likelihood of poorer educational attainment, involvement with the justice system and becoming dependent on drugs, as well as being more likely to smoke and drink, and earn less money or experience unemployment as adults.⁴²³ With suicide now the leading cause of death for males from the age of 15 upwards we must ensure that all young people, particularly the most vulnerable in society, have the opportunity to receive timely and quality care. As well as the personal cost to the young person and those around them, we cannot ignore the £105 billion social and economic cost of poor mental health in England each year.⁴²⁴

Healthwatch Essex is delighted that young people’s mental health has become a policy priority in recent times, but there is still a long way to go to minimise the factors contributing to poor mental health. With the most vulnerable young people in society far likelier to experience mental health problems, the Mental Health Taskforce advocates for the reduction of inequalities in improving mental health for young people,⁴²⁵ and while Mind acknowledges the increased investment in mental health they state:

“...there’s still a lack of recognition that mental health can be as much a social issue as a clinical one. If we fail to address the underlying social issues which may have a bigger impact on people’s lives and health than treatment or therapy, we undermine any potential benefit

Public Health

Drugs & Alcohol

As with the first SWEET! report,⁴²⁷ we found that larger numbers of SWEET! 2 participants engaged with drug and alcohol use than more mainstream samples of their peers. Again, cannabis was the most commonly-used drug among participants, with several saying they smoke it habitually. Participants largely felt that cannabis was a "good" drug as they knew adults who used the drug to ease pain or anxiety, and several thought it would soon be legalised – one of the young people told us her father had smoked cannabis habitually for 22 years for back pain. However, participants seemed unaware of the risks associated with early cannabis use such as psychosis,⁴²⁸ other mental health issues and poorer general health.⁴²⁹

More than half told us they regularly "binge drink," with only 4 claiming they knew how to drink responsibly. About a third of participants said it was difficult to manage their own drinking, saying that each drink tended to lead to another.

Some participants felt that habitual drug and alcohol use was a factor of life in a more deprived seaside town, saying that these substances were sometimes used to self-medicate or pass time – feeling that there was little else to do by way of employment or leisure.

"I smoke green but I want to quit."

Peer pressure was another key factor in participants' introduction to using drugs and alcohol:

Lindsay told us she first smoked cannabis at the age of 12, after a family friend gave it to her and told her it was "something nice, called Rainbow." This family friend also bought her alcohol. Later, Lindsay had a boyfriend who pressured her to take drugs with him, and would become angry and aggressive if she did not comply.

Jay's friends encouraged him to smoke cannabis with them when they went fishing. He did this for a while, but he had bad reactions and decided to stop. He was unsure where to get support to quit, and Jay said he now feels he needs to smoke something when the group goes fishing so has switched to cigars.

⁴²⁷ Fletcher (2016) p. 39

⁴²⁸ Frith (2016) p. 42

⁴²⁹ Ipsos MORI (2016) p. 13, 16

Several of the young people spoke of the disruptive effects of a relative's addiction, which had caused parents to separate and had even resulted in the death of one participant's relative. Participants were worried about addiction in their own friendship circles, voicing concern for friends whose drinking habits involved drinking daily, drinking large quantities or neat spirits, or drinking alone.

The majority of participants felt it was therefore important to have reliable information on drugs, alcohol and addiction. They said curiosity about such things was part of being a teenager, and therefore it would be more useful to learn how to drink responsibly than told not to drink at all. Because of their particular lived experience, SWEET! 2 participants also wanted the chance to learn about addiction, and personal safety (around topics such as drink spiking, and being targeted for crime or exploitation when drunk). As their peers were likely to use drink and use drugs, the young people explained they were naturally curious about why people engaged in these behaviours, and what the effects felt like.

Jamie's friend use cocaine, and have asked him to use it too. He observed that his friends didn't seem concerned about their health, even though they always regretted taking the drug the next day. Jamie said he wanted to understand why his friends want to take this drug, and how it makes them feel.

Despite being more likely than YEAH! participants to engage with drink and drugs, fewer reported receiving information on these topics.⁴³⁰ Roughly a third told us they received no information and those who had reported inconsistency in how or what they learned. Getting such interventions right is crucial in allowing young people to make informed decisions, as 2 participants who felt they had received a good education on these topics told us that their learning had satisfied their curiosity enough to deter them from engaging with risky behaviours.

Young people's illegal drug use continues to be a key policy concern for the government,⁴³¹ and the Children's Commissioner aims for raised awareness of the dangers of drugs and alcohol.⁴³²

With this demographic of young people likely to be exposed to drugs and alcohol at a younger age, it's important to deliver interventions before they begin engaging in these behaviours.

Sexual Health

As with drugs and alcohol education, several young people claimed to have received no information on sexual health, and those who had found it inconsistent: some found it too

⁴³⁰ Fletcher (2015) p.21

⁴³¹ Ipsos MORI (2016) p. 16

⁴³² Children's Commissioner (2015) p. 8

limited and others found it too overwhelming. Yet SWEET! 2 participants wanted clear information on sexual health so they would be able to make informed decisions.

Liam is gay, and said he'd only ever learned about heterosexual sex and relationships, which didn't apply to him. He was unsure if condoms were necessary in same-sex relationships, as STDs had only ever been spoken about as occurring between a man and a woman. Liam felt "incredibly isolated" by sex education classes, as he felt there was no alternative to being straight. Because of this, he didn't come out as gay, or seek a relationship, for many years. Liam wanted the chance to learn about his own sexual orientation, and how to have safe sex and healthy relationships. He thinks it would be good for others to learn about same-sex relationships too.

There was a drive from both students and staff of TESS for sex education to include discussions on healthy relationships, and signs of exploitation or abuse. With many female pupils planning on starting a family as soon as they finished school, staff felt it was important to educate young people on the emotional motivations and consequences of sex, and the potential impact on mood and self-esteem. Staff went on to say that these young people often feel obligated to have sex, and it would be good for them to develop confidence and defence mechanisms.

Furthermore, findings by the Children's Commissioner reveal that young people who had been sexually exploited felt they would have benefited from good relationships and sex education in school.⁴³³

The need for consistent and reliable information on sexual health, sexual orientation, relationships and consent among all young people is evident. For SWEET! 2 participants, there is also a clear need to deliver this information at an earlier age when they are exposed to attitudes about sex and pregnancy in their home, community and school life.

Nutrition and Exercise

SWEET! 2 participants felt confused by the conflicting information they received on healthy eating, with debate around whether a healthy diet meant eating lots of salad, or buying diet microwave meals. There was also apathy amongst participants towards their current and future health, claiming they didn't care about the benefits of eating healthily.

Participants were also frustrated that healthy food was more expensive than unhealthy fast-food...they explained they would be able to buy several burgers for the cost of the ingredients for a salad, and research has shown that young people from the most deprived areas are less likely to get their "5 a day".⁴³⁴ Some of the young people worked in fast-food outlets where they were allowed to eat for free.

⁴³³ Children's Commissioner (2015) p. 7

⁴³⁴ Ipsos MORI (2016) p. 11

Expense also played a role in their ability to exercise, with participants saying that gym memberships were not affordable and that exercising outdoors was often not possible due to concerns for their safety in the community, and feelings of self-consciousness and low self-esteem. Again, research has found that young people in the most deprived areas are the least likely to achieve an hour of moderate/vigorous exercise in a week.⁴³⁵

SWEET! 2 participants wanted clear direction on how to achieve a healthy diet, with a third saying they had never had the chance to learn about this. A popular idea was to use school time to plan healthy meals, and as some were responsible for the cooking at home they felt this would also benefit the health of their families.

As mental health problems were prevalent among these young people, staff felt information on nutrition and exercise should highlight the potential mental health benefits of a diet and exercise. Staff also felt there was a need for a clearer message around balance and moderation, as the young people often described feeling guilt about their food choices which could lead to disordered eating.

Smoking

Research shows that young people living in areas of deprivation are likelier to smoke⁴³⁶ and that those with mental health conditions are twice as likely to smoke.⁴³⁷ The majority of TESS students were smokers, most commonly telling us they began smoking between the ages of 12 and 14, and smoking an average of 10-20 cigarettes a day.

Staff explained smoking was a learned behaviour that frequently began at home, and the young people confirmed that the main reason for starting was because friends or relatives smoked...in fact several of the participants' parents were the ones who provided them with cigarettes.

Lee began smoking when he was 13, because both of his parents and all of his siblings were smokers. For this reason he felt it would be particularly hard for him to quit.

Few participants reported having received information on the negative effects of smoking and how to quit. Those who had said that while sessions were off-putting, they had yet to quit.

Again, participants often displayed apathy toward the impact of smoking on their health, with some saying they were unconcerned about their futures, and others feeling that they wouldn't need to change these behaviours until they were older. One participant went so far as to tell us "Smoking will kill me, but I'm not fussed."

⁴³⁵ Ipsos MORI (2016) p. 10

⁴³⁶ Ipsos MORI (2016) p. 12

⁴³⁷ Mental Health Taskforce (2016) p. 14

Participants felt that the most effective deterrent from a lifetime of smoking would be to receive key information on the harmful effects before they started smoking. They explained that this information was less effective once they become addicted, as quitting was very difficult. People with prolonged mental illness are at risk of dying 15-20 years earlier than other people, and the Mental Health Taskforce acknowledges the prevalence of smoking among this group, calling for integrated services that offer health checks and smoking cessation programmes to those effected by severe mental illness.⁴³⁸

The Role of Education

CentreForum states “Education is one of the strongest predictors of good health; the more schooling people have the better their health is likely to be. More formal education is consistently associated with lower death rates. School exclusion can often be a life-changing decision and experience. It often adds to already accumulating risks in a child’s life.”⁴³⁹ Yet many SWEET! 2 participants had dropped away from mainstream education through exclusion, bullying, caring responsibilities, chaotic lifestyles, mental health issues and truancy before enrolling at TESS.

So far in this report we have established the link between young people living in areas of deprivation and poorer health and social care outcomes, and the support needed to help young people break the cycle of deprivation. The House of Lords has said “Getting a job is one of the most direct routes out of poverty,”⁴⁴⁰ but we know that those living in deprived areas, from poorer backgrounds, with low educational attainment, and so on, are disadvantaged in their chances of moving up the social ladder later in life.⁴⁴¹

In working with the school it was evident that TESS refused to accept these odds for their students, and placed value on vocational skills. Tailored guidance was in place to minimise disruption to the students’ education, as well as pastoral staff able to refer the young people and their cases to Children’s Services or the Emotional Wellbeing and Mental Health Services. A Student Advocate was in place to communicate with parents and carers to bridge the gap between home life and school, which could positively impact both environments for the young people. We also observed classes in which staff used the subjects they were teaching to cover themes that were relevant to the young people’s health (for example, in an English class, the teacher had chosen to cover a book which allowed for discussion around mental health, self-esteem and drugs) which demonstrated a whole-school approach to promoting good health and wellbeing.

These staff spoke of the importance in taking the time to build a personal relationship with a young person that could overcome trust issues and aggression and reach a point where they were able to intervene in the students' decision making processes.

TESS students often praised the “safe space” they felt TESS provided where they were able to focus on their education away from bullying, troubled home lives and pressures to reach an academic standard they were incapable of.

Archie said TESS offered “loads of support” and a “small, friendly environment” to learn in. He explained he achieved more at TESS than at his previous school which was exam-focused and high pressured, where he was also bullied. Archie told us TESS works with pupils on their personal goals and growth, rather than being completely focused on academic results. Archie spoke about the positive impact this environment had on others, noting that a classmate of his had severe anger issues and was aggressive to staff and students but is now one of the highest achieving pupils in his class.

TESS staff told us that not every young person's strengths lie in academia but as this is the focus of mainstream schools a young person's confidence and self-worth can be depleted if they feel unable to reach the educational standards expected of them. At TESS the young people were able to study vocational modules in mechanics, catering and childcare and work towards employment. A teacher explained “They may not get A-C grades, but their lives are changed.” Students told us that because they often took on responsibility for the lives of themselves and others the emphasis on life skills helped prepare them for an independent future.

A report from the House of Lords has found that “The transition from school into work is a vital point in the lives of young people. Making a successful transition through a high quality and valued pathway can mean a successful career. Becoming trapped in poor quality and under-valued alternatives can mean a lifetime of poverty.”⁴⁴² But with TESS closing staff expressed great concern about young people's ability to make this transition without this structure in place. Staff explained the inclusive and encouraging nature of the school helped deter young people from crime and drug use and kept them focused on goals that would better their futures. The value of the school was obvious, as later in our engagement when the school's classes had stopped young people were still coming into the building to spend time around staff.

The Mental Health Taskforce has said “Employment is vital to health and should be recognised as a health outcome. The NHS must play a greater role in supporting people to find or keep a job,”⁴⁴³ and it is estimated that educational underachievement costs £22bn per generation.⁴⁴⁴ However, the ability for young people such as SWEET! 2 participants to break the cycle of deprivation can be hindered by bullying, troubled families, chaotic lifestyles, caring responsibilities, mental health conditions, substance misuse and involvement in crime. In order to reverse these trends there must be integrated, multi-agency support in place to allow young people to overcome such disadvantages. Failing to invest now will only increase the personal and economic cost of unfulfilled potential.

⁴⁴⁴ Peacock (2011)

Learning disabilities

We know that those with disabilities are more likely to be NEET⁴⁴⁵ and report lower life satisfaction.⁴⁴⁶ Most of the students of TESS had a statement for a learning disability or behavioural issues. Combined with the other factors that affected young people in our study, TESS staff were concerned that these students would face even more barriers when the school had closed. The small and personal environment had proved to be beneficial to their learning, and working closely with staff allowed them to work on behaviour. With many opportunities for education and employment taking place out of the area staff felt that the anxieties and difficulties these young people often had in using public transport and entering busier and unfamiliar environments would be a further barrier.

“I have dyslexia and autism which makes it hard to do some things, like making friends.”

Participants with a diagnosed learning disability told us that up to the point of diagnosis they had received no awareness on what a learning disability was, and how it could impact their learning. We learned the confusion that could be caused by not having relevant information, and the value appropriate support could bring.

Amy had an autism diagnosis, but told us she wasn't informed about what support she would need or how autism would affect her behaviour and ability to learn.

David also had an autism diagnosis. He attended a weekly club which helped him build confidence and become less withdrawn through participating in social activities with others. He also said the inclusive environment at TESS made it easier for him to make friends and feel involved in school life.

Participants with learning disabilities spoke of bullying in their previous schools which they said stemmed from a lack of awareness:

“I have been bullied because of this. It actually started in primary school. I used to get beaten up a lot. I learned that being upset and crying attracted the attention of bullies even more so soon any sadness became anger.”

The National Autistic Society found that only 16% of autistic people and their families think the public understand autism in a meaningful way, but felt that if the public had a better understanding it would improve the health and wellbeing of autistic people and their families,⁴⁴⁷ which can also be said for all young people with disabilities who encounter bullying or discrimination. They have said:

⁴⁴⁵ Delebarre (2016) p. 8

“Better public understanding of autism would expand these worlds and improve the health and wellbeing of autistic people and their families. We can’t always change all the environmental factors that can make going out difficult, like crowded spaces and sensory challenges, but if the public understood autism better, it would mean anxiety about their reaction is less likely to contribute to these unacceptable levels of isolation.”

GPs, Hospitals and Additional Services

Just as SWEET! 2 participants often avoided contact with Children’s Services and the police, they could also be avoidant of mainstream health services.

Participants told us it was too difficult to secure GP appointments, which often required calling at 8am the day you wished to be seen and hoping there was a space.

“I wanted to make an appointment but all of them were gone. When this happens you have to wait until the next day and go to the doctors really early to try to get an appointment.”

“It takes ages to get through to someone and then the next minute all the appointments are gone.”

Even if they were successful in getting an appointment, some told us these appointments usually conflicted with school and work times. While we know that increasing difficulties in accessing services is a national issue,⁴⁴⁸ TESS staff told us this could particularly effect SWEET! 2 participants whose sometimes chaotic lifestyles added an extra barrier to booking and upholding appointments.

Tony and his family were travellers, and when they moved to the area they tried to register at their local surgery but were turned away. Tony felt this was because they were travellers. The family managed to register at a different surgery, but Tony explained that the time it took to make an appointment and then be seen meant he went to a walk-in centre or A&E instead. He felt these services were easier to use.

Around half of SWEET! 2 participants had used emergency services in recent years. As this sample of young people largely avoided making appointments at a GP surgery, participants commonly saw A&E as a catch-all service for any medical issue, with some telling us they skipped their GP altogether and went straight to A&E. However, some claimed they would not even attend A&E, feeling they would not be taken seriously.

Despite a high use of A&E, an awareness of 111 and walk-in centres was incredibly low amongst SWEET! 2 participants, with only 2 having heard of walk-in centres, and 1 having heard of 111. However, 5 told us they felt that walk-in centres sounded like good alternatives to A&E, but they did not know where their nearest service was located.

⁴⁴⁷ The National Autistic Society (2016) p. 2, 17

⁴⁴⁸ House of Commons Health Committee (2016) ‘Primary care.’ London: House of Commons: p. 5

Without a wealth of their own experience with health services, participants mistrust or anxiety was heightened by negative press around local hospitals that led them to believe they could expect long waits and poor standards of care.

“My girlfriend’s grandad died in the hospital where he received poor service and neglect.”

This fear, compounded with a lack of experience, could produce unpleasant outcomes:

Tom felt that because his family had not used mainstream health services very often, they were unaware of how they were expected to behave in them. Tom told us that his relative became very aggressive in hospital when his baby was very ill, and the police were called to take him away. Tom said he had been angry because he was frightened for his baby, and being taken by the police made him feel even less in control.

The House of Commons Health Committee says that “Primary care is the bedrock of the National Health Service and the setting for ninety percent of all NHS patient contacts.”⁴⁴⁹ It is therefore a concern that the young people we spoke to in SWEET! 2, who arguably present a higher need of such services, are at risk of disengagement. With SWEET! 2 participants often caring for parents or siblings it might be that the needs of those in their care are also affected.

Concluding Thoughts and Next Steps

We are sad to say that TESS closed down at the end of summer 2016. At present, we are unaware of similar provision for young people with similar lived experience in the Tendring area.

Healthwatch Essex has continued to engage with seldom heard young people, going on to gather the lived experience of young people in a secure mental health unit. These findings will produce a SWEET! 3 report.

Last summer Healthwatch Essex carried out the final instalment of the YEAH! project, engaging with around 1,000 young people from throughout the county. This time, we collected their lived experience around public health topics which will form the YEAH! 3 report to be released later this year.

In 2017 we will continue seeking the lived experience of the “hardest to reach” groups of young people in our county in order to embed their voice in health and social care decisions made around services. We will begin to focus on the safeguarding needs of young people who have experienced gang recruitment, sexual exploitation and trafficking.

⁴⁴⁹ House of Commons Health Committee (2016) p. 3

We hope that the courage of the young people who spoke to us for this SWEET! 2 report will be rewarded by having their voices used to create positive change by those making decisions about the services they access and need. These are some of our county's most disadvantaged young people, and we must act to reverse the odds that can seemingly be stacked against them. As the Children's Commissioner has said:

“Disadvantage casts a long shadow over children's lives – it affects their experience of school and educational outcomes, their ability to participate in their local community, the opportunities they enjoy throughout childhood, their health and ultimately life expectancy.”⁴⁵⁰

As ever, Healthwatch Essex wants to work with commissioners, services and health and social care professionals in order to form part of the solution in these challenging times.

11 Q.9 Left behind communities and groups: my recommendations, including my submissions to other inquiries.

2) CREDENTIALS

2.1 A private citizen, widely floating voter with no paid or voluntary office, and no previous involvement in politics other than going to cast my vote, until, made possible by variable work shifts, observing numerous Northumberland County Council Full Council, Cabinet, and various Scrutiny Committee meetings over last 4 years, local Parish Council meetings, and meetings of North East Combined Authority committees.

2.2 After decades working in varying fields and locations, now employed back in Northumberland to serve numerous customers from all walks of life in a market town on the boundary between urban post-industrial areas, sparse rural areas, and urban Tyneside.

3) Q.1. WHAT DOES CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT MEAN IN THE 21ST CENTURY? WHY DOES IT MATTER, AND HOW DOES IT RELATE TO QUESTIONS OF IDENTITY?

3.1 I have noticed that since the EU referendum, instead of most people saying “ it’s a waste of time, it makes no difference, they’re all the same, they’re all in it for themselves, they have decided already and they don’t care about us”, most people now have some opinion and awareness of local and national politics and are prepared to express an opinion about it – so maybe they have already become more engaged, because they saw that in the EU referendum where each vote had an equal chance of having an effect, their vote did count, and that they needed to vote to get what they wanted. The result of the 2017 Parliamentary election might also be reinforcing their conclusion.

3.2 So maybe it needs to be proved that their votes and voices are listened to and can make a difference before they are prepared to spend their precious time on being engaged.

3.3 Without their engagement, our democratic system will become moribund and fail.

4) Q.2. CITIZENSHIP IS PARTLY ABOUT MEMBERSHIP AND BELONGING. ARE THERE WAYS WE COULD STRENGTHEN PEOPLE’S IDENTITY AS CITIZENS, WHETHER THEY ARE CITIZENS BY BIRTH OR NATURALISATION? COULD CITIZENSHIP CEREMONIES OR EVENTS THROUGHOUT THE EDUCATIONAL PROCESS PLAY A ROLE? SHOULD PRIDE IN BEING OR BECOMING BRITISH BE ENCOURAGED?

4.1 I think that there would be several benefits if everyone were treated equally and with substantial ceremony as they gain the right to vote.

4.2 Giving everyone the same opportunity together, whether they were just reaching the age to vote or were just gaining it through becoming British citizens, would allow people from all walks of life to meet and interact and have the same introduction to our democracy.

4.3 Perhaps everyone coming up to 18 as well as those seeking citizenship should have the same education and preparation together and be encouraged to take the Life in the UK test.

4.4 Within a reasonable time of them attaining the right to vote by whatever means, perhaps they should be required to select a date when they could attend a major event to celebrate their attainment of the vote, meet others who are doing the same, meet elected representatives, and see and learn the locations and means by which they can follow, observe and participate in all stages of democratic policy and decision-making, including knowing how they can report on these if they wish.

4.5 I think that this is of fundamental importance in getting people through the door and engaged when they are not from groups who are traditionally “in the know”.

4.6 This might include a point in the event where they could nominate and vote on a subject for the elected representatives do deal with to illustrate how procedures work, and how an individual’s vote can count.

4.7 This might also help elected representatives to connect with new voters, and possibly to identify rising issues which might need their attention.

5) Q.3. CIVIC ENGAGEMENT CAN BE SEEN AS BOTH A RESPONSIBILITY AND A RIGHT OF CITIZENSHIP. BEYOND THE EXISTING LEGAL FRAMEWORK, SHOULD CITIZENS HAVE ADDITIONAL FORMAL RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES? HOW DO YOU SEE THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE TWO? SHOULD THEY HAVE THE FORCE OF LAW INDIVIDUALLY OR BE PRESENTED AS RECIPROCAL DUTIES BETWEEN CITIZEN AND STATE? HOW SHOULD THEY BE MONITORED AND/OR ENFORCED?

5.1 See section 4 above.

5.2 Perhaps there should also be “democracy service” on a par with jury service, whereby perhaps 4 citizens are required to sit on a local authority scrutiny committee to help to bring day-to-day insight and experience to discussions, but without having a vote on the committee.

Unlike Jury service though, they should be positively encouraged to talk to as many people as possible about the proceedings which they have seen, and perhaps encourage them to come and watch. Even if they didn’t feel confident enough to speak in a committee, they could usefully tell other people who they meet about what they have seen.

5.3 Over the last few years of observing various local government meetings, I have been extremely worried that I am more often than not the only member of the public who is observing, and that often there are no reporters there either. This means that whatever information which people get about local government workings is not first hand, and is either filtered through press- releases, or is not available until it is published in the agenda of the next meeting as minutes to be agreed, so that it is too late in the proceedings for them to act. Minutes are rarely word for word, and miss the nuances of how participants have interacted.

5.4 Despite the fact that they have very rarely seen proceedings, and do not have access to first-hand information to see how they work, many of my fellow citizens seem all too ready to be disparaging about democratic proceedings and as such detached from them.

6) Q.4. DO CURRENT LAWS ENCOURAGE ACTIVE POLITICAL ENGAGEMENT? WHAT ARE YOUR VIEWS ON CHANGES TO THE FRANCHISE FOR NATIONAL OR LOCAL ELECTIONS, INCLUDING LOWERING THE VOTING AGE? SHOULD CHANGES BE MADE TO THE VOTING PROCESS OR THE VOTING REGISTRATION PROCESS?

6.1 Some young people might well be disengaged before they even reach the vote, because they are seeing decisions or omissions made, or issues ignored, the results of which they will have to live with and/or clear up in future decades, without having any recognised means of having their voice heard in the decisive debate.

6.2 SUGGESTION

We probably have more data available about under-18s to help to verify their identity than for any other generation. After the disappearance of the two Child Benefit data discs in 2007, it is possible that even criminals could do it.

6.3 Could polling stations not be used for them to cast an advisory vote?

This would encourage the political debate to include the issues which are of greatest concern to them, and would therefore allow those of voting age to hear and balance their judgements before voting.

It would also allow young people to get used to taking part in votes before their vote achieves legal standing.

6.4 If the unelected House of Lords can have an influence, surely our soon-to-be-voters i.e.16/17 year-olds should have an authoritative means of being heard.

6.5 At the very least, some sort of third soon-to-be-voters elected house, or forum based on equality and inclusiveness, should be set up on an equal basis to Commons and Lords to debate, examine and report on issues, even if they can have no part in legislating.

7) Q.5. WHAT SHOULD BE THE ROLE OF EDUCATION IN TEACHING AND ENCOURAGING GOOD CITIZENSHIP? AT WHAT STAGES, FROM PRIMARY SCHOOL THROUGH TO UNIVERSITY, SHOULD IT BE (A) AVAILABLE, AND (B) COMPULSORY? SHOULD THERE BE ANY EXEMPTIONS? SHOULD THERE BE MORE EMPHASIS ON POLITICAL PARTICIPATION, BOTH INSIDE AND OUTSIDE CLASSES? HOW EFFECTIVE IS CURRENT TEACHING? DO THE CURRICULUM AND THE QUALIFICATIONS THAT ARE CURRENTLY OFFERED NEED AMENDING?

7.1 EVERYONE should Google “Eddie and Bethan – It’s Debateable” and spend the 5 minutes which it takes to listen to this Radio 4 Listening Project’s slot last broadcast on Wednesday 16th August 2017 at 10.55.

7.2 In 5 minutes, these two perspicacious primary school girls clearly explain the importance of learning debating skills and being able to understand other points of view.

It is more common sense about the essence of democracy than I have heard in decades from the powers-that-be who appear on Radio 4, and IT SHOULD BE MADE PART OF THE LIFE IN THE UK TEST.

7.3 OFFICIAL ACTION SHOULD BE TAKEN ON WHAT EEDIE AND BETHAN SAY.

7.4 [A pity that with its recent imposition of registering and logging in in order to access licence-payer funded Listen Again, the BBC has locked out all of those licence payers and potential friends of democracy across the world who are not prepared to hand over curatorship of their contact details for yet another database whose number and range of customers and wealth of cultural detail on them must be a very desirable one for hackers, and who are not prepared to allow the BBC to harvest their preferences, and, unless they specifically object, to seek to direct their future choices].

8) Q.6. DO VOLUNTARY CITIZENSHIP PROGRAMMES SUCH AS THE NATIONAL CITIZEN SERVICE DO A GOOD JOB OF CREATING ACTIVE CITIZENS? ARE THEY THE RIGHT LENGTH? SHOULD THEY BE COMPULSORY, AND IF SO, WHEN? SHOULD THEY INCLUDE A GREATER POLITICAL ELEMENT? SHOULD THEY LEAD TO A MORE PUBLIC CITIZENSHIP CEREMONY? ARE THEY GOOD VALUE FOR MONEY? WHAT OTHER ROUTES EXIST FOR CREATING ACTIVE CITIZENS?

8.1 COMPULSION = DEVALUATION AND ADMISSION OF FAILURE –it devalues and diverts resources from genuine effort, bringing the whole into disrepute because individual motivation is lost in the perception of it being compulsory, and it might also provoke active hostility and attempts to undermine it from those who it does not suit, and whose time, talents and enthusiasm might be spent more profitably in other avenues.

8.2 There are already too many compulsory calls on people’s time and resources, which reduces their power to choose what is most suitable in their situation, and perhaps their sense of, and right and motivation to, self-determination, thus undermining their sense of responsibility.

9) Q.7. HOW CAN SOCIETY SUPPORT CIVIC ENGAGEMENT? WHAT RESPONSIBILITY SHOULD CENTRAL GOVERNMENT, DEVOLVED AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS, THIRD SECTOR ORGANISATIONS AND THE INDIVIDUAL HAVE FOR ENCOURAGING CIVIC ENGAGEMENT? WHAT CAN THE GOVERNMENT AND PARLIAMENT DO TO SUPPORT CIVIL SOCIETY INITIATIVES TO INCREASE CIVIC ENGAGEMENT?

9.1 See section 14 of my submission to the Communities and Local Government Select Committee>Inquiries>Parliament 2015>Overview and Scrutiny in Local Government:

9.1.1 Require a LOCAL PORTFOLIO HOLDER with specific budget to uphold and promote democratic systems to voters and encourage their engagement.

9.1.2 EMULATE

-Northumberland County Council’s excellent Democratic Services Department

-Councillors and Democracy section of NCC website, especially Forward Plan of Key Decisions and Calendar of Meetings, which includes working groups not open to observe.

9.1.3 Publish DRAFT MINUTES – currently, minutes of meetings aren’t generally available to voters until published in agenda of following meeting, when too late to get questions onto agenda.

With internet, it should be possible to circulate draft minutes to members quickly, and publish them to voters with any queries to be raised at next meeting highlighted.

This way, voters could contact elected representatives in meaningful time, rather than always being left one step behind, awaiting publication of previous minutes in next meeting agenda.

9.1.4 Look at providing more detailed minutes for those who can’t observe due to time or distance – e.g. HANSARD. COULD VOLUNTEERS OR STUDENTS BE ENCOURAGED TO HELP?

9.1.5 See also its section 14.5 on points relating to the conduct of public consultations.

9.2 In addition to my recommendations to that inquiry, live-streaming, as Parliament manages to do, might be extremely helpful in making first –hand democracy accessible to many more people, especially if it were done by volunteers such as media students, who could at the same time develop a valuable knowledge of what they were streaming, and enable minimum strain on local authority resources.

9.3 At local authority meetings, have a compulsory agenda item where, if members of the public are present, they are welcomed and there is a brief explanation of the function of the meeting, who the people are, what their role is, and what political group and ward they represent, and a brief explanation of the items on the agenda. This explanation might encourage more people to continue to follow them if they were observing for the first time, especially if they were being live-streamed.

9.4 More account should also be taken of the needs of people with disabilities, such as explaining to people who cannot see, on which side the various political groups sit in chamber, and making sure that speaker’s names are given in full.

9.5 There should also be heavy emphasis on making sure that public address systems are working effectively, that participants are required to switch on their microphones when they speak, and that public address systems are not subject to interference by items such as mobile phone signals which haven’t been switched off, or by people speaking over each other.

I have seen too many instances of pivotal points being inaudible in such circumstances.

10) Q.8. WHAT ARE THE VALUES THAT ALL OF US WHO LIVE IN BRITAIN SHOULD SHARE AND SUPPORT? CAN YOU IDENTIFY ANY THREATS TO THESE VALUES, WHICH AFFECT THE CITIZENSHIP OF, FOR INSTANCE, WOMEN OR VARIOUS MINORITY GROUPS? IF SO, HOW CAN THEIR CITIZENSHIP BE STRENGTHENED?

10.1 Having been able to borrow the Life in the UK test Study Guide, Handbook, and guide to passing the English test for British Citizenship, from the library [although Northumberland libraries do not hold a copy of “Life in the UK: a Guide for new residents], it seems to me that it is all reasonably put together.

10.2 EXAMPLES OF THREATS

10.2.1 However, I have seen one or two men from another continent who, without having good enough English to be able to understand points in debate, do not seem to have absorbed the information about equality of gender, and who speak to and treat women in a way which I have not seen British men do for 40 years.

10.2.2 I have also met women who, for their own safety, have felt forced to move out of the areas where their family has lived for generations because of the behaviour of immigrant men.

10.2.3 I have also been managed by a new citizen from another continent who did not appear to have any respect for the people in the community into which they had come, and appeared determined to flout any laws, including employment laws, which they could get away with flouting.

10.2.4 In all of these instances, when questioned, the immediate response has been that the questioning is racist. I do not think that these are isolated instances.

10.3 COMMENTS AND SUGGESTIONS

10.3.1 WHEN GENERATIONS OF OUR BRITISH PEOPLE HAVE PUT IN UNTOLD EFFORT AND SUFFERING IN THE FIGHT TO ACHIEVE THE VALUES OF RESPECT, EQUALITY AND JUSTICE FOR WORKERS AND EVERYONE ELSE WHICH MAKES OUR DEMOCRACY WHAT IT IS TODAY, and attracts so many people from across the world, it is extremely galling and disturbing to see these values being taken back decades by a small minority of immigrants who do not come here out of a desire to participate in our democracy, but out of a desire to extract whatever they can from it in material terms.

10.3.2 IF OUR ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES WERE PREPARED TO ACKNOWLEDGE AND ADDRESS THIS PROBLEM, THEN IT COULD NOT UNDERMINE OUR DEMOCRACY. Instead they are cowed by the prospect of their actions being labelled racist instead of standing up as they should for the people who they represent.

10.3.3 This means that THOSE WHO HAVE THE LEAST VOICE AND MOST EXPOSURE TO SUCH ABUSES, and who our democracy is supposed to protect i.e. women, children and others amongst the most vulnerable, and those on low incomes, whether at home, at work, or reliant on public transport, ARE DISPROPORTIONATELY AND ADVERSELY EFFECTED.

10.4 OUR ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES CAN ONLY SPEAK OUT ABOUT THESE ISSUES IF THEY AND THE COUNTRY AS A WHOLE ARE WHOLLY HONEST ABOUT HOW BRITAIN HAS ACTED ON PEOPLE AND COMMUNITIES ACROSS THE WORLD IN THE PAST, where and how Britain has gained its wealth, and who now controls its wealth.

10.5.1 I think that it might be helpful if, in the Life in the UK Test, even more emphasis were placed on respect for British Democracy, and the part that ordinary British people played in bringing it about, and the effects on communities across the world of British interactions with them, whether positive or negative, so that this could be the basis of proper democratic debate in our society.

10.5.2 I have also failed to spot any useful mention of the NHS in the Life in the UK literature [and who funds it, who works in it, where they are trained etc.], even though it might be one of the biggest attractions of entry into the UK and one of the biggest influences in weak local economies across the world.

11) Q.9. WHY DO SO MANY COMMUNITIES AND GROUPS FEEL “LEFT BEHIND”? ARE THERE ANY SPECIFIC FACTORS WHICH ACT AS BARRIERS TO ACTIVE CITIZENSHIP FACED BY DIFFERENT COMMUNITIES OR GROUPS - WHITE, BME, YOUNG, OLD, RURAL, URBAN? HOW MIGHT THESE BARRIERS BE OVERCOME?

11.3 N.B. Current newspapers are no longer available in Northumberland libraries.

11.4.1 Above all, governmental bodies at all levels should reverse and explicitly address the cut-back-imposed culture of "desk-top studies" and expecting the actively interested or the desperate to find them online, both of which probably serve to reinforce existing connections rather than making new ones, and instead they should go out to where the majority of voters are who are don't have time to be interested and are not desperate, but who do pay taxes and are very busy doing their best for the future of their families and communities.

11.4.2 SUGGESTION

Use existing official communications such as Council Tax bills and electoral registration to include optional forms for people to give a picture of their circumstances, most pressing requirements and concerns, and best methods for engaging in democracy.

e.g. I recently heard at a meeting that in one ward, 60% of residents in Gento housing don't have computers.

11.5 We should be aiming for transparency, accountability, and availability to scrutiny of democratic processes such that citizens of all ages, resources, walks of life, locations, and origins know and can access all stages open to direct their participation and observation.

HM Government – Supplementary written evidence (CCE0249)

1. The meaning of citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

In a speech to the Charity Commission in January, the Prime Minister set out the Government's determination to build a shared society based on the values of citizenship, responsibility and fairness. In the speech, the Prime Minister spoke of how the word 'citizen' implies that we have responsibilities to the people around us, and that whilst individual rights are to be valued, there should be more focus on the responsibilities that we have to one another. Society is built on the bonds of family, community, citizenship and strong institutions.

The Government is committed to building a stronger civil society that works for everyone – one in which people are supported to come together and improve their own lives and people of all ages are encouraged to play a part in their community as active citizens. From responses to the annual Community Life Survey⁴⁵¹ which explores levels of community cohesion and engagement, it is evident that Britain is on the whole well-integrated, with 85% of respondents feeling they belonged very or fairly strongly to Britain and 81% of respondents agreeing their local area is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together.

However, Government must not be complacent. More needs to be done to make sure nobody is excluded or left behind and we must be prepared to take strong action where people refuse to integrate and fail to embrace the shared values that make Britain great. The Department for Communities and Local Government is reviewing the available evidence on the main causes of poor integration, and in the coming months will bring forward plans for tackling these issues through a new integration strategy.

The Community Life Survey also collects information on social action and on three types of civic engagement: participation, consultation and activism. In 2016-17, the most common form of civic engagement was 'civic participation', with 41% saying they had undertaken some form of participation in the last year and 5% saying they had participated at least once a month. Annual levels of civic participation and civic consultation have increased from 33% to 41% and 16% to 18% respectively between 2015-16 and 2016-17. In 2016-17, 60% of adults had engaged in some form of civic engagement (participation, consultation, or activism) and/or formal volunteering, an increase from 2015-16 (55%).

It is important for all British citizens to understand and uphold the rights and responsibilities that are implicit in this status, and citizenship is taught in schools as a fundamental part of the national curriculum. Education plays an important role in helping children develop the knowledge, skills and values that will prepare them to be active citizens in modern Britain, and to grow into fully rounded members of society who treat others with respect and tolerance.

The Government also attaches great importance to helping those who settle here to understand the rights and responsibilities that come with British citizenship. The aim of citizenship education and the tests for those who decide they want to become British is to ensure that none of our citizens is excluded from meaningful participation in society. It is not about promoting conformity to a particular stereotype of “Britishness”. It is about making sure that the common citizenship, which is so often implicit in all that we do, is also formal and explicit so that it is easier for everyone to understand and share in. It also reinforces the fact that our sense of identity, and understanding of mutuality and interdependence, comes just as much from our contributing to the society around us, as it does from accessing any entitlements that we possess.

Passing the Life in the UK Test has been a requirement for those seeking to naturalise since 1st November 2005, and a similar requirement was extended to settlement applications in 2007. Nationality law also requires that as part of the naturalisation process for acquiring British citizenship applicants must also have sufficient knowledge of English (or Welsh/Scottish Gaelic), and attend a citizenship ceremony and undertake the oath and pledge.

Volunteering and/or civic engagement do not feature in the naturalisation requirements. However, the core “Life in the UK” text contains a chapter on “Your Role in the Community” which covers subjects such as values and responsibilities; being a good neighbour; getting involved in local activities; helping in schools; looking after the environment; and blood and organ donation.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

All schools and relevant further education providers are expected to actively promote the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect and tolerance for those of different faiths and beliefs. These are the bedrock of British values and without them we cannot expect any young person to play a full part in civic society in this country.

Schools have a vital role in promoting integration and an understanding of different faiths and communities. All publicly funded schools are required to promote community cohesion, including through the national curriculum Citizenship programme of study, which includes knowledge of the diverse range of identities in the UK and the importance of respecting others. Schools can provide many opportunities for their pupils to learn about and mix with people from different backgrounds – for example through visits and establishing links with other schools. All schools and relevant further education institutions are expected to promote the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect and tolerance for those of different faiths and beliefs.

As referred in question 1 above, the Life in the UK core text and test are designed to ensure people who are applying for British citizenship appreciate what being a British citizen means, and that it is as much to do with what you contribute to society as the entitlements it brings. The Life in the UK core text, which was last substantively updated in 2013, traces the development of British democracy, its legal system, language and culture over time, to assist the reader in understanding how the UK has become the country which it is today.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship.

Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

The Government's view is that in a democratic society, a value is placed on personal freedom. Some freedoms are protected by law, but more frequently they are a matter of social and cultural conduct that demonstrates respect for others, with the law being there as a remedy for serious failings. We expect those who live in our society to regard people of all faiths, races and cultures with respect and tolerance, and for that to be reciprocated by support for the society which makes that possible. Whilst this means we undertake to respect and understand that different people may hold different views about what is 'right' and 'wrong' at a personal level, all people living in England are subject to its law. Where religious or other beliefs lead to observance of laws particular to that religion, then particular care needs to be taken to explore the relationship between state and religious law, and to ensure that protections granted by state law are not being violated or compromised. The rule of law is there to protect freedoms that we believe are meant to be enjoyed at the individual level, both by citizens who grow up in this country and by those who choose to live here.

As the Prime Minister made clear (when speaking as Home Secretary) "...in a pluralistic society like ours, there are responsibilities as well as rights. You don't only get the freedom to live how you choose to live. You have to respect other people's rights to do so too. And you have to respect not just this fundamental principle but the institutions and laws that make it possible.

The overwhelming majority of people in Britain accept and positively cherish this proposition. We choose to live here, immigrants come to live here, and many millions of people around the world dream of building a life here precisely because we have a free society, diverse communities and pluralistic values."

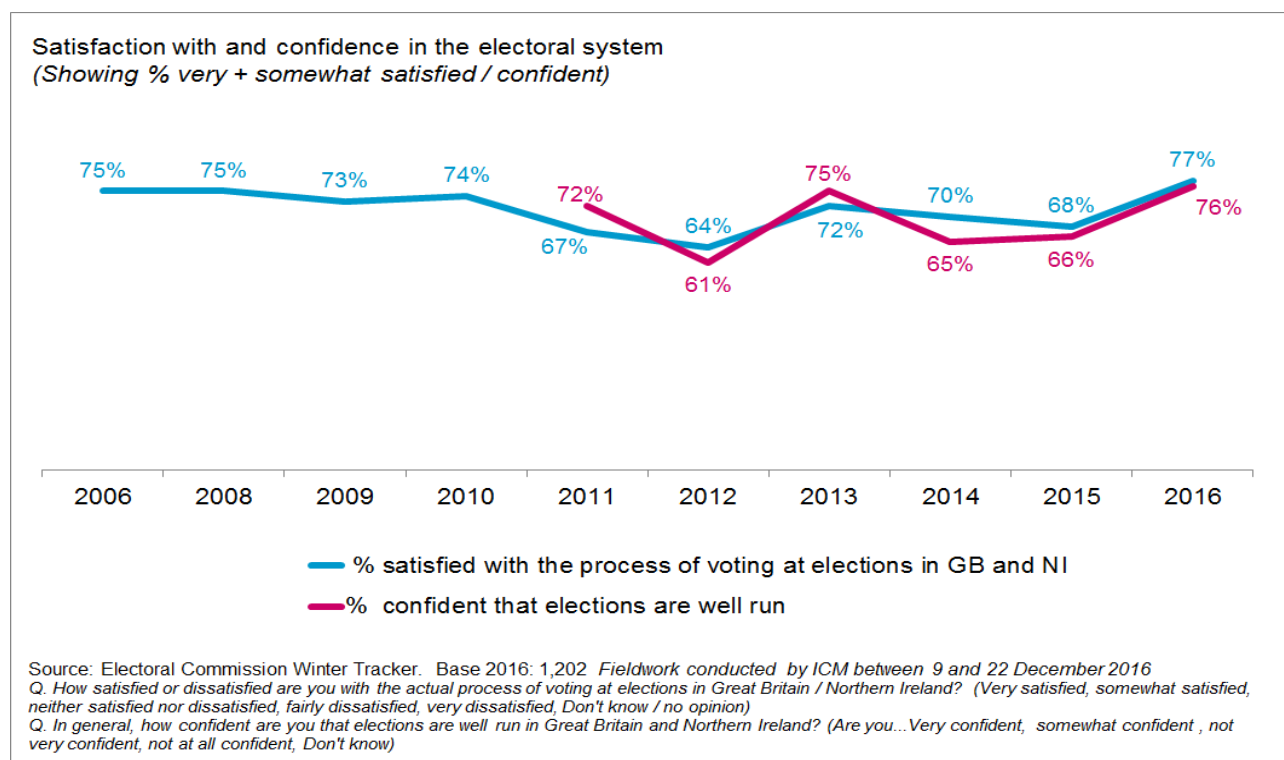

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The Government is committed to creating a democracy that works for everyone, and has pledged to continue to modernise and improve the electoral registration process, making it as accessible as possible, so that every voice counts. Government has an important role in setting the legislative framework and providing the tools to ensure that all electors are able to play an active part in the democratic process. We also recognise, though, the valuable role others have to play and we have been keen to work with our partners, who have a vital stake in the electoral ecosystem. We recognise that organisations from other sectors have expertise in developing and sustaining new approaches to engage people, particularly those groups that are less likely to be registered to vote. In addition, we are working with the Scottish Government as a result of the devolution of competence in respect of local government elections and elections to the Scottish Parliament provided for in the Scotland Act 2016, and with the Welsh Government as a result of the forthcoming devolution of competence in respect of local government elections and elections to the National Assembly for Wales provided for in the Wales Act 2017.

The Electoral Registration and Administration Act 2013 paved the way for the introduction of Individual Electoral Registration in Great Britain from June 2014. This included amending the Representation of the People Act 1983 and was the biggest change to the electoral registration system in a century. It abolished the old, patriarchal ‘head of household’ paperwork in favour of a citizen-centred approach, including the launch of a new website enabling online registration. As a result it has never been easier to apply to join the electoral register. This can be done online at www.gov.uk/register-to-vote in as little as 3 minutes. The effect has been transformational, with 27,912,055 applications to register to vote made since its launch. The service caters for citizens both at home and abroad, meaning UK citizens resident in Great Britain, or formerly resident in Great Britain, are able to participate in democracy wherever they are in the world by registering online.

In addition to this citizen-led, user friendly interface with the registration system we also need to modernise its foundations. This includes reviewing the annual canvass in England, Wales and Scotland, required by the Representation of the People Act 1983, to consider if it can be made more efficient and easier for Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) to administer. Building on pilots in 2016, working with the Scottish Government we have launched an additional 24 canvass pilots in 2017. The pilots allow EROs to undertake less prescribed, more cost effective approach to canvass, allowing for innovation and giving EROs the freedom to trial and implement what works best in their locality – the areas they know best. The results of the pilots will be considered in due course to inform any future changes to the canvass.

The process of voting is seen by the general public as positive, with satisfaction levels for elections the UK increasing by 9 percentage points to 77% in 2016. This shows a trend back towards the higher levels of satisfaction previously seen between 2006 and 2010.

People were more likely to say that they are satisfied with the voter registration system too. 80% said that they were satisfied with the process, showing a 5 point increase on December 2015. 73% of people also feel confident that the personal information they provide in order to register to vote is held securely.

On the whole, the electoral process is generally seen to be safe from fraud and abuse (73%), with only around 1 in 10 (8%) saying that they believe electoral fraud to be a common and widespread issue.

The Cabinet Office’s Digital and Democratic Engagement Team leads the Government’s commitment to encourage democratic participation and promote voter registration, particularly amongst those groups who are least likely to be on the electoral register. It engages with local authorities to ensure policies, and the delivery of projects, are sense-checked and on track. In addition, it works with voluntary and community organisations with unique links to under registered groups in order to underline the importance of democratic participation more widely.

Promoting Democratic Engagement

Within the context of the legislative framework for electoral registration, the Government is committed to ensuring that ours is a democracy that works for everyone. As such we are working to promote engagement, including amongst those groups that are traditionally less likely to be registered to vote. For example, within the scope of the law and purdah guidance, we have supported the Electoral Commission's public awareness campaign and worked across Government departments to reach a diverse range of audiences. This has been successful in helping to build the largest ever parliamentary register of 46.8 million electors ahead of the 2017 General Election.

However, some groups still face barriers to participation. We are addressing these through a combination of policy and communication activity, including tackling specific issues that discourage some people from accessing our democracy. These include:

(i) Disabled people

The Government is committed to ensuring the Register to Vote website is as accessible and user friendly as possible for everyone, including people with disabilities. We are considering a range of suggested website improvements identified through various feedback channels and user research activities, including amending the online voter registration process to capture the accessible format needs of disabled voters and for this information to be passed onto relevant electoral service teams for action. Once this review, which includes an accessibility audit, has been completed, we will report on its outcomes and our intended next steps.

We are also committed to improving the access to support for blind and partially sighted people, through changes to the Certificate of Visual Impairment by the Department of Health at the request of the Minister for the Constitution. Providing the facility for local authorities to use records for those with visual impairments to support participation in electoral events provided the person's consent has been given to do so. As a result, people with vision impairments will have access to wider services which will assist them in voting at elections.

We will continue to work with leading charities including Mencap, RNIB, Scope and key electoral stakeholders to improve the accessibility of future elections for disabled people.

(ii) Young People

The 2017 General Election saw youth turnout reach a 25-year high, estimated at 67%. This was an increase of 16 percentage points on the 2015 General Election. However, statistics show that young people remain under-registered and Government has been working with the civil society sector to boost this group's participation in society and democracy. For example, the National Citizen Service (discussed in more detail below in the response to question 6) provides participants with the opportunity to build new skills for work and life, while taking on new challenges, meeting new friends and giving back to their communities. A standing commitment to democratic engagement was also incorporated as part of the NCS Trust's Royal Charter granted in April 2017. This builds on the current requirement of the NCS Trust to promote social mobility, personal social development and support employment prospects by equipping them with relevant practical skills. It reads as follows: 'In exercising its primary functions, the NCS Trust must a. treat the need to safeguard and promote the wellbeing of participants as the paramount consideration, and b. have regard to the desirability of i. promoting social mobility, ii. promoting the personal and social development of participants, iii. promoting the employment prospects of participants by equipping them with relevant practical skills, iv. encouraging participants to take an interest in debate on matters of local or national political interest, and promoting their understanding of how to participate in national and local elections, and v. ensuring value for money.'

(iii) Students

The Cabinet Office has been working with parliamentarians, including Baroness Royall, to ascertain how best to increase the registration levels of students in England. This resulted in measures being included in the Higher Education and Research Act 2017 to allow the Office for Students to require Higher Education providers to actively promote electoral registration amongst their student populations.

(iv) Anonymous Registration

The Government will propose changes to the current anonymous registration scheme, to make it more accessible to those escaping domestic violence. Anonymous registration allows those whose safety would be at risk if their name and address appeared in the electoral register to register to vote with confidence.

(v) Overseas Voters

The Government is looking to encourage greater participation in our democracy by all under registered groups. The Conservative Party manifesto for the current Parliament included a commitment to legislate to scrap the current 15 year time limit on voting from overseas. Our aim is to deliver votes for life for British citizens resident overseas, ahead of the next scheduled General Election in 2022. The Government's position is clear: participation in our democracy is a fundamental part of being British, however far you have travelled.

Democratic Engagement Strategy

The Government is committed to a Democracy That Works For Everyone. The Government's Democratic Engagement Strategy, due for publication in November, will examine the challenges and opportunities for democratic engagement and voter registration, review existing evidence, explore the experiences of under registered groups and those working with them, and set out the Government's next steps in response to this learning.

Voting Age

As regards changing the franchise, we have no plans to lower the voting age for UK Parliamentary elections. This is outlined in the Conservative party manifesto commitment to maintain the minimum voting age for these elections at eighteen.

The Scottish Parliament has lowered the voting age to 16 for elections to the Scottish Parliament and local government elections in Scotland using powers devolved by the UK Government. Equivalent powers to amend the franchise for elections to the National Assembly for Wales and local government elections in Wales will be devolved to the National Assembly for Wales when the relevant provisions in the Wales Act 2017 are commenced.

There is no standard age of majority in the UK at which one moves from being a child to being an adult. Instead, the rights and responsibilities young people gain, and the activities in which they can participate, build over time. People gain the right to do some things when they turn 16 and other things when they turn 17 or 18.

According to the most recent evidence the Government is aware of most people in the country seem to believe that 18 is the age at which most young people are likely to be sufficiently politically aware, mature, and independent enough to make up their minds as to who should represent them. For similar reasons, you have to be 18 to sit on a jury. While there is some variation within the UK and around the world, the overwhelming majority of democracies consider 18 to be the right age to enfranchise young people.

Secure Elections

Moving to whether changes should be made to the voting process, in line with our manifesto commitment, we plan to legislate to ensure that a form of identification must be presented before voting. It is intended that this requirement be tested through pilot schemes at local government elections in England to be held in May 2018. Pilots will help to identify the best way of administering this new requirement.

In his review, Sir Eric Pickles argued that requiring voters to provide a form of identification at polling stations before voting could improve the rigour of our electoral system. The Government agrees that the options for asking voters to present identification should be explored further. The pilot schemes we are planning to run in a number of local authority areas in England in 2018 will be designed to test the impact of voter identification on all aspects of elections in Great Britain, including cost and turnout.

The Government is committed to providing a clear and secure democracy, but we remain aware of the important consideration that not all registered electors would be able to provide a passport or a driving licence (or other specific documents) if requested. Consequently, the Government's response to Sir Eric's review sets out a variety of other types of identification that voters may be asked to produce in pilot schemes before voting.

If the pilot schemes are successful, voter identification measures could be introduced in other polls in Great Britain. Our view is that any measures need to be proportionate, and should enhance public confidence in the integrity of our democracy.

It is the Government's abiding determination that every poll is as accessible as possible and engages the interests of those the Government serves.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education plays an important role in equipping children with the knowledge, skills and values that will prepare them to be citizens in modern Britain. All schools are under specific duties to promote the spiritual, moral, social and cultural development (SMSC) of their pupils and, to prepare them for the opportunities and responsibilities of adult life. Furthermore, we expect all schools and further education (FE) institutions to promote the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect and tolerance of those of different faiths and beliefs. The Department for Education (DfE) has provided advice to schools on how they can do this, for example by establishing a strong school ethos supported by effective relationships throughout the school; meeting requirements for collective worship; and providing relevant activities beyond the classroom. Schools are also required to have a behaviour policy, which encourages good behaviour and respect, and prevents all forms of bullying and intolerance. Under the Children and Social Work Act 2017, all primary schools will be required to teach Relationships Education, and all secondary schools will be required to teach Relationships and Sex Education, ensuring pupils are taught about healthy and respectful relationships.

Citizenship is taught in many areas of the school curriculum, including subjects such as religious education, personal, social, health and economic education (PSHE), history, English, geography, and other activities that the school chooses to offer. For example, schools can also promote citizenship through participating in programmes such as the National Citizen Service (NCS) or Cadet Expansion Programme (CEP), which enables young people to develop key skills such as responsibility, teamwork, self-reliance, and a sense of service to others.

Citizenship is also part of the national curriculum at key stages 3 and 4 and it is compulsory in maintained secondary schools. Primary schools can also choose to teach Citizenship at key stages 1 and 2, following the non-statutory framework for Citizenship, which is available on gov.uk. Academies do not have to follow the national curriculum and can develop their own curricula, tailored to meet the particular needs of their pupils or the particular ethos of the school. However, they are still required (like all schools) to teach a broad and balanced curriculum and promote fundamental British values. Academies may therefore choose to teach Citizenship to fulfil these duties.

A high quality Citizenship curriculum helps to provide pupils with knowledge, skills and understanding to prepare them to play a full and active part in society as responsible citizens. Pupils are taught about democracy, government and how laws are made and upheld. Teaching should equip pupils to explore political and social issues critically, to debate, and to make reasoned arguments.

All education providers should also encourage their pupils to respect other people, whatever their personal circumstances, background or beliefs. . When inspecting schools and FE settings, Ofsted takes account of how well schools and FE institutions promote the spiritual, moral, social and cultural development of pupils, including their understanding of, and respect for, different faiths and cultural diversity.

DfE is working with the Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT) to produce guidance and resource packs to help teachers lead knowledge-based debates on topics relating to fundamental British values and contemporary political and social issues, including extremism. The first set in a series was launched in July 2017 and is available on the Educate against Hate website. In July 2017, online modules “Side by Side” were launched for students in FE.

Universities do not have a curriculum in the same way that schools do. However, they still have a role to play in assisting their students to understand citizenship. They have a responsibility to provide a safe and inclusive environment for all students. This includes legal obligations for ensuring that students do not face discrimination, harassment or victimisation and to have regard to preventing people from being drawn into terrorism. This can help students better understand the society they are part of and the responsibilities that citizens have towards each other.

Democracy is one of the fundamental British values we expect schools and FE institutions to promote. DfE has provided advice to schools on how to teach this, including through holding classroom-based debates. Debate is fundamental to a thriving democracy and has a clear place at the heart of our education system. Universities and FE colleges have a particularly important role to play in allowing challenging and varied debates.

As with other curriculum subjects, Ofsted does not report separately on the effectiveness of citizenship as part of its inspection process. Key aspects of citizenship are, however, considered within the judgements on leadership and management, and personal development, behaviour and welfare. In the case of school inspection, inspectors also consider pupils’ spiritual, moral, social and cultural development. Inspectors expect schools and colleges to provide a broad and balanced curriculum, which prepares pupils and students for life in modern Britain and promotes the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect for and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs and for those without faith.

The national curriculum was comprehensively reviewed and then published in 2013 and we currently have no plans to review it. The national curriculum outlines the body of essential knowledge that must be taught in maintained schools; this essential knowledge should not change significantly over time. Alongside this, we have also been reforming GCSEs and A levels to be more demanding and knowledge based, to match the best education systems in the world and to keep pace with universities’ and employers’ expectations.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

The National Citizen Service (NCS) is a voluntary personal and social development programme open to all 16 and 17 year olds across England and Northern Ireland. Since 2011, over 300,000 young people from all walks of life have participated in NCS, and over 100,000 are expected to take part in 2017 alone. NCS is the responsibility of the Department for Digital, Culture Media and Sport, and delivered by the NCS Trust, currently an independent community interest company, through a network of regional and local delivery partners.

The NCS Act achieved Royal Assent in April 2017, and the NCS Trust was granted a Royal Charter and a clear mission to make NCS available to all young people, particularly those from deprived backgrounds, to contribute to a Britain that works for everyone. The Charter also guarantees the Trust's operational independence.

NCS is not a citizenship scheme per se although the volunteering component to the programme has an important role to play in creating a younger generation of active citizens. NCS was set up to achieve the following three purposes:

- Social Cohesion - By exposing young people to peers from different backgrounds;
- Social Mobility - Through teaching young people 'softer' skills for work and life;
- Social Engagement - By encouraging young people to contribute to their communities and therefore feel a part of their local areas as active citizens.

Consecutive independent evaluations show that NCS participants are emerging from the programme more confident about getting a job, more confident leading and working in teams and more confident meeting and working with others from different backgrounds.

The NCS Trust estimates that past NCS participants have donated around 10 million hours of volunteering while participating in the NCS programme and the 2015 independent evaluation of NCS showed that past NCS participants contribute four additional hours per month to their communities versus their peers who did not take part in the NCS. This engagement demonstrates that young people are emerging from the programme more assured of their ability to make a difference on the world around them and more able to locate the right people to talk to in their communities to make things happen. As a result, these young people are poised to continue to make a contribution to their local areas as active citizens invested in the future of their communities.

The evaluation also shows that young people are more likely to vote after taking part in the programme, indicating that NCS has helped them understand their role in the democratic process. And indeed, the NCS Trust were recently granted a Royal Charter that includes under the body's wider functions a requirement to "have regard to the desirability of encouraging participants to take an interest in debate on matters of local or national political interest, and promoting their understanding of how to participate in national and local elections".

NCS is a voluntary programme taking place outside school during either the summer holidays or autumn and spring half terms. The summer programme takes place over four weeks, with a slightly shorter version running for the spring and autumn.

Consecutive, independent evaluations commissioned for all past programmes since 2011 show that NCS is having its intended impact on participants across all seasons. Young people are emerging from the programme more confident, more engaged and more socially responsible, indicating that the traditional structure of the programme and both the 3 and 4 week models are working.

The Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport is committed to working with the NCS Trust to ensure that the design of the NCS programme continues to deliver the intended results as well as value for money. This includes evaluating the different length programmes.

Government wants to make sure that every young person who wants to is able to take part in the NCS. We believe that NCS will be most attractive to young people and can have the most impact by retaining its voluntary ethos. Young people need to want to take part to create an atmosphere of a shared experience at a pivotal point in their lives to ensure that NCS continues to have a positive impact across its main outcome areas.

The NCS Trust currently work primarily with “The Basics” (Bite the Ballot) & “Rock Enrol” (Cabinet Office) to deliver sessions on democratic engagement. Both modules inform young people about how to get on the electoral register, and in many cases young people are registered to vote during these sessions.

The Basics (Bite the Ballot) is embedded in all direct delivery under The Challenge (approximately 35% of the total provision). Analysis from summer 2015 showed that 15% of other programme timetables included either The Basics or Rock Enrol.

Outside this, 30% of the remaining phase 2 timetables make explicit reference to other sessions or activities about democratic engagement. These included workshops with local politicians, sessions with local Youth Parliaments or other structures, challenge sessions on youth manifestos, and youth-led debates.

In addition to this existing activity, it was suggested during previous debates in the House of Lords on the NCS Bill in November 2016 that NCS should include a greater political element and a closing ceremony centred around a celebration of British citizenship.

Government recognises the benefits of citizenship education for young people. Though NCS can achieve some of the same outcomes as citizenship education, such as a sense of community and desire to participate in community matters through volunteering, it is not a citizenship scheme. The NCS primarily exists to achieve its three core purposes: social mobility; social cohesion; and social engagement. As such, the NCS Trust is not funded, resourced, or equipped with the specific expertise to provide instruction in citizenship. Adding this requirement would be burdensome and distract the NCS Trust from achieving its core functions.

Moreover, the purpose of the existing NCS graduation ceremony is for participants to celebrate their personal NCS journeys and everything they have learnt on the programme in the presence of their friends and family. There is a risk that broadening the scope of the graduation ceremony into citizenship could exclude some communities or individuals which would change the shared celebratory feel of communal achievement that is an integral feature of the current ceremonies.

Consecutive independent evaluations show that NCS is good value for money. The 2015 evaluation of the programme by Ipsos Mori showed that for every £1 spent on the summer 2015 programme, up to £1.50 of benefits are realised⁴⁵².

However, DCMS agrees with the recently published NAO and PAC Committee reports on NCS that argue that the value for money of the programme needs to be improved as NCS expands. The NCS Trust and DCMS are therefore working closely together to enhance the value for money of the programme. The NCS Trust will shortly be re-commissioning their provider network when the current set of contracts expire in Autumn 2018. This will be a key opportunity to ensure that the new provider contracts deliver better value for money. NCS Trust is also developing a series of pilots to test new ways of delivering the programme at lower costs and finding new delivery partners. This will inform the re-commissioning process.

What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

DCMS grant funds the British Youth Council (BYC) to encourage young people to engage with democracy and have their views heard on topics that matter to them.

One such initiative is the UK Youth Parliament, a youth organisation made up of approximately 600 democratically elected members (300 Members of Youth Parliament, and 300 Deputy Members) aged between 11 and 18 years. Members are elected to represent the views of young people in their areas both to Government and to national and local youth service providers.

BYC also coordinate Make Your Mark, the largest ballot of youth views in the UK. It gives the UK Youth Parliament its mandate and gets young people aged 11-18 involved in democracy, helping them to learn to engage, debate, listen and negotiate on a variety of topics. In 2016, 978 216 young people voted and the aim is to reach a million votes through the 2017 ballot.

DCMS supports the #iwill Campaign which is coordinated by the charity Step Up to Serve. The campaign aims to achieve a once in a generation step change in attitudes towards social action to ensure social action is celebrated by society and a part of life for as many 10-20 year olds as possible. Over 700 businesses and charities have pledged support for the campaign. The #iwill fund is an integral part of this work and brings together £40m of seed funding from Government and Big Lottery Fund to create a central investment pot. Since its inception there has been £16 million of match funding from organisations such as Pears Foundation, the Duke of Edinburgh and Sport England. All this activity and funding is designed to increase the number of 10-20 year olds taking part in meaningful social action to 60% by 2020.

⁴⁵² The NCS Trust has also commissioned a report on the value for money of the programme which monetises wellbeing

Sport has a huge role to play in encouraging individuals to become active citizens engaged in meaningful volunteering activities. Sport is heavily reliant on its 5.6 million volunteers, both at a grass roots level and through additional support required to run major events.

The Sport and Recreation Alliance estimated there were approximately 150,000 community sports clubs in the UK (2014) and each of these benefits from the support of an average of 24 volunteers. Volunteering is the backbone of sport and sports clubs and those are kept going through a wide range of voluntary activity. It offers a wide-range of technical and nontechnical roles: coaching; refereeing, officiating and stewarding; fundraising; providing transportation; coaching and administration, and multiple opportunities for people to get involved and contribute to the life of their communities.

Volunteering is at the heart of Government's sport and physical activity strategy. Sport England launched their new Volunteering strategy in December 2016 and is investing over £20 million over 4 years (2017 - 21) to support its implementation. This strategy sets out our plans to allow more people to engage in all types of volunteering through sport and physical activity as active citizens.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

This Government's set out its vision for a Shared Society, where nurturing the responsibilities of citizenship is the bedrock of a fairer and stronger Britain that works for everyone. As part of this, there is significant potential to harness more effectively the skill and passion of citizens, communities and businesses to help tackle long-standing challenges this country faces. That's why we are:

- Accelerating the development of projects that complement public services through the Centre for Social Action.
- Devolving power and resources so people can take action on issues they care about.
- Encouraging the role of social action to be considered in the design of public services.
- Encouraging and enabling more people to take part in social action

Social action is about people coming together to help improve their lives and solve problems that are important to their communities. Social action can broadly be defined as practical action in the service of others, which is:

- carried out by individuals or groups of people working together
- not mandated and not for profit
- done for the good of others - individuals, communities and/or society
- bringing about social change and/or value

Social action:

- Increases the resources available to achieve social goals
- Gives public services access to new expertise and knowledge
- Enables broader and better targeted support
- Empowers local groups, enabling local solutions and building resilient communities
- Creates new models for how society can respond to challenges
- Helps reduce demands on public services

The UK is a very generous place, with a long and proud tradition of social action, and levels of volunteering and giving have increased. The Community Life Survey shows that 75% of people give money to charity in the average month; and the Charities Aid Foundation (CAF) World Giving Index shows that the UK is the most generous nation in Europe and one of the most generous countries in the world. Individuals' charitable giving continues to be an important source of income for charities in this country. CAF's research indicates around £10bn was donated to charity in 2016.

This Government is committed to helping to build a compassionate country that works for everyone. So we will continue our work to make giving as easy and compelling as possible; and take steps to help civil society organisations to access the tools, training and moments they need to harness the generosity of the public.

What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Government support for charitable giving

Government has recently taken a range of steps to encourage and enable giving. This includes funding subsidised fundraising training for small, local charities; simplifying the Gift Aid Small Donations Scheme; launching the inaugural Local Charities Day to celebrate their work; matching public donations to local charities to incentivise giving and encouraging innovation by testing the effectiveness of matched crowdfunding to fund art and heritage projects.

In addition, we coordinated a series of Giving Roundtables bringing experts together to consider what more can be done. We heard strong messages about the need to support small charities to develop their fundraising and digital skills; to encourage more collaboration in communities; and the opportunity to unlock more giving from high-net-worth individuals.

Following the Roundtables, we have already announced funding for a further three years of subsidised fundraising training, and we'll be setting out more detail on our other plans to take these themes forward in due course.

The Centre for Social Action

The CSA aims to identify and accelerate the development and spread of high impact social action initiatives that complement public services and improve social outcomes.

On 1 December 2015, then Minister for Civil Society Rob Wilson, publically committed investing '£15 million in a new phase in the Centre for Social Action, taking the ideas that can make a difference, and enabling them to grow and become routine in our public services and communities'.

Examples of CSA work:

- In the first phase (2013-2016), the CSA backed 215 initiatives, many in health and education/social mobility as well as others like jobs, digital and rehabilitation.
- The portfolio includes the Dementia Friends social movement; helping establish, scale and mainstream models like Code Club, City Year, The Access Project and Shared Lives; backing new social action innovations that technology has only recently allowed like GoodSam; helping to shape whole system change in health, care and tutoring.
- Programmes have collectively mobilised more than 2 million people into social action, and leveraged around £30m alongside a Government investment of £36m.

More than 30 programme evaluations have shown that social action transforms lives; helping students that had fallen behind at school to catch up, job seekers to find work, isolated older people to feel less lonely, and more. Examples include:

- Dementia Friends: 1.2m volunteer Dementia Friends created public savings in reduced medical care, paid care and working benefits and valuable impacts in volunteering time.
- End of Life Social Action Fund: funded 7 volunteer befriending services to provide social support to people at end of life and their carers.

Programme evaluation found that increased contact with befriending volunteers demonstrated a significant improvement in quality of life for people in their last year of life. Examples include:

- Into University: reached 18,000 students in 2013-14 with 79% reaching university and £4.20 social value generated for every £1 invested.
- Code Club: expected to scale to nearly 30% of English primary schools by 2018 at a cost of just £9 per pupil per year.

Enabling Social Action

In February 2017 OCS and New Economics Foundation (NEF) launched the Enabling Social Action Tool which provides resources, ideas and case studies on how to embed social action into existing public services, develop new programmes and create the conditions for social action, including community action.

Community Action

The Prime Minister Theresa May's speech on shared society called on Government to step up and, rather than allow people to just get by on their own, be part of the solution by supporting people to have their voices heard across every layer of society. This is exactly what community action policy has been doing and will continue to do. “We are a country built on the bonds of family, community and citizenship and there is no greater example of the strength of those bonds than our great movement of charities and social enterprises”.

Community action is about people taking action on the issues that matter to them to help improve their own lives. The following are examples of our key programmes and the impact they have had.

The Community Organisers programme trained individuals to work in communities and act as local leaders, bringing people together to take action on the things they all care about. The original Community Organisers programme (2011-2015) listened to over 150,000 residents, worked in over 400 neighbourhoods and supported over 2000⁴⁵³ community projects. We know that where community organisers are at work, people have a stronger sense of belonging to their neighbourhood, they feel more valued, they become more likely to team up and improve their area. Following the success of this programme, we have committed to expanding the number of Community Organisers recruited to 10,000 by March 2020. The programme will train organisers through local hubs, the National Citizens Service, Public sector, VSO and local partnerships.

In Community Organiser areas, communities have benefited from projects and listenings; 75% of organisers and 72% of employers think that it is more common that people form new groups around shared ideas and projects; 70% of organisers and 64% of employers think that it is more common that people have the skills to organise activities and projects for themselves and others in the neighbourhood. Analysis by TNS-BRMB found that individuals living in organiser areas were significantly more likely to agree that local people pull together to improve the neighbourhood (51% and 39% respectively), reported a stronger sense of belonging to their neighbourhoods; and were more likely to organise a paper petition (44% and 37% respectively) or organise a group (9% compared with 4%).

The Community First Neighbourhood Match Fund (2011-2015) was a small grants programme targeting deprived wards. Local people set funding priorities for their own communities and around 600 volunteer panels made 27.2 million in funding recommendations to nearly 18 000 projects. Communities have matched this to the tune of over £93m, including £15.3m in cash and 5.5m volunteering hours. For every £1 of government money, people matched with the equivalent of £3.40 of in kind support, exceeding expectations three fold.

⁴⁵³ Evaluation of the Community Organisers Programme, P59

As a result of Community First, 72% said that it is more common that people are taking part in local groups, events and activities. Local groups in these areas - traditionally seen as 'cold spots' by funders - have also been strengthened. 86% of projects funded through Community First said that their experience had encouraged them to apply for funding from other sources; the proportion of project leads who felt highly confident they could organise local activity to address local needs increased from 48% to 67%.

Cities of Service (Sept 2014 - Oct 2015) worked with local authorities to encourage people to take action around key local strategic issues. Seven local authorities grew volunteer teams to tackle issues from loneliness amongst older people, to food poverty. Over 10,000 volunteers were engaged across the 7 Cities, reaching over 18,500 beneficiaries.

Initiatives consist of a mixture of low-intensity or one-off activity, like 'Love Where You Live' in Barnsley and 'Pride in Your Community' in Telford, to more intense one-to-one support such as 'Circles of Support' offering befriending and activities with older people in Swindon. In Barnsley, 945 volunteers spent 2,249 hours improving their local environment, including removing 13 tonnes of rubbish from the Trans Pennine Way.

Volunteering in Health & Social Care

In health and care, we are scaling projects that harness the assets of communities to provide support to statutory services and draw on the passion and commitment of volunteers to offer support beyond the capacity of the public sector.

NHS England STP & Social Action: Government has been working with NHS England on better embedding social action & volunteering in health and social care through membership of their People and Communities Board.

NHS England have asked its 44 NHS Footprint areas to work with local health and social care leaders, including the Voluntary and Community Service Enterprise sector to prepare what are known as local Sustainability and Transformation Plans (STPs). NHS England as part of its Five Year Forward View strategy have committed to people and communities being at the heart of this work. NHS England has also agreed that social action and volunteering is a key enabler and should be included in each STP. The 44 STP areas cover every part of England, each STP will set out how best to spend funding, support growth and transform care in the face of rising demand and more complex patient needs.

Q-Volunteering

Through a new three year programme called Q-Volunteering, the Office for Civil Society and the programme partners (NHS England, the Department of Health, Healthwatch England, the NHS Confederation, NHS Horizons and Care England) are working with local NHS ambulance-led partnerships, to develop a social action-based system transformation and leadership programme in health and care. Locally led ambulance services will recruit and train volunteers to promote self-care and patient activation, in order to support better outcomes for patients, carers and help moderate pressure on local health and care.

Encouraging civic engagement more broadly

The Localism Act 2011 gave new rights to individuals and communities in England, making it easier for them to have a say in developments at a local level and achieve their ambitions for the place where they live. These included the Right to Bid, Right to Challenge and Neighbourhood Planning. The Government has funded the establishment of the ‘My Community’ website <https://mycommunity.org.uk/>, which has tools and resources to support communities take action to shape their local area.

Every town, village or neighbourhood is home to buildings or amenities that play a vital role in local life, including community centres, libraries, swimming pools, village shops, markets or pubs, which if closed or sold into private use, would be a real loss to the community. Under the Right to Bid, local authorities are required to maintain a list of assets of community value which have been nominated by the local community. When listed assets come up for sale or change of ownership, the Act then gives community groups the time to develop a bid and raise the money to bid to buy the asset when it comes on the open market, helping local communities keep much-loved sites in public use and part of local life.

Over 4,000 Assets of Community Value have been listed in England and we estimate that our programmes alongside the Community Right to Bid have helped around 150 assets to be transferred into community ownership since 2012. We have provided funding to support communities to exercise these rights, including £1.85 million to help community groups to take on the ownership of their local pub alongside £1.77 million from the organisation Power to Change. We are also providing £3.25m over the next two years through the Communities Fund programme to support a mix of local authority and community-groups to deliver solutions to entrenched social issues such as domestic violence and long term unemployment.

The Government believes that innovation in public services can offer greater value for taxpayers’ money and better results for local communities. The best councils are constantly on the look out for new and better ways to design and deliver services. Many recognise the potential of social enterprises and community groups to provide high-quality services at good value, and deliver services with and through them.

In some places, however, voluntary and community groups who have bright ideas find that they do not get a proper hearing. Under the Right to Challenge, these groups, parish councils and local authority employees have the right to express an interest in taking over the running of a local authority service. The local authority must consider and respond to this challenge; and where it accepts it, run a procurement exercise for the service in which the challenging organisation can bid. This makes it easier for local groups with good ideas to put them forward and drive improvement in local services. For example, community enterprise Halifax Opportunities Trust, used the Right to Challenge to bid for the contract to manage a large proportion of Calderdale Council’s Children Centres. The Halifax Opportunities Trust won the tender, securing contracts for services worth over £8m.

Through the Neighbourhood Planning process, communities can for the first time produce plans that have real statutory weight in the planning system, enabling people to choose where they want new homes, shops and offices to be built, have their say on what those new buildings should look like and what infrastructure should be provided, and grant planning permission for the new development they want to see go ahead. As a result, over 2,200 groups have started the neighbourhood planning process since 2012, in areas that cover nearly 13 million people across England, and over 390 successful neighbourhood planning referendums have taken place, with an average 'yes' vote of 89%, on an average turnout of 33%. Locality, a national network of community-led organisations, is delivering the Government's neighbourhood planning support programme, for which DCLG have made available £22.5 million for 2015-18 to provide grants, technical support, advice and the MyCommunity website. In addition, local authorities are funded to fulfil their legal duty to support organisations producing a neighbourhood plan or neighbourhood development order. Funding for local authorities has been available since October 2012.

Many of the projects supported by DCLG's integration programme have the aim of encouraging participation in society and promoting social action to build community cohesion and reduce social exclusion. This includes £9.7 million since 2011 for the Near Neighbours programme which brings together people from different faiths and no faith to improve their neighbourhoods and create links and build networks and skills in some of our most multicultural (and deprived) inner city areas. Between 2014 and March 2017 this programme supported around 1,400 local events and small community projects that brought different faith and ethnic groups together reaching over 209,000 people.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

The Government defines British values as including regard for the rule of law, participation in and acceptance of democracy, equality, individual liberty, free speech and mutual respect, tolerance and understanding of different faiths and beliefs. These values, which were reiterated in the Government's manifesto, are supported by the overwhelming majority of British people, and are sustained by our most important local and national institutions.

This Government is committed to creating a fair society in which all people, of whatever ethnic origin or background are valued, are able to participate fully and realise their own potential. The Prime Minister has spoken of the need to ensure that our society works for everyone. We are currently considering the findings of Dame Louise Casey's independent review into how to boost opportunity and integration in isolated communities published on 5 December and we have also launched an audit to look into racial disparities in our public services.

The UK is an open and diverse country where people from all parts of society can be successful. This is a key part of the UK's values and will not change.

Extremism poses a threat to our shared values. The Government defines extremism as the vocal or active opposition to our fundamental values, including the rule of law, individual liberty and the mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs. If left unchallenged, those values that bind our society together start to fall apart. Women's rights are eroded, hatred, intolerance and bigotry become normalised, minorities are targeted and communities become separated from the mainstream. The Government therefore has a responsibility to protect the public from all of the harms – in addition to terrorism – which extremists pose to our society. We want to defeat all forms of extremism, wherever it occurs.

The Government is taking a comprehensive approach through our four-year Counter Extremism Strategy (published in October 2015). The strategy addresses extremism in all its forms, including Islamist and far/ extreme right extremism.

The strategy sets out a range of action, including Government support for the public sector and civil society to confront extremist narratives that run contrary to our shared values; our commitment to working with everyone who is committed to standing against extremism in their communities; our determination to disrupt the most harmful extremists, including prosecuting those who break the law; and supporting efforts to improve community cohesion.

We have made significant progress in defending our shared values against extremism in recent years. As part of the Counter-Extremism Strategy Government has:

- Improved our understanding of extremism through the work of the Extremism Analysis Unit - which has also helped disrupt extremist activity.
- Awarded funding and support for 53 civil society groups to tackle extremism via our £63m 'Building a Stronger Britain Together' programme. We intend to expand our network to over 100 groups in the coming months.
- Grown our network of Community Coordinators embedded in Local Authorities, to develop knowledge of extremism locally and identify and support groups challenging extremism. Twenty-seven are in post to date and 42 Local Authorities have agreed to work with us overall.
- Published the main findings from the review into Islamist extremist funding and what Government is doing in response⁴⁵⁴.

⁴⁵⁴ Written Ministerial Statement by Amber Rudd 12 July
<http://www.parliament.uk/business/publications/written-questions-answers-statements/written-statements/?page=1&max=20&questiontype=AllQuestions&house=commons&use-dates=True&answered-from=2017-07-03&answered-to=2017-07-14&dept=1>

- Published a new Hate Crime Action Plan (in July 2016). Key achievements include launching funding schemes for protective security measures for places of worship and community-led projects to tackle hate crime, and measures to increase reporting of hate crime and support victims.
- Continued to act to prevent extremism from gaining a foothold in our schools, including through strengthening regulations to safeguard children missing from education (introduced in September 2016).
- Concluded independent reviews of integration and of Islamist extremism in prisons. In direct response to the latter’s recommendations, Government has established a joint (OSCT-HMPPS) unit to take work forward, including introducing prison separation units in to manage a small number of the highest risk prisoners away from the general prison population.
- Launched an independent review into the application of Sharia law. The Chair will submit her final report later this year.
- Introduced new powers - via the Digital Economy Act 2017 – to enable Ofcom to act quickly against community radio stations and Internet Protocol TV channels when they breach Ofcom’s content standards. We have also revised the UK’s Broadcasting Code to make clear that hate speech and derogatory content is not permitted.
- Excluded ten individuals from the UK on the grounds of unacceptable extremist behaviour.

However, Government recognises that there is still too much tolerance of extremism in our country and we need to become far more robust in identifying it and stamping it out. We will therefore be establishing a new Commission for Countering Extremism. The Commission will advise the Government on how best to tackle extremism and will support the public sector and our communities to promote and defend our shared values and confront extremism wherever it exists.

The Government will continue to do everything it can to tackle extremism – but we know we can only defeat it through working in partnership with local communities. We will continue to stand with everyone who shares our values to keep our multi-faith, multi-society society one of the most successful in the world.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Britain is on the whole well-integrated, but more needs to be done to make sure nobody is excluded, or left behind, and that we are prepared to take strong action where people refuse to integrate and fail to embrace the shared values that make Britain great.

Dame Louise Casey's review into how to boost opportunity and integration in isolated communities considers a number of issues, including population change; patterns of residential and school segregation; public attitudes and values; social and economic exclusion; and the equality impacts of cultural and religious practices. It concludes with a series of recommendations to Government for promoting integration. Dame Louise also considered the role of leadership and recommended that the Government should work with the Committee for Standards in Public Life to ensure that British values are enshrined in the principles of public life.

The Government's manifesto has committed this administration to help people in more isolated communities to engage with the wider world, help women in particular into the workplace, and teach more people to speak English.

As mentioned in the answer to question 1, the Department for Communities and Local Government is reviewing the available evidence on the main causes of poor integration, and in the coming months will bring forward plans for tackling these issues through a new integration strategy.

Other work is in hand across Government to address the inequalities faced by particular groups, including:

- A Race Disparity Audit to at look the inequality in outcomes experienced by people of different backgrounds in every area of our public services from health to education, childcare to welfare, employment, skills and criminal justice. The first tranche of data will be published in autumn 2017.
- Alongside the Industrial Strategy work on developing local industrial strategies, a Civic Renewal approach will aim to support struggling areas, whose economies have not recovered from the impact of deindustrialisation, through regeneration and urban renewal. The Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy is also developing proposals that will enable greater labour market access and participation for under-represented groups (including women and the disabled), ensuring that they can boost their earning power.
- Expanding the existing DfE Opportunity Areas across England, targeting social mobility 'coldspots' through education. Increased funding of £72 million is available to support local education providers and communities to address the biggest challenges in the twelve areas.

The Government aims to drive social mobility by breaking the link between a person's background and where they get to in life. In education, we have protected the pupil premium, worth nearly £2.5 billion this year, so that schools receive funding to support pupils from disadvantaged backgrounds. The Department for Education's gap index shows that the attainment gap between disadvantage pupils and their peers has narrowed by 9.3 per cent at key stage 2 and 7.0 per cent at key stage 4 since the pupil premium was introduced in 2011. This means better prospects for a more prosperous life as an adult.

Education alone will not be enough to transform social mobility. The best employers are already taking important steps, including engaging and supporting young people in schools, introducing fairer recruitment practices, removing barriers, opening up alternative routes to entry, and monitoring progress – but there is more to do to ensure that background is not a barrier to a good career.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

The Government believes that through the promotion of fundamental British values and equality of opportunity, we create the conditions for people to live and work together, to bridge boundaries between communities and to play a full role in society. When this is underpinned both by opportunities to succeed, and a strong sense of personal and social responsibility to the society which has made success possible, the result is a strong society.

Government supports national and local initiatives which aim to bring communities together around shared values, such as The Great Get Together in June 2017 to mark the first anniversary of Jo Cox’s death and reinforce her mantra that “we have more in common than that which divides us”, and The Big Iftar taking place annually since 2012 where Muslims open their doors to invite the wider community to break their fast with them during Ramadan. DCLG funds the Inter Faith Network which organises Inter Faith Week to encourage people from different faiths to participate in local activities together – Inter Faith Week 2016 saw over 600 events take place across the UK.

DCLG is also funding the Joseph Interfaith Foundation to provide culturally sensitive training for young refugees from Syria, Afghanistan, Iraq and Somalia to enable them to integrate into the UK society, including by building their understanding of respect for the rule of Law, parliamentary democracy and the concept of female equality as part of women’s Human Rights.

Schools play a vital role in promoting integration and are all required to promote community cohesion and fundamental British values. The teaching of religious beliefs and cultures helps in the development of an understanding and respect for different faiths and communities. Good quality religious education can develop children’s knowledge of the values and traditions of Britain and other countries, and foster understanding among different faiths and cultures. That is why religious education remains compulsory for all state funded schools, including academies and free schools, at all key stages.

Schools without a religious designation should have a curriculum for religious education that reflects that the religious traditions in Great Britain are in the main Christian, whilst taking into account the teaching and practices of the other principal religions represented in Great Britain. Faith schools also make a strong contribution in this area and there are many excellent examples of Church and faith schools providing opportunities for their pupils to mix with children of different faiths and backgrounds. DfE and DCLG are working closely to ensure that schools play a key role in supporting with Government's wider integration agenda. DfE will continue to work closely with church and other faith schools to promote and support integration and community cohesion. We will set out further details of our approach in this area and in relation to the 50% cap on faith admissions in faith free schools in due course.

Dame Louise Casey's review explored diversity and integration in schools and the Government is currently preparing an integration strategy that will set out how we address these important issues.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

The Government recognises the importance of English proficiency to enable people to participate fully in society. This is why we are supporting English learning at all levels and across all age groups.

With regards to children and young people, the Government's ongoing school reforms focus on creating a school-led, self-improving system in which every child and young person has opportunity to achieve their full potential, regardless of ethnicity, gender or background. Under current school funding arrangements, local authorities may allocate a proportion of their funding to schools based on the number of pupils in each school for whom English is an additional language (EAL), and who have been in the school system for a maximum of three years. In 2016-17, 136 local authorities used the EAL factor in their local funding formulae, spending £282 million in total. Schools may also draw on their pupil premium funding to support those EAL pupils who are classed as disadvantaged.

Some pupils in the overall EAL group will have recently arrived in England from overseas – so mobility is another relevant factor that local authorities can currently use in their funding formulae. It provides additional funding to schools that had at least 10% of their pupils not starting at their school in August/September (and January for Reception pupils) over the previous three years. 66 local authorities used this factor in 2015-16, allocating a total of £24m through it.

Earlier this year, the Government's second consultation on introducing a national funding formula for schools proposed that an EAL factor should form part of the new formula. We will be announcing our plans for implementing the national funding formula in due course.

The Department for Education's school census now requires maintained schools in England to report annually on the written and spoken English language proficiency of their individual EAL pupils. This will help schools in planning their support provision for their EAL pupils and will also inform future policy on supporting EAL pupils.

To support adult learners the Government provides funding through the Adult Education Budget (AEB) for education providers to offer a range of approved English courses, depending on the needs in their local areas.

Government funding of English for Speakers of Other Languages (EOL) training seeks to:

- enable unemployed people on benefits to get the skills they need to get into and stay in work;
- support the integration of long-standing migrant communities and particularly those individuals most at risk of isolation from services and wider society; and
- support refugees, especially Syrians to settle in the UK.

English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) courses are fully-funded for jobseekers on work-related benefits⁴⁵⁵ and can be made freely available to unemployed learners on other benefits at the discretion of the provider. All other learners are co-funded at an assumed rate, with the Government contributing 50% of the cost. In 2015/16, 110,600 adults in England received full or partial funding to participate in an ESOL course.

Adults in England also benefit from a legal entitlement to fully-funded English courses up to Level 2 (GCSE A*-C (9-4) or equivalent). This means anyone who has not completed their GCSE or equivalent in English language has access to a range of free courses to improve their skills. Those adults whose first language is not English may choose to pursue a regular English qualification, for example a Functional Skills or GCSE qualification, instead of, in addition to, or after completing an ESOL course. Adults are also able to access funded unaccredited community courses, including in English language. In 2015/16 583,600 adults in England received funding to participate in English courses. All adults benefitting from AEB-funded provision have to meet the general eligibility criteria, including in most cases a three-year residency requirement⁴⁵⁶. This reflects the Government's expectation that those newly arrived in England who have chosen to settle here, for example to improve their employment prospects, invest their own time and resources into learning English. Adults who are granted refugee or humanitarian protection status by the Home Office are eligible for the same skills funding as any other English resident and are not subject to the normal three year qualifying period.

AEB funding is allocated to education providers who have the flexibility to decide their level of ESOL and English language provision based on local needs. Therefore the amount of funding spent on ESOL and regular English provision varies from year to year. In 2015/16 just under £100m of the Adult Education Budget was spent on ESOL provision.

The Government also provides targeted English language training to support integration. From November 2013 to March 2016, DCLG's £8m Community-Based English Language programme supported 39,800 adults with the lowest levels of English who had not previously engaged with mainstream provision. Around 80% of participants were women, with over half from Bangladeshi, Pakistani and Somalian ethnic groups, who 2011 Census data shows have the lowest levels of English.

On 18 January 2016, the previous Prime Minister announced a new English language offer worth £20 million over this Parliament. As a first step in rolling out the new programme, DCLG committed £3.7 million in 2016/17 to enable providers who delivered the Community-Based English Language programme to provide new tuition to nearly 14,000 learners by March 2017.

The Casey review published in December 2016 found that English Language was a common denominator and a strong enabler of integration. The report found that poor English Language skills, and thereby poor labour market outcomes, led to a strong correlation of increased segregation among Pakistani and Bangladeshi ethnic households in most deprived areas, suggesting a negative cycle that will not improve without a concerted and targeted effort. DCLG are developing proposals to address this as part of an Integration strategy.

To avoid a gap in provision Ministers agreed a further £4.6m funding to extend our existing community based English language provision for another year to reach over 19,600 new learners by March 2018.

The Government has also pledged up to £10m over 5 years for ESOL provision specifically for those refugees fleeing the Syrian conflict who have come to the UK under the Vulnerable Persons Resettlement Programme. This funding will be available to Local Authorities to which these refugees are allocated as part of the resettlement programme and will enable them to access language tuition and integrate into local communities.

In addition, the £140m Controlling Migration Fund includes £100m to help ease local pressure on services in areas strongly affected by migration. This could include funding for English language support and other cohesion activity. To date £2.9m has been awarded to local authorities to support additional English Language tuition for migrants, and £3m for cohesion.

British citizenship is a privilege, not a right. We expect those wishing to settle here to demonstrate they are ready and able to integrate into society. We have made the acquisition of citizenship more significant. All applicants for naturalisation are required to pass both the new, revised Life in the UK test and have the relevant English language speaking and listening qualification. We also view the citizenship ceremony as an important part of the process of becoming a British citizen. It allows a successful applicant to commit their loyalty to their new country, often in front of family and friends

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

In addition to the initiatives referred to in the responses to the above questions, some further examples are set out below.

The London 2012 Olympics and Paralympics showcased British Citizenship at its finest. One of the major contributing factors to the success of the London 2012 Games was the role played by volunteers such as LOCOG's Games Makers and GLA's London Ambassadors. There was a strong appetite from the public to volunteer - for the 70,000 Games Maker positions, over 250,000 applications were received and 40% of Games Makers were new to volunteering.

On the back of this renewed ardour for volunteering in sports, the legacy programme 'Join In' was established to continue to promote sports volunteering. At the heart of Join In is a network of Local Leader volunteers, many of whom are former Games Makers, who help coordinate and engage people in volunteering activities around the country. As well as sharing local volunteering opportunities, Join In also promotes opportunities to volunteer at some of the biggest sporting events in the world, like the Tour de France and Commonwealth Games.

DCLG's Near Neighbours programme (referred to in response to question 7) includes the Catalyst young leaders programme which develops the skills and experience of 18-30 year olds so they can play their part in building a strong civil society – over 300 young people have passed through the programme since 2011.

The Government is actively supporting those working to protect their communities from extremism and promote shared values via our £63m 'Building a Stronger Britain Together' (BSBT) programme of support for community groups and strategic communications campaigns. Launched in 2016, BSBT encompasses a network of community co-ordinators, embedded in priority local authorities; funding and practical communications support to groups working to challenge and build resilience to extremism locally; and a programme of targeted campaigns to counter extremists' narrative and promote shared values.

BSBT is currently funding and supporting 53 civil society groups to tackle extremism and we are committed to supporting over 100 groups in the coming months.

Twenty-seven community coordinators are currently in post and we expect to have 42 embedded in local authorities across the UK by the autumn. Strategic communications campaigns underway this financial year include Britain Helps, which raises awareness of British aid in conflict zones and facilitates a dialogue with British Muslims on foreign policy; and Safer Giving, which seeks to disrupt extremist organisations from receiving charitable funding.

6. How many people do we think are at risk of extremism in this country? (HO)

National statistics on the numbers of people referred to Prevent and receiving support through Channel are not routinely published. However, since 2012, over 1000 people have been supported through the voluntary confidential Channel programme.

The Government defines extremism as: 'the vocal or active opposition to our fundamental values, including the rule of law, individual liberty and the mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs. We also regard calls for the death of members of our armed forces as extremist.' Our Counter-Extremism Strategy sets out the harm that extremism can cause beyond terrorism, including the justification of violence, promotion of hatred and division, rejecting the democratic system, and harmful and illegal cultural practices. The strategy sets out a programme of work designed to defeat extremism at source wherever it exists, support those vulnerable to extremist narratives and safeguard our communities from the harm that these narratives can cause.

7. Data on immigrants voting / taking part in elections (CO)

Cabinet Office has confirmed that they do not have a way of checking the number of immigrants voting. A joint pilot trialling a Home Office automated service for checking people's immigration status returned too many false positives for it to be used with electoral registration.

Diversity in the UK Youth Parliament and National Citizen Service

UK Youth Parliament:

The UK Youth Parliament is made up of 600 elected young people (300 Members of Youth Parliament, and 300 Deputy Members) from across the UK aged 11-18. In 2016:

- 52% were female
- 33% were from a BAME background
- 12% reported a disability
- 9% were eligible for free school meals

The Government is committed to ensuring that as many young people as possible are given the chance to have their voices heard. The strength of UK Youth Parliament is not in the annual debate, but in the hundreds of thousands of young people involved in the Make Your Mark campaign in the lead up to the House of Commons vote, from all parts of the country, and from a variety of different backgrounds. Furthermore, every individual youth parliament member brings with them not just their own voice, but also that of the thousands of young people that voted to elect them as a representative of their constituency.

National Citizen Service (NCS)

In summer 2016:

- 17% NCS participants were eligible for free school meals (vs. 8% of the population).
- 32% NCS participants were from BAME backgrounds (vs. 22.5% of the population).
- 5% NCS participants reported a special education need (vs. 2% of the Year 11 population).

NCS costs a maximum of £50, and bursaries are available for those who require financial assistance.

NCS Unit Costs

To clarify the figure used at the hearing of an approximate NCS unit cost of £2,000 per participant, please see below a breakdown of the costs per NCS place for 2014 to 2016:

Year	Average Cost per Participant
2014	£1826
2015	£1825

2016	£1780
------	-------

These costs are calculated by dividing the all in costs of NCS delivery by the total number of NCS participants. The 2016 actual differs from the figure quoted in the NAO report as it has been informed by the most recent cost data from the NCS Trust's finalised end of year report.

As the NCS Trust transitions to a Royal Charter Body and refreshes its provider contracts, reducing the unit cost of the programme will continue to be a priority for DCMS and the NCS Trust.

NCS Evaluations

DCMS (and formerly the Cabinet Office when the responsibility for NCS sat in the Cabinet Office) commission yearly independent evaluations on NCS. These evaluations can be found on the NCS Trust website. The publication list also includes one year and two year on studies for the 2013 cohort of NCS participants.

The most recent evaluation of the 2016 programme is being undertaken by Kantar Public in partnership with London Economics, and is scheduled to be published later this year.

As per the Public Accounts Committee's report recommendation, we are also exploring how the measure the long term outcomes of the programme beyond the one / two year on studies. To this end, DCMS has appointed a provider to carry out a feasibility study to determine how long term outcomes could be best reviewed. This study is set to yield findings by February 2018.

DCLG

Near Neighbours Programme

The Near Neighbours programme, which started in 2011, brings together people from different faiths and no faith to improve their neighbourhoods and create links and build networks and skills in some of our most multicultural (and deprived) inner city areas. The programme includes a small grants fund which offers grants of between £250 and £5,000 to community projects that bring together people from different faith and ethnic groups to do projects that improve their communities. The programme has also been delivering local community leader training and capacity building through partner inter-faith organisations.

The programme, initially operated in East London, Birmingham, Leicester, Bradford, Burnley and Oldham. In 2014 it expanded into West London, the Black Country, Luton, Nottingham, Leeds, Rochdale and Bury, and this year it was extended again into Blackburn and Manchester.

Between 2014 and March 2017 Near Neighbours supported around 1,400 local events and small community projects that brought different faith and ethnic groups together, reaching over 209,000 people. The programme also includes the Catalyst young leaders programme which develops the skills and experience of 18-30 year olds so they can play their part in building a strong civil society – over 300 young people have passed through the programme since 2011. During this year the programme will pilot “difficult conversations” sessions in two areas (Luton and the Black Country), to give communities space to discuss difficult community issues. More information about the programme is available at <https://www.cuf.org.uk/near-neighbours>

Community-Based English Language Programme

In 2013 DCLG ran an English Language Competition to grant fund new providers who could develop and deliver innovative community-based English language tuition to isolated adults with the lowest levels of English who were unlikely to access tuition in more formal settings such as Further Education colleges. In November 2013, DCLG awarded £6m across 6 projects with very different models with the aim of supporting 24,000 learners by March 2015. We expanded delivery by allocating an additional £2m to the projects to reach an additional 9,400 learners (bringing the total target to 33,400) by the end of the 2015/16 financial year. By March 2016 they had exceeded this target by reaching a total of over 39,800 people.

In January 2016, the previous Prime Minister announced a new English language offer worth £20 million over this Parliament to help at least 40,000 women in the most isolated communities in England get the training they need. The new offer would be informed by the Casey Review and learning from DCLG’s existing programme.

As a first step in rolling out the new tuition (pending the findings of the Casey Review) DCLG invested £3.7 million last year for existing providers to support 12,000 people by March 2017 – they exceeded this target reaching nearly 14,000 new learners.

Following publication of the Casey Review in December 2016, DCLG are developing options for new English Language provision as part of an Integration strategy. To avoid a gap in provision Ministers agreed a further £4.6m funding to five of our existing community based English language projects for another year to reach over 19,600 new learners by March 2018.

DCMS

National Citizen Service (NCS)

The NCS Trust and DCMS are committed to taking an innovative approach to growing the National Citizen Service.

The NCS Trust recently established an innovation unit to run a series of pilots over the next two years to test new ways of delivering the programme through new and existing partners in five key areas:

- Growth
- Reach and inclusion
- Impact
- Quality
- Value for money

If successful, learning from these pilots will be incorporated into elements of future programme delivery and will inform the NCS Trust's phased re-commissioning of their provider network that will start in 2018. This approach builds on the Autumn 2016 Pathfinders where 18 organisations outside the established NCS network were appointed to run pilot programmes to test different ways of recruiting to and delivering the programme.

Addressing Questions 1, 5 and 7:

- What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century?
- What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?
- How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

1. Summary

‘The primary aim of the learning society is to help people learn to love learning – a culture of learning – and regard it as their civic responsibility to continue to learn’ (Jarvis, 2008, p. 215).

1.1 For most of their history, British universities have had a strong local civic role, educating the adult public in their communities. This had a highly beneficial effect on democracy and citizenship. Since the 1980s, however, this role has declined, as higher education has increasingly focussed on economic objectives and on young people of school leaving age.

1.2 This paper argues we should recapture and reimagine universities as vital centres of local citizenship and civic activity. A key element will be to strengthen their role in the informal education of adults in their communities. To achieve this, universities must be encouraged to devote resources to public educational activities, and to ensure these are fairly allocated among different social groups and across people’s entire lifespans.

2. Background

2.1 During the 19th and 20th centuries, universities in England were seen as having a profound role to play in civic life. This can be seen particularly in the development of civic universities (Birmingham, Manchester, etc.) and the creation of polytechnics and colleges of technology, in the university “extension” movement, and in extra-mural adult education through most of the 20th century. This civic life included embeddedness in local regional economies in the broader European technical tradition. Since the 1990s, however, although higher education has expanded massively, taking in a far larger proportion of UK school-leavers, teaching many students from overseas, and even developing campuses abroad, universities’ wider role in strengthening citizenship and civic engagement in their own localities has much diminished.

John Holford (Robert Peers Professor of Adult Education, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Sharon Clancy (Senior Research Fellow, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Jeannie Holstein (Assistant Professor in Strategic and Public Se

2.2 There are several reasons for this. For example:

- the intensifying focus of public educational policy since the 1980s on economic and narrowly-defined vocational outcomes and on young people (some “lifelong learning” rhetoric notwithstanding);
- the removal of polytechnics from local control and their rebranding as universities, diminishing their distinct regional industrial and educational mission;
- universities’ (especially older “civic” universities’) becoming internationally recognised “brands” (through the globalisation of higher education), and incentivised to recruit greater numbers of students from overseas;
- the trend to “accountability” and the growth of an “audit culture”, which tend to emphasise centrally-set targets, focus on “what works”, and discourage local initiative and experimentation;
- the well-known difficulties faced in developing quantifiable indicators for “measuring” citizenship and forms of civic engagement, and their impact (Holford 2008);
- the narrowing of universities’ regional responsibilities to distinct forms of economic aim, for example as part of global innovation ecosystems;
- the “academic drift” of the former polytechnics away from their distinct regional and technical education missions;
- the recent reimagining of social inclusion in terms of social mobility and individual “success”, resulting in an emphasis on using higher education to move young people out of their communities of origin;
- The emphasis on ‘corporate social responsibility’ within universities, as opposed to concepts of ‘public’, ‘civic’ or ‘community’ engagement in which we, ‘the public’, are recognised as being part of many different communities and active producers of knowledge.

3. Universities as Integrative Civic Spaces

3.1 We argue that public policy should encourage and enable universities to develop stronger forms of democratic partnership with their local communities through genuine community and civic engagement. Universities can be profoundly important contributors to their local civic environments and to such debates. This is partly because of their history and “embeddedness”: unlike many businesses, they tend to “stay put” in their locality. They can also be ‘anchor institutions’ in the sense of integrative civic spaces which have a particular engagement with their surrounding community (Axelroth and Dubb, 2010).

4. Building Trust in Community/University Relationships

4.1 Good community and civic engagement are long-term, ongoing and cumulative in nature, enabling relationships and trust to build and strengthen over time. Trust building is particularly important among disenfranchised and disadvantaged communities. Deep knowledge of the community and its locality is essential. Historically, such intensive forms of engagement have fostered a heightened sense of responsibility in people for their own community/ies, helped engender civic sensitivity and involvement in democratic processes,

John Holford (Robert Peers Professor of Adult Education, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Sharon Clancy (Senior Research Fellow, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Jeannie Holstein (Assistant Professor in Strategic and Public Se and increased likelihood of voting. This, in turn, fosters citizens who have a more equal chance of participating in society:

By participating in elections and other civic engagement citizens are able to influence politics; the involvement of all citizens in democratic processes and the extent to which they are enabled to be involved are crucial for ensuring that all citizens have an equal chance of participation and political integration (Salter et al, 2017, p. 152).

4.2 Civil society is a complex, shifting and uncompromising space. Little emphasises this more than post-Brexit Britain, where divisions are very evident. ‘Wicked’ issues can seem utterly intractable. These include the schisms of poverty and financial inequality; health and an ageing population, with more people living with disabilities and mental health issues; ecological change; and ever-faster technological innovation.

4.3 Community-university engagement is by necessity complex and requires a long-term commitment. Universities have a role in helping us work out what we want community and ‘good citizenship’ to mean. Does our ‘community’ encompass where we live, our shared interests and passions, our allegiances and affiliations? What is ‘good citizenship’? What gives us the range of skills, attitudes and activities which enable us to become “agents of positive social change for a more democratic world” (Jacoby, 2009, p.9).

4.4 The late Sir David Watson, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Brighton and Principal of Green Templeton College, Oxford, called for a re-imagining of universities’ social role: there should be “dialogue across the boundary between the University and its community which is open-ended, fluid and experimental” (Watson 2003, p. 16), a “thoughtful, argumentative interaction with the non-university world” (Watson, 2007, p. 3), bringing community members, community/voluntary sector practitioners and university teachers and researchers together as citizens and neighbours.

4.5 In fact, however, ‘public engagement’ and ‘knowledge transfer’, as developed recently, have been imagined as the one-directional transmission of knowledge from universities to others - driven by the call for research to be “publicly accountable and impactful” (Mahony and Stephansen, 2016, p. 585). On this approach, the ‘public’ has been little more than “the target of engagement activities” such as marketing and research dissemination (ibid, p. 590). Without a genuine exchange of knowledge, involving hard-won trust between universities and their local citizens and communities, the ‘public’ become recipients only.

4.6 Universities’ engagement with civil society has also been damaged by the crisis in the voluntary sector. Faced with a £2.3 billion fall in income from government contracts and grants (NCVO, 2015, cited in Hemmings, 2017, p. 41), the voluntary sector’s capacity to act in an ambassadorial or campaigning vein with universities, to share community knowledge and expertise and to offer a voice to the most marginalised in society, has been severely curtailed.

5. Universities and Part-time Mature Students

5.1 Many universities (especially those in the Russell Group) do not routinely draw students from their local area. At the same time, participation in higher education, as measured by socio-economic disadvantage, is strongly unequal. A particular problem is the

John Holford (Robert Peers Professor of Adult Education, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Sharon Clancy (Senior Research Fellow, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Jeannie Holstein (Assistant Professor in Strategic and Public Se extra barriers mature learners have in attending university (intensified recently by the upsurge in fees), and the paucity of widening participation measures aimed at their needs. As a recent report points out, “most current WP outreach activity focuses on interventions in schools, partly because policy makers can appear infatuated with getting 18 year-olds from under-represented groups into selective universities” (Open University, 2017, p.4). Les Ebdon, Director of the Office for Fair Access (OFFA), has argued that the dramatic (61%) decline in the numbers of mature part-time and full-time learners in Higher Education since 2010 – which shows no sign of levelling off – directly conflicts with the drive to greater social mobility.

5.2 For obvious reasons, part-time, mature students are most likely to remain embedded in their localities, to provide continuing leadership in their communities and voluntary networks, and to be able to give “voice” to their excluded and “invisible” friends and neighbours. Universities’ large-scale abandonment of their mission to such people damages democracy and community. Part-time, mature students were central to university and community-based adult education and provided a space for understanding communities and fostering long-term collaboration. Such spaces also offered opportunities for dialogue and debate, enabling people to critically reflect on civil society from their current positions (“beyond the lecture hall”) and generating research based on people’s real and self-identified needs.

5.3 Research shows that adult learning, across the lifespan, strengthens democratic engagement and is “associated with higher levels of interpersonal and social trust, social connections and community engagement” (Schuller, 2017, p. 7). This is particularly true of “liberal” education, aimed at teaching the whole person. It enables us to “see the world as a web of interrelated processes of which we are integral parts, so that all of our choices and actions have consequences for the world around us” (A.N. Whitehead, quoted in Mescle, 2009, p.9). This is very different from universities’ current focus on skills and vocational/employer-based needs. Recent comparative research shows that academic or mixed academic/ vocational education is much more effective than vocational education alone in developing a lasting interest in politics, in voting, and in being civically engaged – effectively, in making ‘good citizens’ (Salter et al 2017). Yet “current policy in England presages the eradication of large swathes of publicly funded adult education” (Tuckett, 2017, p. 230).

6. The Challenge

6.1 Relatively speaking, universities are privileged and resource-rich institutions. They should form a crucial part of our shared associational life. They must again be encouraged and enabled to play a vital role in supporting the development of a knowledge democracy. They need to become places in which we collectively re-shape, re-think and re-frame what civil society should look like.

6.2 To do so, they must be prepared to learn from the communities of which they are part. They have much to learn from patterns and traditions of learning which fall outside the standard and enter the realms of the “all-too invisible” groups in society and the messiness of real community life.

6.3 In recent years, however, incentivized by policy initiatives to “deliver measurable impact” in the short-term, university leaders have generally been unable, or

John Holford (Robert Peers Professor of Adult Education, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Sharon Clancy (Senior Research Fellow, School of Education, University of Nottingham), Jeannie Holstein (Assistant Professor in Strategic and Public Se unwilling, to devote resources and time to building long-term relationships with their local communities.

7. Recommendations

7.1 We call for a serious rethink of the “policy drivers” that have, since the 1990s driven universities away from interacting with their local communities on a deeper basis than one-directional “public engagement” and “knowledge transfer”. This requires not only the removal of damaging policy drivers, but new policies to encourage sustained democratic engagement, at a local, civic level.

7.2 Widening participation needs to embrace people failed by initial schooling, those furthest from the labour market – the part-time and mature learners who are being lost to the system of higher education.

7.3 Post-compulsory education must not be merely “a subsidiary contributor to wider economic policy” (Tuckett, 2017, p. 234). “Lifewide learning” is needed. Its benefits include developing engaged and impassioned communities who feel able to shape the world around them. A “life-wide” learning strategy is needed, “locally shaped”, and able “to respond effectively to adults’ appetite for learning, however unexpected” (Tuckett, 2017, p. 244).

7.4 We recommend in particular the following:

- (a) Universities should be encouraged and incentivised to work with civil society organisations to provide more non-formal training for citizens involved in voluntary organisations. This is a route through which many people find their way back into the formal education system after previous failure.
- (b) Policies should encourage universities to develop and maintain educational relationships with communities in the regions they serve. These should include non-formal courses and informal learning, especially in forms relevant to strengthening citizenship in the community.
- (c) Universities should create opportunities for individuals to learn citizenship skills through practice and participation in activities relevant to them across a range of contexts, and by supporting the development of learning resources. Such learning is likely to foster transferable citizenship skills from one area to another and could create disproportionate benefits.
- (d) Formal education needs to engender a critical dimension, enabling people to challenge and question normative assumptions about who are active citizens, and how they learned to be so. Higher education, can be a way of empowering people to think differently about what they may have learned elsewhere. Models of student engagement which link undergraduate teaching with the potential for developing civil society-based research initiatives, such as the Student as Producer model ⁴⁵⁷ have proved very effective in facilitating university/community engagement.

Holocaust Educational Trust – written evidence (CCE0252)

The Holocaust Educational Trust was founded in 1988 during the passage of the War Crimes Act. Our aim is to raise awareness and understanding in schools and amongst the wider public of the Holocaust and its relevance today. We believe that the Holocaust must have a permanent place in our nation's collective memory.

We have chosen to answer only those questions from the call of evidence which directly relates to our programmes, namely 5 and 12.

5. Education and citizenship

Holocaust education and citizenship

Holocaust education provides an excellent example of the role of education in encouraging young people to engage with citizenship issues. The Holocaust was a defining event in human history whose legacies continue to shape the modern world: its study therefore has contemporary as well as historical relevance. This does not mean that it should be a source of easily packaged homilies for modern society, but rather that as a paradigmatic event it can enable students to engage with challenging questions which encourage them to think critically about the world around them, and their place in it.

Most obviously, the Holocaust represents the most extreme manifestations in history of antisemitism and denial of human rights; much of the current framework of international, and specifically European, human rights law was created in direct response to the Holocaust and Nazi crimes. If practised properly, Holocaust education can therefore encourage students to consider the complex roots of prejudice and the potential consequences of the weakening pluralism, the judicial system and civil society.

In particular, effective Holocaust education requires reflection on the importance of the choices made by the very large numbers of ordinary people, who in varying ways made the Holocaust possible. Exploration of the means by which Jews, and a courageous minority of non-Jews sought to resist the genocide again highlight the importance of choices and can provide inspiring examples of the power of the human spirit, as can provide inspiring examples of the power of the human spirit, and can provide inspiring examples of the power of the human spirit, as can study of the post-war lives of survivors. Holocaust education thus encourages students to grapple with a host of challenging questions which are essentially about what it means to be human.

In addition, study of the Holocaust in the UK can demonstrate specifically why good Citizenship is so important. Although British territory – with the notable exception of the Channel Islands – was never occupied. Britain was not insulated from the effects of Nazi policy towards Jewish people. For example, thousands of central European Jews came to the UK as refugees in the 1930s, notably almost 10,000 mostly unaccompanied children through the Kindertransport programme of 1938-39, whilst around 2,000 Holocaust survivors were similarly admitted after the war. Study of their experiences therefore contributes to young people's understanding of the cultures and traditions which have shaped the British society and of the essential role of voluntary groups and ordinary citizens in their story. It should be stressed that study of such issues does not mean uncritical celebration of Britain's role or values, but rather critical engagement with them. Learning about the Kindertransport, for example, requires consideration of why the Home Office largely refused to admit parents and of the hostility which the child refugees faced from some sections of society.

In summary, learning about the Holocaust forms one of the most powerful means through which young people can reflect critically on issues of identity, behaviour and ethics which should be at the heart of good citizenship.

The curriculum

As the preceding comments imply, Holocaust education raises citizenship issues by its very nature, regardless of the subject in which it is studied. Nonetheless, we do believe that Citizenship (and its equivalents in the devolved nations) as a specific subject can play an important role in the delivery of powerful educational experiences. Although we very strongly feel that History should always be at the heart of any programme of study on the Holocaust, we encourage secondary schools to adopt where possible a cross-curricular approach, engaging other subjects including Citizenship.

Our teaching resource, Exploring the Holocaust, is a free and comprehensive downloadable teaching pack for Key Stage 3 (or S2 in Scotland) which includes lessons and accompanying classroom materials for History, Religious Education and Citizenship. In line with the British focus of the current Key Stage 3 National Curriculum in England, the lessons for Citizenship address questions raised by the British responses to the Holocaust to enable students to study issues such as immigration and the plight of refugees, the role of the media in Nazi Germany, the role of government, law and justice, and what it means to be a good citizen.

At post-16 our Lessons from Auschwitz Project, funded by the Department of Education in England, the Scottish and Welsh governments and the Northern Ireland Executive, offers two students from every school in the UK the opportunity to participate in a four-part course centred around an unforgettable one-day visit to Auschwitz-Birkenau. As the final stage of the course, participants undertake "Next Steps" projects in which they share their experiences with their schools or local communities prior to becoming Holocaust Educational Trust Ambassadors, a community of young people committed to learning about and remembering the Holocaust and encouraging others to do the same. In doing so, they contribute in a significant way to the citizenship agenda.

12. Initiatives and role models

Our Ambassadors are incredible role models, young people from the UK who have been inspired by their participation in the Lessons from Auschwitz Project to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive and to fight hatred, racism and prejudice afterwards, through university and even once they are in the workplace. They do this on a voluntary basis, often juggling their personal priorities because they are so enthused with a passion for ensuring that the Holocaust is never forgotten.

A few examples of our Ambassadors' amazing work is attached with this letter. They constantly amaze us with their dedication and passion for a cause which they have no personal family connection to, but recognise the societal importance of. If the inquiry would like to speak to role models of British citizenship in the UK, our Ambassadors would be brilliant examples.

I hope this is a helpful response to this inquiry.

Dr Neil Hopkins, Senior Lecturer in Education, University of Bedfordshire – written evidence (CCE0016)

John Rawls, the American philosopher, stated in his book Political Liberalism (1993) that diversity and conflict (in terms of people's beliefs, philosophies and worldviews) is something that is inevitable in contemporary liberal democracies. Rawls, as a committed liberal, believed this diversity was not something that should be counteracted by imposing or privileging a particular doctrine at the expense of other beliefs. Rawls's question, therefore, was how can we live together where such diversity occurs, ensuring citizens are free to believe and express their views without society breaking down into never-ending conflict. Rawls's potential solution was the 'overlapping consensus', a concept whereby citizens of different persuasions are able to adhere to collective attitudes, values and norms through the lens of their own religion or set of beliefs (what Rawls termed a 'conception of the good'). Rawls believed such an overlapping consensus could be achieved by citizens who adopted 'reasonable' conceptions of the good because they held respect and tolerance of other views (for example) as an important element of their own belief systems.

This has a direct bearing on any discussion of Fundamental British Values (as introduced by the government after the 'Trojan Horse' affair). The question to ask ourselves is: 'Is the introduction of Fundamental British Values' in schools and colleges an attempt to create or formalise such an overlapping consensus in British society?' Whilst it is difficult to argue with the central tenets of each of the five elements that comprise Fundamental British Values, the way they have been introduced into the education system and whether they articulate 'Britishness' in any significant degree are problematic. There was not a period of public discussion and national debate on Britishness and what values (if any) this encapsulated. This lack of debate has made it difficult for Fundamental British Values to be accepted in many quarters of British society. I teach in a university that has many British Asian students on its programmes and there is anecdotal evidence that many in the British Asian communities are worried that Fundamental British Values and the PREVENT duty in schools and colleges has singled out radical Islam as a potential threat to the welfare of British citizens. It could be argued this has led to a 'drift' in thinking by many towards viewing Islam per se as a danger to liberal values in British society (see Qureshi (2015) and Mogra (2016)). If the Lords' Select Committee can use this call for evidence and publication of its report to generate such a national discussion on Britishness and the values this encapsulates, this can only be of benefit to schools, colleges, universities and the wider society.

Fundamental British Values and the PREVENT duty have become essential aspects of citizenship education in schools and colleges. This has come at a time, however, when it could be argued citizenship (as a curriculum subject) has been increasingly downplayed in school and college curricula. When the new National Curriculum was introduced in 2014, the programme of study for citizenship was very brief in comparison to other subjects. This could be seen as a means of ‘unshackling’ the subject from needless regulation and prescription. However, it could also be sending a signal that the subject is relatively unimportant. Evidence suggests there are very few citizenship specialists undertaking initial teacher education in secondary schools and colleges (and, likewise, citizenship co-ordinators in primary schools). This apparent lack of specialisation has led to a potential marginalisation of citizenship education in the curriculum where the subject is often allocated to humanities specialists or teachers with a religious education background. There are many instances where citizenship is not treated as a curriculum subject at all and is integrated into a school’s PSHE, SMSC or tutorial provision. This provision leaves it open to the confidence and expertise of the individual teacher whether citizenship is adequately covered and explore with the students. There is a danger with such provision that schools and colleges ‘cover the bases’ and ‘tick the boxes’ by making sure they adhere to the statute and regulations on British Values and/or PREVENT without adequately ensuring there is the time and space for students to fully debate and argue what it means to be British and what constitutes radicalisation (for example).

These issues inevitably lead to the question of pedagogy concerning citizenship education. It must be acknowledged that there is already excellent practice occurring in this area – the Anglo-European School in Ingatestone, Essex, for instance, has done ground-breaking work on incorporating citizenship and human rights education into the fabric and governance of the school. The practice of ‘Rights Respecting Schools’ supported by UNICEF have also done a great deal of work promoting citizenship and human rights in RRS schools. These examples are important because they show that citizenship should not be seen as a completely separate discipline or subject from the rest of the school curriculum. Citizenship needs to be ‘plumbed into’ the very structures of the schools and colleges themselves in order as citizenship is a set of practices as well as a programme of study. I have written about this extensively from a college point-of-view in my book Citizenship and Democracy in Further and Adult Education (2013). British schools and colleges have often been very effective in encouraging and facilitating student voice (as analysed in the work of Julia Flutter and others). It is important, however, that student voice isn’t seen as tokenistic or focusing on issues that are relatively mundane and unimportant – student voice should allow (where possible) for the students to have a significant say as stakeholders in their own education. This in itself is a clear manifestation of citizenship education in action.

The final point I want to make regards political literacy in citizenship education. Political literacy was strongly advocated by the Crick Report in 1998 as a means of encouraging students to become active citizens in their local communities and the wider society. This means that citizenship education has to go beyond the confines of the classroom and school/college to advocacy and involvement in issues that concern students in the world around them. I think this has proved the most difficult to achieve as teachers and heads/principals are worried about political neutrality and accusations of indoctrination.

Dr Neil Hopkins, Senior Lecturer in Education, University of Bedfordshire – written evidence (CCE0016)

Because of this, projects involving citizenship in the wider community have tended towards 'safe' issues such as local environmentalism. It is here, however, that schools, colleges and the National Citizen Service could work in tandem to actually explore what is meant by 'political literacy' and how that can be facilitated to enable young people to become active citizens and have the confidence to be advocates for what they passionately believe in. The good practice that has been raised in the paragraph above cannot solely remain within the boundaries of the school and college – the subjects raised in schools and colleges will often extend to engage with people, groups and institutions in the community. The Youth Parliament and local councils that encourage youth representation are excellent examples of citizenship being taken beyond the classroom walls. The Inns of Court encouraging student role-play of key trials is another creative instance of facilitating the duties and practices of citizenship.

Political literacy, as articulated by Crick, inevitably involves questioning and challenging existing attitudes and states of affair. It also involves working against perceived discrimination and injustice. These are not things that can necessarily be kept in tidy pedagogical boxes – they are messy as democracy itself is messy (this possibly explains why many teachers are reticent to tread onto such territory). Work in the field of dialogical teaching (as advocated by Robin Alexander, for instance) offers some possibilities on how debate and discussion can be facilitated in a robust but respectful way. Indeed, many teachers who skilled in citizenship education are already using these skills with their students. Gert Biesta and Peter Lawy in their paper 'From teaching citizenship to learning democracy' (2006) take the means of dialogics further and encourage students to question 'what is a good citizen?'. Biesta and Lawy argue that citizenship education has had a tendency to assume what good citizenship is and for students to comply with this rather than challenge and analyse the concept as part of their studies.

This brings me full circle back to Rawls's overlapping consensus and Fundamental British Values. Biesta and Lawy's invitation to question what good citizenship is can be extended to notions of Britishness and whether there is a consensus regarding this. The Select Committee's invitation for evidence on citizenship and civic engagement offers a welcome opportunity to refresh and extend the discussion on citizenship education in what are politically disquieting times. I welcome the opportunity to submit this evidence to their Lordships.

Background to submission

1.1 Our testimony draws upon a project where we examined the political interests and political participation of young Muslims (aged 15-27) in Scotland. Through this research we have gained significant insights into barriers and possibilities encountered by young Muslims when engaging in politics and in public life, which we believe is valuable for the work of Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee. Our final report from this project has been published here:

<https://research.ncl.ac.uk/media/sites/researchwebsites/youngmuslims/MuslimYouthScotland.pdf>

In addition to the research on political participation, we also draw on other academic experiences of working with Muslims communities to broaden our contribution.

Key summary points

- 2.1 Everyday experiences of racism and Islamophobia are potentially very discouraging factors when it comes to facilitating the participation of young Muslims in public life.
- 2.2 Negative media and political representations of Muslims and the interpretations of government policies such as Prevent are damaging the confidence of young Muslims.
- 2.3 The reinforcement of gender stereotypes about Muslim women – both within the Muslim community and within society at large – present challenges for their broader engagement in public life.
- 2.4 There is significant potential for greater Muslim participation in public life based on the growing presence of Muslim role models in Scottish politics and society.
- 2.5 There is much potential for expanding and promoting the strong ethos that many young Muslims have for charity and volunteer work; drawing on and promoting their interest in global politics and utilising their transnational outlook to foster connections and dialogue around the world.

In response to the questions identified by the Committee, we respond in particular to questions 7 and 9 below:

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

3.1 From our research, we recommend that society can support civic engagement by taking more seriously the assets and strengths exhibited by young Muslims. Central, devolved and local government could all contribute here too. In our research, we identified the following strengths and assets amongst the young Muslim men and women who participated in the research:

3.2 Strong ethos for charity work and volunteering - A key - but under-recognised - way young Muslims engage in civic life is through charity work and volunteering. In our research, we found that the majority of our participants volunteered or did charity work, ranging from global to local charities and different forms of campaigning. A strong ethos for charity and volunteer work is a substantial asset of Muslim young people and has significant potential to promote political and civic participation. To harness its potential, Muslim young people need to receive greater recognition and publicity for the different ways they engage in charity work and help those in need. Many of our participants combined international charity work with local charity issues demonstrating their concern for and interest in both international and local affairs. A number of participants asserted that in the face of negative stereotypes they thought it was important for young Muslims to demonstrate an involvement in local affairs, with local charity and volunteer work as a way of achieving this. Therefore, expanding the repertoire of volunteering and charity work could be a significant way to promote visible participation and assist with the integration – and recognition – of young Muslims and the valuable contributions they make to society.

3.3 Strong concern about global political issues - Our research has demonstrated that young Muslims frequently have a sharp awareness of, and a strong concern about, global political issues and matters. This, we believe, is an asset of Britain's youthful Muslim community. Through promoting young Muslims' interest in global politics, a new generation of global thinkers and international strategists can be fostered in the UK. Rather than discouraging the global outlook of young Muslims, these interests could be promoted and have the potential to provide an important platform for Muslims to participate in British public life.

3.4 A transnational outlook (connected with family heritage/diaspora) - Due to connections with diasporas and migrations, young Muslims frequently offer a transnational outlook; many convey connections with multiple places, facilitating networks between the UK and other parts of the world. In our globalised and interconnected times, a transnational outlook can be a major asset, helping to foster connections and dialogue with other countries and world regions. Young Muslims provide a distinct transnational outlook, which could be utilised and promoted to assist their participation in public life. Rather than perceiving migrant/diaspora connections in a negative light, there is an opportunity to nurture these transnational characteristics, which could open up new possibilities for young Muslims in UK society.

Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University – written evidence (CCE0070)

3.5 Emerging Scottish Muslim role-models – below, we state that a lack of suitable role models is a barrier to the participation of Muslims in public life. While we believe there is still a need for more Muslims to take an active role in public and political roles, we also believe that there is an emerging and growing presence of publically prominent Muslims and they are very important for engendering the participation of younger Muslims in public life. If those in public roles can foster good relations and contact with Muslim young people, acting as positive role models, it should greatly assist with the growing participation of Muslims in public Scottish life.

3.6 A young and educated population - In Scotland there is a growing Muslim population that is young and educated, with many signs of increasing confidence in the face of many barriers and prejudices. From our research, there are positive signs that many in this new generation are determined to engage in public life and make their voices and opinions heard. Therefore, an emerging aspirational youth is a growing asset and it should hopefully foster greater participation in public life and integration.

3.7 The importance of locality - We are primarily drawing from research carried out in Scotland and we have observed that many young Muslims believe that Scotland provides distinctive opportunities and challenges in terms of participating in public life compared to other places in the UK. For a number of our participants, there was a sense that Scottish politics – specifically the Scottish National Party (SNP) and Scottish nationalism - provides a distinct form of politics that is conducive to their participation and involvement in politics. Participants stated that they perceived SNP politics to be inclusive and distinctive from traditional Westminster political parties that had toxic legacies for some. This perceived distinctive form of politics resulted in a number of participants engaging in politics and campaigning with/for the SNP. The contextual specificities of Scotland then, are assisting and encouraging some young Muslims to actively participate in politics and public life. What we hope this example demonstrates is that locality is important; where Muslims live can significantly impact on their desire and possibilities to participate in public life. While our example in Scotland demonstrates a context that can assist participation for some, other geographic contexts in the UK can function just as easily as a barrier to participation (or not). The history, political culture and society of certain locations can potentially make participation for Muslims a significant challenge compared to other areas. Therefore, we should consider the history, culture and the politics of places where Muslims live as potentially one of the biggest barriers to their participation in public life.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

4.1 From our research with young Muslim men and women in Scotland, we found the following barriers when it comes to them being active citizens and to engaging politically:

4.2 Racism/Islamophobia - From our research, everyday racism and Islamophobia present one of the most consistent and worrying experiences that young Muslims in Scotland have to negotiate. We find that such experiences intensify after terrorist incidents (regardless of where in the world these take place) and have increased as a result of Brexit. These everyday experiences of racism and Islamophobia work to discourage the active participation of some younger Muslims and is one of the biggest barriers to their participation in public life. That being said, some of our participants demonstrated tenacity in terms of how they managed and responded to racism and Islamophobia.

4.3 Media and political representations about the ‘Muslim Community’ - Negative media and political representations about ‘Muslims Communities’ present significant barriers to the participation of young Muslims in public life. Muslim young people are sometimes discouraged from engaging in politics and public life out of a fear of being misrepresented and branded as “extremist” or non-patriotic for example. In many of our interviews, a frustration with how Muslims were represented in media and political narratives was expressed. There is a sense that the media and political parties only represent Muslims in a negative light, and pay little attention to their positive contributions to British society. Government policies such as Prevent are being used in such a way that suspicion is cast upon young Muslims, resulting in a level of apprehension with regard to political expression and general engagement in public life. Nonetheless, we have also observed that for some young Muslims, political participation and public engagement is perceived as a resource to challenge stereotypes and negative representations. In a number of interviews, participants asserted that they felt that there was a need for Muslims to engage in more prominent public roles in order to provide alternative narratives and re-represent the Muslim identity. Therefore, we have seen an emerging awareness that participation in politics and public life is a way to challenge stereotypes, Islamophobia and negative representations. However, it would appear that negative representations and stereotypes are more of a barrier than a motivation to participate in public life.

4.4 A lack of appropriate role models - A number of our participants referred to there being a lack of Muslim role models in prominent public and political positions and explained that this discouraged them from taking an active role in political affairs. We found that the small number of Muslims who are in publically prominent positions in Scotland often have a positive impact on the aspirations and confidence of young Muslims. A number of participants highlighted that Muslim politicians such as Humza Yousaf were positive role models, providing them with confidence to participate in political affairs. However, the continued lack of Muslims in public and political roles means there is still a shortage of role models to inspire and engender confidence in young Muslims to engage in public life.

4.5 Gender stereotypes - We have found that women participants often felt that they had to deal with multiple prejudices based not only on religion but also gender, making their engagement in public life especially challenging. Gender norms within communities and the stereotyping of Muslim women tend to reinforce the idea that women should not participate in political affairs. Therefore, gender and everyday sexism should be considered as a key barrier to the participation of British Muslim women in public life. Nonetheless, we also observed a growing confidence in young Muslim women, with a number of participants engaging in politics and taking on publically prominent roles. There are positive signs then, that young Muslim women are rejecting and challenging gender prejudices and becoming visibly involved in politics and campaigning.

Submission of evidence in response to questions 5 and 9. Barriers in learning political engagement for disadvantaged communities and how they can be addressed within the education system

Summary

Disadvantaged school students have less access to participatory forms of learning Citizenship at school compared to their more advantaged peers and thus lose out on opportunities to learn the skills and attitudes for political engagement. This is one reason why disadvantaged communities feel left behind as they feel they have a limited voice in the decision making of the country. One explanation for why this is happening is due to the voluntary nature of these activities within the school environment. Advantaged students self-select to participate as they frequently have been shown to have had a head start in learning these skills and interest for political engagement already in the home. Our evidence suggests that access to compulsory citizenship education classes is not affected by social economic background in England. In addition, these classes are shown to have a stronger effect on disadvantaged students reducing the inequalities in future political engagement.

Introduction

White working class communities can be argued to feel left behind partly as a result of the English education system that reaffirms their political position and lack of voice in society. Although the education system often gives the appearance of being meritocratic and has the capacity to produce social mobility and improve life chances it often reproduces the status quo and even enhances differences. This is widely researched in terms of academic performance and social mobility into labour market outcomes but much less researched in terms of learning citizenship skills and social mobility regarding political outcomes in power and decision making. Our recent research on, 'Tackling inequalities in political socialisation: A Systematic analysis of Access to and Mitigation Effects of Learning Citizenship at School' (Hoskins, Janmaat and Melis forthcoming in the Journal Social Science Research) has recently addressed these questions and established;

- 1) The elements within the English education system that have formed a barrier to the learning of political voice of disadvantaged communities
- 2) How these barriers in the English education system can be overcome through Citizenship Education and the role that the education system can play in reducing socioeconomic differences in political engagement

Professor Bryony Hoskins Department of Social Sciences, University of Roehampton, London and Dr Jan Germen Janmaat, from the ESRC LLAKES centre, Department of Lifelong and Comparative Education, Institute of Education, London – written evidence (CCE0047) We will address these two aspects in this order below.

1) The elements within the English education system that have formed a barrier to the learning of political voice of disadvantaged communities

Students learn citizenship attitudes, values, knowledge and skills through participatory approaches to learning that can be classified in 3 ways;

- I. Real life or simulated political situations in the school, for example, school councils (Hoskins et al 2012).
- II. Through the transfer and debating of political knowledge in citizenship education classes (Whiteley 2012) and,
- III. Through using a participatory pedagogical approach to teaching and learning across all disciplines that invites the students to express their own opinions in class and to disagree openly with the teacher. This is often referred to in the literature as an ‘open climate of classroom discussion’, a pedagogical strategy that has been found to have a strong and sustained positive influence on political engagement (Hoskins et al 2012; Torney-Purta 2002; Hahn 1998; and Campbell 2008).

In our research, (Hoskins, Janmaat and Melis forthcoming), we found that disadvantaged youth have significantly less access to political activities in school and an open classroom climate for discussion (Table 1). Using the Citizenship Education Longitudinal dataset, that followed a representative sample of young people from schools in England 2002-2014 (starting at age 11-12) and using advanced statistical analysis, we found that from the age of eleven young people from disadvantaged backgrounds are less likely to be involved in Political activities at school including student councils, debates, mock elections and less likely to perceive that they are in a school and class environment in which they are invited to contribute, state their own opinion and have their voice heard. This access to political learning, moreover, was influenced by social background for each year studied between the ages 11-16 years old (see table 1). We think that there is no justifiable reason why young people from different social backgrounds should have different levels of access to political learning during their compulsory years of education and this continual reinforcement over many years may well be contributing to certain communities feeling a lack of power and control in their lives.

One possible explanation for different levels of access to political activities in school is that these opportunities are likely to be voluntary and that young people from disadvantage backgrounds are more likely to opt out of these activities. For example, participating in debates or students councils may well be a choice and influenced by an individual's existing levels of political efficacy, political skills and interest. These qualities could already be higher amongst students from more privileged social backgrounds as these aspects of competences are likely to be cultivated within more middle class home environments. There is clearly a case for making political activities at school compulsory for all students, across all classes and all schools. In addition, getting teachers to encourage students from less advantaged backgrounds to stand for positions in school councils could also play an important role in reducing political inequalities.

A second explanation concerns access to an open classroom climate. As this is a learning process rather than a specific activity it is more complicated to ensure access for all

Professor Bryony Hoskins Department of Social Sciences, University of Roehampton, London and Dr Jan Germen Janmaat, from the ESRC LLAKES centre, Department of Lifelong and Comparative Education, Institute of Education, London – written evidence (CCE0047) students. We argue that what is likely to be occurring is a result of miscommunication between disadvantaged students and more middle class teachers and middle class school environments. Thus young people from less privileged social backgrounds may feel less able to have their voice heard and to express their opinion in class. Better training of teachers to support open discussion across the whole curricular and school environment for all children regardless of their social background could be one method for enhancing access to this form of learning. In addition, highlighting to parents the importance of political discussions and supporting children to take decisions in the home could also be another useful avenue for policy development.

2) How these barriers in the English education system can be overcome through Citizenship Education and the role that the education system can play in reducing socioeconomic differences in political engagement

Perhaps the most important finding from our recent research (Hoskins, Janmaat and Melis forthcoming) is on Citizenship Education. We found no evidence to suggest unequal access by social background or prior levels of political engagement on access to Citizenship Education (see table 1). Importantly we also found that Citizenship Education is beneficial for learning political engagement in every year studied. In fact using a specific statistical analysis to assess changes in political outcomes among children in England between ages 11 and 16 (Hoskins, Janmaat and Melis forthcoming) we also found Citizenship Education to be more effective in enhancing the political engagement levels of those from lower social backgrounds than of those from more privileged backgrounds, thus decreasing the differences between social groups intended political engagement. In England education is now compulsory until the age of 18. If citizenship education could also be made statutory until that age, it offers the prospect of further reducing social inequalities in political engagement. This promising finding regarding citizenship education builds on the research from Gainous and Martens (2012) who found similar results in the US.

In England citizenship education could be targeted at disadvantaged students, for example, within vocational education and training courses that in general include a higher intake of socially disadvantaged students. Nevertheless, we would not argue that citizenship education should only be for less advantaged students as not all more privileged young people are socialised into political engagement in the home and vice versa. We suggest that compulsory citizenship until 18 combined with ensuring quality citizenship education in vocational education and training are promising policy directions to support young people from more disadvantaged backgrounds to gain a greater political voice in the democratic system.

Hospital Broadcasting Association – written evidence (CCE0259)

The Hospital Broadcasting Association (HBA) welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Lords' committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. Voluntary endeavour, on which hospital broadcasting is almost entirely dependent, is an important part of citizenship and civic engagement.

The HBA and its members

Answers to your consultation questions

Q1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Q2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Q3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Q4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

Q5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Q6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Q7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Q8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Q9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Q10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Q11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Q12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Christine Huebner – written evidence (CCE0221)

Executive Summary of key points

This submission provides evidence on the meaning of citizenship among young people in the U.K. Based on a qualitative study on the meaning of citizenship and civic and political engagement among 15-18 year olds (ongoing research)ⁱⁱ, the following key conclusions are presented:

- a. Citizenship has a variety of meanings for young people. Only some young people view citizenship as related to rights and responsibilities. Many young people view citizenship as belonging to a community and acting responsibly and independently for the advancement of that community.
- b. The communities young people relate to are not always unique or necessarily local or national; some young people relate to multiple and comprehensive communities, some even to a global community.
- c. Some young people feel marginalized as citizens-to-be, for not participating in the labour market or not being given the same rights as adult citizens. In particular political participation gives rise to a two-tier view of citizenship among young people.
- d. Young people view current citizenship education as not related to their view of citizenship. Some would like to see in particular more formal education on possibilities for political participation. This should be mandatory for all young people. Others see no need for citizenship education.

To question 1. The meaning of citizenship

1. There is little empirical evidence on the meaning of everyday citizenship in the UK, in particular among young people. Notable exceptions are studies by Ruth Lister and colleagues (2003)ⁱⁱⁱ and Pamela Conover (1995).^{iv}
2. Citizenship is not part of the everyday language of young people, a finding also previously reported by Lister et al. (2003).ⁱⁱ However, when prompted, young people have a range of opinions on what they think citizenship means. They relate the concept to a variety of issues relevant to their everyday lives.
3. Citizenship has a variety of meanings for young people. Some young people connect citizenship predominantly with rights, such as the right to hold a passport or the right to healthcare in the UK. Others find it easier to think of the responsibilities of citizens, such as obeying the law or acting respectfully towards others.
4. Instead of speaking of concrete rights and responsibilities many young people view citizenship predominantly as belonging to a community and acting responsibly and independently for the advancement of that community. Conover (1995) finds this so-called relational conception of citizenship to be more prevalent in the U.K. than in the U.S.
5. This relational conception of citizenship is strongly based on identity, social relations and belonging. Some young people describe it as based on an insider status that a citizen takes up in his or her community. From preliminary findings it seems that the stronger young people feel embedded in their communities, the more intuitive they find this particular interpretation of citizenship.
6. While belonging to a community is an important aspect of these young people's perception of citizenship, the type of communities they identify with does not define their views of citizenship. There are a variety of communities within which young people view themselves: local, regional or national as well as transnational communities. A number of young people identify explicitly as global citizens, connecting the concept to human rights and global challenges. Some young people have multiple and layered identities.

To question 9. Barriers to active citizenship

7. Some young people view economic independence and, in particular, participation in the labour market as an important aspect of citizenship. In their eyes paid labour constitutes a significant contribution to the community. While still in full-time education these young people do not view themselves as citizens, but instead as citizens-to-be. There is a distinct view that education does not count as a respectable contribution to the community.

8. Some young people view themselves as active citizens, through paying taxes, being part of the labour market, or (in Scotland) having the right to vote. In contrast to their self-image, they feel marginalized as citizens-to-be by policies such as the staged National Minimum Wage based on age and the opposition to the lowering of the voting age across the U.K.
9. Few young people mention formal political participation as fundamental aspect of citizenship. When prompted most consider voting as a civic duty, but not other forms of political participation.
10. For some young people, the distinction between voting and other forms of political participation gives rise to a two-tier view of citizenship. While voting is considered a duty for every citizen, further political participation, such as being a member of a political party or campaigning for a particular issue, is considered an activity making someone a “good” rather than just a normal citizen. Other forms of political participation are not considered duties of ordinary citizens, because they are too time-consuming and better left to expert citizens.

To question 5. Citizenship and education

11. In particular those young people who hold a relational view of citizenship do not relate currently available citizenship education to the above conceptions of citizenship. Only young people who view the role of the citizen primarily as participation in the labour market relate to what is taught. For many young people, citizenship education is indistinguishable from PSHE.
12. Some young people see a need for factual education on the political system and the rights and responsibilities of being a citizen. They want, in particular, to learn about the possibilities and procedures of formal political participation, such as how to vote and other ways to get involved politically. Some young people believe that this kind of education on citizenship and politics should be available from an earlier age than current citizenship classes and should be mandatory.
13. Other young people, mostly those who view themselves as citizens, see no need for citizenship education in particular.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship and civic engagement have evolved into the 21st century and cover digital and electronic elements as well as more usual approaches (citizens' rights, democratic engagement, involvement in the third sector). The internet and social media now enable citizens to engage in different ways (especially through single issue movements such as Occupy).

There has also been a resurgence of referenda to address crucial issues (such as Scottish independence and Brexit) and to determine whether devolution to city regions and Metro Mayors should go ahead).

Both citizenship and civic engagement remain crucial to a thriving democracy that respects the rights of all. Identity is bound-up with how citizens view their rights, legitimacy and involvement in all aspects of the economy and civil society.

Equality in engagement with communities of interest (especially based around ethnicity and geography) is vital to fostering better citizenship.

Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

A model that the UK might follow is the USA where allegiance to both the Constitution and the Flag are part of citizen ceremonies and pledges of loyalty. This is more difficult in the UK since there is no written Constitution (although there are Magna Carta, a Bill of Rights Habeas Corpus and separation of powers). Also, as a former imperialist power, the flag as a unifying emblem may be problematic (as indeed the Monarchy might be).

Greater focus on ‘citizenship’ issues in the educational system could be of benefit in cementing a British identity, as long as such issues are placed in the context of history and the changing nature of contemporary Britain.

Pride in being British should be encouraged but must be linked to a future, progressive vision of a shared society and values that support a multi-cultural and multi-ethnic society, as well as one that celebrates equality and diversity.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The lack of a written Constitution, particularly since Brexit and the proposal to transfer European Union law en masse via an enabling (‘Henry VIII’ Act) certainly undermine engagement. However, it might be argued that recent referenda have galvanised political engagement – especially among young people.

Extension of mechanisms that encourage political engagement should be considered. Making voter registration easier is essential; as is actions to reduce gerrymandering as in the last government’s pledge to reduce the number of MPs. Lowering the voting age to 16 (possibly for local government initially) could have a beneficial effect on fostering citizenship.

Perhaps compulsory voting, similar to the method used in Australia, could be piloted in the UK to test whether it would be effective in raising voting numbers and making British democracy more representative and cohesive.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Programmes to inculcate citizenship and support civic engagement from a young age are of great value and can only have a generally beneficial effect in creating more active citizens. That having been said, they can only benefit a minority of citizens, although they encourage advocacy on behalf of civic engagement as an ideal.

It might be possible to make attendance by all at some sort of citizenship activities compulsory (as with jury service) with employers required to release staff for a few days per year. This might help fulfil companies' corporate social responsibility (CSR) ambitions and approaches.

Other routes for creating active citizens need to embrace both economic and political spheres:

- Worker control/part control companies (via mutual approaches or worker representation on company boards).
- Enabling communities to control social housing and neighbourhood assets through tenant management organisations and community interest companies for instance.
- Supporting routes into community finance to reduce debt and reliance upon high-cost and/or payday lenders, and tackle precarious living – possibly via a Community Reinvestment Act.
- Facilitating greater access of young people and low income families to access internships in Parliament, major companies etc. to improve equality of access to top professions currently dominated by public school leavers and children from higher income households.

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Government at all levels has a duty to promote an active citizenry to ensure a vibrant democracy. This is especially important at local government level where participation in the political process is less robust than at a national level of through referenda. The new Combined Authorities and Metro Mayors, have a key role to play.

Ongoing devolution within the British state, one of the most centralised internationally, should foster greater levels of engagement if accompanied with devolution of adequate budgets and recognisable powers in areas that matter to local people.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

British values need to be built around concepts such as greater equality, rights and responsibilities as citizens, and opportunities to participate in wider economic, political and civic life.

Despite Britain being a former colonial power, its more recent history has included fighting for universal abolition of slavery, combatting fascism, introducing universal suffrage and supporting legislation and statutory powers to tackle discrimination and disadvantage associated with defined characteristics (such as gender, ethnicity, disability and lifestyle).

While there is further progress to be made in these areas, values based around these elements of liberal democracy have the potential to form a binding contract between citizens and the state. And these values surmount the aims to foster a multi-cultural society where/if the values of any minority cultures run counter to these values.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

There are well-documented barriers based around gender, class, economic status, ethnicity, disability, lifestyle and geography. Chief among these has been growing inequality in income and wealth, stretching back four decades, growing insecurity and precarity in the employment market and housing system, and declining community solidarity, exacerbated by austerity policies (particularly welfare reforms and the rise) since 2010.

Austerity has had telling impacts on already fragile local economies and disadvantaged communities since those on the lowest incomes and the most vulnerable groups have been disproportionately affected.

Actions to address such disparities and ensure a fairer and more equal society where all have the opportunity to prosper will need to be deep and far-ranging. These actions might include (for example):

- More progressive taxation on income and introduction of a wealth tax.
- Introduction of a universal basic income to replace the welfare system.

- Greater devolution of power and influence to regions, local authorities and communities.
- Extension of mutual approaches across the economy and society.
- More localised economic development and retention of economic and social value locally.
- Adequate and affordable housing for all.

HCI's 'Human City Manifesto: Realising the Potential of Citizens and Communities in the Shared Society' describes a range of approaches.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Investment must be made into schemes that enable integration into British society and support the development of community cohesion. Proficiency in English is crucial to this process.

Recently, we have seen cuts in provision of ESOL classes and similar, so this needs to be reversed to support integration and community cohesion.

While education approaches should stress the value of other languages and cultures, an ability to speak and write English is vital for new migrants to participate fully in their country of choice and for migrant communities to interface with existing communities.

A face-to-face and side-by-side approach is advocated.

Ian Jones, Chief Executive, Volunteer Cornwall – written evidence (CCE0034)

1. I think the notion of belonging has to be more nuanced than from a top down national perspective. People have to first feel that they belong to the place in which they live and then that place is part of something bigger to which they belong. It is not the other way around. People are feeling disengaged from national agendas and politics and thus want to feel purpose at a local level this is where citizenship comes in. We have to address the two but not by top down diktats.

Identity links the sense of belonging with the sense of purpose that gives meaning. It is essential that we support people at the local level and then communicate to show how this builds up to a national sense of being. There is a complexity in the relationships we are trying to manage, it is not a machine, it is emergent and has to be nurtured organically from the bottom up.

Citizenship matters a great deal in the 21st century. We are social beings and need to connect, our culture is undermining these connections and we need to ensure they are strengthened to deal with the ‘wicked’ challenges facing people, communities and nations, issues such as climate change, strains on resources and biodiversity, demographic changes, fragile economies and political systems etc.

2. Identify is not something that can be fostered upon someone. It is something that one has through engagement and participation with others. It is cultural and relates to values, norms and behaviours. We have to give people the opportunities at a local level that bring them together so they themselves share the common values and behaviours that create citizenship.

I do not think citizenship ceremonies would do much to assist with the challenges ahead. I think some events and ceremonies would work, praising the collaboration and engagement at a local level showing what people can achieve together to make their community a better place in which to live. People will only feel part of something big if they feel that they themselves have contributed and participated in shaping and delivering things. The political system and governance structures are failing to achieve this and any top down approach to tell people what it is to be British will fail.

I think there is a role for activities within the educational system. I think out of classroom learning within communities and creative classroom activities with external partners would help. I think the National Citizen Service is not addressing needs or future challenges. It does not embed the ethos of voluntary action or link into necessary local motivation and support that is required to keep young people engaged.

3. I think we have to embed rights and responsibilities in all we do. All public service provision should be underpinned by coproduction at the local level. Involve local people in the creation, design, development and delivery of services. This involves supporting voluntary action as a form of responsibility. Not one that is forced upon people but through recognition that the place and services in a locality are the communities and not the governments.

It has to be through reciprocal duties between citizen and state, at a local level and then nationally. Force of law can be invoked to ensure public services are made to engage local people in a more creative manner, one that engages communities and works with them. Too often arms of government want to treat people passively or manipulate them. Any law has to empower people to voluntarily become involved and not empower government to instruct and direct.

They can be monitored and enforced at the local level through agreements between civil society and public sector between community organisations that build and develop social action and social capital and those responsible for public funding and services. We nearly had this with the Local Area Agreements and a few National Indicators 1, 2, 3 and 6. We were responsible for NI6 and could challenge partners on how they were supporting us to deliver it. We were also partners in the other indicators and could help shape and deliver activities.

NI1 % of people who believe people from different backgrounds get on well together in their local area	NI2 % of people who feel that they belong to their neighbourhood
NI3 Civic participation in the local area	NI6 Percentage of residents participating in regular volunteering

4. The current political structures are outdated and archaic. Yes we can lower the voting age, and also make it easier to register, however there is a shift taking place where passive representation is no longer accepted by many of the population. They want to participate and have active involvement in shaping the community in which they live. We have to develop new models of engagement linking representation and participation and more equitable relationships between the national and the local.
5. As above we have to be more creative in what we do around citizenship. We can be too prescriptive in the planning and delivery of curriculum. Education is more than rote learning of facts; we have to have young people with a sense of purpose and innovative thinking to cope with challenges in an increasingly complex world.

It is not just about teaching citizenship within stage of education but embedding it in mainstream curriculum and leaning outside the classroom. One can deliver learning that links English, maths, humanities, science with the world in which young people find themselves. Engagement involve them in situations that make them aware that they are part of a community etc. Curriculum and qualifications do need amending as we have managed out creativity and the ability to innovate to engage young people at the local level in new and collaborative ways of thinking.

Political participation has to be more than representation people want to be engaged as equals not as passive recipients governed by a distant political and media elite. Participation is about action, about doing things and not just voting as mentioned previously we have to link representation and participation to make people responsible for what happens where they live.

6. No, NCS does not do a good job of creating active citizens. It is a top down structure of engagement that is rigidly managed; to me it is a pet political project and is not value for money. Young people need continuous facilitation and motivation if they are going to continue to be engaged in their community after the structured programme ends. NCS does not do that and is particularly problematic in rural areas. NCS funding should be used to mainstream social action of young people continuously at the local level and not just for short defined programmes.

The UK had a good infrastructure for building social capital and encouraging social action and it has been undermined by national programmes like NCS and austerity with cuts to local activities. Also silo funded programmes by particular departments are also problematic as citizenship is about place and multifaceted and not about function of government.

It is essential that citizenship is intergenerational and not boxed as activities for young people or retired people. We have to get all people active in their communities understanding their rights and responsibilities.

People need to become active citizens because they want to not because it is compulsory. The commitment has to be due to belief that they are doing the right thing for the right purpose underpinned by a culture of reciprocity. Citizenship has to be lived not just taught.

Locally based social action and social capital infrastructure organisations should be encouraged to join things up between the voluntary, community and social enterprise sector and the public sector. We have been trying to do this in Cornwall for many years and this effort is generally undermined by national campaigns, cuts and silo funding and gaming between institutions. Progress has been made but a long way to go.

7. Central government can set the framework, indicating why civic engagement and social action are important. It can establish systems the embed this ethos is public sector contracts, the Social Value Act has not really be very well implemented, utilised or embedded.

We have to make it the norm that people want to add value to public services by undertaking voluntary action. This means it has to be the local level where the difference is being made. We need infrastructure organisations like Volunteer Cornwall to promote, develop and coordinate activities that link the public realm with the third sector in a more deliberate manner.

8. Values are fundamental in how we develop citizenship and how institutions and organisations encourage and promote it. These organisations need to share common values and challenge each other when they do not follow through, we need continuous encouragement and investment in social action to build social capital (both bonding and bridging).

Trust, honesty, reciprocity are vital values to have. We have to enable and encourage and not expect people just to do things.

Main problem we have is that over the decades the dominant economic paradigm has a purposefully developed a culture of individual consumerism which has distracted from building communities. There is recognition that shallow engagement through material consumption does not give lasting wellbeing or create cohesion, in fact the evidence shows that doing things with others has a lasting benefit to people and communities, NEF's Five Ways to Wellbeing. There is a strong case to build citizenship and social action which will also improve people's wellbeing and enhance individual and community resilience.

9. People feel left behind when they believe that they have no control of what is happening in their lives and they see other people speaking on their behalf and what is best for them. We have to encourage and show people that it is their community and their future and facilitate and motivate their engagement.

The only barrier is a willingness to invest in the development of social capital. We spend millions of pounds every year developing the economy but not much at all on social capital. The infrastructure to do this does not cost much as many volunteers help to promote social action and citizenship but it has to be supported. Community Organisers concept did not work as they spoke to people about what they wanted but then expected other organisations to coordinate and facilitate activities. As an organisation we had people come to us to do this at the same time as our infrastructure money was cut so we could not assist.

10. There is a very strong link between citizenship, civic engagement, social cohesion and integration. It is all about people sharing common goals and understanding aspirations, these are generally very similar about family, security, undertaking worthwhile and purposeful activities that provide meaning in one's life. We have to develop such social action that brings people together to address common issues in their community, we have to promote this and encourage participation. It does not happen overnight. A number of years ago I gave a presentation to the All Party Parliamentary Committee on Civil Society and met the then Minister Nick Hurd to discuss Big Society. It was clear to me that central government did not understand how local communities function in terms of social action. People's continuous engagement has to be nurtured, developed and they need to be given feedback on the impact and outcomes being achieved, it will not last unless this is done.

Diversity is a good thing if one wants to generate new ideas and innovation, what matters is what we do at a local level that brings people together to build bridging social capital. At the moment funding to do this has been reduced dramatically due to cuts from central government and then local authorities. Also government is very poor at doing this itself as its perspective can be political, hierarchical and cumbersome when we need lateral emergent engagement as it is complex not complicated.

11. Communication is crucial, the proficiency for people to talk to each other and thus generate understanding is very important. ESOL classes need to be easily available and there has to be some practical engagement built into learning English not just classrooms. We have to encourage people from different cultures and backgrounds to volunteer together to learn at the same time not just language but share common bonds that makes us human.
12. We work with the local authority to pick up and transport Syrian refugees from the airport when they land in the UK and bring them down into our community. Groups and individuals then work together to assist them to settle in and the community to embrace them. It is not a case of having a 'hero' to do this but a combined effort across the board, public, voluntary sectors and local volunteers. This combined effort shows what Britain is about, not divisive and unwelcoming but cohesive and supportive.

The Imagine Project – written evidence (CCE0127)

Co authors: Professor Kate Pahl, Sheffield University; Professor Sarah Banks, Durham University; Professor Angie Hart, Brighton University; Professor Paul Ward, Huddersfield University.

Imagine is a large five-year Economic and Social Research Council project (2013-17) funded through the Research Councils UK Connected Communities programme (Grant number ES/K002686/2). The project involves university researchers from a range of disciplines working together with a variety of community organisations across the United Kingdom to explore why and how people participate in civic and public life. Our key contribution is connected to the ways in which it is possible to co-produce research to understanding the context of civic engagement within diverse communities. The research has foregrounded the importance of community development, community activism, and arts and humanities approaches to civic engagement.

Summary/key points

- Co-produced research is important. We use the term ‘co-production’ to describe methodologies that are collaborative, participatory and democratic and which try to access hidden or otherwise absent voices in civic life. Co-producing research has enabled us to develop methodologies that include voices and perspectives that uncover different forms of engagement, whether this be with groups of Muslim women, young people, people with complex needs or diverse groups within community settings. Community research teams are an essential part of this as they are able to set priorities that are important to them.
- Funding should be made available for open ended, experimental projects that make use of creative arts and a multiplicity of methodologies to encourage dialectical thinking. This can include groups researching hidden histories, artistic and visual understandings of engagement, including poetry, visual and relational art and approaches that rest on creating spaces for dialogue and communities of practice.
- Community development support is essential. Local authorities are cutting back but there needs to be staff supporting community projects and initiatives, regardless of whether or not there is a co-production partner such as a University.
- We welcome the fact that the Select Committee is seeking to understand better the benefits of civic engagement. In this response we focus in particular on the relationship between civic engagement and identity (1), the ways that civic engagement, in its varied and different forms, can be supported (7), barriers to belonging and citizenship (9) and issues of social integration, citizenship and role models (12).

Question 1: Civic engagement and identity:

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. People belonging to communities of place, identity and interest need to be able to reclaim their own histories. In one part of the Imagine project, a research team explored activities, achievements and legacies of the Community Development Projects (CDPs) of the 1970's in three areas: Benwell (Newcastle), North Shields and Hillfields (Coventry). The CDPs were part of an experimental Home Office anti-poverty programme, initiated in the late 1960s in 12 'deprived' neighbourhoods, adopting an action-research approach. The CDPs understood the value of historical research and importance of documenting 'hidden histories' of local working people to counter histories of the powerful. In Benwell, North Shields and Coventry today groups of local people are keen to write their own histories to challenge the stigma still associated with the areas, thus strengthening and empowering local community groups (see www.dur.ac.uk/socialjustice/imagine/). This applies also to BAME groups who want to see their contribution to British society recognized as part of 'British history' which underpins civic engagement.

Question 7: How can civic engagement be supported?

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

1 The government should provide funding to community development workers so that communities can run projects in a productive way. These could take the form of small development grants that are 'light touch' in terms of review and which encourage experimental development projects.

2. Co-production of research is important. If delivered in an ethical way, co-production can empower communities and elevate voices that traditionally have been on the margins. This is a democratic form of knowledge creation and a more ethical way of working with communities that feels less like 'doing things to communities'. Research that is co-produced by universities and community organisations has the potential to empower communities to collectively construct new life worlds, in that the process of doing research together, and co-producing the research questions can make visible new kinds of knowledge that can be articulated and heard in new ways. Collaborative research can bring communities to the heart of social research while capturing the funds of knowledge held in communities that exist outside the corridors of education institutions. Through Imagine we worked with community researchers embedded in their communities to explore civic engagement, which takes many forms. Co-production can also help some of the most marginalized people in society to become agents of social change. An example of this comes from our work with young adults with learning disabilities and other complex needs in Sussex and Blackpool. They co-produced a research project on the resilience of young adults with learning disabilities with an Imagine PhD student. Led by the young adults with learning disabilities and other complex needs, resilience games were produced that could support other young people to build their own resilience and to lobby local government for changes that would support the resilience of young people with complex needs more widely. For example, one group of young people engaged with their local bus company to lobby for bus company staff to be trained to support people with complex needs travelling on buses.

3. Citizens have a right to get knowledge back. A key message from a roundtable on the theme of The role of research in promoting and supporting community development in urban neighbourhoods at the Imagining Benwell Workshop, Discovery Museum, Newcastle, 21 January, 2016

If we are thinking about improving places, we need to ask why they are as they are. We need to divest ourselves of the idea that people have made them as they are. Citizens have a right to get knowledge back. The role of social sciences is to say how things can change. People know their areas best.

4. Civic engagement is a process and needs support. Our work has shown that it does not happen overnight and it needs workers at grassroots level supporting disengaged communities, hence, the importance of community development workers.

5. The idea of ‘Communities in control’ from the Localism Act needs to be understood from a community perspective. A summary of comments from a roundtable on the theme of Communities in control at the Imagining North Shields Workshop, The Meadows, North Shields, 3 April, 2016:

(www.dur.ac.uk/resources/beacon/ImaginingNorthShieldsReportfinalversion4.5.16.pdf):

- Localism powers are difficult to enact in areas of deprivation. Is the Localism Act designed for the benefit of voluntary groups in leafy suburbs wanting to take over the local pub or library?
- The infrastructure is not effective enough - for example, funding from the Cabinet Office was given to start a Neighbourhood Plan in a 6-month time period when it takes much longer.
- The local authority doesn't have an asset transfer policy and there are loopholes in the Localism Act: e.g. even if a building is listed as a community asset, if the local authority decides to demolish it they can without consultation. Whereas if they wanted to sell it they have to give 6 months' notice.

- There are not enough resources to support communities in control.
- Each local authority is dealing with it differently; some are devolving really difficult situations.
- It is too complicated and complex. Taking control requires a community development background and business experience. Lots of communities would not know where to start taking control and need support to do this.
- Is it about transferring assets or liabilities?
- The pace and speed is too fast and it can generate false hope in communities. There is a need to have a good sense of what the community can do.
- Local councillors have a role in supporting the communities they represent to exercise more control over their social/local environment. Concern was expressed about the decline in political engagement including at the community level.

6. Social cohesion needs to be co-produced. One of our community research team commented that there should be events that celebrate diversity and BME people will buy into that. People new in this country are not then being forced to leave their culture behind and adopt an alien one.

7. Organisational structures can support civic engagement. When we considered the legacy of the Community Development Projects of the 1970's we learned about the importance of organisational structures (e.g. Coventry and Newcastle Law Centres developed from Coventry Income and Legal Rights Service and Benwell Community Law Project).

Question 9: What are the barriers to belonging and citizenship? Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

1. Impact of austerity. Some community organisations struggle to survive in a context of economic austerity and increasing needs, while others have risen to the challenge and have expanded their remit (for example, food banks). Many are keen to play a role in designing and delivering services, but this requires support from local and central government. See responses to question 7.

Question 12: Issues around social integration and role models?

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

1. The creative arts can be a powerful mode of civic engagement. We have found the arts to be an effective way to engage the voices of marginalized women and girls by bringing them into research through artistic approaches, such as poetry, art, photography and drama. One example of this is the ‘Threads of Time’ project, based in Rotherham. It explored minority ethnic girls’ identity and their understanding of citizenship linked to place, culture, faith, history and tradition, and examined what it means to be British. A Union Jack was created that contained images contributed by the whole group (see Figure 1). On the large flag, they added images of all the things they saw as defining Britain today. Poetry and visual images for us ‘count’ as evidence of how young people imagine their futures to be. Below we provide examples of the Union Jack images and of the poetry:

EDL don't belong in Rotherham

Rotherham is my home and I like living here and every time the ‘Army of Hate’ visits us they leave our community feeling vulnerable, the police have enough to deal with, without this unnecessarily pressure added. The’ EDL’s motto is ‘Not racist, not violent, and no longer silent.’ Does anybody else see the irony in this? ‘Not racist’ EDL is a fascist group who are clearly Islamophobic; they are not silent when they are hurling racial abuse. Most Muslims in Rotherham respect the law and want to live peacefully if EDL allow us. I write this sitting at home as EDL have disrupted another Saturday and create tension between communities long after they are gone, which hardly seems fair.

(‘Lucy’ [British Asian girl, pseudonym], aged 16).

Living on My Street

My street is a very long street. It is very multi-cultural.

On my street live English, Irish, Pakistanis, Scottish, Indian, African, Afghans, Italian, Polish, Slovaks and Spanish

It's good to meet and mix with other people, and learn about each other,

We all get on with each other.

We don't argue.

We accept everyone.

My street is the best street in Rotherham.

2. Civic engagement is an essential component of marginalized communities' lives. Through civic engagement they have to construct support networks, volunteer, be neighbourly, develop community-based education, create safe spaces, and share resources in order to make life manageable. These are day-to-day activities that enable British society to function. Such roles can be uncovered and validated and recognized as citizenship through co-production that understands their value. Ceremonies suggest that citizenship is a test to be passed, a right to be earned, rather than a recognition of the civic contribution that migrant and ethnic minority communities make every day.

The Inter Faith Network for the UK – written evidence (CCE0250)

Context

The Inter Faith Network for the UK has been concerned with aspects of citizenship since it was first established in 1987.

This is reflected in its publications such as Faith, Identity And Belonging: Educating For Shared Citizenship (2006) which explored the issue of Citizenship Education in England's schools and Faith, Citizenship and Shared Life in Britain Today: A Discussion Document (2007), discussed further below, which looked at the issue of Citizenship more broadly.

This short response focuses on just some of the questions in the consultation.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support?

We do not submit a list for consideration but the Select Committee may be interested to be aware of IFN's work on values.

a) "IFN's vision and values"

IFN's vision is of "a society where there is understanding of the diversity and richness of the faith communities in the UK and the contribution that they make; and where we live and work together with mutual respect and shared commitment to the common good."

The values which we aspire to reflect in all our work are:

- Service to others
- Integrity
- Accountability
- Trust
- Consultative and cooperative working
- Valuing diversity
- Inclusiveness
- Listening and openness

- Courtesy
- Mutual respect
- Respecting dissent and people's right to express this

The question of values and their part in our society has been at the heart of IFN's work from early days – from the publication of The Quest for Common Values back in the 90s, through working to support the faith communities in the development of the Millennium Act of Commitment, to more recent exploration of what might be called the 'procedural values' of how we engage positively and effectively with each other within society – even, and perhaps especially, where we differ.

Relevant are such IFN documents as Building Good Relations with People of Different Faiths and Beliefs which contains principles fundamental to positive interaction between people in a diverse society. This is annexed.

The Millennium Act of Commitment, mentioned above, remains widely used today – particularly in civic contexts:

In a world scarred by the evils of war, racism, injustice and poverty, we offer this joint Act of Commitment as we look to our shared future.

*We commit ourselves,
as people of many faiths,
to work together
for the common good,
uniting to build a better society, grounded in values and ideals we share:*

*community,
personal integrity,
a sense of right and wrong, learning, wisdom and love of truth,
care and compassion,
justice and peace,
respect for one another,
for the earth and its creatures.*

*We commit ourselves,
in a spirit of friendship and co-operation,
to work together
alongside all who share our values and ideals, to help bring about a better world now and for generations to come.*

b) Faith, Citizenship and Shared Life in Britain Today: A Discussion Document

This discussion paper mentioned at the outset of this response recognises some of the issues that the Lords Select Committee is exploring.

Active Citizenship

The Discussion document states:

“Most religious traditions have both a personal and a public dimension and invite their believers to follow a way of life which shapes not only their personal lives and relationships but also the way they contribute to wider society. In a few cases, members of a religious group will believe that it is inconsistent with their spiritual practice to become involved in the political process. Their viewpoint needs to be respected. But most people of faith want to engage, alongside others, in the activities of the ‘public square’. For some this will take the form of direct involvement in the political process, while for others ‘active citizenship’ will be expressed mainly through voluntary service to the community. But all of them will bring their personal faith to bear in varying ways in their contribution to public life. (9)

In recent years there has been an increased recognition of the contribution which the various faith communities make to our shared public life. The leaders of faith communities have generally welcomed the increased engagement which has developed with Government, both central and local, and with other public institutions. Faith communities have an important and legitimate role to play within society through contributing to the formation and implementation of public policy, and in providing services both to their own members and to the community more generally. They have been playing a significant part in the regeneration of socially and economically disadvantaged communities.” (10)

Examples of this are abundant, especially the way that religious traditions work together to mobilise their communities, and others, to work together to respond to social need, as can be seen from the report Public Faith and Finance published by the University of Bristol in 2016. As Lord Bourne of Aberystwyth noted at IFN’s National Meeting in 2016:

“Across the country, people from different faiths are working hard in countless churches, mosques, temples, gurdwaras, synagogues and elsewhere, and in charities and community groups, to make their communities better places.”

But it also recognises that this can only occur in a context where there is an absence of barriers of discrimination and inequality.

Shared Values

IFN recognises that people of faith derive their values, in part, from their traditions that are passed on through scriptures and loved traditions. It also recognises that whilst values may come from different sources there is much agreement on the values needed to live and support a modern democratic society. This at times includes values that are not necessarily valued themselves by states, such as dissent. The Discussion document notes:

“There is a strong and important tradition in this country of dissent, and indeed of civil disobedience, which should be respected, while recognising that society, through its governmental institutions, needs to place appropriate limits on the actions through which this dissent may be lawfully expressed. People of many faiths have in the past been associated with these movements of dissent and will no doubt continue to be so. While they can be expected to acknowledge the authority of a democratic government, they will inevitably have a prior commitment, rooted in their particular religious tradition, to the pursuit of compassion, justice and truth, as they try to live out with integrity the values which they derive from their religious faith.” (17)

But it also recognises that dissent and robust engagement are very different from extremism and violent opposition.

Integration not assimilation

Sharing values, though, does not mean assimilating oneself to a larger or dominant culture; as the Paper notes:

“The process of integration requires mutual engagement and involves change which affects everyone, but can enlarge the understanding and experience of us all.” (49)

Hence, integration within a nation has to be based on a model which does not merely tolerate difference but respects difference and, at times, celebrates it. As the Paper recognises:

“Britain today is our society, the one of which we, as British citizens, have co-ownership.” (31)

What matters is the way we build mutual respect and underpin that by laws that allow for personal and communal flourishing.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

On this, we would wish to note that religious identity can be a cause of being ‘left behind’ if a person encounters discrimination or social exclusion because of this. Vital to shared citizenship in our society is enabling full and positive engagement of people of all faiths within the workplaces, education and all other contexts.

IFN has been pleased to play an active role in enable the guidance materials provided by a number of bodies which assist towards this end, most recently those of the Equality and Human Rights Commission for employers about religion in the workplace.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Many national inter faith bodies contribute to a positive vision of citizenship within a tolerant and inclusive society through particular inter faith programmes and events. Just a few examples would be the programme for refugees and asylum seekers of the Maimonides Foundation; the youth Interfaith Summit of 3FF, the projects of Mitzvah Day, Sadaqa Day and Sewa Day; the work of the St Ethelburga's Centre on tools for dialogue and working jointly on areas such as the Environment. Many, many more could be highlighted.

Around the UK over 250 local inter faith groups in towns and cities and also rural areas carry out work which is a living demonstration of people of different backgrounds who make work together in ways which witness visibly to tolerance and respect and contrite the cohesion of their local areas. Most have strong working relationships with their local authority and, through participation in civic events, strengthen the bonds of trust and cooperation between faith groups and local government. Just a few examples would be Faith Network for Manchester, York Interfaith, Bristol Multi Faith Forum, Medway Inter Faith Action, Cornwall Faiths Forum, Warwick District Faiths Forum, Birmingham Council of Faiths and Northampton Inter Faith Forum.

At UK level, the same might be said of the Inter Faith Network for the UK which was founded in 1987 and works with its nearly 200 member bodies to promote inter faith understanding and cooperation. These members include national faith community representative bodies of different faiths; national, regional and local inter faith bodies; and educational and academic bodies with an inter faith interest. IFN works with Government and other public agencies and with many other organisations to encourage positive interaction within society through inter faith understanding and cooperation.

In Scotland, the role of Inter faith Scotland is very important, as is that of the Inter-Faith Council for Wales in Wales and of the Northern Ireland Inter Faith Forum in Northern Ireland.

A significant programme currently supported by Government is the Near Neighbours programme of the Church Urban Fund and Archbishops' Council of the Church of England. This funds many local projects which strengthen as sense of shared citizenship and belonging.

As noted in Inter Faith Week Stories from 2016, inspiration for 2017 Inter Faith Week each November, on which IFN leads, brings faith communities together, and many choose to celebrate through practical cooperation for the common good. An array of multi faith social action events took place for the 2016 Week. Popular initiatives included helping the homeless; campaigning for environmental change; improving public spaces; and action to support refugees, migrants and asylum seekers.

A huge variety of organisations took part in 2016, including places of worship; national faith community bodies; inter faith bodies; voluntary organisations such as those working with refugees and the homeless and public agencies. Some organisations and projects, such as Near Neighbours programme (noted above), organised and encouraged events held by many others.

Mitzvah Day took place close to Inter Faith Week and some inter faith Mitzvah Day activities were held early, during the Week. Mitzvah Day is led by the Jewish community and is one of three annual major days of faith-linked social action throughout the year, along with Sewa Day and Sadaqa Day which fall earlier in the year.

But to reduce Citizenship to social action would, of course, be an error. Citizenship is also about engaging with others, engaging in mutual learning and being enriched by what is encountered. Inter Faith Week provided a great opportunity for events showcasing the arts, culture and music of faith communities across the UK. People also used art, culture and music to remind one another of the things that unite people of different faiths, and to explore and display harmony and common ground. Members of the public experienced the art, culture and music of faith communities by visiting a place of worship or going on a faith trail. People of different faiths also came together to produce art as part of a joint social action project to raise awareness of issues such as hate crime, or the refugee crisis.

Examples of this ranged from a ‘Day of Craft for Women’ in Feltham, West London, organised by Hounslow to Friends of Faith to storytelling as part of the Jewish Museum’s Inter Faith Week ‘Inter Faith Celebration Day’ in London.

Education for Citizenship

Education is key not only within schools but also in the wider social context. Schools are important places not only for learning about being a citizen but also where they can experience being citizens and see good citizenship modelled, see: Faith, Identity And Belonging: Educating For Shared Citizenship (2006).
