IFN has highlighted the work of The National Citizens Service (NCS) (www.ncsyas.co.uk) in providing opportunities for inter faith engagement, partly through inclusion in publications such as Inter Faith Learning, Dialogue and Cooperation: Next Steps (2016) and its Executive Director was involved in the early conversations about its establishment, having advocated strongly for such a programme while a Commissioner on the Commission on Integration and Cohesion.

Conclusion

IFN's Discussion Paper in 2006 noted:

“There is at present much discussion about what is involved in being a ‘citizen’ and about related questions of ‘identity’ and ‘belonging’.” (14) and:

“It is clear from recent public debate that the term ‘citizenship’ can have negative overtones for some people because they understand it as demanding an exclusive loyalty of a narrow, conformist and nationalistic kind.” (16)

It is important in any debate about citizenship that a narrow definition is avoided, one that becomes exclusive of legitimate difference. Since the Act of Toleration of 1689 the concept of what it is to be a citizen of these Isles has grown to encompass difference and diversity in such a way that the nation has become enriched culturally, economically and, perhaps most importantly, spiritually.

In its section on ‘Being British’ the paper noted:

“An individual’s sense of belonging is linked to their understanding of their identity, which is in turn linked to their history and family roots. Accompanying the debate on ‘citizenship’ there has been discussion on what it means to be ‘British’ and on how far diversity and a sense of unity within our society can be reconciled. The debate has focused on how we live together as diverse people and communities within one society. ‘Multiculturalism’, ‘integration’ and ‘cohesion’ are terms which are often currently used in discussing these questions. While it may be helpful to have agreed definitions of these words, what is more significant is for there to be some shared understanding of the characteristics of the kind of society which we want to have in this country.” (22)

There is still a clear need to develop a shared understanding of the language used in such a way that as many as possible can be included and as few as possible disenfranchised.

September 2017

Intergenerational Foundation – written evidence (CCE0104)

The Intergenerational Foundation (www.if.org.uk) is an independent think tank researching fairness between generations. IF believes policy should be fair to all – the old, the young and those to come.

Introduction

The Intergenerational Foundation (IF) welcomes the opportunity to comment on government policy towards citizenship and civic engagement. Growing age segregation is changing the shape and structure of British families and communities. IF would like to stress that this feature of the generational divide not only holds significant economic costs, but also acts as a barrier to integration, tolerance and cohesion. In order to promote a more trusting and cooperative society, we would like to bring the following points to the select committee's attention:

1. Different age groups are growing apart

Last year IF published a research paper entitled, 'Generations Apart? The growth of age segregation in England and Wales', in which we demonstrated that over the last two decades different age groups have become increasingly segregated at both a micro-level and macro-level. On the micro-level, members of the same age group are becoming more highly concentrated in the same neighbourhoods. Retirees and young adults are growing closer to their own groups and further from one another, and today just 5% of the typical urban under-18's neighbourhood population are over the age of 65. Our urban areas are becoming a tale of two cities. On the macro-level, rural and suburban areas are growing older and large cities growing younger in relative terms; between 1991 and 2014 the median age of rural areas rose almost twice as quickly as urban, inner-city areas.

2. Age segregation is costly

While spatial age segregation is often viewed as natural, or even beneficial, the recent trend is troublesome for a number of reasons. Age groups living apart places growing pressure on public services. When young adults and their retired parents live in close proximity to one another, the former can provide health assistance for the latter, and the latter childcare for the former; but as families drift apart, the onus falls on the state to care for both. Moreover, the Social Integration Commission in 2014 estimated the cost of age, ethnicity and socio-economic segregation to be over £6billion each year.

An even greater concern with regard to citizenship and civic engagement, however, is the social and political cost of the phenomenon. A lack of face-to-face contact — a natural byproduct of age segregation — undermines trust and solidarity between generations. IF research suggests that older people in Britain have the most negative impression of the young out of any country in Europe. Spatial divides cause social divides, make different groups more susceptible to media stereotypes and limits opportunities to identify common goals, culture and knowledge; age segregation is self-perpetuating phenomenon.

Finally, uneven concentration of age groups causes political problems, as competition among the old and young for limited resources and institutions to meet their age-specific needs causes the political subordination of shrinking local minority age groups. This is a particular concern in rural and suburban areas, where the combination of older populations and disparities in propensity to vote leave young people underrepresented. Far from benign, the current pattern promises to reduce intergenerational social contact, to place strain upon care services, to cause disparity in political power, and to foster distrust and fear. It promises to compromise integration, tolerance and cohesion in British society.

3. Housing policy is a key cause of growing segregation, but can also effect positive change

One of the main causes of this divide is Britain's housing crisis. Students and young families are renting privately in city centres at higher rates as they are no longer able to afford property in the suburbs; the rise in the house price to median income ratio means that far fewer young adults are able to take their first steps onto the property ladder. The flight of youth to the city centres is also a concern for rural communities, whose future viability is threatened by shrinking local working-age populations. The housing crisis and rural-urban economic imbalance must be addressed in order to treat the aforementioned social and economic ills.

As IF has previously argued, a policy that makes it easier for people living in large homes to subdivide them without requiring planning permission has huge potential to open new housing units. Promoting downsizing-in-situ would have a number of benefits: it would enable older people who want to downsize — but would not be willing if it meant leaving their local communities — to do so. In subdividing the top storey of their homes into one bedrooms flats for young people to buy, they would increase housing supply and relieve the inflationary pressures that limit property ownership among young people; and living in close quarters would increase inter-age mixing, fostering understanding and shared experience. Providing opportunities to downsize in cities would also allow older property-owners in cities to find more suitable living spaces without being forced to move to rural areas; this could be achieved by enabling private developers to provide older people with housing under Section 106 agreements. Finally, ensuring new developments contain a wide mix of housing types and a variety of tenures will promote inter-age communities.

Together, these policies could stabilise or even begin to reverse the trend towards growing age segregation, which would have benefits for both young and old alike.

7 September 2017

International Association for Community Development – written evidence (CCE0036)

This response is from the International Association for Community Development (IACD). Community development is a practice-based profession and an academic discipline concerned with the organisation, education and empowerment of people within their communities and the International Association for Community Development (IACD) is the only global network for those who work in this field.

We are accredited with the U.N. and have members across the world.

This response is based on our long and wide experience of working on a wide range of community development issues, comparing experience and drawing lessons from dozens of countries over a period of 64 years. (2018 is our 65th anniversary year). Our HQ is based in Glasgow, UK and we receive core funding from the Scottish Government as well as income from membership subscriptions and from our activities.

IACD:-

- organises international conferences and smaller regional events;
- publishes an international community development magazine and other resources;
- supports national community development associations;
- runs international study visits and exchange programmes;
- provides continuing professional training opportunities;
- has an extensive bank of teaching and learning resources;
- seeks to influence and respond to international public policies that impact upon communities and the sector;
- advocates for community development at the U.N. and other international arenas.

More information about the association can be found on our website www.iacdglobal.org

1. As an international organisation, IACD is concerned with issues that cross national borders. But we recognise that for people to be able to participate and relate to each other anywhere there have to be democratic frameworks in each country. People have to feel themselves to be citizens of somewhere in particular in order to be citizens of the world. And where they are not citizens, whether because they are visitors, refugees, asylum seekers or stateless persons, they particularly need the hospitality and inclusiveness of those who are citizens.

However, formal citizenship is not enough to ensure commitment to shared values and cooperative endeavour. Symbolic and educational measures are important but what is even more essential is personal involvement in practical community action, linking the individual with others in some purposeful joint effort. This builds the experience of citizenship without necessarily theorising it. It may consist in action to improve one's neighbourhood, take part in a social activity, help people suffering from a particular health condition, campaign on a current issue, protect the environment or numerous other topics. It is through such lived activities, carried out in a spirit of mutual benefit and respect, that people know themselves to be members of society alongside others, whether from similar or different backgrounds.

The visible expression of these types of activities is the community sector of independent groups in each locality or across wider areas in all countries. Community development (CD) is the set of techniques and values which nurtures this sector. A policy on citizenship should therefore give a high priority to ensuring the health of the community sector, deploying CD practitioners where needed to achieve this. Here we would urge the committee to acknowledge and indeed build upon the UK's extensive tradition of governmental and non-governmental support for community development as a practice profession since the 1960s both domestically and overseas.

The importance of CD in this respect is not merely its fund of skills and techniques but the values of equality, diversity and cooperation that are built into them. Community activity sometimes arises from dissatisfaction with local conditions, from protest, and from social tensions, and it is vital that its motivations are understood and guided into constructive forms. This applies equally to communities of locality and communities of identity, interest or ethnicity. CD practitioners work with them all, respecting the identities that people choose for themselves but at the same time instilling the message that all must respect the identities chosen by others. These values are of course not unique to CD, but CD is the occupation which applies them in the detailed life of local groups and networks.

2. We find the phraseology of this question slightly disturbing, as it implies that your concern is only with people who are formally citizens. We see it as vital that other people living in this country (or in any country) who for one reason or another do not have formal citizenship status should nevertheless be included in citizen-like activity and experience. It is important to make extra effort to overcome the feelings of alienation and exclusion that they are likely to experience. This is not incompatible with encouraging pride in being or becoming British, but such pride should be vested in Britain's once-famed qualities of tolerance and inclusiveness, not in some supposed superiority or exclusiveness.
- 3/4. We see the main obstacles to active citizenship not as matters of legality but policies which exacerbate inequality and divisiveness. We believe that the virtual disappearance of the 'Big Society' initiative shows that it was unwise to seek to separate community involvement from state support and cooperation with public services. The community sector and parts of the voluntary sector have significantly dwindled in the last few years, notably in England

(less so in Scotland). We would advocate new investment in those forms of community and voluntary activity which particularly enhance the experience of cooperative involvement in society (not merely in the form of contracts to voluntary organisations to deliver parts of the public services). This includes recognising once again the important role that local councils can make in employing CD strategies AND professionals.

5. There is undoubtedly scope for better education in citizenship. Past initiatives on this subject in schools have sometimes been little more than arrangement of volunteering. Although we recognise and welcomed the initiative taken in the early 2000s regarding citizenship education in all secondary schools as a core subject, that encompasses such notions as political literacy (knowledge and skills) and practical experiences of getting involved in local communities (of locality, interest and identity). What needs to be conveyed is a more all-round understanding by young people (and indeed adults through community education support and the role of the media) of how society works, in terms of decision-making and negotiation between different interests through the democratic framework at national and local levels. Many schools, colleges and universities do have imaginative schemes in this area, but others regard it as a marginal issue which can be dropped in order to concentrate purely on formal qualifications. We would like to see a review of the extent and content of genuine good practice on citizenship education, followed by strong guidance throughout the lifelong education system. However, again we would stress that the emphasis should be on understanding how society works and on practical experience of co-operative activity, not merely on symbolic declarations.
6. We do not have a single view on the efficacy of the national citizen service. We can see considerable value however from all young people, in that important transition period after school, engaging in community development type programmes and have seen this work in many countries, where it is well planned and supervised and where there is a strong partnership between schools, post school institutions and the local voluntary sector in ensuring a rich practical placement. Such citizenship service programmes should also be linked with proactive policies and funding programmes by the government et al that assist the host voluntary/community organisation to professionally host young people (and indeed adults) engaging in a citizenship service experience. VSO and CVS in the UK have had years of experience in this area which should be learnt from.
7. The most natural and common motivations to civic engagement often occur in relation to public services, since these affect people's daily lives, whether in the form of housing, education, health, policing, environment or other fields. To encourage active citizenship it is therefore necessary that the services are delivered in such a way as to invite and value user involvement and in what is currently known as 'co-production'. This should go beyond merely consultation, by developing active decision-making partnerships between providers and users. CD is again a key instrument here, but, given the closed nature of large institutions, the requirement for them to develop genuine partnerships has to come from government and its local agencies. A number of tragic disasters in recent years (the Grenfell Tower fire being only the most recent) reveal a chronic lack of partnership and joint decision-making between providers and users. And it is for this reason that we would strongly urge that the committee learns from the best of the past, where CD practitioners employed within the local state and other agencies can have a hugely significant role to play in training and supporting all public servants to adopt more citizen engaging and empowering processes.

23 August 2017

Involve – written evidence (CCE0187)

Involve – written evidence (CCE0187)

Who we are

Involve is a charity and think tank. We want to build a democracy that works for everyone – that gives people real power to effect change in their lives, communities and beyond.

We believe our political system is lacking three essential qualities of democracy:

- Openness – The public should be able to understand, influence and hold decisions-makers to account for the actions and inactions of their governments;
- Participation – People should have the freedom, support and opportunity to shape their communities and influence the decisions that affect their lives;
- Deliberation – A key role of democracy is exchanging and acknowledging different perspectives, understanding conflict and finding common ground, and building a shared vision for society.

We believe that these qualities of democracy are essential for solving 21st century challenges - including extreme inequality, the impacts of globalisation, climate change, rapid technological development and the pressures of an aging society - and for achieving a more equal distribution of political power.

Evidence

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1. Active citizenship and civic engagement are essential qualities of any healthy and functioning society and democracy. The literature and research on active citizenship suggests a wide range of benefits for individuals, the state and society:

- Creates a vibrant civil society, an important counter-check to the state and the market
- Fosters social capital (i.e. the ties and shared norms between people)
- Develops people's confidence and sense of self-determination
- Contributes to well-being
- Strengthens the legitimacy and accountability of democratic institutions
- Empowers local communities
- Builds social cohesion
- Improves the effectiveness and efficiency of public services
- Increases political efficacy and self-esteem

1.2. Involve's Pathways through Participation research, with NCVO and the Institute for Volunteering Research, found that active citizenship can be grouped into three main categories (although there are clearly many overlaps between them):

- Social participation: the collective activities that individuals are involved in, including being involved in formal voluntary organisations (e.g. volunteering for a charity shop or being a trustee), informal or grassroots community groups (e.g. a tenants' and residents' association or a sports club), and formal and informal mutual aid and self help (e.g. a peer-support group or a community gardening group).
- Public participation: the engagement of individuals with the various structures and institutions of democracy, including voting, contacting a political representative, campaigning and lobbying, and taking part in consultations and demonstrations.
- Individual participation: people's individual actions and choices that reflect the kind of society they want to live in, including buying fair trade or green products, boycotting products from particular countries, recycling, signing petitions, giving to charity and informal helpful gestures (such as visiting an elderly neighbour).

Citizenship, civic engagement and identity

1.3. Our Pathways through Participation research found that how and why people participate is closely linked to their sense of identity. This extract from the research summarises the findings on the links between active citizenship and identity:

1.3.1. Participation is about individual motivations and personal preferences. People got involved in activities that had personal meaning and value and that connected with the people, interests and issues that they held dear. We identified six categories of meanings that motivated interviewees to participate:

- helping others
- developing relationships
- exercising values and beliefs
- having influence
- for personal benefit
- being part of something.

1.3.2. People often have multiple motivations for participating – some linked to a belief system or moral code, for example the 'greater good' – and others more self-interested. We found that people gain as well as give when they participate. This is not to suggest that participation lacks altruism, but rather that if there is not some mutual benefit then people's involvement may falter. Interviewees often spoke about gaining from participating (in terms of friendship, satisfaction, influence, support, confidence, skills and recognition) as much as they gave (in terms of time, money, compassion, care and energy).

1.3.3. Individuals often participated in activities and groups because of the people they knew, liked, enjoyed being around and cared about. A desire to make and/or embed social connections, meet new people and combat isolation or loneliness led many people to get involved in a collective activity. The human desire to be with others in a joint endeavour, and the strength and quality of the relationships between fellow participants that grow through belonging to a group, came through vividly in our research.

1.3.4. We found that people's values, beliefs and worldviews are closely linked to their experiences, social connections, cultural and social norms, and perceptions of community (of place and interest), as well as life spheres (the different elements that make up an individual's life – for example, family and work). All these elements are integral to people's identity and self-image and are crucial to understanding their motivations for participation.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1. Membership and belonging are formed through active engagement with community and social life. A more effective way of strengthening people's identity as citizens than ceremonial events would be to demonstrate people's stake and efficacy within their community and wider society. The Hansard Society's Audit of Political Engagement shows that only 23% of people perceive that they have an influence over decision-making locally, falling to 16% for decision-making nationally.

2.2. Research has shown that the involvement of people in local decision making can have a range of benefits both for them and public bodies. This includes making people feel more connected to their local community, increasing their sense of self efficacy, and encouraging other forms of civic engagement. Attempts to promote citizenship must, therefore, extend beyond the symbolic to involving people in shaping their lives, communities and beyond.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Involve – written evidence (CCE0187)

3.1. Citizens should have the right to have their voices heard by the state on the issues that affect their lives. One model that could be explored is the Tuscany Regional Participation Policy.

3.2. The Tuscany Regional Participation Policy (TPPR) institutionalises participatory, deliberative processes as a regular part of administration and governance throughout Tuscany. Introduced into Tuscan regional law in 2007, and strengthened in 2013, the central purpose of the TPPR is, as declared in Article 1 No 46/2013, “contributing to renew democracy and its institutions by integrating them with practices, processes and tools of participatory democracy”, and, through this, to develop “greater social cohesion, through the diffusion of a culture of participation, and valuing all forms of civic engagement, knowledge and skills disseminated in society”.

3.3. The law goes on to establish an obligation on local and regional governments to develop varied participatory processes for engaging citizens in the construction of public policies and projects. These obligations are based on the principle that participation is a basic human right and that it is the responsibility of public institutions to provide opportunities for this, and ensure the right tools are in place to enable effective participation.

3.4. The law also provided for the creation of an independent institution in charge of the promotion of participatory processes: “the Authority for participation”. This body has the role of monitoring the development of a more participatory culture across the region and distributing funding to support innovative methodological approaches to participation (including the use of new information and communication technologies) to enable new forms of exchange to develop between institutions and citizens.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1. At the heart of the electoral reform debate are questions of fairness and values. Any electoral system will include biases that impact who votes, how they vote and who benefits. These are important constitutional decisions that must be made through an open and fair process. Politicians and political parties naturally have a self-interest in promoting a system that increases their chances of being (re)elected, and therefore are not best placed to make decisions that reflect the wider public interest. We believe, therefore, that these are decisions citizens themselves should have a role in making.

4.2. There are already a number of international examples of Citizens’ Assemblies being held on such issues. Citizens’ Assemblies bring together a randomly selected group of the public to deliberate and reach recommendations on an issue, which are often then either reviewed by Parliament or go to a public referendum. Ireland, for example, is midway through its second citizens' assembly on constitutional reform. The first covered issues including presidential terms, voting age, the electoral system, and voting rights for expats, while the current assembly's remit includes considering fixed term parliaments and referenda.

4.3. While voting is an important expression of citizenship and civic engagement, it is not the only one. There are a wide variety of other mechanisms through which citizens can be engaged in informing and taking decisions in local and national policy making. As well as the benefits to people's sense of belonging, efficacy, citizenship, etc., outlined above, these forms of engagement give a more detailed and accurate picture of people's policy preferences than voting. Therefore, in addition to electoral reform, attention should be paid to these wider opportunities to promote political engagement.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1. Through our work with young people, they have told us that there should be more of an emphasis on citizenship education within the school curriculum. Unless you do politics at A-level or have politically engaged parents it is unlikely that you will leave school understanding the political system and how decisions get made.

5.2. Beyond the classroom, though, we believe that the most effective way to form young people into active citizens is to give them the experience of making a difference on an issues that matters to them. No classroom lesson can replicate the feeling of actually exercising political power.

5.3. An example of such an approach from Involve's own work is our MH:2K project on youth mental health. Mental health conditions affect about 1 in 10 young people in the UK, with vulnerable groups particularly at risk. MH:2K was developed by Involve and Leaders Unlocked to engage young people in conversations about mental health in their local area. It empowers 14-25 year olds to identify the mental health issues that they see as most important; engage their peers in discussing and exploring these topics; and work with key local decision-makers to make recommendations for change.

5.4. The MH:2K model consists of six key components:

Involve – written evidence (CCE0187)

1. Recruitment of a core team of young people as ‘Citizen Researchers’, including those with direct experience of mental health issues and individuals from at risk groups.
2. Design Days to allow this team to explore key national and local information about youth mental health, alongside their own views and experiences. The Researchers determine which mental health issues are most significant for their area. They receive training in research, facilitation and public speaking.
3. Roadshow: The Citizen Researchers co-design and co-deliver workshops to engage at least 500 other young people in the topics they have identified to be the most significant for their area. The workshops stimulate informal learning and gather young people’s views on the issues and potential solutions.
4. Results Day: The Citizen Researchers help analyse and extract key findings. They work with local decision-makers to develop strong, practical recommendations for change.
5. Big Showcase: The Citizen Researchers present their findings and recommendations to key stakeholders at a showcase event, involving facilitated conversations about next steps.
6. An Expert Panel of key local decision-makers and stakeholders informs the project’s work throughout its lifetime.

5.5. The process was piloted in Oldham between September 2016 and May 2017. Twenty young adults from diverse backgrounds were recruited to become the first MH:2K Citizen Researchers. Armed with the right knowledge and support, the Citizen Researchers selected five key priorities to address through the pilot: Self-harm; Stigma; Professional Practice; Family and Relationships; The Environment; and Culture of Education. The recommendations of the Citizen Researchers were heard by representatives of Oldham Council, CCG and youth sector organisations, many of which are in the process of being implemented.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

-

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1. There are a range of ways in which the state can encourage civic engagement, but it must be recognised that people’s motivations for participating in political and social life are often deeply rooted in their sense of identity.

7.2. This extract from our Pathways through Participation research summarises our findings and recommendations on supporting civic engagement:

1. Participation is personal and must be viewed first and foremost from the perspective of the individual taking part

7.2.1. Policy-makers and practitioners who wish to promote and encourage participation must view participation holistically, because trying to channel individuals into narrowly defined areas of participation is unlikely to result in more active citizens. If an individual does not identify with a particular cause or activity, reducing the barriers to them becoming involved is unlikely to make a difference. Any attempt to encourage participation must take into account the differing and multiple motivations people have for becoming and staying involved.

7.2.2. Participation is inherently about a free choice to take part without coercion. Our interviewees defined their own participation and made their own decisions about how and why they participated according to their upbringing, life stages, personality traits, beliefs and values, interests and personal circumstances. In contrast, government policy was never described as a motivating factor by the interviewees, and any influence was reported negatively: imposition of government agendas and intentions on people’s existing activities, for example, was viewed as politicising their participation and was almost unanimously rejected.

7.2.3. People’s negative reaction to the imposition of agendas that are not theirs has potentially been exacerbated by government’s encouragement of comparatively narrow, highly formalised and structured forms of participation (e.g. public consultations, regeneration boards, health consultative bodies, formal volunteering). This does not fit easily with the variety of participation activities we identified. It can also be counter-productive: it can dissuade some people from participating and limit the diversity of people involved, or kill-off local groups through, for example, processes and demands that are too formalised, and generally inhibit less structured forms of participation.

2. Participation can be encouraged, supported and made more attractive

7.2.4. Our research identified a range of factors that fostered people's participation. There are many basic practical reasons why people do and do not participate that can be addressed. Our research challenges assumptions that non-participation is about apathy, laziness or selfishness. Participation opportunities need to complement people's lives and respond to people's needs, aspirations and expectations. The 'build it and they will come' approach does not work in isolation.

7.2.5. People juggle many competing demands for their time and attention and their priorities will vary according to personal circumstances and life stage. This has implications for the role that participation can play in local communities and wider society. Current policy agendas that look to citizens to take control and manage community assets or deliver public services, for example, are unlikely to be attractive forms of involvement for people who want to engage in a more episodic, light-touch way.

7.2.6. While participation is already widespread, there is significant potential for more opportunities to participate to be made available to a wider range of people. We found that few people had a full picture of the range of opportunities available to them locally. Decisions about what to do and how to get involved tended to be almost entirely the result of personal contact (e.g. being asked by a friend) or finding information of direct personal relevance (e.g. an advert to join the parent-teachers' association of their child's school). Support bodies and other public and voluntary and community organisations also often had only a partial picture of local activities, groups and events, which limited the extent to which they could help provide access to relevant and appropriate opportunities for individuals wanting to participate.

7.2.7. These findings complement previous research which has, for example, found that smaller, grassroots organisations rarely engaged with Volunteer Centres and often existed independently of such structures. However, we observed that well-run and welcoming groups, the right physical locations in which to meet and sufficient funds can create the right growing conditions for people to participate and provide a positive experience that will encourage them to continue participating.

7.2.8. Many interviewees highlighted how their parents and wider family had played an influential role in instilling a culture of participation and/or the values and beliefs that later framed their participation. But not all interviewees had been socialised into participation through their family; schools and youth groups (such as Scouts and Guides) also played an important role in providing opportunities for participatory activities during people's formative years.

7.2.9. Institutions, organisations and groups enable participation by providing resources and support, and in some cases, bridging communities through their everyday contacts with people. Places of worship and community centres provided a range of opportunities to participate, some within their own walls and some beyond. The importance of physical spaces where diverse groups can meet, and bonds and networks are formed and maintained, was found throughout the research: without access to a hall or a room many collective activities would simply not happen. The spaces that provide access to a range of activities and people allow pathways and connections to be established that support sustained participation.

7.2.10. Individuals who are bridge-builders within communities were also an important enabling factor. They brought people together and facilitated access to opportunities and routes into participation. However, sometimes key individuals were seen as a mixed blessing if they acted as barriers to the involvement of others, perhaps protecting their own positions at the expense of others, or preventing new people from taking up leadership roles.

3. Significant barriers to participation are entrenched

7.2.11. At present much policy remains focused on initiatives to address the symptoms (e.g. technology to promote volunteering and giving opportunities) without addressing the underlying causes (e.g. lack of confidence or resources).

7.2.12. We found that deeper and more entrenched issues in society are reflected in disparities in the practice of participation. Issues of power and inequality in society are critical to understanding how and why people get involved and stay involved. The uneven distribution of power, social capital and other resources means that not everyone has access to the same opportunities for participation nor do they benefit from the impacts of participation in the same way. Such persistent and structural socio-economic inequalities are clearly challenging to address and cannot be removed without profound political and societal changes.

7.2.13. Our recommendations are clustered around three themes:

1. Develop realistic expectations of participation

7.2.14. An over-optimistic view of participation can portray participation as the answer to all society's ills but it is important that we acknowledge its limitations and develop realistic expectations of what can be achieved. This requires policymakers to be clear about the purpose of the participation they want to see happening, and to recognise that almost everyone already participates in one way or another. It also requires institutions, organisations and groups to recognise that participation is dynamic and that opportunities need to be flexible; that participation should be mutually beneficial – participants need to gain something from the experience; and that people have limited time and sometimes just want participation that is sociable and enjoyable.

2. Understand what policy and practice interventions can and cannot achieve

7.2.15. Policy and practice interventions can influence participation, but there are many other factors that shape how and why an individual participates, and that affect the desired impact of policy and practice decisions. Participation is more bottom-up than top-down, and does not always happen in the ways policymakers and practitioners want or expect. Some factors that shape and encourage participation are easier and quicker to influence and shape than others.

7.2.16. We suggest that:

- An individual's motivations are difficult to shape in any predictable way but policy-makers and practitioners should acknowledge their importance and aim to understand them.
- An individual's resources cannot be wholly shaped by policy-makers and practitioners, but can be influenced by policy and practice decisions and initiatives.
- An individual's opportunities to participate can be shaped collectively by policy-makers and practitioners.

3. Improve participation opportunities

7.2.17. The first step in improving participation opportunities is to establish strong foundations by starting at an early age, providing appropriate formal and informal places and spaces for people to meet and join in activities, and creating links and pathways between individuals and organisations through networks and hubs.

7.2.18. Improving participation opportunities requires starting where people are and taking account of their concerns and interests, providing a range of opportunities and levels of involvement so people can feel comfortable with taking part, and using the personal approach to invite and welcome people in. Support is needed to enable institutions, organisations and groups to learn how to operate more effectively and therefore sustain people's interest and involvement. It is vital to value people's experience and what they do, at whatever level of intensity. Language referring to the 'usual suspects', 'NIMBYs' and 'do-gooders' is pejorative and creates a negative mood around active participation and should be avoided. The design and management of public consultations should be improved, so that participants feel it is worth taking part and that their contribution can make a difference.

7.2.20. Finally, organisations and government at all levels need to be aware of the benefits of participation, and use these to promote involvement. Similarly, those already involved can tell positive stories about their experience, and encourage others they know to participate. The recruitment of new participants is almost always more effective through word of mouth.

Involve – written evidence (CCE0187)

8 September 2017

Dr Toby James, Senior Lecturer, University of East Anglia – written evidence (CCE0131)

Introductory remarks and overview

1. The committee has invited evidence on the changing nature of citizenship and civic engagement in the twenty-first century. This is an important and timely issue because of the challenges that the committee flags in its terms of reference.
2. Being a citizen involves more than just voting at elections. However, elections are the primary mechanism through which citizens can give their democratic voice and hold governments to account. Participating in elections is therefore an essential component of being a citizen. There is a civic duty for every individual to take part in the electoral process. But there is also a duty upon central and local government to make it as easy and convenient for citizens to take part in the electoral process as possible. Societal changes mean that many individuals may lack the time to navigate through difficult bureaucratic hurdles to register and cast their vote.
3. I am a Senior Lecturer at the University of East Anglia whose research focuses on how electoral administration and management can be reformed to increase civic engagement at the ballot box. My research has been funded by many organisations (ESRC, AHRC, Nuffield Foundation, Electoral Commission, British Academy and the McDougall Trust) over many years. I am currently the Lead Fellow on Electoral Modernisation to the All Party Parliamentary Group on Democratic Participation and co-author of the group's report on Getting the missing millions back on the electoral register: a vision for voter registration reform in the UK.⁴⁵⁹ I am therefore submitting evidence to the committee based on my research and will comment specifically on the questions where I have unique findings that may assist the committee.
4. In summary, this submission argues that the committee could improve citizenship at the ballot box by recommending concrete reforms to continue to modernise the electoral process to keep it in line with the twentieth-first century.

Question 4: 'Do current laws encourage active political engagement?... Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?'

5. Being a citizen involves much more than taking part in the electoral process by casting a vote. However, this is an essential component of it. Without active participation at the ballot box then the results of elections may not be representative of the views of the population and there is a much less rigorous check on the accountability of decision-makers, at national, local and mayoral elections.

⁴⁵⁹ James, T.S., Bite the Ballot and Clear View Research (2016) 'Getting the missing millions back on the electoral register,' the All Party Parliamentary Group on Voter Registration, April 2016, with Bite the Ballot.

6. Turnout at UK elections remains low, especially amongst young people. At the 2017 general election, 54 per cent of 18-24 years olds voted. Overall, 68.5 per cent voted. This was a reversal of the long decline in turnout in UK general elections and the gap between young and old narrowed considerably. There remains a large gap, however.⁴⁶⁰ Turnout is also much lower in other types of elections. Turnout in the 2017 Metropolitan Mayoral elections ranged from 21 to 32.9 per cent.⁴⁶¹ There remains a democratic deficit.
7. There are many reasons why citizens do not vote. This includes a general level of disengagement and cynicism about politicians and the ‘establishment’. One reason why many people do not vote, however, is that the process of casting a vote was designed in the Victorian era and require a fundamental re-think for the twenty-first century. Society has become more complex with individuals and families having different working patterns and lifestyles. The electoral process has not kept pace with this. Studies show that making it more convenient for the citizen to vote can increase the chances that they will cast their vote.⁴⁶²
8. Those policies, which have an evidence base, that the committee could consider are as follows:
 - Voting at any polling station. Citizens are currently required to vote in a designated polling station - one located near to where they live. However, this is often not convenient for many voters. The system of having a paper-based register in polling stations prevents citizens being able to vote in any polling station, such as one near to their workplace, university or school. In many countries, however, citizens can vote in a variety of polling stations because electoral officials have an electronic version of the register. This allows them to mark off a voter who casts their ballot. Such a system would require capital investment in the UK, but deserves to be piloted. It would also address concerns about electoral fraud.
 - Extended voting hours including weekend voting. Elections are held on a Thursday in the UK out of tradition rather than a rational analysis. Turnout might be higher if elections were held at weekends or advance voting was available. There were some ⁴⁶⁰ Toby S. James (2017) ‘How strong is the democratic integrity of the UK elections? And are turnout, candidacies and participation being maximized?’ in Patrick Dunleavy (eds) The Democratic Audit of 2017. London: Democratic Audit.

⁴⁶¹ House of Commons Library (2017). ‘Turnout’, Research Paper SM02633.

⁴⁶² Toby S. James (2012), Elite Statecraft and Election Administration, Palgrave, Basingstoke.

limited pilots of this between 2000-2007, but mixed evidence on the effects. It deserves further piloting.⁴⁶³

- All-postal elections. Experiments with all-postal elections in the UK between 2000-2004 suggested that this could have a significant positive effect on turnout in local and European elections. In many cases turnout rose by 50 per cent on the previous election.⁴⁶⁴
9. To take part in the electoral process citizens need to be registered to vote. The evidence is that there are millions of people missing from the electoral register, however. This is a problem that has developed over several decades as society has changed and reforms have not been to made the electoral registration process to keep up with this. The latest systematic estimate is that there were around 8 million people missing from the electoral register in December 2015, around 16% of the adult population.⁴⁶⁵
 10. Levels of electoral registration are also highly uneven. The evidence is that the register is less complete in urban areas (especially within London), amongst recent movers and private renters, Commonwealth and EU nationals, non-white ethnicities, lower socioeconomic groups, citizens with mental disabilities and young people. This matters more than ever before because this is the register on which the boundaries for future general elections will be drawn. These groups will have less representation in the UK Parliament than others. Democracy will suffer as a result.⁴⁶⁶
 11. Registration rates are also declining sharply among some groups. Table 1 charts out the proportion by age groups between the 2014 and 2015 register. Less than half of ‘attainers’ – the next generation of voters – are on the register, but nearly everyone over-65 is. But this is a situation which has worsened during the implementation of individual electoral registration (‘IER’) – a system that made it an individual’s responsibility to register to vote and asked them to provide their National Insurance number. Registration rates increased amongst older voters, but declined among younger voters.⁴⁶⁷

⁴⁶³ Toby S. James (2011) ‘Fewer “costs”, more votes? U.K. Innovations in Electoral Administration 2000-2007 and their effect on voter turnout’, Election Law Journal, 10(1), p.37-52,

⁴⁶⁴ Toby S. James (2011) ‘Fewer “costs”, more votes? U.K. Innovations in Electoral Administration 2000-2007 and their effect on voter turnout’, Election Law Journal, 10(1), p.37-52, ⁴⁶⁵ Toby S. James (2017) ‘How strong is the democratic integrity of the UK elections? And are turnout, candidacies and participation being maximized?’ in Patrick Dunleavy (eds) The Democratic Audit of 2017. London: Democratic Audit.

⁴⁶⁶ Toby S. James and Oliver Sidorczuk (2016) ‘Missing Millions’, Fabian Review, 2 August 2016.

⁴⁶⁷ Also see: (2014) ‘The Spill-over and Displacement Effects of Implementing Election Administration Reforms: Introducing Individual Electoral Registration in Britain’, Parliamentary Affairs, 67 (2): 281-305; Toby S. James (forthcoming), Comparative Electoral Management: Performance, Networks and Instruments (Routledge: London and New York).

Age group	Completeness of the electoral register (%)
	2014	2015	Change during introduction of IER
16-17	51	45	-6
18-19	76	65	-11
20-24	70	67	-3
25-34	74	70	-4
35-44	85	82	-3
45-54	91	90	-1
55-64	93	93	0
65 plus	95	96	+1

Table 1: Changes in registration rates after the introduction of IER. Source: author based on data in Electoral Commission (p.45)

12. Although it is in large part an individual’s responsibility to ensure that they register to vote and are on the electoral roll, there is evidence of confusion among behalf of the public. Research shows that:

- Citizens regularly attend polling stations to vote but are turned away because their names are not on the electoral register. At the 2015 general election, two-thirds of polling stations turned away at least one voter.⁴⁶⁸
- Citizens often don’t register because they think that the government knows about them because they pay their council tax and access other government services.⁴⁶⁹
- There are a large number of duplicate applications that overwhelm electoral officials. Unsure whether they are registered, citizens register again and again, ‘just in case’.⁴⁷⁰

⁴⁶⁸ Alistair Clark and Toby S. James (2017) ‘Poll Workers’ in Pippa Norris and Alesandro Nai (eds), Watchdog Elections: Transparency, Accountability, Compliance and Integrity. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press.

⁴⁶⁹ Toby S. James (2014) ‘Electoral Management in Britain’ in Pippa Norris, Richard Frank and Ferran Matinez I Coma (eds) Advancing Electoral Integrity (New York: Oxford University Press).

⁴⁷⁰ Alistair Clark and Toby S. James (2017) ‘Fair and Free? Electoral Administration in the 2016 EU Brexit Referendum.’ Paper prepared for the Midwest Political Science Association Conference, Chicago, and the UK Political Studies Association Conference, Glasgow, April 2017, with Alistair Clark.

- Electoral officials are generally under-resourced and this is affecting their voter outreach work.⁴⁷¹
13. There are many reforms which could make the registration process easier for the citizen, but which could also potentially save substantial amounts of time and resources for electoral officials (please also see the report on Getting the Missing Millions Back on to the Electoral Register for more information)⁴⁷²:
- Support voter outreach work in schools. New research shows that when local electoral officials visit schools to speak about voter registration and elections, voter registration rates among young people increase. However, funding cuts to local authorities has meant that these now happen less frequently.⁴⁷³
 - Prompt students to register to vote during university enrolment. Students are one of the most under-registered groups. A provision in the Higher Education Research Act means that universities will have to take any steps set out by the Office for Students to register their students. These steps are subject to ministerial guidance. An easy way to improve voter registration rates among students is to prompt them to register to vote at university enrolment each year. This should therefore be set out in clear directions from the Minister of State.⁴⁷⁴
 - Encourage recipients of National Insurance number notification letters to register to vote online. A National Insurance number is needed for citizens to register to vote. Many people do not know their National Insurance number and the process of finding it is often inconvenient and challenging. As noted above, attainers, one of the most under-registered groups, are sent their National Insurance numbers in a letter from HMRC just before their sixteenth birthday. With the necessary details at hand, this could become an important point at which they are also asked to register to vote.
 - National civic engagement forums. There are a variety of venues for electoral officials to work with stakeholders to identify emerging threats for electoral fraud and best practices to prevent it such as the annual Electoral Integrity Roundtable. There is no similar forum for civic engagement and voter registration. This could be an annual event organised by the Electoral Commission or Cabinet Office to which ⁴⁷¹ Toby S. James and Tyrone Jervier (2017) 'The cost of elections: The effects of public sector austerity on electoral integrity and voter engagement,' Public Money and Management, volume 37(7).

⁴⁷² James, T.S., Bite the Ballot and Clear View Research (2016) 'Getting the missing millions back on the electoral register,' the All Party Parliamentary Group on Voter Registration, April 2016, with Bite the Ballot.

⁴⁷³ Toby S. James and Tyrone Jervier (2017) 'The cost of elections: The effects of public sector austerity on electoral integrity and voter engagement,' Public Money and Management, volume 37(7).

⁴⁷⁴ Toby S. James, Josh Dell and Lord Rennard (2017) 'Too late for GE2017 – but now universities will have to play a role in registering students to vote,' Democratic Audit, 2 May 2017.

grassroots campaign organisations, political parties, academics, electoral officials and other stakeholders are invited to share best practices.

- Assess the impact of voter ID proposals. There is a risk that government proposals to require citizens to provide voter-ID could negatively affect voter participation.⁴⁷⁵
- Voter registration website. A system of online voter registration was introduced in 2014. However, for people to check whether they are on the electoral register, they need to contact their local authority. These enquiries can slow down the work of election officials and their staff. People may therefore register online again online, ‘just in case’, which then creates further work. It would be more efficient for the would-be voter and electoral services if citizens could check their own registration status online. Such a system was introduced in Ireland (see, www.checktheregister.ie) in 2006.⁴⁷⁶
- Prompt citizens to register to vote when accessing other government services. When a citizen pays their council tax or car tax, they could be asked to register to vote.⁴⁷⁷
- Pilot election-day registration. Citizens are required to register in advance of an election, but many miss-out because they register after the deadline.
- Review the need for a single national electronic register. There is no single electoral register in the UK – but hundreds of local registers which hinders the ability to improve accuracy and completeness. This is a technical reform – but makes many other reforms possible.
- Automatic registration. Citizens could be automatically registered to vote. In practice, automatic registration would probably need to focus on specific such as attainers who receive their National Insurance card. The principle could be piloted and expanded, however.

Question 7: How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

⁴⁷⁵ Toby S. James (2017) ‘Voter ID is a risky reform when 8m people are already missing from the electoral register’, Democratic Audit, 28th December.

⁴⁷⁶ Caroline Lucas and Toby S. James (2017) ‘Why isn’t the electoral registration process fully online?’, Open Democracy, 29th March 2017.

⁴⁷⁷ Toby S. James (2012), Elite Statecraft and Election Administration, Palgrave, Basingstoke.

Dr Jan Germen Janmaat, LLAKES Research Centre, Department of Education, Practice and Society, UCL Institute of Education and Professor Bryony Hoskins, Department of Social Sciences, University of Roehampton – written evidence (CCE0060)

14. Please see my comments in relation to question 4. Central and local government should play a key role in promoting civic engagement. The evidence is, however, that local government has been less proactive in this task because of funding cuts. Visits to schools are therefore becoming less common than they once were.⁴⁷⁸

8 September 2017

Dr Jan Germen Janmaat, LLAKES Research Centre, Department of Education, Practice and Society, UCL Institute of Education and Professor Bryony Hoskins, Department of Social Sciences, University of Roehampton – written evidence (CCE0060)

Submission of evidence in response to question:

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Response:

As liberal democracies are not ideologically neutral but are founded on a set of basic civic values, such as tolerance, equal treatment, respect for the law and political engagement, schools have a role to play in fostering these values. Schools can do this in a variety of ways. Evidence from existing research suggests that both citizenship education and ‘learning by doing’ or participatory approaches are effective in fostering these values. Citizenship education traditionally aims to transfer and debate political knowledge and terminology that young people need to understand the political system. It also trains them in the skills to navigate and participate in the political process. Learning by doing approaches essentially mimic the democratic political process in order to foster the skills and values such as negotiation, communication, efficacy, a sense of engagement, belonging and ownership among students. Such approaches include creating student councils and holding elections, as school activities that have been shown to have lasting effects on student political engagement, and facilitating a climate in which sensitive political and social issues can freely be discussed. Such a climate has been found to not only cultivate political knowledge and participation in general, but also to mitigate social disparities in students’ political engagement. Citizenship education and learning by doing approaches should not be seen as ⁴⁷⁸ Toby S. James and Tyrone Jervier (2017) ‘The cost of elections: The effects of public sector austerity on electoral integrity and voter engagement,’ Public Money and Management, volume 37(7); Toby S. James and Tyrone Jervier (2017) The Cost of Elections: Funding Electoral Services in England and Wales, ClearView Research: London, with Tyrone Jervier, June 2017.

Dr Jan Germen Janmaat, LLAKES Research Centre, Department of Education, Practice and Society, UCL Institute of Education and Professor Bryony Hoskins, Department of Social Sciences, University of Roehampton – written evidence (CCE0060) mutually exclusive. They complement one another and citizenship education can incorporate learning through practice pedagogies.

Citizenship education should be made available in the final two years of lower secondary (i.e. Key Stage 4) and in upper secondary (i.e. in Sixth Form and in Further Education), because mid to late adolescence is a crucial period for the formation of political identities and dispositions. Late adolescence is such a politically defining period because young people at this age begin to turn to society as a source of exploration after having examined family membership and questioned parental authority in early adolescence. Young people are therefore likely to be particularly receptive to educational influences on political dispositions during this life stage. But curiosity about society is not synonymous with political/civic engagement (indeed, this link is what citizenship education tries to establish). This means that not all adolescents will self-select into citizenship classes, even though they are likely to be curious about society. Therefore citizenship education should be compulsory as this ensures that everybody will benefit from the lessons. Making it an optional subject will only lead to the already engaged students, who as a rule are from middle class backgrounds, signing up for the programme. Voluntary programmes therefore risk not serving the disengaged groups. Having citizenship education as a compulsory programme makes all the more sense as existing research has found that students from disadvantaged backgrounds benefit more from citizenship education in terms of political engagement than their peers from more privileged backgrounds. Citizenship education is thus able to compensate for missing parental socialization.

The most important change that needs to happen in the current education system is the introduction of citizenship education as a compulsory course in upper secondary. The existing system of 16 to 19 education is characterised by a rigorous separation of the academic (A levels) and vocational (NVQ /Btech) track. The vocational track only offers training for specific professions rather than general courses. Citizenship education is altogether absent. It is therefore not surprising that existing research has found track attended to have an independent effect on students' political engagement, with students pursuing A levels having significantly higher levels of political participation (both in terms of voting and protest activities) than their peers studying for NVQ or B-tech qualifications, controlling for pre-track levels of political engagement. As students of disadvantaged backgrounds, who as a rule are less politically engaged, are disproportionately assigned to vocational education (since their GCSE results do not allow them to do A levels), the existing tracked system of upper secondary education only exacerbates social disparities in political engagement.

Other countries acknowledge the importance of education for active citizenship in upper secondary vocational education. France and Sweden already have citizenship education as a compulsory programme in all tracks of 16-19 education, and The Netherlands has recently introduced it in the vocational track. The highly esteemed system of vocational education in Germany includes a school component with general courses such as citizenship education. Sweden has even standardised citizenship education across the various tracks in upper secondary. The UK would do well to learn from these examples.

Joint submission – written evidence (CE0199)

Note: The research informing this response was funded by the Centre for Learning and Life Chances in Knowledge Economies and Societies (LLAKES). LLAKES is an ESRC funded Research Centre (grant ref: ES/J019135/1).

5 September 2017

Joint submission – written evidence (CE0199)

Introduction

At a time when our society feels more divided than ever, with disenfranchisement and a sense of exclusion on the rise, this inquiry is a timely and welcome step towards improving community integration for young people across the UK.

As part of this submission, a number of youth charities have come together to pool their expertise and experience across a number of issues, offering insight on how to make the UK a more inclusive society; one that is composed of prosperous communities of engaged, young citizens.

These charities are: The Scout Association, Leap Confronting Conflict, UK Youth, V Inspired, Girlguiding, NCS Trust, The Mix, Ambition, British Youth Council, Citizenship Foundation and City Year UK.

As a group, we have developed a submission that contains details of what we have learned about citizenship and civic engagement through our work with young people.

We all agree that developing a sense of citizenship and encouraging civic engagement is something that is most effective when it is done earlier in life.

The sooner young people discover a model of positive and active citizenship, the more likely they will be to emulate it and the more likely they are to feel included in their communities.

Most importantly, young people need to be empowered to define their own thoughts and be in control of how they participate in a global community. But it is important to recognise that the idea of citizenship has changed as the world has changed. How young people engage in their communities today is very different to previous generations especially as a result of technology and social media allowing individuals to connect and engage with others around the world.

We know that many teachers and schools do a fantastic job of teaching citizenship, and we firmly believe that citizenship should form part of the curriculum and be encouraged and supported.

Nevertheless, how citizenship is taught and promoted is inconsistent across the country and varies from year-to-year. That is not to say, however, that schools should shoulder the burden alone. We must work in partnership.

When it comes to building an inclusive society, we strongly believe that the third sector has a vital role to play. Many charities already do exceptional work when it comes offering young people opportunities that allow them to take part in society and learn to become active citizens. However, on matters of social exclusion and citizenship there are lessons to be learned and more that can be done in partnership with Government.

We know from our experience that programmes that offer structure for young people are successful at bringing young people together and imparting valuable knowledge and experience. We also know that when a young person's development is recorded and their achievements are recognised, it can improve levels of self-esteem and other important life skills. Young people who are able to access these kinds of programmes are supported in their development as active citizens.

We believe it is essential that the Government supports the youth sector in delivering its work in developing active citizens, and seeks a cross-departmental approach to these issues. We would encourage both the Committee and the Government to review closely the experience of the youth sector when making recommendations or considering future policy initiatives.

In the pages that follow, you will find further detail on our positions, which draw on a variety of evidence. We hope the Committee find this submission useful as part of your considerations and would be happy to provide further thoughts and evidence as needed.

Executive summary & recommendations

There are deep divisions in our society and we welcome the Committee’s remit to explore the issues of citizenship and civic engagement in the twenty-first century.

As a sector, we believe that citizenship is about understanding one’s role and responsibility to others in their community, as well as understanding society’s challenges and working collectively to make a difference.

We must work together to build an inclusive society and strongly believe that organisations like ours have a vital role to play. But, it will also require a long-term commitment from Government if we are to help young people to build deeper roots within their communities.

Working collectively, as part of our submission we make 10 recommendations that we would encourage the Select Committee to consider in greater depth as part of this inquiry.

Recommendations

1. Utilise money from dormant assets to support third sector organisations to drive and deliver civil society initiatives

...

Following the publication of the Dormant Asset Commission’s report, the Government committed to consulting on how to best use this money. Potentially up to £2bn to support good causes. We strongly recommend that Government acts quickly to identify how a proportion of these funds can be used to support the citizenship agenda.

2. Create a legal status for full-time volunteers

...

Full-time volunteers are in “legal limbo” and have no legal status other than NEET. Full-time volunteers have an important role to play and can have a significant return on funding with participants improving their employability skills. They should be legally recognised.

3. Automatically register young people onto the electoral roll at the point they also receive their national insurance number

...

The Government must find ways to make the registration process easier by utilising technology and social media platforms to encourage young people to get involved in the democratic process. Automatically registering young people on the electoral roll would be one way of doing this.

4. Collaborate with existing reviews and make bold recommendations to Government

...

Following recent events, several reviews are now underway, including the Youth Social Action Review being chaired by Steve Holliday. We would encourage the House of Lords

Citizenship & Civic Engagement Committee to work closely with this review as it presents a real opportunity for the Committee to make bold recommendations that Government should be encouraged to accept and act upon.
5. Implement The Russell Commission’s recommendations on how to support civic engagement ... Specifically, the Committee should look carefully at any proposal that helps to: i) Implement strategies to ensure volunteering within public services is an attractive proposition for young people, and ii) Involve young people at the highest level to help establish the types of roles that would appeal to them.
6. Carefully consider how a lack of representation affects the extent to which young people are willing to engage with politics and within their local communities ... Some research, combined with our experience, suggests that young people are put off by imbalance and disparity of those elected to represent them. For example, a recent IPPR report, Power to the people? Tackling the gender imbalance in local government & combined authorities, highlighted the barriers women faced to entering local government. If we are to succeed in encouraging young people to participate, we must find ways to remove such barriers.
7. Review and implement findings of international ‘domestic gap years’ in the UK ... We would encourage the Committee to look at international comparisons and how “domestic gap years” work. Important lessons can be learnt that should be implemented in the UK for similar voluntary schemes.
8. Encourage schools to work closer in partnership with third sector organisations and emphasise supporting young people in care ... It is essential that schools are encouraged to be more open to working in partnership with a number of organisations including ourselves. What’s more, particular effort is needed on i) Supporting young people in care ii) Young people in prison reintegrating into society and iii) helping young people from poor and deprived backgrounds. A collective approach should be supported in order to resolve our shared objectives.
9. Invest in existing role-model and mentoring initiatives ... Young people are most influenced by people they know personally – it could be a parent, a teacher or a friend. However, role-models, whoever they are (e.g. celebrities, high-profile individuals or a friend) can make a real impact on a young person’s life. For that reason, we need to invest further and show greater support for role-model and mentoring initiatives.

10. Encourage young people to think seriously about their values and how they relate to the values of others within their community

...

We believe young people should be encouraged to think seriously about their values and how they relate to the values of others within their community. Providing a definition of British values is not required but much could be gained from creating space for young people to explore their own identities and how they are embedded in society.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship & civic engagement

- 1.1 Citizenship is a critical part of an inclusive society. We believe citizenship is about understanding and acting upon one's role and responsibility to others in their communities, as well as understanding society's challenges and working collectively to make a difference.
- 1.2 We believe that young people can play an important role in their communities, and that the practice of 'citizenship' and 'civic engagement' should be nurtured from a young age.
- 1.3 It is important to understand and recognise that the nature of citizenship has changed: what it means for young people today is very different to what it meant to previous generations. For example, young people are much more connected on a global level and place a greater emphasis on using digital platforms to engage a wider audience.
- 1.4 The way in which young people connect and engage through digital channels and social media platforms has fundamentally changed the very essence and dynamic of citizenship.

- 1.5 More broadly, we believe civic engagement is too narrow a concept to address the issues identified by the Committee. The focus should be on helping people to understand their communities and giving them the opportunities to express themselves and make a positive contribution independently.
- 1.6 It is essential that young people are in control of this process and can identify among themselves what it means to be a citizen in today's world.
- 1.7 Building knowledge of democracy and democratic processes and institutions will help young people to achieve this. Society as a whole needs to both enable and encourage young people to take part in the democratic process. It is important that we learn from the enthusiasm demonstrated by young people at recent elections to encourage them to stay involved – for too long youth engagement in politics at a local and national level has been poor. Parliamentarians finding opportunities to visit local youth programmes to meet their young constituents will help young people to gain an appreciation for local and national politics, whilst engaging them in key issues which affect their age group.

The problem today and why it matters

- 1.8 Society is becoming increasingly divided. The Brexit result revealed deep divisions across the country while the Social Mobility Commission's report, Time for Change, warned that social and economic division will widen without radical and urgent reform.
- 1.9 In our experience, young people feel increasingly disconnected from their communities which has dangerous consequences. Recently, the country has witnessed an increase in recorded hate crimes, violence and extremism.
- 1.10 Young people are being targeted and, in many areas, feel disenfranchised. This results in wasted opportunity and untapped potential, which negatively impacts our societies as a whole.
- 1.11 Some young people who are disproportionately represented amongst people who have grown up in care, been excluded from school or caught up in the criminal justice system are particularly likely to feel disconnected from their communities. Programmes that promote civic engagement should make particular efforts to engage these young people.
- 1.12 However, we know that when individuals feel part of their community and are recognised for the impact they make, it has a huge benefit on their mental wellbeing (as this research from the #iwill campaign illustrates). Research from Ipsos Mori found that NCS improves personal resilience, leaving participants feeling better equipped to handle whatever comes their way. Research from the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow (2016) also found that people who were Scouts or Girlguiding members in childhood have better mental health in later life. What's more, research from the Duke of Edinburgh awards shows that two-thirds of young people feel that being engaged in their community helped to develop their self-esteem (DoE research). Even for very young children, the difference can be dramatic. A randomised control trial organised by the Cabinet Office in 2014 showed that the Citizenship Foundation's Make a Difference Challenge for primary pupils reduced levels of anxiety amongst the pupils taking part by 22%.

- 1.13 Research also shows that young people understand the importance of active community engagement, but believe there are limited options for them to engage. As a part of The Scout Association's 'A Million Hands' social action programme, 3,000 young people were surveyed by ComRes (2015) which found that 82% of 12-24 year olds across the UK believe it is important that young people help to solve some of the biggest social issues in this country, but only 36% believe they were given that opportunity.
- 1.14 There is research to support that taking part in volunteering and social action activities improves young people's sense of community.
- a. For instance, in VInspired's *Get Active for Good Cashpoint (2017) programme evaluation, both Award Holders and volunteers reported a high level of trust in others. Cashpoint is a micro-grant initiative that gives young people the funding and support they need to set up their own voluntary project to tackle community issues that matter to them. 93% of Award Holders said that either many people or some people can be trusted, whilst the equivalent for secondary volunteers was 90%.
 - b. Social trust is an important indicator of the strength and quality of a society and community. In terms of social capital and, specifically, the trust and shared norms participants felt they identified with their community, the findings were very positive for Award Holders. 89 per cent of Award Holders strongly agreed or agreed that they understood the organisations and people that influence their local area. As a measure of community cohesion, 81 per cent of Award Holders felt that their local area is a place where people from different backgrounds get on well together.
 - c. Similarly, data taken from 2013/14 and 2014/15 evaluations of VInspired's Talent programme found a significant positive difference in young people's connectedness to community post intervention. The 2014/15 evaluation found that participant's indication of feeling part of the local community increased 73% on average and participants' willingness to get involved in local activities increased 93% on average. The 2013/14 evaluation found a positive average improvement in relation to participants' feeling part of the community.

- d. Additionally, the Behavioural Insights Team evaluation of youth social action, using RCTs, also found that involvement through taking part in youth social action had real significance for young people's sense of community.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Strengthening people's identity as citizens

- 2.1 To strengthen identity, it is important that the Government takes a long-term, committed approach that has cross-party and cross-departmental support.
- 2.2 As part of this, society must provide year-round safe spaces for all young people to get together and explore the commonalities of their identity, engage in enriching activities, to understand the differences of those from other backgrounds or communities.
- 2.3 It is essential that we create opportunities for young people to voluntarily come together within their communities, supported by trusted adults and positive peer networks, helping them to feel invested in their community, define their role in society and the positive contribution they can make.
- 2.4 This is about much more than being considered as British or aspiring to be British. As mentioned earlier, for young people, the nature of citizenship has changed and is as much about being a global citizen as a national citizen (research by Ipsos Mori for example shows that just 20% of people would say their nationality was among the top three or four things they would tell a stranger was important about them). Some people take great pride in being British and that is fine, however particular versions of ‘Britishness’ can be misconstrued as an outmoded view of the world. That is why we take the shared view that instead there ought to be space for pride in a shared sense of place and of a shared community.

Recognising social action and positive contributions

2.5 Being too selective or focused on ceremonies or events can in fact drive further divisions through being too prescriptive. Where would the line be? Who would be included in such events?

2.6 More important to young people is recognising action and other acts of citizenship, and rewarding positive contributions. The lack of recognition today is partly to blame for the sense of disenfranchisement some feel.

2.7 Programmes that understand this contribution are more valuable and incentivise young people to do more in future.

- a. The Duke of Edinburgh Award recognises the efforts of young people on the scheme by celebrating when they complete each award level. The young people work towards Bronze, Silver or Gold Awards and are invited to a special ceremony upon completion of each. Recognising achievement is an important part of the scheme and impact research they conducted with the University of Northampton in 2007 showed that:
 - i. 82% noted their DofE has made them want to continue with volunteering/voluntary activities.
 - ii. 62% feel that doing their DofE has helped them make a positive difference to their local community.
 - iii. 74% of young people said they developed self-esteem as a result.
- b. National Citizen Service (NCS) requires participants to spend 60 hours designing and delivering a social action project in their local community. Following completion of the course, young people attend a ‘celebration event’ where they officially graduate from the programme and are awarded a certificate. Independent evaluations show that following their NCS experience, young people volunteer up to seven hours more per month, on average, and indicate an increased likelihood to vote in future elections.
- c. The Scout Association badges are used similarly to the Duke of Edinburgh awards to recognise achievement and motivate young people. They can be focused on a variety of different things:
 - i. Activity badges allow Scouts to show their progress in existing pursuits, but also encourage them to try new things and form new interests.

- ii. Challenge awards involves accomplishing a number of more ambitious tasks within the Troop or community. There are several challenge badges across a number of themes, from physical and outdoor challenges, to dealing with the local community or issues connected with the Scouting world.
 - iii. Research by ComRes for The Scout Association (2015) shows that 74% of Scouts said they “help tackle social issues”, compared to 46% of non-Scouts
- d. Girlguiding has always provided girls and young women with opportunities to recognise achievements through social action – within their local communities and participation for positive change on a larger scale. This is done through a structured programme of activity such as activity badges, interests badges, and the Queens Guide Award and Young Leadership Qualification. Through Girlguiding’s Action for Change project, girls reported a 20% increase in confidence to influence change within the UK’s democratic decision-making processes
- e. Leap Confronting Conflict's Lighting the Fire Awards recognise the positive contributions that young people make in supporting other young people to manage conflict better and act as inspirational role models for other young people.
- f. UK Youth’s Youth Achievement Awards (YAA) are nationally recognised and have been developed as a framework for providing non-formal learning and recognition, to support and encourage young people on their journey from childhood to adulthood, as they progress into social action roles and leadership roles.
 - i. Through the YAA young people are encouraged to actively participate in their own “Social Development Journey”, developing, acknowledging and articulating life skills and competencies which help them to become a positive force for change in their own lives, and the lives of others.
 - ii. The awards provide a framework which recognises the four levels of responsibility taken by young people participating in activities that interest them.
 - Social Engagement through the YAA BRONZE – recognises and encourages young people to get involved
 - Social Learning through the YAA SILVER – recognises and encourages young people to work with others and share responsibility
 - Social Action through the YAA GOLD – recognises and encourages young people to take individual responsibility and play an active role in organising activities. This can be community based.
 - Social Leadership through the YAA PLATINUM – recognises and encourages young people to move into a leadership position.
- g. V•inspired has a long established record in recognising the volunteering contributions of young people. Their V•Awards scheme - <https://vinspired.com/get-awards> - recognises these achievements based on hours of service. These Awards are formally recognised by the likes of UCAS and serve not just to recognise young people's contribution and to create a habit of service; they're valued evidence to support young people in their transition to higher education or employment.

- h. The Citizenship Foundation's Mock Trial Competitions help young people understand the legal justice system and how the rule of law works. The use of a competition format, as part of a wider pattern of support, helps young people gain a sense of achievement from their taking part. Amongst those taking part in the scheme, evaluation shows a 20% increase in those young people confident in defining a legal right.

2.8 As a sector we welcome new guidance from DfE, where young people on 16-19 study programmes can now include social action, such as volunteering, to be classed as a form of work experience. Such interventions encourage young people, their parents/carers and teachers to see that social action has a 'double-benefit' to both the young people participating and the community they are serving. <https://www.tes.com/news/further-education/breaking-news/social-action-included-study-programme>

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1 Our view here is that – whatever the voting age – it is important that Government finds a way to make the registration process easier by finding new ways, utilising technology and social media platforms, to encourage young people to get involved. Perhaps there is an opportunity to enlist schools and universities to be involved in this, by automatically enrolling those of voting age on the electoral roll, as has successfully happened at institutions like Sheffield University.

4.2 Consequently, we would recommend that young people are automatically registered onto the electoral roll at the point they also receive their National Insurance number.

4.3 More broadly, it is important to recognise that this is not just a youth issue – every citizen should believe in their ability to understand, but also to influence and change the democratic process, boosting involvement.

4.4 What's more, we would encourage the Committee to look closely at how a lack of representation affects the extent to which young people are willing to engage with politics.

4.5 For example, we noted with interest the recent Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR) report, Power to the people? Tackling the gender imbalance in local government & combined authorities, which found that women are faced with a number of barriers to entering local government and progressing into leadership roles. The report revealed just 33% of councillors and 17% of council leaders in England are women - something the IPPR suggested is causing a “democratic deficit”. Equality of male and female councillors would require an increase of 3,028 women (more than 50% on number of women currently in post).

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Engaging people at a younger age

5.1 The evidence is clear that engaging people at an earlier age will have a positive impact and result in a stronger sense of citizenship. Research published by think tank Demos shows that the 29% of young people currently participating in social action develop self-discipline, resilience and empathy by doing so. Furthermore, evidence from the CBI (See CBI First Steps report) shows that social action helps develop optimism, determination and emotional intelligence - skills which are key to employability. The Cabinet Office's Randomised Control Trial showed that primary pupils taking part in the Citizenship Foundation's Make a Difference Challenge were more likely to have increased empathy levels, problem-solving skills, grit and community skills. Children who took part shared, on average, a level of empathy 6% greater than those who didn't. These children were also adept in problem-solving, and showed a level of grit significantly above that of the children who did not participate. Similarly the level of community investment was considerably higher.

5.2 We cannot overstate the importance of a long-term approach that has cross-party consensus. It is only with consistent, and sustained engagement at a young age, that we can reap the benefits of a more confident, resilient and empathetic population.

Current approach in schools

5.3 The current situation and approach is inconsistent – some schools are excellent, some are poor. The quality of approach is different year-on-year for a number of reasons and largely depends on individual teachers and their personal preferences. We applaud the work of 'Citizenship' teaching in schools where it is offered, however there are no incentives for schools to maintain any focus on it as a subject. Lessons should be learnt from the 'character' agenda when funding, through Character Grants, was promised but quickly fell away. Indeed, a lack of interest from government or regulatory bodies such as Ofsted make it much harder for schools to give Citizenship adequate focus even where they have a desire to.

5.4 This is compounded by a lack of monitoring of what is happening across the board and only anecdotal evidence on how to make decisions and define a policy approach.

5.5 Teachers do a terrific job and we recognise that they have huge pressures on their time. That's why we strongly believe that the third sector must work with schools so that there is provision for citizenship programmes for all young people. Collectively, we have an important role to play. Together we can make a significant impact. This is also recognised by teachers themselves. For example, Demos' Learning by Doing report (2015) found that 58% would welcome partnerships between their schools and Scouts to provide students with other types of learning activities, and that 60% thought that non-formal learning activities provided by organisations like Scouts should play a bigger role in the education system.

5.6 While our individual views differ slightly on the extent to which teaching good citizenship should be compulsory, collectively we believe that where citizenship remains in the curriculum it needs to be given the right support so that schools are consistent in their approach. More evidence is needed in the primary sector which should be an area of focus for Government over the next two years. This would allow sufficient time to get the necessary data on which to make decision in future, any study should examine the extent and quality of citizenship education in schools, support for schools to improve provision, and teacher training both for new citizenship teachers, and for existing teachers who want to be able to teach it effectively.

5.7 What's more, we would encourage the Committee to consider how schools might use third sector partnerships to provide meaningful opportunities. This is particularly successful in Germany through the Schule Plus initiative (<https://www.schule-plus.de/>). The programme is best described as a "unique social online-network connecting schools with external partners, who offer various external offers to enrich the schooling curriculum." It is free of charge for schools and helps them to connect with a range of organisations, including from the third sector, to "enhance the learning of students".

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they involve a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 The sector agrees that programmes, whether year-long such as NCS, part-time or more flexible volunteering opportunities, should not be made compulsory, rather young people should be supported to engage with volunteering and social action projects in ways that support and complement their individual circumstances.

6.2 There are also many routes that support younger children to be active citizens; including non-formal education programmes run by uniformed groups such as Girlguiding and the Scout Association, as well as others including the Woodcraft Folk, that provide opportunities for children as young as aged five to participate in social action and volunteering. These programmes help to develop a sense of belonging and ownership in the local community.

6.3 By engaging with children at Primary age level the notion of being an active citizen becomes the norm, rather than being seen as something extraordinary or to be done at a certain stage in life. Recognising that volunteering, social action and community engagement activities all help create active citizens, and are currently delivered by the third sector in a range of ways, calls for a need to widen support for the citizenship agenda rather than viewing it as an age-specific opportunity, and complementary to more formal, year-long schemes.

The role of voluntary programmes - learning lessons from international comparisons and celebrating success

6.4 We would encourage the Committee to look at international comparisons and how “domestic gap years” work. Important lessons can be learnt. Section 6.5 explains this in more detail.

6.5 NCS engages a broad range of groups and individuals. 17% of NCS participants are on Free School Meals, compared to 8% of the population. 28% are from non-White communities (compared to 18% of the population), and 15% are from minority religions (compared to 10% of the population). This social cohesion has a positive effect on young people who leave the programme with increased social trust and a higher likelihood to mix with young people from different backgrounds (2015 NCS Evaluation)

- 6.6 Many young people might have volunteered for the first time when at school or when participating with uniformed organisations. However, for many others, NCS will be the first time they will have volunteered, which is cause for celebration. NCS is working with sector organisations, including Scouts, Duke of Edinburgh, International Citizen Service, and others, to ensure NCS is just the start of an enduring journey for young people, and that young people are provided with further training, volunteering or employment opportunities post-NCS). However, there is more to be done in this space.
- 6.7 NCS currently works with “The Basics” (Bite the Ballot) and “Rock Enrol” (Cabinet Office) to deliver sessions on democratic engagement, and to register tens of thousands of young people to vote.
- 6.8 At the end of the NCS programme, participants celebrate their achievements from a graduate ceremony, where they are presented with a certificate. Whilst civic engagement is a key part of NCS’ mission, it is not the only part. Therefore, NCS does not currently carry out public citizenship ceremonies as part of the programme.
- 6.9 NCS Trust remains of the opinion that NCS should not be mandatory, in order to preserve its youth-led and voluntary ethos.
- 6.10 Many young people might have volunteered for the first time when at school or when participating with uniformed organisations. However, for many others, NCS will be the first time they will have volunteered, which is cause for celebration. However:
- The main gap is around supporting young people when they join or leave these organisations. There is currently no support from schools when they join the NCS, and none when they consider career opportunities afterwards.
 - The International Citizens Service is a good model to emulate as it actively supports its young people who have completed the programme to use the experience when taking their next steps in life.
 - However, it must be borne in mind that young people will get much more from any NCS experience or equivalent if they have had good citizenship education (both formal and informal) from a young age, and if, following NCS, they are supported to carry on their citizenship activities.
- 6.11 A wide variety of programmes show that those that run well offer value for money. They also prove the importance of recognition – e.g. NCS graduation, Scout and Girlguiding badges etc. Again reiterating the importance of valuing positive contributions.
- a. A recent Wellbeing and Human Capital Evaluation independently commissioned by NCS Trust, and published earlier this year, reported a social benefit-to-cost ratio of between £5.93 and £8.36 for NCS. This includes the impact of NCS on university entry, which is on average 12% higher for young people taking part in NCS compared to those who don't, with those living in the poorest areas almost 50% more likely to get into higher education if they do NCS.

- b. V•Inspired Talent – a full-time volunteering placement which supports young people to gain an accredited Level 2/3 qualification and develop real world skills and experience for progression into employment, education or training.
- c. V•Inspired was created as a dedicated implementation body for the findings of the Russell Commission – which stated that it should be natural for young people to volunteer and natural for organisations to either offer young people the opportunity to volunteer or support them in doing so. The Russell Commission proposed that society as a whole benefits from volunteering, as young people express themselves as active citizens.
 - d. Giving Nation: A national initiative by the Citizenship Foundation which supports young people to give. Whether it is time, energy or voice, every young person can play a part in challenging the issues that face others. The programme challenges students to turn their generosity into action by selecting the issue that matters most to their class. Young people then take action as social entrepreneurs, fundraisers, campaigners or volunteers.

6.12 There are also numerous international examples:

France

6.13 France also has a Government sponsored full-time social action programme. The 'Service Civique' initiative was launched in 2010, and has helped tens of thousands of volunteers to pour 25 hours of their time every week into good causes and public services.

- a. The programme aims to strengthen national cohesion and promote social diversity among its 16 to 25 year-old participants who can engage in the programme for a period of 3 to 12 months. It can be carried out in 9 main areas: culture and leisure, international development and humanitarian action, education, environment, crisis intervention, memory and citizenship, health, solidarity and sport.
- b. Such is the success of France's 'Service Civique', it is to expand to 150,000 places per year by the end of 2017.
- c. The programme prides itself on producing civically engaged young people;
 - i. 57% of the young people who were not registered on the electoral roll before their Service Civique year had done so since or intend to do so.
 - ii. 80% of the volunteers intend to vote in the next elections too.
 - iii. Moreover, 89% of volunteers feel useful to others and to society, and for 93% of them the Civic Service is a good way to meet people of different backgrounds.

USA

6.14 In the USA, 80,000 young adults participate in full-time social action annually as part of ‘AmeriCorps’. AmeriCorps is a network of local, state, and national service programmes that connects young Americans each year in intensive service to meet community needs in education, the environment, public safety, health, and homeland security.

- a. Participants serve in full or part-time positions over a 10-12 month period. Upon completion of their service, members receive an education grant known as the ‘Segal AmeriCorps Education Award’ of up to $4,725 to pay for college, graduate school, or to pay back qualified student loans.
- b. Since 1994, nearly one million volunteers have contributed over 1.4 billion hours of service to local communities.
- c. Research demonstrates that service through AmeriCorps creates empowered and prepared leaders who are civically engaged and committed to strengthening their communities.
- d. Alumni believe that the experience improved their ability to bridge divides and solve problems, while also developing skills and expanding opportunity to advance their careers and education.
- e. Key stats include:
 - i. 80% of alumni feel confident they can create a plan to address a community issue and get others to care about it.
 - ii. 93% of alumni said that after service, they felt comfortable interacting with others different than themselves, as compared to 72 percent before.
 - iii. 94% said that national service broadened their understanding of society and different communities.
 - iv. 79% of alumni are involved or plan to become actively involved in their community post-service, compared to 47 percent prior.
 - v. 94% of alumni are registered to vote, well above the national average.

Germany

6.15 Germany also offers young people from this age the chance to engage in full-time social action as a transition year through three federal organisations: the BFD, Bundesfreiwilligendienst (German voluntary service); the FSJ, Freiwilliges Soziales Jahr (voluntary social year); and FÖJ, the Freiwilliges Ökologisches Jahr (voluntary ecological year).

- a. While all the programmes cater for young people, the FSJ and FOJ are aimed entirely at young people from the age of 15-27. The FSJ alone allows 50,000 young German’s the opportunity to undertake full-time social action each year.
- b. These programmes allow a young person to volunteer full-time for between 6-24 months on a community project close to their hearts for public good.

UK

- 6.16 City Year UK has demonstrated that full-time volunteering can create active and engaged citizens in a UK context through its ‘year of service’ programme.
- a. Their volunteers are issued a survey at the beginning and the end of the year that assess their development across a number of areas.
 - b. Evidence from this survey showed engagement with the programme helps to shape positive social attitudes and create engaged citizens.
 - c. Volunteers reported impressive attitudinal shifts over the course of our programme such as an increased likelihood to vote and take a leadership role in civil society and improved attitude towards other social groups (age, ethnicity and religion). For example:
 - i. There was a 22% rise in volunteers who said they were very likely to vote in the next General Election.
 - ii. Over 50% said that participation in the programme had positively affected their attitude toward those from different age groups and ethnic, religious and socio-economic backgrounds.
 - iii. There was a 40% rise in volunteers who felt people in society could be trusted. City Year volunteers are over twice as likely as their peers to cite a responsibility to their community as a motivation to volunteer.
 - iv. Volunteers are 70% more likely than their peers to take on a leadership role in civic society.

6.17 While NCS is a valuable experience for thousands of young people, encouraging active citizenship in the form of social action, it is, on its own, not enough. Community based, universal and open-assessed youth services are vital in engaging young people of all ages, supporting them to value their community and feel valued by their community, take part in political discourse, and make a positive contribution.

Legal status

6.18 A significant problem with full-time and part-time volunteering is the “legal limbo” it leaves individuals in. While this poses more immediate issues and concerns for some charities involved with this joint submission, it is a broader issue that the sector as a whole is facing.

6.19 In essence, the lack of a legal status other than NEET means volunteers are not recognised in the legal structure. This is a missed opportunity.

6.20 The fact is that full-time volunteers have an important role to play and can have a significant return on funding with participants improving their employability skills.

- a. We see this in the work of City Year UK and their volunteers. Through that year of full-time volunteering, 18-25 year olds can make a real difference to the life chances of school pupils from the most disadvantaged communities, while gaining valuable leadership experience and boosting their own career prospects.

- b. Volunteering Matters also provide full-time social action opportunities in health and social care setting, while other charities such as The Scout Association and vInspired use full-time volunteers as part of their wider work.

6.21 Despite pouring in thousands of hours to better their communities, this ‘legal limbo’ actually punishes full-time volunteers in the following ways. Below are a number of ways not having a legal status makes it difficult to do full-time social action:

- a. National Insurance Credits: Full-time volunteers are not entitled to National Insurance Credits (NICs) meaning they have their pensions eligibility cut by one year. They are not a drain on the economy, yet because they have no recognised status they are unfairly punished by not being automatically granted the NICs that would protect their pension entitlements. Contrastingly, those looking for work while on benefits, caring for children or sick relatives and doing jury service do qualify.
- b. Ill-health: Full-time volunteers are forbidden from being paid expenses if they are ill. That makes it hard for people to sustain their commitment over several months or a year.
- c. Personal development training: Full-time volunteers are forbidden from receiving personal development training, or help from the charity they serve with when they look for jobs at the end of their programme, even though career progression is a major motive for, and benefit of, taking part.

6.22 In order to support existing and full-time volunteers and programmes, we call on the Government to create a legal status for full-time volunteers.

Collaborating with existing reviews

6.23 It would be prudent to engage with existing reviews and Government initiatives that have similar aims and goals. We would encourage the Select Committee to consider the benefits of such engagement.

- a. For example, in March of this year Steve Holliday, the former Chief Executive of National Grid plc, was appointed by then Civil Society Minister Rob Wilson to lead a review that examines how to increase participation in full-time social action by young people. It also examines the challenges faced by organisations working in this area.
- b. When he was appointed, Holliday explained his view that “social action benefit[s] the development and character in young people, giving them employability skills while making a real difference in their communities.”
- c. He further added that the review would explore how to “expand full-time volunteering as a real option for young people.”

- d. Alongside Holliday, the advisory panel will include experts from relevant sectors and is expected to make recommendations to the Minister for Civil Society by October 2017. Therefore, now would be an ideal time to coordinate views collectively.
- e. In addition, it is worth considering the findings of the Casey Review and the Milburn Reports.

6.24 There is a real opportunity for the Committee to make bold recommendations that Government should be encouraged to accept and act upon.

6.25 Importantly, the committee should recognise the value and importance of a diverse range of groups working to deliver shared outcomes. Many provide for a range of different age groups and offer a different perspective. There is no one size fits all approach.

6.26 On the NCS specifically, we must work together and be supported in helping broaden the programme by encompassing both pre and post support. The National Audit Office report, published in January 2017, recognised how NCS has “shown it can attract large numbers of participants and participation has a positive short-term effect on young people.” However, questions remain whether “these effects were enduring”. By working in partnership we can help to ensure they are. In addition, in March 2017, the Public Accounts Committee recommended that the NCS should do more to work with existing youth organisations in order to deliver the programme. The NCS Trust should be supported in their efforts to explore such options, and this should be balanced with support for the full array of offers for young people available.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Building a cross-departmental approach

- 7.1 Government and Parliament can best aide this by providing the framework, policy guidance, convening powers, and the support required to help deliver programmes.
- 7.2 We would encourage the Committee to look again at The Russell Commission which set out a number of recommendations for how to support civic engagement. Specifically, this included i) Government developing and implementing strategies to encourage greater levels of volunteering within public services taking account of the need for quality opportunities that are attractive to young people, and ii) Government should involve young people at the highest level to help establish the types of roles that would appeal to them. Arguably, these needs still exist.
- 7.3 From experience and through research we know that for young people, engaging with issues which matter to them is the most effective way to engineer and sustain interest in civic engagement. To understand this, we need to engage and involve young people in co-production from the outset.
- 7.4 There needs to be a discrete focus on youth policy within DCMS that identifies new streams of funding, such as utilising dormant assets and building sustainability into programmes and organisations. Essentially there must be a cross-departmental approach, and an understanding that encouraging active citizenship requires multiple central government departments, Local Authorities, and third sector organisations to work collectively to drive long-term systemic changes.
- 7.5 All programmes need to be accessible with a diverse communications approach so that everyone benefits. As it stands, some parts of society are being phased out or disincentivised. The accessibility for other young people is very important and a key priority for Government, e.g. young people with a barrier to employment (such as a disability). However, this again raises the point about the legal status of volunteers.

Utilise money from dormant assets to support third sector organisations to drive and deliver civil society initiatives

- 7.6 In March 2017, the Dormant Assets Commission published its final report to Government. The Commission estimated that there could be up to £2 billion of additional funding potentially available for the benefit of good causes.

7.7 The Charities Minister at the time, Rob Wilson, suggested that the funds could be used to “transform the charity sector”. The Government has also committed to responding in full to the Commission’s 50 recommendations, promising a further consultation with charities on how the money should be utilised.

7.8 We welcomed both the Commission’s report and the Government’s commitment to using this additional money to support the third sector. We would strongly recommend that Government acts quickly to identify how a proportion of this money can be used to support the citizenship agenda. Examples of the usage of statutory funding to support initiatives include Girlguiding, which has previously benefited from a range of statutory funding streams e.g. Uniformed Youth Social Action Fund (UYSAF)

- a. From 2014-2016 Girlguiding received funding from the Cabinet through the Uniformed Youth Social Action Fund (UYSAF) project. The funding supported our work to bring guiding to new communities and to encourage young people to get involved in social action and make a difference. The project was a great success and as a result we:
 - i. Opened 135 new units and supported over 50 units at risk of closing
 - ii. Recruited over 280 new adult volunteers
 - iii. Created spaces for almost 3000 girls
 - iv. Supported almost 4000 young people to take part in 460 social action activities.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Values

8.1 The Casey Review published earlier this year raised serious concerns about the state of social integration in the UK. We welcome the Dame Louise Casey's report and agree that a failure to address citizenship and social integration will mean we fail to address the reported rise in hate crime and extreme violence. All community leaders and institutions have an important role to play and must address the criticism that difficult issues had been ignored, primarily for a fear of being labelled racist.

8.2 Importantly, we strongly agree with the Casey Review's conclusion that "resilience, integration and shared common values and behaviours – such as respect for the rule of law, democracy, equality and tolerance – are inhibitors of division, hate and extremism" and that by building on these qualities we can become "stronger, more equal, more united and able to stand together as one nation."

8.3 One problem is the lack of a clear definition of British values and how we embed them. From our perspective, the most important thing is to encourage people to think seriously about their values and how they relate to the values of others within their community. People shouldn't be afraid to think about this matter or shy away from it. This must be done in a respectful manner and we would recommend that the Committee considers how this might be done in consultation with young people.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Improving accessibility – especially in rural areas

9.1 Rural communities in particular suffer because of the low population density – as a result they are harder to help. The Australian Government and Australian Third Sector offer excellent examples of positive programmes that overcome these barriers. They run a number of programmes that aim to integrate young people from rural communities into wider society and also inure them to political engagement through various schemes. There are several successful examples:

- a. The Haywire Summit: An annual youth summit in the capital (led by ABC radio, the Australian equivalent of the BBC) where kids can get an all-expenses paid trip to come meet with politicians and talk about problems in their communities.
- b. Police-Citizens Youth Clubs - PCYCs are very popular in rural towns. The idea is to keep children and young people off the streets and prevent negative habits forming (e.g. drug abuse) by engaging them with sports and other activities and offer mentoring from rural police officers.
- c. CEP - The Country Education Partnership is a not-for-profit organisation that supports the provision of education within rural and remote communities.

9.2 Because rural areas are more cut-off, they need a greater emphasis on different approaches to reach them and many will require a more digital approach utilising the latest technology. This was identified in the House of Lords Social Mobility Committee’s earlier report - Overlooked and left behind. It showed that children in rural areas will have a harder time acquiring the requisite work experience that either employers require or that facilitates the development of work place skills, e.g. self-management, resilience, team work. The same report also identified that young people that did not follow an academic route had been “forgotten” or “overlooked” by policy-makers. The stark warning was that without greater support and “clarity”, the “overlooked majority of young people are at great risk of drifting into work and being trapped in employment at the bottom end of the labour market.” This must be addressed.

9.3 Many communities also face a number of smaller-scale barriers. For example, it might be that transport networks are poor and result in people feeling “left behind” or not being able to play an active part in their community. Furthermore, it could be that the digital infrastructure is not in place – again, a particular problem in rural areas.

9.4 Areas of low social mobility (SMI) and high deprivation (IMD) are particularly excluded when it comes to engaging in citizenship and civil society programmes. Increased resource needs to be allocated to those areas, as has been done through the DfE Opportunity Areas, but importantly there is a need to provide increased access to community based services, supporting cross-sector collaboration and long-term systemic solutions.

Working in partnership

9.5 It is essential that schools are encouraged to be more open to working in partnership with a number of organisations including ourselves.

9.6 Greater emphasis is also required to help support prisons and those reintegrating into society; prisons should be seen as a part of a community. There is currently an untapped potential given the lack of effort to support immersion and integration back into the community.

9.7 Particular effort is needed on supporting young people in care and we all need to think seriously about how we help people from poor and deprived backgrounds – statistically life chances are significantly reduced for young people from such backgrounds. Statistically they are less likely to engage in youth social action than their more affluent peers. Society as a whole must do better at improving social mobility.

9.8 A collective impact approach should be encouraged and supported in order to develop genuine cross sector partnerships to resolve shared objectives. (<http://www.youthimpact.uk/more-our-collective-impact-work>)

Supporting girls to be active citizens

9.9 Girlguiding's Girls' Attitudes Survey 2015, found only 20% of girls aged 11 to 21 surveyed said they felt part of their local community – this was a decrease from 2010 when 30% felt this way. 38% said they felt the UK was a good place to grow up (a decrease from 48% in 2010); and in 2014 57% of girls aged 11 to 21 said they feel politicians don't listen to the voices of girls and young women.

9.10 There is a well-documented lack of women participating in politics, particularly at a local level, IPPR study (Aug 2017) shows that only 33% of councillors and 17% of council leaders in England are women causing a “democratic deficit”. Better support and engagement for girls and young women means they require opportunities to develop as active citizens and develop their leadership skills. It is also important they have role models to be able to do this – in 2014 61% of girls wanted political parties to make sure there were more female MPs.

9.11 Girlguiding believes that political education must be available to all young people and that it must include feminism and cover female as well as male political figures. The curriculum should be varied and engaging and include an explicit focus on girls and women and how politics is also ‘for them’. 55% of girls support political education in schools; 54% support mandatory teaching around citizenship, democracy and human rights (Girls' Attitude Survey 2014).

Identifying positive role models and addressing media perceptions

9.12 We need to encourage more role models by supporting individuals and groups to promote role models from different communities. Currently an absence and lack of role models persists.

9.13 There needs to be investment into existing role-model and mentoring initiatives, including Brightside, Chance UK and Future First.

9.14 There are real problems with how the media portrays and reports on real-time events. The media drives unhelpful perceptions – for example, demonising Muslim communities in the wake of the various terrorist attacks in London and Manchester.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand, and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Broadening the definition of civic engagement

10.1 As set out at the start of this submission, this matter shouldn't be confined by civic engagement (regularly defined or portrayed as being synonymous with taking positive action or working towards a greater good).

10.2 However, this is an issue that goes beyond such a definition and the primary focus should be on helping people to understand their communities. It is essential that we provide young people with opportunities to express themselves in order to then make a positive contribution independently.

The role of citizenship in helping address social integration and the rise of extremism and hate crimes

10.3 Citizenship and social cohesion do go hand-in-hand. Bringing together young people from a range of different backgrounds allows them to make friends and learn together, and leads them to focus on what they have in common rather than their differences (relating to gender, ethnicity, religion, socio-economic background, or otherwise). This in turn increases social trust, breaks down social barriers, and increases young peoples' sense of belonging to a wider community, rather than a specific niche. This is a key part of what we mean by citizenship, and this is what is needed to combat the rise in hate crime and extremism.

10.4 It is therefore essential that we work together to help young people understand and mix with people from different backgrounds. Social action programmes like those offered by NCS and City Year UK where young people work together in diverse teams have shown to improve attitudes and understanding of those from different backgrounds. For example, data from City Year UK shows that over 50 per cent said that participation in the programme in 2015/16 had positively affected their attitude toward those from different age groups and ethnic, religious and socio-economic backgrounds. NCS research shows similarly positive effects of the programme on attitudes towards others from different backgrounds.

10.5 We welcome Dame Louise Casey's review into opportunity and integration, which also concluded: "The less integrated we are as a nation, the greater the social and economic costs we face as a whole. Mistrust, anxiety and prejudice grow where communities live separately. That allows people with extremist agendas to step in and spread fear, hatred and division." Dame Louise also found that, "Long-standing – and worsening – divisions in our society are being exploited by extremists, predators, and those seeking excuses to legitimise their hate.”

10.6 The Casey Review aimed to address integration and the life chances of some of the most disadvantaged and isolated communities, and by doing so inject some resilience against those who try to divide communities with extremism and hate. The Review found that successive Governments have focussed on, and at times achieved, progress with social and economic exclusion, worklessness, poverty and disadvantage. Historical attainment gaps for many of the most disadvantaged groups in society are narrowing; however there is still a long way to go.

10.7 For example, the Review concluded that in relation to social and economic integration in particular, there is a strong correlation of increased segregation among Pakistani and Bangladeshi ethnic households in more deprived areas. Combined by poorer English language and weak labour market outcomes, without a more concerted and targeted effort it is likely that such a cycle will only continue.

10.8 If we get our approach to citizenship right however, it is demonstrably clear that participation in the wider community leads to increased levels of trust and engagement. It is interesting to look at Germany as an example:

- a. In April 2016, the German Government announced new legal measures requiring migrants and refugees to integrate into society in return for being allowed to live and work in the country. The mandatory integration measures include language classes or lessons in German laws or cultural basics. According to the German Chancellor, Angela Merkel, the aim of Germany’s first ever integration law is to make it easier for asylum seekers to gain access to the German labour market, with the government promising 100,000 new “working opportunities”, expected to include low-paid workfare jobs. Additionally, a law requiring employers to give preference to German or EU job applicants over asylum seekers will be suspended for three years.
- b. Germany uses its full-time volunteering programme to help integrate refugees into German society. In December 2015, the Bundesfreiwilligendienst (Federal Volunteer Service) started a special programme for 10,000 refugees. This programme allows refugees ages 17 and older to work for charity or state organisations for 6 to 18 months, for over 20 hours per week, while the state pays for their health insurance and a small stipend to cover their living expenses. The programme is used to help refugees receive German language support, assimilate with German culture and demonstrate work experience in a German context.
- c. However, independent integration projects have also flourished in Germany. Between 2015 and 2016, some 15,000 refugee projects launched in Germany, with many of them focused on helping newcomers learn the language – these are schemes like volunteer instruction, mentoring or casual meet-ups with refugees.

Those interested in learning German have good chances of finding someone to help them.

- d. The Federal Office for Migration and Refugees (BAMF), with the help of other institutions like the country's network of adult education centres (Volkshochschulen) and workers' welfare organizations, has created an extensive offering of integration courses across the country. The classes offer a combination of language training and civics for newcomers, with the state covering the costs for those who have been granted official refugee status.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

12.1 It is important to start by recognising and acknowledging that young people are most influenced by people they know personally – it could be a parent, a teacher or a friend. Family and friends are key influencers and have an essential role to play in encouraging others to become better citizens.

12.2 However, without doubt there are good examples of celebrities and high-profile individuals that are making, or have made, a real impact and/or difference. For us, this includes:

- The Royal Family – in particular the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Prince Harry. They exemplify the model of 'duty' and 'service'. The 'I will' campaigns and similar initiatives strongly emphasise this.
- Dame Kelly Holmes Trust – the charity trains and develops world class athletes to mentor young people facing disadvantage. This empowers them to realise the attitudes and behaviours needed to lead a positive life. The programmes target those who are difficult to reach – for example, care leavers, homeless people, young offenders, women at risk of sexual exploitation and those living within isolated communities.
- Sport England – Works to increase the number of people getting active. Their own strategy was developed in response to the Government's Sporting Future strategy, which was published in December 2015.
- FA Foundation - Funded by the Premier League, The Football Association and the Government, the Foundation directs £30m every year into grassroots sport. The money is used to deliver a programme of new and improved community sports facilities in towns and cities across the country.
- Team GB - Post London 2012 but also following recent 2017 World Championships.
- Vloggers and YouTubers
- Youth led engagement and citizenship schemes create peer and near-peer role models, including UK Youth Voice, UK Youth Parliament and the British Youth Council.

Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues, University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0078)

- Points of Light scheme - The Prime Minister's Points of Light award that recognises outstanding UK volunteers and those making a change in their community. The award was recently presented to Jack Abrey, Chair of The Scout Association's Community Impact Group.
- Other ambassadors (e.g. Ellie Simmonds, Bryony Gordon)

Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues, University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0078)

Author: Joseph Ward, on behalf of the Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues, University of Birmingham

Future Correspondence: Professor James Arthur, Director, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues

About the Organisation

The Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues is a unique and leading centre for the examination of how character and virtues impact on individuals and society. The Centre was founded in 2012 by Professor James Arthur. Based at the University of Birmingham, it has a dedicated team of 30 academics from a range of disciplines, philosophy, psychology, education, theology and sociology.

1. Submission Summary

1.1 This submission focuses on the conceptual and empirical links between character education, citizenship and civic engagement. As well as including research evidence of the potential benefits character education can yield for developing civic engagement in schools, it also features research into social action and volunteering programmes and the potential they have for creating responsible and compassionate young citizens of the future.

2. Argument & Evidence

2.1 Whilst the early 2000s produced a wealth of fresh thought and research on citizenship and civic republicanism (see Arthur, 2003; Annette, 2005), over the last 10 years it seems the cultivation of citizenship and civic engagement in education has splintered across a number of seemingly disparate fields. This submission focuses on one of these – character education – and summarises research evidence highlighting the relevance and benefits of character for civic engagement.

2.2 A critical aspect of character education which is often overlooked in theoretical and empirical discussions of the concept is its potential benefits beyond the individual. Much of the current discourse on character focuses on traits of performance, such as resilience and grit (Duckworth, 2016), which can be perceived as overly individualistic. This has led to criticism that character education neglects the place of the individual within the community (see Kristjánsson, 2015, Ch. 2), leaving the civic and social benefits of character development underrepresented in the discourse.

2.3 However, a recent survey commissioned by the Department for Education illustrated that 97% of schools in Britain seeking to develop good character in their pupils do so in order to help them become good citizens (Marshall et al. 2017). The survey also identified moral character traits, such as honesty and integrity, to be most important to schools in this pursuit (ibid. p.18). The conceptual and empirical intersections between character, citizenship and civic virtues have been consistently highlighted in the work of the Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues. In its recently revised framework, the Centre posits that character education can help schools to develop ‘...confident and compassionate students, who are effective contributors to society, successful learners, and responsible citizens’ (Jubilee Centre, 2017).

2.4 The Centre’s empirical work has also highlighted that 60% of UK school teachers see citizenship or PSHE as lessons explicitly dedicated to the development of the ‘whole child’, but that many of feel they receive insufficient training or that time allocated is inadequate to pursue this effectively (see Arthur et al. 2015a). This suggests that more work on cohering and improving citizenship and character education initiatives through government could help to improve curricula provision for encouraging citizenship and civic engagement in schools. Evidence suggests that adopting a ‘whole-school’ approach is an effective way to develop character through the more subtle aspects of culture and environment – an approach the Centre terms ‘character caught’ (Arthur et al. 2017a).

2.5 Beyond formal education, the Centre’s work on service learning and volunteering has consistently shown a connection between civic engagement and character. A 2015 Jubilee Centre study into youth social action showed that 87% of providers interviewed saw character development as a central to their work (Arthur et al. 2015b). More recently, research into social action has revealed that the younger children become involved, the more likely they are to develop a ‘habit of service’ for the future, and those that develop a habit are more adept at identifying and understanding civic virtues (Arthur et al., 2017b). The concept of the ‘double benefit’ is vital here in highlighting how social action can help young people in their future careers, as well as engaging and benefitting their local community (see Arthur et al. 2015b).

2.6 Character education is, therefore, a lens through which the deeper meaning of citizenship and civic responsibility can be articulated, and the normative underpinnings of these concepts made explicit (Peterson, 2011). A definition of citizenship which is engaged and socially responsible, and comprised of the civic virtues of service, volunteering, and caring for others, allows for a deeper exploration of what it means to be a good citizen (see Jubilee Centre, 2017). Such a definition is perhaps a better way of understanding citizenship and civic engagement in contemporary society, as opposed to the rather narrow, legalistic definitions concerning rights and status which often dominate and can become mired in the exclusionary language of nationality.

3. Recommendations

- 3.1 The continuation, extension and investment in the nascent character education programme at the Department for Education would be an effective way of enhancing citizenship and civic engagement in UK schools. Making the multifaceted nature of character more explicit – with civic engagement as an integral part – could help to clarify the role of citizenship in contemporary society and highlight its moral foundations. This could include a focus on ‘virtue literacy’, enhancing pupils’ knowledge and understanding of civic virtues and how to develop them (Jubilee Centre, 2017).
- 3.2 In addition, the extension of a diverse range of localised voluntary citizenship and youth programmes (as well as the NCS) could help to increase awareness of ways in which young people can fruitfully engage with their community, as well as highlighting the double benefit to them of engaging in such activity.
- 3.3 Comprehending and articulating the multifaceted nature of character could also hold practical benefits for government in connecting up strands of policy work already in train. Research in this field could help to inform implementation not just in formal education through curricula, and its relationship to British values, but also as highlighted above, in social action provision.

References

Arthur, J. (2003), Education with Character, London: Routledge Falmer

Arthur, J., Kristjánsson, K., Walker, D., Sanderse, W., and Jones, C. (2015a) Character Education in UK Schools: Research Report, Birmingham: University of Birmingham, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues [Online], Available at:
http://www.jubileecentre.ac.uk/userfiles/jubileecentre/pdf/Research%20Reports/Character_Education_in_UK_Schools.pdf

Arthur, J., Harrison, T., Taylor, E. (2015b), Building Character Through Youth Social Action: Research Report, Birmingham: University of Birmingham, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues [Online], Available at:
http://www.jubileecentre.ac.uk/userfiles/jubileecentre/pdf/Research%20Reports/Building_Character_Through_Youth_Social_Action.pdf

Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues, University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0078)

Arthur, J., Harrison, T., Burn, E. and Moller, F. (2017a), Schools of Virtue: Character Education in Three Birmingham Schools, Birmingham: University of Birmingham, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues [forthcoming, scheduled 19th October 2017]

Arthur, J., Harrison, T. and Taylor-Collins, E. (2017b), A Habit of Service: Research Report, Birmingham: University of Birmingham, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues [forthcoming, scheduled November 2017]

Annette, J. (2005), 'Character, Civic Renewal and Service Learning for Democratic Citizenship in Higher Education', British Journal of Educational Studies, 53(3), 326-340

Duckworth, A. (2016), Grit: The Power of Passion and Perseverance, New York: Simon & Schuster

Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues (2017), A Framework for Character Education in Schools, Birmingham: University of Birmingham, Jubilee Centre for Character and Virtues, [Online], Available at: <http://jubileecentre.ac.uk/userfiles/jubileecentre/pdf/character-education/Framework%20for%20Character%20Education.pdf>

Kristjánsson, K. (2015), Aristotelian Character Education, Abingdon: Routledge

Marshall, L., Rooney, K., Dunatchik, A. and Smith, N. (2017), Developing Character Skills in Schools: Quantitative Survey, NatCen Social Research [Online], Available at: https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/634711/Developing_Character_skills-survey_report.pdf

Peterson, A. (2011), 'The common good and citizenship education in England: a moral enterprise?', Journal of Moral Education, 40(1), 19-35

6 September 2017

Just Fair, Children's Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women's Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

Just Fair, Children's Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women's Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

1. This submission is from a coalition of organisations that monitor and promote the full implementation of human rights treaties ratified by the UK: Just Fair, Children's Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women's Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights.
2. We welcome the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement inquiry into civic engagement, social cohesion, citizenship education, participation, rights and responsibilities. We are particularly pleased that, among other issues, the Select Committee seeks evidence about additional formal rights and responsibilities beyond the existing legal framework, whether they should have force of law, and how they should be monitored and/or enforced (question no. 3). This submission focuses on this question.

Bringing international human rights home

3. The UK has ratified a number of international treaties that proclaim human rights: International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (binding since 1969), International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1976), International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1976), Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (1986), Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (1986), Convention on the Rights of the Child (1991) and Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (2009). The UK has also ratified other human rights-related protocols and regional treaties at the European level.
4. Although the majority of these rights have not been incorporated into national law, the UK is still bound by the obligations set out in the treaties voluntarily ratified under international law (Articles 26 and 27 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties).
5. Together, these treaties constitute what is known as the international bill of human rights. The significance of the international bill lies in setting out the rights that every individual is entitled to regardless of their place of birth or residence.
6. The UK is monitored on how well it is implementing these rights by periodic reporting to the various UN treaty monitoring bodies. The organisations signing this submission gathered and submitted evidence and engaged constructively with government and UN officials in reviews concluded in 2016 and 2017 by the

Just Fair, Children’s Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women’s Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

Committee on the Rights of the Child, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. The signatory organisations also gathered and submitted evidence in the Joint Shadow Report of the Universal Periodic Review in 2017.

7. It is crucial that the UK Governments treats all international human rights obligations and recommendations from independent human rights bodies equally and, working constructively with civil society, take concrete steps to address the concerns raised by the UN treaty monitoring bodies following examination of the UK.⁴⁷⁹
8. The UK Government should also allow and empower individuals to submit complaints to independent international human rights committees after exhausting domestic remedies. In particular, we encourage the UK Government to sign and ratify the 1966 Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the 2008 Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the 2011 Third Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The UK should also accept the jurisdiction of the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Committee Against Torture.
9. The 3rd UN Universal Periodic Review (UPR) of the UK took place in May 2017, when the UK government received 227 recommendations from other countries in the UN Human Rights Council in relation to its human rights obligations.⁴⁸⁰ At the end of September the Government will be expected to inform the UN what recommendations will be voluntarily accepted by the UK. These recommendations will have to be implemented in the following years. By accepting and implementing as many recommendations as possible, the UK would present itself before the international community as an open and advanced society, and the Government would contribute to strengthen the UN human rights system. The plan to implement these recommendations should include a mid-term report to assess process and ensure opportunities for engagement with civil society.

⁴⁷⁹ Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (August 2017, UN doc. CRPD/C/GBR/CO/1); Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (2016, UN doc. CERD/C/GBR/CO/21-23); Committee on the Rights of the Child (2016, UN doc. CRC/C/GBR/CO/5); Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (2016, UN doc. E/C.12/GBR/CO/6); Human Rights Committee (2015, UN doc. CCPR/C/GBR/CO/7); Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (2013, UN doc. CEDAW/C/GBR/CO/7); Committee Against Torture (2013, UN doc. CAT/C/GBR/CO/5). Find the reports (concluding observations) here.

⁴⁸⁰ Report of the Working Group on the UPR of the UK, 2017, UN doc. A/HRC/36/9.

Just Fair, Children’s Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women’s Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

10. The European Convention on Human Rights is the only human rights treaty that has been built into the national legal framework through the Human Rights Act 1998 \(HRA\). The HRA is the primary law that safeguards everyone’s fundamental human rights in the UK and it places a duty on the public sector to comply with human rights set out in the Act. Its protection is essential for children and vulnerable adults, who depend heavily on public services. The UK Government must put an end to the threat of scrapping the Human Rights Act and withdrawing from the European Convention or restricting its application in any way.
11. The withdrawal from the European Union should not constitute a backdoor regression for human rights and equality in the UK. In particular, we hope that in the parliamentary process the EU Withdrawal Bill will be amended to incorporate the rights contained in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights into UK law.

Civic engagement and the human right to participate actively in society

12. Active participation is essential in an open and engaged society. The principle of active participation is a defining attribute of citizenship rights and cuts across the global human rights regime.⁴⁸¹
13. As summarised effectively by the UN Special Rapporteur on Extreme Poverty and Human Rights, participation rights have a key role in promoting and protecting active citizenship: “Through meaningful and effective participation, people can exercise their agency, autonomy and self-determination. Participation also limits the capacity of elites to impose their will on individuals and groups who may not have the means to defend their interests. Conceived as a right, participation is a means of challenging forms of domination that restrict people’s agency and self-determination. It gives people living in poverty power over decisions that affect their lives, transforming power structures in society and creating a greater and more widely shared enjoyment of human rights”.⁴⁸²
14. Civic engagement requires the empowerment of people living in poverty and experiencing social exclusion. Ensuring an adequate standard of living for everyone is a necessary requirement to strengthen the social fabric and people’s identity as ⁴⁸¹ The principle is contained implicitly or explicitly in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Articles 21 and 27), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 25), the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Articles 13(1) and 15(1)), the Covenant on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (Articles 7, 8, 13(c) and 14(2)), the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (Article 5(e)(vi)), the Convention on the Rights of the Child (Articles 12 and 31) and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (Articles 3(c), 4(3), 9, 29 and 30), among others.

⁴⁸² Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on Extreme Poverty and Human Rights, Magdalena Sepúlveda, 2013, UN doc. A/HRC/23/36, #16.

Just Fair, Children’s Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women’s Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

citizens. Children also have the right to adopt an active role in society and those in power must hear their voices.

15. Participation and active citizenship must be seen as a human right and an essential ingredient of human rights public discourse, laws and policies.

Recommendations

16. The House of Lords Select Committee asks what additional forms of rights, responsibilities and enforcement and monitoring mechanisms could contribute towards a more active and engaged citizenship. We believe the UK Government and society at large should embrace and bring home the human rights recognised in international law. In particular, we call on the UK government to:

- a. Abandon plans to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998.
- b. Treat all international human rights obligations and recommendations from independent human rights bodies equally and take concrete steps to address the concerns raised by the UN treaty monitoring bodies following examination of the UK.
- c. Accept and implement the recommendations made in the last Universal Periodic Review, including a mid-term report.
- d. Engage with civil society in the process of acceptance, monitoring and implementation of human rights recommendations made by international bodies and the UPR.
- e. Draw up a national human rights action plan setting out the priorities the Government will take to improve the promotion and protection of human rights drawing on its work with civil society to take forward treaty body recommendations, as agreed by world leaders in the 1993 Vienna World Conference on Human Rights.⁴⁸³
- f. Safeguard all the rights derived from UK’s membership of the European Union, and in particular amend the EU Withdrawal Bill to incorporate the rights contained in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights into UK law.
- g. Ensure participation and active citizenship are seen as essential ingredients of the human rights public discourse, laws and policies.

⁴⁸³ Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna on 25 June 1993, #71.

Just Fair, Children's Rights Alliance for England, Alliance for Inclusive Education, Inclusion London, Women's Resource Centre and the British Institute of Human Rights – written evidence (CCE0162)

Signatories:

- Just Fair
- Children's Rights Alliance for England
- Alliance for Inclusive Education
- Inclusion London
- Women's Resource Centre
- British Institute of Human Rights

8 September 2017

Dr Nisha Kapoor, Lecturer in Sociology, University of York – written evidence (CCE0225)

1. I am an academic who has studied recent shifts in citizenship law and policy as it impacts on racially marginalized populations, with a particular focus on the impact of the securitization agenda as it has been enforced through immigration control and counter-terrorism initiatives. My academic research on this and related topics has appeared in peer-reviewed academic journals, books and public media platforms.
2. The research I have been carrying out, as part of an ESRC funded project, has involved investigating the growing insecurity of citizenship in the context of the War on Terror with a particular focus on different forms of citizenship denial, withdrawal and deprivation and their racial dimensions. The premise here is that much can be learned about the nature of citizenship from an examination of the experiences of those who are excluded from it.
3. In light of this, I centre my comments here on analysis of data capturing different dimensions of citizenship refusal and withdrawal. The policing of citizenship and reasons provided by the Home Office for its denial has implications for the way in which citizenship comes to be understood and experienced for members of resident minority ethnic communities who are disproportionately affected by these measures.
4. The research has thus far indicated a number of important findings that are deeply concerning. Ann Gross, Director of Special Needs, Disadvantage and Character Policy in the Department for Education, has indicated in earlier evidence to the Committee that Government policy on citizenship education expects schools to promote fundamental British values of ‘democracy, rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect and tolerance for people of different faiths and beliefs’. My research, however, indicates that many of these principles and values are not adhered to in the decision-making processes for granting citizenship. This not only compromises the sentiment behind those principles per se, it also sends a message out to racially marginalised communities that there are hierarchies of citizenship, with the threshold being higher for some than others. This in turn has potential for increasing levels of alienation and negatively impacting on senses of belonging amongst minority communities.
5. To elaborate, I would like to raise with the Committee a number of issues arising from one of the current requirements for citizenship, namely the ‘good character’ requirement. The broad policy underpinning this criteria has allowed for an ever expansive scope for denying citizenship. While the quantitative data I have examined points to the disproportionate targeting of people with certain nationalities, the qualitative analysis indicates quite starkly how the criminalisation of immigration constrains future possibilities of citizenship.

Individuals can be denied naturalised citizenship on the basis of honest mistakes made when completing asylum application documentation, or for the political views or affiliations that caused them to seek asylum and refuge in the first place. Minor convictions, such as for driving misdemeanours, can also result in the refusal of naturalisation.

6. Analysis of interview data and legal judgements for cases where individuals have been refused citizenship on national security grounds (another dimension that constitutes 'not good character'), shows that in multiple cases individuals are designated to be of 'not good character' because of political beliefs they might hold, because of individuals they are suspected of associating with (which might include family members) and because they have refused to cooperate with and work for the intelligence and security services, acting as undercover agents within suspect communities (typically Muslim communities). While the policing and criminalisation of divergent political beliefs contravenes the very principles of democracy and liberty, 'respect for people of different faiths and beliefs', a value that the Government ostensibly seeks to encourage, is disregarded in this process.

Naturalised Citizenship and the Character Requirement

7. Within unsuccessful applications for British citizenship, being of 'not good character' has come to represent the principle reason for refusal over the last ten years. Since 2008 the number of people being refused naturalised citizenship on the grounds of 'bad character' has been gradually increasing so that, after a small dip in 2014, in 2015 43%, and in 2016 44% of people who were refused British citizenship were denied on this basis. It is consequently becoming the principle reason why citizenship is denied in Britain.
8. The good character requirement for citizenship was revised in 2009 as part of broader immigration-citizenship reforms brought in under Gordon Brown (Borders, Citizenship and Immigration Act 2009). The Brown Government's 'Path to Citizenship' strengthened a notion in development for some time that citizenship was something to be 'earned'. The 2009 enhancement centred around a staged process that would involve demonstration of contribution to social and economic life in a number of ways as well as proving a certain degree of assimilation. Sufficient knowledge of life in the UK and the English language would need to be demonstrated alongside exemplifying that one was of reputable 'character', a requirement that encompassed multiple considerations including previous criminal convictions and suspected criminality but also civil society contributions such as paying taxes and community engagement. Though the character requirements have long been part of legal provisions for citizenship, policy changes brought in at this time introduced a stricter test, adding a further dimension to a shift in the administration of citizenship that was already underway.

9. Though there is no official legal definition of what constitutes ‘bad character’, the 2013 Home Office policy guidance indicated that it incorporated ‘not abiding by or respecting the law’, being ‘associated with war crimes’, not having one’s ‘financial affairs in appropriate order’, being involved in ‘notorious activities’ that ‘cast serious doubt on standing in the local community’, being dishonest with the UK Government, or having previously been deprived of citizenship (see Home Office 2013 Nationality Policy Guidance and Casework Instruction. Chapter 18, Annex D: The Good Character Requirement). Illegal entry to the UK, ‘assisting in the evasion of immigration control’ and contravening immigration regulations were added to this list in 2014. Currently behaviours such as divorce, promiscuity, drinking or gambling, eccentricity (including beliefs), and unemployment or working habits should not normally constitute grounds for refusal, but scale and persistence of such activities are considered potential grounds, particularly if it is a case likely to attract public or media attention. Parenting, debt, bankruptcy factor too. The guidance further stipulates that a decision maker can still refuse citizenship if they have further doubts outside of this list (Home Office 2013, p.4).

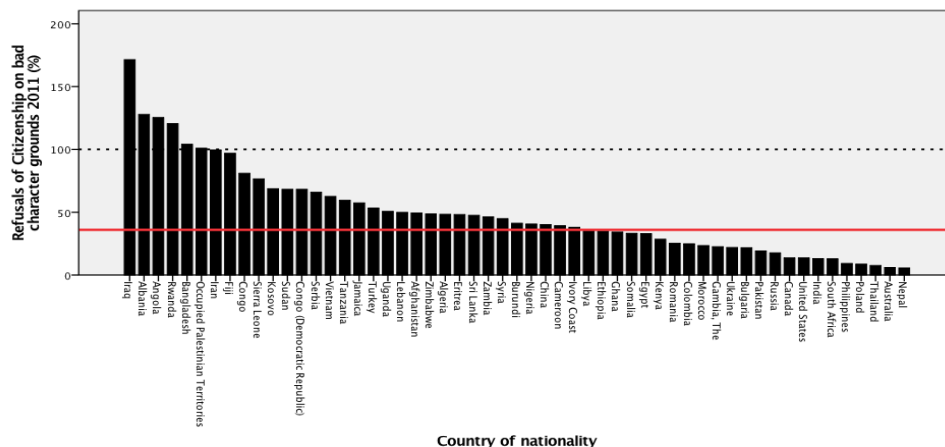

10. While the framework for demarcating citizens and granting citizenship has always been deeply racialized, the supplementation of ‘objective’ thresholds for citizenship such as residency requirements with such ‘subjective’ criteria significantly expands the scope for racial sorting. Analysis of Home Office Citizenship statistics supports this, indicating an uneven distribution of citizenship refusal by nationality.

11. The data indicates that refusals on character grounds are unevenly distributed and some nationalities are more likely to be refused for such reasons compared with others. The data shows this uneven distribution to be the case since 2002, but I focus on data from 2006 here (see Figure 1), two years before a significant jump in citizenship refusals on character grounds in 2008, and three years before the official policy shift in 2009. I have calculated percentage refusals on character grounds as proportions of expected rates of total refusal for each country. Consequently, some of the results show that more than 100% of applications are refused on character grounds. While this indicates that specific percentage rates I show are to be treated with some caution, the results do indicate that the overall refusals for applicants from these countries are higher than would be expected (the denominator estimates are too low) and still suggest that a high proportion of refusals from these countries are for reasons of ‘not good character’. Applicants who are nationals of Turkey, Vietnam, Kosovo, Angola, Jamaica, Rwanda, Congo, Tunisia, Algeria, Sudan, Sierra Leone, Iran, Palestine and Libya are consistently more likely to be refused citizenship on character grounds compared with the average rate. From 2008 when there was a jump in the use of this measure so there was a significant rise in refusing applicants from Iraq and Afghanistan and applications from nationals of these countries remain high over the subsequent period.

12. It is difficult from these data to confirm why nationals of the listed countries in particular feature amongst those most likely to be refused on character grounds but they do feature as states from where a high proportion of asylum applications have come from five years or so preceding citizenship applications, countries facing wars in which Britain has had a direct or indirect role and/or post/colonial relationship.
13. One of the justifications for refusing citizenship on character grounds, as noted above, refers to 'deception and dishonesty' in any liaison with a state department, a sufficiently broad criterion that can encompass a range of actions and behaviours. The caseworker guidance notes indicate it refers to attempts to enter the country using false or misleading documents and/or attempts to gain access to public and social services which one's immigration status prohibits against. Since the onslaught of legislative restrictions against asylum make it near possible to arrive as an asylum seeker 'legally', without incurring some kind of legal infraction, and the exclusion from or limited access to basic services such as healthcare and housing mean transgression becomes a necessity for most to survive, it is quite possible that the measure of 'deception and dishonesty' offers a way to exclude from British citizenship large numbers of individuals who have arrived via the asylum route. Though denial of citizenship by naturalisation does not mean the right of residency is retracted it does maintain a position of precariousness for those refused is maintained, restricting freedom of movement for those with no viable passport and preserving a sustained possibility for deportation at future dates.
14. An examination of legal judgements in the High Court where individuals have appealed against refusals of their applications for naturalisation shows that citizenship is often refused on the basis of the roles individuals played in the regimes they were fleeing from and on the same basis that they were granted asylum. Asylum applications from Sri Lanka, for example, have been at persistent levels over recent years as a result of the civil war there. In some cases, refusals of citizenship of applicants from Sri Lanka have been on the basis of their association with either the army or rebel groups, both of which have formed legitimate reasons for seeking political asylum.
15. In another case, citizenship was refused to a Botswanan national who had served in the British army (as part of the Commonwealth) on the basis of a driving conviction.
16. In one case a discrepancy in the applicant's date of birth on two different forms (a typo of one number) was the given reason for her refused application.
17. The power to refuse citizenship on character grounds was extended to children from aged 10 in 2010. 415 children aged 10-18 were refused citizenship on character grounds between 2010 and 2014, 25 of whom were 10-13, 95 of whom were aged 14-15 and 300 aged 16-17. There is little detail on the reasons for these refusals but it is somewhat problematic to assume that the full 'character' of a person has been formed by such a young age.

18. Refusal of citizenship on character grounds is sometimes framed in terms of the applicant being suspected of engagement in terrorism-related activity. While there is a broad range of political groups that have been designated as problematic, refusal on this basis can also include those who are not necessarily part of any movement but, for example, engaged in preaching 'non-Western views' or who made public statements that were regarded to be 'of an extremist nature'. This seems to contradict some of the democratic principles being lobbied for, such as freedom of speech and expression.
19. The second, and more prominent, reason for citizenship refusals based on national security bad character concerns associations with others deemed to be suspicious. This affects those who know people who are considered to be of bad character, such that there is a pattern of guilt by association- knowing someone deemed to be of bad character means you can also be labelled in such terms. This reasons underpins most of the justifications for refusing citizenship on character grounds when the specific reason is related to national security or suspicion of terrorism-related activity.
20. The consequence of this wide definition of 'not good character', with its use and application in this way, is to further racialize the concept of citizenship, disproportionately excluding and marginalising some minority ethnic communities, particularly those who are likely to have arrived in the UK via asylum routes and Muslim communities, already alienated by experiences of exclusion and Islamophobia.

Source: Home Office Citizenship Table cz-01qa-Citizenship Applications by Country of Nationality 2016; Home Office FOI Response 26908, 25 April 2013.

The Committee has, in places, redacted the names of individuals to prevent them from being identified.

Dr Avril Keating – written evidence (CCE0134)

Dr Avril Keating is a Senior Lecturer in Comparative Social Science at the UCL Institute of Education, where she works in the Department of Education, Practice and Society. She is the Director of the Centre for Global Youth and a Contributing Academic to the ESRC Centre for Learning and Life Chances in Knowledge Economies and Societies (LLAKES).

Dr. Keating's research focuses on the evolution of civic attitudes and agency during youth, and over the past 10 years, she has been involved in a range of projects that explore this theme from a comparative and mixed-method perspective and that draw on theories from across the social sciences. As part of this research agenda, she has played a leading role in the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS) since 2008. She was the lead author on the final two CELS reports for the government (Keating et al, 2009, 2010) and subsequent analyses (see, for example, Keating and Kerr, 2013; Keating and Janmaat, 2016).

Evidence Base for this submission

Much of the evidence presented here draws on the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS) in England, a long-running study that follows a cohort of young people that were among the first to become entitled to Citizenship when it became a statutory subject in state-maintained secondary schools in 2002. The study began in 2001, after the National Foundation for Educational Research (NFER) was commissioned by the Department for Education (DfE) to conduct an independent and longitudinal evaluation of the implementation and impact of Citizenship on schools, teachers, and young people. The government evaluation was officially completed in 2010, but thanks to funding from the ESRC, we have been able to transfer the study to the Institute of Education and to collect further data from our young cohort as they have made their way through early adulthood. The latest data were collected in 2014. For this phase, we collected data from the original cohort of CELS participants (now age 23) but we also conducted a cross-sectional web survey of young people aged 22 – 29 in England, Scotland and Wales.

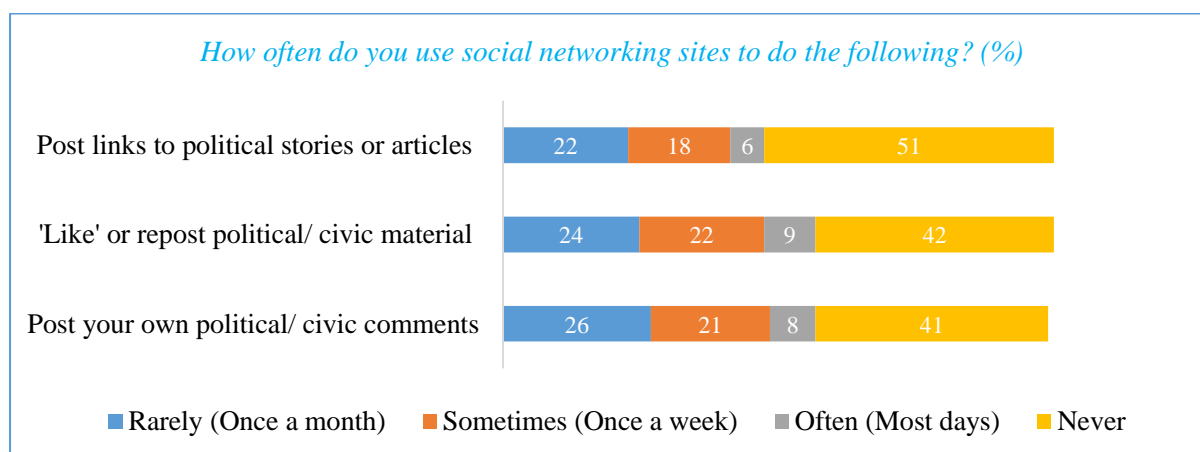

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century?

There is much debate about what citizenship and civic engagement 'mean' in the 21st century. On the one hand, there is widespread consensus that the relationship between individuals, governments and political institutions is evolving. Yet there is little consensus about what the 'new' citizenship contract is (or should be) evolving into, and even more debate about how we conceptualise, categorise, and understand the significance of new forms of civic engagement. For some, these changes pose a risk to our democratic institutions, as they are bound up with a decline in 'traditional' forms of civic engagement such as voting and volunteering (see, for example, Putnam, 2000). Others, however, view these changes as a positive shift that is enabling democracy to be transformed (see Dalton, 2008; Norris, 2002). At the root of this is the fact that citizens are increasingly looking beyond the established forms of political engagement (e.g. joining political parties) to find new and creative ways to express their political preferences and to achieve their civic and political goals. These ‘new’ forms of civic engagement typically do not take place within established institutions, and include protests, petitions, boycotts, and, and more recently, online modes of engagement (e.g. Twitter campaigns).

Young people are often at the heart of non-institutional forms of civic engagement, particularly if the action is taking place online. And as young people are often the earliest adopters and most prolific users, it has been suggested that social media is a key way to re-invigorating youth political engagement, which has fallen markedly in the UK since the early 1990s (although youth turnout rates now appear to be re-bounding).

Figure 1: Proportions of young adults participating in political discussions online

Source: CELS cross-sectional survey 2014, age 22-29 (n = 2025)

The 2014 CELS web survey illustrates both the challenges and the limitations of viewing social media as a simple panacea to the perceived problem of youth political engagement. On the positive side, it is a powerful communication tool that can reach a large number of young people. Almost 90% of the 22-29 year olds we surveyed reported that they are members of a social networking site, and over half of this group told us that they use social media to engage with political or civic material (either by liking, re-posting, or commenting on political/ civic material) (see Figure 1). Yet while many are using social media for political discussion, far fewer appear to be using these fora for explicitly political actions, such as starting campaigns on social media (Figure 2). Indeed, a majority of young people (60%) indicated that they had never used social media for political action. By contrast, almost 50% reported having voted in an election; as such, it remains the most common way that young adults engage with the political system and a vital part of political engagement (see Keating et al, 2015).

Figure 2: Proportions of young adults that used social media for the political activities (% yes)

Source: CELS cross-sectional survey 2014, age 22-29 (n = 2025)

Advanced statistical analysis also showed us that the principal driver of online political engagement is political interest (even after controlling for socio-demographic characteristics). On this basis, we concluded that social media may be providing a new outlet for some young adults, it is not re-engaging the young adults that have already lost interest in politics (see Keating and Melis, 2017). Social media may thus be most useful for communicating with young citizens that are already interested in politics, and it should not be relied upon to solve the long-standing inter-generational and intra-generational gaps in civic engagement that have emerged in Britain.

Recommendations:

1. Citizenship and civic engagement should be seen as contested and constantly-evolving social contracts. Treating them as such will enable us to maintain healthy democratic institutions.
2. Social media can be a useful tool for communicating with citizens, but its reach is limited and campaigns that seek to reach out to disengaged citizens should not rely on social media.

5.1 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

Schools and educational institutions are a key site of young citizens' socialisation, whether implicitly (through the hidden curriculum) or explicitly (through curricular or extra-curricular interventions). Indeed, the relationship between citizenship and education is inextricable, in part because of the long-standing involvement of the state in educational provision, but also because by its very nature, education provides young citizens with the fundamental tools (e.g. literacy) that they need to act as citizens. Research has repeatedly shown that there is a strong relationship between education and civic engagement, and that citizens with higher levels of education are more likely to vote, to volunteer, and to support important civic values such as tolerance and respect for democracy. In this context, then, the role of education should be to provide equal opportunities to all children and young people to receive the high-quality education that they will need to become informed and enabled citizens.

How can educational institutions best achieve this goal?

In addition to providing lifelong civic resources through general education, schools can also play a more direct or explicit role when citizenship is taught as part of the curriculum. Our evidence to support this claim is drawn from the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS), which evaluated the impact of school-based citizenship education during the first eight years after Citizenship became a statutory subject in maintained secondary schools in England (i.e. Key Stages 3 and 4). This wide-ranging and mixed method project examined the impact of this new curriculum subject on schools' and teachers' policies and practices, as well as the impact on student outcomes (e.g. behaviours and actions; attitudes and beliefs; knowledge and understanding; civic interest and engagement).

By tracking schools and students over time, and using qualitative and quantitative data, we found that citizenship education could have a positive impact on a range of student outcomes. In particular, students who reported receiving a lot of education about citizenship at school were more likely to hold positive attitudes towards civic and political participation, and to feel that they could effect change in their communities and in the political sphere (i.e. to have higher levels of political efficacy). These benefits could be seen even after they had left school and become young adults (see Keating et al, 2010; Whiteley, 2012).

The CELS data also enabled us to identify the schooling practices that were most conducive to achieving these positive civic outcomes. Based on these findings, the 8th and Final Report of CEL provided a series of recommendations, including:

1. Citizenship should be delivered in discrete timetable slots and not conflated with other subjects, such as Personal, Social and Health Education (PSHE). These Citizenship classes should last for more than 45 minutes per week.
2. Schools should be encouraged to offer external examination or certification of Citizenship learning.
3. Policymakers should provide more support and training for the political literacy strand of CE (the subject area where teachers felt least confident), and
4. Both schools and teachers need more support to ensure that citizenship learning is embedded in school practices and cultures.

Subsequent analysis suggests that taking part in experiential, 'hands-on' learning activities can be particularly effective at promoting youth civic engagement. In Keating and Janmaat (2016), we found that experiential learning activities that help pupils acquire politically-relevant skills (e.g. school councils, mock elections and debating clubs) have a positive, lasting, and independent effect on a range of political activities (including voting, contacting MPs, campaigning and protesting). These effects were apparent even after the participants had left school and had become young adults (age 20), and above and beyond the effects of other known predictors of civic engagement (such as socio-economic status, or prior dispositions). We also estimated that the size of the effects, which are not insubstantial. When pupils participated in these types of activities, the predicted probability of voting rose by 14.9 per cent, while the probability of participating in other types of political activities increased by 13.1 per cent.

Recommendations:

1. Schools and educational institutions should provide equal opportunities to all children and young people to receive the high-quality education that they will need to become informed and enabled citizens.
2. The Committee should consider how the recommendations from the CELS Final Report could be taken forward.

5.2 At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory?

The CELS data show that as young people move towards adulthood, they become more interested in politics, more likely to say that they will vote in general elections, and more confident in their ability to influence political institutions (see Figure 3). This upward trend is particularly marked between the ages of 16 and 20. This suggests that it is especially worthwhile continuing and strengthening citizenship education in post-16 education and training settings. As it currently stands, there is no statutory entitlement to citizenship education in 16-19 education (i.e. upper secondary education).

Further support for the idea of continuing citizenship education at post-16 level is found in the final CELS report (see Keating et al, 2010: 58). The advanced statistical analysis in this report suggest that the potential benefits of citizenship education wane if citizenship education is not sustained throughout a young person's secondary school career. However, the importance of citizenship education at the post-16 stage should not mean that we shift resources away from citizenship education prior to this. For example, we found that experiential learning activities were particularly effective if undertaken in Year 11 (see Keating and Janmaat, 2016), and also that this Year 11 experiential learning was compounded by learning in previous school years. We therefore concluded that that such activities should be provided throughout the schooling experience, to maximise take-up and (ultimately) political engagement.

Recommendations:

1. Citizenship education should take place throughout the schooling experience, with additional citizenship education towards the end of secondary school. Introducing some form of citizenship education at this stage seems particularly timely, as changes to the education system mean that 82% of young people now stay on in education or apprenticeship after age 16.

2. Provision should be compulsory at all levels, and in vocational and academic tracks, to ensure equity of access

Figure 3: Youth attitudes towards voting and politics from adolescence to early adulthood (% agree/ strongly agree)

Source: Keating et al, 2015; Based on data from CELS Waves 1-6 (2003, 2005, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2014)

The Challenges and Limits of Citizenship Education

Further support for the efficacy of citizenship education can be found in research studies from other countries, which have shown that civic participation during adolescence can have a wide range of benefits, both for individuals and for societies. In particular, these studies have found that participation in civic activities can have a positive effect on young people's civic dispositions such as tolerance, trust, civic knowledge, political activism, political efficacy, sense of commitment to the community, and self-esteem (see, for example, Torney-Purta, 2002; Schmidt et al, 2007; Quintelier, 2008).

Yet we also know that any potential benefits of citizenship education are dependent on how it is implemented. As noted in my Background Paper from July of this year (see Keating, 2017), the implementation of Citizenship in England has often been uneven. Much of this is due to a combination of policy-design issues, a lack of consistent support for schools and teachers, and resource issues (see also Keating and Kerr, 2013). Currently, the dwindling number of teachers that are trained in Citizenship is a particular concern. There is also concern that recent government priorities and reforms are also further undermining the already-fragile status of Citizenship in schools. For example, there is preliminary evidence to suggest that the introduction of the English Baccalaureate (EBacc) is putting pressure on subjects like Citizenship, which are not considered core academic subjects within this framework. This is something that should be monitored over the coming years. At this juncture, the situation is still somewhat unclear as there is a paucity of up-to-date evidence of what is going on in schools (although the recent ACT survey of Citizenship teachers will help to address this).

Even when citizenship education is implemented well, however, it too should not be viewed (or presented) as a panacea to the various challenges associated with engaging young people in civic and political life. For one, while adolescence is formative, we must remember that civic attitudes and values are not static after this point. Instead, they continue to be malleable after young people have left education and as they make the transition into and through early adulthood (up to age 25). As their attitudes are still being formed, this also means that attitudes are potentially more vulnerable to shocks (such as political scandals and economic crises) and life-stage changes that can undermine civic engagement (see, for example, Schoon and Mortimer, 2017; Smets, 2016). In short, learning about citizenship is a lifelong endeavour; responsibility for this learning cannot be shifted exclusively onto citizenship education or formal educational institutions.

This brings us to a second point that is regularly overlooked in these debates: while schools play an important role in citizens' education, it often a relatively small one. In England, for example, the final CELS report cautioned that 'impact of citizenship education is still relatively small' (Keating et al, 2010: 65). Likewise, multi-level modelling of pan-European data from the 2009 ICCS study shows that schooling and cross-national differences only explain a small amount of the differences that we find in youth attitudes (see Keating, 2014). Both studies highlight that the vast majority of the attitudinal differences emerge not from what young people learn at school, but what they learn from their parents and other social interactions. Thus while citizenship education can be an important part of this process, simply tinkering with the education system, or simply proposing more citizenship education, will not automatically bridge the gulf between the political actors and citizens, or provide an easy fix for the latest social 'problem' that has been identified.

Recommendations

1. The Committee should consider how the number of trained Citizenship teachers could be increased.
2. While CELS and other studies shows that citizenship education can be effective, citizenship education lessons alone are not sufficient to tackle intransigent problems that are rooted in wider social challenges and changes. We should acknowledge that schooling is only one part of what is a complex citizenship-formation process.

3. In addition to ensuring that all children and young people have access to citizenship education throughout schooling, we should also find ways to engage more effectively with other the social institutions that play an important role in citizenship-formation (i.e. families, the media, political parties and other civil society). For example, youth voter registration campaigns should target parents as well as young people and educational institutions. (Parents continue to play an important role in political socialisation when young people are in their 20s.)

Summary and Conclusions

There is evidence both from the UK and beyond that citizenship education has a lasting and positive impact on civic values, attitudes, and engagement among young people. However, while important, citizenship education at school is only one of the many factors that influence citizenship and civic engagement. It cannot be left to schools alone to address the current challenges we observe in civic engagement. Without working with other civic and social institutions, or tackling the underlying social inequalities, launching isolated school-based initiatives to resolve these issues is likely to have only limited success.

Moreover, to increase the efficacy of citizenship education in schools, policy announcements in this vein must be backed-up with sustained political commitment, practical support for schools, and trained teachers (see Keating and Kerr, 2013). Without these vital resources, it will be difficult to live up to the potential that different types of citizenship education can have, and give youth civic engagement the boost it still clearly needs.

References

Dalton, R. J. (2008). The good citizen: How a younger generation is reshaping American politics. SAGE.

Keating, A. (2014) Education for citizenship in Europe: European policies, national adaptations, and young people's attitudes. Palgrave Macmillan.

Keating, A. (2017) Citizenship Education in England: Current state of play and key challenges. Background paper for the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement, July 2017.

Keating, A. and Kerr, D. (2013) 'Putting participation into practice : re-evaluating the implementation of the Citizenship curriculum in England'. In: Hedtke, R. and Tatjana Zimenkova (eds.) Education for Civic and Political Participation: A Critical Approach. Routledge (Chap 6).

Keating, A. and Melis, G. (2017) Social media and youth political engagement: Preaching to the converted or providing a new voice for youth? In: British Journal of Politics and International Relations. [Open access] DOI: <https://doi.org/10.1177/1369148117718461>

Keating, A., Green, A. and Janmaat, J.G. (2015) Young Adults and Politics Today: disengaged and disaffected or engaged and enraged? The latest findings from the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS). LLAKES Research Brief. UCL Institute of Education. Download here.

Keating, A., Kerr, D., Benton, T., Mundy, E., and Lopes, J. (2010) Citizenship education in England 2001-2010: young people's practices and prospects for the future: the eighth and final report from the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS). Department for Education [online]. <http://www.education.gov.uk/publications//eOrderingDownload/DFE-RR059.pdf>

Keating, A., Kerr, D., Lopes, J., Featherstone, G., Benton, T. (2009) Embedding Citizenship Education (CE) in Secondary Schools in England (2002-08): Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS): Seventh Annual Report. London: DCSF.

Norris, P. (2002). Democratic phoenix: Reinventing political activism. New York, NY: Cambridge University Press

Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling Alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Quintelier, E. (2008). Who is politically active: the athlete, the scout member or the environmental activist? Young people, voluntary engagement and political participation. Acta sociologica, 51(4), 355-370.

Schmidt, J. A., Shumow, L., & Kackar, H. (2007). Adolescents' participation in service activities and its impact on academic, behavioral, and civic outcomes. Journal of Youth and Adolescence, 36(2), 127-140.

Schoon, I., & Mortimer, J. (2017). Youth and the Great Recession: Are values, achievement orientation and outlook to the future affected? International Journal of Psychology, 52(1), 1-8.

Smets, K. (2016). Revisiting the political life-cycle model: later maturation and turnout decline among young adults. European Political Science Review, 8(2), 225-249.

Torney-Purta, J. (2002). The school's role in developing civic engagement: A study of adolescents in twenty-eight countries. Applied developmental science, 6(4), 203-212.

Whiteley, P. (2012). Does citizenship education work? Evidence from a decade of citizenship education in secondary schools in England. Parliamentary Affairs, 67(3), 513-535.

Dr Avril Keating – written evidence (CCE0134)

8 September 2017

KIDS – written evidence (CCE0238)

KIDS is a national charity working with children and young people with disabilities, and their families. We support over 13,500 disabled children, young people and their families every year by delivering over 120 services throughout England. Kids is unique; there is no other organisation dedicated to providing such an extensive range of services to disabled children and young people, aged 0 – 25 years, irrespective of their impairment or condition.

Part of our work involves engaging young people in consultation and coproduction for other organisations, such as Local Authorities. We have groups of young people who have developed their skills and insights to be able to reflect on their experiences and to consider the experiences of their peers. Two of these groups have been engaged in reviewing some of the questions posed by the select committee.

Several of the questions posed by the committee were adapted to be accessible to the young people taking part in the activity.

Main themes that emerged were that access to meaningful employment is key to being able to engage with society – providing independence and positive self-esteem. The ability to engage in community activities and make a difference to local communities was also a key component in active citizenship for young people.

What do you think Citizenship involves?

Young people described citizenship as involving

- Being part of a wider community and being an active part of that community
- Being able to access services
- Abiding by the rules of society
- Being able to find employment (a particular concern for people with disabilities)
- Caring for other people
- Being able to live independently and having positive self esteem

What does being a good citizen mean? How can people be good citizens?

This question brought to the fore many views about how accessible society is for disabled people.

The ability to gain information in order to be able to participate was raised – adaptations to information allow people with disabilities to make informed choices at, for example, election time. There is a shortage of such adapted information.

Ways in which people can be good citizens include:

- Tolerating and accepting difference
- Avoiding discrimination and prejudice
- Being kind to people
- Volunteering and getting involved in local communities

Is there anything about being a good citizen that you are stopped from doing, or that you find difficult to do? What things stop you, or make it difficult?

- A lack of employment opportunities for disabled young people creates a huge barrier to gaining independence
- Accessible transport is a significant barrier to being engaged in communities and society in general
- A lack of understanding, acceptance or even tolerance of people with disabilities. In particular relating to employment and career opportunities.
- A lack of appropriate volunteering opportunities for people with disabilities limits the ability to engage.
- Voting in elections: A lack of accessible information to help inform disabled people, along with issues regarding transportation to actually vote.
- A lack of good quality education for young people with disabilities has a significant impact. More support at school, along with education systems designed to enable young people with disabilities to more fully realise their potential, is needed.

What activities or examples could show that someone is a good citizen?

- Wider access to the National Citizenship Service for people with disabilities
- Volunteering in projects like the one creating these responses – engaging in public speaking, petitioning and being active in your community; having an influence on the world
- Caring for the environment
- Voting
- Being informed about the social and political world
- Being aware of rights and responsibilities
- Supporting and caring for others
- Gaining employment
- Joining Brownies / Scouts. Taking part in the Duke of Edinburgh Award Scheme.
- Paying taxes, abiding by the law, being polite

What could help you to become a more active citizen?

- Opportunity
- Employment
- Access to opportunities such as National Citizenship Service, Duke of Edinburgh Award Scheme and the Prince's Trust. Many participants found they could not access the NCS as a result of their disabilities.
- Gaining a good education

Simon Kinder, Head of Learning and Teaching, Gresham's School – written evidence (CCE0009)

Simon Kinder, Head of Learning and Teaching, Gresham's School – written evidence (CCE0009)

The state of citizenship education and the role that it plays in creating active citizens:

In general in curriculum terms this is adequate but often gets side-lined in favour of other very important PSHE areas. Rarely is the curriculum time sufficient to allow citizenship education to be delivered fully or in a way that will inspire and animate young people. I am fortunate enough to work in a school in which there is curriculum time to explain the constitution, voting system, the different levels of democracies and to explore the rights and duties of British citizens. We have also arranged a mock election in conjunction with every UK general election since 2005, in which candidates address the whole school and are subjected to public Q and A hustings; turnout is now regularly 80% of the pupil body. We staged a Brexit debate, where staff and pupils debated together, and secured a 92% turnout in our referendum. We hosted a post-Brexit discussion forum by Cambridge University, in which pupils, staff, parents and local people shared their views as to the shape of post-Brexit Britain that they wanted. We even conducted a US presidential debate in 2016. During the 2017 UK general election the School had a visit from the CPA UK Election Assessment Mission which allowed pupils to discuss their views of the UK political system and the election process; the international delegations were impressed by the passion and level of engagement displayed by the pupils. There are typically twenty-plus school debates a year, which frequently explore issues directly related to citizenship. There is also a Politics Group, which invites local councillors and police and crime commissioners to speak and answer questions. More schools need to be encouraged to have this level of active engagement for pupils and there ought to be time and incentives to make it more central.

The actual process of voting looks like it is out of the 1920s. It is time to explore a secure digital system of voting which might encourage more young people to vote. Social media was certainly a significant factor in the increased student turnout in 2017.

In general, decent citizenship education is essential to social cohesion. It would be great to see more freedom to celebrate the values of freedom and political democracy, which are not solely British values, and to separate this from a Prevent strategy which serves quite a different purpose. Above all though the delivery of citizenship needs to be active and exciting. Only when young people get the chance for dialogue and debate amongst themselves and with different stakeholders and generations can citizenship education really succeed.

4 August 2017

Kingsteignton Youth Centre – written evidence (CCE0084)

“If they knew how much we knew, if they knew our vote could help them in their job, then maybe they’d listen to us.”

A. Executive Summary

- Current laws do not encourage political engagement from young people and we should be given our right to vote.
- We believe that being unable to vote signifies to political leaders that we are less deserving of attention, and that our opinions are less important.
- Schools can and should do more, by teaching life skills integrated with political engagement.
- Without change, it will continue to feel as if politics is about us but not for us.

B. Introduction: The Young People of Kingsteignton Youth Centre (KYC)

1. This evidence has been collected from young people, aged 8 to 18, who are members of a community youth group in Devon. Kingsteignton Youth Centre is a Charitable Incorporated Organisation (Reg. no. 1171416) which runs KYC, a youth club for young people aged from 8 to eighteen years. One of the principal objects of the charity is to provide support and activities for young people, in order to develop their skills, capacities, and capabilities and enable them to participate in society as mature and responsible adults.
2. The young people who make up KYC welcome this opportunity to share their experiences with the House of Lords and highlight their hopes for better engagement between young people and the state.
3. The following evidence focuses on three key issues taken from the Call for Evidence, relating to questions 4, 5 and 9. It was collected and reviewed in August 2017 by the young people with the help of staff and volunteers.

C. Enfranchise Young People (Question 4)

4. Current laws do not encourage political engagement from young people and we should be given our right to vote.
5. Our future is affected by votes from which we are excluded. The recent referendum on membership of the European Union is an excellent illustration of a political decision that affects us all, and which will determine our future but which was made without us. We will deal with the consequences of Brexit, and we were not given a voice.

6. In 2017, YouGov reported that when it comes to voting, “age is the new class”.⁴⁸⁴ We believe we are deliberately disenfranchised from the vote in order to affect the result of national and local elections. The vote should be given to people aged 16 and above.
7. We believe that being unable to vote signifies to political leaders that we are less deserving of attention, and that our opinions are less important. More energy would be spent engaging with young people if the voting age is lowered, and young people in turn would feel more invested in civic engagement.
8. We reject the argument that 16 and 17 year olds do not possess the maturity to vote in an informed way.
9. We question whether age signifies maturity, and point to the many significant responsibilities held by people under 18. For instance, young people are allowed and encouraged to join the armed forces, where we train to defend the country. If we can be trusted to defend the country, we should be trusted to have a voice in our elections.

D. The Role of Schools and Education (Question 5)

10. Schools can and should do more, by teaching life skills integrated with political engagement.
11. We want to be taught more of the hard skills we need for adulthood, we want to be taught how to pay our taxes, and where those taxes are spent. We know that our taxes and our parent’s taxes fund politician’s salaries, but we want to learn about how these funds are spent on services that affect us, and how we can influence those spending decisions.
12. We believe that to be better engaged with society, young people need a better understanding of the legal and justice systems that affect us. We should be aware of our rights as well as our responsibilities.
13. We want to learn the know-how we need to be successful adults, including political engagement. Government should invest in educating parents, so they can benefit from these skills and pass them on to us too.
14. “Politics should be part of life skills and all life skills should be compulsory in schools.”
15. We want a better understanding of global politics at an earlier age. We hear a lot about war and conflict between and within countries. We want to know how our defence system works, and what the implications of political choices are on the international stage. We want to better understand the decisions that are being made by adults that will affect our future.

⁴⁸⁴ “The demographics dividing Britain” 25 April 2017, [Available at: <https://yougov.co.uk/news/2017/04/25/demographics-dividing-britain>]

E. Young People are Not Included or Represented (Question 9)

16. It feels like politics is not for us. Although the diversity of Parliament seems to be getting better, it does not mirror society. We feel disconnected from our MP who works with her constituency but not with us, because we can't vote as young people.
17. "If [MPs] knew how much we knew, if they knew our vote could help them in their job, then maybe they'd listen to us."
18. There is still a lack of diversity in parliament and we don't feel represented. To us, being represented means having more women, more young people, and more BAME leaders in Government.

6 September 2017

Kingston Park Neighbourhood Forum – written evidence (CCE0107)

Submitted by Violet Rook, Chair

The meaning of citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century

The Kingston Park Neighbourhood Forum was established to formulate a Neighbourhood Plan under the Localism Act 2011.

This idea of a plan for a local area be it a Parish or an area with an established structure was to encourage local citizens to become actively involved in their community, to establish a local plan similar to a core strategy which would be of benefit to this and the next generation. This idea encourages civic engagement and should be encouraged in regard to local democracy.

Newcastle also contains many examples of local civic engagement which brings together many cultures and communities in civic endeavours. An example was the Community Voices an organisation which included representatives of the BME, women's groups, older peoples groups communities in the city who worked together in regard to commenting on council strategy. This established a tradition which the city encourages in schools and colleges.

The rights and responsibilities attached to citizenship

The rights of every citizen should be maintain without fear or favour and not for profit or fame but to endeavour to deliver all from the insecurity of bias and hatred. Showing no privilege or prejudice to anyone, but treating each citizen as unique to themselves and deserving to be considered so. The constitution shows and gives direction to enable trust in each decision and future proof the word of parliament and whose who try to establish a country where it is safe, caring and just. The individual needs to be aware of the rights of others to life, liberty and to pursue their own course in society. These rights have been establish in law, be it parliamentary legislation, case law, common law and precedents. These have been formulated by the Executive, the Legislature and the Judiciary over time and are the basis of our constitution. Many other countries have followed this example and it provides checks and balances which have brought stable government. This now needs to be adjusted to enable the positive use of technology to work for the citizens advantage in modern day society to have a voice in regard to parliamentary structure and process.

The impact of current electoral law on political engagement

Current law works in regard to democracy. Democracy indicates voting should be a personal choice and not compulsory. The use of technology in regard to voting will undoubtedly become the norm as it is in many countries in the world. But lessons need to be learnt in regard to hacking and false use of electronic voting. It would be useful if a research project was established to further the safeguarding of this procedure before it becomes established.

The state of citizenship education and the role that it plays in creating active citizens

The education of the citizen in regard to how the state works is vital to the health of democracy and the state both now and in the future. The media should play a more proactive role in this with information related to the structure and workings of Parliament. The broadcasting of the House of Commons is not compulsive viewing for the public. Therefore the national curriculum should be used to strength the knowledge of society in the very important topic, with economics being used to illustrate how local and national governments work.

Parliament and the Constitution should be taught to children and adults with refresher courses and visits to Parliament and Council events being made, especially at the commencement of a new government, this would make the electorate more aware and active in civic developments. Perhaps a formal part of voting would be to indicate an active activity in regard to the topic.

The connections of Councillors and Members of Parliament should be developed in regard to educating the generations and encouraging involvement via visits, and the us of technology in regard to comments on committee meetings. Social cohesion would be encouraged and unite communities in mutual community needs via having the knowledge of how things work, its members being well informed, supporting civic engagement and the role of Government and Parliament

7 September 2017

Dr Dina Kiwan, Reader in Comparative Education, Department of Education and Social Justice, School of Education University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0033)

This evidence is based on various pieces of published research and policy contributions that I have conducted over the last 15 years:

i) Research that I conducted (2001-2005), which examined conceptions of citizenship in the policy and curriculum development process of citizenship education with its statutory introduction in the English secondary school contemporary context, from the perspectives of the key players who were involved. My particular focus was on the extent to which these conceptions addressed ethnic and religious diversity, in terms of their theoretical and practical implications. My methodology entailed interviewing thirty participants involved at different stages of the policymaking process, including David Blunkett, Sir Bernard Crick, and others both actively involved in the policy process, subsequent curriculum development stages and also related initiatives – including the Home Office community cohesion initiatives. In addition, I analysed key policy and curriculum documentation. (Kiwan, D. (2008). Education for Inclusive Citizenship. London and New York: Routledge.)

ii) Policy consultation: Co-author of DfES Diversity and Citizenship Review (Ajegbo Report, 2007).

iii) Large-scale research project conducted on the process of integration and acquisition of citizenship, interviewing adult third country nationals applying for UK citizenship in 2010, in collaboration with COMPAS, University of Oxford (2010-11), funded by European Integration Fund, administered through the Home Office. (Gidley, B., Cangiano, A., Khor, Z. and Kiwan, D. (2012). Citizenship and Integration in the UK.)

iv) Research and policy consultation on naturalization and education policy in the UK:

1. Kiwan, D. (2011) (ed). 'Education for national citizenship in the context of devolution and ethno-religious conflict' special issue, Ethnicities, 11 (3).

2. Kiwan, D. (2013). 'Learning to be "British"? education and naturalisation in the UK', in D. Kiwan (ed). (2013). Naturalisation Policies, Education and Citizenship: Multicultural and Multi-nation Societies in International Perspective. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan. (This book also provides a comparative perspective, comparing with countries in Europe, Asia and the Middle East.)

3. Kiwan, D. (2007). Becoming a British citizen: A learning journey. (Lord Goldsmith QC Citizenship Review).

v) Research and policy advice for UNESCO on global citizenship, leading to publication: Kiwan, D. and Evans, M. (2015). *Global Citizenship Education. Topics and Learning

Dr Dina Kiwan, Reader in Comparative Education, Department of Education and Social Justice, School of Education University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0033)

Objectives by Age. UNESCO: Paris, France. (Additionally, I have recently participated in a high-level interdisciplinary UNESCO consultation in Seoul, South Korea, June 2017 on nationalistic perspectives and their implications for global citizenship education).

vi) Research conducted on conceptions of citizenship in the Middle East context:

Kiwan, D. (2014). 'Emerging Forms of Citizenship in the Arab World' in E. Isin and P. Nyers (eds) Routledge Global Handbook of Citizenship Studies. London and New York: Routledge.

Kiwan, D. (2016). 'Syrian and Syrian Palestinian women in Lebanon: 'actors of citizenship'?'. In M. Shalaby, and V. Moghadam (eds). Empowering Women after the Arab Spring. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Kiwan, D. (2017). 'Middle East', in Ian Davies, Li-Ching Ho, Dina Kiwan, Carla Peck, Andrew Peterson, Edda Sant, Yusef Waghid. (2017 forthcoming) (ed). The Palgrave Handbook of Global Citizenship and Education. Basingstoke, UK and New York, US: Palgrave Macmillan.

1. There is a long intellectual history to citizenship and civic engagement, from philosophical conceptions of citizenship in ancient Greece, to framings of citizenship in Western Europe in the Enlightenment period and the rise of the modern nation-state, to contemporary conceptions of citizenship against a backdrop of globalisation, immigration and social pluralism. In the UK, the government has made efforts to reassert the relevance and significance of 'national' (or state-level) citizenship, in the context of internal division from increased devolution, community cohesion and security threats (Kiwan, 2011). In exploring the various and contested conceptions of citizenship in my research, what emerged from the analysis of interviews I conducted with UK policymakers between 2002-2005, as well as the analysis of key policy and curriculum documentation, was that there were three 'dominant' conceptions of citizenship – which I refer to as 'moral', 'legal' and 'participatory' conceptions of citizenship, with the 'participatory' conception being the most dominant of these conceptions (Kiwan, 2008). In contrast, interviewees also referred to 'underplayed' conceptions of citizenship, supported by my analysis of key policy and curriculum documentation: what I have referred to as 'identity-based conceptions', as they are inherently concerned with 'identity', or forms of identification at different levels. These include national, European, and global framings of citizenship, as well as citizenship presented as a framework for anti-racist education, and 'multicultural' citizenship.

The emphasis of these conceptions of citizenship have shifted over the last decade towards a heightened focus on identity and values, especially since the London bombings in July 2005, and more recently with concerns relating to global terrorism, Brexit, and trends towards populist and nationalist understandings of citizenship. There have been attempts to engage with issues of diversity in relation to citizenship (eg. the DfES Ajebo Report 2007, of which I was a co-author). In this report, we proposed an additional strand - 'Identity and Diversity', in addition to the original three strands of 'social and moral responsibility', 'community involvement' and 'political literacy' proposed in the initial Crick Report. This recommendation was accepted and incorporated in subsequent revised curriculum documentation. There has been a troubled engagement with ‘diversity’, where ‘shared values’ is often utilised to question and challenge the presumed cultural, economic and political threats of ‘diversity’, an important theme that emerged from my interviews over a decade ago, as well as continuing as a common theme in public debates today.

Dr Dina Kiwan, Reader in Comparative Education, Department of Education and Social Justice, School of Education University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0033)

An increased focus on the conception of ‘global citizenship’ has been championed by UNESCO since the launch of the Global Education first initiative of the UN Secretary General in 2012. Global citizenship education is situated within this initiative, framed in terms of an emphasis on the importance of recognizing interdependency – socially, culturally, economically and politically, with local, national, regional and global connectedness. This initiative in its stressing of socio-emotional, as well as cognitive and behavioural dimensions illustrates an international trend recognising the importance of the so-called ‘soft skills’, as well as resonating with such initiatives as some forms of ‘character education’, sustainable development, human rights and peace education (Kiwan and Evans, 2015). In the developing world context in particular, however, there has been some resistance to such global conceptions, with the argument that where there are significant local and national regional challenges, such conceptions are not relevant or helpful (Kiwan, 2017).

2. Since 1997, citizenship has been a high policy priority across government. In addition to the introduction of citizenship education as a statutory subject in England in 2002, the Life in the UK Advisory Group – of which I was a member, was set up in 2002, with the remit to advise the Home Secretary on the ‘method, conduct and implementation’ of a ‘Life in the UK’ naturalisation test. Both these initiatives - in education policy and naturalisation policy were concerned fundamentally with promoting membership and belonging. There have been debates about what content best serves the purposes of strengthening people’s identification and active participation. One debate relates to whether this is better achieved through equipping people with critical skills of language and practical information, or whether it is through a more academic engagement with the country’s history. The recommendations of the Life in the UK advisory group reflected a support for the former position. There have also been debates as to the length of time before qualifying for naturalisation, as well as distinctions between such statuses as ‘permanent leave to remain’, and being a ‘citizen’. In addition, the role of symbolic markers of recognition of achieving citizenship status can be considered to have an important emotive value, as evidenced in research findings on the integration and naturalisation process that I conducted in collaboration with COMPAS, University of Oxford (2010-11). The naturalisation process was viewed in general positively, with more positive reviews for the course route as opposed to the test route, which allowed for increased social contact. Applicants noted both instrumental (eg. security of residence, freedom of movement) as well as non-instrumental benefits of citizenship - namely a sense of belonging to the UK. Half of the applicants in the sample had friendships outside of their ethnic group, with a greater level of inter-ethnic interaction than the UK-born population. Education, faith and sport were the main sites for such socialisation. New citizens were also more active in terms of civic participation than the UK-born population. With regards to identity, the majority had a strong sense of local identity to their neighbourhoods, and to the UK, but less so to the separate four nations of the UK (Gidley, Cangiano, Khor and Kiwan, 2012).

5. In my research on citizenship and inclusion - studied both through education and naturalisation policy – both in the UK and in international context, I have proposed that the construct of ‘citizenship’ is not a static one – a badge of honour, but one that is continually in process through learning – both through formal education, but also very importantly through non-formal means – through the community, family and peers. As such, we are learning what it means to be members of our communities from an early age, and so it is appropriate that formal education supports this learning process from primary school onwards. However, citizenship education has been presented primarily in terms of knowledge and skills of participation, based on ‘cognitive engagement theory’, which hypothesizes that participation depends of access to information (Kiwan, 2011). There is a further implicit assumption that equipping pupils with ‘skills’ for participation will somehow translate into active participation of all students. Whilst this is necessary, it is not sufficient for a model of inclusive active citizenship. What is missing is an understanding that identification with the social context will necessarily influence an individual’s motivation to participate. There is an important role of ‘emotional’ learning that has been neglected in dominant models (Kiwan, 2007; Kiwan, 2011).

I have also written about how the naturalisation process can be conceived of as a learning process (Kiwan, 2007; Kiwan, 2011; Kiwan, 2013). The advantage of making such learning compulsory is a practical one – in that it both signals the importance of this learning, as well structurally requiring ‘space’ to be made in the curriculum for this learning. In order to answer the questions of relative emphasis of ‘political participation’ (and what this refers to) inside and outside classes, effectiveness of current teaching and assessing the current curriculum offering, I would propose that a national comprehensive review be commissioned. There is certainly evidence that there are examples of excellent teaching, although due to resource limitations, this is patchy on the national scale.

8. As noted in my response to 1, the issue of ‘shared values’ has often been raised as an antidote to the dangers of diversity. Of note, is that the policy preoccupation with promoting ‘Britishness’ – both in education and naturalisation policy – has been predominantly a focus in England, rather than in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. Indeed, research analysing conceptions of citizenship in citizenship education in England, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales illustrate varying conceptions across the four nations, given the devolved nature of education policy in the UK: England presents a predominantly state-level, yet multicultural, framing; Scotland presents a relatively more national (although predominantly civic) framing, coupled with a relatively more global outlook; Wales presents a national framing (both in cultural but increasingly also in civic terms), coupled with a relatively more global outlook; Northern Ireland presents a ‘glocal’ framing with the focus on the local, explicit avoidance of the national and state-level, and an orientation to the global through the lens of human rights (Kiwan, 2013). Furthermore, even though naturalisation policy is a function of central government, my research has shown tensions between a top-down state discourses on 'Britishness' in contrast to regional discourses on 'Welshness', 'Scottishness', 'Northern Irishness' and 'Englishness' (Kiwan, 2013).

Dr Dina Kiwan, Reader in Comparative Education, Department of Education and Social Justice, School of Education University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0033)

The concern with promoting shared values in the face of diversity typically reflects a concern with perceived divisiveness of 'multicultural' diversity arising from the UK's minorities, as opposed to concerns with 'multi-nation' diversity (the four nations – England, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales). Yet, as remarked upon by the Canadian political philosopher, Will Kymlicka (2011) reflecting on the Canadian context as well as other multi-nation states, although many nation-states are concerned with potential threats from multicultural diversity, in fact the greatest 'threats' to the integrity of the nation-state come from its constituent nations.

There are also problems in the teaching and practical application of any kind of prescriptive approach to what values count as 'British'. Certainly, I would advocate learning about values and discussing controversial issues, where students are supported in learning to develop skills of logic, debate, clarity of informed expression, as well as listening to opposing perspectives. Since Brexit, and the rise in populism in the US context as well as in parts of Europe, members of minority groups have come under increased verbal and physical attack, by those who have been emboldened to express and act in ways previously deemed to be unacceptable in an egalitarian and democratic society. In some discourses, unfettered 'freedom of expression' has sometimes been used as way to legitimise the expression of hate speech, racism, sexism, other forms of discrimination, and acts of violence. There is much public misunderstanding regarding how freedom of expression relates to justice and inclusion, and a public initiative to address this would be an important step to towards addressing these issues.

9. In recent analyses of why there has been a rise in nationalist and populist movements worldwide – for example, the forces leading to the voting for Trump as President, the forces leading to the result of the Brexit referendum, it has been suggested that certain communities have felt 'left behind' or not heard by the political elite / establishment. It has also been suggested that these groups tend to be demographically poor, White and relatively uneducated. In the context of Brexit, statistical analysis has also show the importance of age in this demographic, where relatively more older voters supported Brexit, alluding to more ideological rather than economic drivers for these decisions, with a nostalgia for a 'stronger' UK as in the days of the British Empire. However, it is also important - that whilst recognising these factors, it is also recognised that such sentiments are predicated on a strong sense of entitlement, positioned in relation to those 'minorities' and 'newcomers' perceived to have less entitlement. This is not only the case in the UK and US, but also evident in other contexts worldwide. For example, in research on Syrian and Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, the same concerns are articulated by poor, marginalised local Lebanese communities. One strategy used by international humanitarian agencies, such as the UNHCR has been to support those local deprived communities and their local inhabitants where there have been large influxes of refugees (Kiwan, 2016).

Dr Dina Kiwan, Reader in Comparative Education, Department of Education and Social Justice, School of Education University of Birmingham – written evidence (CCE0033)

11. Language proficiency has been shown to be strongly positively correlated with employment rates and with earnings, and so is important in promoting equality (Gidley, Cangiano, Khor and Kiwan, 2012). In addition, language is critically important in cultural integration. Some European countries have language programmes specifically for new migrants, but in the UK provision has been either within schools for the under-16s or at FE colleges for over-16s. There have been reductions in free provision since 2007, and women, the low-paid and part-time workers are particularly adversely affected by such reductions, with 26% in our interview sample stating that the courses were too expensive (ibid, 2012). In addition, from our interviews, it was noted that a significant minority (13%) had to travel more than 10 miles for an ESOL class, and 17% had to wait more than 6 months to access a place on a course (ibid, 2012). In the Lord Goldsmith QC Review of Citizenship, I also made a number of recommendations in relation to supporting the integration of first and second generation immigrants through adequate and free provision of English language at the earliest possible opportunity (Kiwan, 2007).

22 August 2017

Adam Peter Lang – written evidence (CCE0022)

I am a former London secondary teacher, head teacher and former Chair of the Association of School and College Leaders (ASCL) Public and Parliamentary Committee. I am now engaged in independent Doctoral research at UCL.

This short contribution to your very important and timely work on Citizenship and Civic Engagement is an independent one.

My contribution will relate to questions 5, 8, 9 and 10. I would be willing to speak to the committee if that would be helpful.

My research at UCL is on the impact of the Prevent strategy, especially the July 2015 duty, on schools and colleges with a close examination of the impact on Leadership and within communities.

The demographic changes relating to the British population and in particular schools (Cliffe 2017) is an important context. 67% of students in London Secondary schools are of BME background and in 2015 DFE figures showed that 30% of Primary school children in England and Wales are of BME background.

My research and that of others notably Busher et al (2017) shows that despite a recognition that there needs to be a counter - terrorism strategy there is also real concern about the Prevent strategy and the requirement to promote ‘ fundamental British Values ‘ (FBVs). There is within many communities and families a ‘fear of Prevent’.

Prevent and FBVs are seen as inextricably linked and have been the focus of extensive and often highly polarised public debate. There is a view that because Prevent is seen within some communities as unfair targeting and therefore stigmatising Muslim communities that it has had ‘a chilling effect ‘on free speech in schools and colleges. For example I have heard evidence from members of the Muslim community working with families and mothers that some mothers directly tell their children not to engage in any discussions about Citizenship/ Controversial Issues/Terrorism. I have also been told this by teaching staff and young people themselves.

There are good examples of some schools and colleges embracing this challenge and through assemblies, displays, PHSE tackling controversial issues but many are not. At a recent conference on FBVs that I attended a number of secondary teachers gave excellent examples of good practice but all were uncomfortable with the term Fundamental British Values , indeed saw it as profoundly un - British , when I asked them what they would re name FBVs with they said Citizenship .

There are a growing number of teachers in our schools of a young age and hence inexperienced for some the challenge of teaching/ discussing controversial issues is too daunting.

Some suggest that since the removal of Citizenship from the curriculum and overcrowded timetables, space needs to be created again. It may not be necessary to call it Citizenship, other names associated with Human Rights, Rights, Responsibilities and Respect could be used. There is a strong argument that this needs to be a compulsory part of the curriculum again with appropriate training provided for teachers. Why not re introduce qualifications that also give this area/ subject status? It does not need to be a GCSE but a formal qualification with appropriate assessment. Space needs to be created within schools and colleges for this.

Some excellent new resources for use in schools and colleges are being produced such as The Rule of Law for Citizenship in Education: A resource pack supported and produced by the Bingham Centre. It is also interesting to note that a number of countries including China are looking at what Citizenship education should be. They look to learn comparatively from the U.K. There are a number of international students studying Citizenship in our Universities including the Institute of Education at UCL.

The term FBVs is divisive. It is not a popular concept with communities of all kinds and with teachers and school and college leaders. A diverse, evolving culture exists in the U.K. We are not the U.S.A., with its different experiences of migration, education and symbols such as the American flag. Therefore a different term respecting the liberal values, but in changing times, of British education needs to be coined.

As a London Head teacher I insisted that the school and its students celebrated a range of festivals and events including St. George's day.

It would appear following this year's General Election that young people have found an appetite and interest in democracy and political engagement. There is evidence that it never went away but rather there was a reluctance to vote. This democratic engagement can further be stimulated in our schools and colleges. Brexit has opened up real discussions about Citizenship, migration and what it means to be British. The creative online think tank COVI (Common Vision) often captures well these views and concerns. Young people often seem more at ease with a diverse society than their elders.

My research has also highlighted the need to address 'far right extremism' as seen with the murder of Jo Cox and the attack on Finsbury Park Mosque. We live in an era of extremisms not just one extremism.

The Grenfell Tower tragedy has also demonstrated clearly how certain communities have a lack of trust and confidence in authorities.

My research looking at the perceived impact of Prevent on school and college leaders provides a wide range of views, pros and cons, with many seeing that this is an important moment to re visit this duty but also to re consider the holistic purpose of school and colleges in this new era. As West 2016) concludes in his study of Stoke on Trent ,an English post-industrial city in distress, “ a new politics of humanity” needs to work with and challenge “ the dynamics of hope and hopelessness”.

Ofsted has provided an understanding of the duty through its Common Inspection Framework which is strong on seeing that protecting children from the risk of radicalisation should be part of a wider safeguarding duty. School and college leaders and teachers identify this interpretation as positive. But there is a concern that as a legal duty, closely monitored by Ofsted inspections, Prevent has silenced opposition and democratic debate.

Recent events in this ‘age of anger’, an era of anti globalisation and populism, remind us all of the importance of education. Education alone cannot deal with all of these challenges but there burns a positive optimism amongst most young people and their families for the future. A broader more inclusive approach to Citizenship in our schools and colleges would be of enormous benefit. But to create this positive agenda the Prevent strategy needs refining and FBVs as a term scrapped, replaced with a concept of values acceptable to all. Time for an inclusive National debate on the notion of Citizenship and hence The House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement is most welcome.

14 August 2017

Professor Cristina Leston-Bandeira, Professor of Politics, University of Leeds – written evidence (CCE0154)

Summary:

- Citizenship is shaped by multiple factors;
 - Citizenship education can contribute towards fostering political engagement, but it is only one factor;
 - It is useful to identify specific characteristics of a legislature as an institution likely to affect public engagement, in order to foster more effective engagement initiatives;
 - Parliamentary public engagement encompasses a wide range of types of activities from the provision of information to the actual integration of the public’s views into parliamentary business;
 - Effective political engagement should be issue based, relevant and integrative of feedback;
 - Civic and political engagement should be actively encouraged and promoted at central, devolved and local level.
1. I’m submitting this evidence as Professor of Politics, whose research has centred on the relationship between Parliaments and citizens. This has recently led me to focus in particular on parliamentary public engagement and petitions, particularly in the UK. My submission addresses mainly Questions 5 and 7 of your call.
 2. Citizenship is a complex phenomenon and no single cause is likely to foster it on its own. Likewise, its relationship with political engagement is not as straightforward as one might think in the first instance. Importantly though, citizenship should not be conceived merely from the political realm.
 3. Research shows that citizenship develops through a combination of individual interest (how will this benefit me), sense of shared experience with others (being part of a community) and mobilisation (being part of a collective action, with a clear lead).⁴⁸⁵ Whilst Citizenship can be encouraged, it is also important to bear in mind that not all “citizenship initiatives” do achieve the aim of developing a sense of civic engagement. The ones that do, tend to be embedded into individuals’ routines (such as through education), specific and relevant; as well as utilising well proven education practices such as the use of active learning. Abstract, generic and one-off events are unlikely to achieve much in terms of developing a sense of civic engagement.
 4. Research also shows that Citizenship education can affect key constitutive variables of political engagement, such as political literacy and interest⁴⁸⁶; and that political knowledge, political interest and political engagement are closely linked.⁴⁸⁷ This would suggest that citizenship education can help to foster political engagement. However, citizenship education can also be very badly delivered and so its potential impact on enhancing political engagement would depend on the quality of its delivery. More importantly, whilst citizenship can lead to more political engagement, it is not by itself the only factor in promoting it.

⁴⁸⁵ See, for instance, C. Pattie, P. Seyd and P. Whiteley (2003), ‘Citizenship and Civic Engagement: Attitudes and Behavior in Britain’, Political Studies, vol.51, 443-468.

⁴⁸⁶ See, for instance, P. Whiteley (2012) ‘Does Citizenship Education Work? Evidence form a decade of citizenship education in secondary schools in England’, Parliamentary Affairs, vol.67(3), 513-535.

5. It is also important to consider what actions political institutions can develop to engage the public. In the next few bullet points I do a summary of what my research has found in relation to the development of public engagement by parliaments.
6. Before we consider these actions, it is useful to take stock of the characteristics of a legislature as an institution and reflect on how this affects public engagement. Parliaments have never been popular and never will; they are institutions destined to be unloved. Besides generic phenomena (such as how people view politics in itself), three key characteristics of the institution explain this⁴⁸⁸: the fact that parliaments are highly visible, collective institutions and accountable. In short, visibility breeds vulnerability; this is particularly so when this visibility enhances the sense of distance between the individual and the institution. As collective institutions, legislatures do not have a clear lead, unique identity, personified in a leading figure (as governments do with a Prime-Minister, for instance); legislatures are constituted by collectives of different groups and actors, who lead different, and often opposing, agendas. Besides this, parliaments' accountable nature means that each and every one of us thinks we have a stake in it and that it should be meeting our own needs and preferences; this means that for every single decision taken in parliament, someone somewhere will be unhappy with this decision.
7. Recognising that legislatures are destined to be unloved is no excuse to hinder the development of public engagement, on the contrary. It is simply about identifying key characteristics of the institution and bearing these in mind when developing specific initiatives to foster political engagement. For instance, breaching the distance of the institution by bringing individuals to the building, or taking parliamentarians to individuals, is a way of demystifying stereotypical assumptions forged in the public discourse through its visibility; it's a way of developing personal/individual imageries of the institution rather than letting the public discourse shape individuals' perceptions. Likewise, a focus on key leading figures such as the Lord Speaker, Speaker or Presiding Officers, helps to personalise the institution, giving it a more identifiable voice⁴⁸⁹.
8. Ever since they have existed, legislatures have played some form of public engagement/education role. But this has only become an actual major activity for legislatures since the turn of the 21st century. This is particularly clear in the UK (though also visible elsewhere). Its devolved legislatures have pioneered some of the most innovative forms of parliamentary public engagement and, particularly since 2005, the ⁴⁸⁷ See, for instance, the Audits of Political Engagement series of Hansard Society (all accessible from <https://www.hansardsociety.org.uk/research/audit-of-political-engagement>).

⁴⁸⁸ C. Leston-Bandeira (2014) 'The Pursuit of Legitimacy as a Key Driver for Public engagement: the European Parliament case', Parliamentary Affairs, vol. 67(2), 2014, pp. 437-457;

⁴⁸⁹ C. Leston-Bandeira (2016), 'Why Symbolic Representation Frames Parliamentary Public Engagement', British Journal of Politics and International Relations, vol. 18, 2, 2016, pp. 498-516; D. Judge and C. Leston-Bandeira (2017) 'The Institutional Representation of Parliament', Political Studies – forthcoming.

Houses of Parliament has also developed impressive public engagement initiatives. As with everything, far more could still be done however. Effective parliamentary public engagement should enable some form of connection from the public to the institution, it should also, where possible, be integrated into parliamentary business rather than being seen solely as a parallel activity.

9. Parliamentary public engagement encompasses a number of different activities: information services (which would include from information on a website to visiting services), education services (both linked with the schools/education system, and for a wider public, separately to the education system), and involvement in parliamentary business. Whilst the first two areas have seen considerable development, the latter – integrating the public into parliamentary business – has seen the least development.
10. Three key factors help to promote effective engagement: it needs to be issue based (rather than procedural), relevant to those potentially engaging and include a form of feedback from the institution.
11. People engage mainly through issues, not because they've woken up in the morning with a burning desire to participate in politics. Focusing only on the value of politics and the duty of being involved in politics risks to miss out on a large proportion of the population who would never be interested in being involved in politics – even if they may vote. They expect others, those they voted for, to do the politics. However, if the political matter is presented as an issue of great importance to them, then they are likely to become involved simply because they have a very strong interest for that issue. This has been clear in the interviews I have developed with petitioners.⁴⁹⁰
12. Linked to this, citizens are more likely to get involved, and feel that their input is of value, if the initiative is somehow relevant to them. This was clear in the research I developed with Dr Thompson (University of Surrey) on the Public Reading of the Children and Families Act, where participants overwhelmingly participated because the bill would affect them very directly⁴⁹¹. Likewise with petitioners, they are more inclined to sign a petition or to become involved in its campaign, if it is of direct relevance to them. Demonstrating the relevance of parliament to the public is therefore an important part of parliamentary public engagement.
13. Finally, feedback from the institution is key, due to the abstract nature of the institution and the fact that the vast majority of the people have not been in contact with it. This feedback can be as simple a parliamentary official acknowledging the contributions of a group of 16 year olds in a general outreach session. It can also mean simply being listened to; it can also mean an explanation of how an individual's input has been received. For instance, my research with petitioners has shown that one of the main benefits of the new e-petitions system in the House of Commons has been the actual contact with the Committee's team. Likewise, those individuals who do become involved in a public engagement initiative, but then never hear back from the institution feel a double sense

⁴⁹⁰ Leston-Bandeira, C. with Spaiser, V. (2017) An Evaluation of the UK Parliament's e-Petitions System - Final Report, July 2017.

⁴⁹¹ C. Leston-Bandeira, L. Thompson and W. Mace (2016), Letting the Public in on the Act, report, project funded by British Academy/Leverhulme Trust (Ref: SG141934), Online at: https://www.researchgate.net/publication/318109261_Letting_the_Public_in_on_the_Act of disappointment, that they have wasted their time. Developing public engagement with no outlets for feedback can often result in strengthened disaffection to the point that not doing anything may have been better. This explains why the integration of parliamentarians into public engagement is very important; individuals need to feel there is a real purpose in getting involved.

14. Political engagement can and should be promoted by formal institutions; this can be done at local level, devolved and/or central. One solution and one perspective are seldom sufficient. Political engagement needs to be flexible to fit a range of contexts and purposes. It should definitely be promoted through education, but it should also be part of routine parliamentary business. Examples of excellent practice in political engagement at local level can be found, for example, through the recent Kirklees Council Democracy Commission,⁴⁹² and at devolved level through the work the Welsh Assembly has been developing with Committees.
15. Overall, political engagement that works is: specific, issue-led, relevant, integrating contact and feedback with formal institutions, with a specific purpose, integrated with politics/politicians, flexible to suit different audiences, taking place in a range of places rather than at the main institution and integrating active learning techniques.

8 September 2017

⁴⁹² See <http://www.democracycommission.org.uk/>

Let Us Learn! Just for Kids Law – written evidence (CCE0141)

Let Us Learn is a group of over 850 young migrants, aged 16 to 24 years old, supported by the charity Just for Kids Law. All of us were brought to the UK as children, from over 70 different countries. We have grown up here and are proud to call Britain our home. Despite this and despite the fact that many of us cannot remember our country of birth, we are not legally recognised as citizens of the UK. Most of us have to go through a 10-year process of applying for and repeatedly renewing our immigration status, costing many thousands of pounds, before we are entitled to apply for British citizenship. Throughout the 10 years that this process takes, our continued status in the UK is precarious and expensive to maintain. Until we get to the point of being granted full citizenship, we live in fear that our temporary status (leave to remain) may be taken away from us.

Let Us Learn was launched in 2014, in response to a policy change which meant many of us were no longer eligible for student loans, and so could not take up hard won university places. Since then, our 'Young, Gifted and Blocked' campaign has had considerable success in winning increased student funding for migrants. See video here:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BumdwKTbyZQ>

Summary:

This paper is based on the responses of 20 members of our campaign leadership team. We also interviewed a selection of the 850 young migrants who have contacted us since we were formed in 2014 to canvass their opinions and personal experiences. A summary of the main points are as follows:

- There are many children and young people like us who have grown up in the UK, but who are not recognised as British citizens. It would benefit us and our communities, and improve social cohesion generally, if the process by which we obtain citizenship were less onerous and uncertain;
- Citizenship ceremonies are an insult to people like us who have lived here virtually all our lives, are steeped in British culture, and know no other home;
- Those without full citizenship should not be disadvantaged. We are already treated differently than our friends and peers who we have grown up with;
- Schools should have responsibility for teaching students about citizenship and immigration, so that children like us are informed of how our lives may be affected by government policy and can take steps to resolve our situations as early as possible;

- Our community does not feel “left behind” it feels forcibly held back by government policies and a Home Office, which charges prohibitively high fees for our immigration applications and renewals (which have to be made every 30 months), and regularly inflicts long and explained delays of a year before making decisions.

Response:

Question 1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

To us, citizenship is made to be a complicated concept. In some ways, legal citizenship is our Holy Grail. It would mean an end to the uncertainty and fear with which we live constantly. It would mean that our families would no longer have to save all of our money to pay for the next Home Office application, every two and a half years. It would mean we would no longer have to take a year out of our lives every two and a half years, as we wait for the Home Office to process our case and reconfirm our temporary ‘lawful’ status.

“I had to send away to the Home Office all my stuff which proves who I am or what I’ve done. All my certificates. Everything that I’ve had my whole life, I don’t have it now. So, there’s not much I can do, other than sit at home.”

Young man age 20 who was brought to the UK age 3. He has been waiting over a year for a decision on his application to the Home Office.

It would mean we could live and travel freely, knowing we could always return to our home. Our friends and peers, who we have grown up with since primary school have citizenship and they have none of these fears. The physical possession of a British passport would be confirmation that we have been accepted and are a part of the UK. We would then also be able to engage in civic life, without any barriers.

Yet the process of acquiring legal citizenship, for most of us still many years away, is so long and painful that the ‘Holy Grail’, may in the end be tainted. Many of us doubt that we will ever even get there, because it feels as if we are being made to jump through an ever increasing number of hoops, such as rising fees and reduced timescales in which to make our applications. How will we feel about this country, our home, when the government finally bestows upon us legal citizenship? Will we be thankful? Will we be able to forget the damage that has been done to us?

“I don’t understand. Why doesn’t this country want me?”

Let Us Learn member who has brought to the UK when she was 2 years old but was repeatedly refused ‘lawful’ status before being granted temporary leave to remain when she was 20 years old.

Citizenship is a complicated concept for us. If it were easier for us to obtain, we would feel differently.

Question 2: Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

We are proud of who we are and of the contributions we make to society. Although this is our home, it is sometimes hard to feel pride in being British, and instead feel alienated from aspects of wider society because we are not allowed to be British. Our path to citizenship is so long and our characters apparently held in so much doubt by the Home Office that, should we ever even make it that far and become British citizens, the end goal will now have been tainted. Allow us to become citizens more readily, and this would be different.

“Am I supposed to be happy that they have given it to me now, after all these years? What was I before? I’ve lived here since I was a baby”

Let Us Learn campaigner, age 20

We do not feel that citizenship ceremonies would strengthen our connection with this country or make us better ‘citizens’. For most of us, if we are ever allowed to have legal citizenship, it would be an insult to make us attend a citizenship ceremony. We already feel that this is our home. Why would we want to celebrate when this is finally recognised by the state, after a long period when we have been made to feel unwanted and unwelcome?

Question 3: Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Citizens should not have additional formal rights, because that would disadvantage those like us who are citizens in all but name. We are not legal citizens. Despite the fact that we have lived here most of our lives, we are already treated differently from our friends and peers who have British passports. For example, if one of us were to commit, say, a driving offence, this could mean losing our ‘lawful’ status and block our eventual path to citizenship. We could be deported to a country we have no memory of. This would not happen to our friends and peers, no matter what they do.

“Even now, even after all this time, I still think someone will come one day and take my visa away and I will have to leave”

Let Us Learn campaigner, age 21.

We have to pay very large sums of money to maintain our ‘lawful’ status every two and a half years. At present this costs £1500 before legal fees (legal aid was withdrawn in 2012). If our families cannot afford to maintain this ‘lawful’ status, we lose all of our rights and could be deported. This does not happen to our peers who hold legal citizenship. Some members of Let Us Learn were abandoned as children and have grown up in unofficial fostering relationships. None of us come from wealthy backgrounds; some live in families with a number of children in the same situation, and where our parents cannot afford to maintain everyone's legal status every two and a half years. Some families have to choose which child will remain 'lawful'.

"My leave to remain is expiring but unfortunately I'm currently not working. I'm a single mum and don't really have support financially. The little I do have I've saved towards the £2300 for my renewal. I have £1500 but I don't know where else to turn. I'm so desperate at this point I've tried to get a loan but because I'm currently unemployed I don't qualify for a loan. Without my passport I cannot go to uni in September or even work"

Young woman, age 24.

Question 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

In our experience, citizenship and political participation are not spoken about enough in secondary school. Some feel that citizenship should be compulsory at GCSE and even in primary school lessons. We also believe that schools should have a responsibility to inform students about the limits to legal citizenship and of the fact that there are many young people who do not have citizenship in the UK. Most of us were not told about our immigration status by parents or guardians, or by our corporate parents. We believed what we were told: that if we studied hard at school, we would have the opportunity to pursue our professional and other ambitions. Most of us realised this was not possible only when we applied for university.

"Nobody speaks about this. Nobody tells you. People in school didn't tell me"

Young woman, age 19.

Question 9: Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

We do not feel left behind, we feel forcibly kept behind. We have done everything we can to 'integrate'. We have forgotten our original languages and lost our accent, but we are still not allowed to be equal.

"If you want my full participation let me be a citizen"

Let Us Learn campaigner, age 24.

Let Us Learn! Just for Kids Law – written evidence (CCE0141)

It is government policy to create a ‘hostile environment’ for migrants, and we are on the receiving end of that in our daily lives. During the many months when our papers are with the Home Office, our lives are on hold. Some of us have been turned down for jobs because of delays in processing renewal applications. The rhetoric of migrants coming to ‘take’ from society negatively affects us and how we feel we can contribute to this country, our home.

“If I am being told that I should be lucky to be given the opportunity to stay, I won’t feel confident in constantly putting my head above the parapet and being opinionated about things, as there is fear that I am overstepping the boundaries of my stay”

Let Us Learn campaigner, age 20.

Let Us Learn Campaigners would be happy to expand upon any of the answers contained within this document or to arrange a meeting with members. If you have any questions please do not hesitate to contact us.

8 September 2017

Link Up (UK) – written evidence (CCE0167)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 Link Up (UK) has been working in the field of cohesion, combatting prejudice, citizenship and belonging for a number of years now. During this time, we have worked closely with community groups, academics, think tanks, campaigning and engagement organisations (amongst other). And the thread that runs through this work is that of belonging.

1.2 Belonging underpins the idea of who does and who doesn't belong; in terms of people perceiving that they have more or less rights to belong (and thus receive more or less) than others, and in terms of people feeling excluded from the most popular image of what it means to be British.

1.3 Belonging, citizenship and identity are so closely linked as to be inseparable elements of this question.

1.4 To truly belong to a society, people need to have the following:

- Equal access to training/ employment opportunities
- Equal access to facilities – housing/ education/ health
- An opportunity to feel that they have a voice in decision making
- An acceptance of their stake and belonging in society.

1.5 British society in the 21st century looks vastly different from British society in the past – or that is the common perception. However, diverse communities have always been a part of Britain, and their impact and influence can be seen in all aspects of British life – whether in terms of culture, society, economy, traditions or infrastructure. Much of what is deemed to be quintessentially British has been shaped by the contributions of diverse communities, but this is not the common perception.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 Pride in being and in becoming British is no bad thing as long as it is done alongside an understanding that citizenship and belonging is not just a one way process.

2.2 Most efforts look at how to encourage diverse communities to fit in, to help them feel a sense of belonging and Britishness. This is an important part of the process, but similar efforts also need to be put on the wider communities to not just accept, but to value and welcome these communities, and to see them as equal parts of society. It is not enough just to tolerate diversity.

2.3 In order for this to happen, the public need to buy into the idea of a vision for society that reflects Britain as it is today. To bring an understanding about what Britishness is today, that it includes people from very diverse faith, ethnicity, social and other backgrounds.

2.4 Our political system does not make this an easy idea, and in fact can be seen to directly obstruct this approach. Political parties are playing for the same audiences – the so called middle ground. They rely on votes from their core supporters and can be seen frequently creating policies and statements that will appeal to this audience. In many cases this means not standing up strongly for diversity – Gordon Brown famously called for British jobs for British workers, David Cameron said that multiculturalism had failed.

2.5 This allows for continued ‘othering’ which in turn leads to discrimination, marginalisation and acts as a barrier to belonging, engagement and integration.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1 This question is beyond the remit of the charity – Link Up (UK).

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

4.1 This question is beyond the remit of the charity – Link Up (UK).

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1 The role that education can and does play in teaching and encouraging good citizenship cannot be overestimated.

5.2 Without having seen any evaluation on the current levels of teaching, it is not possible to comment on its effectiveness. The following responses are made in light of having worked in schools trialling education resources.

5.3 When Link Up (UK) was working in schools, we were asked for more materials for them to use, and as a result Link Up (UK) has created a range of materials that were created primarily for use within the Citizenship and PSHE curriculum. These cover themes such as identity, diversity, belonging, values, rights, responsibilities, and critical thinking.

5.4 There seem to be limits on the time and resources given to citizenship education. It should not be leveraged in as an ‘add on’ programme, to be shoe horned in as and when there is time. Citizenship education should be made compulsory and should cover the areas outlined in the previous paragraph in addition to political and social participation.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 This question is beyond the remit of the charity – Link Up (UK). However, from personal engagement with the NCS and from anecdotal information received from parents and teachers, I would say that when it is done well, it has an incredibly positive impact on participants – particularly when young people from different backgrounds are brought together.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1 All of the organisations listed in this question have an important role to play in encouraging civic engagement. But firstly there needs to be a clear understanding about the barriers that are preventing civic engagement.

7.2 There will be a number of reasons, and reasons that differ according to the age groups and backgrounds of those in question. But an initial list would include the following:

- Apathy – people cannot be bothered to participate, it's someone else's responsibility.
- Lack of knowledge – they don't feel they have enough information to make a decision.
- Lack of trust – politicians are not seen as honest and trustworthy, and they are seen as not having any consequences for their actions.
- Media bias/ fake stories – biased reporting and the growth of fake stories has led to a lack of trust in sources of information.
- Lack of impact – people feeling that their vote doesn't matter or count.
- Lack of representation – voters not seeing themselves or their views represented by decision makers.

7.3 Only once the barriers have been identified and accepted, can efforts truly be made to overcome them and encourage and increase civic engagement.

7.4 From this initial list, it is clear that whilst some of the barriers can be overcome through education and third sector organisations, many areas that need to be addressed are more endemic and can only be tackled by government, political parties and the media.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

8.1 Link Up (UK) have been looking at the question of values for a number of years, and have talked to many groups and individuals to hear what they think are British values. Unsurprisingly, you get very different answers depending on who you ask, although there are many threads and common strands that run through their responses.

8.2 Whilst it is interesting to try to define British values, there needs to be an understanding that values change over time and what we might agree on now may not be as appropriate in 10 or 20 years' time.

8.3 This is also an area that would benefit from a vision that the public can get behind. The current values that are promoted through schools are solid ideas, but they do not speak to people. They are not powerful and positive enough for people to engage with or have a sense of pride in. There is a clear statement of what France or America (for example) stand for – but this needs to be reflected in all aspects of public life.

8.4 At Link Up (UK) we are developing education materials that talk about British values, but also responsibilities and entitlements and rights.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

9.1 Many communities feel 'left behind' because they still encounter discrimination when it comes to accessing the same opportunities as those not from BAME communities.

9.2 Many communities feel 'left behind' because they feel that they do not have the same rights that their families used to have – and that these rights have been taken by 'newer' communities.

9.3 Many communities feel 'left behind' because they cannot see a way out of their current circumstances, that they do not have the same chances as others.

9.4 Many communities feel 'left behind' because they feel that they have no access to decision making and decision makers.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

10.1 Citizenship, civic engagement, social cohesion and integration are all parts of the same question – each element intrinsically linked with the other.

10.2 Diversity in schools is incredibly important – we fear what we do not know, and if we only learn with/ socialise with one group in society – we will continue to see people as the ‘other’ and to fear them.

10.3 There are a number of factors that limit diverse communities within schools, including:

- Faith Schools – increasing number of faith schools mean there are less opportunities for young people to interact with ‘others’ – therefore there is an increased impetus to find ways to foster interaction across different groups.
- Physical location - schools in more rural areas and in areas with a heavy concentration of one community will also have more limited diversity. Therefore programmes like the NCS – which offers opportunities to meet and engage with people from different backgrounds – are incredibly invaluable.

10.4 Diversity in the workplace is equally important. There are natural limitations – i.e. physical location which can impact on the makeup of the workforce, but also social and discriminatory limitations, which can and need to be addressed.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

11.1 Most people would accept that speaking the language is invaluable, without it access to social, employment and cultural engagement is severely limited. Therefore encouraging migrants to learn English can only be beneficial.

11.2 But it is important to encourage, as learning a language is not easy. The best way to learn a language is to meet people and have to speak that language. Therefore could an approach be considered whereby learning English is combined with social interaction, for example by pairing people with volunteers, who mentor them and support them in their learning and understanding of British culture and society?

11.3 There are going to be some people for whom learning English is not encouraged or even seen as necessary. They are happy or their families are happy for them to stay within their communities. This will necessitate a different approach.

11.4 With regard to the citizenship test, some of the questions seem to be a rather random selection of British knowledge. And I would question if they actually equip participants with what they need to become active citizens. Learning answers by rote does not give people a deep enough understanding of the stories behind the facts, which is just as important as knowing the right answer.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

12.1 Link Up (UK) are developing a number of initiatives that employ positive role models as a way of overcoming the idea that diversity is a recent and negative phenomenon. The use of role models and information employs two of the accepted approaches in how to change attitudes (societal, behavioural and cognitive).

12.2 One of Link Up (UK)s initiatives - The Family Tree - encourages participants to share stories of local role models from both the past and present. The use of local heroes allows us to engage with audiences that would not otherwise take part in programmes that promote the benefits of diversity.

12.3 This builds on the concept of the 'Mo Farah effect', in that we celebrate those people and products and behaviours that we feel benefit us. We then accept them as part of British culture and they are no longer seen as the other.

12.4 These programmes can have a positive impact on both diverse communities – who are given a sense of belonging – and those who are worried about the impact of diversity – who are shown the positive impact of diversity and how long it has been a part of British society.

12.5 This message needs to be promoted more widely and regularly in order to combat the wealth of negative stories about diversity that are prominently identified and displayed by certain elements of the media.

12.6 This approach is just one element in the mix of approaches that need to be taken to overcome divisions in society and to encourage and foster positive citizenship. There are many organisations, large and small, that are doing excellent work in the fields of cohesion, citizenship and integration. Working with different approaches, audiences and methodologies there is a wealth of work, research and learning that can be brought together and shared in order to work more effectively and to make more impact.

12.7 To harness this impact, Link Up (UK) - in conjunction with a number of organisations and academics – is working to create a Cohesion Network. The Cohesion Network would bring together community groups, charities, academics and practitioners with the following aims:

- To facilitate knowledge sharing.
- To identify and create research methodologies to enable effective evaluation.
- To recognise opportunities for resource/ programme sharing.
- To support new project development and trialling.
- To demonstrate to funders and decision makers a coherent approach.

8 September 2017

Ross Lloyd – written evidence (CCE0228)

My submission comes from the personal experience of disengagement from politics amongst many of the people I came into contact with as a resident in towns and cities across South Lancashire, Greater Manchester and North Wales. I know or have met people with as wide a range of political hues as is possible but everywhere, without exception, there are swathes of people who have opted out. I commonly hear expressions such as "I don't understand what they do and they don't act in my interests anyway" or "I'm voting for X because X will win anyway and I might as well vote for the winner" or "I'm not voting at all because it makes no difference".

Arguments for fptp, local representation, is given the lie in two ways obvious to me at least.

1. The claim that the winning party represents a majority is in almost every case incorrect. Those not choosing the winner may be divided but they are by far the majority and are thus unrepresented. This is becoming more evident as politics appears to be polarising away from the centre ground.

2. MPs are often parachuted into safe seats, selected by a small coterie of local party members and activists. They may have views miles away from the majority of the constituency but this is not material. The duly selected member is then safe in the sense that they can't be dismissed except on very narrow criteria, performance not being among them. Some 60% or more conservative members are neither from their constituency and not resident in any meaningful way there. The same is apparently true for the Labour party although on a smaller scale. This is not legitimate representation, although it clearly serves the status quo.

There is a disconnect between people's daily lives and the actions of those in Parliament, in either house. Far from working together, current and increasing levels of inequality divide communities, and this has been brought into sharp relief by brexit and by the wars in Syria, Iraq and Afghanistan. The recent attacks arose from alienation, dispossession and lack of representation. It's a bit difficult to feel part of a community when you depend on it to feed you via charitable giving, even though you may well have one or even more minimally paid jobs. This employment leads to a feeling of helplessness and worthlessness because so many jobs are unimaginative, lead to no betterment of their lives and provide no sense of contributing to something bigger than themselves. People in this context are ripe for further exploitation and recruitment by those who offer a false sense of belonging through corrupted interpretations of religious texts.

Ceremony may have its place for some people but citizenship is not innate, it has to be learned. How can a young person choose a local councillor or a national representative except on the basis of what is taught either at school, which is minimal to nothing or at home which as easily also be nothing?

The middle classes may well say we talk to our children; many do, and a substantial number don't. Even where political conversations take place, how many families are "staunch" whatever and simply pass this down. That isn't education or preparation for responsibility but indoctrination and potentially the transmission of prejudice. What about the many millions of families where the parents simply don't have the ability or interest to discuss how they're governed? Awarding the right to vote does not confer the ability to choose what is in their best interests and simply makes them vulnerable to extremely biased press and political snake oil salesmen.

I have tried to find evidence of teaching civic responsibility in schools and have found precious little. I believe there is a new short course in Wales with elements of political education but none, as far as I know, in the rest of the UK. It would bear examination. It seems pointless, to me, to lower the age of enfranchisement without outlining at least the basics of what makes a Conservative, Labour or LibDem etc. party member and how local and national policy is formulated. There are lots of models all over the world for this.

Pupils ought to be able identify how laws are created, how scrutinisation and voting occurs, how amendments are tabled and how the parliamentary version of debate takes place and how and why it differs from other forms of debate. They ought to know what mps do when they are not in parliament and ought to be introduced to their local member as a matter of course.

Local politicians where I live are often re-elected unopposed because there's little confidence in local politicians to be able effect change and improve to their lives so no-one stands. The council appears to be supervising cuts imposed by parliament at present and the talk is of more to come. At the same time there are some pretty fancy claims for expenses that seem hard to justify given the current constraints

In my constituency, the local/parish/community councillors are almost never elected. There seems to be a system for co-opting friends, relatives or acquaintances. No one has any idea of what is done because meetings are carried out in Welsh, a language not everyone understands, and requests for minutes in English are met with blank refusals. So much then, for local democracy. Is it any wonder people disengage?

I believe our country is at a crossroads, as indeed, is much of the western world. Since 2007/8 western economies have dithered on the edge of catastrophe but, at the same time, personal fortunes have grown among the privileged.

David Cameron claimed that we were all in it together but I have difficulty in understanding what he meant by this. There appears to be a ruling elite directing the flow of money and resources ever upwards. That they pay no or little tax is a matter of record and this situation is apparently accepted by parliament, at least, little to nothing has been done to redress the situation. These people appear to be above parliamentary rule. They either ignore parliament or use it to further their ends, taking more and more of whatever productivity the country is able to manage and giving nothing back.

At the other end there are people who do not get by. The current government appears obsessed by the desire to end social care for their fellow citizens and fling vulnerable people into the laissez faire capitalist free market they themselves do very well from. The trouble is that not everyone has the advantages that the relatively well to do have. They didn't attend private schools or have crammers to get them into Oxbridge and the higher end of professional life.

Instead they are pushed into relying on zhc and gig work, contribute little in national insurance, although their precarious existence makes them more vulnerable to ill-health. The new exploitation of pretend self-employment simply means the employer doesn't pay the employers contribution to national insurance. This wheeze simply means the NHS and will grind more quickly to a halt and pensions will shrink, which is a political choice and not what very many voters expected to be done in their name. The false claim, that the NHS receives more than ever funding, hides the fact that much of the money is now trousered by very rich shareholders, something else that many voters are not aware is being done in their name.

None of what I write can be news but I write in the hope that something might start to move in what appears to be the moribund corridors of Parliament. If nothing is done to reset the system it risks imploding with civil unrest and suffering the likely outcome. Your committee might want to consider finding ways to act rather than remaining the Popular Front or the People's Front.

Lloyd Banks Foundation for England and Wales – written evidence (CCE0130)

1.0 Introduction

- 1.1 Lloyds Bank Foundation for England & Wales is one of the leading community grant makers. An independent registered charity funded by the profits of Lloyds Banking Group, the Foundation invests in charities supporting people to break out of disadvantage at critical points in their lives, and promotes approaches to lasting change. In 2016 the Foundation awarded total funding of £12.7m, directly supporting 1,231 small and medium-sized charities. This equates to supporting 99,967 individuals facing multiple disadvantage.
- 1.2 Having supported small charities in every region of England and Wales for more than 30 years, the Foundation is built upon the knowledge and experience of locally based charities, with locally based Grant Managers visiting applicants and grantees and providing an avenue for identifying patterns and issues faced by the sector. The Foundation also conducts and commissions research specifically focused on the experiences and concerns of small and local charities, particularly those with an income between £25,000 and £1m. This submission to the call for evidence draws on information provided to the Foundation by its grant holders through monitoring reports and feedback as well as research undertaken and commissioned by the Foundation. In itself, this highlights the important role that Foundations can play in building relationships with small and local charities, understanding new challenges and solutions as they develop and as sources of learning for best practice.
- 1.3 This response is centred on charities which are embedded in their local communities and were developed in response to an unmet need. They typically have an unprecedented ability to reach and engage individuals and communities due to their trusted nature in the locality.⁴⁹³ The role of these charities is of growing significance in a society whose divisions have been accentuated by Brexit – their trusted nature has never been more important for reaching people that other agencies have failed to engage and in developing responses to local needs that grow from the bottom-up. This submission focuses on those questions which are significant for such small and local charities supporting individuals facing multiple disadvantage.

2.0 Engagement

Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

- 2.1 There has been much debate of late about the far-reaching ‘cooling’ effect of the Lobbying Act and the ‘anti-advocacy’ clause within government grant agreements. Actively discouraging charities from engaging in lobbying is very concerning. Small, local charities typically have a level of understanding about needs and how best to meet them which is unparalleled. For Government at every level to be able to tackle some of society's most intractable problems, it is this knowledge and understanding from small charities about where systems are failing and where solutions can be found that will help Government achieve its aims.

⁴⁹³ Too Small to Fail: How small and medium-sized charities are adapting to change and challenges, 2016, IPPR North

- 2.2 Without doubt, charities should not be partisan but they should be encouraged to engage politically on issues that affect them as charities and which affect their clients. Regulation is necessary to ensure that no one individual or organisation can exert undue influence on an election but the Lobbying Act has had a disproportionate impact on civil society campaigning. As a recent letter to the Minister for Sport & Civil Society, signed by 124 civil society organisations highlighted, we are concerned that the current legal structure has caused many organisations not to engage in the run up to the general election which resulted in some important voices being lost from public debate.⁴⁹⁴ This is particularly concerning given that the small and local charities that the Foundation funds invariably support those individuals who are most at risk and whose voices are least likely to be heard.
- 2.3 Charities and non-partisan campaign groups have spent significant time attempting to understand the legislation and how to comply. However, many of the rules are vague and confusing, especially for smaller organisations. While some organisations have sought legal advice to help them interpret the legislation, this can be expensive and is simply not an option for many. The rules on joint campaigning are also a concern for smaller charities, and have made organisations more hesitant to collaborate.
- 2.4 A Government-commissioned review of Part II of the Lobbying Act, conducted by Lord Hodgson of Astley Abbotts, found that it fails to get the balance right and proposed several changes to the legislation. The House of Lords Select Committee on Charities described his recommendations as "eminently sensible" and called on the Government to implement them "in full". Thus far there has been no indication that the recommendations will be implemented despite them being desperately needed. Enabling these charities to take part in important debates is a key determinant in engaging more voices in politics.

3.0 Volunteering

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizenship Service do a good job in creating active citizens?

- 3.1 Volunteering is an important part of civic life and is the lifeblood of many small and local charities. Amongst the charities funded by the Foundation, there is an average of 13 volunteers for every member of staff. The benefits of this volunteering are two-fold: for the charity it means they can operate at a lower cost and for the individual it can bring a wealth of advantages from building confidence, work skills, social networks and engagement with communities. Volunteering is an essential route for creating active citizens but to maximise its value, a number of barriers need to be overcome.

⁴⁹⁴ Charities call on new minister to revise 'burdensome' Lobbying Act, 30 August 2017, Civil Society

- 3.2 Evidence collected through the Foundation's grant monitoring reports indicates that charities are finding it increasingly difficult to recruit and retain volunteers. In large part this is attributed to changes in welfare reform, whereby benefits are dependent on spending all time actively searching for paid employment, no matter how far an individual may be from the job market. This approach threatens to further disengage people from active citizenship at a time when volunteering could nurture their abilities and engage them on the long path towards meaningful employment.
- 3.3 Volunteering offers many opportunities to engage active citizens, and this is particularly the case where volunteers are able to use their skills to support local charities. The Foundation facilitates such skill based volunteering through its Charity Mentoring scheme, matching members of staff from Lloyds Banking Group to mentor charities funded through the Foundation. Sharing their skills has shown to be of significant value to both mentor and mentee and is increasingly leading to enduring relationships between the bank employee and the charity such as through becoming a long term volunteer or joining the trustee board. Actively supporting more meaningful skills-based volunteering offers many opportunities for engaging active citizens but it must be remembered that such activity does not without a cost. Effective skills-based volunteering linking up corporates and charities needs effective brokerage for it to be successful, as has been demonstrated through the Foundation's mentoring brokerage system with Lloyds Banking Group.
- 3.4 Investment in volunteering is important but it is also important that it is proportionate and targeted. At a time when charities are overstretched, the role of volunteers is arguably more important than ever but this is set amid a context where support is needed across a range of areas. National Citizenship Service has seen significant investment at the expense of other support for charities aside from attempts to develop the social impact bond market. This has been particularly problematic because of the top-down, contracted nature of the scheme rather than investment routed through smaller, local charities that can respond to specific local needs.
- 3.5 We know that small charities in particular are struggling in a way that cannot be overcome by concentration purely on National Citizenship Service and social investment. In 2015 the Foundation published research which showed that 89% of charities are experiencing a change in demand which is largely in terms of rising and more complex needs.⁴⁹⁵ Since then, there has been growing evidence of the increase in demand experienced by small charities and the increasingly complex nature of this demand coupled by increasing difficulty in accessing funding. Given that these charities are central to engaging and developing active citizens, it is vital that investment is directed towards supporting the sustainability of small and local charities more widely. This is particularly the case given the rising complexity of needs which typically require professional support. As our Facing Forward⁴⁹⁶ publication highlighted, investing in local infrastructure is an important way to support the sustainability of the sector more widely.

⁴⁹⁵ Expert Yet Undervalued and on the Frontline, 2015, Lloyds Bank Foundation for England & Wales

4.0 Engagement

Why do so many communities feel “left behind”?

- 4.1 Research shows that there are many disparities between areas across the country which can see individuals, communities, local areas and regions ‘left behind’. In these areas, individual challenges are compounded by structural problems. As the below illustrates, more deprived areas tend to have more community needs which require more statutory services, yet they have fewer charities to meet needs and less local income potential. Increased pressure on local authority spending and moves towards less redistribution of funds to encourage local authorities to generate more income for themselves is set to compound the differences between areas further still. With some areas subsequently trailing further behind, it will become increasingly difficult for individuals and communities in those areas to be ‘active citizens’.

- 4.2 One of the starkest examples of the impact of structural disadvantage on individual multiple disadvantage is visible through Lankelly Chase’s report, Hard Edges, which examines the nature, extent and distribution of people facing multiple disadvantage. The evidence shows that the highest incidences of multiple disadvantage occur in areas that have seen significant economic decline, such as former seaside towns and old industrial areas.⁴⁹⁷ Taken alongside the fact that the voices of the most disadvantaged are least likely to be heard, it is clear that some individuals and communities are driven further from engagement. The former Chief Executive of Birmingham City Council articulated this tendency in an article for the Guardian, describing how the services which are cut first tend to be those that affect the most vulnerable because they are the least likely to raise their voices and publicly oppose the cuts.⁴⁹⁸ These levels of disadvantage inevitably lead to some areas and communities being further left behind.

⁴⁹⁶ Facing Forward, 2017, Lloyds Bank Foundation for England & Wales

⁴⁹⁷ Hard Edges: Mapping Severe and Multiple Disadvantage in England, 2015, Lankelly Chase

4.3 How might these barriers be overcome?

Small charities often work with the most at risk individuals and communities in society. As discussed above, they can do this because they are trusted in those communities, having grown out of a local need and being embedded in the community. If these individuals and communities are to be engaged as active citizens, it cannot be done without nurturing and supporting small charities. Funding is inevitably an important aspect of this. Research conducted for the Foundation by NCVO shows that statutory funding has been increasingly directed towards the largest organisations, to the detriment of small, local charities.⁴⁹⁹ Yet raising the voices of small and local charities so that they can be part of decision making is equally important. Engaging people who feel ‘left behind’ has to start with understanding the challenges they face and support they need, and small and local charities are the gateway for enabling this to happen. Foundations are well placed to support and facilitate this, given the strong relationships they hold with charities across the country and the information they gather about needs and interventions.

This evidence was prepared by Caroline Howe, Policy and National Programmes Manager on behalf of Lloyds Bank Foundation for England & Wales.

8 September 2017

⁴⁹⁸ Birmingham Council Chief: Years of cuts could have catastrophic consequences, 12 December 2016, Guardian

⁴⁹⁹ Navigating Change: Analysis of Financial Trends for Small and Medium-Sized Charities, 2016, NCVO

Local Trust – written evidence (CCE0139)

Summary

1. In response to the Committee's call for evidence, we present research and learning from the Big Local programme. Big Local is a 15 year Big Lottery endowment to support community development and civic engagement. It is administered by Local Trust. The programme is offered as an example of an alternative to many other programmes that look to encourage active citizenship and civic engagement. We feel it is especially pertinent to the Committee's questions 6, 7 and 9.
2. In response to Q6: Big Local's key features are that it is: place-based, resident-led, non-prescriptive, and over a significant period of time. Evidence of the impact of Big Local on active citizenship is starting to emerge: 150 partnerships have been formed, each with a minimum of eight members (although most have more); residents feel more in control, there are some health benefits, and the longer timescale is helpful. That is not to say that Big Local has been easy or straightforward. Challenges include: it can take time to establish new structures from scratch; the £1 million awarded can bring conflict as well as releasing potential; and it can be difficult to sustain engagement over time.
3. In response to Q7: Communities can be strengthened if the individuals within them are upskilled. This is particularly pertinent because Big Local areas have lower than the national average educational attainment. Third sector organisations have also been engaged. For example, Big Local areas often have a close relationship with at least one local third sector organisation who acts as a 'Locally Trusted Organisation'. Finally, there are many positive examples of councillors and local authority offices working closely with Big Local areas to help with projects.
4. In response to Q9: The 150 Big Local areas were selected – in part – because they were communities 'left behind' in the sense of not having benefited as much as other areas from Lottery and other grant funding. In some areas, a focus of Big Local partnerships has been around establishing or re-establishing links with the wider communities they live in, through bringing in services or addressing issues around transport and access to employment.

5. Conclusion – An alternative model of engagement: Big Local represents a distinctive and radical approach to tackling many of the issues being focused on by the committee. It shifts the centre of gravity away from grant makers and funders towards communities – they are best placed to identify local need. They will make mistakes as well as having successes, the point is there is a sense of ownership over the process, and time to build on learning. Big Local is still at an early stage in its development, with nearly a decade left to run. But Big Local is likely to represent an important source of evidence and learning over the next five to ten years.

Introduction

6. In response to the Committee's call for evidence, we present research and learning from the Big Local programme. Big Local is a 15-year Big Lottery endowment to support community development and civic engagement across 150 neighbourhoods in England. It is administered by Local Trust. Although Big Local is only a third of the way through its planned delivery programme, there are already important lessons about how to engage citizens and communities. The programme is offered as an example of an alternative to many other programmes that look to encourage active citizenship and civic engagement. We feel it is especially pertinent to the Committee's questions 6, 7 and 9. We have therefore structured the response around those questions, with examples (case studies of Big Local areas) in the appendix, which also relate to the Select Committee's question 12, as examples of citizenship.
7. In Big Local, 150 communities were each awarded £1 million to spend over a 10-15 year period. Big Local areas, typically neighbourhoods of 1500-4500 homes, were selected by the Big Lottery Fund in 2010-12 on the basis that they had historically 'missed out' on their fair share of Lottery and other funding. Often (but not always) this was because they were communities with relatively low levels of civic engagement and, as a consequence, may have lacked a critical mass of active and engaged citizens and community-based organisations competing for grant funding from Lottery and other sources.
8. Communities are expected to set their own priorities and output targets, and to organise themselves in ways that are appropriate to their area. The desired outcomes of the overall programme are therefore broad – that:
 - Communities will be better able to identify local needs and take action in response to them.

Local Trust – written evidence (CCE0139)

- People will have increased skills and confidence, so that they continue to identify and respond to needs in the future.
- The community will make a difference to the needs it prioritises.
- People will feel that their area is an even better place to live.

Response to committee question 6

The Big Local model of citizen engagement and how it differs

9. Big Local builds on learning from previous regeneration and community development programmes, providing an alternative model for creating active citizens. In contrast to short-term, prescriptive programmes, where relatively small numbers of citizens would have to complete a set range of activities in a short space of time, there is much greater scope for a wider range of citizens and communities to get involved over a longer period of time. Its key features are that it is:
- Placed based: Big Local invests in communities as opposed to projects or organisations. This provides a basis for community engagement across a range of activities and over a significant period of time – citizens have multiple opportunities to get involved and can engage on issues in their areas that are important to them;
 - Resident-led and non-prescriptive: Residents make decisions about how the money is spent. There are very few restrictions on what this might be and there is genuine choice, as opposed to choosing from a set of pre-devised options or themes set in advance by funders.
 - Over a significant period of time: With each area having at least ten years to spend the money, there is time for networks to develop, involved residents to grow in confidence and skills, mistakes to be made and learnt from, and as well as the opportunity to create lasting change. As the Third Sector Research Centre note: ‘...Big Local is in stark contrast with previous neighbourhood change and regeneration programmes in that areas are not driven by top down targets, annual spend and externally imposed goals and outcomes (see for example New Deal for Communities... and the Single Regeneration Budget)’⁵⁰⁰;

How citizens get involved in Big Local

⁵⁰⁰ McCabe, A., Wilson, M. and Macmillan, R. with Morgans, P. and Edwards, M. (2017) Big Local: Beyond the Early Years – Our Bigger Story: The Longitudinal Multi Media Evaluation of Big Local 2015 – 2016. Online at: <http://ourbiggerstory.com/OBS-2015-16-Final-Full-Report.pdf> . p. 86.

10. Although £1 million spread over 10-15 years does not amount to a huge amount of additional resource when compared to statutory and other funding going into many communities, it is a large enough sum to provide a strong focus for engagement, decision making and participation. So far, there have been different levels of involvement of citizens in Big Local both between and within Big Local areas. These range from more intensive participation to more light touch involvement, including:

- Partnership members: The most involved and active citizens who come together to plan Big Local activities, oversee expenditure, provide oversight of Big Local in the area and vote on major decisions. With support, and over time, we have seen Big Local grow and develop significant numbers of new, community based change makers, capable of making things happen in their area.
- Additional volunteers: These are volunteers who are not members of the partnership, but nevertheless invest a lot of time in Big Local, for example organising groups or events. The non-prescriptive nature of Big Local has often enabled local people to identify and self-fund activities that might never otherwise have gained visibility, releasing ‘below the radar’ talents and skills amongst local residents and encouraging local initiative.

Direct beneficiaries/participants: There are a broad range of people more lightly engaged with the programme, such as those who have engaged in a consultation about Big Local priorities. The non-prescriptive nature of the programme has meant that Big Local areas have been able to develop approaches to engagement and participation that are relevant to their local communities. Some have adapted large scale participatory activities, such as participatory budgeting. Other involvement can be engaging in the community either:

- Directly through a Big Local activity.
- Through a group or activity supported by Big Local.
- In an activity that had no direct link to Big Local, but they are helped by Big Local to do so.

One early focus of many Big Local has been on the importance of available space to facilitate community activity and engagement – which appears to be a key factor in enabling activity to take place within communities. This can be particularly important in communities where traditional places to meet and interact – whether the local pub, church or major local place of employment – no longer exist. Where areas have existing spaces, Big Local areas have typically been keen to work with rather than sideline them. A significant number of Big Local areas have invested in either establishing or improving local community hubs: ‘They tended to be seen by residents as more accessible and as a way of getting more people involved from the local community.⁵⁰¹

What's different about Big Local? – Evidence so far

11. We are still at an early stage in both the delivery and evaluation of what was designed as a 10-15 year programme. There is therefore a need for some caution in drawing significant conclusions – either positive or negative – from what has happened to date. However, a great deal of evidence is collected on the programme, both internally and from other agencies and this feeds into a comprehensive evaluation programme.⁵⁰²

12. Evidence of the impact of Big Local on active citizenship is starting to emerge:
 - 150 partnerships have been formed each with a minimum of eight members (although most have more), and all with a majority of local residents, developed a plan outlining what they propose to deliver over the next few years and leading the delivery of that vision. This is one of the few requirements of the programme, and represents some achievement in itself in some areas, especially where there may not have been a significant history of successful community engagement or involvement.
 - Residents feel more in control: Initial evaluation from the Third Sector Research Centre (TSRC) states: 'In Big Local, residents decide upon any changes that they feel need to happen, design how change will take place, and determine appropriate timeframes for affecting change.'⁵⁰³ In a survey of those involved in Big Local Partnerships; 80% of members strongly agreed or agreed that residents are leading Big Local in their area and 78% strongly agreed or agreed that Big Local is giving residents more control over what happens in their areas.⁵⁰⁴
 - Health benefits: The programme is the subject of a major independent public health study funded and conducted by the NIHR School for Public Health Research (SPHR), which suggests some evidence of measurable positive impacts of civic ⁵⁰¹ School for Public Health Research. (2016) Communities in Control Study – What are we learning? Online at: <http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Communities%20in%20control%20-%20What%20are%20we%20learning%20final.pdf> p. 2.

⁵⁰² Various evaluations and research on the programme can be found here: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/research-and-evaluation/>

⁵⁰³ McCabe et al., Big Local: Beyond the Early Years, p. 47.

⁵⁰⁴ Results from the partnership survey were published in a series of blogs: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/blogs/are-residents-leading-big-local> engagement and participation on health and well-being: ‘residents felt involvement was improving their own mental and, to some extent, physical, health by expanding their social support systems and increasing their sense of identity and self-worth, their personal power to manage their own wellbeing and their feelings of having something to look forward to.’⁵⁰⁵ However, the ongoing study also found that involvement can be challenging and stressful for those more intensely involved, such as partnership members. We look at some of the challenges facing partnership members shortly.

- The longer timescale is helpful: In surveys of partnership members 84% agreed that the Big Local programme has given them the freedom to do things to a timescale that works for them. 70% agreed that they are satisfied with the pace of their progress with Big Local. As one partnership member stated: ‘the 10-year funding gives time to achieve something lasting.’⁵⁰⁶ Our experience of the programme so far is that in areas with little previous history of community involvement or activity, or where there is not a clear pre-existing sense of collective and shared identity, it can take several years of patient support and engagement to establish the trust, skills, confidence and vision needed for local people to start to take on the responsibility for making decisions about their own neighbourhoods. The Institute for Voluntary Action Research (IVAR) outlines the importance of the timeframe in avoiding short-termism: ‘Most programmes emphasise the way in which capacity and community confidence in taking control builds over time. It also takes time to build trust – across communities and between communities and their partners. Conversely, short-term programmes, despite significant achievements, have been hampered by the need to demonstrate success over a limited period.’⁵⁰⁷

Challenges

13. That is not to say that Big Local has been easy or straightforward. Whilst some local communities have achieved amazing things in a very short time with the resources made available to them, as noted above, others have had to work hard to get themselves to the point where they are able to take on the challenge of delivering change in their areas.

⁵⁰⁵ School for Public Health Research. (2017) Does community empowerment have the potential to improve health in disadvantaged areas?. To be presented at Public health England conference (Warwick University) on 12th September 2017. For information about the study: <http://sphr.nihr.ac.uk/health-inequalities/home/>

⁵⁰⁶ Partnership survey results: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/blogs/are-residents-leading-big-local>

⁵⁰⁷ Baker, L., Hennessy, C. and Taylor, M. (2013) Big Local: What’s new and different? Online at: <https://www.ivar.org.uk/research-report/big-local-whats-new-and-different/>. p. 3.

- It can take time to establish new structures from scratch particularly in communities that have not historically had significant local infrastructure to support engagement and local participation and decision making.
- £1 million can bring conflict as well as releasing potential. Some areas initially struggled to reach agreement on priorities, or to get their plans off the ground. In other areas, those ‘sticking their head above the parapet’ to try to organise and change their communities have found themselves the subject of challenging treatment. Where a Big Local area boundary failed to reflect ‘natural’ communities, or brought together multiple areas with distinct identities and interests, considerable time was sometimes needed to overcome initial suspicion and create a shared vision. Local Trust has invested heavily in providing support for areas to overcome their difficulties and resolve local conflicts.
- Sustaining engagement is important as some of our areas reach the mid-point of their programme, some are having to work hard to maintain impetus and involvement, and consider issues around how they renew core partnership members and avoid individuals being burnt out by the expectations and commitment that can come with leading and driving forward work at a community level. In some areas, those with the time to become involved have tended to be older than the general population, as younger people with jobs and families struggle to find time to sustain involvement. However, this in itself presents challenges to sustainability as local partnership members age.

Response to committee question 7

Big Local’s focus on civic engagement

14. A big focus of early work by many Big Local areas has been around civic engagement – perhaps reflecting the extent to which Big Local areas have a history of lack of engagement and participation before the programme. As of July 2017, 134 out of 150 Big Local areas were currently spending money on explicit community engagement projects.⁵⁰⁸ For example, see appendix 31.c for a case study on St Oswald and Netherton.

15. More widely, Big Local encourages civic engagement and facilitates co-operation in three main ways:

⁵⁰⁸ Unpublished analysis of Big Local plans.

Local Trust – written evidence (CCE0139)

- The core emphasis on working with and engaging the community and placing them in the lead in defining priorities in their area and then ensuring delivery.
 - The focus of many areas on using their £1 million as leverage to generate engagement with much broader networks of organisations and institutions, including local government and third sector organisations.
 - The ability to bring local authority and civil society organisations onto Big Local partnerships (whilst retaining a resident majority on decision making bodies).
16. Communities can be strengthened if the individuals within them are upskilled – as noted in the introduction one of the outcomes of Big Local is increase the skills and confidence of residents. This is particularly pertinent because Big Local areas have lower than the national average for educational attainment. Involvement provides opportunities for boosting cultural and social capital. For an individual’s journey in Big Local, see ‘Kathryn’s Story’ in the appendix, paragraph 32.

Providing citizens with the influence and leverage

17. In some Big Local areas, the £1 million has helped change the way in which local communities and those working with them relate to shared challenges. Whilst it is a relatively small sum of money when compared to other sources of investment and expenditure in many communities, it has nevertheless changed local dynamics, enabling communities to work on solving issues together on an equal footing, as opposed to focusing on problems – helping change local citizens from the position of passive applicants for or recipients of assistance to active negotiators of change. See 31.a in the appendix for a case study of Big Local improving green and open spaces in Grassland Hassmoor. In another Big Local area, the partnership has worked with multiple local agencies and established a key role for itself in the local planning and development process, enabling the development of 40 new community-owned homes, the development of major new local sporting facilities and the launch of a community energy company, releasing over £4 million of additional resources into the local community. See 31.b in the appendix for a case study of housing developments in Lawrence Weston.
18. Where it works best, Big Local money provides local people with a long term, resourced and relevant voice capable not just of representing views but also directly delivering change that they themselves control, providing a focus and a legitimacy to the civic engagement that underpins it. Research on how Big Local areas are attracting additional resources shows that no respondents felt that the area would have received all the additional resources had there not been a Big Local partnership bringing the community together to lead change in their area. Three quarters of people felt that they would have attracted little or no resources without Big Local.⁵⁰⁹

Better engagement with local third sector organisations

19. Big Local areas often have a close relationship with at least one local third sector organisation who acts as a ‘Locally Trusted Organisation’, which takes responsibility for:

- Reducing the amount of bookkeeping and paperwork for residents
- Helping partnerships stay outward and outcome-focused, rather than focused on bureaucracy
- Employing community development and partnership support workers

20. However, more generally, Big Local has enabled local people to find ways to more effectively bring third sector organisations into their areas on their own terms – enabling them to commission the services and ideas they prioritise, rather than being delivered to in ways that limit their ability to engage with, influence and control outcomes. See appendix 31.e for a case study from Growing Together in Northampton.

The role of local councillors as support

21. Whilst early in the development of Big Local, some areas found relationships with local authorities problematic, particularly in relation to discussions around the prioritisation of funding allocation at a time when a lot of local funding was being cut, there are now many positive examples of councillors and local authority offices working closely with Big Local areas to help with projects. As one partnership member stated: ‘Having Big Local money and a structure has provided a chance to meet local councillors and bridged the gap between the council and residents.’⁵¹⁰

22. An example is in Chatham, where the Arches Big Local has worked closely to with local councillors and officials to change perceptions within the local council about the extent to which the local community can take responsibility for tackling local problems and they have now come around to the idea that residents should be leading the way. Councillors now are aware that they have a group of residents that are willing to try new ideas.⁵¹¹

⁵⁰⁹ Resources for Change and Rocket Science. (2017) Big Local – More than just the £1 million. Online at <http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Additional%20resources%20in%20Big%20Local%20-%20Summary%202017.pdf>. p. 3.

⁵¹⁰ McCabe et al., Big Local: Beyond the Early Years – Our Bigger Story, p. 75.

Response to question 9

'Left behind' communities

23. The 150 Big Local areas were selected – in part – because they were communities 'left behind' in the sense of not having benefited as much as some other areas from lottery and other grant funding. Some of the areas would also fit the description of 'left behind' used to describe certain communities since the European Referendum – post-industrial, high unemployment, low political engagement etc. However, Big Local areas are very diverse communities, who face challenges across multiple deprivation issues. These include lacking significant civic infrastructure and social capital, which may have contributed to them failing to access funding in the past.⁵¹²
24. In some areas, a focus of Big Local partnerships has been around establishing or re-establishing links with the wider communities they live in, through bringing in services or addressing issues around transport and access to employment. An example is the Wargrave Big Local in Newton-Le-Willows who have invested significantly in bringing a range of new services, and agencies into a community that has suffered from the loss of their major local employer and has traditionally lacked embedded local activity and capacity.⁵¹³

Barriers to active citizenship

25. As noted, Big Local operates in areas that often have historically low levels of civic engagement, which may in itself have led to a lack of access to grant funding in the past – there was no-one locally making the case for investment in their area. As a consequence, there have been stark differences in the speed that partnerships have come together. The Big Local programme was designed from the outset to allow areas work at their own pace: where Big Local was able to build on and strengthen existing emergent civic activity and networks, areas were able to move more quickly

⁵¹¹ LGIU. (2017) Community Collaboration – A Councillors guide.

http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Community%20collaboration%20a%20councillors%20guide%20\(003\).pdf.pdf) p. 7.

⁵¹² Leach, M. (2017) 'Let's fund places not projects'. Online at: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/blogs/lets-fund-places-not-projects> forward; in other areas time was needed to get started. Moreover, within some Big Local areas, partnerships initially found it challenging to engage all parts of the area and all demographic groups. These are the communities that, in terms of engagement, may require the most investment in building sustainable local relationships and shared ambition, and slow progress should not be judged negatively. But with a 10-15 year time horizon, rather than the much shorter duration of many other community engagement and regeneration programmes, it has been possible to allow areas to overcome those issues and move forward at their own pace.

⁵¹³ For information see: <http://www.wargravebiglocal.co.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/10/Year-One-Review-Final-Report.pdf>

26. We are aware that participation in the UK is skewed overall. Data from the Community Life Survey suggests participation rates are higher amongst certain demographic groups (White British, young people 16 to 25, and those over 65s).⁵¹⁴ Different roles also attract certain groups. Partnership roles in Big Local have some resemblance to Trustee roles and there is a similarity to the demographics of trustees, with very few young people on Big Local partnerships,⁵¹⁵ which reflects other surveys about the demographics of the trustees.⁵¹⁶ However, there are multiple other routes for young people to get involved in Big Local. For an example of this see the case study on Kirk Hallam in the appendix, 31.d.
27. As noted earlier in this submission, in the longer term this may in itself present issues around sustainability and the extent to which changes in community capacity and confidence are embedded in the longer term. Individuals tend to dip in and out of volunteering. The Pathways through Participation project suggested that people's participation fluctuates throughout their lifetimes. Key events can result in participation, such as having a child or retirement.⁵¹⁷ As many Big Local areas enter the mid-point of their existence, Local Trust has been helping them start to address issues of sustainability and legacy.

⁵¹⁴ Community Life Survey 2015 to 2016 data:

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/539106/2015_16_community_life_excel-table.xlsx Table 3

⁵¹⁵ See: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/blogs/are-residents-leading-big-local-part-2>

⁵¹⁶ Saxton, J. (2016) 'Twenty things we learned from our National Trustee Survey'. Online at:

<https://nfpsynergy.net/blog/twenty-things-we-learned-our-national-trustee-survey>

⁵¹⁷ Brodie, E., Hughes, T., Jochum, V., Miller, S., Ockenden, N. and Warburton, D. (2011) Pathways through participation: What creates and sustains active citizenship? Online at:

http://pathwaysthroughparticipation.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/sites/3/2011/09/Pathways-Through-Participation-final-report_Final_20110913.pdf p. 36.

Overcoming barriers to help facilitate engagement

28. A key part of the Big Local ethos is to not focus on the deficits of communities, rather their strengths – an ‘asset based approach’. As IVAR state: ‘Local Trust’s approach is perceived as an empowerment rather than deficit model – focused on recognising and building on strengths and assets in an area, rather than the needs and negatives.’⁵¹⁸ Helping the residents overcome barriers has included:

- a. Learning and networking: A key component of the programme is to share learning about how barriers have been overcome and how they have succeeded in engaging their local communities. These include learning events,⁵¹⁹ alongside major regional and national networking events that have been run every spring since 2012. These have promoted networking, learning and peer support between areas, and workshops are often led or co-delivered with people from Big Local areas.⁵²⁰ There has also been networking facilitated at a local level, often by the Big Local ‘Rep’ – workers employed by Local Trust at a community level to provide light touch mentoring and support to local areas. Reps also have regular network meetings to share their experiences. In addition, evidence and learning has been presented online and shared through social media.⁵²¹
- b. Support: There are various support mechanisms in addition to the peer support through networking. Having a Rep on the ground (even if only for a few days every month) and broader support from Local Trust has been vital in helping Big Local areas facilitate community engagement. There is also other support projects, such as grants for innovative projects in Big Local areas. Many areas employ a support worker to help them. The roles range from administrative support to community development work.

Conclusion – An alternative model of engagement

29. Big Local represents a distinctive and radical approach to tackling many of the issues being focused on by the committee. It shifts the centre of gravity away from grant makers and funders towards communities – they are best placed to identify local ⁵¹⁸ IVAR. (2015) Funding for resident control: The Local Trust experience so far. Online at: <https://www.ivar.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/07/Funding-for-Resident-Control-Local-Trust-2015.pdf> p. 4.

⁵¹⁹ Turner, J. (2016) Effectiveness of Big Local learning support – Executive Summary. Online at: <http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/EXECUTIVE%20SUMMARY%2018%20May%202016%20Big%20Local%20effectiveness%20of%20learning.pdf>.

⁵²⁰ NCVO, IVR and OPM. (2014) Big Local: The Early Years – Evaluation Report. Online at: http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Final_report_reduced.pdf p. 26.

⁵²¹ See various case studies and resources: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/> need. They will make mistakes as well as having successes, the point is there is a sense of ownership over the process, and time to build on learning.

30. Big Local is still at an early stage in its development, with nearly a decade left to run. Therefore the information and evidence in this submission should be viewed as emergent and partial. But Big Local is likely to represent an important source of evidence and learning over the next five to ten years. Local Trust will continue to invest in sharing learning – both positive and negative – as an ongoing contribution to policy making and developing practice around civic engagement, community empowerment and neighbourhood renewal and regeneration.

APPENDIX – Case studies in response to question 12

Examples of initiatives in Big Local areas that promote citizenship

31. Taking an active role in decision making is an act of citizenship itself. There are numerous specific examples within Big Local areas around promoting citizenship. We have outlined these below:
- a) Developing green and open spaces in Grassland Hasmoor: In Grassland Hasmoor the presence of Big Local stimulated the Green and Open Spaces working group who were working closely with the relevant local authorities to improve pathways and make them more accessible, something which local rangers see as a great opportunity for facilitating change. They have also harnessed volunteers to deliver their summer holiday and food projects, leading to a reputation with councils and others that residents can make things happen.⁵²²
 - b) Facilitating new housing in Lawrence Weston: Lawrence Weston Big Local has worked closely with its Locally Trusted Organisation (Ambition Lawrence Weston) on various projects. This includes developing the large area of derelict land in the middle of the estate. There are plans for a new supermarket, new housing (including shared ownership and intermediate market rent) and local services, including a GP surgery, in a community hub. They have worked with a number of local authorities, including in Bristol, South Gloucestershire and North Somerset, which has attracted Coastal Communities Fund monies and brought other investment in the area including a supermarket. They have also helped develop wind turbine and a solar farm which result in greener energy and a financial return on investment.⁵²³

⁵²² For more detail see: McCabe et al., Big Local: Beyond the Early Years, p. 76.

- c) Tackling anti-social behaviour in St Oswald and Netherton: The area made Citizenship one of the priorities in their Big Local plan. They defined it specifically in terms of tackling anti-social behaviour. In order to achieve this, they worked with services offering provision to NEET's (Not in Education, Employment or Training) to encourage community awareness and respect. In order to reduce anti-social behaviour they wanted local people to be able to access positive, affordable, local activities and to become engaged, involved and take ownership of their projects. This included providing volunteering opportunities for young people and the long term unemployed.⁵²⁴
- d) Engaging young people in Kirk Hallam: It has introduced a 'passport project' in partnership with a local school where children do activities around the area and work through the passport, like a local Duke of Edinburgh award. It is based on the 'National Trust things to do before you are 11 3/4' and includes: skimming stones, climbing a tree, flying a kite etc. The idea would be to introduce something specific for local children that enabled them to capture moments and thoughts as they grow and do some of the activities. An example is the Big Camp Out was put on by the two primary schools, organised by a specialist company which erects the tents and organises activities at an event which included a bonfire and lessons for children on how to make safe drinking water.⁵²⁵
- e) Working with third sector organisations in Growing Together: Growing Together in Northampton East have been working closely with their Locally Trusted Organisation, Blackthorn Good Neighbours. This small third sector organisation moved from being a community-based organisation to taking over a nursery after it was about to be shut down. Working with Growing Together, Blackthorn Good Neighbours has been able to re-introduce this community-based aspect back into what they do. After Growing Together finish spending their £1 million, it is planned that they will merge with Blackthorn Good

⁵²³ For more detail see: McCabe et al., Big Local: Beyond the Early Years, pp. 43-44 and <https://www.bigissue.com/news/bristol-residents-plan-community-housing-project/>

⁵²⁴ For more detail see L30 million's Big Local plan:

http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/plans/L30%20Plan%20Year%201%20\(1\).pdf.pdf)

⁵²⁵ For more detail see Big Kirk Hallam's Big Local Plan:

http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/plans/Big%20Kirk%20Hallam%20-%20Big%20Local%20Plan%20\(2\).pdf.pdf) p. 10. and the this case study:

http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Kirk%20Hallam%20engagement%20case%20study%20\(Final%20Sept%202016\).pdf.pdf)

http://localtrust.org.uk/assets/downloads/documents/Kirk%20Hallam%20engagement%20case%20study%20\(Final%20Sept%202016\).pdf.pdf)

Neighbours to create a new organisation that will continue to work within the area.

32. Here is a case study of someone who has been involved in the programme:

Kathryn's story⁵²⁶

'I started by making teas and coffee for drop ins, and from this people around me were able to identify my transferable skills such as my IT skills. So from making refreshments, I then started to work on the newsletter, which then led to me taking minutes, controlling social media and arranging meetings. Local Trust realise that in deprived communities people may not have all the tools that are needed to run projects like this so provide a lot of free training for residents in the 150 areas. It's this training that has helped me understand the third sector, governance and best practice, how to make meetings successful and present with confidence and clarity.'

8 September 2017

⁵²⁶ For full case study see: Andrews, K. (2016) 'Positive change for people and place: Kathryn's story from Big Local in Blackpool'. Online at: <http://localtrust.org.uk/library/blogs/positive-change-for-people-and-place>

Locality – written evidence (CCE0140)

About Locality and our members:

Locality is the national network of ambitious and enterprising community-led organisations, working together to help neighbourhoods thrive. We represent over 600 community-led organisations, who operate in neighbourhoods across England, undertaking a wide variety of different activities, reflecting the communities they serve. What unites our members is a sense of ambition for their local neighbourhood, an enterprising approach to finding local solutions to local problems, and a clear sense that this activity should be community-led and based on self-determination. They act as ‘anchors’ within their community, providing stability, flexibility and a responsiveness to local need.

Community anchor organisations are fundamental to the creation of successful and self-confident neighbourhoods, uniquely placed to provide solutions to many of the intractable economic, social and environmental problems we face as a society. They foster self-reliance rather than dependency, and provide communities with a degree of resilience to cope with changing circumstances. They are independent organisations, working interdependently with the public and private sector locally.

Community anchors build and harness a huge amount of social capital in their local communities, and are key institutions in supporting active citizenship and civic engagement. Through their strong relationships with vulnerable and excluded groups locally, they support people to have a voice in their local community and shape neighbourhood priorities. Community anchor organisations also often play an important role in reinvigorating common assets locally, which ensures that communities can directly control the important activity in their neighbourhoods

Summary:

Locality welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. The remit of this Committee, to identify new ways of building bridges within and between communities and support civic engagement, is an extremely important one. The EU referendum exposed a number of deep divides in our society: an economic model which has generated deep patterns of inequality, as well as a sense of democratic deficit which has left people feeling they lack agency and a stake in their communities. It also exposed an unease about demographic change, with people living increasingly separate lives across age, class and ethnicity, made toxic by a strident immigration debate.

Community anchor organisations are an essential component of the fabric of our communities and their role is more important now than ever. They stimulate active citizenship and civic participation through volunteering and community organising, and act as a catalyst for community cohesion, bringing together diverse groups to work together for the local neighbourhood. Through community development and community organising, they give local people a voice and strengthen community involvement in local decision-making. They are also powerful local economic agents, using assets and enterprise to drive regeneration, often in the most disadvantaged areas.

Throughout this response, we highlight the importance of neighbourhoods as a key site for building civic engagement and citizenship, and the fundamental role of community institutions and community infrastructure in supporting this capacity. We highlight the need for places and spaces within neighbourhoods for communities to come together, and make recommendations for protecting and developing vital community assets through community asset ownership. We also make recommendations for strengthening neighbourhood-level governance and decision-making, in order to build participatory democracy and develop community agency.

Throughout this response, we draw on emerging evidence from Locality's Commission on the Future of Localism, which we established earlier this year, in partnership with Power to Change, to investigate what is required to reinvigorate local democracy and community empowerment.⁵²⁷ The Commission is chaired by Lord Kerslake and brings together politicians, community leaders, and policy expertise. The Commission is due to report its findings and recommendations in January. We have been holding evidence hearings and consultation events across the country, and been receiving written evidence, in order to harness ideas and innovation about how we can ensure people have a greater stake in their local area and the decisions that affect them.

Locality have also established a new member-led network 'the Future Places Network' to bring Locality members together to discuss the role of community institutions in the context of Britain's exit from the European Union. We are holding our first session in September; we will be focusing on the role of community anchors in promoting community empowerment, building community cohesion and driving community economic development. We will also be considering how they can do this better and making recommendations on what we need to do to build a more supportive policy environment.

We would be very happy to feed in further evidence from this research project, as well as our Commission on the Future of Localism, to the House of Lords Committee on Civic Engagement and Citizenship.

Responses to questions:

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- 1.1. The power of community is a core expression of what citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century. Neighbourhoods are a key source of the sense of belonging and connectedness that underpins people's identity as citizens and within wider society. The place where people live can affect their social capital, their support networks and opportunities to connect, as well as their health and wellbeing. Equally, neighbourhoods can also reinforce inequalities and isolation, which can undermine people's connectedness to wider society and their sense of belonging.

⁵²⁷ For more information, please see: <http://locality.org.uk/our-work/policy/localism-commission/>

1.2. Civic engagement takes many forms; ultimately, it is about people getting involved to make a difference and impacting change in some way, through both political and non-political channels.⁵²⁸ The community is a key site of civic engagement, and local democratic institutions often provide a channel for that engagement. However, civic engagement is about more than turnout at local or national elections; participatory democracy requires neighbourhood governance and forums that can facilitate deliberation and local decision-making. Civic engagement through participatory democracy and involvement in local decision-making often requires resetting the relationship between citizen and state, which needs to be enabling and generous rather than controlling and obstructive. Throughout this response, we make recommendations for strengthening neighbourhood-level governance.

1.3. Civic engagement also finds expression in community action; participation in local action can demonstrate to people the power of getting things done in partnership with their neighbours. Evidence gathered through our Localism Commission (forthcoming) is demonstrating how this participation can reinforce community ties, and affect how people identify their own capacity and power, which can also foster greater participatory democracy. Active citizenship and civic participation at the neighbourhood level can also act as a catalyst for community cohesion, bringing together diverse groups to work together for the local neighbourhood.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational

2.1. A key way to strengthen people's identity as citizens is to build and strengthen the community institutions that foster connectedness and belonging. We expand on our recommendations for strengthening these institutions - and how this facilitates civic engagement and citizenship - in later questions throughout this response.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

⁵²⁸ Definitions

- 3.1. Civic engagement can be strengthened by re-thinking the relationship between citizen and state. Localism and community empowerment form a key part of this. The Localism Act (2011) built on the Coalition Government’s intention to “promote decentralisation and democratic engagement [and] end the era of top-down government”⁵²⁹ by introducing a set of Community Rights to empower communities to take action locally. Whilst these have offered an important route for communities seeking to save valued local assets or shape local planning, barriers remain to achieving a truly bottom-up model of civic engagement.
 - 3.2. The opportunities to reinvigorate the localism agenda and strengthen local democracy was a core motivation of Locality establishing our Commission on the Future of Localism. Evidence gathered so far has demonstrated the frustrations felt when considerable time and effort is dedicated to community action, which is then disregarded by local government and leads to greater disconnect. Fostering civic engagement requires the devolution of tangible powers to communities, including responsibilities over resources, to unlock community agency.
 - 3.3. Community organisations can be a key link between the formal rights and responsibilities of citizenship, and the capacity to translate these into civic engagement and community action. Through community development and community organising, they give local people a voice and strengthen community involvement in local decision-making. Considering citizenship in terms of ‘formal rights and responsibilities’ does not always fully capture the barriers which exist to civic engagement, and we expand on these further in our response to Question 9.
7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?
- 7.1. A key part of encouraging greater civic engagement is in supporting community infrastructure. Community organisations are a huge source of civic capacity and participatory potential – they often provide important spaces for community conversations and activism, and through community development and community organising techniques they give local people a voice. This fundamental role does not necessarily rely directly on external funding programmes – it is a core functioning of their community purpose. However, funding pressures elsewhere, including the decline in grant funding and squeeze on income through contracts⁵³⁰, alongside rising demand, can have a significant impact on organisational sustainability and the diversion of time and resources from community development activities.

⁵²⁹ Coalition Agreement, May 2010

- 7.2. A core way in which government can support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement, is through focusing on the sustainability of civil society organisations. Community organisations are fundamentally important to ensuring that neighbourhoods are places where feelings of belonging and connectedness can flourish, and where civic engagement is developed. However, the environment within which community organisations are operating is becoming increasingly challenging, with implications for the sustainability and viability of this vital sector. Whilst community organisations have faced a perpetual challenge in maintaining financial stability, these issues have become increasingly complex and pressing. Alongside this, local VCSE infrastructure – a common source of advice and support - is increasingly squeezed, and government interest and capacity for providing further centrally funded support programmes is waning.
- 7.3. One key route for financial sustainability is through asset ownership, which, when done well and properly supported, provides a sustainable foundation and robust financial basis for the growth of community and civil society organisations. The organisations which are best able to sustain their activities during turbulent financial pressures, are those which generate revenue, including renting buildings or hosting new services. In order to unlock the widespread benefits which community asset ownership can bring to local areas, a coordinated strategy of investment from funders, central government, and social investment is required and we have been calling for a £1 billion ‘Community Asset Investment Plan’⁵³¹.
9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?
- 9.1. An uneven economic model has been a key contributing factor in why many communities and groups feel “left behind” within an increasingly divided and unequal society. Whilst government’s economic strategy is increasingly regional, it is still far from local. Indeed, the economic benefits of the development of city regions may exacerbate inequalities within places even as some of the differences between them are levelled out. Britain’s exit from the EU is an important opportunity to strengthen the potential of community economic development; maximising and harnessing local assets for the benefit of the local community, and delivering neighbourhood-level economic opportunity.

⁵³⁰ From 2010/11 – 2012/13 the value of income from grants and contracts to the voluntary and community sector has fallen by £1.7 billion, NCVO Civil Society Almanac
<http://data.ncvo.org.uk/a/almanac15/introduction-2/>

⁵³¹ For more information, please see: <http://locality.org.uk/our-work/campaigns/places-and-spaces/>

- 9.2. Efforts to encourage active citizenship need to account for the barriers many face to this kind of involvement and recognise that there is often a lot of work needed to reengage communities, and break down barriers. A core finding of the evidence received through our Localism Commission, is that for many people experiencing multiple-disadvantage, the opportunities to be involved in local community activities and initiatives can seem extremely alien and distant. This can be a result of a lack of confidence and personal sense of power and agency, perhaps connected to wider disadvantages of health, employment opportunities or housing. In this way people are actively excluded from citizenship through economic inequalities and disadvantage. Community anchor organisations can play a fundamental role in community development activities which re-engage these groups and tackle part of this citizenship deficit.
- 9.3. Democratic structures at both central and local government can deepen divides if they are not representative of the whole community; this can act as a further barrier to civic engagement and participation. This is not purely about representativeness through elected leaders, but through wider participatory democratic channels and forums. For example, local democratic structures can help support children and young people to express their views – for example through youth councils. BAME community organisations and community infrastructure are also essential in supporting black and ethnic minority leadership and participation. Research from Locality and Ubele, for example,⁵³² has demonstrated how the sustainability of BAME community owned assets poses a real threat to community representativeness and voice.

8 September 2017

⁵³² For more information, please see: <http://locality.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/A-Place-to-Call-Home-exec-summary.pdf>

London Youth – written evidence (CCE0205)

Question 4.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

- Politicians and other people in decision-making positions are generally too far away from young people, leaving young people with a feeling of disempowerment and unclear how to influence decision-makers. This can make them less likely to participate in ‘traditional’ methods of engagement although many would wish to engage.
- There are variations depending on whether the committee means local or national political engagement. For example, in London there are moves towards wider participation such as the Youth Council.
- Citizenship education is no longer a key part of the National Curriculum, which may put up further barriers to young people participating in politics.

What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age?

London Youth has previously supported initiatives encouraging young people to get out and vote such as Bite the Ballot.

Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

- Voter registration needs to be made simpler and easier for young people.
- Other methods should be considered that are used in other countries such as remote or electronic voting. (Although the security of paper-based systems and recent problems with electronic systems are noted.)
- Political parties need to do more to appeal to the concerns of young people and to ensure their policies are understandable to an audience with less experience of policy-making.

Question 6.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when?

London Youth believes that the National Citizen Service can have a very positive impact on participants - and contends that this is compounded when NCS is delivered by local youth organisations which have the flexibility to better respond to local community needs and challenges. We think it is a good step that NCS has been expanding its programmes to reach a wider range of young people from a wider range of backgrounds.

NCS provides a valuable ‘taster’ of active citizenship but should be recognised that NCS delivers to certain age groups at certain times of the year. A broader approach such as Step up to Serve would cover a wider age range and facilitate participation at other times of the year. Local authorities and youth groups could play a bigger convening role.

Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

London Youth is not sure how the current NCS could have a greater political element, though there could be more of an effort made to bring a political context generally to social action programmes through the engagement of local councillors and MPs.

Although the current NCS celebration events are key to reflecting on and celebrating the achievements of young people in terms of their contribution to their community, London Youth is not sure that a public citizenship ceremony would be particularly useful or cost effective

We contend that there are plenty of other routes to active citizenship, from uniformed groups to volunteering opportunities and other social action programmes. When these are developed and delivered locally they can be more beneficial as they meet the specific needs of young people in those communities

Question 9.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

London Youth contends that the most fundamental cause of a “left behind” feeling is overall poverty and economic inequality. This is perhaps more important to address than ethnicity, age, gender or urban/rural issues. Young people in disadvantaged areas can feel this most acutely, being bombarded with materialistic ideas and concepts yet not being able to afford these ‘aspirations’.

It will always be more difficult to engage young people into concepts of active citizenship where there are high levels of economic and educational inequality. For example if a young person has to work at 16 to help meet their family’s basic needs then they will not have the time to take part in such schemes, and they shouldn’t be further penalised for this.

How might these barriers be overcome?

Social action and the ability for young people to create positive change in their communities can help to overcome such barriers. We fully believe in the double benefit of social action as laid out by Step Up To Serve. We ensure through our own social action programmes such as City Leaders, Future City Leaders and our own organisational Youth Advisory Board that young people are able to find solutions to these barriers themselves, while enabling them to become the community leaders of the future. We seek participation in our programmes from a wide range of young people to ensure a diversity of representation and opportunity.

It should also be recognised that schools are not the only place where young people can be engaged. For a variety of reasons, some young people don't get on at school but do participate in youth organisations in their communities which they can attend for free, on a voluntary basis, interacting with trusted adults.

Earlier this year (March 2017) we published a series of recommendations in a report on life for young people in London called 'Young People's Capital of the World?'. This included:

- Recommendation 3: The Mayor of London and the Greater London Authority should put mechanisms in place to ensure that young people have a clear voice, brokered through community youth organisations, in the development of London strategies and in key local decisions around service provision, housing and regeneration, and skills and employability.
- Recommendation 4: The Mayor of London should make explicit the role of youth organisations in facilitating positive outcomes for young people in his plans for education, skills, culture and the arts, clean air and open space and community regeneration, as well as in crime prevention.

Dr Eric Royal Lybeck, University of Exeter – written evidence (CCE0209)

We Need a Civic Sociology for a Civic Society

1. I write to submit evidence to the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement drawing on my expertise as an editor for a new journal founded by leading British, American and European sociologists called Civic Sociology. Indeed, our motivation in establishing the journal is similar to that which seems to prompt the committee's enquiry – namely, recognition that critical events in 2016, including Brexit and the election of Donald Trump, portend either dramatically new social and cultural conditions, or, reflect longer-term trends which have hitherto been ignored. In founding a new journal so named, we commit ourselves to not only understanding civic engagement and participation^v, civic action^{vi} and civic imaginations^{vii}; but, perhaps, more importantly, we recognize that we must have been doing something wrong to have not seen these recent crises coming. And, by 'we', I don't just refer to sociologists, but to all 'experts' – academics, journalists, civil servants, professionals – as a whole. For what 2016 reveals, perhaps, most strikingly is: the expert, like the emperor, appears to have no clothes.

2. This presents a challenge for any expert now seeking to advise the Lords on how to positively build bridges between communities. Collectively, our new network of scholars have consulted the committee's document and have much to contribute in terms of how to conceptualize civic action;^{viii} others have explored alternatives to prevailing strategies towards 'heritage' in UNESCO designated sites;^{ix} or the relationship between legal rights and urban development;^x and so on. In other words, we could help address the specific and most worthy questions asked within the document, and will do so in time within the pages of our journal.

3. However, a prior question needs to be asked regarding who needs to be more civically engaged? As presented, the call for evidence mentions British-born radical terrorists and those 'left behind'. This corresponds with recent research highlighting a civic 'participation gap', largely reflective of social inequalities.^{xi} Yet, the request implies we develop or identify positive British values which should appeal to those marginalized folks in order to re-engage them in the civic process. But, this suggests the 'problem' is the marginalized people – 'them' – some maybe in self-segregating urban neighbourhoods, and others abandoned in the rural hinterland. How can we make or inspire these folks to engage in new civic behaviours, which will, in turn, make them less marginalized? In other words, how do we help these folks be less of a problem?

4. I would propose a different framing of the problem: the issue of low civic participation is not the fault of marginalized populations, but that of 'us': the mainstream, middle-class centre, the experts, the professionals, the academics. We are the ones who have failed to adequately participate in our local communities. We have for too long engaged in what civic sociologists have, following Dickens, called ‘telescopic philanthropy’.^{xii} Instead of understanding and engaging with nearby deprived neighbourhood just across the train tracks, or off the B-roads up-county, scholars and governments have too often patronizingly tried to solve “Africa’s” problems through ineffective target-driven projects;^{xiii} or, we have been incentivized to partner with academics in developing countries to address ‘Global Challenges’ scattered randomly across the entire planet.^{xiv} All well-intentioned ideas, of course, but, along with the REF and TEF and related pressures emanating from Whitehall, the result is an estrangement between the expert centre and local marginalized populations. What better evidence of this is there than the wildly off-base polling predictions ahead of the Brexit and Trump votes? Who knew? Certainly not political scientists. Precious few sociologists. And yet many of these same experts will now offers your committee their explanations and solutions anew.

5. As LSE sociologist Lisa McKenzie recently pointed out, ethnographers, actually on the ground, had observed a growing resentment between the political establishment and those whose voices have been ignored for decades.^{xv} If we engaged in a bit less pontificating, and a bit more listening – with intellectual humility as Ruth Braunstein, Andrew Abbott and others contributing to our civic sociology project recommend^{xvi} - we might hear just how little trust in our expert authority remains. And, far from being ‘dangerous’, ‘irrational’ and ‘intolerant’, many of those who have disengaged from politics recognize the truth we ignore at our peril: for it may be the middle-class experts in the cities and university towns who are, in fact, the source of the problems we wish to solve.

6. Elisabeth Clemens, for example, has reviewed a number of recent books in an essay titled ‘Distrust in Distant Powers’ in which she argues American’s declining faith in the federal government mirrors Europeans’ resentment of out-of-touch bureaucrats in Brussels.^{xvii} In Wisconsin, political ethnographer Kathy Cramer set out to understand variations in different classes’ opinions of government, and discovered instead overwhelming similarity across ‘out-state’ populations insofar as anyone not from the major cities of Milwaukee and Madison resented those urban elites.^{xviii} Similar findings come up in Arlie Hochschild’s study of rural Louisiana^{xix} and, within cities, complicated political jurisdictions contribute to a sense of absent political power and gang violence.^{xx} These studies can be tied to Clemens’ historical account of the growth of the ‘Rube Goldberg state’,^{xxi} referring to the manner in which federal interventions, for good and ill reasons, have gradually undermined the capacities of local governments to react to citizens’ needs; at the same time shrinking pots of federal money are used to ‘incentivize’ regional initiatives according to the interests of Washington insiders. Living and working in Southwest England, I observe similar outrage over large civic infrastructure investments in ecologically-friendly swimming pools no one locally ever asked for. The city council’s response to such complaints via facebook is to ask these critics: ‘why don’t you run for office yourselves?’

7. Recent works by civic sociologists Josh Pacewicz and Michael McQuarrie highlight similar patterns happening again and again across America. These changes are experienced at local and regional levels, but interact in complicated ways with national and global trends.^{xxii} Pacewicz, for example, explains the long-term dismantling of local political party allegiances in two Iowa towns.^{xxiii} Since the 1970s, new local patterns of ‘bipartisan consensus’ in pursuit of large waterfront renewal projects and the like emerged. In effect, these strategies leveraged municipal revenues in favour of external interests – as the saying goes: Wall Street over Main Street – all the while, these consensus- and consultant- driven strategies produced rumps of formerly substantial local party organizations, unions and chambers of commerce. This provided the seeds for polarization as national-level politics – culture wars over transgender bathrooms and the like – overtook bread-and-butter concerns. At the end of the day, no one seems to be happy and each side increasingly resents the other; and, to top it off, there’s no money left.

8. This returns us yet again to the issue of the crisis of expert legitimacy, and authority, in general. To oversimplify a complex recent history, while paraphrasing W.B. Yeats: things fall apart when the centre cannot hold. Three essential crises of public confidence have befallen the so-called ‘establishment’ since the end of the Cold War. First, in 2003, the public was led to believe there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. There were none. This was a wilful lie. Britain has admitted this. America has not. Second, in 2008, the financial markets collapsed leading to the Great Recession. The banks were bailed out while the rest of us underwent a program of austerity. Whereas the economists promised renewed growth, we have experienced unacknowledged inflation, particularly in terms of house prices. The average home in Chelsea now costs £2,100,000 in neighbourhoods a young professional couple could have bought a flat for £30,000 in the mid-1980s. But, of course, we must all tighten our belts. Third, in 2016, the media, academia and metropolitan cultural and political elites completely failed to predict elections in both Britain and the USA. This reflects a much broader series of cultural divides, which have been hitherto ignored by political establishments, largely focused on the goings-on of London or Washington. Any attempts to ‘bridge’ these divides must extend from these capitals and university towns toward those hinterlands and marginalized neighbourhoods which have been excluded or ignored for decades.

9. This is the programme civic sociology proposes to develop by re-orienting our scholarship and professional practices toward problem-solving within local and regional communities, all the while, reflecting more on our ethical commitments, particularly those tensions which exist between experts and the populations they study or collaborate with. We thus consider civic sociology to be reflective and encouraging of a new generation of social scientists, committed to addressing the polarizations of the contemporary world, whether these be divisions between old and young, rich and poor, town and country, and so on. We wish to reconsider these problems from the ground-up, establishing and reconstructing our legitimacy in an age sceptical of experts. We do not wish to smash the idols of previous generations, but rather to carve out a space to develop new ways of pursuing sociology and solving social problems in the 21st century.

10. This involves recovery of a range of civic traditions which have been forgotten.^{xxiv} While much historical scholarship highlights the role of civic associations in the American Progressive Era, we argue that there was an equally vigorous civic tradition within British history, particularly during the late Victorian, Edwardian and early twentieth century.^{xxv} This recognition follows on from the ground-breaking historical scholarship of William Whyte who identified an underlying ‘civic’ tradition behind British higher education.^{xxvi} Within the social sciences, a civic tradition emerged in the late 19th century under circumstances remarkably similar to today.^{xxvii} Inspired by the cultural criticism of Matthew Arnold, George Eliot, John Ruskin and the entrepreneurialism of William Morris, the founders of Toynbee Hall and more besides, a civic sociology tradition developed centred in Edinburgh. Led by Sir Patrick Geddes, Victor Branford and others, this civic scholarship understood the integral relationships between town and country, young and old, university professors and the non-educated poor.^{xxviii} Central to the civic sociology project was integration, collaboration and engagement between universities and the public. The centuries’ long regeneration of Old Town Edinburgh is a testament to the viability of this approach and the wider civic and settlement movement. This connected historically with planners of Garden Cities; the Documentary Film Movement; the Kyrle societies, which became the National Trust; rural regeneration projects such as Dartington Hall in Devon, a fascinating institution which combined the ethical principles of Indian philosopher, Rabindranath Tagore, American Pragmatism and the best of English culture so conveniently summarized by T.S. Eliot at the time: ‘Derby Day, Henley Regatta, Cowes, the twelfth of August, a cup final, the dog races, the pin table, the dart board, Wensleydale cheese, boiled cabbage cut into sections, beetroot in vinegar, 19th-century Gothic churches and the music of Elgar’.^{xxix}

11. Perhaps here we might encounter some of the positive British values the committee has requested? And yet, we also confront a paradox: which is that, perhaps the quintessence of British, or English culture is to not disclose itself. After all, why did so many cosmopolitan elites in the capital ignore UKIP for so long? Is it not because there is something vulgar – something decidedly un-English about banging on about English values? There are unwritten rules, and one either knows them or you don’t. These must be learned to get on in life, but also, these values cannot be written down, because to speak of them publicly breaks the very rules and expectations. One cannot wrap oneself in the red, white and blue as Americans or Frenchmen do, declaring ‘freedom’ or ‘equality’ as being the ideals above all other which must be embodied by all citizens. And, in any event, as Tocqueville noted of these two ideals in particular: they contradict one another, for one cannot obtain equality without limiting liberty and vice-versa.^{xxx} Or, perhaps, as German sociologist Robert Münch suggests, the essence of British modernity is the tension between tradition and reform?^{xxxi}

12. This is why civic education is so important as the committee rightly notes. However, we mustn’t confine our conception simply to a narrow, mandated ‘citizenship’ curriculum as currently exists. Rather, the entire school curriculum should be constructed in order to draw out the civic dimensions of one's life and the life of one's community. As Geddes, Jane Addams and others showed, one could highlight civics through biology lessons as much as language study – and my own research highlights the decline of such broad understandings since the nineteenth century precisely due to the replacement of Classical studies with modern foreign languages and specialized, disciplinary-oriented education. Not only does this narrow specialization limit students' understandings of other cultures, as well as the capacity to reflect upon their own; this prevents students from learning how to learn. Teachers teach to the test, all the while being observed by OFSTED, exam boards and suspicious parents. Meanwhile, the specialized content memorized for A-levels will become obsolete within a few years based on current rates of technological change. In a future full of artificial intelligence, advanced robotics and fake news, what is most important is that students learn how to learn, and a robust, broad civic education may be the only way to engender this.

13. One of the classic civic sociologists we draw upon, W.E.B. DuBois, noted that the goal of education should not be simply to make 'men' into carpenters, but, rather should be 'to make carpenters men' (excuse the dated gendered language here!). There are, thus, two sides of education – one, technical, providing the individual with skills; and a second, providing the broader community – especially families – with a sense of what life means. What are some of the ideals of the good life? And, how might one use those acquired technical skills to obtain them? It is ultimately a question of ends vs. means. Du Bois wrote:

If we make money the object of man-training, we shall develop money-makers but not necessarily men; if we make technical skill the object of education, we may possess artisans but not, in nature, men. Men we shall have only as we make manhood the object of the work of the schools—intelligence, broad sympathy, knowledge of the world that was and is, and of the relation of men to it—this is the curriculum of that Higher Education which must underlie true life. On this foundation we may build bread winning, skill of hand and quickness of brain, with never a fear lest the child and man mistake the means of living for the object of life.^{xxxii}

14. Similar sentiments were expressed by Ruskin, Arnold, Eliot, Morris and others. Indeed, there is a long tradition in Britain of such an educational interest in 'making men', or perhaps, better expressed: making adults. Yet, how much entertainment on television or on film is truly oriented toward adults? Harry Potter, recall, is a children's book. What is 'Love Island'? Perhaps we avoid such questions for fear of appearing 'elitist' – which, incidentally, as noted above, is a strategy which has not worked! But, in avoiding such questions we ignore Arnold's observation:

The complaining millions of men
Darken in labour and pain –

what they want is something to animate and ennoble them – not merely to add zest to their melancholy or grace to their dreams.

15. Perhaps we have further neglected in recent decades, as sociologist Robert Bellah argued was the case in America in 1985, that contemporary societies have settled into a form of individualism which is essentially ‘adolescent.’ We mistake the virtues of this interim phase of life: the unrootedness of the student leaving home, their quest for identity, initiative and independence, ‘along with their less savory concomitants of adulation of success and contempt for weakness’ for what it means to be a fully, self-actualized human being.^{xxxiii}

16. But, is this not the fallacy of classical liberalism itself, as Philip Gorski recently argued in the case of America?^{xxxiv} Liberalism – or, what contemporary social critics call ‘neoliberalism’ – has been the heart of a broader consensus amongst the expert centre currently undergoing a comprehensive crisis of legitimacy.^{xxxv} Under their watch, public services have been converted into simulated markets organized around targets and, ostensibly, “choice”. Many of my critical colleagues argue this is an insidious attempt by the powers that be to turn us all into automatons – and, while that is, indeed, the effect – as a sociologists of professions, I interpret the cause as being largely due to an over-extension of economics and business professionals into problem-areas for which their knowledge was ill-suited. These include, healthcare, education, civil service – essentially, everything other than actual economic markets. Regardless, as noted above, these experts have failed to deliver the goods. Look at the economy, politics, culture and society. What a mess!

17. Gorski, however, provides an alternative to liberalism which is rooted in similar historical and intellectual traditions – early American ideals during and since the colonial and revolutionary eras – which, consequently, also connect to British traditions, including the civic tradition noted above. Indeed, following Bellah, Gorski calls this tradition ‘civic republicanism’. In contrast to the liberal ideal of freedom as being solely freedom from restraint – Isaiah Berlin’s ‘negative freedom’ – civic republicanism is rooted in classical and Biblical ideals of self-actualization through active citizenship. The language of markets and consumption can be replaced with the language of civic virtue and the good life. Rather than thinking of the government as being opposed to the individual, the community becomes the means through which the good and just are obtained.

18. In his discussion, Gorski notes different conceptions in the notion of ‘corruption’, which might helpfully draw out issues related to the crisis of neoliberal legitimacy: Since the late 19th century, ‘[corruption] has come to mean self-dealing and quid pro quos – bribery, nepotism, influence peddling, and so on. It suggests individual moral failing – the proverbial “bad apples”’.^{xxxvi} The civic republican understands corruption differently, in terms of a sociological imbalance: ‘corruption infects the whole tree, not just one apple. How so?’

Simply put, if one group can exercise power without being checked by another, it will elevate its corporate interests above the common good'.^{xxxvii} Soon enough, everyone realizes this and starts to behave selfishly, becoming a 'free rider' to avoid being a 'sucker'.

19. We are thus in a position to reconsider some of the questions the select committee asked regarding shared British values. From a liberal, or neoliberal point of view, the question is ultimately framed by thinking of individuals as problems which must be solved. What laws, mandates or responsibilities do we need to impose in order to obtain the behaviour we wish from British citizens or immigrants? For example, we do not want a terrorist attack, and those radical individuals were detached from communities, and therefore civic participation is a solution to prevent those individuals from exhibiting these forms of deviance. But, from a civic republican point of view, the question is not framed in terms of the outlier deviant, but in terms of the entire community's commitment to one another. How does the individual come to realize themselves within these communities? Rather than thinking about what barriers impede youth from being engaged civically, we should ask a different question, namely: what actual opportunities are we providing youth and disadvantaged populations – native born and immigrant, old, women, straight, gay – as they do their best to get on in life? For decades, neoliberal experts, politicians of both parties at both local and national levels, have provided what seem to be 'opportunities', but which are too often the mere absence of impediments; these are then cynically renamed as individuals' "choices". Everyone knows this is proverbial poppycock. And, every election henceforth will involve throwing the bums out until some minimum satisfaction is obtained by the public vis-à-vis the powers that be.

20. What is required is a redistribution of the civic functions across the national geography and across social groups – white British, immigrant, young, old, and so on. This will not happen automatically, and must be planned – reflexively, ethically and actively. Everyone should have a part to play in their local, national and the global communities. They should feel a part of their histories and know their histories – warts and all! But, in order for such participation to occur, those opportunities and a robust civic education must be available. In recovering the civic sociology tradition, in Britain, American and beyond, we intend to contribute to this integration process in a concerted, long-term and ethical way. We have only just begun this process of reconstruction, but we thank you for your time and consideration at this early stage of our project. Please do not hesitate to let us know if we can be of any further assistance.

Please direct any questions, comments or concerns to the contributing author:

Dr Eric Royal Lybeck

University of Exeter

Department of Sociology, Philosophy & Anthropology

John Malcomson – written evidence (CCE0017)

The problems raised in Question 4 represent the biggest barrier to political engagement. The “first-past-the-post” system means there is a very high number of “safe” seats, which means that those electors who do not support the party holding the seat are effectively disenfranchised; I have never lived in a constituency where my vote would have affected the outcome. This system also encourages a “winner takes all” approach by the party forming the government, which can ignore what may be the wishes of a majority of the electorate. A further problem is this gives the more extreme elements in a party disproportionately more power. Electors are forced to choose between two, often extreme, views, neither of which may represent their political views.

It has been claimed that the current system leads to a clear majority for one party, and this is represented as desirable. Neither is correct. As stated above, it allows one party to dictate policy which may well be against the wishes of the majority of the electorate, and this is fundamentally undemocratic. In addition the claim to provide a strong majority is not borne out by reality. Over the last 50 or so years there have been few occasions when there was a decent working majority for the party in power, notably only for Margaret Thatcher in the early 1980s and Tony Blair in 1997, but otherwise majorities have been small and often required careful management of backbench MPs and extremely fierce action by the government whips.

A further consequence of the current system is that, unless an elector’s views are supported by one of the main parties they are completely disenfranchised. This is illustrated by the current situation with regard to Brexit. 48% of the voters in the EU Referendum were opposed to leaving the EU, but neither of the main parties supports a remain position. When/if a final deal on leaving the EU is struck, unless a second referendum is offered, electors opposed to Brexit will have no say in the outcome.

Local Government has become almost pointless as more and more powers have been seized by Westminster. Any change in control in Local Authorities results in only very minor changes in policy. While we do have multi-member wards the electoral system again militates against a more diverse range of councillors, since the majority of voters choose candidates from the same party.

Another issue is that large, and multinational, businesses have now attained such power that they can have a major influence on government policy. This is clearly undemocratic.

In addition, Central Government has become synonymous with rule centred on benefiting London and the Southeast. The North seems to have no voice in central government, and Local Government has too little power to influence decisions that affect local areas.

A final point that creates a lack of respect for politicians is the fairly high number of recent successful legal challenges to decisions by ministers. This creates a feeling that politicians have no respect for the rule of law. A suspicion is that ministers are failing to consult with civil servants before they make decisions, and as a result they are not aware of the legal position. This just makes them look both arrogant and stupid.

All the above alienate electors, who feel disenfranchised and disempowered.

Proportional Representation is proposed as a panacea for the above problems. However it is important to recognise that PR can take many forms.

The system used in Israel, where there is just one constituency and parties put forward lists of candidates is not desirable. While the system makes it impossible to form a government without a coalition, which is not in itself undesirable, it usually requires the support of some very minor parties with extreme policies, and these parties makes exorbitant demands in exchange for support. This is no better than in Britain where the extremist wings of the governing party make demands for supporting their government. A further consequence of the Israeli system is that candidates who are considered undesirable by their party will be placed low on the party list and have little chance of being elected; this can result in a candidate leaving that party and forming one of their own. Israel's first Prime Minister David Ben Gurion did just that, twice, first leaving Mapai to form Rafi, and when Rafi merged with the Israel Labour Party he sat as an independent.

There is of course a variety of other ways of applying PR, one of which is the creation of multi-member seats.

The German system, while complex to administer, is relatively simple for voters, and clearly has the advantage of being much more representational of a wide range of views from the electorate.

The problem with changing the current system is that both the two largest parties have a vested interest in retaining the current system. It is difficult to see how any change can be effected. This is the problem that arose in Israel in 1965 when Ben Gurion was in favour of a change from the existing system, and which resulted in him forming Rafi.

On another issue, and despite being part of the geriatric generation, it seems quite clear to me that the voting age should be lowered to 16 at the very least; I would favour 14. This would introduce young people to the idea of voting in order to have an influence on their future. As a teenager I found it extremely frustrating to be unable to vote (at the time the voting age was 21).

To summarise

- The "first-past-the-post" system is undemocratic and should be changed to one which marginalises the extremists and allows for the wishes of the majority to take precedence of party dogma

- It should be recognised that the “first-past-the-post” system does not deliver the strong government with a clear majority claimed by its supporters, and that coalition government is more democratic and preferable
- A new form of electoral process should be introduced, one that makes all electors feel that their votes count, and that gives greater voice to smaller groups
- Powers seized by Westminster over the years should be returned to Local Authorities, and the powers of Local Authorities should be enhanced to allow for decision-making that is not subject to Westminster control
- Large companies, and especially multinational companies, should have power curbed to prevent them acting against the interests of electors
- The voting age to be lowered, at least down to 16

9 August 2017

Saskia Marsh – supplementary to oral evidence (CCE0260)

Further points around a suggested review of Prevent – drawing on research/evidence of ‘what works on countering violent extremism

A specific area of Prevent where there is room for review is the definition and application of the term ‘non-violent extremism’. The government has understandable anxieties concerning tackling non-violent extremism and this issue was acknowledged by most from whom the Commission heard from as being a legitimate concern.

But it is also clear that the issue of non-violent extremism will not be successfully dealt with unless there is greater trust and collaboration between Muslim communities and government agencies and a better appreciation of what exactly the government is trying to address.

As noted in my verbal evidence a review of Prevent could seek to more clearly define non-violent extremism; revisit the boundaries of who is included/excluded in this definition; and review the benefits/drawbacks of non-engagement with those labelled as non-violent extremists. This should draw on emerging evidence of ‘what works’ in countering violent extremism (CVE), to provide constructive suggestions on how Prevent could be refined and improved. Below is an initial overview of some of the available evidence and/or lessons learnt which such a review could draw upon:

- Groups classified as non-violent extremists have been shown, in some specific cases, to be effective in dissuading individuals from violent behaviour and moderating extreme views. This has been the case, for example, in Canadian approaches to tackling violent extremism where Salafist groups have been engaged to stop individuals progressing onto violent extremist behaviour.⁵³³
- Furthermore, the available research on countering violent extremism tends to show that top down approaches by governments, which have focused on a ‘battle of ideas’/ have sought to shape community values, have tended to be unsuccessful in preventing or

⁵³³ Note also that respected CVE experts have highlighted there is little evidence that ideological or religious ‘pull’ factors are the sole or key drivers of violent extremist behaviour See e.g. J.M. Berger, Making CVE Work: a focused approach based on process interruption, International Centre for Counter-Terrorism, May 2016; also James Khalil, Radical Beliefs and Violent Actions are not Synonymous: <http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1080/1057610X.2014.862902>. Similarly Jamie Bartlett and Carl Miller have shown that radicalisation does not necessarily lead to violence – it is possible for individuals to hold, express and consume extreme views, without transgressing to violence. Jamie Bartlett, Carl Miller, “The Edge of Violence: Towards telling the difference between violent and non-violent radicalisation” in Terrorism and Political violence, Vol 24, Issue 1, 2012 reducing extremist behaviour, and occasionally counterproductive.⁵³⁴ This too points to a need to revisit definitions of ‘non-violent extremism’ and ‘British values’ and perhaps just as importantly the process by which definitions are arrived at.

- Instead, community-level partnerships in the CVE space - whereby community organisations are involved in identifying, and diverting individuals from violent extremism - have been relatively effective. This has occurred where community relations have been invested in as an end in themselves, rather than simply for CVE purposes.⁵³⁵ Danish and Dutch models using community mentors working alongside community police officers are now being piloted in locations in Africa and the Middle East.
- Note also that the current definition of extremism in CONTEST⁵³⁶ potentially leaves the British government vulnerable to accusations of ‘double standards’, also vis a vis overseas counterparts (for instance, Saudi Arabia, a key ally, could be characterised as opposed to the fundamental value of democracy). A more nuanced official definition could be adopted, and some initial language on this is provided in a footnote⁵³⁷.
- The need for an approach based on two-way communication and trust is further strengthened when one considers the examples of where Prevent is working successfully. One such example is in Leicester, where an independent multi-faith organisation rooted in the local community holds responsibility for bringing together community members and statutory bodies to discuss cases of concern. This has enabled the community to take responsibility for tackling potential cases of extremism, in a manner that is in line with the legal framework but also understood and trusted by the local community itself.

⁵³⁴ See Peter Romaniuk, Does CVE Work? Lessons Learnt from the Global Effort to Counter Violent Extremism, Global Centre on Cooperative Security, September 2015 p24 -5. See also the review of Australia’s CVE programmes which found that initiatives to ‘build resilience’ in communities have not of themselves proven to be sufficient to stop all individuals heading down a pathway of radicalisation. Individuals within these communities were still being drawn towards extremist ideologies, the study found. Australian Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet ‘Review of Australia’s Counter-Terrorism Machinery’: https://www.dpmc.gov.au/sites/default/files/publications/190215_CT_Review_0.pdf

⁵³⁵ See e.g. Romaniuk, P, (2015), Does CVE Work? Lessons Learned from the Global Effort to Counter Violent Extremism, Global Center on Cooperative Security, pp24-25. Available at: http://www.globalcenter.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/09/Does-CVE-Work_2015.pdf

⁵³⁶ CONTEST definition of extremism: ‘Extremism is the vocal or active opposition to our fundamental values, including democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and the mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs. We also regard calls for the death of members of our armed forces as extremist.’

⁵³⁷ A more nuanced definition of extremism could be: ‘Extremism is the possession of black and white worldviews, the inability to acknowledge the potential validity of different viewpoints, and the desire to impose, often by force, intimidation or coercion, the views one holds on others.’

Christopher Mattley – written evidence (CCE0024)

1. The question of citizenship and civic engagement revolves around an issue of representation. A huge element of citizenship is a sense of belonging, and without this, there is unlikely to be any civic engagement. Whether it is feeling a sense of belonging to a street, an area or a country, if you lack that feeling then you are unlikely to engage with it, care for it and do anything other than just get by. This means that those who feel disenfranchised will struggle to feel that sense of belonging and this comes to a secondary issue of visibility. Whether its rural communities, young BAME children or those who identify as LGBT+, if these communities cannot see themselves in the books they read, the TV they watch, the systems that they interact with then they are likely to feel marginalised.

We especially see young people claiming that they don't feel represented by those systems which they have to work with, whether that be government or civic society – this only leads to disillusionment with the society in which they find themselves, shamed by those around them and unable to break through the various glass ceilings that they feel encased by. Once marginalised this leads to upset, discord and potentially apathy, and once apathy has set in, that is incredibly hard to break. Therefore, citizenship and civic engagement are inherently bound to the idea of identity.

2. Unfortunately, we seem bound up with the obsession of formalising membership and citizenship. The fear of the stranger and foreigner has fuelled the Brexit debacle and this came from a need to find a neat solution to appease the disgruntled public over the issue of immigration. So we continue to searching for a piece of paper or a strategy to make it all better and make everyone “feel” British, as if by telling the public that its ok, those people you were worried about, well they are British now will somehow solve the issues. It has only led the upset public to demand a whitewash “get them all out” mentality, which is so upsetting to see in a nation that in inherently built on diversity.

It is sad to reflect back over the years and months and see that currently in the United Kingdom the only thing that seems to unite us all regardless of faith, race and identity is tragedy. Tragedy seems to be the only thing that brings us together, whether the outpouring of grief after terrorist atrocities, the public reaction to the London Riots or a charity drive. If you look over the past years, despite financial crashes and crises, the amount given to charities continues to rise. We give when there is cause to give to. However, uniting us is the UK is difficult; the only time in recent memory that brought the nation together without tragedy was the London Olympics in 2012. The summer when people smiled at each other on the Tube. There is not one single thing that can be done to strengthen belonging, a piece of paper will not help, and a test or ceremony will not solve it either. Moments of unity need to be created, where people can come together and simply be. These events need to be based around sharing, whether that is stories, food, or time, otherwise the only time we join together is to grieve or protest both of which are raw emotions that are not creative.

3. Huge leaps and bounds have been made through education; however, this is undermined by then telling children and young people that their views or voices are not worthy or important because they are too young. This means that we work hard through youth groups and schools to motivate and engage children in the political process, in citizenship and each other and then say but now you have to wait a few more years because you are not ready. Most schools foster a sense of community and togetherness, yet once we end this education process, we turn young people out into a world where the sole goal is to compete for jobs, wages and attention. Social media is instilling this sense of competition amongst young people, despite being framed as “groups” where people can share. They instead become platforms to shame.

It is only a handful of young people that leave schools, which act as centres of community that have belonging and choose to continue to give something back. This might be through a charity, campaigning or a sport but few have that sense of togetherness as they head into a world, which is designed to be insular. The result is that children feel disenfranchised, which again only leads to disengagement and therefore apathy. Lowering the voting age would go some way into capitalising on a sense of excitement at school about things political, perhaps this would in turn bring young voices into politics and let young people see themselves amongst those who purport to represent them.

4. The role of education is vital and it should be available at every stage of education. My personal view is that education has come a long way in this regard. Perhaps I am biased, but I feel that citizenship education in the school in which I work is excellent. I teach at a rural state comprehensive in Lincolnshire, William Farr School. Here citizenship, while being compulsory in our curriculum, is valued and curated by staff who are enthusiastic about its role in education. For example, the students at William Farr have, regardless of age, have been given the opportunity to vote in conjunction with the two most recent General Elections. Sixth Form students held Question Time debates, all students watched Party Political broadcasts and older students led hustings to present the three main political parties. This obviously pertains to the political element of citizenship, but students are encouraged to give back to their community through charitable works and events that promote cohesion. Subsequently I feel that citizenship should continue to be compulsory, however I would urge that schools are continually squeezed with regards to provision whether this be monetary or simply in terms of time. Elements like citizenship are the first to be marginalised or rushed as teachers clamber to change to new specifications as the government continually tinkers with the education system. It is only through dedicated members of staff at William Farr School that the citizenship element has become so strong, yet we have no dedicated time, staff, or department that is responsible for its teaching – we simply do not have the time.

8. I would like to think the British people are kind; I would like to think the British people are united by their differences, but there are too many recent examples that trouble this view. As a result, the only value that British people share, other than our love of the weather, is a stoic outlook on life. Whether born from our history or the constant battles with the atmosphere, British people carry on. It is interesting to have seen the rise and popularity of the “Carry On” poster campaigns from World War II. Entrenched on our little island we just get on and hence, when there have been recent threats to this nature from terrorist atrocities, the reaction has always been that we will carry on, we will show them, and we will do the exact opposite of what they want. This stubbornness is Britishness.

Yet, perhaps that is our deepest flaw, because when change is forced upon us – we resist. Look at the recently celebrations of the decriminalisation of homosexuality in 1967, where historically when first proposed there was outrage. Yet with a slow accretion of time, several tragedies and continued upset, shame and hatred placed upon the LGBT+ community (albeit diminishing) there has been a huge change in the views of the public. This took time and therefore anything forced upon the public as a change will be greeted with the same stoic nature. Strengthening the marginalised returns to the idea of visibility for if we do not see ourselves in society, we will continue to hide and lose our voices.

9. Again the answer to this question representation and visibility. I personally think that in a world of instant connections, social media and seeming availability we are the complete opposite, the vast majority of people are lonely. This is especially true of those communities who feel marginalised, not represented or forgotten. The rural feel left out and distant, as they are the last to receive adequate broadband connection, sexual health services and smart meters from their energy companies. The urban feel lost in the din of expansion and rising property prices, which forces them into difficult areas as gentrification, takes over the cities. BAME communities cluster and feel disenfranchised. Speaking myself as a gay man, despite being in a caring relationship, I feel lonely. I experienced an education and youth where I did not see anyone like myself. It was not talked about in schools thanks to Section 28, and it was only recently that I realised that this was only abolished a year after I completed my formal education. I grew up in a society where I was made to feel ashamed for who I was. The media reviled the LGBT community as perverted and as a result, I grew up with the feeling I was wrong. This left me behind and continues to leave many within the LGBT+ community behind, despite the progress that has occurred.

This lack of visibility and representation forces those who do not see themselves to go find themselves, often in places where the information is dark, extreme or what we have been told both others that we are. For instance, take a young gay child, who doesn't see themselves in the books they read, the lessons they are taught and then is told repeatedly that being LGBT is wrong and you'll die alone and ill. In the modern age, they will turn to the internet and if they search for support, they are likely to find extreme pornography and an image that being gay is about being promiscuous. The shame experienced and the lack of role models leads to a dangerous outlook. Take this exact example and change it to a question of faith, a young Muslim child who does not see themselves on TV, in the books they read and constantly hears through the media that Muslims are bad and terrorists. Some of those disenfranchised children will go and search for an antidote to this message of shame that allows them to feel valued and wanted.

10. If I were to quote again an example from the school, at which I work. I helped to create a support group for students who identify as LGBT+. Formed with the help of students, named and run by them, the LGBT+ Space (@WFS_LGBTSpace – on Twitter) offers a space for them to just be. To converse, see one another and feel valued. The school in which I work is very accepting and tolerant of differences and when it was first proposed by a student the initial answer was that we didn't need a group, children were openly LGBT. Yet, with perseverance, the group has flourished. It is not an advocacy group, but simply somewhere for young children to have a voice and see themselves. Since its inception the group has run assemblies, offered support to other local schools in creating their own Spaces, we have worked with the local NHS Partnership Trust to improve their services for LGBT+ students and are heavily involved with the Stonewall Charity. The students offer email support to those students who do not feel ready to come to a public group and offer this email support to others across the county.

My role in facilitating this group has led to myself being able to be open about my sexual orientation at work after teaching in the School for 10 years and feeling that I could not because I would be risking my career. The realisation that my invisibility was causing young children to continue to have no representation in their formal education and so the greater good was the imperative. I was raised in an education system where my identity was missing. The society in which I grew told me at every turn that I was abhorrent and would be cast out and therefore it is my duty to make sure, that in my little corner, my school, that this group of identities is represented. I need to make them see that they are wanted and need, to catalyse them to help others, to be proud and get out there because ultimately they make society.

18 August 2017

The Mayor of London, Greater London Authority – written evidence (CCE0244)

Introduction to the GLA

The GLA delivers the work of the Mayor of London. The Mayor provides city-wide leadership on transport, policing and fire services through to the economy and the environment. The Mayor creates the plans and policies, scrutinised by the Assembly, that improve the lives of Londoners and changes the capital for the better. The Mayor also champions the interests of London and Londoners all around the world.

Background

London is one of the world's most diverse cities, but improving social integration is still one of our biggest challenges. London's population is rapidly growing and changing – around 50 per cent of people moving to London are from abroad, with the remaining 50 per cent from other UK regions. The Mayor has already made the case for the rights of EU citizens to be protected after Brexit, and an integral part of these plans is to support the take up of British citizenship by Londoners from the EU and abroad.

Whilst 640,000 Londoners became British citizens in the past 11 years, 54 per cent of Londoners born abroad do not hold a British passport. There are also thousands of young Londoners who have grown up in the capital but cannot access higher education or work because they have irregular migration status.

In April 2017, the Mayor launched a ground-breaking new citizenship programme, the first of its kind in the UK, to help Londoners become more engaged in the life of the capital. The programme is a partnership with Trust for London and Unbound Philanthropy. It will tackle the main barriers preventing all Londoners from getting fully involved in their communities. It will also help new migrants find a path to citizenship, increase civic engagement, and celebrate diversity and shared identities across the capital.

To support the programme, experts from Migrants Organise, Citizens UK, Coram Children's Legal Centre and Just for Kids Law have been seconded to help shape the Mayor's plans for a truly socially integrated city. The target audience is not limited to those who have migrated to London – it is part of a much broader drive to get all Londoners more involved in their city, become active citizens and live interconnected lives.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship can be seen as a legal category, but also includes elements related to civic engagement and identity. Definitions of ‘citizenship’ include:

- a) Access to citizenship rights – an individual’s legal status as a citizen. This is a ‘thin’ definition as it focuses on legal status only. This definition is binary – you either are, or are not, a citizen. Legal citizenship in the 21st century still determines the life chances of people across the world. The power of inclusion and exclusion from citizenship is brought into ever greater focus by the movement of people globally in the 21st century.
- b) Active participation in society – an individual’s engagement in the civic spaces, places or organisations near them. This is often referred to as ‘active citizenship’. Participation in civic and civil society is not limited by legal status – as someone without legal status can participate to some extent. Some aspects may be limited by status (the right to vote in certain elections) whereas others are not (the right to protest). Active citizenship can be typologised as representative, challenging, charitable or associational.
- c) Belonging – an individual’s identity as a member of that society or group.

A ‘thick’ definition of citizenship includes all three elements. These definitions are linked and inter-related, but are not dependent on each other. In other words, an individual’s ability to access citizenship rights may affect their participation in society, but even if they are not legally a citizen they can still participate. Similarly, even if an individual has full rights as a citizen under the law, if they do not feel that they belong they may not participate actively in society.

National legal citizenship may be part of identity, alongside many other aspects. Global citizenship is a part of people’s lived experience through technology and access to travel, especially in cosmopolitan cities such as London, and this can inform their identity. National citizenship still has a monopoly in the determination of legal rights, but it is only one aspect of identity. Political change such as Brexit has an impact on how people understand their identity and national boundaries. The GLA’s social integration team is currently exploring the subject of a London identity, and how supporting this could bring different groups together.

Citizenship and civic engagement are important for social integration. Social integration is a priority for the Mayor that cuts across all policy areas. Social integration is about everybody playing a full part in the life of London. If we are to achieve it, we need to tackle inequality and overcome the barriers that stop some Londoners from benefitting and contributing to all that the city has to offer.

The GLA's framework for social integration encompasses participation, relationships and equalities. In our approach to social integration, access to citizenship rights is a core condition which enables social integration to take place. If people are not legally recognised as citizens, this can become a structural barrier and will impact on their participation and their relationships. Other core conditions might include proficiency in English and mental and physical health, as well as many others.

Involvement with civil society organisations helps citizens connect with local issues and gives them the chance to help solve them. This process creates a connection with local organisations and a sense of belonging. Developing roots in a local area helps to improve health and wellbeing and this is essential if an individual has challenging aspects in their life or is new to an area. As such, civil society organisations should be supported and recognised for the value they play in creating links between places and people and a sense of identity.

Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Since 2004, there has been a steady decline of attendees at citizenship ceremonies following government changes to routes to citizenship. Citizenship ceremonies offer a rare moment for those who have journeyed – often for many years and at great financial expense – to becoming a citizen.

Citizenship ceremonies take place with varying quality and impact on those taking part. Many new citizens find the experience joyful, whilst others find it patronising. The feeling of being patronised can come from the lack of acknowledgement for those who already see Britain as their home and are active citizens. People's identity as citizens may also be weakened if their route to citizenship has been long and expensive. For example, long-term residents, including children and young people who wish to get to citizenship currently pay £993 (plus £500 immigration health surcharge) four times over a ten-year period, before applying for indefinite leave to remain costing £2,297, and thereafter the cost of citizenship is £1,282. This totals £9,551 per person for the route to citizenship on top of any legal fees.

The 'Citizenship & Integration Initiative' at the GLA plans to develop best practice guidance to ensure that community/business-led citizenship ceremonies bring Londoners together to promote social integration. Ceremonies might be made more high-profile, addressing the lack of political engagement by inviting political representatives to meet new citizens, or encouraging greater civic engagement by including information about volunteering or registering to vote.

Most people in Britain would prefer migrants to stay, settle and become citizens, but few members of the public are aware that the citizenship ceremony is mandatory and that new citizens must swear an oath of allegiance to the Queen. Citizenship ceremonies in other countries are much more high-profile, and there is an opportunity to improve ceremonies both for new citizens and wider society.

- On Australia Day, each year thousands of people in towns and cities across the nation make the pledge of commitment to Australia and become Australian citizens. Australia Day gives all citizens, new or old, the opportunity to openly reflect on what it means to be an Australian citizen and celebrate the rights and the values they all share.⁵³⁸
- Canada has handed some of the ownership of citizenship events to the community. Many community groups have a strong interest in Canadian citizenship. Groups assist newcomers in completing their applications and preparing them for their citizenship test. For many years Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada (IRCC) has worked with community groups to support their involvement in the hosting of citizenship ceremonies.⁵³⁹ They have a framework for community groups that they can use to host citizenship ceremonies which allows them to still deliver what is essential and important but also take ownership in a real and meaningful way.

Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Civic engagement and taking part in the life of a city should be encouraged and made easy. For example, there could be incentives for volunteering as a ‘nudge’ towards active citizenship. However, enforcing civic engagement may not be the best approach. The role of authorities is to provide the conditions in which people are supported and encouraged to engage as active citizens. Civic engagement should be made easier, but not enforced. Team London, the Mayor’s volunteering team, is developing a programme to incentivise volunteering and social action by rewarding those who take part. The aim is to make volunteering and social action part of everyday life for all Londoners.

⁵³⁸ <https://www.australianaffirmation.com.au/australia-day/>

⁵³⁹ <http://www.cic.gc.ca/english/celebrate/ceremony.asp>

There are concerns about making access to citizenship contingent on civic engagement. ‘Earned citizenship’ was considered in Lord Goldsmith’s citizenship review, in the Government’s ‘The Path to Citizenship’ consultation, during the passage of the Borders, Citizenship and Immigration Act 2009, and in the Government’s ‘Earning the right to stay: A new points test for citizenship’ consultation. At that time, concerns were raised about creating additional requirements for citizenship beyond those that are well established: obeying the law, paying taxes and speaking English (since 1914), and knowledge of ‘life in the UK’ (since 2002). Concerns about ‘earned citizenship’ included the bureaucracy needed to police the requirement, the possibility of exploitation, potential prejudice against those for whom ‘active citizenship’ and volunteering is harder, possible shortage of volunteering opportunities and the burden on the voluntary sector. The naturalisation provisions of the 2009 Act were not commenced.

There are also concerns about placing formal responsibilities or duties on citizens to engage. If someone is not able to engage it may well be due to lack of meaningful opportunities or barriers that are not within their control. For example, those on low incomes, with poor mental health, carers, disabled people, the elderly and others may face significant barriers. Other barriers associated with London include cost of travel, cost of accommodation and rapid turnover of neighbourhoods.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education plays a fundamental role in encouraging good citizenship. London has an enormous range of cultures and ethnicities. Governing such a diverse city is a real challenge, but finding ways for young Londoners to have a voice and work with decision makers is essential for London to continue to be a hive of democratic engagement and purpose.

The London Curriculum

The London Curriculum offers teaching resources supporting most subjects on the national curriculum, professional development for teachers and events for children. Resources are inspired by the city’s diverse culture, heritage, science and technology, built environment, green spaces and rivers. Since its launch in 2014, 80 percent of London’s secondary schools have registered. In 2016 the scheme was offered to younger pupils and nearly 350 primary schools now take part.

Currently, a ‘Citizenship’ module for secondary schools is being developed by the GLA in partnership with Association of Citizenship Teachers (ACT). This topic will help teachers inspire young people to consider their identity as Londoners, consider what is important to them, and to be ambitious about how they can reach those who govern the city.

Citizenship is a fluid subject and schools teach it in different ways. Citizenship education is the name of a subject in the national curriculum. It provides for legal, political literacy and some aspects of financial understanding. Some confuse the term Citizenship with gaining the legal status as a British citizen. Whilst the subject does indeed explore matters of identity, diversity and belonging, it is not related to the Home Office’s British Citizenship Test. Most schools will have pupils whose status in the UK may be unclear. Sensitivity is required as some pupils will feel vulnerable in discussions about notions of being a citizen.

The London Curriculum does not use the term citizen which reduces potential confusion about the meaning of this term and its legal connotations. The programme talks about young Londoners and a London identity. The notion of London’s identity is always evolving and the programme encourages discussion around this idea to encourage young people to consider how and why they should engage with those who govern the city.

Team London Young Ambassadors

Team London is the Mayor of London’s volunteering programme for schools. The young volunteers who participate in the programme develop social action projects through volunteering. These projects address issues they are passionate about including sexuality, discrimination, mental health, homelessness, the environment and social integration. All projects are designed and led by the young participants.

Since 2013, the programme has been offered for free to primary and secondary state schools and sixth forms in London. Participation is not compulsory; however, the programme has worked with 2,100 schools including special educational needs and disability schools (SEND) and pupil referral units (PRU) and reached over 400,000 young Londoners.

Below are some examples of how the programme has impacted young people as active citizens:

- 79% of Young Ambassadors are more capable of developing a plan of action to address social justice issues
- 87% of Young Ambassadors demonstrate more consideration of local and global issues in their everyday life choices

In 2016, the programme won the Department of Education’s Character Award for Greater London. The award recognised the programme’s aim of developing traits including confidence, perseverance and resilience in young people. These are traits that support academic attainment and enable young people to make a positive contribution to society.

HeadStart London

HeadStart London was created by Team London and youth charity The Challenge in 2014. It brings together industry leaders, charities and young people (aged 16-18 and still in full time education) to help bridge the gap between schools and work. The programme inspires young people to strengthen their communities through volunteering, whilst giving them the skills and experience to succeed at work. It involves:

- supporting young people to volunteer for a minimum of 16 hours
- offering employability skills and communications skills workshops
- a guaranteed interview for paid employment for all successful participants
- a job offer for work placements for successful candidates

Since 2014, HeadStart has worked with over 5,000 young people who have given 100,000 hours of volunteering to London. Young people have reported improved communication skills, confidence and preparation for the workplace, with almost 500 young people securing employment.

Initially, HeadStart London was developed as the next stage for those completing the National Citizen Service (NCS), however, due its huge success work is underway to make the programme available to all young people from 2018.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Active citizenship is a central component to creating socially integrated cities. This includes political participation, where young people can influence decisions that affect their lives. We welcome a greater political literacy element to voluntary citizenship programmes, where young people learn about how national and local decisions are made, how they can be challenged and how they might participate in positively changing their communities.

The Mayor wants to make it easier for Londoners of all backgrounds to take action in their schools and local communities. In addition to running the Team London Young Ambassadors programme, he intends to influence the development of the NCS in London.

The NCS has shown to positively impact on the lives of young people and engage them in active citizenship. However, there is a lack of evidence to demonstrate the long-term impact of NCS given the short length of time it has been running. The impact of the programme is also dependent on participation levels. Strong encouragement from schools for pupils to take part is recommended; however, programmes like this are not suitable for all children and should not be compulsory.

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

London is a super-diverse city with a rapidly growing and changing population and significant population turnover. In 2014, roughly 50% of the 400,000-people moving to London were from abroad with the remaining 50% moving from other regions within the UK. An estimated 500,000 young Londoners will turn 18 during this London mayoral term. This level of change presents both tremendous opportunities and unique challenges in terms of delivering active citizenship and integration in London.

Whilst 44,000 Londoners became British citizens in 2014, 54% of Londoners born abroad don't hold a British passport, and there are hundreds of thousands of Londoners with irregular migration status, including young Londoners who have spent most of their lives in London.

In response to this, the Mayor of London launched the new citizenship initiative referred to earlier in this response to help Londoners become more engaged in life in the capital. In partnership with Trust for London and Unbound Philanthropy, the programme is working with boroughs, communities, civil society and employers to improve social integration in the capital. It is helping Londoners to:

- play an active role in the city and decisions that affect them
- access their citizenship and residency rights.

In addition, for everyone to be active in society there are specific barriers to integration that need to be tackled such as lack of spoken English, inaccessible transport and built environment, visible representation in the public sector, travel costs, time poverty (role of employers giving voluntary hours) and precarious employment. Also, if civil society organisations are to engage more citizens and encourage more civic engagement then they need the expertise, confidence and resources to do this.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

A major barrier to active citizenship is uncertain immigration status. For example, for the three million EU citizens in the UK, insecurity about their position may act as a barrier to active citizenship and engagement. Likewise, for long-term residents of the UK, including children and young people who have grown up in the UK, very long and costly routes to citizenship can act as a barrier to full participation during the period before they gain full citizenship rights.

In addition, many traditional civic engagement roles such as governorship and trusteeship are seen as exclusive and exclusionary. This causes some groups in society to feel these roles are not suitable for them. As society and technology changes, new methods of civil engagement such as social media campaigning have the potential to create new ways for citizens to get involved. This type of citizenship may be invisible from a public sector perspective and very difficult to track and analyse.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Social integration is about active citizenship/participation, relationships and equality. Active citizenship/participation is about Londoners playing an active role in their communities and the decisions that affect them. This can be done through voting, political representation, volunteering, donating to charity, protesting and lobbying, being a member of associations or support groups and helping neighbours.

The GLA sees citizenship and civic engagement as critical to levels of social integration. The Mayor has made it clear that diversity of backgrounds does not naturally produce social integration even though London is a success story for diversity and integration.

“London is one of the world’s most diverse and vibrant cities, but improving social integration is still one of the biggest challenges we face. Building more cohesive communities across the capital is a top priority for me as Mayor because greater integration will lead to a safer, healthier and more prosperous London. I want every Londoner to be able to actively participate in the life of our great city.” Sadiq Khan

The Mayor has created a social integration team led by Matthew Ryder, Deputy Mayor for Social Integration, Social Mobility and Community Engagement. The team’s role is to help Londoners lead more inter-connected lives. The GLA is aware that age and stage of life has an impact on levels of integration and will be looking at inter-generational integration.

“Social integration is not just about bringing certain communities together. It is about every single Londoner feeling like they belong in this city, have a shared set of values with other Londoners, and a role to play in the everyday life of the capital.” Matthew Ryder, Deputy Mayor for Social Integration, Social Mobility and Community Engagement

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

English proficiency is vitally important for all citizens. Understanding English is key to building relationships and playing an active part in the community. It also impacts on an individual’s ability to get a job and access key services. According to the Office for National Statistics, approximately 800,000 people living in the UK at the time of the 2011 census – or 2% of the population – could not speak English well or at all. According to that census, seven of the top ten local authority areas with the highest proportion of three- to 15-year-olds not proficient in English were London boroughs. English proficiency amongst speakers of other languages varies from 99% (Afrikaans) to 37.5% (Gypsy/Traveller languages).

English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) courses are essential as they help London benefit from the skills that refugees and migrants bring with them. Being able to speak English helps people to get jobs, encourages integration, develops family capital and improves health and wellbeing. Supporting those furthest from the workplace and with the poorest skills is of paramount importance. There is ongoing demand for ESOL courses, but the recent funding changes have left many unable to access language learning opportunities.

In 2017, the GLA commissioned research on the availability of formal and informal English language learning opportunities in London. The research found that demand for ESOL outstrips supply. There is also little information about local classes, and learning opportunities often do not meet the needs of learners. The research highlights the need to:

- identify new investment in ESOL
- support new approaches to planning and commissioning ESOL
- increase attendance of formal and informal learning opportunities
- address practical barriers to accessing ESOL learning

The general picture for ESOL provision at city level is summarised below:

- There is a diverse base of established providers and a range of ESOL provision delivered across London. There is a greater concentration of ESOL provision in inner London boroughs, where there is also greater involvement of third sector organisations in ESOL delivery.
- Over half of providers, rising to two thirds of colleges, report that they struggle to meet the demand for ESOL. Oversubscription of provision is evident in inner and outer London boroughs. This affects refugees' access to ESOL learning, and providers' ability to respond to their needs and those of other learners. ESOL provision that is free of charge to learners is more likely to be found in inner London boroughs.
- Generally, demand reported by providers is predominantly at pre-entry and entry Levels, and this provision was frequently identified as being oversubscribed. This demand is mirrored in refugees' needs as reported by Syrian resettlement coordinators and refugee organisations, which suggests a need for capacity-building at this level.
- ESOL provision offers different levels, times, start dates, and sometimes offers more specialist content such as links to vocational learning or specific programmes for 16 to 19-year-olds. However, it is more likely to be 'general' in nature, with few examples of provision specifically aimed at refugees in 'mainstream' education. This means that some refugees' language learning needs, such as higher level language skills for specific professional purposes, or basic language relating to the specific local context and orientation needs, can be challenging to meet. Home Office guidance recommends that access to ESOL learning for refugees resettled under the Syrian Vulnerable Persons Relocation Scheme (SVPRS) should be provided within one month of arrival in the UK. This may present a challenge where access to provision is required at times outside of providers' planned start dates.
- The hours and intensity of ESOL provision average 5.5 hours per week, although there is some evidence that provision in inner London boroughs tends to offer a slightly higher number of learning hours per week. This was considered by Syrian 8 Resettlement coordinators and stakeholders to be insufficient to support refugees' urgent need to learn English upon resettlement. Home Office guidance recommends that refugees resettled under the SVPRS are offered a minimum of 8 hours per week.

- Whilst numerous partnership arrangements are in place to support ESOL delivery, there is a lack of information about the provision available in many local areas, which often makes signposting and referral to appropriate provision challenging. Furthermore, strategic planning to co-ordinate ESOL learning opportunities is largely absent. As well as affecting referrals to provision, this also results in missed opportunities, such as more joined-up working between formal and informal ESOL provision, and the development of new partnerships, for example by working with employers.

- https://www.london.gov.uk/sites/default/files/gla_esol_-_combined_report.pdf

A 2012 report into ESOL provision is available here:

- https://www.london.gov.uk/sites/default/files/english_language_for_all.pdf

In many other European countries (including in Denmark and Belgium), new arrivals are enrolled on integration programmes when they first arrive. These include intensive language learning.

- <http://citiesofmigration.ca/tag/Language-learning/>
- <http://citiesofmigration.ca/good-ideas-in-integration/learn/>

Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

a) The naturalisation process in general

A key feature of this is the very high cost of naturalisation (for adults) and registration (for children). Concerns have been raised by lawyers and civil society, including Amnesty and the Project for the Registration of Children as British Citizens, about this aspect of the process which excludes would-be citizens from their rights, including children with rights to citizenship.

- <http://www.legalvoice.org.uk/children-priced-rights/>
- https://prcbc.files.wordpress.com/2015/10/fees_briefing_revised_8_april_2017.pdf
- <http://www.migrationobservatory.ox.ac.uk/resources/briefings/naturalisation-as-a-british-citizen-concepts-and-trends/>.

Recent research from the University of Leicester into the UK citizenship process has explored some of the experiences of those going through the naturalisation process. The full report is due to be launched in September 2017. An interim report highlights the following observations:

- Policy flux: In November 2013, the citizenship test was made more difficult. Respondents have said that these policy changes generate feelings of insecurity and that they do not always know where to get accurate information. The research interviews aim to capture the ways in which this flux shapes experiences and perceptions, and to compare experiences of participants who have gone through the ‘old’ system with those who have experienced the post-November 2013 system.

- A never-ending process: The citizenship test is perceived as a process which has the potential to become endless. Interviewees underline that the process is very long and costly. They also stress a more general feeling about how they have to engage with public authorities throughout the process. The process is presented as comprising many successive steps, each of them constituting a specific ‘test’ in which they must ‘prove, to demonstrate, something’ to public authorities.

Inequalities are also evident for migrant women’s experiences when preparing for the test. With respect to preparation in particular, the study finds that migrant women who try to become citizens and acquire knowledge of life in the UK and English proficiency face a situation where there is little state support of the ‘journey to citizenship’. The test process must take place at the same time as the withdrawal of state support for ESOL courses. The effects on migrant women have been documented by third sector organisations and denounced by ESOL activists and experts.

For some migrant women, of different religions and nationalities, a combination of barriers effectively prevents them from being able to study and prepare for the citizenship test (which some participants were quite skeptical of to begin with, viewing it as a form of border control rather than a measure for integration). This was because:

- they did not have time, given domestic responsibilities
- the test and preparation materials were difficult and daunting, especially for those with little English
- the process was too expensive and competed with the cost of childcare (costs reported were over £1000 per adult, including the test, naturalisation fee, plus any preparation courses, solicitor fees etc.)
- they faced difficulty or were unable to access language training that is no longer freely provided and/or where there is no crèche facility and they are not able to afford childcare
- they are socially isolated as a result of:
 - racism (e.g. in the job market, the hospital, on the street, from neighbours)
 - not speaking English and lacking information about where to learn and how to get to access classes
 - cuts to funding of crèches and childcare

The demands of the test process such as time, money, energy and social capital can make existing inequalities worse and create new challenges.

- <http://www2.le.ac.uk/departments/sociology/research/uk-citizenship-process>
- <http://www2.le.ac.uk/departments/sociology/research/uk-citizenship-process/interim-report>

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

In April 2017, the Mayor launched London’s Citizenship and Integration Initiative to help Londoners become more engaged in life in the capital. The innovative programme, in partnership with Trust for London and Unbound Philanthropy, will work with boroughs, communities, civil society and employers to improve social integration in the capital. It will support all Londoners to:

- play an active role in the city and decisions that affect them
- access their citizenship and residency rights.

Other examples of initiatives are:

- The Olympics and legacy programme.
- Project for the Registration of Children as British Citizens, which aims to raise awareness of registration and the importance of citizenship, as well as to support and increase the number of children and young adults who register as British citizens.

Mayor’s Peer Outreach Workers

The Mayor’s Peer Outreach Workers (POW) is a group of young people who influence the Mayor's policies. These young Londoners are aged 15-25 years old and come from diverse backgrounds and life experiences. They are commissioned by the Mayor to engage, inspire and gather the opinions of other young people in the capital. Their work helps to shape the policies, strategies and services that directly affect young people. At any one time, the POWs can lead on up to 15 pan-London projects, which can include:

- piloting new approaches
- working with existing organisations to improve their engagement with young people
- evaluating programmes or services

The Mayor of London, Greater London Authority – written evidence (CCE0244)

They emphasise to decision-makers the importance of involving children and young people in policies and strategies. Their projects aim to tackle various issues that young Londoners face, which includes citizenship, and they have worked with refugee action groups to deliver sessions with young people.

The POWs have worked with refugee groups for several years now - promoting social action programmes and positive integration. They supported and helped facilitate a session with young people and CSP and discusses their status and integration.

Other examples of good initiatives can be found in faith groups. Churches, synagogues, mosques, temples and dioceses can be excellent examples of promoting community cohesion through activities such as cooking, gardening and music.

Matthew Ryder, Deputy Mayor for Social Integration, Social Mobility and Community Engagement – supplementary evidence (CCE0273)

Matthew Ryder, Deputy Mayor for Social Integration, Social Mobility and Community Engagement – supplementary evidence (CCE0273)

This briefing provides further information on the relationship between the number of application for citizenship in London versus elsewhere and the Greater London Authority's work on citizenship.

Applications for citizenship in London versus elsewhere

The number of annual citizenship applications has fallen since its peak in 2013, however the proportion of applications from EEA nationals has increased. While we do not yet have qualitative data as to why there has been a fall in applications, the fall has coincided an increase in fees

The evidence does not show any significant divergence between the proportion of applications to attend citizenship ceremonies in London compared to that in other regions of the country.

The Greater London Authority's (GLA) work on Citizenship

There are a number of strands to the GLA's work on Citizenship. Below is a summary of the most relevant projects to the Committee's inquiry:

- London Identities:

A qualitative research project, delivered in partnership with market research experts GfK and British Future, the independent thinktank that focusses on identity, integration and migration, to examine the concept of a shared London identity.

This research is due for completion by February 2018. We will be able to share interim findings with the Committee very shortly.

- Children with insecure status:

The latest data on the number of non-UK national children and young people in London, and specifically the number of children who are undocumented, are from GLA-commissioned research in 2009 based on data from 2007.

This research will seek to obtain an updated figure and will also cover uptake of different immigration routes by children and young people.

Due for completion by April 2018.

- Active Citizenship in Ceremonies:

This research will inform the design and delivery of six pilot citizenship ceremonies in collaboration with local authorities to test different interventions, including on volunteering and voter registration, and to establish best practice. Due for completion May 2018.

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

About Power to Change

Power to Change is an independent trust, established in 2015. Our funding is used to strengthen community businesses across England. We help local people come together to solve problems for their community, reviving local assets, protecting the services they rely on, and addressing local needs. We provide practical and financial support to them as they run businesses which help their whole community and recycle money back into the local area. In our first two years of operation, we invested almost £20m in over 300 community-run businesses, across a wide variety of economic sectors such as pubs, shops, community centres, transport, energy generation, and sports facilities.⁵⁴⁰

About community business

Community businesses are established and run by local people who want to make a difference in their area – active citizens seeking to give something back and to create opportunities for others. Unlike charity, private business or even social enterprise, community business brings together a unique combination of entrepreneurialism, social purpose and local community ownership. Communities are running rural bus services or community shops, developing community-led housing schemes, and delivering health and wellbeing services to deprived populations. When a community centre is run as a community business, it generates its own income from trading and provides services for everyone in the surrounding area. Community businesses often collaborate with other local institutions like schools or GP practices – like New Wortley Community Centre, where a community-run centre is working with the local GP surgery, which refers patients to the centre for counselling and other support. Community businesses are ideally placed to deliver support to local public services, be paid for their time and effort, and re-invest that income back into the local community. See Appendix A for a case study profile of a successful community pub.

⁵⁴⁰ Up to 31st December 2016, Power to Change awarded grants of £19.5 million. Our grants data is available online here <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/power-change-grants-2015-2016/>

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

Our research estimates that there are over 7,000 community businesses across England, with their numbers growing each year.⁵⁴¹ Overall, the community business sector grew by 5% in 2016, comparing very favourably to growth rates in both the charity and small business sectors (1% and 2.3% respectively).⁵⁴² These businesses are estimated to employ over 36,000 staff and engage nearly 200,000 volunteers, generating more than £1 billion of income each year on £2.1 billion of assets.

Introduction to our submission

We have interpreted the Committee's questions as being intended to help to frame the work of the Committee over its lifetime, and to aid the Committee to set its detailed agenda for the year ahead. We have not sought to answer all questions but instead focused on three where we have a contribution to make. The questions we have addressed are (with our emphasis in bold):

*Q6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

*Q7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

*Q9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Context

The Committee's call for evidence sets out a number of reasons why more needs to be done at this time to bring people together and promote engaged citizenship. In our view, the ongoing devolution policy agenda presents an opportunity to boost people's levels of belonging to and ownership of their local area and community. But there are hurdles to be overcome, before communities can really take advantage of these opportunities. In many places, slow economic growth, entrenched deprivation and inequality have conspired to leave communities feeling disempowered and unable to influence decisions that affect their lives. We discuss below how the devolution and localism policy agendas could go further to foster local democracy and local accountability.

⁵⁴¹ Hull et al (2016), The Community Business Market in 2016. London: Power to Change. Available here <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/the-community-business-market-2016/> and summary here <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/the-community-business-market-2016-report-summary/>

⁵⁴² Most recent available statistics, sourced from: NCVO Voluntary Sector Almanac 2015 and 2016, and Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy: Business Population Estimate 2014 and 2015.

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

The Committee is particularly interested in thinking about citizenship and civic engagement in a more vibrant, positive and integrated manner. The recent growth in community-run businesses is just such a positive force for engaging people in their local communities. Local people getting involved in the running of an enterprise offers, we believe, greater empowerment and better sustainability than the traditional model of charitable donations and grant-making. Community business sits between the private and charitable sectors, sharing values with social enterprise but having a stronger local civic engagement aspect. This new economic model is emerging in response to a number of trends and drivers: recent reductions in public spending, the opportunities presented by public service transformation initiatives, the growth in local authority asset transfers. People are responding to the need to do things differently, and, by doing so, they are becoming engaged.

Response to the Call for Evidence questions

Creating active citizens: Top-down initiatives to create more active citizens can be challenging, and a return on investment is not guaranteed, as the National Audit Office recently commented⁵⁴³. We believe that policy should focus on supporting and enabling where there are existing trends towards participation, boosting growing movements. As stated above, we see a growing movement of people establishing community businesses, that has links to the long-established cooperative movement but is also a novel response to modern social challenges. To date, our funding and support is attracting both newly-established groups and existing organisations (often traditional charities) that are considering converting their governance model and becoming more community-led and more entrepreneurial.

Growth potential: Our funding experience and research evidence to date indicate that there is strong potential for more active citizenship and engagement through involvement in local community businesses. We see considerable demand for investment into community businesses, both new and established. During 2015, our first year of operation, we received c1,500 applications, requesting in total c. £139m (£9 million was awarded). During 2016 and early 2017, 704 applications, requesting c. £104 million, have been made to our flagship Community Business Fund (and £10 million has been awarded).

Deeper engagement: Community ownership of businesses brings a large number of engaged local people into the sphere of the business, engaging them as citizens and users of the business. Many community businesses are raising capital through issuing community shares. At present, community-owned pubs have over 9,000 engaged shareholders, and for community-run shops the figure is 62,000.⁵⁴⁴ We believe the long-term market potential for community shares is substantial. Since 2009, almost 120,000 people have invested over £100 million to support 350 community businesses across the United Kingdom.

⁵⁴³ National Audit Office (2017), National Citizen Service: Report by the Comptroller and Auditor General. London: National Audit Office. Available at <https://www.nao.org.uk/report/national-citizen-service/>

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

Engaging a diverse population: Our own unpublished research shows that volunteering time towards the set-up or running of a local community business is attractive to a diverse range of people. People who said they wanted to get involved in a community business were more likely to be younger people, and people from minority ethnic communities.⁵⁴⁵

Sustaining engagement: Many community businesses are formed as a result of a burning local issue or need, often saving a cherished asset (such as Hastings Pier) or developing new services around an old asset (employment training for disabled adults at Burton Street Foundation). This brings people together in ‘campaign mode’ and energises them, forging a sense of community and getting new people engaged. The benefit of the community business model is that these campaigns are translated into going concerns, maintaining wide community engagement over the longer term. Community businesses are extremely resilient. Our research showed that in 2015 and 2016, alongside overall sector growth, there was no decline in any of the 15 sub-sectors we examined.⁵⁴⁶ During 2016, no co-operative pubs closed their doors, while CAMRA reported 29 privately-run pubs closing every week.⁵⁴⁷ Only 17 community shops have closed since 1992 – a 99% five-year survival rate, comparing favourably with the 45% five-year survival rate for UK small business.⁵⁴⁸

Drivers of growth. There are a number of drivers of growth in this sector that are supported by government policy and where there are policy levers available to drive up engagement. Changes to local government budgets and service provision are prompting local people to come together to replace and/or sustain valued services and amenities. Relatedly, local authorities are beginning to review their property portfolios and to identify surplus assets for disposal. Communities are sometimes energised to bid for these assets under powers bestowed by the 2011 Localism Act, often supported by heritage sector bodies where the asset is of historical importance.⁵⁴⁹ Our research shows there is a steady pipeline of asset transfers from local authorities to community groups across England, though more could be done to boost this trend and encourage authorities to work with communities to transfer

⁵⁴⁴ The Plunkett Foundation (2017) Community Shops 2017 and Co-operative Pubs 2017. Available at <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/community-shops-2017/> and <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/co-operative-pubs-better-form-business-2017/>

⁵⁴⁵ Unpublished market research conducted in 2016 for Power to Change by Britain Thinks.

⁵⁴⁶ Hull et al (2016).

⁵⁴⁷ Plunkett Foundation (2017) above, and CAMRA (2017). Available here http://www.camra.org.uk/home/-/asset_publisher/UzG2SEmQMtPf/content/new-pub-closure-statistics-revealed

⁵⁴⁸ Royal and Sun Alliance and Centre for Economic & Business Research (2014) Growing Pains. Available at <https://www.rsabroker.com/system/files/SME%20Growing%20Pains%20White%20paper.pdf>

⁵⁴⁹ For an example of asset transfer to community business, see: Alt Valley Community Trust (case study) available at <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/alt-valley-community-trust-case-study/>

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

assets, rather than sell to private sector bidders.⁵⁵⁰ The 2012 Public Services (Social Value) Act complements this legislation, requiring service commissioners to consider social value during the procurement process. The aim of this legislation was to level the playing field for organisations from the voluntary, community and social enterprise sector who are bidding for service contracts.

How Government and Parliament can support growth: Specifically, we call for central government to implement the recommendations of the Communities and Local Government Select Committee to boost the impact of the Localism Act.⁵⁵¹ Chief among these was the recommendation to extend the moratorium on the sale of a designated ‘asset of community value’ from six to nine months, alongside a number of other recommendations to improve take-up and impact. Central government can also take further steps to boost the impact of the Social Value Act. Our research has shown that this legislation has not, to date, been a strong driver for growth in the numbers of community businesses, but it is felt to have potential, if strengthened.⁵⁵² We have called for a lowering of the financial threshold above which the law applies, and a widening of the legislation beyond services to include other public procurement.⁵⁵³ There appears to be broad consensus that this legislation has been a positive force and should go even further – the House of Lords Select Committee on Charities being the most recent publication to reinforce this message.⁵⁵⁴

How local authorities can support growth: There is also a significant role for devolved and local government in supporting local people to become more engaged and do things for themselves. Legislative or guidance changes to support asset transfer are desirable, but much more important is local government’s appetite for change, for new relationships with local communities and for shared approaches to service delivery.⁵⁵⁵ Similarly, there is a role for local authorities in their approach to public procurement. The Social Value Act and other moves towards more socially-minded commissioning mean that local authorities or health services can actively engage local citizens in the delivery of services, by working with

⁵⁵⁰ Gilbert, A (2016) A Common Interest: the role of asset transfer in developing the community business market. London: Power to Change. Available at <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/common-interest-role-asset-transfer-developing-community-business-market-report-summary/>

⁵⁵¹ House of Commons Communities and Local Government Committee (2015), Community Rights. London: House of Commons. Available at <https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201415/cmselect/cmcomloc/262/262.pdf>

⁵⁵² Jones, N. and Yeo, A. (2017) Community Business and the Social Value Act. Available at <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/research/community-business-social-value-act/>

⁵⁵³ Power to Change (2017), Community Business and the Public Services (Social Value) Act. Available at <http://www.powertochange.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/08/SVA-policy-recommendations.pdf>

⁵⁵⁴ House of Lords Select Committee on Charities (2017), Stronger charities for a stronger society. London: House of Lords. Available at <https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/ld201617/ldselect/ldchar/133/133.pdf>

⁵⁵⁵ See, for example, Quirk, Barry (2007) Making assets work: The Quirk Review of community management and ownership of public assets. Available at <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20120920020552/http://www.communities.gov.uk/publications/communities/makingassetswork>

Ailbhe McNabola, Head of Research and Policy, Power to Change – written evidence (CCE0048)

organisations that involve local volunteers, or that are run by local communities. Where direct commissioning is not feasible, authorities can encourage the inclusion of such organisations in their supply chains. More can be done to encourage all councils to use their procurement power to engage their citizens and improve their localities, following in the footsteps of some of the leading authorities – such as Kent County Council, Oxfordshire County Council, Manchester City Council, to name but a few.⁵⁵⁶

Conclusion

In this submission, we have set out our experience of funding and supporting community-owned and community-managed enterprises across a wide range of economic sectors. We have shown that this is a growing movement with high growth potential and promising longevity. We believe that this offers a different route for people to become engaged citizens, volunteering locally in support of an enterprise that delivers economic and social benefit to its local community. Policymakers should widen their concept of volunteering and citizen engagement to consider this form alongside more traditional charity and cultural volunteering, for the sustained engagement and the positive social impacts it delivers. We would be delighted to share further evidence with the Committee if requested, or to discuss any of the points made in this submission.

1 September 2017

⁵⁵⁶ These and further examples of ‘embracer’ councils can be found in Social Enterprise UK’s 2017 research: Procuring for Good. Available at <https://www.socialenterprise.org.uk/procuring-for-good>

MEND – written evidence (CCE0185)

Muslim Engagement and Development

1.0 Introduction and Methodology

1.1 MEND is a not-for-profit company that seeks to empower and encourage British Muslims within local communities to be more actively involved in British media and politics. For too long, British Muslims have remained on the margins of public and political debate about their religion and place in modern Britain and the level of Muslim participation in media and politics remains woefully low. As such, MEND seeks to enable British Muslims to engage more effectively with political and media institutions and play a greater role in British politics and society by instilling confidence, competence and awareness within them. Enhancing mainstream participation of communities that are under-represented and vulnerable is an important step towards deepening and strengthening our democracy.

1.2 This submission was composed through the use of focus groups conducted with Muslim women and men in London, as well as through observations made through previous MEND research projects and engagements with Muslim communities across the country.

1.3 Having explored the questions posed by the committee, this submission concludes that the greatest challenge to engendering a sense of citizenship and belonging for minority communities is the current atmosphere of hatred and mistrust that has escalated over recent years. In a climate lacking in respect, stigmatised communities do not feel valued by society and thus individuals may become vulnerable to exclusion from wider society and potentially insecure in their civic identities.

1.4 In addressing the existing toxic atmosphere, it is imperative that there is immediate action taken to tackle the impacts of both unfair media coverage and the impacts of the far-right, through strengthening existing hate crime legislation and through better media regulation on a Leveson compliant basis. This atmosphere should also be challenged through the development of teaching materials to educate young people on Islamophobia, racism, and antisemitism; and through greater emphasis on PSRE/PSHE in schools in order to prepare young people for life in a diverse society.

1.5 Secondly, in successfully fostering a shared national identity, we need to focus on creating a shared national narrative. This can be achieved through greater teaching regarding a shared history, contributions of minority communities and shared values of respect, as well as through greater visibility of positive representations of BME individuals in broadcasting.

1.6 Meanwhile, greater civic and political engagement can be achieved through better teaching of politics at a younger age through the education system, and through lowering the voting age. Such engagement will naturally lead to a greater sense of inclusion and belonging, thus furthering the solidarity of citizenship.

1.7 Finally, the government's stance towards dealing only with certain representative bodies is being interpreted within Muslim communities as patronising and insincere. In engaging with organisations which have no grassroots presence and which are often viewed with deep suspicion by British Muslims, the government is failing to involve communities in decisions regarding their own futures – thus effectively excluding them from the political process.

2.0 What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

2.1 Within the focus groups, the core of citizenship was described to be identity and belonging. However, there is a sense of frustration throughout Muslim communities, due to the way in which terms such as “Britishness” and “British values” have been used almost obsessively through our political and media discourses as a mechanism for branding minority groups generally, and Muslims specifically, as disloyal and outside of what it means to be British.

2.2 Concerning Muslim communities specifically, political attempts to increase patriotism by emphasising “British values” have been used to construct ideas of Britishness as something directly oppositional to what it means to be Muslim. Such statements falsely advertise to wider society that Muslims are making a conscious decision to reject British values and incorrectly implies that they are unwilling to engage in dialogue. This myth continues to be perpetuated, despite evidence showing that British Muslims are as patriotic, if not more patriotic, than other social and religious groups. Furthermore, considering the divisive ways in which “Britishness” may be used, this usage has created a perception that Muslims – having been branded as disloyal by certain segments of society – are thus undeserving of the entitlements embodied within citizenship. As such, despite remaining ill-defined at best, these terms and other similarly stigmatising discourses have been used divisively to create barriers between Muslim communities and wider society, and serve to make some British Muslims feel excluded and insecure in their own identities.

2.3 Stemming from this, participants within the focus groups highlighted a need to promote an understanding of “Britishness” that is inclusive of a multitude of identities. As many respondents articulated, there is no conflict between citizenship and identity. Rather, for all people (regardless of religion, ethnic background, gender or socio-economic status), citizenship is an innate part of identity – identities which are naturally multifaceted and not necessarily in conflict.

2.4 However, from a logistical standpoint, citizenship is a guarantee of certain rights and entitlements. In this light, many observed a generational difference in perspectives to citizenship. It was noted that immigrants or asylum seekers may understandably be interested in citizenship for practical reasons, such as employment, human rights, or educational opportunities. Consequently, first generation individuals may feel a more explicit sense of citizenship, whereas for individuals born and raised in Britain, this sense is more implicit and internalised – a taken for granted aspect of their identities.

2.5 Civic engagement, as understood within the focus groups, was deemed to be engagement with society outside of paid employment, such as through social organisations, political parties, charity work, and community projects. Ultimately, it is about being a social actor within the local community and within wider society.

3.0 Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

3.1 Membership and belonging is built upon inclusiveness. As such strengthening individual affiliations to a common British identity is dependent upon the acceptance of and respect for differences. Indeed, the history of Britain is characterised by the British Empire, and is thus a history of difference. Through colonialism and migration from former colonies, British identity is not homogenous – nor should it be expected to be.

3.2 An atmosphere of mutual respect is an expectation of a liberal society. Indeed, an atmosphere wherein individuals feel valued and respected is the only one in which a sense of belonging may be fostered and maintained. Consequently, preserving minority rights as enshrined within the Human Rights Act should be at the forefront of any government strategy aimed at respecting diversity.

3.3 The general feeling emerging from the focus groups is that citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process would not have a great deal of impact. This is due to the sense that they create an in-organic and forced identity construction. Instead, what is needed is a better teaching and understanding of a joint history. For example, greater focus should be given to teaching about the contributions made by minority communities in building Britain today. During the Second World War, over 2.5 million men and women from the Indian sub-continent formed the largest volunteer force ever seen in history and fought on behalf of Britain. Yet, the general public's knowledge of such contributions and shared history remains minimal at best.

3.4 In terms of pride in being or becoming British, this is definitely something that participants within the focus groups believe should be encouraged. However, particular emphasis was placed upon certain aspects of being British; in particular, tolerance, respect, good manners, understanding and empathy – in other words, encouraging attributes of a good social actor.

4.0 Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

4.1 A right is given to the individual citizen through laws that protect individuals for the common good. A responsibility is the individual's interpretation of those rights. As such, focus group participants were very clear that rights should have the force of law, while responsibilities are reciprocal duties. Beyond compliance with the laws of the land, there should not be any enforcement of responsibilities for several reasons. Firstly, this would involve defining what the exact responsibilities are. Amongst Muslim communities there is considerable unease at this prospect, due to the potentially dangerous precedent set for promoting narratives resulting in non-inclusiveness. Secondly, there is a problem of monitoring and enforcing such responsibilities. Considering already existing community tensions, advertising the enforcement of thus far ill-defined responsibilities carries the potential for exacerbating these tensions and resulting in vigilantism and violence against already vulnerable and stigmatised communities.

5.0 Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

5.1 Within the focus groups, there was a general consensus that the current laws do facilitate active participation through the rights to association and membership and the right to lobby and interact with the political sphere.

5.2 However, although the current laws facilitate active political participation, it must be recognised that discriminatory aspects of some counter-terrorism legislation in particular have fostered a sense of distrust in the political establishment amongst parts of the Muslim community, and has thus acted as a barrier to fuller active political engagement.

5.3 Within the focus groups, there was also a call for greater transparency over funding in order to facilitate trust of this country's political representation. Furthermore, while the voting registration process is felt to be effective, there is a need to recalibrate the election process through the implementation of proportional representation, in order to promote trust within the political system.

5.4 Lowering the voting age would also be instrumental in encouraging active civic engagement from a young age. In turn, a greater level of civic engagement fosters a sense of inclusion and personal social value, thereby promoting a heightened feeling of national belonging.

6.0 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

6.1 As discussed previously (see 3.3), specific citizenship classes are unnecessary within education. However, other methods of encouraging good citizenship need to be implemented throughout the education system. For example, through developing teaching materials to educate young people on Islamophobia, racism, and antisemitism, and through prioritising PSRE and PSHE within the national curriculum, we are able to better prepare young people for life in a pluralist and diverse society. A second area for potentially engendering greater citizenship, is through better political education in order to teach young people the importance and mechanisms of civic and political engagement, their place in society, and how to access their rights as engaged citizens (also see 5.4).

7.0 How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1 At present, there are barriers to civic engagement created through a lack of trust between individuals (of all religious, ethnic, and socio-economic backgrounds) and their political representatives. This situation needs to be challenged through transparency and through engaging with all communities and community representatives honestly. Indeed, a recent Citizens UK report highlighted the need for the government to interact with a wider representative range of Muslim organisations. Thus far, the effects of the government's stance towards dealing only with certain representative bodies has been interpreted within communities as patronising and insincere.

7.2 Since 2010, successive governments have effectively boycotted mainstream Muslim organisations. Whilst the government has refused to engage with the Muslim Council of Britain (MCB), the Federation of Student Islamic Societies (FOSIS) or MEND (Muslim Engagement and Development), it has chosen to associate with organisations created by government agencies such as the Research, Information and Communications Unit (RICU) which have no grassroots presence and are often viewed with deep suspicion by British Muslims. This is particularly surprising considering that MCB have more affiliates than any other Muslim organisation in the UK and therefore the largest mandate to represent British Muslims; over 90 percent of Islamic societies are affiliated with FOSIS; and that MEND has the largest national grassroots Muslim presence in the UK.

8.0 What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

8.1 The basic values that all British citizens should support are the principle of universal humanity; respect, understanding, empathy, and good manners to name but a few. However, as discussed throughout this report (see 1.1, 2.1, 2.2), the toxic atmosphere created by hatred and division is threatening these values which all British citizens should be fighting to uphold. This threat is specifically coming from far-right politicians, journalists and commentators; and sensationalist, misleading and exploitative media reporting.

8.2 Once again, some of the impacts of these threats can be mitigated through strengthening existing hate crime legislation; through working with social media companies to protect free speech while developing an efficient strategy to tackle hate speech online; through considering primary legislation to deal with social media offences and hate speech online; through better PSRE and PSHE education; and through the development of teaching materials to educate young people on Islamophobia, racism, and antisemitism (see 1.4 and 6.1).

8.3 A further mechanism to prevent the erosion of these common values is to initiate media reform and the full implementation of the Royal Charter on a Leveson compliant regulator. The overwhelmingly negative portrayal of Muslims within the media is detrimental to any integration strategy based on creating and maintaining common-ground and a sense of collective British identity. Furthermore, such negative misrepresentations are incredibly harmful to social cohesion strategies, as irresponsible and sensationalist reporting works to propagate stereotypes and further fuel an atmosphere of hatred. This is particularly so considering the tendency within some parts of the media to promote an “us vs them” dichotomy in reporting stories about Muslims. This is clearly a mechanism for stoking tensions and division, and excludes Muslims from the perceived national identity of “us”. In tackling this alarming trend, the current system of press regulation by IPSO is seen as weak and ineffective by many minority groups, including Muslims. As such Leveson compliant media reform serves to protect vulnerable communities from the scapegoating and stigmatisation that has characterised media over recent times - scapegoating and stigmatisation which can only damage individuals’ sense of belonging to a national community.

8.4 This media reform should also be further supported by industry initiatives to promote positive, diverse representations of Muslims and minorities within the mainstream media and broadcasting. It is imperative that minority communities are included within the national narrative in order to facilitate and maintain a sense of belonging and national membership.

As Riz Ahmed, warned during Channel 4's annual diversity lecture at the House of Commons in March 2017, the lack of diverse voices and stories displayed in broadcasting led those from minority backgrounds to "switch off and retreat to fringe narratives, to bubbles online and sometimes even off to Syria... If we fail to represent, we are in danger of losing people to extremism... In the mind of the Isis recruit, he's the next James Bond, right? Have you seen some of those Isis propaganda videos? They are cut like action movies. Where is the counter-narrative? Where are we telling these kids they can be heroes in our stories, that they are valued?"⁵⁵⁷

9.0 Recommendations

9.1 Having surveyed the questions posed by the House of Lords' Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement, this MEND report offers a series of recommendations to further strengthen citizenship and civic engagement within Muslim communities. However, while these recommendations are specifically relevant to British Muslims, many of these conclusions are also relevant for minority communities and the wider British public generally.

9.2 In terms of promoting and fostering a greater sense of national belonging and citizenship amongst Muslim communities, perhaps the greatest challenge is posed by the atmosphere of hatred that is fuelled by far-right politicians, journalists and commentators, as well as sensationalist, misleading and exploitative media reporting. Consequently, the immediate need is to tackle the impacts of both unfair media coverage and the impacts of the far-right through strengthened legislation, and through greater encouragement of universal human values of respect and understanding.

9.3 Furthermore, we need to focus on creating a shared national narrative. This can be achieved through greater teaching regarding a shared history, contributions of minority communities and shared values of respect, as well as through greater visibility of positive representations of BME individuals in broadcasting.

9.4 Greater civic and political engagement can be achieved through better teaching of politics at a younger age through the education system, and through lowering the voting age. Such engagement will naturally lead to a greater sense of inclusion and belonging, thus furthering the solidarity of citizenship.

9.5 MEND maintains that, in light of present challenges, the government also needs to:

- Commit to proactively engage with a broad and representative spectrum of the British Muslim community (See 1.7, 7.1 and 7.2)
- Commit to a review of the 2006 Racial and Religious Hatred Act as advised by the Law Commission's "Hate crime: the case for extending the existing offences" report and introduce legislation to extend legal protection to cover religion, homophobia and disability hate crime (See 1.4 and 8.2).
- Commit to (a) working with social media companies to protect free speech while developing an efficient strategy to tackle hate speech online (b) consider primary legislation to deal with social media offences and hate speech online (See 1.4 and 8.2).

⁵⁵⁷ Hannah Ellis-Petersen, "Riz Ahmed warns lack of diversity on TV will drive young to Isis," The Guardian, March 02, 2017, <https://www.theguardian.com/culture/2017/mar/02/riz-ahmed-warns-lack-of-diversity-on-tv-will-drive-young-to-isis>.

MEND – written evidence (CCE0185)

- Commit to developing teaching materials to educate young people on Islamophobia, racism, and antisemitism; to prioritise religious education in the national curriculum to prepare young people for life in a religiously plural society (see 1.4, 6.1 and 8.2).
- Commit to media reform and the full implementation of the Royal Charter on a Leveson compliant regulator; support industry initiatives to promote positive, diverse representations of Muslims and minorities in the mainstream media (see 1.4 and 8.3).
- Commit to improving ethnic diversity in all sectors of business, politics and media through schemes encouraging BME recruitment, mentoring and promotion, as well as through greater diversity within broadcasting (see 1.5 and 8.4).
- Commit to preserving the Human Rights Act and the protection of minority rights including rights to religious slaughter, circumcision and wearing of religious dress or symbols (see 3.2).
- Commit to fostering social cohesion and community resilience to all forms of extremism; support de-radicalisation programmes that work with Muslim communities not against them (see 5.2).
- Commit to repealing the current statutory Prevent duty, and replacing this with a more effective, evidence based and non-discriminatory counter-terrorism strategy by engaging with Muslim communities (see 5.2).
- Commit to curbing the encroachment of counter-terrorism policies on civil liberties by reviewing all counter-terrorism legislation enacted since 2000 (see 5.2)

8 September 2017

Zoraida Mendiwolso-Bendek, Senior Research Fellow in Citizenship, University of Lincoln– written evidence (CCE0176)

1. It is important to emphasise a citizenship in which the construction of identity is directed towards constructing meanings. Citizenship, as a synthesis of justice and membership, is a property that emerges from the way we relate to each other. It is about a citizen who creates his/her self through everyday communication, and it is a process of identity formation and recognition of community membership beyond normative conditions. This does not imply minimising the relevance of normative conditions; on the contrary they form an essential part of social agreements. However norms and citizenship are understood as a thing that we build in the process of constructing our identity. Citizenship is understood as a stable construction-property in the process of building a meaningful identity that emerges from daily citizens interactions (Mendiwolso-Bendek, 2002), (Mendiwolso Bendek Z. 2015).⁵⁵⁸
2. Citizenship is observed as a stable construction that emerges from the way in which people relate to each other and which we build in our moment-to-moment communications. Through the relationship of ownership and inclusion local citizens can influence the identity of the democratic system as they elect representatives or engage in reflecting upon their values, perceptions, concerns, expectations. For a more direct, participative and deliberative influence, citizens can directly leverage their power through their moment-to-moment communications with local decision makers. For a more indirect leverage they can exercise their influence through collective pressure groups, as these get involved in dialogues and other forms of engagement with global policymakers and experts. In this way there is an opportunity for them to exercise local and global influence. Through these two channels they can improve interactions with the political system; creating continued need for critical reflection that questions and refines the relationship of citizens with politicians and experts as an ongoing process. (Espejo, R. and Mendiwolso-Bendek, Z. 2011)⁵⁵⁹
- Community Based Research, community education and experiential learning have influenced a wide range of active citizenship learning initiatives in recent times, enabling individual and collective critical understanding of the realities, issues, perceptions and expectations of communities in order to develop strategies for social transformations. Take Part is one of the UK Programs that over the past decades has ⁵⁵⁸ Zoraida Mendiwolso-bendek, (2002) Citizens of the Future: Beyond Normative Conditions through the Emergence of Desirable Collective Properties journal of Business Ethics 39: 189-195, 2002.

Zoraida Mendiwolso-bendek, (2015) "Community-based research: enabling civil society's self-organisation", Kybernetes, Vol. 44 Issue: 6/7, pp.903-912.

⁵⁵⁹ Espejo, R. and Mendiwolso-Bendek, Z. (2011) An argument for active citizenship and organisational transparency. Kybemetes Vol 40 No.3/4. 2011pp.477-493 support learning to take part in Civil Society as an active citizen. Take Part programme (2002-2013) designed to improve citizens' knowledge, skills and confidence, as well as structures and processes for community engagement and empowerment, involved several local authorities as well as third sector organisations and universities. The Take Part programme contributed to the development of "research mindedness", which led to an ESRC capacity building cluster. Through this programme third-sector organisations began to develop an enhanced awareness of the value of research more generally. It helped third-sector organisations understand how to undertake research for themselves, commission research most effectively and identify relevant research methodologies and tools, as well as ways of identifying, evaluating and then applying research findings. Overall, this research helped to develop innovative approaches to community engagement and empowerment, issues of central importance to the self-organisation of the third sector, as well as the public and private sectors. This programme on the organisation and practice of citizenship learning showed the impact of conceptual robustness in direct applicability to local efforts. It included a sustained strategy of maintaining a link within the programme from research to practice. (Mayo, M., Mendiwolso-Bendek, Z. and Packham, C. (Eds) (2013)⁵⁶⁰,

8 September 2017

⁵⁶⁰ Mayo, M., Mendiwolso-Bendek, Z. and Packham, C. (Eds) (2013), Community Research as Community Development, ISBN-13: 978-1137034731, Palgrave, London, pp. 41-60.

Migrants' Rights Network – written evidence (CCE0224)

Introduction

This submission sets out the response of the Migrants' Rights Network (MRN) to the call for evidence from the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement.

MRN is an innovative national NGO working and campaigning for the rights of all migrants. Our overall mission is to promote a rights-based approach to migration, which reflects international human rights standards, and involves migrants as full partners in the development and implementation of policies that affect them⁵⁶¹.

Q1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- In this day age, there is much focus on citizenship, identity and civic engagement in the UK, a possible outcome of the diversity of our society, and unwarranted fears of certain communities, and how they are perceived. But, there is little clarity on what it means to be civically engaged, or what identity newcomers to the UK, or those that settle here, or are born here are meant to adopt.
- With the recent reviews and reports on social cohesion and integration by Dame Louise Casey⁵⁶² and the APPG on Social Integration⁵⁶³, both reports have highlighted either 'discrimination and disadvantage isolating communities from modern British society', or in the manner in which migrants have been described as the 'other'. The Casey review, although first admitting that 89% of people thought their community was cohesive and a similar proportion felt a sense of belonging to Britain, goes on to suggest a different position with negative views about the cultural and economic impact of migration and of migrants themselves.
- And, both reports have tended to concentrate their views on what expectations we should have of new and settled communities in their behaviours and interactions with other communities. There is usually scant requirements for Governments, local or national, to review whether there are any structural or systemic reasons for why certain communities may not feel able or willing to 'fit' into wider society.
- Identity is a complex issue to approach, especially when individuals will have multiple identities based on where they live, were born, their religious and ethnic

⁵⁶¹ Migrants' Rights Network, www.migrantsrights.org.uk

⁵⁶² The Casey Review: A Review into Opportunity and Integration, December 2016

<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/the-casey-review-a-review-into-opportunity-and-integration>

⁵⁶³ Integration Not Demonisation, August 2017, All-Party Parliamentary Group on Social Integration

background, sexuality and gender. Identity is not necessarily one based on which nation state they belong to, or to which State they have citizenship of. What is clear is that when a State does afford someone their rights and entitlements, and they are free from discrimination, they are more likely to be able to identify with the positive values of the country. Offering them the same rights will offer more harmony in UK society, and offer a sense of positive identity because they are treated equitably

- Where those rights are not afforded, and individuals are pushed to deal with a system that does not seem them as equals, there is little value for them to civically engage, and 'integrate' into a society that is regularly pushing them to the fringes.
- There needs to be recognition that certain individuals are not afforded an ability to be civically engaged due to their immigration status in society. The UK's immigration system because of its complexity, and lengthy decision-making processes offers little reassurance to some migrants who end up stuck in a waiting game to secure their status in the UK. Many undocumented migrants, will try and remain invisible within society, and to the Government because of their precarious situations.

Q2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

- In a globalised society, there is little reason to encourage there to be pride in any one nation, and especially one where 'Britishness' or 'being British' is ill-defined. Currently, the rhetoric of 'Britishness' suggests assimilation, and taking the majority population's views and culture, whilst eroding their own. Yet, history will probably show that Britain has thrived on having a diverse society: economically and socially
- We favour the approach used by MIPEX⁵⁶⁴, which involves outcomes measured in terms of a range of independent variables which, taken together, give a better indication of the direction and dynamic of belonging.
- For communities and individuals to 'belong', there also needs to be consideration made to national immigration policies where the provisions of the immigration Acts – in particular those of the 2014 and 2016 Acts – need to be recovered to consider the extent to which they have contributed to the emergence of a 'hostile environment' directed against migrants and the communities they live in.

⁵⁶⁴ Migrant Integration Policy Index, 2015, www.mipex.eu

- There is little evidence that citizenship ceremonies, and events play a role in encouraging further civic engagement. Before there was any expansion or focus on this, we would highly recommend a review of how they are currently perceived by those who participate in them.
- In the Casey Review, oaths were mentioned as a recommended action for government, but these would only have been requested of migrants and newcomers. There are no requirements for the rest of society to take such 'oaths' and does nothing to show that integration is, and should be a two-way process.
- To increase the demands on migrants already living and working here – ignores the vital ongoing contributions made by migrants to the UK. Migrants shape at every level the dynamic development of British economy, society and culture, in both visible and invisible, but no less essential, ways. There is no evidence to suggest that they do not value the opportunity to live and work in the UK, or that they lack a sense of belonging and appreciation of the UK, despite the costs and barriers they already face

Q3. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

- During MRN's Listening Campaign in 2017, many migrants commented on the lack of political engagement because of their inability to vote in national elections and referendum campaigns. In Boston, one EU National said a key issue they felt their migrant community faced is an 'inability to vote (except in local elections).'
- Some migrants without voting rights become disinterested in political engagement because the current system does not give them access to the political process. In our Listening Campaign in 2017, when talking about Brexit, an asylum seeker from Oldham, said 'I don't know much about it because I can't vote.'
- Some local Members of Parliament are also reluctant to represent and support non-British constituents, as they have no voting rights in General Elections, and therefore, are deemed to be of little value. This leaves some individuals without any recourse to challenge national government policies, and are unable to receive support from their political representative.

Q4. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

- The government's integration policy is set out in a paper entitled "Creating the Conditions for Integration"⁵⁶⁵ which states the government will act only exceptionally and see integration as a purely local issue. Yet many local authorities, subject to large budget reductions by central government, do nothing. As integration policy is split between different central government departments, devolved administrations of Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales, and local authorities, with no coordination between them, the result is often that nothing is done. In many cases, regional and local authorities may not have the data (apart from the census), guidance, resources, migrant forums or willingness to respond effectively to newcomers and reverse inequalities for long-settled communities
- For examples, there continues to be local hostility among the voting population against migrants, and Gypsy, Roma and Travellers, and this means that elected councillors are reluctant to address issues, and engage with these communities.
- There must be more national activity to describe the positives of migration, and its importance for the UK's history and future endeavours. This would then trickle down into local communities, and increase engagement.

Q5. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Values should be mutually defined with settled and new communities. It is still unclear what constitute as 'British values'. Values can be deemed to be abstract, subjective, and do not reflect new and emerging communities, or identities. Any values someone does hold would be formed by many different factors.

⁵⁶⁵ Creating the Conditions for Integration", February 2012,
<http://www.communities.gov.uk/publications/communities/integration>

Rather than values as a commonly shared idea, it would be preferable to focus on rights, which are concrete, defined in law, and against which a society could be benchmarked more easily. All those who live in Britain should be encouraged to share and support these rights.

Increasing hurdles to citizenship is not likely to foster any 'shared values'. Rather it would have the opposite effect - instead generating mistrust, insecurity and resentment among non-citizens. There are already significant costs attached to achieving citizenship which can amount to over £1300 per application.

Q6. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

- In Boston, an EU National responding to MRN's Listening Campaign said that the community there felt left behind due to a lack of investment in the town's services and infrastructure: 'In Boston people do not travel a lot, they live in small communities and everyone for them is a stranger and a potential enemy (including British people coming from other counties). Disseminating fear and paranoia among them is a very easy and effective strategy. The nature of the most work available here is low paid and does not require any qualifications, therefore the majority of migrant workers are from a low background and do not speak any languages. The government was too busy investing in big cities and big projects so this little town had no money to improve its old and ineffective infrastructure and in this time of austerity, cuts hit really hard the weakest points i.e health, education, roads, housing. [This] all combined created the monster of xenophobia.'
- While there are some steps to address the disparities between some communities through initiatives like the Race Disparity Audit, this in itself is not sufficient because it does not provide any context for those disparities existing, and will not provide any solutions for addressing these. Much of this will need to be taken up by local governments, who are already stretched and usually lack the resources, to fully comprehend, and resolve these barriers.
- We would recommend, any reviews of barriers to engagement, should include the following factors as have been well-set out in the Migrant Policy Integration Index (MIPEX) and can be summarised as:
 - i) Anti-discrimination
 - ii) Labour market mobility
 - iii) Family reunion
 - iv) Education
 - v) Political Participation

- vi) Conditions for residence
- vii) Access to nationality

- Within this list access to nationality would remain the prerogative of UK government (though in a wider settlement of the national question there may be scope for determining access citizenship of England, Northern Ireland, Scotland, and Wales in accordance separate constitutional arrangements for each country).

Q7. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

- Diversity in schools and workplaces does not necessarily ensure integration or social cohesion will happen naturally, and will be taken forward outside of those settings. Comments on the matter from EU Nationals in Boston, responding to the Migrants' Rights Network's Listening Campaign were quoted as saying: 'I go to high school where students are dividing themselves into different nationality groups and stick together most of the time' and 'most of racism is going on in schools.' In response to this, an EU National from Boston suggested that there should be 'greater integration for children. Schools need to understand cultural differences.'

Q8. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

- English proficiency is a useful tool for individuals to be able to participate in all fabrics of society⁵⁶⁶. However, it should not be viewed as the only means by which migrants can be seen to be a part of society. Communities, and
- Where ESOL has been available, the barriers to accessing ESOL include:
 - The cost of ESOL classes
 - No funding for asylum seekers to access ESOL classes during their first six months in the UK. An asylum seeker from Wolverhampton, responding to MRN's Listening Campaign, said: 'I am an asylum seeker and I should be allowed to learn English; I should not have to wait for 6 months because it is not fair.'
 - ESOL classes being taught by native English speakers; for people arriving in the UK

⁵⁶⁶ ESOL Literature Review, May 2016, <https://www.goodthingsfoundation.org/sites/default/files/research-publications/emwliteraturereview.pdf>

with little to no knowledge of the English language. Classes when taught by someone who also speaks the non-English language of the students can be helpful during the initial classes. An EU National living in Boston, responding to MRN's Listening Campaign said: 'There should be free ESOL courses with bilingual professional teachers who could teach English, translate phrases, words, teach English grammar in migrant's native language. I could not understand the English teachers, therefore I do not go to Boston College or other places with native teachers who cannot explain me basic grammar and translate words in my native language.' Another respondent seconded this, saying that ESOL classes should be 'held by the teacher speaking the learners' first language.'

- In some locations, the distance of travel to and from the nearest ESOL classes mean needing to take transport, which is an expense that some students cannot afford
- ESOL classes are not always held during times of day that are accessible to students; there is not always enough choice of day / evening classes available

- All these comments suggest the quality of ESOL classes, and their availability need to be reviewed with the individuals that participate in those classes.

We would encourage the committee to consider the following additional information, which offers views from migrant communities perspectives from across four areas in the UK:

Migrants' Perspectives on Brexit & UK Immigration Policies, August 2017,

<https://migrantsrights.org.uk/blog/2017/08/07/migrants-perspectives-brexit-uk-immigration-policies-2/>

Mr Richard Miles – written evidence (CCE0219)

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. This is a significant question for the United Kingdom in the 21st Century, especially at a time of major political upheaval over membership of the European Union. UK citizens have also, wittingly or unwittingly, been citizens of the European Union for many years, but on the basis of a particular application and interpretation of one form of civic engagement, the 2016 referendum, this second citizenship is likely to be removed from those of us who have it, and denied to future generations.
2. At the same time, the UK has not been, and hopefully will not become exclusive about dual citizenship or nationality,⁵⁶⁷ so whilst for particular political and ideological reasons dual UK/EU citizenship may no longer be the norm post “Brexit”, many UK citizens will still have dual citizenship with other nations, and thus be able to move freely to and from other countries, live in the UK and elsewhere, and enjoy the rights and responsibilities that accompany their different citizenships.
3. The question is also important because citizenship is not something that is particularly taught or acknowledged as a part of growing up or engagement for anyone who is born in the UK. There is an assumption for many that you are a British citizen⁵⁶⁸, and possibly the most obvious “formal” reference to citizenship appears for those who apply for and receive a passport, because of the language in which it is couched and its purpose of permitting return to the UK.
4. In my recent experience of helping a member of my family from another country to prepare for UK citizenship, I have been struck by the information he has been required to learn⁵⁶⁹, and the processes he has to go through, including a ceremony, which are not applied to those of us born as UK citizens. It therefore seems to me that migrants to the UK may have a better appreciation of citizenship and what it means than those of us who acquired it at birth.
5. Unfortunately, those who pursue citizenship in 2017 Britain not only have to learn facts about the UK (which may or may not be useful), but also frequently experience a darker side of life in this country, including a culture of hostility and inefficiency from the Home Office and the related approach that everything has a price that is more important than its value.⁵⁷⁰
6. In this respect we seem to be on a par with the Roman empire, as evidenced from the experience of the apostle Paul described in Acts chapter 23 (New International ⁵⁶⁷ Unlike, for example, Japan, which does not accept dual nationality for adults.

⁵⁶⁸ Although arguably this assumption is still most consistently applied to people of white European appearance.

⁵⁶⁹ E.g. Life in the United Kingdom: A Guide for New Residents; Home Office; Stationery Office; 3rd Edition; 2017

⁵⁷⁰ <https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2017/jun/28/immigration-detainees-legal-challenge-slave-wages>
<https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2017/sep/01/home-office-makes-800-profit-on-some-visa-applications>

Version): The commander went to Paul and asked, "Tell me, are you a Roman citizen?" "Yes I am," he answered. Then the commander said, "I had to pay a big price for my citizenship." "But I was born a citizen," Paul replied. On this occasion Paul's citizenship spared him from being flogged, but he was probably threatened with that because he didn't behave as, or appear to be a Roman citizen. I suppose that the current UK equivalent of the brutality of flogging for those who are not accepted as UK citizens is detention in Immigration Detention and Removal Centres, such as Morton Hall⁵⁷¹ or Brook House⁵⁷².

7. Key factors in the consideration of citizenship and identity are family and residency. Many people who are part of an established family in the UK, or the immediate family of a UK citizen, and others who have lived and perhaps worked in the UK for many years, identify themselves by their relationships, residency and/or actions as de facto UK citizens. Nevertheless they are denied citizenship because they do not meet arbitrary criteria set for political reasons by a Government that gives these a higher value than familial relationships, love, compassion, community or even civic engagement.

Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

8. To be a member and to belong there has to be something that attracts you and that is of greater intrinsic value or value to yourself than the alternatives. I think that those who have sought naturalisation have some sense of identity as citizens here, either because they see it as providing the freedoms to maintain their family relationships; they respect what they have seen and heard of our constitution and values; or because (in some cases) there is no alternative citizenship available to them because of war, persecution or other catastrophe.
9. One of the strengths of the UK is that it does not have a single homogenous identity, so the very notion of citizenship to which all (or at least a significant majority) can subscribe should be pursued to identify its essential elements – its purpose, values, and structures.
10. A friend who is a church leader notes: I think the desire [for identity as a citizen] comes from that 'echo' of God's design that 'there is something within all of us that desires to be connected to something bigger than our individual selves'.⁵⁷³ People's past cultural experiences, principles, ideas and expectations hugely shape a person's identity and allegiances. My experience of other cultures is it enables you to ask the questions of 'what can I readily let go of from my own cultural background?' and

⁵⁷¹ <https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2017/jan/13/investigation-after-third-death-in-uk-immigration-detention-centre>

⁵⁷² <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-41121692> Detainees 'mocked and abused' at immigration centre

⁵⁷³ Citizen: Your role in the alternative kingdom; Rob Peabody; 2014

‘what am I inspired to pick up from the new cultural experience?’, and identifying how much of the current is holding us back or propelling us forward.

11. Mechanisms that help people to reflect on these would help, through story perhaps etc., telling your own, hearing others, identifying changes on the journey.
12. However, change requires a process and takes time, and some UK citizens would be surprised and even puzzled to hear the rationale for seeking UK citizenship that might be expressed in these stories.
13. In the short term, this could be helpful for citizens by birth as well as for those who are naturalised, as I wonder how much appreciation and hence response to the essence of a uniting UK citizenship there currently is in the UK.
14. This is where the education system could perhaps help, as it appears that the notion of citizenship and civic engagement has not been taught in any depth to several generations of children.
15. There is also surely a parenting responsibility, and behind that support and guidance for parents who as they grew up perhaps never learned what would help them to be responsible and engaged citizens.
16. However, before burdening schools and other front-line establishments with more pressures, a change in culture throughout Government and the public sector is required, to reflect a value system that follows good governance; respects citizens and people who aren't but might like to be; understands a public service ethos; and observes the rule of law at all times. From my perspective as a former public servant, all these appear to have been in decline in recent years, but if citizenship and civic engagement are to flourish they must be exemplified and nurtured from the top.
17. The idea of citizenship ceremonies, perhaps as coming of age events – could be worth considering. (They could be of more value and less expense than the imported Prom Parties!)
18. It is strange that as part of the naturalisation process people have to attend a citizenship ceremony, but that is not the norm for citizens born here; we are allowed to drift and at no time in our lives are we guided or inducted. Is this because we do not take it seriously until we want to keep people out?
19. It is perhaps ironic that there is an option for people to book a private citizenship ceremony (at double the fee), which surely works against integration and civic engagement⁵⁷⁴ and reinforces individualism, which is the antithesis of citizenship.
20. My friend adds another comment that could be helpful here: I also think sport has a very influential role on people's local and national allegiances and cannot be underestimated or alternatively used to leverage changes where possible – e.g. the way people get behind things like UK athletics/ Olympics / Football/Rugby etc. When people from other nations have a strong sporting allegiance (e.g. cricket) that's unlikely to change – but even a hardened Scot like myself can support the British Lions, but the passion for the sport comes from the original allegiance.

⁵⁷⁴ It could perhaps be argued that paying a larger fee is a practical form of civic engagement, in that it helps to fund local authorities that are short of cash.

Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

21. It is helpful to start with some sort of definition of civic engagement, and this seems reasonable: Civic engagement means working to make a difference in the life of our communities and developing the combination of knowledge, skills, values and motivation to make that difference. It means promoting the quality of life in a community, through both political and non-political processes.
22. There is a balance to be struck between an understanding of responsibilities and legal coercion. The ideal is that citizens so identify with their communities that they contribute to the wellbeing and development of those communities, without the need for the force of law. Unfortunately, what we are seeing at times is people being unwilling to contribute to wellbeing, and others destructively undermining wellbeing by their behaviour.
23. In my community I attended a meeting with my MP, at which, inter alia, there was discussion about the amount of rubbish in the streets and open spaces. As we have become accustomed to a transactional basis for service, whereby we pay the local authority and they clear up the rubbish, the solution was seen to be more work by the council, even though everyone knew that their funding had been cut by central government. I suggested that my MP organised something like Umuganda, to bring people together to clear up the neighbourhood. (I came across Umuganda in Rwanda. It can be translated as 'coming together in common purpose to achieve an outcome'. Umuganda is a communal act of assistance and a sign of integration in a country still recovering from a Government-inspired genocide. It is undertaken on the last Saturday of each month, when everyone aged 18- to 65-yrs-old is expected to do yard work or help the community in some other way.) My MP, knowing his constituency, was horrified at the prospect of suggesting a requirement for people to be involved, and told me he did not want to be re-elected!
24. On the other hand there are a large number of voluntary groups that bring people together to improve the quality of life in their communities – including the constituency where I live.
25. However, in or close to my community, there appear to be enough people without a sense of identity or civic engagement to discard their rubbish in the streets, to fly tip, and to steal cars, break into houses, and to ride unlicensed motorcycles in large noisy groups without regard to law or safety. These appear predominantly to be “born-in-the-UK” citizens who have lost touch with the responsibilities of citizenship, if they were ever aware of them. Their younger siblings, or the next generation, are also in evidence, preparing for their adulthood of counter-engagement.
26. Before even suggesting extensions to the force of law, it is clear that the existing legal framework is not effective in upholding responsibilities and maintaining the rule of law. This is in part because the police force is under-staffed and also ill-equipped or prevented from carrying out all the functions that the law provides for – and so the well-being of communities tumbles.

27. In terms of additional rights, my inclination has been to consider that we have enough rights. However, at the present time it is evident that rights that we take for granted could be undermined in the proposed transition to a post Brexit UK.⁵⁷⁵ There have been disturbing signs of a tendency by the Executive to seek more power, and thus to bypass Parliament in making or amending legislation.⁵⁷⁶ One of the most disturbing suggestions is that citizens may lose some of their ability to challenge the Government. We have already seen reductions to legal aid, considerable obfuscation in dealing with Freedom of Information requests, frequent referrals to “Remainers” as disloyal (when surely we still have “Her Majesty’s Most Loyal Opposition” in the House of Commons), and so on.
28. We have a parliamentary democracy which means that Parliament should have more say over legislation than advisory referenda or an Executive that seeks to be unaccountable. It is ironic that the unelected House of Lords and Supreme Court have at times recently led the way in looking after the rights and responsibilities of citizens by securing the rule of law and the ongoing effectiveness of Parliament. May this continue until we have an Executive (and a press) that understands the nature of our constitution in protecting citizens.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

29. I think that consideration should be given to lowering the voting age to 16 for national and local elections. So many decisions affect the lives of your people who will soon be adults. Strong governance should be maintained in the voting registration and voting processes. Consideration could be given to electronic voting systems, as long as the secrecy of the ballot is preserved; there are cast-iron assurances that the systems will not fail or be compromised; and implementation only proceeded following a rigorous procurement process with fixed costs to public funds.
30. On the other hand, it is worth noting that visiting a polling station is itself a tangible expression of civic engagement and integration, and this should not be lost.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

⁵⁷⁵ See, e.g. European Union Withdrawal Bill 2017 Section 5(4)

⁵⁷⁶ See e.g. European Union Withdrawal Bill 2017 Sections 7-9;17

31. I have noted above the desirability of encouraging good citizenship through the education system, but do not have enough knowledge to comment on when it should be compulsory, or on the content of the curriculum.
32. I also think that ways should be explored to encourage a parental role in the encouragement and development of good citizenship, so there could be a role for employers, parent groups and other organisations. Guidance could be more valuable than coercion, e.g. in a similar way that charities help people with financial or relationship difficulties.
33. Interestingly there appears to be a rise (certainly amongst younger people) to get involved in volunteering in some way, which is a move towards civic engagement. Some of the motivation for this will come from schools, or youth groups, churches and other networks.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

34. I have sought to discover a comprehensive list of “British values” from different Government departments, but there does not appear to be a consistent set of values applied across government.
35. I would comment on Freedom of Speech as a value that is under threat, for example: as I have noted above, in the current Brexit political climate, those who challenge the Government’s approach are not just disagreed with, but branded as disloyal, undermining the will of the people and the like. It feels as though those who voted to Remain have lost their voice as a more than significant part of the British people. This challenge to freedom of speech is being modelled by government ministers and MPs, amongst others, who, in a Parliamentary democracy should know better. Their behaviour appears to be thoroughly unparliamentarily. For example: it has become increasingly difficult to express any opinion other than the current “received wisdom” on anything to do with gender politics, such as abortion, same-sex marriage, or gender identity, without being labelled as a bigot. Some aspects of liberalism are extremely illiberal. For example: there appears to be an unwillingness to allow freedom of speech in some areas of university life, for fear of offending the sensitivities of some students. Universities should be the very places to speak freely and explore ideas. I grew a lot through the challenges to my ideas and world-view that I experienced at university, and it is there that my civic engagement developed.
36. I would also comment on a right to family life, because I think that this is one value area in which the current and previous government have been the most perniciously hypocritical, notably in their dealings with migrants. When David Cameron was promoting same sex marriage, he argues that “when people’s love is divided by law, it is the law that needs to change”.⁵⁷⁷ But the Government’s family migration rules and other hard-line approaches to immigration policy have done precisely the opposite, and divided thousands of UK citizens from the partners they love, and their children. Furthermore, marriage, and remaining together for a UK citizen and a non-EU spouse (and before long potentially an EU spouse too) is made subject to means testing, excessive and repeated profit-making fees⁵⁷⁸, and a form of marriage probation, all of which show an amazing contempt for British citizens who love someone from another country and yet want to live here.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

37. My observation on this relates to the Home Office’s oft-repeated claims that its family migration rules are designed to assist integration, and that people who are not allowed into the UK because of a low sponsor income, or inadequate language skills would not be able to integrate. I would say that one of the best ways to integrate into UK society is by being with a UK based family, and also by engaging with community-based organisations such as churches and schools. Furthermore, the best place to become competent in spoken English is an English-speaking country, as I believe is acknowledged by the Australian government.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

38. Levels of English proficiency are very important, without decrying the use of other languages in the home and elsewhere, where appropriate. ESOL classes are helpful, but so is immersion in a community that speaks English – see my observation on integration in paragraph 36.

39. The citizenship test is a mystery to those who have never taken it – and even to those who have come across it. There is much in it that we have not been taught, and that has very little bearing on life in the UK today. I have encountered many UK born people who have tried test papers and failed. It takes no account of the differing ways that people learn, and for the most part is redundant the moment a pass has been granted.

⁵⁷⁷ David Cameron; 29 March 2014

⁵⁷⁸ <https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2017/sep/01/home-office-makes-800-profit-on-some-visa-applications>

Dr Sarah Mills and Dr Catherine Waite – written evidence (CCE0030)

1. About The Researchers

Dr Sarah Mills is a Senior Lecturer in Human Geography at Loughborough University. Her research focuses on youth citizenship, informal education and volunteering and she has published widely on these themes. She is an expert on the geographies of youth citizenship and youth organisations in the UK. She is Chair of the Royal Geographical Society's Research Group on 'Children, Youth and Families'.

Dr Catherine Waite is a Lecturer in Human Geography at University of Northampton. Her research explores geographies of migration, young people and sport.

2. Executive Project Summary

Dr Mills' ESRC-funded research project on National Citizen Service [ES/L009315/1: 2014-7] explored the state's motivations behind, the voluntary sector's engagement with, and young people's experiences of NCS. Dr Mills & Dr Catherine Waite (Research Associate) collected data using several research methods including qualitative interviews with NCS graduates (30), regional delivery providers (22) and key 'architects' of the NCS programme (8). The researchers also conducted policy analysis, an online survey with NCS graduates (407), an 'on-the-ground' ethnography of one team's NCS journey, and a participatory animated whiteboard video of their NCS experience (more details via project website). The project submitted written evidence to the Public Bill Committee (NCS Bill) in January 2017 and has fed key findings to NCS Trust, Cabinet Office and other stakeholders.

3. Relevant Project Publications

Peer-Reviewed Journal Article

Mills, S. and Waite, C. (2017) "Brands of Youth Citizenship and the Politics of Scale: National Citizen Service in the United Kingdom", Political Geography 56: 66-76.

Open Access PDF Free to download here

Full web-link: <http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0962629816300944>

Hard Copies Available on Request

End of Project Report

Mills, S. and Waite, C. (2017) National Citizen Service: A Geographical Approach
Loughborough University ISBN: 978-1-5272-1279-4

Open Access PDF Free to download here

Full web-link: <http://www.geographiesofyouthcitizenship.com/project-outputs.php>

Hard Copies Available on Request

4. Written Evidence with respect to Select Committee Question 6 on National Citizen Service

4.0 Case-Study Context: What is National Citizen Service?

Launched in 2011, National Citizen Service (NCS) is a short-term voluntary scheme for 15-17 year olds in England and Northern Ireland. Over 300,000 young people have completed the NCS programme, comprised of three distinctive phases over 3-4 weeks during Summer, with shorter versions available in Spring and Autumn.

Phase One is a residential experience usually held at an outdoor activity centre to create bonds between young people. Phase Two is a second residential, usually hosted in University Halls of Residence. Activities here are focused on skills development for the future through a series of workshops and group tasks. For both residential experiences, young people are in large 'waves' (circa 100 people) from the same region, but activities are completed within smaller teams of young people from the same village or town. For the final phase of the programme, young people return to their home communities to design and complete a social action project, for example fundraising, campaigning or renovation projects. The programme ends with a graduation ceremony to celebrate their NCS journey.

NCS is a unique voluntary youth programme because it was created, driven and funded by the UK Government. It employs a top-down regional delivery model overseen by the NCS Trust, with provider contracts awarded through a tendering process. A wide range of providers have been involved in NCS delivery including private sector partnerships, businesses, social enterprises and voluntary sector charities. Participants pay £50 to join an NCS programme, with bursaries available for low-income groups.

NCS is subject to programme evaluation, initially by NatCen and currently by Ipsos MORI [\[link\]](#). The NCS Trust also reports to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (previously the Cabinet Office and Department for Education). In April 2017, National Citizen Service received a Royal Charter following the NCS Bill (House of Lords).

4.1 “Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?”

4.1.1 Social Action and NCS’ Brand of Youth Citizenship

Young people in our research project were overwhelmingly positive about their NCS experience, based on narratives of fun, friendship and futures. The survey data revealed clear benefits to their participation: 96% of respondents would recommend NCS to other teenagers, 91% were proud of their achievements on NCS, and 90% of respondents felt more confident as a result of NCS.

Active citizenship centred on ‘social action’ is the ‘brand’ of youth citizenship embodied by NCS (Mills & Waite 2017). Our research uncovered that citizenship within NCS infrastructure, its curriculum and ‘on-the-ground’ is often equated with volunteering. Survey data from graduates revealed that 86% of respondents felt they learnt what it means to be a citizen on NCS. However, within our qualitative research, understandings of what citizenship meant were almost exclusively about the responsibilities of young citizens to volunteer. Citizenship was often used by NCS staff and graduates as a synonym for ‘social action’, or ‘community’. Other parts of our data-set support this finding that citizenship within NCS is ambiguous and, at times, weakly linked to forms of political participation and the wider relationship between rights and responsibilities.

We are not critiquing youth volunteering or social action per se, with the benefits of this activity widely reported. However, we are highlighting that the model of NCS and its promotion of a particular ‘brand’ of youth citizenship centred on social action as the number one tenant of being a ‘good’ citizen (rather than say, voting or democratic participation) tells a story about the state’s vision and priorities, encouraging a type of citizen that performs ‘safe’ and compliant acts of (youth) citizenship.

Recommendation: Citizenship education and political literacy should be embedded within Phase Two of the NCS curriculum (see also 4.1.2).

4.1.2 Regional Geographies of NCS

Our research project also found that the regional geographies of NCS shape young people’s experiences with respect to citizenship education.

Regional delivery providers (RDPs) either directly deliver NCS programmes or work with a range of local delivery providers (LDPs) to sub-contract and deliver NCS on the ground. Our research revealed that this mixed geography of service provision is creating some regional disparities in the NCS experience, with a ‘postcode lottery’ for young people. Overall, geography matters in relation to the exact programme young people receive and there are two core areas where this has the biggest impact on the NCS experience:

i) Phase Two’s Activities

The second residential with workshops and group tasks designed to improve skills for the future varies based on each RDP. Although one would expect some variations in programme specifics due to local dynamics, our research did identify a lack of consistency in activities and core messages. For example, some participants expressed frustrations at missing out on ‘Big P’ political education content i.e. debates, or meeting MPs that other RDPs delivered.

Recommendation: A review of Phase Two to ensure consistency across Regional Delivery Providers, including scope for citizenship education and political literacy

ii) Youth-Led Social Action

The extent to which social action projects are youth-led is also shaped by the regional geographies of NCS. Whilst some RDPs encourage young people to design their own projects based on young people's passions or interests, other RDPs pre-design social action projects for young people to choose from and deliver. Around half of our survey respondents designed their project with their team, with 28% indicating it was a combination of their provider and their team, and 16% indicating it was their provider alone. We recognise challenges in terms of preparation, insurance and risk assessments for social action projects with short lead times, however the extent to which some providers arrange social action projects limits the 'buy in' young people have as participants.

Recommendation: NCS Trust should prioritise youth-led social action in future commissioning rounds and support Regional Delivery Providers with these logistics.

4.2 "Are they the right length?"

NCS is a short-term programme compared to the regular activities of voluntary youth organisations or local authority youth work. Although 89% of survey respondents felt they had made a difference through social action, there is no doubt NCS is a short-term experience and time-limited. There was a sense of frustration for some participants at not being able to continue their projects, and 80% of our survey respondents would like to do more social action.

However, NCS is full-time for 3-4 weeks of a young person's (on average) 6 week summer holiday and any longer for an NCS programme would – based on our overall analysis – impact on young people's opportunities for paid/unpaid work, educational or other extra-curricular activities, or family commitments and caring responsibilities.

Recommendation: Retain the current programme length of NCS, but ensure greater opportunities for NCS alumni to continue social action projects through signposting to other relevant opportunities.

4.3 "Should they be compulsory, and if so, when?"

NCS is not compulsory and participants currently 'opt-in' through dedicated and widespread marketing campaigns. To make NCS compulsory would dramatically change the rationale and 'place' of NCS in society. Compulsion would change the character of NCS and create further obstacles for NCS Trust to integrate with the existing youth sector landscape.

Recommendation: NCS should remain voluntary without compulsion

4.4 "Should they include a greater political element?"

Yes. See Section 4.1 for a detailed discussion. Furthermore, our project revealed some interesting dynamics on the scales of youth citizenship within NCS.

The climax of the NCS programme is the social action project. Our research found that this model locates the real arena for active citizenship in young people's own local towns, cities and villages – as part of a wider national collective. This framework – coupled with the varied content of Phase Two (See Section 4.1) – has resulted in little awareness by NCS providers or amongst participants about how their activities at the local scale are connected to global issues, politics or challenges. Our data indicates that NCS graduates are aware that they are part of a bigger, national movement, beyond their local team. However, our data-set revealed that other 'scales' of youth citizenship – such as European and global citizenship formations – have been relegated.

We found a weak relationship between NCS and the International Citizen Service (ICS), a scheme with a shared genealogy but a separate organisation. Indeed, there was only one reference to ICS in the whole of our data-set from either providers or young people. This dual approach with two organisations has created a scenario whereby a global outlook is a 'bolted-on' additional extra or alternative to NCS, rather than part and parcel of what it means to be a citizen. Overall, ideas of multi-scaled identities are marginalised within the NCS framework.

We believe that NCS is – like many institutions in civil society during the past year – struggling to grapple with ideas about national identity, belonging, and citizenship. In light of Brexit and subsequent political debates, there is a pressing need for NCS to reconsider its scales of youth citizenship.

Recommendation: UK Government and NCS Trust should revisit the aims and objectives of NCS in relation to citizenship, identity and belonging in post-Brexit Britain

4.5 "Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony?"

The current NCS graduation rightly celebrates the achievements of young people and is a chance to reconnect as alumni. It already has elements of being part of a wider national (political) project i.e. receiving a certificate with the Prime Minister's signature. Any changes towards a more 'public citizenship ceremony' would further entrench NCS as a national political project and not address the wider scalar dilemma discussed in Section 4.4. Furthermore, any shifts towards this form of ceremony would have to carefully consider devolution as NCS exists in England and Northern Ireland, but not in Scotland or Wales.

Recommendation: Retain existing format of graduation ceremonies

4.6 "Are they good value for money?"

This research project did not investigate value for money or a cost benefit analysis as part of its objectives. This topic was recently discussed by the Public Audit Committee [link] and £1.26 billion has recently been committed to NCS delivery for 2016-21, with a target of

360,000 young people completing NCS annually by 2020-21 (60% of the target population of 16 year olds).⁵⁷⁹

However, our research did reveal the ‘hidden costs of social action’. Our research found that a key component of the NCS experience is fundraising. This is either through social action projects that aim to fundraise for local charities, or fundraising activities required to support and deliver different social action projects themselves. The money raised for charity by NCS participants is noteworthy, with inspirational achievements by young people. However, our interview and ethnographic data highlights there should be more sensitivity as to who shoulders the burden of donations, sponsorship and resources. Not all young people and families have the resource(s), time and/or opportunity to contribute in ways that are often assumed by NCS, for example completing sponsorship forms or supporting bake sales.

Furthermore, there were other hidden costs of social action in relation to travel. Whilst the £50 cost of NCS is well covered through participation bursaries for low-income groups, participants were not always aware when signing-up to NCS about travel times and costs. From our survey findings, most of our respondents (40%) travelled between 15-30 minutes to their social action project. However, around 10% were travelling between 45 minutes to an hour each way. These issues were most acute in rural areas. Public buses were the most common mode of transport (35%), with 30% of NCS participants using parental car travel. This raises further questions about the ‘hidden’ costs of social action projects. A small number of providers in our research project offered transportation, but this was not universal.

Recommendation: To investigate the provision of free or reduced cost local bus travel for NCS participants during their social action project.

Recommendation: To offer small social action project bursaries for participants who already receive the £50 waiver for the participation fee.

4.7 What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Please see the submissions from other Political Literacy Oversight Group (PLOG) members (Chaired by Dr James Weinberg) for evidence-based discussion on these themes.

5 Conclusion

NCS has become a key part of the youth policy landscape and is set to further expand. It is driving forward new partnerships (e.g. recent announcement of a three year pilot with the Scout Association) yet remains controversial within parts of the voluntary and youth work sector. There is potential for it to identify new ways of building bridges within and between communities, and to support civic engagement, as per the Lords Committee’s interests. The recommendations in this submitted evidence could help to improve the NCS experience for young people and embed citizenship and political literacy within its programme.

⁵⁷⁹ National Audit Office Report, January 2017

Dr Sarah Mills and Dr Catherine Waite – written evidence (CCE0030)

Further project findings – beyond the scope of these questions in the call for evidence – can be shared upon request, or consulted in the end-of-project report (see Section 3 for links).

22 August 2017

Paul Milton – written evidence (CCE0156)

Please find attached my contribution to the enquiry into Citizenship and Civic engagement. I firstly think the terminology is wrong there's being a citizen, becoming a citizen and gaining citizenship and being and becoming a well rounded individual the lines are a bit blurred with this subject.

I've covered the first topic before previously, the main aspect and crux of citizenship was the control in terms of immigration and border control. Citizenship the key is getting the balance right in terms of benefits to the (UK) economy and diversity and culture through the process of citizenship becoming a (UK) Citizen.

Citizenship Early Summary:-

The process isn't perfect it has its flaws and imperfections similar to the GIG economy American terminology for (GIG's), but can be beneficial for example the Erasmus program highly connected to Citizenship as well, Citizenship is also highly connected to the aspect of the labour market and also Brexit as well "The final terms and conditions".

"Citizenship as I say is very closely related to immigration and border control the access in and out of country. The key is getting the balance right weighing up the pro's and con's. The cases in the news recently with ISIS and Islamic extremists being extradited out of the UK sent back to their original countries is a good justification and example we need to be vigilant of our border's and immigration."

Citizenship Education Program: -

The program again at its heart is the flow or people educating and integrating new citizens into our society. It's a double edged sword similar to teacher retention or army militia in other countries. We could teach and integrate these new citizens into our society but need to make sure once trained or integrated those people we've put time and effort into are retained in the (UK) and don't just take that knowledge and experience to another country, "A previous problem they had with teacher training in the (UK)".

Civic/Community Engagement: -

Civic engagement or community engagement means different things to many people depending on class ethnicity and background. We are still failing quite a few minorities in terms of integration into communities; the integration relies on several things even down to the most basic things such as kindness and respect.

Historical Divide: -

In addressing these issues and questions we need to take into account history and the divisions made by history and events in time you're also looking at genetic traits and dispositions as well past on habits "Habitual or none intentional" in terms of people being able to change their opinion or view.

Hypothetical:-

Another hypothetical is do we wish to heal and close the divides in society? Would that community fair better if it was its own state or governance in being a separate body you could then treat it more easily similar to the grey pound, pink pound, and purple pound, their own economy.

Cultural Engagement:-

Engagement the key to this is a working and fully functional system. Psychology also comes into it as well. It's playing with the person's perception depending on perspectives and from group or community influence from that input has anything changed a bit like a pressure group.

What It Means to be Part Of Britain:-

At the heart of all these questions is integration, bonding, and unity, these questions really shouldn't be for the public to answer but for the government to answer and heal. A good example was Brexit but at the heart of Brexit was issues not addressed and looked at or people's voices not being heard or recognised.

Realistic Goals and Agendas/Inclusion: -

It's also a case of setting boundaries and reasonable bracketing on what is possible and not possible as you can't help and save everyone.

Summary:-

This subject and topic of citizenship and civic engagement is really quite complicated when it really shouldn't be, the idea of the citizenship education program from what I've seen its aims are integration and more engagement in certain areas such as politics and engraining the basics such as morals and principles through the citizenship education program. It really shouldn't be for the education system to have to engrain these morals and principles it should be a joint effort of good parenting and education system.

Citizenship Education Flaws:-

The program is also flawed you can have these values instilled in these youngsters or try and open these routes more or engage them at a younger level but it's no point if the subjects are controlled and contrived later on or further up the ladder in terms of career's also taking into account disabilities and (SEN). Other factors for example electoral role problems in terms of political engagement of young people if these problems were fixed the engagement would be better. One main area of the electoral role system, which was failing, was it was unable to keep track of young people in college or moving.

8 September 2017

Ms Lorna Hughes – written evidence (CCE0132)

This submission is made by Lorna Hughes as an individual expressing personal views held. It does not represent the views of others – though probably does! I have chosen to answer some of the questions posed.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship and civic engagement must mean mutual respect for difference. The respect of ‘difference’ is critical – as we live in a much divided society, where our connections are built on the differences we share – race; class; economic status; housing tenure etc. These differences have been allowed to become entrenched lines of conflict and form the key points of identity we recognise.

Sadly, there is little evidence of mutual respect and citizens have withdrawn from civic engagement – leading to a governance structure that does not understand and cannot relate to the people that it serves. Citizens engage within and amongst themselves – the governance struggles because it is no longer integral or relevant to everyday lives. For example, it is now acceptable to mock poverty and deprivation in TV programmes such as ‘Can’t pay we’ll take it away’, ‘Benefit Britain’ and many others. While the TV is not controlled by the state, – such offensive programmes reflect the lack of moral compass throughout the nation.

It matters because we now have a situation where public services are disconnected from the people they are paid to serve – and unable to determine how, or support the way communities function. The recent Brexit vote demonstrates the state is unclear of its role (having whipped the nation into a frenzy) and has unleashed violent responses by people who believe they have no channels to express their views; and the governance structures cannot deal with it.

The state does not identify with its people and is unable to dictate an identity to people who it does not understand. The state created deep divisions in which people’s views and beliefs have been formed. It is the belief system that directs behaviours – in my view, the only thing to change beliefs is through action – the state must act to update its services, its officers and its systems so that we live in a fairer society that enables communities to share more platforms rather than share what has been divided by the state,

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

As said above – the state cannot dictate identity through a 2 hour event or session! Pride comes through having a decent standard of living, equal access to education and employment, a home that meets your needs – the question in itself proves the complete lack of understanding of how people grow and develop.

I do not believe that further pressures on the school curriculum is the answer – the answer is much more about addressing the systemic failure to treat people equally and the creation of an underclass made strong through state policy that has bonded people through negative facets of their life – race, place and economic ability. No one off ceremony is going to cure what people believe – people believe in their experience and reality. To change peoples sense of belonging requires a change in peoples experience – which will take time and a radical change in how people are treated.

This inquiry needs to be based on honesty – these questions do not relate to everyone – they relate to ‘some’ people – people of colour, people of working classes, people of poverty and deprivation. These people largely reject the state for years of failure to address their problem – change needs to address root causes, not be over layed with more bureaucracy that people do not want to hear. The inquiry should focus on where the real problems are – outlined above, and not attempt to pretend this is a matter for everyone. It needs to be focussed on changing the experience of life before attempting to muster false pride that will not be consumed by the people you need to target.

If the desired outcome is pride then people need to be treated with pride every step of the way.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

I believe there needs to be better opportunities to hold public services to account. There needs to be a better understanding that public services are supposed to meet the needs of the public, and the public will. I believe there is a need to refresh public services to deliver from a stronger civic perspective rather than an enforcement perspective i.e Policing. If anything, we the public should be given a stronger role in monitoring public services including monitoring the police.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

My view is this is not limited to law – it is about the behaviours of those voted to serve. One example is I have left messages for my local MP – who has never returned my phone call! They need to serve the people not themselves.

Creating a space for more people to vote and more people to be let down is not the answer in my view!

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

If we are taking an approach of honesty here, why should working class state school pupils of colour be made to spend their time studying how to conform to the perceived 'british way' – whilst private school children are allowed to focus on achieving good exam grades to support their lives long term.

Its is ironic that there is a suggestion in the question of 'optional' civic education – further proof of the lines drawn by the state to inflict on some – diverting valuable educational time to try and change beliefs of experience, which will result in the continued poorer outcomes for certain groups, and continued acceleration of others.

Schools are struggling already – despite not being fit for purpose. Why does it take 11 years to get 5 low grade GCSEs? The whole curriculum needs radical improvement – but I do not think that this inquiry should burden schools with this topic – this inquiry should focus on the structural problems rather than utilise schools as the solution – they are not the only tool the state has to encourage greater citizenship.

Good citizenship is based on experience not taught by rote like the Victorians taught in the early days of free schools.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

I have only seen NCS advertise job vacancies in the Guardian!. I have raised 3 children – youngest 21, and they have never been offered anything from this organisation. I do not believe that citizenship should be externalised from public services and therefore it is not possible for these programmes to be effective at all. How can so much money be invested in one organisation that is clearly scared of black young people – they do not enter black or deprived communities. NCS is white middle class and operates from the fear perspective – not tackling difficult issues.

This inquiry must be bold, brave and honest – who are you really talking about, and how can a distant group like NCS, with no connection or understanding of the lived experience of the inequality of the true target cohort, make any difference at all.

The millions of pounds wasted on externalising civic activity should be reinvested to change peoples lived experience – i.e housing and education. It is only when people experience better that they feel better and they can be engaged. I believe that civic ceremonies are a waste of time that does not really impact on the way people feel. It may well be a process for some people to obtain papers to stay in the UK – but it does not change the experience or living her – and certainly does not make people engage positively with the state. A six week course and a piece of paper does not stop you being arrested because you are black, not given a job because you did not achieve, or housed on a ‘sink estate’ because the state drew those lines previously.

Creating active citizens requires creating equality – it requires support of deprived communities, it requires access to better housing, it requires meaningful education, it requires access to better employment. Its not enough to tick the box with a 6 week programme followed by an awards ceremony; then a return to inequality albeit with papers to stay. Fundamental changes are needed and that could start with diverting the money wasted on these programmes to changing peoples experiences long term.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Respect differences – fully and wholly. Provide and support people to change their lives. Stop criminalising young black boys – and lead them to a path of long term criminal lives – stop excluding young black boys at school. Stop the racist Police practices; stop the racist jailing and sentencing. Stop the bad housing, b & b, overcrowding. It is only when communities basic needs are met can they begin to engage honestly with you.

The Government should admit and reverse the racist foundations that services are delivered from; and then an honest conversation can be held.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

See above. The biggest threat is the services that are delivered from state lines drawn on race, class, and economic ability – people are not being supported to meet their needs, which has resulted in a range of violent reactions. Strengthening citizenship means strengthening peoples ability to access resources to live an equitable life. The gap between citizen and state is worsened by the gap in wealth creation.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Throughout my response I have referred to race, class and economic ability. These factors are seen in the way that services are delivered – racist policing that seeks to criminalise young black boys, racist education that excludes black children, bad housing given to deprived communities. There needs to be an introduction of civic responsibility to the very people providing services – it is not something to be ‘done to’ communities as a programme of education – that they lack the ability to be active citizens; rather the public sector lacks the ability to approach the true cohort you are discussing.

The Government – national and local needs to deliver citizenship itself, not seek to teach it. Overcoming barriers, requires the state to understand the lived experience of its citizens and act to improve that. Opportunities to do this are missed through engagement initiatives that are woefully delivered in fear of the communities they seek to reach. One example is the practice that by listening to well behaved middle class young people is representative of all young people – really not the case. I believe that people practising ‘engagement’ should be fully trained, and have a clear understanding and practice of equalities. Too many times we see engagement initiatives delivered by people with no idea of the lived experience of the people they say they want to engage with – and no idea how to access them. Active citizenship must be embedded in the way services are delivered – in which case, services would reflect the people they serve – such as education, policing and housing. A review of staff demographic will tell you a lot about who is delivering what to who; and then you can begin to understand why civic engagement is disabled by the public sector.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Newcomers to Britain face racism – look at this question from a different lens and you will see how someone who speaks a different language is immediately positioned as ‘other’ and different. This inquiry needs to be honest in what it seeks to find out about who. Of course, speaking English makes a difference to the lived experience – but this should be positioned positively, rather than enforced functional learning of a language. ESOL classes can teach people to say the right answer – but it does not teach a positive experience of the place.

The citizenship test should include a test of the ‘system’ – people should be asked are you treated with respect; has your housing enquiry been dealt with; are the children settling well in school – real tests that matter to people's lives are needed. The test should be of our society to embrace new people, not just the test to conform in situ.

Ms Lorna Hughes – written evidence (CCE0132)

8 September 2017

David Minall – written evidence (CCE0041)

Just some thoughts.

This exercise could end in formally recognising the need for a written UK constitution as the driver for significant, if not radical, changes in law and policy. It is interesting to note that the first two questions are concerned with, identity, retrospectively, and present within the problems at issue in a disenfranchised society, generally.

How can society support civic engagement? The rise of Identity Politics internalising groups within society, against the increasingly cynical view of the established Political Class is pretty much where the problems of 21st century UK lie – along with a fair chunk of the Western World. Devolution is seen as the method by which a population can better perceive their influence on the political system. The structure of devolution is advanced in the UK, the inter-nation identity of Scotland being most prominent. If taxation rights were further devolved, enabling the full responsibility for an area to sink or swim, this could become the framework for a truly decentralised government, leaving the now, National Government, as an assembly with key roles in foreign policy, borders, law, central bank, etc.

Hard to see how any established Political Class would ever agree to let the money train go – this is an old pipedream.

Political education seen as a route to good citizenship and a more engaged electorate. While a good idea in principle, stopping the inevitable and natural corruption of a governing policy that would feedback selected ideas to reinforce a favourable position would be the challenge. Not impossible, but eyes wide open to the danger of political education becoming indoctrination. This has happened so many times in recorded history in the creation of large, authoritarian, governments – CCCP, National Socialists, Khmer Rouge, the list goes on.

If you are asked, ‘How important are levels of English proficiency...’, an alternative to the population effectively speaking the same language is made available by the sly ideology of political correctness. It is essential, so essential that all energy should be toward how to achieve it.

The question, ‘what effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole’, is super loaded. Diversity is a current mantra of our Political Class, it is almost impossible to be effective in politics without singing the diversity song. Integration as a process to bring communities together has in our recent history demonstrated failure – it is where we are now, trying to fix it. Assimilation, the only understandable alternative to integration, would indeed be a challenge to the Political Class under the laws of the EU. But as you can see, they are not talking about that.

29 August 2017

Professor David Morris, Director, Centre for Citizenship and Community,

Muslim Women's Network – written evidence (CCE0220)

Introduction

1. Muslim Women's Network UK (MWNUK) is a national Muslim women's organisation in Britain (www.mwnuk.co.uk). We are a small national charity (no. 1155092) that works to improve the social justice and equality for Muslim women and girls. Our membership also includes women of other faiths or of no faith and men who support our work. We find out about the experiences of Muslim women and girls through research and helpline enquiries. We identify policy and practice gaps and use this information to inform decision makers in government as well as informing our community campaigns at a grassroots level.
2. We also develop resources and train women so they are better aware of their rights. We have a separate website for our national helpline (www.mwnhelpline.co.uk) that provides advice and support on a range of issues some of which include: domestic abuse, forced marriage, honour based violence, sexual abuse, divorce, discrimination and mental health etc.
3. The impact of our work is particularly felt in reducing the vulnerability of Muslim women and girls, reducing the prejudice they face, and giving them greater access to rights and services – all of which allow them to contribute to society like any other citizen. We are also creating a critical mass of voices to influence change with more women being confident to challenge discriminatory practices within their communities and in society and to influence policy makers.
4. Our knowledge and experiences are therefore directly relevant to the House of Lords Select Committee. Although we work predominantly with Muslim women and will therefore focus on the experiences of Muslim women within our Evidence, the points we raise can also be relevant to Muslim men and the British Muslim community as a whole. However, we feel it is vital that Muslim women are provided with an adequate voice in such matters and hope the Select Committee also gives due consideration to the experiences of Muslim women.
5. Although we have chosen certain questions to respond to directly, we have endeavoured to provide responses to the remainder of your queries within this Evidence.

Summary

1. Rather than attempting to define “British values”, it would be more productive to focus on the values universally shared across the globe and across different faiths and cultures, and promote these as part of our civic rights and responsibilities. These values are at risk of being undermined by both Far Right and Islamic extremists and it is vital that all such groups are challenged.
2. A key barrier to the civic engagement of British Muslims, particularly Muslim women, is the issue of discrimination and Islamophobia directed towards Muslims in the work place, in education, in the political arena as well as when trying to access housing and other public services.
3. There are also barriers arising from within sections of the British Muslim community due to patriarchal and misogynist views which need to be robustly challenged. Ensuring representation of Muslim women across all organisations and sectors, including within faith institutions such as mosques will promote diversity and inclusion of Muslim women in wider society, which will in turn promote a better integrated Britain.
4. Economic issues such as high tuition fees, the cost of childcare and the lack of flexible working hours can also act as barriers which need to be addressed.
5. Children and young adults should be encouraged to think critically about universal values and initiatives should be set up in school which reward civic engagement.
6. Role-modelling campaigns, such as our #AndMuslim campaign, can be utilised effectively in promoting social cohesion, integration and citizenship.
7. English proficiency is a key step towards empowerment and integration and should be encouraged. However it is noteworthy whilst some immigrants may have limited English language skills, it has not necessarily stopped their children from speaking English fluently nor impeded their children's successes, achievements and contributions to society. Moreover, it is important to also provide education and raise awareness of rights and responsibilities available to everyone as citizens so as to be able to truly empower and enable others.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

8. We have heard the term “British values” being used a number of times in recent years without, we submit, any true agreement on what these values entail. Ultimately all discussions in this regard point towards what we deem to be universal values, rather than strictly British, and which can be found in the majority of faiths and cultures.

These include but are not limited to: Rule of law, democracy, equality, social justice, respect, tolerance, community, compassion and individual liberty including freedom of choice.

9. In fact we would suggest that rather than trying to finalise a set of values that are labelled “British”, it would be more productive to focus on the values universally shared and promote these as part of our civic rights and responsibilities. This would have the effect of developing a sense of membership and belonging across all communities, and will also show that Britain is not an isolated country but one that is very much a part of a wider global community that promotes peace, harmony and social justice.
10. It is important to stress that promoting British citizenship should not mean imposing restrictions on individual liberties and human rights, unless they of course undermine human rights of others and the said universal values central to British society. A woman wearing the Niqab for example may be just as compassionate and respectful of universal values as a woman who does not. Instead of making some people feel that they cannot be “British” because of their outward appearances, we should praise them for the intrinsic, positive values they do hold.
11. From the perspective of British Muslims, the universal principles mentioned at para.6 above are also key to the Islamic faith. Islam teaches principles and values that are not dis-similar to what may be regarded as universal values, and which are held of importance in Britain. Islam promotes the principles of sovereignty of the rule of law of the state in which you reside, equality, justice, respect, tolerance and compassion, as well as citizenship and community spirit. All Muslims (including Muslim women) are encouraged to gain knowledge through education, empower themselves through employment and enterprise and make positive contributions to their communities, including taking care of the environment, being a good neighbour, carrying out charitable work or exercising their right to vote. As such, there is no conflict between Islamic values and those values which we believe are the cornerstones of British society.
12. Unfortunately, some Muslims in the UK have forgotten the true essence of Islam which is why we hear of gender inequalities, of intolerance and of barriers being placed which hinder engagement with civic society. A lot of misinformation can be found in some cross-sections of the British Muslim community. For example, some may believe that women do not have the right to vote whilst others are told that Muslims cannot participate in the democratic process of a non-Muslim majority society. Another example would be the misogynist notion that Muslim women should not enter the workplace, and do not even have a place at a mosque. These attitudes are a serious threat to the universal values which we believe are of importance to British society and need to be challenged.

13. However, we can utilise the messages of Islam to our advantage and remind British Muslims of the principles of their faith which will empower others to take steps to promote their participation in public life and strengthen their feelings of belonging and citizenship.
14. The other threat to these universal values come from Far Right extremists who promote hate and intolerance towards women and minority groups, and particularly towards British Muslims. Where there are some Muslims who feel they do not belong and therefore cannot engage in civic society, we have those on the Far Right telling them precisely that – that they are not citizens, that they should not be part of British society and that they do not belong. The intolerance shown by such groups makes some British Muslims, and indeed various other minority communities, feel that they can never truly belong even if they were born in UK, shared the pride and values of being British and made contributions to society both socially and economically. Many a times we have heard the phrase “back home” being used by for example, second and third generation British Asians to describe their parent or grandparents country of birth. Whilst we do not intend to police or dictate language or feelings and appreciate that the dynamics of every household can be different (and a person can in fact have dual citizenship), the point we make is that some individuals from minority groups are feeling disconnected from British society due to being made to feel unwelcome, and some are even feeling “state-less” in their minds because they feel they do not belong anywhere – they are not British enough in Britain and too British for the rest of the world.
15. It is ironic that Far Right extremists and Islamic extremists tend to share the same views and values on a number of matters; both these extremists agree FGM is an Islamic practice for example, which undermines all the hard work carried out by Anti-FGM activists who have endeavoured to stop FGM in some communities by highlighting that FGM is in fact against Islam. Or perhaps it is not ironic that those who threaten social cohesion and harmony agree with one another.
16. We can see from media reports that British Muslims, and particularly Muslim women who can be more visibly Muslim due to their attire, have been regularly subjected to violence and abuse at the hands of Far Right extremists and these are only the cases that have been reported. MWNUK are aware of many instances of anti-Muslim hate which are going unreported for various reasons, including a fear of reprisals and feeling that they will not be heard or given justice. Online abuse has also escalated. We are aware that some Muslim women are having to make compromises in a bid to ensure their safety; for example, some Muslim women have chosen to give up jobs where they were making great achievements and giving up chances of quick progression so that they may take up employment that is nearer to home and therefore will reduce their commute time, or will allow them to avoid certain routes where they feel they could be a target. That someone in Britain must choose between their career and safety is abysmal and it goes without saying that such instances are clearly undermining civic engagement of Muslim women.

Why do so many communities and groups feel 'left behind'? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups – white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

17. A key barrier to active citizenship of British Muslims in public life is the discrimination and Islamophobia being experienced by them, and this is especially the case for British Muslim women.
18. We are aware that direct and indirect discrimination towards Muslim women in the workplace is very prevalent, as shown by the number of calls received by the MWN Helpline on such issues. However such discrimination is generally under-documented and under-reported, particularly in respect of Muslim women. This makes it difficult to reference research and statistics to highlight the extent of the issue involved. The Women & Equalities Committee did however find and report that Muslim women face triple discrimination in the workplace, as well as when trying to obtain employment, when they held an Inquiry early 2016 into the discrimination and barriers in employment for Muslim women⁵⁸⁰.
19. Muslim women have reported that there seem to be various stereotypes at play both in the interview process and during employment. There appears to be a presumption that they will get married and leave, or go on maternity leave and not be able to work as many hours or work as hard. These concerns are of course not limited to Muslim women only and can be shared by women of other faiths and ethnicities and on a general basis. However, it appears that the media representation of Muslim women as submissive and weak is a contributing factor for how Muslim women are treated. Like all individuals, Muslim women, and Muslims generally, also want to advance their careers and work in a healthy and safe environment; unfortunately this is seriously lacking in a number of sectors which needs to be addressed if we are truly committed to promoting civic engagement of all British Muslims.
20. It is important to remember that the burden of proof is on the employee to prove direct discrimination and it is not always easy to do so, and proving indirect discrimination is even more difficult. Even where employees have been able to cite clear examples of discrimination, they have reported how they are still disbelieved by co-workers which makes it even more difficult for them. Many feel unable to even discuss the issues they are facing in the workplace because of fear of further alienation and finding themselves penalised as a result.
21. Discrimination and Islamophobia is not only prevalent in the workplace but also in other areas, such as when trying to access housing and other public services. The rising hostility against Muslims has been fuelled by political rhetoric, media misrepresentation and a rise in right wing movements demonising the Muslim community. Such anti Muslim discourse has had an impact on the way Muslims in Britain are treated including in education, when accessing housing and other public services.

⁵⁸⁰ Please see following: <http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmwomeq/89/89.pdf>

22. Muslim women may also have to contend with issues of misogyny and patriarchal attitudes from within the Muslim community and its institutions which impacts on their ability to participate fully in public life. It is deeply concerning for us to hear for example, of British Muslim women and girls being stopped from pursuing further education or employment, or stopped from even leaving their homes without a male chaperone, due to misogynist and patriarchal attitudes which have no place in Islam nor in British Society.
23. It is even more concerning when we hear such misogyny being advocated (or alternatively dismissed as a non-issue, or even silently condoned), by key institutions and individuals within the community.
24. We wish to highlight that in January 2016 we wrote a public letter of complaint to Birmingham Central Mosque due to the misogynistic attitudes displayed by their Chair and Trustee, which included being dismissive on the issues of forced marriage and domestic violence.⁵⁸¹ The following month we wrote to the Leader of the Labour party Jeremy Corbyn MP to complain of the systematic misogyny displayed by some Muslim male Labour Councillors, who have been marginalising and silencing the voices of Muslim women⁵⁸². It worries us that these are merely examples known to us which we have publicly challenged and that there may be many more such instances within the Muslim community which are going unchallenged, and Muslim women are being adversely affected as a result. It is imperative that such misogyny is robustly challenged so as to empower Muslim women to participate fully in British society. One such means of tackling such barriers is by ensuring that there is a representation of Muslim women across all organisations and sectors, including faith institutions.
25. We are also concerned by reports of girls as young as 5 years old wearing the headscarf to school. Whilst there is some debate as to whether wearing a headscarf is compulsory generally, there is absolute consensus over the point that young children are not required to wear a headscarf. Why then are parents allowing this to happen? How can we say that a 5 year old has understood the principles behind the hijab, understands the concept of modesty and is making an informed decision? Are we not sexualising young girls in this manner? We are aware of the case of a 22 year old woman for example, who began wearing the hijab at the age of 16, incidentally at the insistence of her then boyfriend and in a bid to prove to him that she would be “suitable” as a wife in the future. The relationship ended a long time ago and she no longer wishes to wear a hijab but feels she will be judged for taking it off having put it on. Whilst of course many do wear the hijab out of choice, given that we know social stigma does exist, is it fair that a woman may feel compelled to continue wearing the hijab because of a decision made as a 5 year old?

⁵⁸¹ Our public letter can be found here: <http://www.mwnuk.co.uk/mediaStatmentDetail.php?id=155>

⁵⁸² Our public letter can be found here: <http://www.mwnuk.co.uk/mediaStatmentDetail.php?id=157>

26. Whilst we believe respect and tolerance are important universal values, we must not be wary of questioning practices which may act as a means of undermining equality and choice. In this regard we feel education in schools and colleges where open discussions can be had in respect of our universal values and civic engagement, including how different faiths practice these values, are imperative in developing critical thinking amongst children and young adults which will in turn empower them to challenge negative attitudes and become active citizens. However, we believe such education should go beyond the basic comparative exercises and look deeper. For example, when looking at Islam, discussions should be had on the different sects and differing practices and allow an evaluation of these practices with regard to the overarching Islamic principles and universal values.
27. We would also like to stress the importance of asking questions and promoting critical thinking amongst all citizens. Some individuals belonging to minority communities have made the point that their questioning of a policy or practice can lead to their commitment to UK and their level of "British-ness" being called into question, but this treatment is not meted out to their White British counterparts.
28. A further barrier can come in the form of the economic circumstances of the individual. Although this can be the case for all cross-sections of society and not just British Muslims, it still needs to be given due consideration as it can impact on the ability of Muslim women, and British Muslims generally, to participate fully in the social and economic life of British society. One issue for example, is the high tuition fees which can act as a deterrent to accessing further education. The cost of childcare can also act as a barrier for Muslim women who wish to pursue employment, especially if they are not on particularly high salaries. Whilst the government has put forward some proposals which will go towards addressing the issue for childcare costs for some, such as increasing the number of free childcare hours for children aged three and above from fifteen to thirty hours, there will still be a number of individuals for whom employment will not be cost-effective due to the costs of childcare.
29. An additional issue for Muslim women can be the lack of flexible working opportunities available, which can hinder Muslim women who may have caring or other responsibilities. In some cases, this may be as a result of unaccommodating family members, such as parents or in-laws, who expect the women to carry out certain responsibilities in the home without any compromise (such as cooking for the family) as a condition of being allowed to work. In other cases, the needs can be unavoidable such as caring for elderly parents, family members with disabilities or young children. Irrespective of the scenario however, it is apparent that flexible working would assist Muslim women to be able to perform their other responsibilities whilst also being able to work, thus engaging fully with British society.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

30. We believe that citizenship and civic engagement go hand in hand with social cohesion and integration and it is pointless to look at one aspect whilst ignoring the other. We believe diversity in schools and workplaces is key to promoting integration and social cohesion and in turn citizenship and civic engagement. Citizenship ceremonies will achieve nothing if the citizens going through these ceremonies are not able to enter the workplace or get a bus without racist comments being made. It is for this reason that we feel it is essential that the barriers placed in front of Muslims and other minority communities, and particularly Muslim women, needs to be addressed as a matter of urgency. A sense of citizenship and civic responsibility can only be felt when individuals feel they are able to fully participate in British society, without fear of discrimination or abuse.
31. This can only be achieved when equality and diversity is met at all levels and across all sectors. This includes public bodies and faith institutions. In respect of mosques, given that Muslim women make up 50% of the British Muslim community, we find it unacceptable that they have no representation within mosques particularly in terms of governance. There are various examples of mosques in the UK where the entire board is made up of men, even when the number of trustees are in double digits. Birmingham Central Mosque for example has 40 trustees, all of whom are men. Perhaps more worrying is the fact that this mosque is also a registered charity and yet is being able to discriminate against women. Misogynist attitudes which believe Muslim women cannot be involved in such matters are precisely the issues that need to be strongly challenged and eradicated, as these beliefs are hindering integration, social cohesion and civic engagement.
32. Economic barriers mentioned above at para 28, such as high tuition fees, the cost of childcare or lack of flexible working opportunities should be considered and addressed so that they do not continue to hinder Muslim women from taking up opportunities that would help them participate fully in the social and economic life of British society.
33. We also submit that integration and social cohesion are not the responsibility of British Muslims and minority communities alone, but rather the responsibility of all citizens. Much has been said about British Muslims making up the majority of the population in some areas of the UK, with these areas being used as examples of a failure to integrate. However, choice of area can be due to a number of reasons including the financial circumstances of the individual, convenience in terms of access to a place of worship or having family in the same area. That does not mean that these individuals are not integrating in their day to day lives, nor that living in an area not as populated by Muslims will aid integration. We need to address the real issues at hand and not be misdirected by perceptions.

34. Respect, tolerance, compassion and a community spirit needs to be shown by all and we clarify this point further in the following section.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers in Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

35. We agree that English proficiency is very important for enabling not only integration but also allowing individuals to access services and understand their legal rights and responsibilities. Language is a strong empowerment tool and all first and second generation immigrants should be encouraged to develop their English language skills. In this regard, we feel that individuals should be provided with the necessary support, not only in terms of funding, but also in terms of accessibility and encouragement. One Muslim woman told us that she had been learning English for a long time and whilst she was confident in her classes, she was scared of speaking English in public in case she was mocked or abused due to her accent or pronunciation. Just as immigrants should be encouraged to learn English, the rest of British society should show respect and encouragement when the same immigrants put their learning into practice.
36. It must also be noted that whilst some immigrants may have limited English language skills, it has not necessarily stopped their children from speaking English fluently nor impeded their children's successes and achievements and contributions to society.
37. We would also like to make the point that learning English alone is not sufficient to establish integration, social cohesion, citizenship or civic engagement. There are a number of Muslim women in UK who are fluent speakers of English, who were born, raised and educated in UK but who do not know of their legal rights. One example is in respect of registered and unregistered marriages; a number of Muslim women in UK have only entered into an Islamic marriage and it was only on breakdown of the relationship that they realised that their marriage is not legally recognised and that they do not have the same rights as a legally married spouse. It is important therefore to invest in education and awareness raising campaigns and strategies that enable citizenship and engagement by allowing individuals to better understand their rights and responsibilities.
38. We would also like to highlight that in some instances newcomers to Britain can in fact hold and practice universal values better than British citizens themselves. We are aware of cases where Muslim women have come to the UK on a spousal visa and wanted to obtain an education and employment and fully integrate into British society and found that their British spouse refused to allow them to do so, and they have been forced to remain caged at home for fear of abuse or divorce and being sent back to their country of origin where they are likely to face stigma or even honour based violence.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

39. Despite the various barriers, there are many Muslims, and particularly many Muslim women who have achieved great successes and participated fully with public life in Britain. We can highlight examples of British Muslim women who are doctors, lawyers, teachers, accountants, academics and politicians to name a few. British Muslim women are a part of and contributing to all public and private sectors and this is a substantial asset which needs to be highlighted so as to promote integration and participation in public life. By emphasising the achievements and contributions of British Muslims, especially British Muslim women, we will be encouraging others to also have such aspirations and take steps to empower themselves which will in turn assist them to participate fully in the social and economic life of British society.
40. It is for this reason that we at Muslim Women's Network UK launched the #AndMuslim campaign in October 2016, with the aim of challenging the negative stereotypes of Muslim women who are often portrayed as victims, oppressed or linked to extremism⁵⁸³. Our campaign instead promotes the diversity of the female Muslim community in Britain and celebrates their successes, achievements and contributions. By doing so, we highlight how Muslim women are active contributors to Britain and how for many, their faith has been an important and enabling part of their identity, which has helped them to succeed. Such role-modelling campaigns not only encourage other Muslim women and girls to take a step towards fulfilling their dreams and ambitions, but also shows other communities within the UK that the British Muslim population is not segregated or the "other", but rather is a part and parcel of British society. By challenging the stereotypes and promoting the wide-ranging positive examples, we will be educating the wider community. This can then break down the barriers between communities and promote integration, understanding and harmony across British society. After all, integration is a two way street and does require participation from all individuals in society, not just British Muslims.
41. Role modelling and mentoring schemes are useful ways of tackling barriers to participation in public life and encourages Muslims, especially Muslim women and girls, to take the necessary steps towards furthering their education and careers.
42. In this regard we wish to focus on the impact of female and BME politicians on citizenship and civic engagement. We were very pleased to see a record number of women MPs elected in the last general election, with not only included many female Muslim MPs but also Britain's first female Sikh MP. A natural consequence of diversity in the political arena is that women and individuals from minority groups feel better represented and therefore more able to engage with civic society. However, we are disappointed that despite making a formal complaint to Jeremy Corbyn MP and highlighting the systematic misogyny displayed by some Muslim male Labour Councillors who have been marginalising and silencing the voices of Muslim women (as mentioned at para. 24 of this Evidence) we are still receiving accounts from Muslim women who are facing the same hurdles we complained of. It is very disappointing that our complaints raised last year have not been addressed and would like to make the point that it is important to allow active engagement with civic society at all levels. Whilst the number of female and minority MPs elected is a positive achievement, this does not excuse the hurdles being placed at Councillor level. On this note we would like to clarify that we only mention the Labour party as the complaints made to us related to them, but we fully expect all political parties to carry out investigations in this respect and address any issues which are uncovered within their own party and its procedures.

⁵⁸³ Please see our media statement for further details regarding our #AndMuslim campaign:
<http://www.mwnuk.co.uk/mediaStatmentDetail.php?id=171>

43. A further point we wish to make in respect of female and BME politicians relates to the online abuse and 'smear' campaigns that many have been and continue to be subjected to. Whilst the MPs in question have bravely carried, seeing such harassment and online abuse can be discouraging for the wider public. If we want to promote civic engagement, we must make individuals feel it is safe to engage.
44. Whilst we do not consider citizenship ceremonies themselves necessary, we do believe there is merit in rewarding those making positive contributions to civic society and such initiatives should begin at an early age from school to highlight the importance of making positive contributions to society – including respecting diversity, helping the community and showing compassion to those in need.
45. We would also like to make the point that initiatives proposed to promote integration or civic engagement can intentionally or unintentionally ignore those with disabilities, particular with the focus on making "active" contributions. Those with disabilities should not be made to feel that they are lesser citizens in any way.

Final Comments

46. As a point of clarification, we must explain that our comments and examples have been limited to Muslim women due to the nature of our organisation and its work. As a national Muslim women's charity our work predominantly deals with Muslim and BME women albeit we also work with individuals of other faiths and are therefore also aware of issues of relevance to other faith and non-faith communities. We are also aware that some of the issues experienced by Muslim women can also be experienced by Muslim men. In turn we wish to clarify that although we may make recommendations in respect of Muslim women, we do not intend for such recommendations to apply only to Muslim women but rather to all those within wider society who may be affected and who may benefit from such recommendations.

47. We are open and inclusive and seek to promote equality and diversity for all individuals irrespective of their gender, race, ethnicity, faith, sexuality, age, disability etc., and hope that all sectors can develop an environment that is healthy, safe and harmonious for all.
48. Our case studies are anonymised for the safety and protection of those involved. Some cases however may have come to us anonymously and remained as such throughout our involvement.
49. MWNUK would like to express its willingness to assist through research, training, support, information or advice or any other means which would assist in removing barriers to integration and which will allow Muslim women to exercise their rights and choices, and participate socially and economically into British society.
50. We would like to thank the House of Lords Select Committee for holding an inquiry into citizenship and civic engagement. We also thank you for providing us with the opportunity to give Evidence and hope that it proves to be helpful in your considerations.

On behalf of Muslim Women's Network UK, Nazmin Akthar-Sheikh
Vice-Chair

MutualGain – written evidence (CCE0146)

Q1.1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st Century?

1. MutualGain thinks about citizenship as relationships and behaviours: how we connect diverse and disparate or conflicting values and behaviours in communities is fundamental to citizenship in a modern democracy.
2. The MutualGain social purpose is to: “empower organisations and communities to reconnect in the social space that lies between the state and the individual. Ultimately, we aim to promote greater participation and active citizenship within our democracy and increase social capital, for the mutual benefit of all.
3. Citizenship for us is about creating spaces for meaningful dialogue and collaborative responsibilities - it goes beyond a managerial or corporate model of engagement (where a token representative or two sits on advisory boards or service user groups) to a model which culminates in increased social capital.
4. Our work has an evidence base that proves social capital can reduce crime (31% reduction in Victim Crime), ASB (22% reduction) and the fear of crime: <https://www.mutualgain.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/01/EIP-Handout.pdf>. The indicators used to measure social capital here were trust, information sharing, and vision: all important characteristics of an open and strong society that has strong deliberative participation in place to mitigate perceptions of ‘the other’.
5. We like the following definition of deliberative civic engagement:
 - a. Deliberative: when people “carefully examine a problem and arrive at a well—reasoned solution after a period of inclusive, respectful consideration of diverse points of view.”
 - b. Civic Engagement: to make a difference in the civic life of our communities... In short, civic engagement involves forging connections “among citizens, issues, institutions, and the political system. It implies voice and agency, a feeling of power and effectiveness, with real opportunities to have a say. It implies active participation, with real opportunities to make a difference.”
6. The capacity to think, listen and learn together is encouraged in those spaces enabling individuals to learn about 'the other' and connect the similarities of their lived experiences: Citizenship builds cumulative knowledge and practice within a seemingly fragmented public sphere.
7. For this to happen effectively the statutory agencies must see the moral imperative to enable this and go beyond surveys, initiatives and projects to a genuinely co-laborative social space (Ritchie, 2015 - https://link.springer.com/chapter/10.1007%2F978-3-319-16568-4_5)

Q1.2. Why Does it Matter?

8. It is essential for excellent public services, and social responsibility: The myth that some elements of the public are “hard to reach” or ‘seldom heard’ must cease. In practice, it is our public sector that has become increasingly hard to reach resulting in citizens rarely able to meaningfully engage with local and national decision makers.
9. The public care just as much about public services as public servants do, and want to keep them strong for the most vulnerable in society at the very least, and strong for a wider social well-being. But the public are so often not afforded meaningful engagement to enable a different way of thinking and doing together.
10. Public sector agencies regularly seem to still deny the value in debating controversial issues: they seem scared they'll come under attack in the debates. Instead, they offer reassurance that the ‘lessons will be learned’ from each error of judgement that they make, with a few selected individuals or groups. This has proved to be unsatisfactory to the public.
11. Large scale transformation requires those who serve us to initiate and listen to the unpopular points of view even when it feels uncomfortable. The public don’t want reassurance, they want service. To serve you must listen. In the absence of meaningful dialogue and a commitment to build on the strengths and assets in communities, public services risk missing the very ideas that will lead to transformation.
12. Democracy is naturally difficult: let’s not shy away from democratic debate.
MutualGain is working to create a centre ground; a democratic space to share thoughts and ideas in an open and honest way. The centre ground that enables the extremes of left and right and everything in between to be discussed within a liberal framework that we used to hold dear. We must not shy away from democratic debate.

13. Declining Trust in Public Institutions and Politicians.

Putnam’s work emphasises the need for a high degree of trust, mutual respect, and an expectation that individuals will gain from putting their labour into citizenship (NHS Citizen Report on Citizenship). The founding father of social capital theory (Pierre Bourdieu) argued that a sense of obligation was essential in building that capital.

14. Obligation from the public sector to act on what they hear, and obligation on the citizens to engage with genuine offers of dialogue facilitated by the state has almost diminished – both need refreshing with strong incentives and accompanying tools for practice enhanced qualitative debate and deliberation.

15. Ritchie (2015) lists a plethora of ways in which the public could currently engage with public services, and how the government has attempted to strengthen the connection between state and individual, but she highlights the shortcomings of what are essentially communication tools or more of the same (representatives), rather than tools that encourage mutual respect and/or greater trust in each other.
16. Activism and campaigning, whether on a local or national level, are essentially oppositionist ways of engaging in citizenship. Campaigning can be a sign of citizens demonstrating their lack of trust in existing engagement structures such as their elected officials, and taking direct action in lieu of action by those who are employed to represent them. It must come as some concern that between 2014/15 and 2015/16 there was a reduction in the percentage of persons being involved in at least one social action project in their community (Community Life Survey, Cabinet Office).
17. We would suggest that this is not an indicator of increased trust in elected officials, but a decrease in the perception of impact people feel campaigning will have upon decisions made in their local community, and therefore the ability they have to influence decision making at a local level.

How does it relate to questions of identity?

18. There is a legal duty on our public sector to ensure that they do not discriminate across a range of protected characteristics. To enable them to do this well they need to better understand the impact of their policies and practice on those communities. Deliberative Civic Engagement is a core characteristic of a modern democracy.
19. "The emergence of publics depends upon objects (issues), subjects (actors) and mediums (means) of publicness." The issues, actors and ways to engage in democracy will vary according to the identities that we align ourselves to. Building the knowledge, skills and behaviours to empower different identities to be valued is an essential role of government and their associated agencies.
20. Nabachi argues that "developing the combination of knowledge, skills, values, and motivation to make that difference...means promoting the quality of life in a community, through both political and nonpolitical processes."
21. Gehring lists some of the benefits of increased knowledge gained through strong civic engagement:
 - a. citizens learn more about civic affairs
 - b. more likely to support the core values of democratic self-government, starting with tolerance
 - c. more likely to participate in civic and political affairs.

- d. more readily and accurately connect with and defend our interests in the political process.
22. The new knowledge we gain can be used effectively only if we are able to integrate it into an existing framework. (Gehring), strengthening the argument that all public services must democratise their decision-making processes.
23. The important role of government today is to create the spaces for diverse identities to come together and explore their differences and similarities and to realise their capacity to generate change together. Deliberative civic engagement can alter and change opinion on specific issues: the more civic knowledge people have, the less likely they are to fear other points of view or practices.
24. Active Citizenship strengthened through deliberative participation can help shift stereotypes and fear, and enable differences to be valued and similarities shared across the citizenry and publics within a democracy. The process of active citizenship involves the strengthening of a range of skills and competencies which can change social norms of engagement within democracies (RSA, 2012).

Q2: Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging.

25. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation?

There is evidence that when there are higher levels of social capital, people feel an increased sense of identity and belonging (ONS, 2001, p.8 and 20). As a result, people's identity as citizens might be strengthened by building social capital and promoting social interaction within communities (Koole, 2010, p.242).

26. According to Colls (2012, p.6), people need a reason to identify as a citizen of a nation. By promoting the benefits of social interaction and social capital to citizens – where they experience lower crime rates, better health and better educational attainment (ONS, 2001, p.7) – people might be more likely to identify as a citizen. While national identity cannot be invented by governments (Colls, 2012, p.6), it might be nurtured indirectly through this method of building social capital.

27. Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role?

As mentioned above, if people feel the benefits of increased social capital they might feel a stronger sense of identity. Citizenship ceremonies and the educational process could potentially be used to inform people of the advantages of social capital and active citizenship. However, given that identities are complex (Gilchrist et al., 2010, p.8) they may require time to develop naturally, rather than through top-down education.

28. Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Identities are multi-faceted and operate on different levels of community, from neighbourhood level to cities, nations and even transnationally (Gilchrist et al., 2010, p.8). Given that most people operate in multiple communities, most people maintain multiple identities (Timms, 2002, p.2). Subsequently, it must be recognised that ‘British’ might not be people’s primary identity and rather that citizens might mediate between multiple identities.

29. Openly encouraging people to be proud of being or becoming British is potentially imprudent. Some people may not welcome such attempts and some may choose not to identify themselves as being ‘British’ especially in the context of people’s places of origin, where there might be conflicting senses of identity.

30. It might be better to encourage people to be proud of being a ‘good’ citizen or a ‘good’ neighbour, regardless of being British. Is it really an issue if people feel more pride in living as a citizen of a particular city neighbourhood than being a British citizen?

Q3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities?

31. Question three seeks to address how rights and responsibilities of citizens and organisations should be presented, as reciprocal duties or as statute? It is arguable however that this is the wrong question to be asking, rather the question should centre around how to clarify and make clear rights and responsibilities to both citizens and organisations, as there is little point in creating more rights and responsibilities, if people are unaware of their own rights and responsibilities in the first place.

32. We should look to create legislation like Scotland’s Community Empowerment Act 2015⁵⁸⁴: to have an overhaul of the current principles and legislation surrounding civic engagement and compile it into a concise piece of legislation. This is especially important in a time of austerity where communities’ trust in government organisations to act on their behalf and to make a difference is particularly low. This feeling of disappointment influences citizen behaviour and results in apathy and a feeling of “what’s the point?”. An Empowerment Act and the associated practice could help bring rights and responsibilities to life if it goes beyond a communication tool.

Q7. How can society support civic engagement?

33. From the point of view of Central Government, they could follow the example of the Scottish Government by requiring Local Authorities to commit 1% of their budgets to Participatory Budgeting. This encourages active citizenship, democracy, budget literacy and dialogue at a local level. Some thoughts here: <https://www.mutualgain.org/2nd-generation-participatory-budgeting-reflections-mainstreaming-public-participation/>

⁵⁸⁴ <http://www.lexisnexis-com.sheffield.idm.oclc.org/uk/legal/results/enhdisplayunit.do?level=2&linkValue=0&docViewState=default>

34. Local Agencies (police, CCGs, Councils, Housing Associations) etc. could commit to small Grant funded Participatory Budgeting (PB) processes to initiate interest in the way places develop, for instance, by focusing on a geographical area (see our work in London, Midlands, North East and North West, and the work of the PB Network across the UK - <https://pbnetwork.org.uk>)
35. PB can also be undertaken on a thematic basis such as public health - <https://www.mutualgain.org/huge-success-cheshire-east-participatory-budgeting-process/>, or Serious and Organised Crime (<https://www.mutualgain.org/pccs-innovation-innovating-better-community-engagement/>), and hate - <https://www.mutualgain.org/blog-workshop-potential-pb-support-community-safety/>
36. On each of the above occasions active citizenship was promoted, communities connected, and hundreds of positive community projects supported.
37. This demonstrates society becoming involved in civic engagement. Not only do communities bid and vote for their preferred ideas, they are involved in subsequent evaluation, thereby ensuring that their civic engagement becomes a golden thread from start to finish.

Delivered in accordance with the principles of PB, the results can include can include increased social efficacy, better health and wellbeing, reduced fear of crime and anti-social behaviour, and subsequently reduce dependency on services as communities create powerful networks through increased social capital.

38. The responsibility lies with central government and local government to be enablers of civic engagement. While we have some evidence of this happening, we also have evidence of elected officials, public servants, and Voluntary and Community organisations acting as gate keepers, preventing support for organisations to access communities, and disrupting a democratic process to meet their own needs
39. Poor training and guidance available to public sector engagement practitioners does not aid the resolution of these barriers. Many individuals we work with whose role is to engage with citizens tell us they have received no formal training in engagement theory of methods, and are expected to copy practice from other areas without the ability to maximise the effectiveness of the engagement by understanding the theory behind it. Better training, including formal accredited learning opportunities, would undoubtedly increase the quality of engagement. Our new level 4 qualification, Building Social Capital through Community Engagement seeks to develop engagement skills in practitioners whose organisations understand that the skills required to deliver high quality engagement are not innate and are worthy of proper development (Fisher and Ritchie,

2015 - <https://academic.oup.com/policing/article-abstract/9/1/101/1529727/A-Functional-Shift-Building-a-New-Model-of>

40. Community assets are in abundance in all communities but often go untapped. Statutory agencies are missing opportunities to connect and build stronger democracies using different tools. We have a plethora of examples of how this can be done with some of the most disengaged communities in our society.

Q9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

41. Our experience continues to demonstrate that it is not true that apathy is a barrier to communities engaging effectively and participating as active citizens. Research such as that from Ipsos MORI and Consumer Focus, 2012 (cited in INVOLVE/RSA, 2013) demonstrate that this is a myth, and that greater opportunities for citizens to engage would be welcomed if offered at a level which allows them to engage at a convenient time and place.

42. Learning more about all communities is an excellent starting point for our public services and wider public: it helps to reduce fear and strengthens cohesion. We have legislation in place to ensure people think about protected characteristics, and when consultation is disingenuous, we have an increasingly used judicial review process. More processes of challenge are not the issue in our experience; the challenge lies in ensuring local bodies conduct equalities assessments beyond a desk based review and a few focus groups, and instead embark on continual deliberative engagement.

43. One of the biggest barriers to active citizenship in the form of engagement is the ineffectiveness of engagement and consultation currently run by statutory organisations, such as local councils, NHS or police services: Citizens question why they should participate as it ‘makes no difference’ and that the organisation involved ‘never listen anyway’.

44. There is a consistent observable problem that organisations who engage with citizens fail to share (beyond a website) the results of their engagement in a way that allows citizens to understand how their input was used and how it effected the decision ultimately made.

45. At a local level we use a simple formula for our engagement:

- a. Establish your purpose for engagement
- b. Be aspirational with your target audience (beyond the already civic minded in some cases)
- c. Understand what might incentivise those who you want to mobilise

- d. Create a process which is a positive listening experience
 - e. Use strengths based techniques to engage whenever possible
 - f. Decide and Act together
 - g. Continue the relationship beyond an 'event' to create sustainable positive outcomes
46. Many groups - BME communities and young people in particular - experience feeling 'left behind' or marginalised due to shortcomings of engagement processes outlined above (and can be better understood in this paper – https://link.springer.com/chapter/10.1007%2F978-3-319-16568-4_5)
47. Our communities want to discuss issues that are important to them, and current engagement doesn't address those issues (BREXIT, Radicalisation, Poverty, Housing etc). Many communities are strong and cohesive but their strength can be treated with fear by public services which leads to an inability to connect and debate with them.
48. Some communities might bond by poverty, race, lack of hope, housing tenure or social class and when this is not addressed by agencies/government departments it emphasises the gap between them and the State, and mistrust of the state.
49. BME young people that we work with are most conscious of the negative engagement they have with the police. We know that young black boys are more likely to be stopped and searched, arrested, charged with criminal offences, and imprisoned. The narrative around this can often lead to a lack of legitimacy of the police service and their feeling of exclusion can often be exaggerated in their wider exclusion from society.
50. The Home Office conducted 33 reviews of Gangs and Youth Violence across England. Three of our team were heavily involved in those, with one associate leading the national team. We learned that the weakest pillar of that work in local areas was 'Mobilising the Community'. At its best we found authorities working productively with a select few young people to help them exit gangs, but at worst local activity was focused just on establishing some written documentation, and few resources/willingness to do anything. We didn't find large scale deliberation amongst communities being used to help develop strategies and interventions in collaboration with the wider community (beyond the young people or specific parents) which limits the realms of possibilities at a local and national level.
51. Parents of young people cry out for help but are ignored: the circumstances that they find themselves in often require agencies and support beyond policing but instead they find themselves alone. Mobilising communities must include the mobilisation of public services as well as wider (non gang or violence related) communities. Helping each other rather than the hatred that is sometimes seen on the streets must be our aim as we experience greater levels of violent crime. This requires the police to facilitate a different dialogue with their partners and the community if communities are not to be 'left behind'

52. Greater deliberation (and associated action) can help address claims of disproportionate and racist Policing approaches and erase lines that are often drawn between citizen and state. But it has to be genuine passion and curiosity that drives the deliberation and a willingness to hear unpopular points of view.
53. Improved engagement with citizens more broadly, requires a change in the relationships held with communities across every sector. Earlier, this inquiry asks if schools should be made to deliver citizenship education. The 2005 EPPI systematic review of citizenship and student learning could be easily lifted and applied twelve years later https://eppi.ioe.ac.uk/cms/Portals/0/PDF%20reviews%20and%20summaries/cit_rv2.pdf?ver=2006-03-02-124744-420
54. Public services should demonstrate citizenship through their actions and change the way they engage with marginalised communities specifically young people. Active Citizenship is something that is practised not preached.
55. Improving and delivering civic engagement requires the reframing of community engagement so that activity leads to increased social capital by using more meaningful listening techniques, and collaborative action planning with shared power and responsibility. Only by understanding what incentivises specific communities to engage, and facilitating debate and dialogue on tricky topics are we likely to see greater levels of citizenship and reduced levels of marginalisation.
56. We know this can make a difference in society and we know there are many public servants who want to do this - they must be enabled to take this to scale and mainstream their learning beyond projects and in a way that is community led.

8 September 2017

Dr Andrew Mycock – written evidence (CCE0247)

1.1) Citizenship in the UK has undergone significant change due to a complex range of factors which relate to the overwhelming scale and pace of change during early years of the 21st century. From the local to the global, we have witnessed a rapid transformation of many social, economic, and political norms which defined post-war 20th century citizenship in the UK. British society has been demographically transformed through (internal and external) migration, enhancing social and cultural diversity and plurality but also stimulating intense and sometimes febrile debate about established forms of national and other cultural, ethnic, and civic identities. Moreover, the effects of the financial crises of the early 21st century have stimulated widespread concerns related to economic and social exclusion and inequality. Governmental programmes of austerity imposed as a response the financial crash of 2008 has seen a significant scaling back in the functions and resources of the state, thus diminishing its role and resonance in underpinning a uniform sense of British citizenship and identity.

1.2) As part of its governmental brief, the Youth Citizenship Commission also sought to address the question of what citizenship means in its final report. It concluded that people of all ages do not identify with the concept of citizenship. The report went to note ‘When we say citizenship we mean both a person’s membership in a political community and the rights, privileges and responsibilities associated with that. For the YCC, citizenship includes the activities that individuals undertake for the benefit of their community. This includes activities like political engagement, public service, volunteering and participation’. The YCC concluded that being a citizen is not a passive role. As such, it is vitally important that young people in particular are involved in politics, so they can share ideas, contribute to change and build skills and attitudes that are important in future life.

2.1) The Youth Citizenship Commission recommended that all schools should host a statutory ‘Citizenship Ceremony’ for Year 11 students in secondary schools across the UK at the end of the school year as this is the age when most young people reach the age of 16 and thus are able to sign on the electoral register. It was proposed which is attended by local and national politicians and other members of the community and could be hosted at the school or town hall. This ceremony would involve registering on the electoral roll and link to National Citizen Service and other youth social activism programmes. It was recommended that a nationally-recognised citizenship award should be established to acknowledge youth participation and social activism of young people in their schools and local communities. It was also recommended that this ‘Citizenship Ceremony’ should celebrate and welcome new British citizens and also incorporate other events linked to Local Democracy week. This would require the Local Government Association consenting to move Local Democracy Week from its current date in the autumn.

3.1) Successive UK governments over the past two decades or so have drawn communitarian thinking as they have endeavoured to (re-)establish a balance both between rights and responsibilities and between individuality and community. Concerns about the extent to which the prioritisation of individualism has encouraged social atomisation and declining levels of social capital have encouraged greater policy focus on enhancing connections between individuals and their communities. A communitarian perspective recognises that the preservation of individual liberty depends on the active maintenance of the institutions of civil society where citizens acquire understanding of their personal and civic responsibilities, along with an appreciation of their rights and the rights of others.

3.2) There has however been a shift towards neo-liberal manifestations of citizenship whereby responsibilities of citizens have been prioritised before their accordant rights. Young people in particular have experience the implications of this recalibration of citizenship, with a significant number of social, educational, and welfare rights enjoyed by previous generations now conditional, scaled back, or withdrawn completely. The realignment of citizenship highlights the extent to which younger citizens are expected to embrace differentiated and diminished rights while having to fulfil more responsibilities. Beyond important questions about inter-generational fairness – which are outside the scope of this submission – this shift has encouraged more pessimistic attitudes amongst young people about citizenship and the state.

3.3) There is need for the commission to undertake a thorough review of the rights and responsibilities of youth citizenship which should form the basis of a universal Bill of Rights. Young people should be consulted about the terms of citizenship as part of this review. Moreover such review should consider the relationship between established age thresholds for different legal responsibilities, many of which represent important transition points in life, for coherence, justification, relevance and public acceptability and associated age of accrument of the rights of citizenship for young people (see also response to Question 4 with regards to lowering the voting age).

4.1) The potential to lowering the voting age to 16 has proven an increasingly prominent feature of British politics, reflecting anxieties amongst politicians, academics and other commentators about rising levels of political disengagement amongst young people. Most political parties in the UK now support 'votes-at-16', as do an increasing number of youth-focused and democratic reform non-governmental organisations. The case for a universal lowering of the voting age was further strengthened by the extension of the franchise to 16 and 17 year-olds in the 2014 Scottish independence referendum, when 75 per cent exercised their new democratic right. The UK government subsequently empowered the Scottish Parliament to lower the voting age for its elections and those to local councils. The Wales Act 2017 devolves authority to the Welsh Assembly for lowering the voting age to 16 for local and sub-state national elections. Non-unionist elected representatives in the Northern Ireland Assembly support voting age reform. Some metro-mayors and local councils have also called for powers to be devolved to lower the voting age for combined and local authority elections within England. The commission should this review the impact of asymmetries in voting age across the UK.

4.2) There is widespread acceptance that voting appears to be habit-forming. However the extent exercising this democratic right earlier in life might increase election turnout and deepen civic commitment to voting in subsequent elections is uncertain. Evidence from Scotland and Austria would suggest the lowering the voting does increase the interest and engagement of 16 and 17 year-olds in politics. However turnout of enfranchised under-18s has proven consistently lower than the median turnout. Moreover, the argument that lowering voting age encourages a life-long voting habit is challenged by the significant decline in the turnout of Scottish 16 and 17 year-olds in subsequent national and local elections in 2016 and 2017, where less than 50% voted.

4.3) Proponents of 'votes at 16' regularly cite issues of the accrual of significant rights at that age as support for the right to vote. Such claims are open to contention in terms of universality across the UK and overlook a wider age inconsistencies with regards to citizenship rights. The Youth Citizenship Commission undertook an audit of the ages of responsibility and noted successive governments had encouraged an upward trajectory. For example, young people between the ages of 16 and 18 are now they compelled to continue in education or training, a state-imposed restriction not applicable to older citizens. It appears rather at odds to deny potential young voters unfettered access to the rights and freedoms of full citizenship but argue they are politically mature enough to vote. Voting age reform enfranchising 16 and 17 year-olds would mean they are granted a significant political right, but may still be unable to realize the full array of rights available to older citizens. This draws attention to the possibility that a 'two-tier' citizenship might have implications for inter- and intra- generational cohesion of the electorate, particularly if voters disagree on the necessity or desirability of the stratified terms of full citizenship.

4.4) The points raised above do not preclude the possibility of lowering the voting age at some point in the future. There is though a need to consider issues of voting age reform within a wider lens that consider its implications for the framing of youth and adult citizenship. Moreover, the enhancement of youth political engagement to encourage life-long modes of participation requires a more sophisticated review of the quality as well as the quantity of participation. Supporters of 'votes at 16' rightly seek to enhance our democracy but fail to acknowledge that focus on the reform of the franchise places the responsibility for decline in democratic participation squarely on the shoulders of the electorate. The detrimental impact of an under-reformed political system and culture that has become increasingly insular, self-selecting, and unrepresentative is clearly a significant contribution to political disengagement.

4.5) Compulsory voting has been suggested as one way to arrest the decline in voter turnout, particularly amongst young people. Again, it is argued that voting (and by implication, non-voting) is habit-forming. As such, compulsory voting would encourage lifelong participation while also addressing inter-generational inequalities in electoral participation by enhancing the political resonance of groups who typically vote in fewer numbers (particularly young and poorer voters). Politicians, political parties and future governments would thus engage with and develop policies on a par with those of groups who vote more frequently. However the introduction of compulsory voting would once again indicate that it is the attitudes and behaviours of citizens that requires modification rather than a reform of the political system and its democratic institutions to make them more accessible and significant. Moreover, compelling citizens to vote who have little or no interest in mainstream electoral politics or affinity with the parties on offer may well serious detrimental implications for the health of our democratic system. Forcing citizens to vote could encourage resentment of the established parties or a propensity to vote for extremists or antidemocratic parties. Suggestions that young people should be compelled to vote in their first eligible elections, similarly seek to address the symptoms not the causes of youth political disengagement.

4.6) Other initiatives should however be consider such as greater use of technology such as online voting which would allow people to vote more easily. There are legitimate concerns about data safety and propriety which would need to be addressed. It is however remarkable that in an era where we use online resources to undertake financial transactions and participate in elections for political party leadership and trade union votes on industrial action, we are not exploring with greater urgency the potential of online voting. Consideration should also be given to allowing citizens to vote early in polling stations located in public areas such as shopping centres, post offices, further and higher education campuses, and transport exchanges. Such a system exists in New Zealand and allows citizens to vote up to two weeks prior to the election date. The potential that citizens should be allowed outside of their own constituencies should also be considered (again as in New Zealand). Finally, consideration should be given to the timing of election dates. It was noteworthy the youth turnout in the 2017 general election rose significantly. It is possible that this was partially attributed to the election day being in June rather than May. This meant that young students were not burdened with end of year assessment commitments or in transition from university to home.

4.7) One of the most important recommendations of the YCC was that compulsory electoral registration of young people ought to be undertaken by schools or colleges. The switch from household to individual registration has proven successful in terms of changing practice to changing social values and cases of electoral fraud. But the move to individual voter registration has made what was a simple if flawed process more complex and potentially less democratic. Significant numbers of voters have fallen off the electoral register, particularly young people under the new system. Individual registration penalises people who live mobile lives, such as students and those in private rented accommodation. The current government initiatives has placed electoral registration responsibilities on overstretched and underfunded local authorities. With regards to young people, youth-focused social enterprises have been funded to work with schools, colleges and universities to expand the electoral register. Registration opportunities are not however universally available, being inconsistent in schools, colleges, and universities and often engaging with young people not in formal or higher education. The issue is not with individual registration per se. Australia has used individual voter registration for some time and its works on the straight-forward principle that once registered, voters stay on the register. This achieved by cross-referencing multiple databases if they move address. Electoral registration ought to be compulsory, in the same manner in which the registration of births, marriages or deaths, or the completion of a census form, is required. Information is available via National Insurance data and would provide a comprehensive and universal solution to the issue. Government could then invest funding currently allocated to registration to maintaining the register via monitoring databases as in Australia. Voluntarism in the electoral process should be confined to the decision whether or not to vote, but should not underpin the composition of the electoral register.

5.1) Citizenship education should be understood as a central of a programme of civic engagement across the UK (though it is questionable as to whether this should support 'good citizenship' as this introduces value and judgements that might limit the terms and appeal of citizenship to young people. Citizenship education should seek to encourage progressive and critical forms of citizenship amongst young people not merely replicate the norms of current and previous generations of citizens. This does not however discount the idea that the civic and the civil should be linked to connections between rights, duties and obligations that encourages socially acceptable behaviour, volunteering and active citizenship via political participation. Citizenship education should be a compulsory element of primary and secondary education across the UK. Citizenship education opportunities to learn, engage, and participate in democratic politics and social activism should also be available to all further and higher education students. Thought should also be given to how such opportunities could be made available to young people in the workplace who enter the workplace after their statutory period of education.

5.2) The original aims and outcomes of citizenship education as outlined in the 'Crick Report' of 1998 insisted one of its key roles must be to challenge the 'inexcusably and damagingly bad' levels of political literacy and participation. As such, citizenship education was introduced in England as a statutory subject to make young people 'feel that they have a stake in our society and the community in which they live by teaching them the nature of democracy'. There is a need, as the Youth Citizenship Commission noted in 2009, to restate of the importance of political literacy by placing knowledge of our political system at the heart of the citizenship curriculum. This should complement development of positives attitudes to and experience of social activism amongst young people both in schools and locals communities.

5.3) There is considerable evidence of efficacy of citizenship education in promoting democratic participation and civil engagement amongst young people. However a narrative has emerged recently that suggests that politics is not taught in schools and that ‘political education’ thus needs to be introduced. This is not helpful as it both diminishes the extensive evidence of good practice in many schools and the overlooks the expertise and contribution of the many talented citizenship and politics educators. There is no need to introduce a programme ‘political education’ in schools in England – it already exists via citizenship education. There is however need to fund its development through the provision of appropriate resources to train in-service teachers and bring through the next generation of civic educators. Furthermore, the UK and devolved governments need to support the development of their respective school curricula to ensure that sufficient emphasis and space is provided for citizenship education which embodies a significant political education element. Recent reforms of the curriculum appear however to prioritise social and economic citizenship.

5.4) There is a more pressing and fundamental question which the committee should address with regards purpose of citizenship education. The introduction of citizenship education within the English national curriculum was undertaken on the basis of 'light touch' framework which encouraged discrete and cross-curriculum approaches to develop. This has proven somewhat confusing and there is need to provide more certainty as to the form in which schools should deliver citizenship education. Critical to this issue is the extent to which citizenship education is seen as an academic subject, with appropriate assessment and qualifications, or a programme of youth socialisation. The suitability of citizenship to be tested and assessed should be considered, as its relationship with the AS and A-Level Government and Politics. In the absence of a Politics GCSE, much rests upon the efficient delivery of citizenship classes infused with a mission to deliver political education.

6.1) The final report of the Youth Citizenship Commission considered the potential to introduce a national civic service programme. It was noted that although the concept of the ‘Big Society’ had had some difficulties gaining traction, its outworking in terms of youth engagement in the form of National Citizen Service (NCS) was significant and should be supported. It did however draw attention to the limitations of civic service programmes, encouraging some recognition of international comparisons. The Cabinet Office established National Citizen Service (NCS) programme in 2011 without acknowledging these concerns. The programme is now delivered at three points during year in varying formats and in the past six years, 300,000 young people have participated (93,000 in 2016). The intended aim is to expand the programme to 360,000 participants by 2020-1 (55% increase from 2016).

6.2) But although the government targets for the expansion of NCS are admirably optimistic, recruitment has failed to meet targets set during each year the programme has run so far. Moreover high drop-out rates during programme persist. NCS has expanded considerably but lacks universality in opportunities for young people to participate both in England and Northern Ireland, where the programme runs, and in Scotland and Wales, where it does not. Moreover, concerns regarding cost (£1,863 per participant in 2016) and value for money of programme, raised by a number of government reviews, persist without any apparent action to address them. Weaknesses in governance and cost control are compounded by the programme's heavily reliance on small number of providers. National Citizen Service Act passed by Westminster in 2017 has introduced a duty for local authorities and schools to promote NCS without any apparent consideration for the potential impact on existing – and proven – local and national programmes.

6.3) Moreover, the claims regarding its long-term impacts on youth citizenship are simply not sustainable on current evidence. External evaluations indicate positive (short-term) effect on participants in terms of self-esteem, pro-social attitudes and behaviours, and transitions to adulthood. However there are strong concerns that the programme appeals largely to those young people who are all-ready engaged, thus limiting its wider impact. Moreover the expansion of NCS appears to be largely politically-driven and is not fully evidence-based. Evaluation of the programme has focused on the self-reported impacts of yearly cohorts without any longitudinal analysis of its impacts or effects over a period of time. It is concerning that the programme has been expanded without any surety of its long-term success and such an approach has been adopted at a time when many other proven national and local youth citizenship programmes have had their funding reduced or removed entirely.

6.4) There is an urgent need to address concerns regarding expansion of programme and its remit and purpose. Before the programme is further expanded, there is need to develop a longitudinal evaluation of programme to assess its efficacy and encourage strategic approach to civic service learning. There is need to also encourage innovation in programme model and delivery which empowers providers and encourages localism. The commission should consider the potential of devolving delivery of the programme within England to city-regions and local authorities, thus allowing them to blend NCS with other youth social activism and democratic participation programmes. There is also a need to improve links and connectivities with citizenship education provision in schools and colleges and enhance post-NCS alumni programmes in further and higher education and workplaces. Finally, the commission should consider the introduction of NCS as part of Life in the UK citizenship programme for new young citizens.

7.1) There exists in the UK a mature networks of youth representation across the UK (in schools, colleges, high education institutions and also at local, regional, sub-state national, and UK levels). Criticism that such bodies attract a 'particular type' of young people and do not attract significant numbers from disadvantaged and ethnic minority communities in particular. Civil society, faith, and community groups offer alternative opportunities for engagement and representation that often promote non-traditional approaches to participation. This mixture of formal and non-formal approaches offers broad but inconsistent range of opportunities for young people to engage and participate in diverse forms of representation. Impact of austerity on funding of local youth councils and civil society groups means young people across England and rest of the UK experiencing diminution of youth engagement opportunities.

7.2) There is need to address this ‘postcode lottery’ of youth engagement opportunities defined by location and community background by encouraging the networking of formal and non-formal youth representation groups (and schools) to encourage interactions of different groups of young people and build civic cohesion and agency. This requires the development of integrated networks with democratic institutions, elected representatives and other decision-makers to enhance youth engagement, agency, or efficacy. This will require sustainable funding for local, regional, and national youth representation structures to ensure a comprehensive and stable network from locality to UK-level.

12.1) ‘My Country My Vote’ is a project designed and coordinated by Kirklees Council and the University of Huddersfield. The My Country, My Vote project has had two iterations so far – the first in 2013-4 and the second in 2015-6. The programme highlights the importance of the democratic process by fostering democratic networking, peer-to-peer debate and encouraging young people to understand how they can effect change in their schools and local communities. The focus on local youth citizenship reflects the centrality of locality in framing young peoples’ civic viewfinder and personal and collective identities.

My Society – written evidence (CCE0069)

1. About mySociety

1.1 mySociety is an international not-for-profit social enterprise based in the UK, where we run a number of projects designed to give people the power to get things changed. We invent and popularise digital tools that enable citizens to exert power over institutions and decision makers, and work internationally to support partners who deploy our technology in countries around the world. As one of the first Civic Technology organisations in the world, we are committed to building the Civic Technology community and undertaking rigorous research that tests our actions, assumptions and impacts. Our global research work into digital development, civic technology and user-centred design has positioned mySociety as a leading authority in digital civic engagement and participation.

2. Introduction

2.1 Whilst themes of citizenship and civic engagement cover a very broad spectrum of activity, this submission will focus on elements of digital citizenship, participation and engagement. The use of digital technologies in civic life is common in the UK in the current age; however, the strategies employed, the technology implemented, and the impacts of such activities shape the entire participation experience, and have significant consequences for the ability and enthusiasm of individuals seeking to participate. This evidence therefore raises issues and considerations that cut across the questions and potential solutions discussed in the HoL published call for evidence. As a world leader in civic technology, mySociety has conducted extensive research and experimentation in order to understand how digital technologies can be best utilised to engage citizens in civic life, and it is upon this expertise that this evidence is based.

3. Existing points of digital engagement

3.1 There are currently a number of digital routes by which citizens may engage with civic life online. These can primarily be grouped into five categories: Social Media (Twitter, Facebook etc); Reporting Mechanisms (online forms or apps feeding one-way information digitally from citizen to public authority); Consultative Mechanisms (notices requiring citizen response to public bodies on specific issues); Informative Mechanisms (information provision to citizens without a transacting activity); and Conversational Mechanisms (email, or other two-way transactional information flows). These various mechanisms enable higher volumes of interactions and reduce barriers such as distance and time, but are imperfect in their execution, especially when used by official, bureaucratically structured organisations to engage with the public. This section provides a brief overview of these categories, their strengths and their weaknesses.

3.2 Social media provides a low level and high volume means of civic engagement. It has been shown to enable and instigate engagement by a wider audience than traditionally engaged groups; however, conversation is unstructured and vulnerable to a range of problematic issues such as co-option, bullying and harassment, echo-chamber effects, and fake news. Civic participation through social media is effective for collective and campaigning activities as an organising and/or broadcasting method, but provides limited benefit in more meaningful participation with the state itself. The quality of interaction between state and citizen through social media is also highly variable due to the differing communications strategies, personalities and digital competencies held within different authorities, and public and political offices. Negative engagement experiences with one form of authority have been shown to reduce the probability of citizens attempting to engage digitally a second time, and as such, there is a real risk that poor digital engagement strategies may in fact have a disengaging effect.

3.3 Reporting mechanisms online provide citizens with the opportunity to notify officials about certain issues. Traditionally such mechanisms allow information to flow only one way, for example, where a citizen reports an incident or issue to a local authority (such as on FixMyStreet.com), with the expectation that the authority in question will remedy the issue. Such tools can provide a valuable and user-friendly conduit for information, and can improve the maintenance and management of communities through what is essentially the crowdsourcing of information that is vital for officials to deliver their services. Such mechanisms are, however, often executed poorly online as a result of ineffective digital architecture, lack of research in the design of the service and lack of human and financial resources to build and maintain a user-friendly digital interface. mySociety research has shown that even the cosmetic appearance of a reporting mechanism will have an effect on the type of person that will consider using it, potentially to the detriment of large groups within society. Another issue with these tools is that they rarely provide the citizen with follow-up information. If a citizen reports an issue that is not clearly followed up, they have been shown to be less likely to report other issues in the future (Peixoto, 2016).

3.4 Consultative mechanisms online generally comprise an invitation from official sources to citizens to provide feedback or opinion concerning very specific themes or issues. These mechanisms operate very narrowly, and generally allow information to flow in only one direction. Engaging digitally through consultative mechanisms can allow interested citizens to provide expert and valuable evidence on specific issues; however, they require citizens to have existing levels of motivation, skills and engagement. Online surveys are easier for citizens to engage with than requests for written evidence, and require a lower time commitment; however, often survey methodologies employed by official channels are not sufficiently accommodating to collect relevant related information, and can often appear tailored to acquiring support for pre-existing policy ideas. Consultations online requesting written information provide much greater flexibility, but require that the respondent has sufficient reading, policy understanding and digital skills/resources to understand the purpose of the consultation, and the composition skills to present their thoughts. Both surveys and written calls online generally require respondents to move between several web pages, with PDF files containing further details often a feature of responding to written calls, and external non-mobile-responsive websites used for surveys. These are not trivial issues, as individuals with low levels of digital, reading or writing skills, and individuals using mobile devices or devices that do not run PDF software may be easily deterred from engaging with these exercises.

3.5 Informative online mechanisms tend to be the most common information interaction between citizen and state, in which citizens are simply able to access websites and other digital information outlets to collect the information they require without having to ask for it. Gov.uk, TheyWorkForYou.com and local authority websites fall into this category. While it could be argued that this is not a ‘participative’ activity, it is in fact such information provision that will often catalyse further action, whether that is a digital action on the same website, an action that engages with a different section of government, social media or NGO, or an offline action. Easy access to relevant information is one of the most empowering factors in citizen-government interaction, as it enables the citizen to understand the rules and structures within which any participation will take place, and who the relevant stakeholders are. This is particularly important in multi-level governance or devolved contexts, and when individuals are dealing with extremely large and complex organisations. Information provision online by government is, however, variable in quality and user-friendliness. Whilst Gov.uk represents significant strides forward in improving the quality and usability of information concerning central government, it is mySociety’s experience that most people get involved in democracy and participation online closer to home where local issues directly concern them. Official information provision mechanisms tend to be of a lower quality at the local level and less conducive to use by citizens lacking confidence and skills, and again, negative experiences online at a local level may inhibit the willingness of citizens to wish to engage further, either in an online or offline capacity.

3.6 Online conversational mechanisms represent a higher quality of interaction for citizens engaging through official channels because of the two-way information flow. Citizens are able to interact with a ‘real’ person, rather than a form or official email address, and are often provided with the opportunity to use their own words and experiences during the interaction, with officials able to respond, clarify and provide the relevant service. Examples of conversational mechanisms are FOI request procedures and the website WhatDoTheyKnow, or the ability to email political representatives or message them through sites such as WriteToThem. While the cost for providing two-way interaction online is higher for authorities, it provides an overwhelmingly better experience for users, and in many ways compensates for flaws in digital design that may deter individuals from engaging through forms or reporting mechanisms. Users of mySociety services often comment that although their specific issue may not have been solved or their request for information fulfilled, they appreciated the ability to interact with a person and to receive an explanation for why their issue could not be resolved. While many online engagement mechanisms are becoming more intelligent and more automated, such automation should not be built without providing citizens with clear alternative mechanisms to interact digitally with public officials.

3.7 This section has briefly reviewed the most common participation and engagement mechanisms employed by official bodies, and has demonstrated that many such tools are vulnerable to poor design and implementation that can significantly affect the volume of people able to engage and can alienate certain demographics. Any future engagement or participation digital solutions must be mindful of the merits of each method.

4. Individual barriers to digital engagement

4.1 A significant number of individuals in the UK remain on the wrong side of the digital divide, and currently, there are 15.2 million adults in the UK that are either non-users or very limited users of the internet. While digital education in schools is improving, it is a myth that all young people are digital natives. It is perhaps unsurprising that many older people lack digital skills; however, people on low incomes, those with low levels of education, people with social, physical or learning needs, people from certain ethnic minority groups and people not participating in economic activity are also amongst the most likely to lack digital skills. Approximately 90% of non-internet users are disadvantaged in some way. Unfortunately, these are likely to be the people using public services the most, and therefore the migration of services, participation and information online represents a huge hurdle to engagement for these service users.

4.2 Digital civic participation requires skills, resources and in many cases an incentive or specific motivation. The Good Things Foundation has demonstrated the benefits of upskilling those that find themselves on the wrong side of the digital divide, however individuals often require additional support to engage with civic or democratic issues that require a different body of knowledge. mySociety has identified that individuals with lower levels of education, individuals with lower incomes and individuals not in work are more likely to engage with civic issues at a local level in the first instance, and therefore digital design of civic engagement mechanisms should accommodate local aspects in order to engage individuals that are not well represented in state-level civic engagement activities.

5. Institutional barriers to digital engagement

5.1 While the digital divide represents external factors in reducing civic engagement online, the opaqueness, structure and bureaucracy of the public sector has also been shown to limit the effectiveness of digital government-citizen interaction. Many public sector organisations use ageing digital infrastructure, incompatible with new software that is able to streamline workflows and citizen interactions. A number of innovative online tools are available for citizens to interact with officials efficiently, however in many cases these are unable to be integrated with official systems to create a seamless experience for both user and service provider. The Open311 standard is a good example of how such barriers can be surmounted, but often are not, due to the commitments many public bodies have to outdated IT structures. Additionally, many civil servants outside of teams with a dedicated digital remit lack the confidence to use new technologies, and as such may frustrate implementation through bureaucratic means.

5.2 Many public-facing government websites and digital tools reflect the structures of their internal bureaucracy, rather than being designed with the needs of the user in mind. This manifests in information or tools being placed on file-paths that are grouped under the responsibilities of departments or specific initiatives. This reduces the likelihood of individuals engaging through the most appropriate channel, because the logic of the user is very different to the logic of the bureaucracy. User-design research in the build phase of engagement tools is vital in understanding how to cultivate higher volume and more efficient engagement.

5.3 Should the HoL Committee recommend further participation and engagement activities be explored in a digital format, consideration of how bureaucratic structures may frustrate those activities should be key in the design process. Where new digital tools are implemented, they may fail not because of citizen enthusiasm, but because of institutional reticence to embrace new technology.

6. The benefit of designing digital participation architecture alongside policy-making

6.1 As noted in the previous sections, the design of tools for engagement is one of the most important activities in the development process. mySociety's research has demonstrated how icon placement, colour-schemes, imagery and language have a significant effect upon whether, and how, an individual chooses to engage. These design considerations have been shown by mySociety research in the USA to be best addressed alongside policy-making, rather than as a digital afterthought to a fully finalised policy. This research examined a number of case studies of tech implemented by official bodies in the USA and demonstrates that including developers and designers in the development of the policy, and through using user-design research methods, the quality of the policies made was improved for citizens and for the officials providing services. This was because bureaucratic logic, inefficiency in potential processing or accidental inconsistency within the policy was identified as a potential barrier prior to a policy being completed, and joint-working enabled more streamlined policies to emerge that would be deliverable through citizen-centred online mechanisms.

6.1 While not every policy can benefit from full user design exercises, consultation of developers and designers at the point of participation policy development would likely positively influence not only the digital engagement mechanism, but the policy outcomes as well.

7. The role of civil society in facilitating engagement

7.1 As noted in several sections in this paper, citizens often struggle to participate in civic activity for a wide variety of reasons. Civil society can, however, provide a valuable bridge between citizen and state, and can demystify methods of participation that may seem irrelevant or intimidating to individuals unused to interacting with government. mySociety research has demonstrated that the cost of facilitating meaningful interaction rises when targeting the most disengaged and digitally disadvantaged groups; however, high cost, high support and low volume targeting is effective at achieving positive outcomes. On the technology side, individuals and NGOs outside of government have demonstrated significant innovation and expertise in designing services for citizens to interact with government that are more effective and user-friendly than official channels. This external innovation is a good driver for improving official channels, and enables NGOs like mySociety to experiment and demonstrate how good outcomes can be achieved at a low cost. Code for All programmes provide another example of how it is possible to leverage external expertise into official digital activities which can be improved for the benefit of the public.

8. Recommendations

8.1 When developing new methods of civic participation, mySociety recommends that the following points be taken into consideration:

8.2 Employ digital mechanisms suited to the specific type of interaction required, mindful that the motivations and benefits to officials and citizens of the participatory exercise may be very different

8.3 Enable two-way information flows wherever possible: citizens are more positive about interactions when they feel their own voice has been heard.

8.4 Consider using more targeted digital mechanisms for individuals with low levels of digital literacy and confidence: a one-size fits all approach will generally deter the most disadvantaged.

8.5 Design participative policies collaboratively with the digital and user community: such collaboration reduces the likelihood of policy failure further down the line

8.6 Involve NGOs to engage the hard to reach and to leverage innovation and ideas into the design and implementation of participatory activities.

6 September 2017

NALC – written evidence (CCE0190)

I am writing in response to the recent Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement's call for evidence.

The National Association of Local Councils (NALC) is the nationally recognised membership and support organisation representing the interests of around 10,000 parish and town councils and many parish meetings in England. Local (parish and town) councils are the backbone of our democracy and closest to local people, providing our neighbourhoods, villages, towns and small cities with a democratic voice and structure for taking action, contributing in excess of £2 billion of community investment to supporting and improving local communities and delivering neighbourhood level services.

We welcome the opportunity to respond to this call for evidence. The key points we would make in response to the consultation are set out below:

- Local councils are ideally placed to encourage citizenship, civic engagement and social cohesion in their community and currently host a number of initiatives to encourage this through hosting events, fund raising initiatives, and keeping public services running amid the cuts coming from higher tiers of government.
- Young people are currently disengaged with politics. Getting them involved in local and national elections is key in engaging them with issues that affects them and their community. Local councils who have responded to our consultation have suggested that the voting age should be lowered to 16 to encourage younger people to do so.
- More must be done by all tiers of government to encourage citizens to volunteer and participate in their community. Citizens must engage if they are to be active in their community.

As the first tier of local government in England, local councils are positioned at the very heart of the community and ensuring that citizenship and civic engagement is promoted positively is a high priority for them. We welcome the opportunity to respond to this call for evidence.

We were however disappointed that the Select Committee decided to host the call for evidence during August; a month when local councils do not ordinarily meet. We gained a number of responses from local councils but think that number would have been much higher if the call for evidence was held outside either side of summer recess. Further to this, we would like to request for an extension of the deadline for written responses to be submitted to 8th October, to give all local councils the chance to respond to this call for evidence.

In response to our consultation, local councils from a host of different counties agreed that one of their top priorities must be to provide a reasonable level of civic support and community engagement to the area they serve. These local councils did however make the point that it is a two-way street, and citizens must also play an active role in society in order to feel a sense of belonging to their community.

Local councils have been engaging with their communities in a number of ways. They have launched public realm schemes to make their areas attractive places to live in, invested money into local community groups to provide spaces for their community to come together, and carry out work on a daily basis to ensure public services and public facilities remain available for their community to use.

Local councils who responded, agreed that hosting events and ceremonies was an important factor in engaging with their community. For example, in Berkshire, Woodburn and Bourne End Parish Council hosted a community show in the hope of bringing the community together to celebrate their area. Over 200 members of the community attended and the event (gaining a very positive response), with a demand for the show to be hosted annually.

This event relied heavily on the work of volunteers, but some of the local councils who responded highlighted that the lack of volunteers in society is an issue that is affecting citizenship. Communities are all about volunteering and if no one volunteers their time to their community, social cohesion will break down. The Government should be looking at how it can invest and support more voluntary citizenship schemes to boost volunteer numbers.

NALC has begun work to engage with national voluntary sector bodies, to explore how we can strengthen local councils and voluntary sector relations. NALC has worked with voluntary sector bodies such as NCVO and Locality and hosted a number of roundtable discussions with them to discuss volunteer engagement. NALC has also worked in partnership with these bodies on projects such as 'Our Place' and '#VolunteersWeek' to name a few.

Local councils have also reported during this consultation that there is a notable lack of interest from young people when it comes to getting involved with their community. We also think this needs to change if we are to create the civic heroes of tomorrow. NALC has been carrying out work to encourage local councils to engage with younger volunteers including hosting the Star Councils Awards and dedicating a category to Young Councillors of the Year. NALC has also launched a Diversity Commission to look at how local councils can engage with different audiences and be more representative of the community they serve.

NALC – written evidence (CCE0190)

Some local councils suggested that the Government could introduce citizenship to the school curriculum to help younger generations understand the importance of community cohesion and get them involved at an early age.

Lancing Parish Council is one local council who have been engaging with local schools. They have set up a youth council, which allows anyone from local schools, aged 13 – 19, to get involved. The youth council meets once a month to discuss issues that are facing the community and allows younger people to feed in their ideas on how the local council can go about solving them.

Local councils told us that this is not the only difficulty they are having when it comes to engaging with the younger generation. They have had huge difficulties in encouraging younger generations to vote in local and national elections.

Some local councils argued to bring down the voting age to 16, with the hope of encouraging the younger generation to get their voice heard in local and national elections. With a boost in younger voters, policies may be formed to appeal to the younger generation, hopefully leading them to engage once again with democracy.

Local councils can play a vital role in encouraging social cohesion and civic engagement in their areas but more support is needed from higher tiers of government in order for this to happen. NALC are looking to work with the national bodies for district councils, county councils and other forms of local government to discuss some of these issues.

With more spending cuts coming from central government, more restrictions are being put on local councils, and more responsibilities being transferred to local councils from other tiers of government, local councils are finding it increasingly difficult to serve their community effectively. We are calling for more freedom and support to be given to local councils to allow them to support their communities in any way they can.

Please note we are happy to provide further evidence should you need it.

Yours sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Sue Baxter". The signature is written in a cursive, slightly slanted style.

COUNCILLOR SUE BAXTER

CHAIRMAN

8 September 2017

1071

The Committee has, in places, redacted the names of individuals to prevent them from being identified.

NATECLA – written evidence (CE0216)

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

NATECLA^{xxxviii} believes that there is ample evidence to support the argument that language is the key to integration and that ESOL provision (more than just ‘classes’) is vital for promoting citizenship and civic integration. The recent APPG report on social integration Integration not Demonisation echoes our call for a comprehensive strategy for England, as already exists in Scotland and Wales. NATECLA’s report ‘Towards a draft strategy for England’ can be accessed at <http://www.natecla.org.uk/content/631/ESOL-Strategy-for-England>

Regarding the naturalisation process, many ESOL professionals believe that the former option available to lower level ESOL learners – the ‘ESOL course with Citizenship materials’ provided an excellent way for migrants to learn more about British culture and traditions (political system, history, geography, diversity, community engagement, etc.) whilst at the same time improving their English language skills, meeting new people and getting into the habit of learning. Many continued their studies after the course finished, either continuing to develop their English or going on to vocational courses. NATECLA believes this option should be reinstated. The materials were updated in 2010 and are still available for ESOL teachers to use in class if they wish to do so.

Australia and Norway provide examples of comprehensive language and integration programmes for immigrants:

- Australia: Adult Migrant English Program <https://www.education.gov.au/adult-migrant-english-program-0> and <http://www.tesol.org.au/Why-do-immigrants-require-quality-ESL-classes>
- Norway: Immigrant integration <https://www.kompetansenorge.no/English/Immigrant-integration/#ob=9658,9649,12844,9700,9659>

The following reports/websites provide evidence of barriers faced by newcomers, case studies and examples of good practice:

- House of Commons report Adult ESOL in England, 22.02.2017 <http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7905>
- ESOL Policy for Wales 2014 <http://gov.wales/docs/dcells/publications/140619-esol-policy-en.pdf>

NATECLA – written evidence (CE0216)

- Welcoming our Learners: Scotland’s ESOL strategy 2015-2020
http://www.educationscotland.gov.uk/Images/ESOLStrategy2015to2020_tcm4-855848.pdf
- Demos (2014) On Speaking Terms <http://www.demos.co.uk/project/on-speaking-terms/>
- Sue Pember (2015) ‘Why England is crying out for a national ESOL policy’.
- Refugee Action (2016) Let Refugees Learn. Challenges and Opportunities to Improve Language Provision to Refugees in England
- Nick Saville (2015) Making a strong case for ESOL investment
- Wonder Foundation Empowerment Through Education: Women Breaking the English Barrier (2016) <http://wonderfoundation.org.uk/RefugeeESOLReport>

There have been many initiatives and projects such as those funded by the European Integration Fund which have focused on language and integration, e.g. Active Citizenship and English <http://www.learningunlimited.co/projects/ace> A project which trains local volunteers to support ESOL learners is Talk English <https://www.talk-english.co.uk/>

Another example is a recent Scottish project which built on a peer education model. Sharing Lives, Sharing Languages: A Pilot Peer Education Project for New Scots’ Social and Language Integration enabled peer groups to bring together non-native English speakers and local community members under the coordination of peer educators. The project aimed to complement the existing ESOL provision by providing group-based activities which aided language acquisition.

NATECLA would be happy to provide oral evidence to the Committee on request.

Supplementary written evidence from National Citizen Service Trust – CCE0269

1. FSM data

Relevant extract from transcript

Response

Relevant extract from transcript

Response

Relevant extract from transcript

Response

Michael Lynas

National Council for Voluntary Organisations – written evidence (CCE0239)

The National Council for Voluntary Organisations (NCVO) is the largest membership organisation for the voluntary sector in England. With nearly 13,000 members, NCVO represents all types of organisations, from large ‘household name’ charities to small voluntary and community groups involved at the local level. NCVO is the national champion and voice for volunteering in England and we are committed to supporting, enabling and celebrating volunteering in all its diversity.

Executive Summary

Charities play an important role in providing opportunities for civic engagement, particularly through volunteering and social action.

For charities and voluntary organisations to fully play their role in supporting citizenship and civic engagement we believe that the committee should focus on how to:

- support and enable volunteering to thrive in all its forms, but maintain the principle of voluntary participation
- support and enable charities working within communities to develop social cohesion and integration
- support and enable charities to play their part in civic engagement and developing a new generation of volunteers, by recognising and encouraging their campaigning role

Volunteering is in itself a powerful expression of citizenship and civic engagement, but also acts as a route to a range of other civic activities, and can develop a long-term commitment to civic engagement.

NCS has made an important difference for many young people, but there are a number of steps that should be taken to enable NCS to be more effective at encouraging young people to become active citizens and to ensure it can play a role as an entry point or staging post on a longer journey of social action and volunteering.

Young people must be able to complete high quality social action opportunities as part of the programme, and the NCS Trust must ensure there are pathways for NCS graduates into other volunteering and social action opportunities and that NCS provides practical support to young people to get involved after the programme.

Further and better collaboration between NCS and the voluntary sector is needed, and in particular NCS must support smaller, local organisations so that they are able to effectively deliver the programme and ensure that commissioning processes are accessible to these organisations.

The Government's full time social action review provides a chance for more detailed exploration of the opportunities and challenges presented by longer citizen service schemes, but as with all volunteering it is vital that these schemes provide high quality experiences.

It will be important for the committee to engage with the full time social action review so it can seek assurances that any growth in full-time social action will be driven by a commitment to high quality and accessible opportunities for a diverse range of young people.

NCVO is opposed to making programmes like NCS, which include an element of volunteering, compulsory: this would be contradictory to the principle of volunteering and counter-productive to the spirit of altruism that is at the heart of volunteering.

Rather than look at compulsion, we recommend that the committee explores ways to remove barriers to volunteering, including:

- Making it easier for unemployed people looking for work to volunteer, by getting rid of red tape and confusion about the rules.
- Providing a support fund to address barriers to volunteering for people with disabilities
- Encouraging more employers to allow time off work for volunteering, including time off for trustees
- Strengthening volunteer development and management

Voluntary organisations, especially those working within a local community, make a major contribution to building social cohesion and integration, using a wide variety of different models.

We urge both national and local government to look closely at the many projects being run at the community level, identify good practice, and ensure stable funding for groups who are effectively delivering more cohesive communities.

To ensure long-term funding for these projects, we believe that the government's forthcoming Dormant Assets Fund should be used to build on the success of local community foundations by creating income-generating endowment funds. Money from dormant assets could be used to incentivise donations from philanthropists, further growing these funds.

Charities are also an important route for political engagement, and provide a route for individuals to become more politically active. This role that charities play should be enabled and celebrated, however there remain concerns about the regulatory environment of charity campaigning, which could have a knock-on restrictive impact for individuals' ability to engage politically.

The government should both continue to publicly back the role that charity campaigning plays in developing public policy and involving individuals in the political process, and not undermine this role through its policy choices. In particular we urge government to implement the recommendations made by Lord Hodgson, following the review of third party election campaigning.

The role of charities and voluntary organisations in civic engagement

1. NCVO welcomes the opportunity to take part in this inquiry, the remit of which includes a number of issues which charities have to consider on a daily basis.
2. While many individuals engage with and participate in civic life independently, for many others charities and voluntary groups can serve as both an introduction to civic engagement and as a long-term vehicle for activity including volunteering, fundraising, and campaigning.
3. In particular, we believe that volunteering and social action are an important part of the experience of citizenship and civic engagement. It can also set people on a journey through which they may engage or participate in many other forms of activity as an active citizen.

Volunteering and social action

4. Giving time to help others and make a difference through volunteering and social action is already embedded in the culture of our country. The latest figures show that 21.9 million people across the UK volunteer at least once a year and an estimated 14.2 million people formally volunteer once a month.⁵⁸⁷ Volunteering is therefore already a powerful expression of citizenship and civic engagement. It is a route for individuals to do something about a cause they care about: be it preserving their local green spaces; helping get homeless people off the streets; supporting victims of domestic abuse; providing company and care to older people; giving advice and support to cancer sufferers and their families.
5. Volunteers are also at the heart of many other forms of civic engagement and help mobilise others to get involved as active citizens. Volunteers are crucial for the political process⁵⁸⁸ through organising, campaigning and registering voters. Volunteers allow groups to express identity, like the two-week London Pride celebrations. Volunteers are at the heart of the trade union movement and as campaigners and protestors, volunteers also help speak truth to power and ensure that the voices of communities are heard.
6. We would like to make it easier and more rewarding for anyone who wants to volunteer. We want to seed people's interest in and ability to volunteer, setting them on a path of participating and contributing much more in their communities. Evidence, like that from the Pathways through Participation Project⁵⁸⁹, shows that participation is best understood as a journey over someone's life. For many young people structured school-based citizenship, community service programmes and the Duke of Edinburgh's Award were points of entry to participation. Programmes like NCS can clearly provide a starting point or staging post on this journey for young people. If the experience that young people have at this early stage is positive then it can also help to create a habit for life.
7. By taking a pathways approach to volunteering and participation we believe we can help build on the huge amount of activity already taking place in communities and help develop a culture of volunteering where people are able to contribute to communities at different stages of their lives. We also support the objective of the review to help open up opportunities to people who may be left behind. We want to make volunteering accessible to more people and open up the opportunity for people across communities to experience the benefits of volunteering and social action.

The role of NCS in creating active citizens

⁵⁸⁷ <https://data.ncvo.org.uk/a/almanac17/volunteering-overview/>

⁵⁸⁸ Volunteering and the General Election, Will Downs. July 2017.

⁵⁸⁹ <http://pathwaysthroughparticipation.org.uk/>

- How to enhance the role that NCS can play in creating active citizens
8. NCVO is supportive of NCS and we recognise it has made a big difference for lots of young people, improving their confidence, developing team-building and life skills, and increasing their awareness of their local community⁵⁹⁰. Giving young people an experience of volunteering or social action early in life can help encourage them to continue to participate in future. According to one report, 80% of teenagers who have volunteered said it improved their future employment chances and made them want to volunteer more⁵⁹¹. It also fits with evidence from Pathways through Participation where younger interviewees identified structured school-based citizenship, community service programmes and the Duke of Edinburgh's Award as common points of entry to participation. Other entry points or staging posts outside of NCS should therefore also be considered as valuable routes for creating active citizens⁵⁹².
 9. Despite many positives, more can be done to improve the social action element of the programme, which involves young people planning and delivering a social action project to benefit their local community across two weeks. The social action element of the project is ranked lower than other parts in evaluations. Tellingly, only 28% of participants rated the help they were given to plan social action projects as 'very good' (compared to 64% saying staff overall were 'very good')⁵⁹³.
 10. We believe there are a number of steps that could be taken to enable NCS to be more effective at encouraging young people to become active citizens and to ensure it can play a role as an entry point or staging post on a longer journey of social action and volunteering.
 11. Young people must be able to complete high quality social action opportunities as part of the programme which encourage them to get involved as active citizens in future. We know from research conducted by NCVO, Institute for Voluntary Research and Involve, that the "quality of the participation experience is pivotal in determining whether people continue"⁵⁹⁴.
 12. The NCS Trust must ensure there are pathways for NCS graduates into other volunteering and social action opportunities and that NCS provides practical support to young people to get involved after the programme. The most recent evaluation suggests that this is a key area for improvement with only 17% of participants rated

⁵⁹⁰ House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts: National Citizen Service.

⁵⁹¹ Demos: Introducing Generation Citizen. 2014

⁵⁹² <http://pathwaysthroughparticipation.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/sites/3/2011/10/Informing-and-influencing-policy.pdf> p2.

⁵⁹³ National Citizen Service 2015, Evaluation. March 2017. Ipsos Mori. p.16

⁵⁹⁴ Pathways through participation: What creates and sustains active citizenship? September 2011. NCVO, IVR and Involve. p.7.

‘very good’ the support they received to find other volunteering opportunities after the programme ended.⁵⁹⁵

- Further and better collaboration with the voluntary sector is needed

13. We welcome the Government’s amend to the preamble of the royal charter to state that other organisations supporting young people should benefit from the actions of the Trust. In order to maximise the impact of NCS it is important that the requirements in the Royal Charter for NCS to collaborate are met at all levels of delivery by NCS providers. This includes close collaboration with voluntary sector partners at the local level.
14. NCVO has also welcomed the recent new partnership announced with the Scouts as a step in the right direction for NCS to work more closely with other charities with expertise to support the programme and its objectives⁵⁹⁶. This partnership also aims to help set young people on a lifetime of volunteering and involvement in their communities. More opportunities like this should be explored. To not embed this more collaborative approach in future delivery would be a missed opportunity for young people.
15. NCS must also support smaller, local organisations so that they are able to effectively deliver the programme and ensure that commissioning processes are accessible to these organisations. Local voluntary organisations and volunteering infrastructure have a great deal of skills and expertise to offer the programme but to date NCS has failed to nurture and capitalise on this expertise to support the effective delivery of the programme and the quality of the offer for young people. For example, organisations such as volunteer centres form a crucial part of participants’ experiences and future participation in social action. We understand that the Trust intends to consult with volunteer centres about introducing a place-based approach to NCS, which would be beneficial if taken forward.
16. Working in partnership in this way and further collaboration with the sector could also help to maximise the benefits of NCS for the wider sector. Ensuring NCS has a positive impact on the wider sector, as the Royal Charter now requires, may also be an important way of demonstrating better value for money. The NCS programme cost an estimated £1,863 per participant in 2016, in comparison to the estimated £550 cost of creating a place in the Scouts for four years.⁵⁹⁷

⁵⁹⁵ National Citizen Service 2015, Evaluation. March 2017. Ipsos Mori. p.16

⁵⁹⁶ Stuart Etherington, National citizen service partnership with scouts is a step in the right direction. NCVO blog, July 2017

⁵⁹⁷ House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts: National Citizen Service. March 2017

Full time social action

17. The government's decision to set up a review into opportunities and barriers to increasing participation in full time social action by young people will provide a chance for more detailed exploration of the opportunities and challenges presented by longer-term citizen service schemes. Comparisons have been made with other countries (in Europe and the United States) operating full time, year-long citizen service programmes with high-levels of participation and question why the UK doesn't have similar such schemes. Although we should draw on the learning from programmes outside the UK, these schemes may not be directly transferrable and must be considered in the context of the existing landscape of opportunities for young people and be adapted to ensure they complement and enhance other programmes and opportunities.
18. NCVO recognises that the expansion of full-time social action programmes has the potential to benefits to young people and society but with any growth in volunteering and social action, assurances should be sought that opportunities will be high-quality. To ensure this, the sector and young people should be consulted as part of the review on what expansion and recognition of full-time social action should look like and how it will fit within the wider landscape of other youth social action opportunities.
19. NCVO recommends that the review should carefully consider barriers for people accessing full time opportunities and how to address them to make full time social action more inclusive. For people without financial support or accommodation, or who are living in rural area, or have caring responsibilities - full time social action may be inaccessible. If such people are excluded from participation, they will also be excluded from the perks. Disadvantaged young people are already underrepresented in social action figures⁵⁹⁸- this must not create an additional barrier. The review must consider accessibility, barriers and the scope for flexible alternatives to 'year of service' programmes.
20. The committee should engage with the full time social action review and should seek assurances that any growth in full-time social action must be driven by a commitment to high quality and accessible opportunities.
 - Should voluntary citizenship programmes be compulsory?
21. NCVO is opposed to making programmes like NCS, which include an element of volunteering, compulsory. The introduction of any element of compulsion would be contradictory to the very definition of volunteering, which involves people choosing to give their time freely to make a difference to others, the community and the environment. If compulsion is involved it simply is no longer volunteering.

⁵⁹⁸ #Iwill and Ipsos Mori. Youth Social Action in the UK- 2016

22. Evidence suggests that this would also be counterproductive if the aim is to create more active and engaged citizens. Insight into how and why people participate shows that if people feel that action is being driven by an external agenda, it is likely to negatively affect their feelings about participation as it runs counter to the heart of voluntary action - that it is about free choice rather than coercion or a sense of obligation.⁵⁹⁹
23. Comparable programmes elsewhere in Europe, such as programmes run in the United States, France and Germany are voluntary. Compulsory involvement in citizenship schemes appears to only be used in countries with military conscription, as an alternative form of service for conscientious objectors or those unable to serve in the armed forces.
24. Compulsion would also mean that the unique and distinctive contribution that volunteering makes would be lost. Volunteers, active outside the state or the market, give their time freely in the service of others. This is civic engagement in its most powerful and articulate form. People who receive support from volunteers value the distinct nature of this activity and its intrinsic value. For example, the King's Fund have suggested patients see an intrinsic value in knowing the support they are receiving from a volunteer is truly voluntary and the volunteer wants to be there⁶⁰⁰.
25. NCVO strongly argues against compulsion and urges the committee to focus its efforts elsewhere, to explore how more high-quality opportunities for people to engage in volunteering and social action can be developed and to address the barriers that exist to people getting involved in these activities.
- Supporting civic engagement through volunteering
26. Millions of people give their time and talents as volunteers every day⁶⁰¹ and make an astounding contribution as active citizens to improving lives and communities across the country. However, overall levels of volunteering while remaining stable are difficult to increase⁶⁰². We also know that some groups, who can have the potential to gain most from becoming active citizens through volunteering, find it more difficult to get involved and experience the benefits. For example, 15% of people from the most deprived areas of England volunteer formally, compared with 36% in the least deprived⁶⁰³. Those who are educated to a degree-level are almost three times more

⁵⁹⁹ <http://pathwaysthroughparticipation.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/sites/3/2011/10/Informing-and-influencing-policy.pdf> p.3

⁶⁰⁰ Kings Fund. Volunteering in Health and Care: Securing a sustainable future. P.9

⁶⁰¹ NCVO Civil Society Almanac 2017

⁶⁰² NCVO Civil Society Almanac 2017

⁶⁰³ NCVO Civil Society Almanac 2017

likely to volunteer than those with no formal education⁶⁰⁴. Only 40% of the least affluent 10-20 year olds volunteer, compared to 49% of the most affluent⁶⁰⁵ and women, young people and people from BAME groups are underrepresented on trustee boards⁶⁰⁶.

27. Whilst recognising the huge contribution volunteers already make, there is clearly more that can be done to help reduce barriers to volunteering and help more people to become active citizens and make a difference.
28. We need to make it easier for unemployed people looking for work to volunteer, by getting rid of red tape and confusion about the rules. Unemployed people looking for work and receiving benefits can volunteer, yet are often told they can't. NCVO has worked with DWP to issue clear guidance on eligibility to volunteer whilst receiving benefits⁶⁰⁷ but more needs to be done to ensure this is implemented by Job Centre plus staff on the ground and people who are unemployed get the opportunity to volunteer and experience the associated benefits.
29. The government should provide a support fund to address barriers to volunteering for people with disabilities. Too often, disabled people miss out from the potential benefits from participation in volunteering and social action and can get left behind. Government currently provides Access to Work grants, money for practical support for people with disabilities, health or mental health conditions. We think that volunteering can play an important role in the pathway to employment for those trying to enter the labour market - and the extension of the fund could help more people access volunteering opportunities, making both a contribution to their community alongside building their own skills and improving their employability.
30. We need to encourage more employers to allow time off work for volunteering, including time off for trustees. We know that lack of time is the number one barrier preventing people from volunteering⁶⁰⁸. We urge the government to get employers to allow time off work for volunteering, particularly for trustees. Allowing time of work for trustees would simply require an amendment to existing legislation (section 50 of the employment rights act) that currently gives employees the right to request time off work for public duties such as performing duties as a magistrate or school governor⁶⁰⁹. Such a proposal was supported in the House of Lords committee report earlier this

⁶⁰⁴ Community Life Survey 2015-2016

⁶⁰⁵ #Iwill and Ipsos Mori. Youth Social Action in the UK- 2016.

⁶⁰⁶ NFP synergy \(2016\) National Trustee Survey and Grant Thornton – Charity Governance Review 2016

⁶⁰⁷ NCVO- Volunteering and benefits

⁶⁰⁸ NCVO Civil Society Almanac 2017

⁶⁰⁹ <https://www.gov.uk/time-off-work-public-duties>

<http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/1996/18/section/50>

year⁶¹⁰. Reducing such a barrier could enable a more diverse range of people to get involved in trusteeship as data shows that there is a lack of diversity in trustees- who tend to be older, male and white⁶¹¹.

31. We want to strengthen volunteer development and management. To ensure volunteers have the right skills and support to make a bigger difference and a rewarding experience, there should be targeted investment in high level and sophisticated volunteer management. Investment could also be targeted to areas of deprivation to build a more diverse community of volunteers, giving access to volunteering opportunities and the necessary support to people of all ages and backgrounds.
32. Funding can be better allocated towards ensuring better quality volunteering rather creating demand. An example that demonstrates this is the Youth United Foundation. An investment of £20m awarded to the Scouts Association has ensured over 40,000 places were opened for young people to participate in uniformed organisations in areas of deprivation. Together with Girl Guiding, over 120,000 young people have been signed up, but they are now on waiting lists and close to 30,000 volunteers are going to be needed to address this.
33. High quality volunteering opportunities need investment and the right support. NCVO welcomed the House of Lords select committee on charities' recommendation for greater investment in volunteer management, support and training and that funders needed to be more prepared to fund invest towards such aims⁶¹².

The relationship between citizenship and civic engagement and social cohesion and integration

34. Voluntary organisations play a role at the heart of many communities, and are often able to bring together diverse groups of people from different backgrounds. Local charities in particular, have both a major stake in their community and a knowledge of those who live in their community, and are well placed to support attempts to build social cohesion.
35. Projects run by charities large and small are contributing to social cohesion and integration. For example Action for Refugees in Lewisham runs a supplementary Saturday school, serving 44 different nationalities with teaching designed to improve the self-confidence of children and their ability to integrate⁶¹³.

⁶¹⁰ House of Lords Select Committee on Charities: stronger charities for a stronger society, March 2017

⁶¹¹ NFP synergy \(2016\) National Trustee Survey and Grant Thornton – Charity Governance Review 2016

⁶¹² House of Lords Select Committee on Charities: stronger charities for a stronger society, March 2017

⁶¹³ <http://www.afril.org.uk/en/services/rainbow-club/>

36. Playing Out, a Bristol-based Community Interest Company, has developed a model where the community ensures children can play on the street, allowing them to build connections in their communities, with 15,000 children and 7,500 adults having been directly involved⁶¹⁴.
37. We urge both national and local government to look closely at the many projects being run at the community level, identify good practice, and ensure stable funding for groups who are effectively delivering more cohesive communities.
38. These locally-based groups have continued to play a crucial role in local communities, despite the challenging funding environment of recent years. This was particularly important in the aftermath of last year's EU referendum, when a number of charities were required to respond to an increase in the incidence of hate crimes⁶¹⁵.
39. Local authorities have been under particular pressure with regards to funding in recent years, but the role of community organisations in bringing people together must be supported for the long-term. We believe that the government's forthcoming Dormant Assets Fund should be used to build on the success of local community foundations by creating income-generating endowment funds. Money from dormant assets could be used to incentivise donations from philanthropists, further growing these funds.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

40. Charities are often a route for individuals to engage politically. Sometimes this will be done through charities specialising in democratic engagement, but often this will be in a range of activities related to advocacy, whether through signing a petition, using charity materials to write to their MP or taking a more active role in campaigning for or against particular policies.
41. The campaigning environment for charities is thus also crucial in allowing more individuals to take part in the political process, both between elections and during the campaign.
42. A number of charities have expressed concern at the impact of the Transparency of Lobbying, Non-party Campaigning, and Trade Union Administration Act 2014 and the restrictive effect it had on their campaigning activity in the general elections in both 2015 and 2017⁶¹⁶.

⁶¹⁴ <http://playingout.net/about/the-impact-of-playing-out/>

⁶¹⁵ <https://blogs.ncvo.org.uk/2016/06/30/easing-community-tensions-practical-advice-for-charities/>

⁶¹⁶ https://www.bond.org.uk/sites/default/files/29_08_2017letter_to_tracey_crouch.pdf

43. It is also concerning that several other interventions by government and the Charity Commission have seemed to undermine the valuable role of charity campaigning even where changes were made after the concerns of civil society were acknowledged, as was the case with the anti-advocacy clause⁶¹⁷ and the Charity Commission's guidance on campaigning during the EU referendum in 2016⁶¹⁸.
44. It should be remembered when considering the role of charity campaigning that the role of volunteer campaigners, working together with like-minded people, is often at the heart of those campaigns, and that restrictions on charity campaigning have a knock-on impact on the ability of individuals to volunteer and engage on the issues that matter to them.
45. The government should both continue to publicly back the role that charity campaigning plays in developing public policy and involving individuals in the political process, and not undermine this role through its policy choices. In particular it should implement the recommendations made by Lord Hodgson, following the review of third party election campaigning⁶¹⁹.

⁶¹⁷ <https://blogs.ncvo.org.uk/2016/12/02/a-resolution-to-the-anti-lobbying-clause/>

⁶¹⁸ <https://www.civilsociety.co.uk/news/charity-commission-in-climbdown-on-eu-referendum-guidance.html>

⁶¹⁹ Third Party Election Campaigning: getting the balance right, March 2016

National Education Union: National Union of Teachers Section – written evidence (CCE0240)

1. The National Education Union - NUT Section welcomes the opportunity to respond to the call for evidence from the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement's.
2. The following response focuses on the place of global learning for global citizenship and engagement as a cornerstone of citizenship and civic engagement.

Question 1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

3. Citizenship and civic engagement begin in the classroom. Education is a fundamental building block for creating communities of young people who feel and demonstrate that they are part of the wider community; locally, nationally and internationally.
4. In the 21st Century, citizenship and civic engagement cannot and must not be interpreted in the exclusively national sense. To do so is to fundamentally misunderstand the society in which British people, and perhaps especially young British people, live. The internet and the complete saturation of social media throughout young people's daily lives have meant that they are increasingly aware that they act within a global sphere, as global citizens.
5. Global citizenship and civic engagement matters therefore to ensure a sense of belonging in a diverse and constantly communicating world. Global citizenship and civic education teach children to better understand and interpret messages as positive or harmful and empowers them to make a choice between the two. This choice can be the difference between respect and hatred.

Question 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

6. Schools have an important role to play in teaching children about global citizenship and civic engagement.
7. There is a range of ways schools currently teach global citizenship: in some schools it is taught as a discrete subject or through subjects such as PSHE; in others, global citizenship education is mapped and planned through a whole school curriculum approach. We are concerned, however, that changes to the Key Stage 4 curriculum, assessment and accountability reforms – in particular, the EBacc, and Progress 8, are undermining the ability of many schools to deliver effective global citizenship education.
8. The House of Commons Select Committee on Education concluded in April 2017 that a high stakes assessment system ‘can negatively impact teaching and learning, leading to narrowing of the curriculum and ‘teaching to the test’, as well as affecting teacher and pupil wellbeing’.^{xxxix} These comments are relevant to the place of global citizenship education, which is finding itself marginalised by a system which prioritises success in a few test-focused subjects.
9. It has long been established (EPPI Centre 2004) that the quality of dialogue and discourse is central to learning in global citizenship education. Dialogue and discourse are connected with learning about shared values, human rights, and issues of justice and equality. These are complex skills. It is questionable whether their development is adequately covered in the curricula.
10. A modern, broad, balanced and engaging curriculum should include global citizenship within it. Where curriculum design does not include this, it must be revised. Where the drivers of practice – such as high-stakes testing and examinations – serve to steer schools away from them, these drivers must also be changed.
11. Teaching global citizenship and the responsibilities of being part of the international community are now fundamental for citizenship education. Engagement at this level matters immensely, not only for building respect and community cohesion, but for building globally aware citizens who are able to identify in their peers, locally and internationally, that which they have in common. This in turn supports a more peaceful society and world at every level.
12. Evidence from Think Global / Ipsos MORI suggests that ‘[t]hose who learnt about different religions and/or cultures at school have a greater tendency to be comfortable with the mix of people of different religions and races in Britain.’^{xi} The same research suggests that learning about global issues increases levels of desired social engagement.^{xii} These are both key elements to developing strong and active international citizens.

13. Research has also proven that global learning positively impacts schools, leading to improved community cohesion, better school ethos and a stronger pupil voice.^{xlii} This in turn creates a more positive environment for education outside of citizenship and civic engagement.
14. Teachers must have the space, time and resources to teach global education, and to ask and explore difficult questions with their students in a free and safe environment. The positive impact of a good relationship with teachers is already well-established, with better teacher-student relationships leading to reduced instances of antisocial behaviour even years later.^{xliii} A positive relationship between teachers and students in relationship to global citizenship and civic engagement dialogue should be encouraged.
15. Given the aforementioned pervasiveness of social media and the internet, global education should be compulsory from an early age in order to best equip students with the tools required to operate positively in the 21st Century environment. This should include dialogue about belonging, respect, political engagement and global values, including fundamental human rights. Historical lessons and the consequences of unchallenged hatred should come at a later stage in a child's school career, after the foundations of respect have been built.

Question 8: What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

16. The values that are set forth as so-called 'British values' in the government's Prevent strategy (i.e. democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs) are in fact international values, featured in both the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Commonwealth Charter, among other international covenants and treaties.
17. Framing these values as exclusively 'British' is in itself threatening, as it suggests that those who are not by nationality, or do not identify as, 'British' are excluded from these values. British people should share and support values without interpreting these as part of a national agenda. Doing so inherently protects those who are otherwise marginalised, as universal applicability of values means no one is excluded.
18. Global values such as respect for diversity, freedom of thought, and equality of opportunity underpin not only local societies, but international communities. These values also protect marginalised groups, as they are in themselves inclusive of such groups. Supporting all citizens, through education, to feel included in the applicability of values and encouraging open, free and positive discussion about these values strengthens global citizenship and in turn creates more active and cohesive communities, both nationally and internationally.

Question 9: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

19. To suggest that there is one, or even a few, reasons why communities feel ‘left behind’ is a serious oversimplification of a complex issue. Individuals should be treated and consulted only in relation to their situation, without being expected to, or interpreted as, speaking for others. Although we recognise the importance of group identity, in how individuals see themselves and are seen by others, individuality and uniqueness should be treated as the formative factor in any questions about feeling ‘left behind’.
20. With this in mind, there are some underlying factors that may contribute to communities feeling ‘left behind’. For example, discrimination faced at school by other children can have a detrimental impact on a young learner. Children can also learn attitudes such as racism from home, but bring this to school.^{xliv} Global education, teaching a sense of belonging within a diverse and international community, is therefore vital in combatting these attitudes. To do so furthermore encourages a shift in parental attitudes, once the education is brought back to the home.
21. The same is true of media representations of marginalised communities, including minority ethnic groups, certain faith groups, LGBTI and people with disabilities. Again, having strong global education from an early age would teach students how to challenge stereotyping in the media. Having learning resources in schools that include diverse representations of individuals and communities is also important in combatting biases that may arise from other areas of life.

Question 10: How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

22. Education for global citizenship and civic engagement is vital to create more cohesive communities. Education gives children the tools to work together for social cohesion and identify those factors that limit integration. It empowers young people to take an active part in their own community and starts them early on a path of understanding and celebration of diversity. A positive and respectful relationship with teachers, ideally of diverse backgrounds, who open dialogue about the importance of respect and the consequences of unchallenged hatred, is one of the most important ways of creating strong and engaged global citizens.

23. Teachers must be given the space to have these conversations, free from the burden of programmes such as Prevent. This allows more diverse groups of students to be welcomed into a positive community of children inspired to challenge hatred, concurrently increasing diversity and social cohesion.
24. Diversity in schools is very important. Evidence shows that positive relationships with individuals of different ethnic groups and social backgrounds encourages children ‘to decrease prejudice’ and have ‘more cross-group friendships’.^{xlv} This inherently creates a more cohesive and integrated community, but it also encourages a ripple effect out to the wider community. If children are learning positive lessons of inclusivity in school, this is likely to be brought home with them after they leave the classroom.

Question 12: Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

25. Remembering Srebrenica: The lessons of the genocide in Srebrenica are as important today as they ever have been. In a heterogeneous yet integrated community, living side-by-side was not enough to ensure peace. Physical proximity did not prevent societal divides that ended in devastating violence.
26. The charity Remembering Srebrenica creates toolkits and activities to teach children about the genocide. These activities help children learn about the consequences of intolerance and hatred that go unchallenged. Through simple activities, such as a football match, children are made aware of this historical tragedy but given space and time to properly understand the lessons to be learned.
27. Understanding history is an important part of global citizenship education, as it encourages and inspires young people to not let similar events happen in their time.

Authors

Samidha Garg

Anja Nielsen

National Federation of Parks and Green Spaces – written evidence (CCE0151)

Background

1. The National Federation of Parks and Green Spaces (NFPGS) is the umbrella organisation amplifying the voices of the 6,000-strong local Friends Groups' movement throughout the UK.
2. This short submission is intended to highlight the important role of parks and green spaces in providing a focus for inclusive community development and aims to stress the need for additional support to nurture and assist this contribution which, in the current and future economic and social climate, is becoming even more significant and crucial to both local communities and indeed, green spaces themselves.
3. With this in mind, although NFPGS comment is submitted to be of general relevance to the inquiry topic, the submission is of most specific relevance in relation to the following inquiry questions, viz.:
 4. Q.12 Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?
 - 4.1. There are estimated to be more than 27,000 parks and green spaces across the UK. These spaces are diverse, ranging from large city parks with many facilities and amenities, to small local neighbourhood or pocket parks.
 - 4.2. The recent Heritage Lottery Fund's State of UK Public Parks 2016 report found that three quarters of local authority park managers had reported increases in visitor numbers over the past three years. Usage was particularly high among:
 - people between the ages of 25 and 34 (70 per cent use their park at least once a month);
 - households with children under the age of five (90 per cent use their park at least once a month);
 - people identifying as Black and Minority Ethnic (of whom 71 per cent use their park at least once a month compared to 56 per cent of people identifying as White).
 - 4.3. Park usage is also higher among those living in urban areas than those living in rural areas (61 per cent compared to 51 per cent use their parks at least once a month). Different parks play different roles in their communities, and people use different parks in different ways.

- 4.4. On a regular basis these inclusive environments are an integral component of the lifestyle of all, irrespective of age, income, ability or ethnicity. Moreover, the nation's parks and green spaces have become an established focus for community activity and integration, common ground where individuals, families and user groups can meet, socialize, relax, play and recreate.
- 4.5. In this manner, parks have become an important driver for community cohesion, providing an accessible, free resource supporting activities vital to health and wellbeing, helping develop a sense of place and local pride and removing neighbourhood barriers.
- 4.6. To support this activity large numbers of community and 'Friends' groups have developed across the UK – an estimated 5,900 according to the HLF State of the UK Parks 2016 report. These committed and enthusiastic local champions work to sustain their local green assets through projects and events and the 2016 report estimated park friends groups raise £50m each year, with a further 'in kind' contribution of £70m from volunteering hours each year. In many cases this has been achieved through partnership working and building relationships between individuals and groups, often including public and private sector - from schools to supermarkets.

5. Q.7 How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

- 5.1. There is a growing crisis for the management of the UK's 27,000 urban green spaces, as central Government continues to cut local authority funding. With similar challenges to public services in the late 1970s and 1980s many parks gradually but inexorably slid into decline over the next two decades. In response, the Friends movement mushroomed from a few hundred local groups to now several thousands nationwide.
- 5.2. Owing to current austerity measures, public sector funding for discretionary and 'non-statutory' services like parks is projected to continue to fall by 60 per cent or more over the next decade hence the significance of the contributions of park communities to local neighbourhoods is becoming increasingly important. However, austerity is now also jeopardizing the viability and activity of these groups with the loss of resources, both in terms of capital and revenue funding affecting not only the fabric of green spaces but also the vital community development and support work essential to sustain the groups themselves.
- 5.3. The combination of reductions in park management and maintenance, coupled with threats to the mitigating effect of community engagement is creating a downward spiral of deterioration, often exacerbated by increased anti-social behaviour - the antithesis of the positive impact resulting from cohesive parks communities engaged in successful place-making and place-keeping activities.

- 5.4. With these issues to the fore, last year the Department of Communities and Local Government (DCLG) Committee undertook a Public Parks Inquiry, and the subsequent report (11 February 2017) duly noted:

The level of response has clearly demonstrated the strength of the feeling people have for their local parks and green spaces, and how much parks are valued by individuals, families and communities.

Parks and green spaces are treasured assets and are often central to the lives of their communities. They provide opportunities for leisure, relaxation and exercise, but are also fundamental to community cohesion, physical and mental health and wellbeing, biodiversity, climate change mitigation, and local economic growth. These benefits have long been recognised, but within a context of budget reductions and tightening financial circumstances it is increasingly important that we find ways to quantify the wider value of parks in order to access new sources of funding and target investment in areas of greatest impact.

Parks face considerable challenges. As shared community assets, they must serve many different purposes, and be able to respond to the different and sometimes clashing needs of local communities. They must compete with other services for investment to secure their short and long term sustainability. Distribution of parks is unequal across the country, with many deprived communities struggling to access the benefits which green spaces can provide.

- 5.5. Chair of the DCLG Public Parks Inquiry, Clive Betts MP stated:

Parks are treasured public assets, as the overwhelming response to our inquiry demonstrates, but they are at a tipping point, and if we are to prevent a period of decline with potentially severe consequences then action must be taken. The Government have a leadership and co-ordination role to play and volunteers do fantastic work in the sector, but the primary responsibility lies with local authorities.

- 5.6. Moreover, the Inquiry reported noted the importance of Park friends and community groups:

We welcome the contribution made to parks by friends, volunteer and other community groups and individuals across the country. The time and efforts which people freely give to their parks should not be underestimated, and nor should the benefits for parks, communities and for the individuals themselves.

- 5.7. Many of these groups meet up together locally through more than 50 local area Forums and NFPGS is actively working to support and develop the local, regional and national network to improve sharing of good practice and provide a collective voice to support, protect and improve this legacy.

5.8. Indeed, in 2016 the HLF ‘State of UK Public Parks’ report recommended greater collaboration and co-ordination between partners to maximize the efficient use of limited resources and local networks to support groups. This report also recommended new opportunities for capacity building skills and training to help groups and the parks sector.

5.9. These recommendations were endorsed by the CLG Public Parks Inquiry report:

We welcome the steps taken by the parks sector in England to fill the gap left by CABE Space and Greenspace, such as the establishment of the Parks Alliance and the National Federation of Parks and Green Spaces, the Future Parks project led by the National Trust, and the work undertaken as part of Nesta’s Rethinking Parks programme to bring together a database of people and groups with an interest in parks. However, these initiatives, although important and commendable, will not necessarily be enough to provide the coordination and facilitate the sharing of best practice which we believe is necessary to secure and support a sustainable future for England’s parks. We believe that the importance of parks to national strategic objectives such as climate change mitigation and public health mean that there needs to be leadership and vision at the level of national government. We look to the Minister to provide this.

5.10. It is the firm belief of NFPGS that in recognition of the important contribution which parks and their communities make to citizenship and community engagement, the CLG inquiry recommendations are equally applicable to this House of Lords Inquiry.

5.11. Moreover, in recognition of the multiple benefits to both environment and people associated with parks and their communities, the NFPGS reiterates the call to make the provision and management of parks a statutory obligation, protecting and sustaining this special community legacy.

8 September 2017

National Secular Society – written evidence (CCE0133)

About the National Secular Society

1. The National Secular Society works for the separation of religion and state and equal respect for everyone's human rights so that no one is either advantaged or disadvantaged on account of their beliefs.
2. We regard secularism as an essential feature of a fair and open society, in which people of all faiths and none can engage with society on the basis of equal citizenship. We therefore welcome the opportunity to make a submission to the Select Committee On Citizenship and Civic Engagement.

Strengthening people's identity as citizens

3. The UK today has incredible religious diversity. Immigration and secularisation have driven significant changes in the UK's religious makeup. It is regrettable that in recent decades, successive governments have encouraged a multicultural approach to deal with the changing demographics of society. This has tended to manage diversity at the cost of undermining common citizenship and eroding some common human rights and values.
4. We regard it as highly problematic that state-managed multiculturalism (as opposed to 'lived multiculturalism') and multifaithism, has led to civil society being actively encouraged to organise around exclusive religious identities.
5. More recently, multiculturalism has evolved into 'multifaithism', with identity described around religion. This has resulted in an approach which emphasises communal or group rights, and treats minority religions as homogenous. Such an approach, like multiculturalism, gives unjustified power to group leaders, sometimes at the expense of individual human rights.
6. A focus on 'communal rights' under the multicultural framework has led to horrendous abuses, from female genital mutilation (FGM) to forced marriage, as people (particularly women) have been left isolated from mainstream society and trapped in cultural and religious blocs, within which group pressure and 'shame' culture denies them their legal rights.
7. Likewise, under the emerging 'multi-faith' approach where minority groups are seen exclusively through the prism of religion, the rights of women and 'minorities within minorities' are abandoned and ignored, and secular space has diminished. These groups include, for example, gay Muslims, ex- Muslims, and (though not a minority) women. By shutting off, or starving support from, secular avenues for engagement, the state limits the options for such groups.

8. The increasing use of sharia as a system for alternative dispute resolution in the UK strikes at the heart of shared citizenship and therefore should be a particular area of concern. Sharia is a system which leaves children vulnerable and discriminates openly against women, undermining their legal and political equality.
9. We regard it as imperative that the state treats all citizens equally as individuals rather than as members of communities that are only deemed to be accessible through invariably patriarchal and often unrepresentative community leaders.
10. The media, too, sometimes still resorts to ‘community leaders’ to access hard-to-reach groups. This strengthens traditionalist voices, who are often unrepresentative and/or opposed to the interests of the minority groups within minorities. Both the media and the state should interact with minority religious groups through shared civic engagement, elected representatives, councillors and MPs, as they would with the rest of the population.
11. Increasing secularity and the fragmentation of religious belief means the need to treat people as individual citizens rather than as members of a religion has become even more apparent. No faith-based approach from the state will ever encompass every strand of belief that exists in the UK today, and a human rights, individual-centred approach – rather than the failed multicultural or multi-faithist model – is vital for every citizen to be treated and valued equally.
12. Secularisation has resulted not only in the decline of both religious beliefs and identities, but also for many the disentanglement of religious and political/social engagement. The assumption that citizens (particularly of minority faiths) will hold particular views or want to engage with civil society/state interventions on the basis of faith, is highly problematic. Britons of all faiths and none share many complicated overlapping identities, many of which may be more relevant than their faith identity in different contexts.
13. The UK must develop notions of universal rights and responsibilities that transcend all faith and belief systems. Multi-faith societies must also ensure that no citizen is favoured or discriminated against on the basis of their religious identity and should promote shared rather than sectarian values. Principles of equality and human rights are the foundation of equal citizenship; these values should be central to young people's education.

The role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship

14. We regard citizenship education as a key element in preparing young people to exercise their rights as active, autonomous and equal citizens. The concept of equal citizenship regardless of one's religious or philosophical beliefs is central to secularism and something schools rightly have a duty to promote.

15. We welcome initiatives which bring together school communities in order to participate as citizens, as well as mechanisms such as National Citizen Service which bring young people together in a community based on a concept of shared citizenship. While many young people grow up as members of cultural or religious communities, it is important that they gain the skills and opportunities to participate in the multiple overlapping communities that make up modern Britain.
16. We would like to see citizenship education strengthened. The subject should enable all young people to critically and practically explore the values and ideas which underpin the concept of equal citizenship. The subject's content should enable students to recognise the protections granted to all people, regardless of belief, by human rights instruments such as the Human Rights Act 1998 - based on the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) - and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), to which the UK is a signatory.
17. We further suggest that it would be helpful to emphasise that human rights apply to individuals and not organisations or ideologies – and for students to explore the difficulties with models of citizenship where human rights do apply to identity groups rather than individuals. Young people should be able to understand the rights and responsibilities which underpin the different communities within the schools, workplaces, civil-society and nation which they will grow up navigating.
18. In line with the duty on schools to promote 'British values', we believe the consideration of the impact of equality law and human rights on the nature of citizenship should be a key component of the subject. We would encourage an emphasis on the role of the individual citizen here, where every citizen has a vote, and that it is through the bestowal of the status of equal individual citizenship that the UK ultimately views and treats its citizens.
19. Part of the solution to the problem of the development of parallel legal systems in minority communities may be to ensure that all schools, both in the state and independent sector, are under a duty to promote understanding of citizenship and legal rights under UK law so that people – particularly Muslim women and girls – are aware of and able to access their legal rights and do not regard religious 'courts' as sources of genuine legal authority.
20. Similar to the way that a 'Secular Charter' is displayed in a prominent position in French schools to remind pupils and teachers of the country's secular, Republican principles, consideration might be given to displaying the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in schools.
21. Given the transformative demographic and social change which is taking place in Britain, the concept of secularism, with its commitment to everyone's religious liberty, stands to benefit us all. Religious conflict and sectarian grievances have the potential to tear societies apart. Secularism, properly understood, offers the chance for citizens to live in peace with other citizens whose creed is different from their own. We would therefore like to see explicit reference to secularism in the citizenship curriculum.

22. There is a pressing need to ensure that young people develop into citizens who are capable of living together well in 21st century Britain. By empowering the next generation of active citizens, and educating them together regardless of their religious or belief backgrounds, we can hopefully to move closer to the ideal of equal citizenship.

Faith schools and the relationship between citizenship and social cohesion and integration

23. It is impossible to ignore the impact that a lack of diversity in schools has on integration in society as a whole – and the implications this has for the concept of shared British citizenship.
24. Education is probably the best chance we have to promote shared citizenship and stimulate future social harmony and cohesion. That chance is being wasted by pursuing policies that promote faith-based, sectarian and fragmented schooling.
25. Even as we prepare this submission, the Government is contemplating abandoning the only meaningful effort to promote diversity and address the problems caused by faith-based schooling. Plans to abolish the 50% admission cap on faith schools, which currently limits religious discrimination in the admissions policies of oversubscribed new faith schools, would be a highly retrograde step that can only exacerbate the problems caused by religiously segregated schooling.
26. The UK's long-standing commitment to religious schooling has encouraged the idea that it is acceptable and even desirable for children's education to be organised around religious identities. This has more recently encouraged religious minorities to establish their own schools: some within the state sector, some in the independent sector, and some in the burgeoning 'homeschool' and illegal sectors. We believe this will have profound implications for future social cohesion and shared citizenship, and run the risk of leaving some children vulnerable to extremism.
27. The school environment, where young people participate on a basis of equal pupilship, is a training ground to the adult environment where they will be expected to participate on the basis of equal citizenship. If young people are raised in an environment where pupilship is based on religion or belief rather than equality, it sends the message that citizenship too can be based on religion and belief rather than equality.
28. One of the most concerning aspects of faith schools is their potential to divide and segregate children along religious and ethnic lines. The Social Integration Commission has warned that "increased numbers of children [are] being educated in peer groups dominated by a single faith group or community".

29. Demos has warned that British schools are “highly segregated” and that “religious identities often overlap with ethnic identities and therefore some faith schools effectively exclude other ethnic groups.” This mirrors the self-segregation of some religious minorities from wider society. This is deeply troubling and an inevitable result of a divisive faith-based approach to education.
30. Studies have shown that the younger children from all backgrounds start to be educated together, the more successfully they integrate⁶²⁰. If they are very young, this draws in the parents too. The more they integrate, the better their chances of employment and consequently the less the chance of social exclusion.
31. We therefore recommend a move away from faith-based education in favour of inclusive secular schooling which promotes commonly shared societal, rather than religion-specific, values. The most effective mechanism to boost integration would be to ensure that all publicly funded schools are fully inclusive and open to all children, without regard to religion.
32. Promoting shared universal values would better enable schools to develop a strong common social identity amongst young British citizens, a key component in building social cohesion. Allowing schools to promote the superiority of one particular religion or set of religious values, even implicitly, is inimical to this aim.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support?

33. We would welcome the development of national identity based around a firm commitment to equality and universal human rights, encompassing the values of democracy, separation of religion and state, the rule of law, individual liberty, and tolerance.
34. We were broadly supportive of the introduction of the duty on schools to promote “British values” as we regard it as important that throughout all aspects of education, and indeed civil society, there is an emphasis on the basic values that underpin a free, equal and progressive society.
35. We strongly warn against rhetoric repeatedly used by Government that seeks to identify Britain as a “Christian nation”. Christianity is but one influence among many that shape our current way of life. We are a nation of many denominations and religions and large sectors of the population do not hold, or practice, religious beliefs, while many who are religious do not define their primary identity in religious terms. As citizens we share many things, but one thing we do not share is religious faith. Any approach which seeks to label the values widely shared by UK citizens as uniquely “Christian” is not only erroneous, but also doomed to be out-of-touch with the views and lifestyles of the population and counterproductive in promoting the concept of shared values and citizenship.

⁶²⁰ <http://www.secularism.org.uk/uploads/social-cohesion-sharing-crisps-with-someone-different.pdf>

36. If there is to be a serious consideration of the values, principles and processes that might play a role in bringing people together and promoting engaged citizenship, the presence of a state religion cannot be ignored. A rethink is required about the merits of an Established Church and the way in which the link between Church and State manifests itself in our national institutions and ceremonies.
37. The existence of a legally-enshrined, national religion and an established church privileges one part of the population, one institution and one set of beliefs. A national religion which retains archaic and unjust privileges risks disenfranchising the rest of the population – the vast majority of which do not belong to or attend services of the Church of England.
38. The presence of an ex officio Bishops' Bench in the House of Lords is also representative of institutional favouritism for one religion. It is a privilege which sits uneasily in a modern democracy and is contrary to aspirations for a more representative and equitable Parliament.
39. Christianity in general, and the Church of England in particular, can no longer be fully inclusive of the whole nation. It is therefore also legitimate to question the appropriateness of the Church being so closely associated with national ceremonies such as the National Service of Remembrance, which should be equally inclusive of all citizens regardless of religion and belief. For similar reasons it also appropriate to question the relevance of the British National Anthem. God Save The Queen is unlikely to inspire citizens in modern, secular and religiously-diverse Britain.

Summary

40. Living together successfully requires a celebration of diversity to be matched with a celebration of equality and respect for democracy, the rule of law, and human rights. Accommodating the vast plethora of identities within Britain requires engagement to be based on equal citizenship, rather than any particular identity frame.
41. The basis of the secular state which protects the rights of all citizens and shared civic spaces, from schools to high streets, should be protected. Britain should not be a 'Christian club' that tolerates 'outsiders'. A more secular outlook would enable all citizens, whatever their religious affiliations, cultural background, sex, or sexuality, to be — and to be made to feel like — equal citizens.

8 September 2017

National Union of Students (NUS) – written evidence (CCE0106)

The National Union of Students (NUS) is a confederation of more than 600 students' unions, representing more than 95 per cent of all higher education and further education unions in the UK. We also established the National Society of Apprentices in 2014, which now represents over 150,000 apprentices from all sectors and industries in the UK.

Through our member students' unions, NUS represents the interests of more than seven million students. NUS represents students and students' unions to ensure that education is transformative, skills and learning are accessible and every student in the UK is empowered to achieve their potential.

NUS is grateful for the opportunity to submit evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement. This inquiry is of particular interest of NUS, who have been long term advocates of political education and votes at 16. We have chosen to focus on questions which bear the most direct relevance to live areas of our organizational policy and areas which are of most interest to NUS' student members. We would welcome the opportunity to contribute further to this inquiry in any way as needed.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. NUS believes that citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st century means fully participating in and positively contributing to community life. This includes volunteering locally and having involvement with community organisations such as libraries, hospitals, sports clubs, mutual interest groups and faith groups. Engagement in civic life not only includes registering and turning up to vote, but goes beyond this and involves having political literacy and seeing students campaigning on issues that they care about. Civic engagement is fundamentally about students engaging with politics on a local and national level and being effective in making positive change happen.
2. Citizenship and civic life is also about global awareness. This is about students being tolerant, having intercultural awareness and respecting diversity. It is important within any one society to understand that some issues are too big for any one country to deal with and know that actions at home can have wider consequences around the world.
3. It matters that students are aware of their rights and responsibilities as citizens so that they can engage with and influence the issues they care about. NUS has particular interest in, and concern for, this as the rights of students – and citizens more broadly – come under threat through the Great Repeal Bill and loss of the Charter of Fundamental Rights or as Brexit threatens to close down opportunities to study and work internationally.

4. For students, issues of citizenship, civic engagement and identity are inextricably linked. Students are often labelled as ‘apathetic’ when it comes to engaging in formal politics, but this simply is not true. Students have told us time and time again that they have felt disillusioned with a political class that has failed to recognise them. This disillusion has led to a lack of action at the ballot box, with turnout amongst 18-24s as low as 44 per cent 2015. In this year’s election, it rose as high as 60 per cent with shock results coming through from student heavy cities such as Lincoln, Plymouth South, Derby North and Canterbury. When students see their identities or their interests reflected in formal politics, they can turn out to vote in force.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

5. NUS believes that limits to the voting age and the existing voter registration process act as a barrier to active political engagement. As a founding member of the Votes at 16 coalition, NUS is committed to securing the right to vote for all 1.5 million 16 and 17 year olds across the UK. We welcome the lowering of the voting age in Scottish local elections in 2015 and the possible future lowering of the voting age in Wales and call on the UK Government to extend this right for all 16 & 17 year olds across the UK.
6. 16 and 17 year olds contribute to and participate in society in many ways and should be able to have a say on the issues that affect them. They can consent to medical treatment, work full time, pay income tax and National Insurance, claim tax credits and welfare benefits, give consent to sexual relationships, get married or have a civil partnership and join the armed forces. These issues fundamentally impact the life of young people and yet without the right to vote, they are denied the opportunity to have a say on them. These issues affect the lives of 16 and 17 year olds in the same way they do for everyone aged 18 and above, so young people should be able to have their say in shaping these issues in the same way. In NUS’ recent report into the experiences of students in FE and technical education, one student echoed this argument *“I know 16 year olds who are paying tax, so why don’t we get a vote? At 16 we have access to information. A lot of things affect young people so we should have a say. Votes at 16 should be combined with political education.”*⁶²¹

⁶²¹ <https://www.nus.org.uk/PageFiles/12238/Students%20Shaping%20Post%2016%20Skills%20.pdf>

7. A poll run by NUS in summer 2016 found that 76% of 16 and 17 year olds said that they would have voted in the EU referendum had they had the chance⁶²². Similarly, the Scottish independence referendum in 2014 saw 109,593 16 and 17 year olds register to vote, with 75% of young people claiming to have voted⁶²³. Whilst there is no one complete answer to improving engagement in formal politics, voting from an early age can be a catalyst for a route towards individuals understanding their rights and responsibilities as citizens. Getting people involved in politics from a young age can encourage them to stay politically active throughout their lives; 97% of 16 and 17 year olds who reported having voted in the Scottish Independence Referendum said they would vote again in future elections⁶²⁴.
8. The introduction of the system of individual electoral registration (IER) in 2014 presents a further barrier to the active political engagement of students and young people, with the switch knocking thousands of people in the UK, predominantly students who would have previously been block registered by their institution, off from the electoral register. Looking at the 21 regions with the highest population density of students across the UK, registered voters dropped by 181,552 in 2014, nineteen times higher than the drop-off the previous year of 9,727.⁶²⁵
9. In 2014 NUS made clear that any proposal to introduce IER must include a clear and thorough plan as to how the risks to registration levels can be mitigated.⁶²⁶ We recognise that since 2014 campaigns targeted at students have been run locally and nationally in an attempt to drive up registrations. Similarly NUS and students' unions continue to play a vital role in getting students registered to vote.
10. NUS further recognises that IER has brought with it the possibility for online registration and this is a great benefit for students. NUS believes however that the negatives of IER greatly outweigh the positives for students. Following the 2015 general election the Association of Electoral Administrators reported that "The registration of students and care homes under IER is extremely difficult under current legislative procedures and has resulted in far fewer students and care home residents being registered. A review of how these two groups can be registered more easily should be undertaken, with consideration being given to allowing EROs to directly register people at institutions".⁶²⁷

⁶²² <https://www.nusconnect.org.uk/articles/eu-ref-16-and-17-year-olds-are-being-denied-a-say-on-their-future>

⁶²³ https://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/__data/assets/pdf_file/0010/179812/Scottish-independence-referendum-report.pdf

⁶²⁴ https://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/__data/assets/pdf_file/0010/179812/Scottish-independence-referendum-report.pdf

⁶²⁵ <http://researchbriefings.files.parliament.uk/documents/SN06764/SN06764.pdf>

⁶²⁶ <https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201012/cmselect/cmpolcon/writev/1463/m23.htm>

⁶²⁷ <https://www.aea-elections.co.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/07/aea-report-elections-and-ier-challenge-of-2015.pdf>

11. Through the recently passed Higher Education and Research Act 2017, there will now be an obligation on higher education institutions to do more to support the registration of their students to vote. This is a positive move that NUS called for and supported during the passage of the legislation, and continues to support; however, we – as others have – note that the final legislation did not go so far as to prescribe a specific mechanism for universities and HEIs to implement to improve student voter registration levels. Universities like Sheffield, and elsewhere, have demonstrated remarkable success in increasing their levels of voter registration through integrating voter registration at the point of course enrolment – what is known as the ‘Sheffield model’.
12. With the Higher Education and Research Act now passed, and its voter registration clause at a critical juncture as guidance and advice to institutions is formed, we believe it is imperative that as many institutions are supported to introduce their own variants of the ‘Sheffield model’ to maximise the opportunity that this Act now presents.
13. More widely, NUS urges the government to explore alternatives to IER which make it easier for students – and citizens – to register to vote and remain registered, automatically.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

14. NUS believes that education plays a crucial role in supporting students to become active citizens. In 2016 NUS conducted a consultation with FE students which saw us visiting hundreds of students across dozens of colleges throughout England and asked, what is important to them when they complete their education. Students across the country repeatedly identified that they would like to have access to political education to help them become active citizens and develop social & civic skills⁶²⁸.
15. NUS believes that all students should have access to citizenship education from primary level through to university. This should enable students to leave education feeling equipped with the skills, knowledge and experience to become active, well-informed, confident members of their local, national and global communities. This means making sure that education covers politics and democratic life, as well as social issues such as sex and relationship education (SRE), sustainability and inequality, critical thinking and holistic understanding of equality and diversity.

⁶²⁸ <https://www.nusconnect.org.uk/resources/expectations-of-learners-in-area-reviews-waves-1-3>

16. NUS notes that Citizenship has been a statutory subject on the national curriculum since 2002 and that all secondary schools in England will be required to teach sex and relationships education through the Children and Social Work Bill 2017. NUS believes that the scope of citizenship education is currently too narrow and should encompass wider political and constitutional rights, as well as social issues including global citizenship and sustainability, legal rights and financial literacy, human rights, liberation, and diversity. ‘Active citizenship’ should be given priority and embedded as far as possible across the curriculum.
17. In our 2017 report with GuildHE, NUS outlined six key ways in which higher education institutions can play a role in supporting students to become active citizens⁶²⁹. This includes providing volunteering opportunities, encouraging democratic engagement, encouraging sustainable actions, engaging with the local community, developing identities as global citizens and creating the space for self-reflection and personal development. Educational institutions and students’ unions alike play a crucial role in delivering this.
18. Citizenship education shouldn’t just start at HE and in NUS’ recent report on students in FE and technical education we identified that many students are unhappy with the citizenship education they currently receive and would like to see more of a focus on society and politics. One student said *“They don’t teach us anything like that [civic education & politics] in school. You get a bit of it here but depends on what course you’re on”*⁶³⁰. FE students should be taught about formal politics and voting but also about volunteering and community engagement, to provide routes to engaging in civic life beyond typical democratic activity.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

19. NUS believes that the ability to communicate in a common language is the bedrock of a shared and communal society. For many UK residents whose first language is not English, ESOL is their way to find employment, enter education, and engage with their local communities and public services. The 2011 census found that 760,000 UK residents lack English language proficiency. This is a barrier to employment, education and social cohesion⁶³¹.
20. Despite being an essential lifeline for so many across the UK looking to integrate into society and take up their role as citizens, over recent years we’ve seen extensive and damaging cuts to English language services. In 2008 the Government spent £230 million on ESOL funding and by 2015 this had been cut by 60% in real terms⁶³². What is more, wider cuts to the adult skills budget have left providers unable to find funding from other sources. NUS notes that in January 2016 the Government announced a £20 million English language tuition fund, however this sum only goes part of the way of recovering funding for ESOL lost over recent years.

⁶²⁹ <http://www.guildhe.ac.uk/wp-content/uploads/2016/11/6710-Guild-HE-Active-Citizenship-Report-44pp.pdf>

⁶³⁰ <https://www.nus.org.uk/PageFiles/12238/Students%20Shaping%20Post%202016%20Skills%20.pdf>

⁶³¹ <https://www.ons.gov.uk/census/2011census>

21. The impact of funding cuts has meant that ESOL participation has fallen by 22% since 2009, but this is not due to any lack in demand for English language instruction. Rather, 80% of providers have recently reported waiting lists of up to 1000 and 66% said lack of funding was the main cause of this. It is clear that far more than the 140,000 learners currently on ESOL courses wish to take them up⁶³³.
22. In December 2016 the Casey Review into how social integration can be improved across the UK found that community cohesion is being undermined by ongoing funding cuts to ESOL courses. It concluded that: “The government should support further targeted English language provision by making sufficient funding available for community-based English language classes, and through the adult skills budget for local authorities to prioritise English language where there is a need”.⁶³⁴
23. According to both the 2011 Equality Impact Assessment into ESOL cuts and the 2016 Casey Review into social cohesion, a lack of English proficiency is particularly prevalent among Muslim, Polish, Pakistani and Bangladeshi communities, while women are more likely than men to not be able to speak English well or at all. This leads to lower wages, lower community integration and less civic participation.
24. If the Government is serious about integration of migrants, ESOL is a low-cost and straightforward solution. NUS recommends that the Government reverses recent cuts and delivers a sustainable public funding settlement for ESOL provision and all UK citizens should have a statutory right to ESOL if required, independent of immigration or employment status.

7 September 2017

⁶³² <http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7905#fullreport>

⁶³³ <http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7905#fullreport>

⁶³⁴ https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/575973/The_Casey_Review_Report.pdf

New Citizenship Project – written evidence (CCE0170)

How can government and parliament best create and support an engaged and active citizenry in Britain?

(1.1) A word first on where this response is coming from: the New Citizenship Project is a pioneering strategy and innovation company, on a mission to support the shift in the dominant story of the individual in society from Consumer to Citizen. We help organisations do things better (and do better things) because we think of people differently, using creative industry skills to inspire participation from people as Citizens instead of simply serving them as Consumers. Our work spans all industries and all sectors, with clients including Tate, Guardian, National Trust, and many more. Our way of working is rooted in defining generative inquiry questions, in response to which we then work alongside our clients, supporting them to innovate, test and learn.

(1.2) In this submission to the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement, we'd like to begin by articulating an illustrative example core question government might hold openly with the citizens of Britain, in order to create the space for the engaged and broad-based 21st century citizenry we believe we could have in this country:

How can government and parliament best create and support an engaged and active citizenry in Britain?

(1.3) Even articulating a question in this way represents a significant shift from the current framing of this call for evidence as another example of outdated and dry public “engagement”, which is practically impenetrable to all but the usual suspects. It's great that this Select Committee is happening at all, but we see a huge opportunity for its medium to match its message: for you to facilitate a genuine public conversation about what the relationship between the state and the citizen might be.

(1.4) In other words, our first unashamedly provocative response is that if government really want to figure out how best to engage citizens, you should be asking them. Our dream project would be to help you ask that question - to help you hold the space for a true national conversation - not just to try to answer it for you ourselves.

(1.5) Accepting for now, though, the remit of this call for evidence, there are a further four contributions we would like to make: a conceptual framing, and then three categories of action we would recommend.

Conceptual framing:

The Citizen is a concept of the role of the individual in society, not a legal status

(2.1) The default use of the word Citizen is, at least implicitly, as a legal status. This is the case in the text of this call for evidence, in the terms of which “citizenship” is shorthand for “British citizenship”.

(2.2) This is an unhelpful starting point, and needs to be explicitly set aside. I can be a citizen of my town, of England, of the United Kingdom, of Europe, and of the world, whether or not any or all of these have a legal status attached. Thinking and acting as an interdependent member of the community at each and every one of these levels is what it takes to live a good life; not choosing between them. Citizenship is not a question of what passport we hold; it is an idea of who we are as human beings, a question of what we can do, and what we should.

(2.3) As such, the idea of the Citizen is better understood in contrast to two other ideas of who we are: the Subject, and the Consumer. In Subject mode, we do as we are told by our betters, with little or no power to shape the course of our own lives. In Consumer mode, we have the power to choose and the right to complain; our role is to get the best deal for ourselves, as narrowly defined individuals. In Citizen mode, we can and want to shape the societies and communities we live in. We define what the available options are, instead of just choosing between them; and we seek the best for the defined community as a whole, not just our own immediate self-interest.

SUBJECT	CONSUMER	CITIZEN
DEPENDENT	INDEPENDENT	INTERDEPENDENT
TO	FOR	WITH
RELIGIOUS	MATERIAL	SPIRITUAL
DUTY	RIGHTS	PURPOSE
OBEY	DEMAND	PARTICIPATE
RECEIVE	CHOOSE	CREATE
COMMAND	SERVE	FACILITATE
PRINT	ANALOGUE	DIGITAL
HIERARCHY	BUREAUCRACY	NETWORK
SUBJECTIVE	OBJECTIVE	DELIBERATIVE

Quickfire concepts table from This Is The #CitizenShift

Action pathway 1:

Stop undermining the Citizenship inherent in human nature

(3.1) The good news is, human beings are inherently participatory, empathic, collaborative creatures - despite what we may have told ourselves over the last century or so. There is a growing consensus in the fields of animal behaviour and evolutionary biology, perhaps most popularly expressed by Frans de Waal in his TED talk on Moral Behaviour in Animals, that empathy and collaboration are as significant as drivers of evolution as competition and status. The potential for Citizenship is present in all of us.

(3.2) But we don't exist in a vacuum. The messages we receive in our day to day lives (through the news, through advertising, through the built environment), the measures that govern us (what success looks like at home, at work, in society), ultimately the way that we are invited to participate all shape our response to the world around us.

(3.3) We have been involved in a number of studies that show when people are primed to think as Consumers they are less socially motivated, less likely to participate in their communities and wider society. When people are primed to think as Citizens they are more socially motivated. This is as true with prompts as subtle as a single word, or in the case of the data below, exposure to a single normative statement. Simply asking people "to what extent do you agree that it's important to find brands that fit your personality?" can be enough to diminish significantly their motivation for local and national participation - regardless of the extent of their agreement.

(3.4) When the effect of such subtle primes is so significant, ask yourself what we are doing to Citizenship when the average person is exposed to somewhere between 1500 and 5000 commercial messages a day, when the Consumer Confidence Index is reported regularly as a critical indicator of societal success, and when "consumers" becomes more of a colloquialism than "people" - let alone "citizens". Citizenship needs air to breathe, as well as nourishment.

The priming effect of Consumer and Citizen norms, gathered in partnership with YouGov. Data explained fully here.

Action pathway 2:
Build lifelong Citizen skills across society

(4.1) Nourishment is, however, important. Citizenship is a muscle you build, not a cup you empty. Citizenship education should be thought of primarily as a lifelong pursuit of learning-by-doing, that is about building this muscle and repeatedly creating the conditions for its exercise and development; not just a set of rules to be learned by rote, or something that is only for children, though we should start young.

(4.2) An obvious point to start in building the skills needed to be a Citizen is formal education. But this is not about a specific module or area of the curriculum aimed at informing young people on their status as a citizen. As measures like Everyday Democracy show, it is not just an information gap, it is a skills and belief gap. The way our children participate at school is far too limited in scale and scope, children on average speak as little as 20 seconds during a 45 minute lesson. We need to move from Citizenship Education to building Citizens through all our education.

12. Case study: School 21

13. (4.3) School 21, a new school based in East London, was started on the premise that our school system wasn't adequately equipping young people with the skills they need in the 21st Century. The founders talk of "a shared belief that education must be done differently if we are to prepare young people properly for the world they are going into.... we need schools to rebalance head (academic success), heart (character and well-being) and hand (generating ideas, problem solving, making a difference)." School 21 has created approaches intended to build student's sense of agency: one of the central premises is helping students find their voice, helping them to communicate in different contexts through oracy programmes like Voice 21 developed with Cambridge University; another is in perseverance, fostering the belief that sustained effort and contribution results in better outcomes; a further approach is to work collectively, to have constructive dialogue between students through coaching groups and feedback.

(4.4) If it starts from our formative education, it certainly doesn't end there. What if...

10. Universities saw increased tuition fees as a prompt to look meaningfully at undergraduate education - moving from passive lectures into active forums - by questioning how students can meaningfully shape their own education.
11. Workplaces created more opportunities for people to act outside their immediate job roles, building employees' civic muscle e.g. employing open sourcing methods to gain ideas and insight from across the business rather than from the few in charge.
12. Government equipped administrators with the new skills of governance needed to make civic engagement meaningful: "convening, conflict assessment, negotiation, active listening and reframing, facilitation, and consensus building"

These ideas are the focus of widespread experimentation both across the world and indeed across the UK, but here at least there is little or no explicit structural support or backing from government. These structures matter.

Action pathway 3:

Develop structures, systems and spaces that encourage participation

(5.1) The skills we develop are only as good as the structures and spaces we put around them; without structures which offer these skills meaningful outlets, they wither on the vine. Sustained, broad-based civic engagement (such as the much cited example of Porto Alegre’s participatory budgeting process or the less famous Better Reykjavik platform) is only possible through establishing structures, methodology, processes, measures, and providing spaces, both physical and online, to allow for meaningful participation. The absolutely critical ingredient, though, is a meaningful level of power. Where trivial, inauthentic participation opportunities are provided, people will either not participate, or will them with the disrespect they deserve (Boaty McBoatface, anyone?).

(5.2) A useful starting point is to develop a typology of engagement opportunities, to understand what does exist and what could be created. Various models exist including Gaventa’s spaces for change and Arnstein’s ladder of participation. All emphasise the inadequacy of choice between a pre-determined set (as in voting) and of feedback on predesigned approaches (as in standard consultation processes). We prefer this model, since it accentuates what the individual can do. A revised iteration is expected in a forthcoming book in Spring 2018.

The New Power Participation Scale

(5.3) The potential implications of this for the role and processes of government are profound. Today, we have outdated “old power” policymaking systems where most people simply consume the outputs (in the form of public “services”) and a very few become intensively active citizens at the sustain level, in effect becoming institutionalised as part of government (councillors, for example). Where we need to be is a place where a far broader swathe of society are active participants in much lighter touch ways, but still more dynamic and participatory than voting.

(5.4) The momentum behind this shift from purely representative democracy to a hybrid representative-participatory model is gaining pace around the world - Taiwan’s vTaiwan platform is another of the pioneers, and there was recent fanfare in Argentina over the announcement that 20% of the laws passed in that country in the last year originated as online citizens' proposals. The UK - or at least UK central government - needs to move further, faster.

Parting thought: a time for hope

(6.1) The nature of these sorts of discussions often tends to focus on the negative; on diagnosing the problems of disengagement, of a dearth of Citizenship, and seeking to understand the reasons for them. This, however, misses a big part of the picture. Across the country, just as across the world, people are already doing this stuff, both professionally, in the best local authorities, and in self-organised structures in local communities. We wanted to finish by citing a case study of a nascent project that we think hugely exciting; but with the caveat that such initiatives need government to come in soon as an explicit supporter of such initiative if we are to take this change to scale.

14. One to watch case study – Participatory City

15.

16. (6.2) Participatory City is a 5-year project in Barking and Dagenham with local residents, government and organisations. The objective is to increase practical participation, working with 25,000+ people to grow a new network of 250 projects and 100 businesses; projects and businesses meant to support the community in a sustainable way covering childcare, food production, retail, business skills, manufacturing and the environment. It builds upon work done with Lambeth Council in 2014/15, to develop new systems for civic engagement – both citizen to citizen and citizen to government. Participatory City is designed to counteract the fragmentation of communities, where individuals interact with organisations and institutions over and above peer to peer learning and support. The approach is to develop local projects that find new ways of fostering participation and getting resources to the people who need them most: “a re-organisation of local systems to lift all boats.” The learnings from the work done so far and what happens next, when done at scale, should offer real insight into the structures and spaces needed for a flourishing of participation and civic empowerment.

8 September 2017

New Philanthropy Capital – written evidence (CCE0097)

New Philanthropy Capital (NPC) is a charity consultancy and think tank focused on helping charities and funders achieve the greatest impact. We aim to transform the charity sector by increasing the impact of charities, increasing the impact of funders, and strengthening the partnership between the two.

Our work includes supporting individual charities and funders, and exploring issues affecting the wider charity sector through our think tank work. Our State of the Sector research programme considers current challenges and opportunities for the sector, and touches on many issues relevant to this inquiry.⁶³⁵ A recent paper co-authored by NPC’s chief executive Dan Corry also looks at the role civil society plays in ‘the shared society’ and how it can be strengthened.⁶³⁶

NPC exists to support social sector impact. One aspect of the sector’s impact is the role it plays in promoting individual and community well-being, and in doing so creating a more cohesive society. This can be a difficult topic to get a handle on: definitions vary and our understanding of what works, and what is most cost-effective, is limited. However, we—the public and social sectors—need to understand it better if we are make best use of the resources available.

Our response to the Committee’s inquiry should be seen in this light. In it we focus on two of the Committee’s questions: the role of the third sector in encouraging civic engagement, and steps government and Parliament can take to support this (question 7), and the effectiveness of voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service (question 6).

Although in this response we refer to ‘the sector’, the charity sector is far from homogeneous. Financially it is dominated by a small number of very large organisations, while one third of charities with an annual income of less than £1m are in a financially precarious position, operating with no reserves.⁶³⁷

NPC would be happy to discuss any aspect of this submission in more detail with members of the Committee.

NPC’s response to the Committee’s call for evidence

Active citizenship: the role of the third sector

The third sector has a key role to play in supporting civic engagement and active citizenship

⁶³⁵ See NPC’s website: www.thinknpc.org/our-work/projects/state-of-the-sector

⁶³⁶ Corry, D. and Stoker, G. (2017) The ‘shared society’ needs a strong civil society. New Philanthropy Capital.

⁶³⁷ NCVO (2016) The UK Civil Society Almanac 2016.

1. The third sector—by which we mean informal voluntary and community groups or associations as well as formal, established charities and social enterprises—provides a means through which people can exercise active citizenship. It provides a space in which people of different backgrounds, experiences and outlooks come together to explore shared interests or pursue a common cause. Charities therefore play a key role in bringing people together and inspiring civic action by offering opportunities for people to be active in their communities. This is particularly important in the aftermath of the EU referendum campaign, which has exposed and created divisions in society.
2. Charities are increasingly thinking about the role they play within the wider community. As part of NPC's State of the Sector research programme we undertook quantitative and qualitative research involving 400 charity sector leaders. The findings, set out in Charities taking charge, show 66% of sector leaders surveyed see community networks as important to achieving their mission.⁶³⁸ This is particularly true for smaller organisations, while larger organisations increasingly see themselves playing a role in building community capacity.⁶³⁹
3. There are different aspects of citizenship and people will choose to be 'active' citizens in different ways—including in ways that can be uncomfortable for government, such as campaigning and activism. Civil society provides a route for people to exercise active citizenship in this way, too. Campaigning is—and always has been—an important part of what the charity sector does.
4. In Charities taking charge we found that increased civic action is prompting some charities to rethink their role as one that supports, empowers and mobilises people to solve problems, rather than simply delivers products and services.⁶⁴⁰ However, the space for civil society to speak out on important issues⁶⁴¹ is narrowing. From the Lobbying Act⁶⁴¹, to the Charity Commission's guidance on campaigning in the EU referendum⁶⁴², over recent years charities have found themselves in an ever more hostile environment. The sector has a legitimate role in raising issues that matter to beneficiaries, and society as a whole loses out if this role is restricted.

But responsibility to deliver greater civic engagement should not be enforced upon third sector organisations

5. Charities we work with tell us that part of what makes their work effective is that it is—and is seen to be—separate to the state. This allows charities to develop trusting

⁶³⁸ Hoare, G., Shea, J. and Murray, P. (2017) Charities taking charge: Transforming to face a changing world. New Philanthropy Capital, p35

⁶³⁹ Ibid, p50

⁶⁴⁰ Ibid, p52

⁶⁴¹ UK Parliament, Transparency of Lobbying, Non-Party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014, 5 February 2014

⁶⁴² Charity Commission, The European Union referendum: The Charity Commission's regulatory guidance for charities, March 2016

relationships with people and to have a different kind of conversation with them. Our research into the role of charities in the criminal justice sector, for example, found that this central relationship—which is built on trust and on organisations treating people as individuals—is at the heart of charities’ unique contribution to the criminal justice sector.⁶⁴³ Similarly our work on the role of charities in health highlighted this unique position between the system and the beneficiary, which allows charities to act as trusted, independent intermediaries.⁶⁴⁴

6. There are many charities whose mission is explicitly to promote active citizenship, or who tackle issues relating to citizenship and civic or political engagement. However, making this the responsibility of all third sector organisations risks undermining their independence—a central aspect of what makes them effective. While recognising the role the third sector plays in supporting active citizenship, government should avoid placing specific responsibilities on third sector organisations to do this.

How government can support civil society and civic engagement

The Office for Civil Society should commission research into where social capital is weakest...

7. There is a strong body of evidence linking social capital with individual and community well-being and economic growth. One big question—for policy-makers, but also for charities and philanthropic funders—is what to do in areas where social capital is weaker. NPC’s work sees us talking to foundations and philanthropists, many of whom would like to fund work in this area but are not really sure of what works.
8. There has long been a concern within the third sector that funding flows to areas where social capital is already strong, while other areas—the so-called ‘cold spots’ of civil society activity, often areas where the local economy is also weak—miss out. This problem risks being exacerbated by the shift towards citizen-led models of working set out above. As one charity sector leader put it in Charities taking charge, ‘if [that model] works really well what you do is you accelerate the growth and development of those places with assets, and those without get left further behind.’⁶⁴⁵
9. So what is to be done? Firstly, we need a better understanding of the problem and of effective measures to tackle it. NPC welcomes the Office for National Statistics \(ONS\) Social Capital Project to improve the measurement of social capital in the UK.⁶⁴⁶ Building on that, we recommend that the Office for Civil Society (OCS) commissions research

⁶⁴³ Wyld, G. and Noble, J. (2017) Beyond bars: Maximising the voluntary sector’s contribution in criminal justice. New Philanthropy Capital.

⁶⁴⁴ Bull, D., Sheil, F., Joy, I. and Bagwell, S. (2014) Supporting good health: The role of the charity sector. New Philanthropy Capital.

⁶⁴⁵ Hoare, G., Shea, J. and Murray, P. op. cit.

⁶⁴⁶

<https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/wellbeing/bulletins/socialcapitalintheuk/may2017>

into understanding where social capital is weakest and what works in strengthening social capital, building on existing evidence and practice.

10. NPC has also floated the idea of creating a social infrastructure index.⁶⁴⁷ This would form part of the research work proposed above and would identify the local physical and social networks that enable connections to be made and social capital to grow—everything from libraries and parks to sports facilities and meals on wheels.
11. The previous government funded the creation of community organisers to help communities and individuals express their views and concerns and to act upon them. This programme should be kept under review to see how well it works. There may be a case for councils to be encouraged, or even funded, to have community development officers.

...and target funding to plug the gaps

12. Government should invest resource into strengthening social capital, targeting funding to those areas where social capital is weakest and civil society activity low—with possible sources including the dormant assets fund and EU successor funding the ‘Shared Prosperity Fund’.
13. As we set out in Boldness in times of change, effective voluntary sector infrastructure can support civil society activity by: brokering collaboration and partnerships; providing a voice for the sector with local government; supporting improvement; and giving organisations, particularly smaller ones, space to plan and think.⁶⁴⁸ We also set out how digital technology can enable a more networked sector. This has the potential to enable organisations to share knowledge and ideas on an open source, peer-to-peer basis rather than the top down ‘broadcast’ model (where one organisation takes in the knowledge and sends it out to members). Government could do more to support the digital and data infrastructure that enables charities to have a greater impact—including by replicating the successful Ministry of Justice Data Lab⁶⁴⁹ model in health, employment and education to support charities in better understanding their impact.
14. The hollowing-out of local infrastructure creates a major challenge to supporting smaller, more local community groups but, with a few notable exceptions, infrastructure is far down the list of priorities for most funders. The Big Lottery Fund should consider a fund that supports bottom-up and peer-to-peer networks and collaboration.

The wider context of people’s lives must be considered

⁶⁴⁷ Corry, D. and Stoker, G. (2017) The ‘shared society’ needs a strong civil society. New Philanthropy Capital.

⁶⁴⁸ Murray, P., Hoare, G. and Wixley, S. (2016) Boldness in times of change: Rethinking the charity sector for the future. New Philanthropy Capital.

⁶⁴⁹ <http://www.thinknpc.org/our-work/projects/data-labs/justice-data-lab/>

15. Active citizenship and civic engagement develops within a wider context. For example, planning policy influences whether or not there are spaces where people can interact, get to know their neighbours and find other people to associate with. This is about creating spaces where ‘acts of kindness’ can take place.⁶⁵⁰
16. There is some evidence to suggest that levels of active citizenship are influenced by people’s wider circumstances. For example, in its review of the evidence on social capital, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) cites a study showing that differences in educational attainment explained 14% of variations in volunteering rates between countries, and 21% of variations in the level of interest in politics.⁶⁵¹ The same report points to a number of studies suggesting that high levels of income inequality are associated with low social capital: low levels of civic participation, and lower levels of trust. It is not only through promoting ‘active citizenship’ that government can build active citizenship. Government should use its powers to positively influence the wider context in which active citizenship and civic engagement can develop.
17. Similarly, we need to remember that civil society activity does not necessarily support active citizenship. In the same way that the way the state works can promote dependent or active citizens, so too charities can support dependence or autonomy among the people with whom they work. Equally, while charities often bring people together, they can also be divisive; civil society activity can reinforce or even create inequity. ‘Community’ groups may speak only to certain members of a community—building bonding capital, but not necessarily providing bridging capital⁶⁵², which is an important part of social cohesion. Charities themselves need to reflect on how they work with people and whether they are supporting dependence or autonomy, and whether they include or exclude.

The effectiveness of the National Citizen Service in creating active citizens

18. The National Citizen Service (NCS) has three aims: promoting a more cohesive society through social mixing; promoting a more responsible society by developing young people’s skills; and promoting engaged citizenship by supporting young people to carry out projects in their local community. We wish to address two aspects of NCS: whether it works, and whether it constitutes value for money. Note that NPC was involved in the evaluation of the NCS pilots in 2012 as a junior partner to NatCen Social Research.⁶⁵³

There is, as yet, no evidence of the lasting impact of NCS

⁶⁵⁰ See Ferguson, Z. (2016) Kinder communities: The power of everyday relationships. Carnegie Trust UK.

⁶⁵¹ Scrivens, K. and Smith, C. (2013) Four interpretations of social capital: an agenda for measurement. OECD.

⁶⁵² Ibid.

⁶⁵³ NatCen Social Research, Office for Public Management and New Philanthropy Capital (2013) Evaluation of National Citizen Service: Findings from the evaluations of the 2012 summer and autumn NCS programmes.

19. While external evaluations have shown some initial positive effects, we have little evidence regarding whether these initial positive changes are sustained over time. The only evidence currently available shows the initial impact drops off rapidly. On the aim of promoting a more cohesive society through increased social mixing, shortly after the summer programme more than 80% of young people said they felt more positive towards those from different backgrounds—but this had fallen to 57% 16 months later. Similar effects were seen on the aim of promoting engaged citizenship: shortly after completing the programme around 70% of participants said they were more likely to help in their local area—this had fallen to 38% 16 months later.⁶⁵⁴ The 2015 evaluation found that, two years following completion of NCS, the effects on volunteering behaviour were not statistically different from zero.⁶⁵⁵ In order to understand the effectiveness of NCS, we need data on the long-term impact of the programme to know whether initial positive impacts on attitudes are fully sustained, and what that ultimately results in in terms of behaviours and decisions. Good control groups are needed to understand the ‘value-add’ of NCS.

Insufficient consideration was given to value for money from the outset

20. Data on any long-term effects of the programme is needed to make an informed judgement regarding value for money. However, the evidence we have so far suggests NCS has been an expensive way to fund the voluntary sector’s work with young people, at an estimated cost per participant of £1,863 in 2016.⁶⁵⁶ The programme will have received £1.26bn funding between 2016–2020, and it is projected to have a £400m annual budget by the end of this parliament. Meanwhile, Unison has estimated that £387m was cut from youth service budgets between 2010 and 2016, resulting in the loss of over 3,500 youth work jobs and the closure of 603 youth centres.⁶⁵⁷
21. An Ipsos MORI evaluation in 2015 estimated that NCS delivered benefits of between £0.70 and £2.38 per £1 spent, based on short-term outcomes.⁶⁵⁸ A more recent cost-benefit analysis finds a much more positive picture—however, this looks at individual life-satisfaction and participation in higher education rather than the broader aims originally set out for NCS. It is also worth noting that the earnings premium from a university degree is a significant factor in the improved cost-benefit ratio.⁶⁵⁹
22. Could the same thing have been achieved more cheaply by harnessing the existing charity sector rather than establishing a new programme from scratch, with all the ⁶⁵⁴ National Audit Office (2017) National Citizen Service.

⁶⁵⁵ Cameron, D., Stannard, J., Leckey, C., Hale, C. and Di Antonio, E. (2017) National Citizen Service 2015 evaluation: main report. Ipsos MORI.

⁶⁵⁶ National Audit Office (2017) National Citizen Service.

⁶⁵⁷ Unison (2016) A future at risk: Cuts in youth services.

⁶⁵⁸ Cameron, D., Stannard, J., Leckey, C., Hale, C. and Di Antonio, E. op cit.

⁶⁵⁹ National Citizen Services and Jump Simetrica (2017) If you could bottle it...: A well-being and human capital value for money analysis of the NCS 2015 programme.

programme development and assessment work that any new programme necessarily entails? Little thought appears to have been given to whether there were more effective or more cost-effective ways to meet the same aims—something the National Audit Office concluded in its recent report, stating 'The OCS set up NCS without considering different ways it could meet its long-term aims of social responsibility, cohesion and engagement cost-effectively'.⁶⁶⁰

There is work to be done to shape the National Citizen Service for the future

23. Looking back at what might have been is important, but of limited use now that NCS is well-established and clearly remains a political priority. So, the focus should be on ensuring that it works effectively and on making sure we do have the necessary data to understand and improve the impact the programme has. The recently announced partnership with the Scouts is a positive step in engaging the wider sector and building on the established expertise of charities already active in this space.
24. As noted above, programmes such as NCS are just one small part of the story. Policy-makers should not put too much weight on NCS to transform the way that young people see themselves in society, their relationships with other people of different backgrounds (socio-economic, ethnic and other), and their commitment to social action in the future. The evidence that the programme has had a lasting impact in these areas, let alone that it is cost-effective, is not yet in or conclusive. NCS is just one small part of the story—and too often over-emphasised in debates relative to all the good work done by the voluntary, charity and community sector within communities.

7 September 2017

⁶⁶⁰ National Audit Office (2017) National Citizen Service.

Newcastle Council for Voluntary Service – written evidence (CCE0038)

Newcastle CVS is the lead infrastructure organisation for Newcastle and Gateshead's voluntary and community sector. As well as developing and supporting voluntary and community organisations to be more sustainable and resilient, we organise networks and events and represent the voluntary and community sector in strategic discussions. We carry out research and produce policy studies. We have over 750 member and associate organisations that are local voluntary and community organisations, CICs and social enterprises and operate in Newcastle and Gateshead.

Newcastle and Gateshead are based in the North East of England. Newcastle is a city with two universities and a population of around 300,000 people living in mainly urban areas. Gateshead has an inner urban area, a larger more rural population (former mining villages) and a population of around 200,000 people. Both areas have council wards that are in the lowest 10% of wards in the Index of Multiple Deprivation.

1. Until recently, both populations in Newcastle and Gateshead would have been defined by (relative) stability, but in the last fifteen years, the outcome of migration (within and outside the UK); the impact of the universities; and desire to access to better paid jobs means both areas now have a much greater number of residents who have lived in the area for less than five years. Is citizenship about place? Is about belonging and identity? How do you define yourself if it is in relation to others – work, family, partnership, parenthood. If these states are changing what does that mean – are you intrinsically the same person in a different place and state or do you alter to fit the circumstances. One of the post Brexit debates divides people into 'anywhere' – a citizen of the world, or 'somewhere' being more fixed in attitude.

Identity itself is changing and becoming more fluid – gender, race, religion/belief; people no longer fit into single boxes. This in itself is not a problem for the individuals, but the attitudes of others (people, organisations and services) are more hostile. The issue of age and perception means much greater tolerance by younger people.

However the converse of this is people who would prefer to be with others like them, and how they can engage within this rapidly shifting landscape.

2. Is the definition of citizenship more than the legal one? Should there be citizenship ceremonies for all? How can this be promoted without a sense of superiority? How can this be raised sensitively in schools? How do you encourage citizenship and diversity – that which binds us rather than divides us? How about celebrating difference? Part of the citizenship process is a test – why should anyone have to prove themselves and what does the test indicate – namely you know the answers to some questions. It is unlikely that the majority of people born in the UK could answer all these questions.

3. This feels very legalistic; what is the role of the state and the individual? What happens if an individual chooses not to engage – legal action, fines, imprisoning them? Experience shows people engage where they make a difference, get treated with respect, get heard and receive a response. Enforcement and monitoring is not the way to go and is more likely to alienate; who ‘enforces and monitors’, for what purpose? People need to have a choice to engage or not.

4. It is more than law, it is the environment and culture. Children and young people are not taught sufficiently about the history of ordinary people (as opposed to kings and generals), the rights movement, the struggle for the franchise or encouraged to register to vote.

There is a lot of confusion about ‘political engagement’ – can you ask someone to sign a petition, what happens if you take part in a march etc. Political engagement is not necessarily about political parties but social change. The current laws in relation to charities (Transparency of Lobbying Act) has led to confusion and a deterrent to take action.

Voting could be made mandatory and include a ‘none of the above’ option? There are claims that the UK system of voting (usually First Past the Post) disenfranchises so many people that they don’t vote because their preference isn’t counted. Do countries that have different electoral systems have a higher turnout. Is the way people vote, the polling register, a particular day etc a disincentive? Should it be mandatory to register to vote - there appears to be a trade-off between encouraging more people to register and vote and safe systems that prevent fraud. Recent voting figures illustrate the different turnouts at elections in relation to age – 58% of under 25s as compared to 75% of people aged over 60. There is also massive disenfranchisement for poorer people, people who move about a lot, people from BAME communities, people in houses of multiple occupation, new residents, students and young people (universities and FE Colleges should have to ensure that all eligible students are registered to vote). The voting age should be lowered to the same age of responsibility for marriage and being a member of the armed forces.

5. We should be using education as a tool for good and to encourage engagement. Local charities could be involved in delivery. Again it should be part of everyday education, but compulsion is not always the best way to engage. Does political mean party political - how should this be taught without indoctrination. The current syllabus has minimal political education - what is meant by local and national governments, where does power and responsibility lie, comparative political systems. Political education should be widened to include democratic education.

6. There is insufficient current evidence on the outcomes from NCS. It seems to be incredibly variable. In Newcastle a national organisation has been parachuted in whilst local young people’s organisations (who were too small to bid for franchises) have had their grants and contracts disproportionately cut. Local organisations, which are grounded in communities, attract local volunteers, often people who benefitted themselves. Unless the NCS provider is an existing local organisation who is linked in already to communities, it doesn’t seem to work well. It doesn't operate all year round. It often doesn't engage with the young people with the greatest needs and there is no incentive for this to happen. How can programmes become compulsory – what if someone chooses not to engage – will they be fined or imprisoned? NCS was clearly a political priority and it has been put onto a statutory footing. We are not convinced that the money spent could not have better used in supporting local voluntary organisations which relate to different communities (geography and identity).

7. Charities are often the mechanism for civic engagement for many people - by providing volunteering opportunities, by encouraging social action and by advocating for our beneficiaries. Civic engagement should be the responsibility of all. Often charities and community organisations are not recognised for this role, but instead as service providers. Charities have to identify their public benefit - and be clear about how they discharge this. Government and Parliament should recognise this wider role of voluntary and not for profit organisations. We are not paid to do this but it is central to what we do.
8. Are British values really different to French or other Western European values defined in the consensus after the Second World War? The UK has an Equality Act that is framed in legislation that makes it clear that people should not be discriminated against because of particular characteristics. Values should include respect for difference and diversity. If individuals are not treated with respect by the State or suffer unfair discrimination, it is not surprising that they don't engage. The growing disparity and wealth in society leaves more people disenfranchised. A fairer society is more likely to encourage participation and engagement. Our current legislation hasn't caught up with developments in social media and ICT.
9. People don't just feel 'left behind' because many people are actually left behind. They work hard, have minimal employment rights, don't earn enough to properly care for their families, don't have the opportunities for long term stable housing, don't have access to better education and jobs. After nearly fifty years of the Equal Pay Act, even the BBC with all of their diversity policies, have gross pay differences between men and women. This particular inequality can be measured objectively. There are clearly many factors which go beyond the protected characteristics in The Equality Act which mean many communities and groups are excluded from everyday life. Our organisation works with victims of Hate Crime and this has huge impacts on the quality of their lives. If we have people from more diverse and different communities in positions of power and who are more visible in the media, then these will more inspirational and act as role models to others. What percentage of the House of Lords are white men aged over fifty, as compared to those in the population at large?
10. These (citizenship, civic engagement, social cohesion and integration) are all part of the same spectrum. A healthy society is more likely to embrace diversity and difference. Some communities have mono-cultures and if children are raised in this environment and adults work in this environment, how do they cope and deal with differences they have never previously encountered. Sometimes the response to difference can be fear and antagonism. The use of quotas, positive discrimination, role models and more people from different and diverse communities in positions of power should be introduced.

11. Communication is key to integration. It is particularly important for women who might otherwise have to rely (inappropriately) on their children to interpret. The state should pay for English as a Second Language classes - most of this funding has been removed since 2010. Many charities and volunteers offer classes. Action Foundation, a Newcastle-based charity offers free classes run by volunteers some of whom are refugees and migrants, to teach others. Here at Newcastle CVS we offer bilingual advocacy so people who need to access public services can make their voices heard and exercise their rights.
12. The many charities, voluntary organisations, community groups that operate across the U.K. that are dependent on the goodwill of volunteers surely promote a tolerant and cohesive society. People are giving their time, capacity, commitment and resources (including money) for no personal benefit. As an infrastructure organisation operating in Newcastle and Gateshead we see over a quarter of residents volunteering on a regular basis. If asked why they do this, many would define it terms of 'doing good', 'giving back', 'feeling worthwhile', as well as enjoying it. I have never heard of anyone volunteering from the perspective of a 'British citizen'.

Care needs to be taken not to regulate or involve compulsion but instead consider the environment and culture that encourages involvement and engagement that leads to a healthier society. Any final document should refer to charities, community groups and volunteering.

27 August 2017

No Recourse to Public Funds (NRPF) Network – written evidence (CCE0155)

1. The No Recourse to Public Funds (NRPF) Network, hosted by Islington Council, is a network of local authorities and other organisations focusing on the statutory safeguarding response to destitute migrant families, care leavers and adults with care needs, who, due to their immigration status, cannot access mainstream benefits or statutory housing services. Local authorities are required to provide essential financial and housing support to the most vulnerable individuals and families due to safeguarding duties set out in the Children Act 1989, the Care Act 2014 and equivalent legislation in the devolved administrations.
2. This submission responds to questions 9,10 and 11:

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other?

11. Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

3. This response seeks to demonstrate that some aspects of UK immigration policy are not conducive to encouraging a meaningful sense of belonging or active citizenship, which in turn affects a person’s ability to integrate. Such policies affect not only people who have naturalised as British but also those who have acquired British citizenship through birth and are dependent on a parent who is not British.
4. Key points:
 - British children in families where the parent has no recourse to public funds (NRPF) may be economically disadvantaged and feel ‘left behind’ due to the impact on the family of being excluded from benefits and other publically funded services, e.g. free school meals. Such families may become dependent on housing and financial assistance provided by social services.
 - Prosperous and safe communities cannot be achieved if a significant proportion of residents are forced to rely on ‘safety-net’ services provided by communities, charities and social services at considerable expense to the taxpayer. Instead, economic self-sufficiency amongst citizens can be promoted by the state through the provision of benefits and child care in order to enable and sustain employment.

No Recourse to Public Funds (NRPF) Network – written evidence (CCE0155)

- People on lengthy immigration pathways to citizenship, namely the 10-year settlement route, will face barriers to integration throughout this period which may impact on the extent of their civic engagement and integration once they obtain citizenship.
- Citizenship fees prohibit children in low-income families from asserting their entitlement to British citizenship and give rise to costs for local authorities where these fees are funded for children in the care of social services.

5. Recommendations:

- The government should treat people who are on immigration settlement routes, and their dependants, as future citizens, and prioritise economic resilience over immigration sanctions in order to support a path to civic engagement based on fair access to services.
- The government should actively encourage people with an entitlement to British citizenship to apply for this by providing accessible information and promoting this within statutory services, the voluntary sector and communities.
- Any person with an entitlement to British citizenship should not be prevented from obtaining this due to prohibitive fees:
 - Fees should be significantly reduced and/or subject to a fee waiver for people on a low income.
 - Looked after children in the care of local authorities should be exempt from paying a fee to register as a British citizen.

A. Disadvantages faced by British citizen children who are dependent on a parent who has no recourse to public funds (NRPF)

6. British citizen children, who are dependent on a parent who is a non-EEA national and has no recourse to public funds (NRPF), do not have the same entitlements as their British peers, and are at risk of experiencing poverty due to their parent's immigration status. The NRPF condition excludes the parent from claiming many welfare benefits, homelessness assistance and an allocation of social housing through the council register.
7. This situation may arise in single parent families, where the parent has a right to live in the UK that has been acquired due to being the carer of a British child. The child may have acquired their citizenship at birth through the other parent being British or settled, or may have registered as British by entitlement, for example, following their birth and 10 years' residence in the UK. The parent may have obtained leave to remain under the Immigration Rules, or have acquired a right to reside under European law:

(i) Leave to remain with NRPF granted under the Immigration Rules

- The parent must make an application to the Home Office for a fee of £1493 (including the Immigration Health Charge) unless they are eligible for a fee waiver.
- The parent will have 30 months limited leave to remain and be on a 10-year route to settlement, so will need to reapply for leave to remain every 2.5 years.
- The parent will have the NRPF condition, excluding them from welfare benefits and social housing, unless they have demonstrated to the Home Office that they are destitute, in which case recourse to public funds may be granted.
- Between 2013 and 2015, over 50,000 individuals with dependents were given leave to remain in the UK along with a ‘no recourse to public funds’ condition.⁶⁶¹

(ii) Derivative right to reside under European Union (EU) law as the primary carer of a British citizen (Zambrano carer)

- Right to reside and work in the UK acquired by a non-EEA national parent when a British child would be deprived of their EU citizenship rights should they be forced to leave the EU if the parent is not permitted to stay and work in the UK.
- The parent is not required to document this right but will need to do so in order to evidence their right to work and lawful presence in the UK.
- In November 2012, the benefit and housing regulations were amended to exclude Zambrano carers from accessing income-based benefits and social housing. These restrictions were upheld as lawful by the Court of Appeal on the basis that ‘safety net’ support could be provided to the most vulnerable by local authorities under section 17 of the Children Act 1989.⁶⁶²
- Zambrano carers cannot acquire a permanent right of residence under EU law and will need to apply for leave to remain under the Immigration Rules, as described at (i), in order to embark on a route to settlement.

8. Parents with either type of immigration status will be excluded from most income-based welfare benefits, including those provided to sustain low-paid employment, and will be reliant on the insecure private rented sector for housing. The parent’s immigration status will also impact on whether the British child will be able to access some other publically funded services, as highlighted below.

Public funds for immigration purposes	Parent is Zambrano carer	Parent has leave to remain with NRPF
--	---------------------------------	---

⁶⁶¹ The Children’s Society, Making Life Impossible: how the needs of destitute migrant children are going unmet, April 2016, p.7 <https://www.childrensociety.org.uk/what-we-do/resources-and-publications/making-life-impossible-how-the-needs-of-destitute-migrant>

⁶⁶² Sanneh & Ors v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] EWCA Civ 49 (10 February 2015). <http://www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWCA/Civ/2015/49.html>

No Recourse to Public Funds (NRPF) Network – written evidence (CCE0155)

Child benefit	No	Yes (due to an exception)
Child tax credit	No	No
Other publically funded services (not classed as 'public funds' for immigration purposes)
Free school meals (where these are not universally provided) ⁶⁶³	No	No
Government funded childcare for 2 year olds ⁶⁶³	No	No
Government funded childcare for 3 & 4 year olds (15 hours)	Yes	Yes
Government funded childcare for 3 & 4 year olds (30 hours where parents are working)	Yes ⁶⁶⁴	No
Government funded childcare (new tax-free scheme where parents are working)	Yes ⁶⁶⁴	No
Pupil premium funding paid to a school to support the attainment of disadvantaged pupils ⁶⁶³	No	No

9. As a consequence of the resulting financial hardship often experienced by these families, who struggle to earn sufficient income from employment alone to cover their housing, living and childcare costs, social services often have to step in and provide support under section 17 of the Children Act 1989, in order to safeguard the welfare of a child in need. The responsibility of providing this parallel welfare system is summarised by the Judge in a judicial review case that examined the lawfulness of a local authority's child in need assessment where the parent had leave to remain with NRPF: 'the local authority is empowered to rescue a child in need from destitution where no other state provision is available.' ⁶⁶⁵

10. The NRPF Network's data shows that in December 2016, 23% of children in NRPF families supported by 39 local authorities under section 17 were British Citizens. ⁶⁶⁶

11. However, safety net support provided by local authorities will generally not be on a par with that which a family of equivalent size would receive were they claiming welfare benefits. Families will be provided with financial support at a level

⁶⁶³ The only instances where these may be provided to a British child in an NRPF family are when the child: has a current statement of Special Educational Needs or an Education, Health and Care plan; is entitled to Disability Living Allowance or was formerly looked after by a local authority and their main carer has an adoption, special guardianship or child arrangement order.

⁶⁶⁴ The Childcare (Early Years Provision Free of Charge) (Extended Entitlement) Regulations 2016 & The Childcare Payments (Eligibility) Regulations 2015 do not specifically exclude non-EEA nationals with a right to reside in the UK derived from EU law from accessing these services.

⁶⁶⁵ AC & SH, R (On the application of) v London Borough of Lambeth Council [2017] EWHC 1796 (Admin), paragraph 42.

⁶⁶⁶ Data from NRPF Connect database taken on 8 December 2016: 679 out of 2963 children supported under section 17 of the Children Act 1989 or section 22 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 were British citizens.

determined by the local authority to meet a child's assessed needs, so will vary between families and authorities. Often Home Office asylum support payments are used as a base rate - £36.95 per person/week - but the amount paid may be lower or higher than this depending on the local authority's practice and needs of a particular family.

12. With regards to housing, the courts have been clear that the local authority must be satisfied that accommodation provided under section 17 of the Children Act meets the child's needs.⁶⁶⁷ The accommodation used by local authorities to house NRPF families may include B&Bs and out of area placements.
13. The average time period NRPF households are supported by social services is 855 days.⁶⁶⁸ Usually the only way a family can end their dependence on social services' support is by the parent applying to the Home Office to change their immigration status so that they obtain recourse to public funds.
14. Immigration policies excluding the main carers of British citizen children from mainstream benefits and social housing does not therefore encourage integration through employment, differentiates children in these families from their British peers and leads to economic disadvantage. It is widely accepted that children from low income families are less likely to do well in school, are more likely to suffer ill-health and face pressures in their lives that can be associated with unemployment and criminality.⁶⁶⁹ Therefore, British children in NRPF families will face challenges integrating fully into society which may affect their ability to actively participate as a citizen by the time they become adults.
15. The fact that a British child's parent may themselves be on a long pathway to citizenship, and, as a consequence, face barriers to economic self-sufficiency, will also adversely impact on the family's ability to integrate and affect the ability of communities more widely to prosper - see section B.

B. Immigration pathways to citizenship

16. When considering barriers to active citizenship for future citizens who become British through naturalisation, rather than acquisition through birth, it is necessary to examine their pathway to citizenship, as this will have an impact on their ability to integrate within UK society, overall community cohesion and may also result in an individual feeling 'left behind'.

⁶⁶⁷ C, T, M & U, R (On the Application Of) v London Borough of Southwark [2014] EWHC 3983 (Admin)
<http://www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWHC/Admin/2014/3983.html>

⁶⁶⁸ Data from NRPF Connect database taken from 45 local authorities on 30 June 2017: average number of days on support for all supported households (2599), including 1853 families.
<http://www.nrpfnetwork.org.uk/nrpfconnect/Pages/default.aspx>

⁶⁶⁹ The Casey Review: a review into opportunity and integration, 5 December 2016, paragraph 1.9.
<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/the-casey-review-a-review-into-opportunity-and-integration>

17. Under the Immigration Rules, leave to enter or remain may be granted on a route to settlement in the UK, allowing indefinite leave to remain (ILR) to be applied for after a specified period of continuous leave. For example, refugees are on a five-year route, whereas people applying under the family migration rules will be on either a five-year or 10-year route.
18. The 10-year settlement route was introduced in July 2012, when the family migration rules were reformed, and applies to people who are granted leave to remain on the following basis:
- Child who has lived in the UK for seven years
 - Parent of a British child or child who has lived in the UK for seven years
 - Partner of a British citizen where the Home Office has accepted that to refuse leave would result in a breach of their right to family life (Article 8) – they may or may not have been required to meet the minimum income requirement
 - Person granted leave to prevent a breach of their human rights (non-asylum related)
 - Private life (long residence) in the UK
19. Adults may only naturalise as British citizens when they have a form of settled status, such as ILR. Being required to apply for limited leave to remain every 2.5 years before ILR can be applied for on completing 10 years, results in people experiencing a long period of instability and creates barriers to their integration into UK society:
- A fee of £1493 (including £500 Immigration Health Charge) must be paid to extend leave to remain every 2.5 years unless a fee waiver applies.
 - A small administrative error made when further leave is applied for can result in a person inadvertently becoming an overstayer and immediately losing access to any benefits, the private rented sector and free secondary healthcare.
 - If the NRPF condition is imposed following a period where a parent has had recourse to public funds, any benefits will immediately stop, employment may not be sustainable due to prohibitive childcare costs and the family may become reliant on social services' support – see section A.
 - Long-term reliance on insecure and expensive private sector housing.
 - Restrictive regulations mean that few people with limited leave will qualify for student finance and home fees if they wish to pursue higher education.
20. Despite the government clearly recognising that such people have a long-term future in the UK, this group will have spent a considerable length of time in the UK facing continual insecurity regarding their immigration status. They are likely to have encountered barriers to work and education, and may have experienced poverty and dependence on social services' support if they have children - see section A. If people are to naturalise as British having obtained settlement on completion of the 10-year route, then this will be a highly relevant factor in their ability and willingness to participate as active citizens. If it is accepted that people have a long-term future in the UK they must be treated as future citizens and provided with the opportunity to fully participate and integrate into British society.

C. Fees for registration as a British Citizen

21. Children in low-income families who are entitled under the British Nationality Act 1981 to register as British Citizens face barriers doing this due to the mandatory application fee of £973.
22. This fee applies to children who are entitled to register because they were born in the UK and their parent subsequently becomes British or acquires settled status, or because they were born in the UK and have subsequently been resident for 10 years.
23. With no legal aid available for these types of applications, which may be complicated by a child's unsettled accommodation history if applying under the 10-year rule, legal advice would be an additional cost.
24. Where a local authority is looking after a separated migrant child under section 20 of the Children Act 1989, then it will fall to social services to fund a registration application as in the majority of cases it will be in the child's best interests to obtain British citizenship. Although there is a fee exemption for immigration applications made by looked after children, there is no equivalent for registration applications.
25. NRPF Network data indicates that a significant number of children in NRPF families, who are receiving social services' support to safeguard their welfare and prevent destitution, may be eligible to register as British citizens, were it not for the prohibitive cost: out of 2963 children in 1829 family households receiving social services' support, 572 non-British children were over 10 years' old and 491 families had at least one non-British child over the age of 10.⁶⁷⁰
26. Although the data does not confirm whether these children were born in the UK or how long they have lived in the UK prior to receiving social services' support, it suggests that up to 491 out of 1829 families, 27% of supported households, may have a child who would be eligible to register as a British citizen.
27. Where a child can evidence their British citizenship, this will have consequences for the parent, as they may be able to obtain a right to stay in the UK, and ultimately become British themselves. (See section A). Where there is a delay registering a child as British and resolving the parent's immigration status, the family will remain dependent on social service's support, which is not in the best interests of the child, and will impact on the extent to which the child has integrated by the time they are finally able to obtain citizenship, particularly if prior to this they did not have any leave to remain.

⁶⁷⁰ Data from NRPF Connect taken on 8 December 2016 from 39 local authorities.

8 September 2017

Mr Christopher Norris– written evidence (CCE0051)

Media, publishing and social entrepreneur

1. Citizenship mean belonging to a place – through birth, marriage or conscious choice (after a registration period) and agreeing to a set of social values that characterise the best of British character.

Civic engagement implies an individual’s active integration into their local community beyond the scope of his/her immediate and extended family, participating in shared cultural and social experiences.

In the 21st century, civic engagement embraces and reflects online activity and behaviour.

Individuals have multiple identities: family; peer-group; cultural; religious; personal interest groups; local; regional; national and international. These identities are held in dynamic balance all the time and – along with personality, character and moral outlook – make up the individual personas that we present to the world.

2. The most easily agreed set of British values is the ever-evolving bedrock of the law.

The purpose of politics is to influence and shape the law towards reflecting, rewarding and amplifying best practice in social and public behaviour.

We need to write a personality statement of what it means to be British, a set of shared values that every law-abiding can agree. For example, the best of British character is law-abiding, tolerant, hard-working, fair-minded, good-natured, loyal, generous, sociable, charitable and outward-looking.

Society needs to showcase best civic practice and reward outstanding behaviour.

3. Society must build trust between our various communities. This needs a deep review assessment of everyone’s needs, culture and ambition.

Equal opportunities need to be engrained in everything we do, not just paid lip service. We need to address and root out all aspects of life in Britain that prevent social mobility: everyone in the UK deserves the same chance to shine so that citizens succeed on merit, not on nepotism, class or financial wealth.

Politics need to define methods and procedures for ensuring equal opportunities and meritocracy across all communities in Britain. Punitive sanctions need to be available and enforced – and seen to be enforced – to ensure everyone has an equal chance to succeed in life by reaching their goals and achieving their ambitions.

4. We need to encourage citizens to vote. The following suggestions are some of the changes that need to be made:
 - People must be allowed to vote at 16: the age of consent is the time when an individual’s personal choices are directly affected by politics.
 - Introduce proportional representation for all elections
 - Enshrine a Bill of Rights into UK law
 - Create a culture that explains the benefits of voting: give reasons why voting makes a positive difference on everyone’s lives
 - Conduct research into why people don’t vote and act on the report’s findings
 - Develop secure ways of voting electronically
 - Ensure robust security of the voting process
 - Design ways to provide instant factual feedback to political claims (i.e. to reduce ‘fake news’ by presenting the truth or falsehood of political statements in real time)
 - Educate students to understand the importance of politics to their lives
 - Reform the House of Lords: create a second elected chamber of regional representatives to deal with long-term social issues beyond the life cycle of the House of Commons.
5. Good citizenship needs to be taught from birth (including during ante-natal classes for parents). Such teaching would have no exemptions: whilst everyone would have to participate such training would be framed as fun and relevant.

The education system needs an overhaul. League tables based on academic achievement perpetuate class and wealth bias. The curriculum needs to address the needs of wider society in terms of how productive citizens behave. The importance of universal suffrage is vital to student’s understanding of what it means to be an adult and an active participant in civic society.

6. This question is the first time I have come across the National Citizen Service. The programme looks fabulous. I would be relaxed about making the scheme compulsory, for 15-17 year-olds and – in an age-appropriate version - for newly naturalised citizens.
7. Central and devolved government create holistic environments where civic engagement can flourish; local government run individual schemes and programmes within these environments. Examples of best local practice can be shared and taken up nationally.

8. The civic ‘personality statement’ (see question 2) needs to be enforced so that everyone buys into a shared set of values. Championing of best practice will reduce the impact and attraction of groups with views and beliefs that condone and encourage violence against society’s civic values.
9. Human nature dictates that we all compare ourselves negatively with other people. As a society, we need to create an education system that encourages social and civic engagement and reduces the fear of the unknown.

We need to impose zero tolerance of racist, sexist, culturally intolerant and class-based statements, policies and behaviour, both online and in the real world.

We need the media to be more socially engaged. We need voices from all parts of society to have real power in the media.

We need to devise punitive sanctions that can be imposed on any rogue media that perpetuate stereotypes, bias and intolerance in the pursuit of higher ratings or increased circulation figures that do not impact the freedom of the press.

There is a world of difference between ‘free speech’ and ‘hate speech’.

10. Citizenship and social cohesion are two sides of the same coin. No one joins a club if they don’t like the rules. Society need zero tolerance institutional and individual racism, sexism, bullying and class-based prejudice.
11. Proficiency in English is important, but new citizens need to feel like they have a positive stake in their communities. Any testing procedure needs to avoid creating ‘us and them’ scenarios; the system needs to expand the definition of ‘us’.
12. We need to encourage local participation in community projects with real purpose and social-cohesion impacts (e.g. via CrowdPatch, the not-for-profit crowdfunding platform for social entrepreneurs)

We need to publish and broadcast positive news stories that showcase the best of the British character

We need to expand the voices we spotlight and promote positive role models who are succeeding in the public sphere:

Business

- EMpower role models – annual rankings for top 100 ethnic-minority executives
- Black British Business Awards
- Asian Business Awards

Culture

- MOBO Awards – music

Mr Christopher Norris– written evidence (CCE0051)

- British Urban Film Festival – film
- BEFFTA Awards – creative arts, media and entertainment industries

Sport (here are a few examples)

- Football – Ryan Bertrand; Chris Smalling; Dele Ali; Jesse Lingard; Alex Oxlade-Chamberlain; Raheem Sterling; Daniel Sturridge; Jermaine Defoe; Marcus Rashford; Danny Welbeck
- Cricket – Haseeb Hameed; Moeen Ali; Chris Jordan; Isa Guha; Heather Knight; Anya Shrubsole; Natalie Sciver
- Rugby – Courtney Lawes; Maro Itoje; Marland Yarde; Billy Vunipola; Maka Vunipola; Anthony Watson; Nick Isiekwe; Sarah Hunter; Deborah Fleming

3 September 2017

Nottingham Civic Exchange and Professor Matt Henn – written evidence (CCE0188)

Executive summary

- Our submission answers questions 4, 5 and 6 set out by the commission. Our expertise in researching younger people’s political and civic activity leads us to make a set of clear recommendations at the end of this document which we hope the commission will take forward.
- This submission sets out key issues affecting younger people and formal political engagement and makes a strong case for lowering the age to vote to 16.
- We also make the case that the inquiry should avoid supporting compulsory voting aimed at younger people due to a set of potentially damaging consequences.
- We also ask the inquiry to recommend introducing stronger local and project based KS2 citizenship and political education and to fundamentally re-develop citizenship provision.
- Finally, whilst we can see the value of programmes such as NCS, we make a plea for the inquiry to recommend strengthening long term, embedded and community based approaches to support younger people to develop stronger ties within communities and civic and political systems.

About the authors

1. Nottingham Civic Exchange is Nottingham Trent University’s pioneering civic think tank. With a primary focus on issues relating to the city and the region, Nottingham Civic Exchange will enable discovery by creating a space where co-produced approaches are developed to tackle entrenched social issues. Nottingham Civic Exchange supports the role of NTU as an anchor institution in the city and the region. Nottingham Trent University holds engagement with communities, public institutions, civic life, business and residents at the core of its mission. You can find out more about our work at www.ntu.ac.uk/nce.
2. Professor Matt Henn has nearly 20 years’ experience of researching youth and democratic engagement, earning an international reputation for his work in the field. He has led successful projects funded by the ESRC. His work has resulted in numerous high profile publications, together with significant interest from the political parties and citizenship agencies, as well as from the national, local and international media.
3. Professor Henn would be delighted to submit further evidence and give oral evidence if so called.

Submission

Voting and participation of younger people (Q. 4.)

4. Through a range of largescale research projects measuring and codifying young people’s views, we believe there are a number of crucial changes required to encourage voting levels and engagement. Research led by Professor Henn has sought to better understand the characteristics and issues for younger voters and non-voters in the UK.

5. Our submission focuses on encouraging political activity with younger people. Our argument is that young people in Britain are neither anti-democratic nor innately anti-election. This is evidenced by the 75 per cent of 16 and 17 year olds who voted at the Scottish Independence Referendum in 2014, while it is estimated that 64 per cent of registered voters aged 18 to 24 cast a ballot at the 2016 UK referendum on EU membership. Furthermore, at the 2017 General Election there was a large upsurge in the youth voter turnout rate to 64 per cent; this has been attributed by some to the unusual nature of the contest, not least because of the attention given to youth issues by several of the main political parties, but also to the high profile direct form of electoral campaigning from the Labour Party. These particular cases suggest that young citizens will take part in formal election-oriented (institutionalised) politics where such contests have critical meaning and value-potential for them.
6. It remains to be seen whether or not young people's willingness to vote in these recent identity-oriented Referenda and at the 2017 General Election reflect the beginnings of a genuinely new and positive trajectory in youth political engagement, or a temporary reversal in an otherwise ongoing trend of disengagement.
7. Certainly, UK national politicians have observed this relative youth electoral abstention with ongoing concern. Given that young people are significantly less likely to vote than their older contemporaries, it is therefore crucial that young people do not develop a natural pre-disposition towards electoral abstention, otherwise the threat to democracy is that in time the more voting-oriented older generations will be replaced by younger election-abstainer generations.
- Changes to voting processes be considered based on research
8. Using quantitative data from a large representative national survey of 1,025 young people aged 18, recent research conducted at NTU has considered young people's responses to a range of electoral administrative reforms, including whether they would be more likely or less likely to vote in the future if they were able to vote:
 - in a public place such as a supermarket;
 - over more than one day (including weekends);
 - by phone (including by text message or smart phone App);
 - via the Internet or digital television;
 - or if polling stations were open for 24 hours.
9. From this study and based on nearly two decades of researching in this area, Henn's views are that the introduction of these methods would have a positive impact in terms of stimulating increased electoral participation. In particular, voting via the Internet or digital TV would be especially effective in terms of encouraging them to vote in future general elections, followed by voting over more than one day (including weekends) and then voting by phone (including by text message or by a smart phone app)

10. Whilst it is recognised that such changes would not bring uniform increases, there exists a sizeable minority of a key sub-group of intending abstainers that might be persuaded into voting in the future if initiatives were enacted. 45% said they may vote in the next election if they could use the Internet or by digital TV and 32% by phone. These findings suggest that introducing increased flexibility into the electoral provisions might encourage some to reconsider their stated intention to abstain from participating. Consequently, these electoral administration options should be further investigated in terms of their potential impact on political engagement in general and voting in particular, and the issues and practicalities associated with implementation.
- Compulsory voting - a risk not worth taking?
11. One method by which government might intervene to reduce young people's disengagement from electoral politics is to introduce a system of compulsory voting for young people. Whilst the case has been made by numerous policy actors and academics we do not believe this intervention would be beneficial to the longer term aim of supporting increased engagement in political and civil activity. Our main concern with compulsory voting is the risk of increasing societal divisions and the masking affect created by compulsion to deal with the deeper issue of disconnection between younger people and the political system.
12. We recognise the potentially positive outcomes to follow from the introduction of compulsory voting for young people. For instance, drawing on the idea that voting (and indeed non-voting) may be habit-forming, a recent IPPR study has concluded that such a one-off compulsory system would "kick-start a life-long habit of voting" (Birch, Lodge and Gottfried 2013, 21). Secondly, evidence suggests that compulsory voting may reduce generational disparities in electoral participation rates; in particular, it helps to ensure that socio-economically disadvantaged groups are neither under-represented at the ballot booth nor under-estimated in the minds of politicians and policy-makers. In essence, by helping to eliminate the generational electoral divide, it is argued that this would have the effect of reducing generational social and economic policy inequalities. This might contribute to the creation of a virtuous circle, in that young people begin to recognise the latent power of their vote and of their influence over the political class – and this might help to shape an enhanced positive predisposition to electoral participation. However, this is a contested position, and Lever (2008) has recently concluded that in Australia – where compulsory voting is extremely popular and long established – there exists little evidence that high levels of electoral turnout are correlated with enhanced responsiveness of political parties to socio-economically marginalised groups.
13. A major drawback of such a compulsory voting scheme for young people is that it singles them out as 'different' from the rest of the adult population, helping to reinforce the stereotype of this current youth generation as distinctly apathetic. The implication being that it is the behaviour of young people that needs changing, rather than a reform of the political process and of democratic institutions which should become more accessible and meaningful. We are also concerned by the negative implications for the health of our democratic system; by forcing them to vote, this may entrench attitudes of disdain for the parties. However, offering the option to vote for 'None of the above' on the ballot paper may help mitigate against this latter point.

14. A key question to address is whether or not compulsory voting would resolve the disconnect between young citizens and democratic institutions and processes and result in high quality political engagement? Our response is largely shaped by evidence from Henn's ESRC research project mentioned above. Firstly, the data suggest that more young people would vote if compelled to do so in electoral law. However, these data also reveal that those already demonstrating low levels of political engagement - previous non-voters as well as likely future abstainers - would be particularly resistant to compulsory voting. Indeed, such compulsion may actually serve to reinforce a deepening resentment, rather than to engage these particular young people in a positive manner. Compulsory voting for first-contact elections might result in a quantitative increase in the numbers of young voters, but the evidence presented here suggests that it would not necessarily improve the quality of broader political engagement. Consequently, we don't believe that the case for compulsory voting for young people has been made.

- Lowering the voting age to 16

15. Evidence suggests that young people are open-minded about electoral politics and do not have a hardened disaffection; they are more likely than not to express faith in voting and the democratic process although not with politicians or political parties. Research indicates that there is therefore a perception problem. It may be that more young people might opt to engage in elections if they can be convinced that as an age cohort they themselves and their issue priorities are treated seriously by politicians. Reducing the voting age to 16 might assist this process by persuading young people that they are valued by the political class. In doing so, it would contribute to the conversion of their already-existing democratic commitment into actual democratic participation.

16. There is no consensus on whether extending the vote to 16 year olds should be considered a basic right. Detractors question both the maturity of adolescents aged 16 and 17 who have not yet had the opportunity to develop advanced autonomous knowledge and understanding of politics (Chan and Clayton 2006), and also their lack of motivation which it is argued might reduce overall percentage rates of electoral participation (Electoral Commission 2004). Advocates argue that extending the vote to young people while they are "members of settled communities" - living at home and attending school - might increase their turnout in elections (Berry and Kippin 2014, 7). Furthermore, it follows that if socialised into voting within these contexts, they are more likely to continue to do so in the future as voting becomes habit-forming (Franklin 2004).

Finally, supporters argue that enfranchising 16 and 17 year olds would ensure that their concerns are brought to the attention of the political class.

17. As mentioned above, when these younger groups were granted the right to vote at the Scottish Independence Referendum in 2014, three quarters of them cast a ballot. This suggests that young people are not innately averse to voting on matters that are of critical consequence for them. We believe that providing the vote from 16 would be beneficial for young people and society at large.

Educations and citizenship (Q. 5.)

18. Education is in our opinion a critical area to support engagement in civic and political activity. We set out below a series of suggestions to improve and develop this.
19. We don't believe current provision is working and believe an increase in provision starting at KS2 should be implemented, which focusses on awareness of political processes and structures at a local and national scale. This should be complemented by more practical project based interventions for young people that highlight the value and ease of engaging in civil and political systems that exist around them, and position active citizenship education within the context of local communities.
20. The introduction of statutory citizenship classes in schools in England in 2002 was in large part prompted by successive governments' anxieties related to these issues. It is claimed this 'citizenship curriculum' contributes to the development of democratic knowledge and skills, of building informed young citizens, and of preparing them for participation in democratic life. However, reaction to statutory citizenship education (CE) has been mixed (Citizenship Educational Longitudinal Study, various 2001- 2010). Ofsted, has concluded that the method of delivery has been left wanting; and perceived as such by young people. Consequently, in 2012, CE was significantly scaled-back and reinvented with a changed curriculum that gave greater emphases to life skills "at the expense of the political" (Kerr 2014, p.46). These changes continue to raise questions about the efficacy of citizenship education in schools as a preparation for young people's participation in democracy.
21. The active involvement of young people in schools and the wider community provided an opportunity for learning and experiencing active citizenship (Kerr et al 2004: 2-3). Such opportunities depend on student interest, the teaching staff's involvement in the wider community and the school ethos (Ibid: 5). They also depend on a commitment to experiential learning. The original Advisory Group on Citizenship (1998) report emphasised the importance of active learning for active citizenship (see also Arthur and Davison 2002; Packham 2008; Woodward 2004), an approach that requires opportunities for community involvement and learning through citizenship (Selwyn 2002).

22. In the original AGC recommendations, citizenship education was seen as intimately tied to action in the wider community (AGC 1998). Despite this, later research by the NfER found that:

“Young people’s participation opportunities are currently confined largely to the school context, and comprise opportunities to ‘take part’ in clubs and societies, rather than to effect ‘real change’ by engaging with various decision-making processes in and out of school. Additionally, opportunities in the curriculum are often not connected with those in the whole school, or indeed, with wider contexts and communities beyond school.” (NfER 2006a: 1)

23. If current patterns of political disengagement and disaffection are to be reversed, then citizenship education has a critical role to play in helping to:

- promote enhanced universal political literacy,
- foster a strengthened civic culture, and
- alert young citizens to the potential value that is to be gained from strong, active and regular political participation, including (but not limited to) voting.

24. To achieve these outcomes, citizenship education should be extended and deepened so that schools should become what Mycock and Tonge call “sites of democracy”. In particular:

- Citizenship education should remain a statutory element of the national curriculum;
- statutory Citizenship education should be extended to all primary schools to help younger students’ develop their knowledge and understanding of democratic institutions and processes and promote the value to be gained by participating in civic and political projects and activities;
- the GCSE Citizenship Studies should be available to all secondary schools across the UK;
- the balance of emphasis of the Citizenship curriculum should be revised so that political literacy is given increased prominence to pre-2014 levels;
- there should be an expansion of the number of trained specialist teachers who take the lead in the design, teaching and assessment of the citizenship curriculum;
- there should be the “formation of a standing all-party Commission on Education for Citizenship to monitor provision in schools and colleges in England (as recommended in the Crick Report of 1998)” as has been suggested by contributors to the Beyond the Youth Citizenship Commission” (Kerr, 2014).
- Schools should work with community partners to embed civic engagement and practical experience into the Citizenship curriculum, a defining feature of good practice identified in the longitudinal evaluations cited above.

25. We think these are fundamental issues that should be supported and taken forward to ensure future generations of young people grow up understanding how to engage with and influence the world around them.

Young People as citizens in their communities (Q. 6)

26. The increased emphasis on citizenship and social action over the past decade has been welcome, but it has been characterised by short-term programme based approaches at the expense of embedded community-based services for young people. The decline in youth services and youth work provision is well documented, despite previous Ofsted reviews acknowledging the important contribution of youth work to citizenship education.
27. Short term programmes have the benefit of securing high rates of participation but, as the National Audit Office found, 'it remains whether ... effects are enduring' (NAO 2017). There is an added difficulty that such time limited programmes may do little to position young people's power and influence within their own communities. One aspiration for citizenship programmes must be to challenge the exclusion of young people from democratic and community power structures.
28. Longer-term and embedded provision for young people is more likely to be community-based, acting as a 'permanent base' for children and young people to experience active citizenship.
29. At the Nottingham Centre for Children, Young People and Families (www.ntu.ac.uk/nccyfp) we are working with former Children's Commissioner and current Visiting Professor Sir Al Aynsley-Green to develop a 'whole-community' approach to addressing attitudes towards children and young people. This programme will seek to embed aspects of active citizenship education (and the promotion of young people's rights and responsibilities) within the many statutory and voluntary organisations that intersect with their lives. We would be very keen to keep the Committee abreast of developments in this work.

Recommendations

30. As stated in our submission we feel there are a number of crucial steps to take when considering younger peoples formal electoral actions and political and civic engagement. Below we set out a series of recommendations we wish the inquiry will consider and explore in more depth.
31. Flexibility to voting methods and systems are needed to help increase engagement of younger voters and potential voters. Making positive changes to voting administration would see an uptake on voting for younger people with increased attention placed on online or mobile voting options. Between a half and a third of young people identified as abstainers in the political voting system stated they could be persuaded to vote if it was available over the internet, TV or mobile services. This flexibility will also have a knock on affect across the voting population of the UK.

32. Compulsory voting and especially first opportunity compulsory voting should be avoided for future attempts to increase engagement in civil society and voting. Negative impacts and increased stigma associated with forced voting will only reinforce entrenched disdain for political parties who introduce it and reduce effectiveness of this policy intervention for young people.
33. The voting age should be lowered to 16 for all local and central government elections and referenda. We disagree with the assumption that younger people aren't politically engaged in the UK. Evidence from recent UK experiments with votes for 16 year olds suggests that young people do hold strong views on matters viewed as of critical importance to them. This should point to further pressure on political parties to pivot their policies and engagement to a younger demographic to build on recent increases in younger peoples voting rates.
34. The 2017 election highlighted increased engagement with formal political processes from younger people when policies and parties targeted them which strengthens our previous assertions that younger people are disillusioned with political parties and not the role of politics and civil society to improve the world around them. All political parties should take note of this and ensure policies and engagement is designed to better reflect the views of all citizens.
35. Citizenship Education should be developed for Primary School students with a focus on developing knowledge of political institutions at a local and national level with a curriculum that also stresses participation in civic and political projects
36. Department of Education should set out plans to expand the recruitment of specialist citizenship educators to design, teach and assess curriculum which is integral to rather than a bolt on to students educational experience
37. Explore the value of 'whole community' approaches and assert the importance of long term community based civic opportunities for younger people to help strengthen their engagement and awareness of civil society and politics

8 September 2017

Dr Line Nyhagen, Reader in Sociology, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0077)

The role of religious faith in the understanding and practicing of citizenship and civic engagement among religious women, with an emphasis on Muslim and Christian women

1.0 Summary

1.1. Religious faith provides a significant source of identity and meaning to many Muslim and Christian women. Religious faith often underpins these women's sense of belonging to their local communities, to families, friends and neighbours, and thus also provides emotional ties to places and to people. Moreover, religious belonging provides individuals with opportunities for participation and citizenship practice. However, religious beliefs and practices can provide both barriers and resources to participation within and beyond religious communities.

1.2. For Muslim women, Islam provides moral guidance on how to best live your life, just as Christianity provides moral guidance for Christian women. The women in my research equate being a "good Muslim" or a "good Christian" with being a good citizen. Some of the key values that both Muslim and Christian women associate with being a good citizen are: participation in local communities including in religious contexts; caring for family, friends and neighbours; obeying the law; voting in political elections; and having compassion, tolerance and respect towards other people. Despite their religious distinctiveness, there is a considerable commonality between Muslim and Christian women's views of what citizenship is and what constitutes a "good citizen". Muslim and Christian women's wants are the same: to live in peace and care for their families, friends and neighbours, to contribute to society by playing an active part in local communities, and to feel that they belong by connecting with others in a range of social contexts.

1.3 While Christian women feel that their religious identities and practices are largely accepted by the wider society, Muslim women report that their faith is constantly questioned, stereotyped and stigmatized by the wider society. Muslim women experience discrimination, harassment and stereotyping on the street, on public transport, in educational and employment contexts, in media outlets, and in the public sphere more broadly. These experiences have a detrimental impact on Muslim women's sense of well-being and feeling valued as full and equal citizens. Religious hatred and discrimination should be addressed in educational programmes for children and young people. In this regard, the right of women to wear religious dress that signifies their faith must be underscored. The reporting of religious hate crimes should specifically note gender-based forms of such crimes in order to highlight women victims and address their needs.

1.4 Many Muslim women seek opportunities to actively participate in their own religious communities by attending the mosque and engaging in other community organisations. It is important to them that mosques are able to accommodate women's participation via designated spaces for women, and also that mosques afford women access to roles in mosque management and teaching. Importantly, many Muslim women view gender segregated mosques as providing them with an opportunity for participation, rather than as a barrier to their participation. As a response to the general lack of women in mosque governance structures, some Muslim women are developing women-led mosques (e.g. in London and in Bradford).⁶⁷¹ Muslim community organisations, including mosques, should be encouraged to include women in their management and teaching. This encouragement should be extended to all faith based organisations that are in receipt of any form of public funding.

Dr Line Nyhagen, Reader in Sociology, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0077)

1.5 Muslim women's own community organisations should be more widely recognised, listened to and consulted with by UK government institutions, as well as by other civil society organisations including male-dominated Muslim community organisations and also secular women's organisations. Muslim women's organisations provide the best insights into Muslim women's experiences and needs.

2.0 Evidence base

2.1 I am an established academic at Loughborough University, with twenty years' experience of researching the lives and experiences of religious women and men, with a special focus on Christian and Muslim women in European contexts including the UK, Norway and Spain. The evidence herein is based on my research, which has been published in a range of scholarly books and academic journals.

2.2 Selected relevant publications:

2.2.1 Nyhagen, L & B. Halsaa (2016). Religion, Gender and Citizenship: Women of Faith, Gender Equality and Feminism. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2016. Available at: <http://www.palgrave.com/kr/book/9781137405333>

2.2.2 Nyhagen, L. (2016). 'Lived nations – whose nations? The quest for belonging'. Identities: Global Studies in Culture and Power 24 (2): 171-176.

2.2.3. Aune, K. & L. Nyhagen (2016). 'Religion, Politics and Gender'. In Jeffrey Haynes, ed., Routledge Handbook of Religion and Politics. New York: Routledge, 335-351.

2.2.4. Nyhagen, L. (2015). 'Conceptualizing Lived Religious Citizenship: A Case-Study of Christian and Muslim Women in Norway and the United Kingdom'. Citizenship Studies 19 (6-7): 768-784.

⁶⁷¹ For the Inclusive Mosque Initiative in London, see <http://inclusivemosqueinitiative.org/>; for plans by the Muslim Women's Council in Bradford to build a women-led mosque, see <https://www.womenledmosque.co.uk/>. For a further initiative in this direction, see <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2017/jul/26/seyrans-ates-muslim-feminist-liberal-mosque-london-britain>

Dr Line Nyhagen, Reader in Sociology, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0077)

2.2.5. Nyhagen Predelli, L., B. Halsaa & C. Thun (2012). “‘Citizenship is not a word I use’: How Women’s Movement Activists Understand Citizenship”, in Beatrice Halsaa, Sasha Roseneil and Sevil Sümer, eds., Remaking Citizenship in Multicultural Europe: Women’s Movements, Gender and Diversity. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, pages 188-212.

2.2.6. Nyhagen Predelli, L. (2008), “Religion, citizenship and participation: A case study of immigrant Muslim women in Norwegian mosques”. European Journal of Women’s Studies 15 (3): 241-260.

2.2.7. Nyhagen Predelli, L. (2004). “Interpreting Gender in Islam: A Case Study of Immigrant Muslim Women in Oslo, Norway”. Gender & Society, vol. 18, no. 4, August 2004: 473-493.

See also:

2.2.8 Nyhagen, L. (2017). ‘Britain’s “Missing” Muslim Women’. The Conversation. Available at: <https://theconversation.com/britains-missing-muslim-women-80436>.

2.2.9 Nyhagen, L. (2016). ‘Good Muslims’ or ‘Good Citizens’: how Muslim Women Feel about Integration’. The Conversation. Available at: <https://theconversation.com/good-muslims-or-good-citizens-how-muslim-women-feel-about-integration-58796>.

3.0 Religious faith as providing resources and barriers to citizenship and civic engagement

3.1 Muslim women participants in my research referred to stereotypes in society at large as producing significant barriers to their lived citizenship. Due to negative media portrayals of “Islam” and “Muslims”, and to isolated terrorist incidents perpetrated by people calling themselves “Muslims” in the UK and in other geographical contexts, some Muslim women felt they have to demonstrate that they are “a good Muslim”, and that “good Muslims can be good citizens”, so as to counter stereotypes. For example, one participant stated that Muslims ‘... have to be good role models; we have to be good, responsible members of society because that is going to reflect on our religion... You have to portray your religion in the best possible light, because you can damage the image’. It was also suggested that because some Muslim women are ‘so visible and identifiable’ due to their dress, they are under particular pressure to demonstrate that they are good citizens. Another participant noted that she is not as comfortable in public spaces as she was before, thus suggesting that a fear of being harassed. She also observed that an increasing number of Muslim women are wearing the hijab and the practice is therefore becoming increasingly normalized. Because of negative media portrayals, she also felt that Muslim women are under scrutiny and need to demonstrate that they ‘are normal’. The interviewed women underscored participating and contributing to society as positive values and actions that should be promoted by Muslims in order to increase society’s acceptance of Islam and of Muslims. But Muslim women participants also talked about uncomfortable experiences of harassment and discrimination in the workplace, in educational settings or in public spaces like city streets and public transport. Such experiences were in some instances directly associated with the wearing of a headscarf while in other cases it was also related to the woman’s skin colour. Racism, religious prejudice and gender inequalities thus intersect and undermine Muslim women's sense of wellbeing and of being accepted as full and equal citizens.

3.2. Religious community organisations can be said to inhabit a 'borderland' between the private and public spheres, in as much as they are often left alone with little or no public interference (exemplified via exemptions granted to religious organisations from equality legislation) whilst at the same time being important arenas for engagement and participation beyond the spheres of home and/or work. Historically, the voluntary sector has provided women in particular with opportunities to move beyond more restrictive roles in the home and to engage in charitable and political activities that have a considerable impact on the wider societies in which they live. Muslim women in the UK have a long history of mobilization and organization to support local communities, and this history should be made more visible in media and educational resources. Advocates of Muslim women's rights and Islamic feminism are also becoming increasingly vocal and visible and deserve to be recognised and heard by UK government institutions as well as by other Muslim community organisations and by secular women's organisations.

3.3. Religious places of worship such as mosques provide vital arenas for women's sense of belonging and participation as well as for contributing to the wider community. Traditionally, women have been excluded from and/or marginalized within mosques due to a total lack of space for women, or the allocation of an inferior and limited space to women compared to that of men. However, purpose-built mosques are increasingly incorporating separate spaces for women and are thus accommodating women's participation, albeit in gender segregated ways. Although some mosques are becoming more gender-inclusive, there are still mosques from which women are excluded. Women's participation in religious organisations may thus be restricted and even denied through male authority and processes of exclusion. In my research, Muslim women reported that while some mosques now accommodate women through designated spaces, there are others that do not have a space at all for women, or only have a small space for women's prayer, and this was deemed to produce barriers to women's participation. Other Muslim community organisations may also be male-dominated and should be encouraged to operate in more gender-inclusive ways.

3.4 Muslim women in my research are very appreciative of their mosques, which offer women-only spaces via a separate entrance. This enables women to take part in gender segregated religious services, where men are seated in the main prayer room and women in a separate room. The interviewees stated that women feel comfortable coming to the mosque because they have their own space, where they can talk about their personal lives as well as partake in religious prayers. Some also mentioned the introduction of formal women's committees that have decision-making power in relation to women's activities and fundraising as a positive development. For example, an interviewee noted that, in her mosque, “ten years ago nobody would have thought of having a sub-committee of women who would have equal voting rights and look what we have achieved today”. She saw the role of the women’s committee to be that of ‘empower[ing women] to participate in mainstream society, using their religious knowledge’. Religious organisations can thus function as a resource to increase Muslim women’s participation and influence in local communities and as a pathway to further participation in wider society. Muslim community organisations such as mosques can provide women with designated spaces and actively encourage women’s participation and leadership. Muslim community organisations should also encourage women’s participation in wider society, through education, employment and volunteering and impart that women’s participation is both valued and supported by Islamic teachings.

Dr Line Nyhagen, Reader in Sociology, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0077)

The UK government should encourage and support Muslim women’s own organisations as well as their participation in mosques through its funding policies and other policy initiatives.

3.5. One of the strengths of British Muslim communities is their diverse organisational landscape, be it in the form of mosques and other community organisations, including women’s organisations that work to support Muslim women (e.g., the Muslim Women’s Council of Bradford; the Muslim Women’s Network; Maslaha, and others).⁶⁷² Muslim women’s organisations are legitimate representatives of Muslim women’s voices, and as such they need to be heard in governance and decision-making processes that involve stakeholders such as government institutions, secular women’s organisations, and other Muslim community organisations.

4.0 Supporting and increasing the civic engagement of religious women

4.1. The government should further encourage the reporting of hate crimes, discrimination and harassment to the police where religious individuals are targeted because of their faith. In particular, government should encourage awareness and reporting to the police of abuse where religion intersects with other identity characteristics such as gender (e.g. when women are abused, discriminated and harassed due to their choice of religious dress). The coordinated work of the Community Security Trust, Tell Mama, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Department for Communities and Local Government police in producing a guide for those affected by hate crimes is commendable.⁶⁷³ However, while the current definition of ‘hate crime’ applied by these stakeholders refers to ‘a person’s race or perceived race; religion or perceived religion; sexual orientation or perceived sexual orientation; disability or perceived disability and any crime motivated by hostility or prejudice against a person who is transgender or perceived to be transgender’, the definition does not include the term ‘gender’ and gender-based hate crime.⁶⁷⁴ In this regard, the work undertaken by Nottinghamshire Police to include misogyny as a hate crime⁶⁷⁵ should be implemented at national level. More attention needs to be paid to gender-based religious hate crimes. Such crimes involve intersections between misogyny and religious hatred and can they can be expressed by individuals, organisations, and media outlets.

⁶⁷² For the Muslim Women’s Council, see <http://www.muslimwomenscouncil.org.uk/>; for the Muslim Women’s Network UK, see <http://www.mwnuk.co.uk/>; for Maslaha, see <http://www.maslaha.org/>

⁶⁷³ See <https://tellmamauk.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/08/Hate-Crime-A-guide-for-those-affected.pdf>

4.2. The government should seek to combat religious hatred and discrimination through educational programmes for children and young people and also through clear political messages to the wider British public about the need for religious tolerance and the value of religious freedom, including the right of women to wear religious dress. Religious women in the UK, including those from ethnic minority groups, have a long history of mobilization and organization to support local communities. This history should be made more visible in media and educational resources.

4.3. The government should approach the issue of religious faith and citizenship from a broad perspective, where individuals, groups and communities from religious and ethnic minority groups are not viewed in isolation (and thus are potentially further stigmatized) but are seen in relation to individuals, groups and communities of other faiths and none, including the majority faith (Christianity) and secular beliefs. In particular, a political discourse of ‘difference’ between Muslims and other people in Britain must be replaced by a discourse that emphasizes the commonly shared values that are held by people across religious-secular boundaries. As evidenced by my research, Christian and Muslim women share the notion that a “good citizen” is someone who participates in their community, care for their family, friends and neighbours, obeys the law, votes in political elections, and shows compassion, tolerance and respect towards other people. A constructive step would be for the UK government to talk about ‘British values’ not as uniquely British, but as resonating with universal values relating to democracy, rights, duties, participation and caring for others.

4.4. The government should actively consult more with representatives from Muslim women’s organisations in policy-making processes. These organisations provide important counterpoints and corrections to the views that are imparted by male leaders of male-dominated religious organisations where women may be denied a voice. The government should also consider actively requiring male-dominated Muslim organisations to nominate women for participation in consultations with government.

4.5 Muslim organisations (e.g. mosques and civil society/third sector organisations) should be actively encouraged to include Muslim women in their activities and thus provide arenas that support and enhance further public participation and engagement by Muslim women. In particular, mosques in Britain should be encouraged to provide ample spaces for women's participation in religious prayer and other activities in the mosque, and to include women in their governance and decision-making processes. These recommendations should be extended to religious organisations across all faiths and none. In this regard, efforts by the government to improve the gender balance on business boards through voluntary means could be replicated for voluntary sector boards. As a minimum, all voluntary sector organisations that receive public funding should be encouraged to report on and improve on (where needed) the gender balance of their own governing structures. Thus, when religious community organisations (or so-called faith based organisations) receive public funding (e.g. to provide public services or to implement public policies), they could be asked to demonstrate the participation of women in the management and spending of public resources.

⁶⁷⁴ See ‘Hate Crime. A Guide for Those Affected’, 2017, p. 7, published by the Community Security Trust, Tell MAMA, The Crown Prosecution Service and the Department for Communication and Local Government. Available at: <https://tellmamauk.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/08/Hate-Crime-A-guide-for-those-affected.pdf>

⁶⁷⁵ See <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-nottinghamshire-36775398>

Dr Line Nyhagen, Reader in Sociology, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0077)

6 September 2017

Oatlands Community Group – written evidence (CCE0116)

Background

The House of Lords has set up a committee to explore the issues of citizenship and civic engagement in the twenty-first century. The committee is keen to hear from a wide range of individuals, groups and organisations in order to understand the nature of the citizenship challenge for different parts of society; the aim being to identify new ways of building bridges within and between communities, and to support civic engagement. How to think about citizenship and civic engagement in a more vibrant, positive and integrated manner is of particular interest to the committee.

Key questions of interest to the committee

The committee is seeking to gather evidence in answer to 12 questions about citizenship and civic engagement. Oatlands Community Group is submitting evidence in response to questions 9 and 12 in particular. These questions are:

- Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?
- Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

About Oatlands Community Group

Oatlands Community Group (OCG) is a secular community group in Harrogate, North Yorkshire. It has no fixed community base. The group was set up in March 2016 in response to a perceived need in the local area for events to tackle social isolation. The group officially became a legal entity and not-for-profit organisation in July 2016, and is currently working towards becoming a Charitable Incorporated Organisation. The group is run entirely by volunteers and has received donations of money, equipment and time from a local foundation, companies and individuals.

OCG has developed a calendar of events in the local area which are free to attend and which aim to gather the community together for fun. These events are detailed below. As part of its calendar of events, OCG often fundraises for other charities and in its first year it had raised some £3,300 for other charities.

The experience of Oatlands Community Group

In answer to Q9: 9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

1153

OCG faced a number of barriers to becoming established and operating successfully. These barriers and the ways in which OCG overcame them are detailed in the table below. Note that we would be very happy to share model and resources (website) with other communities but have no vehicle to do so.

Barrier	How the barrier was overcome
Securing funds
Difficulty in securing funds due to not being a registered charity: most grant funders want a registered charity number to award to	In the process of changing our status from unincorporated charity to registered charitable incorporated organization (CIO)
Constraints in our ability to grow as a charity: the public want our services but we lack funds (and volunteers) to support our work	We identified a number of small grants available to unincorporated charities to help fund our first year of events. Once we are a CIO we will be able to apply for a wider range of funds. Some items we funded personally.
Securing grants takes time and experience	We found volunteers with experience of applying for funding, and also attended a course on applying for grants
Going through the process of becoming a CIO
Guidance was needed to steer the group through a myriad of legal and statutory requirements, preparing a submission to the Charity Commission and writing policies and procedures to support the group's work	Engaged with professionals offering support and guidance for newly established groups (cost for this was funded by us personally) Identified a volunteer with experience of policy writing
Motivating the community to become engaged
While there is evident demand for the community group and its events, only a small minority of like-minded individuals	Engaging with community individuals effectively by raising awareness of OCG, its aims and its events, and letting people know how they can get involved. Putting out requests for support via social media

Oatlands Community Group – written evidence (CCE0116)

in the community is willing to actually get involved.	(see below). Encouraging young people in particular to volunteer by offering a scheme to help mentor and develop their skills and document this for their CVs
Energetic and enthusiastic leadership is needed to bring those individuals together as one and harness their skills effectively	Our founding members have a strong commitment to the local community and a clear vision of OCG's goals. Without this, the group would probably be much less successful
Raising awareness of OCG and its activities via online presence and marketing	Create 'brand', market effectively using website, Facebook, blogging, vlogging, Instagram, Twitter
Reaching those in the community who may not access information online, and associated costs of doing this	Signpost visually through banners & flyers, word of mouth, feedback surveys & testimonials. Funding for this was obtained from local businesses and small grant providers Created a partnership working with other community groups (e.g. Oatlands Community Centre, St Mark's Church)
Including hard-to-reach groups in our activities
Reaching cross-generationally: some young people may never have come across volunteering / limited community opportunities for very young volunteers possibly through lack of information & opportunities / limited volunteering opportunities for elderly (who may have a lot of experience) due to H&S Risk Assessments regarding frailty or exclusion based on age (both young and old).	OCG has established a volunteer scheme for young volunteers (aged under 18) whereby we train them and also document the hours they put in so that they can put these on their CVs at a later date. While we do not specifically target older volunteers, our opportunities are open to everyone.

Inclusion – ‘community’ isn’t just based on where you live it’s also based on things like heritage, ethnicity, faith, culture, environment, leisure activities – people in the community may identify in multiple communities – how to find out about them, how to engage with them	By using a variety of locations (e.g. community centre, church, playing fields), we aim to reach a broad range of people within the community
--	--

In answer to Q12: Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

OCG has established various events over the past year that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship. These are detailed in the table below.

Event	Ways in which it promotes a positive vision of British Citizenship
‘Tuki’ Community Café – runs once a month between 11am-2pm, hosted by a local church, serving light lunches and cakes. Monies raised go to other charities. More than £2,500 has been raised since September 2016	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Brings people of all generations together: many customers are pensioners, and the volunteers who run the café are either adults aged c. 30-50 or children aged 8-18 who wait on the customers. • Encourages respect for people across generations.

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • This ‘community melting pot’ offers insight and appreciation of different skill sets in different age groups • Broadens general knowledge • Offers all the opportunity to contribute positively to the lives of those living a working in the same community • Offers an environment of mutual tolerance and harmony
MESSI – Mobile Email Smart Phone Social Media Information service (runs at the same time as the Community Café every month). Our youth volunteers give up their time to help older people learn how to use devices such as mobile phones	Our younger volunteers share their digital skills with older members of the community – helping to upskill across the generations and reduce social isolation by teaching older people how to use mobile phones, computers and social media
Knitting group (runs at the same time as the Community Café every month). People with knitting skills (generally older people) are on hand to teach younger people how to knit. The group knits squares to be made up into blankets by ‘Knit-a-Square’, a charity which sends blankets to orphaned children in South Africa	Offers the older generations the opportunity to share skills with younger people and keep skills alive
Community Coffee Mornings: In November 2016 OCG teamed up with Dementia Forward to host a ‘memories’ event. This was held at a local community centre venue – where participants could come together to share ‘memories’. The local Pre-school children who use rooms behind the Community Centre were invited to attend.	As has been demonstrated in the recent Channel 4 programme ‘Old people’s home for 4 year olds’, getting old and young people together has a huge positive impact on health, well-being and even life expectancy! Everyone very much enjoyed the event.

Oatlands Community Group – written evidence (CCE0116)

‘Wonderful Windows’: we encouraged local residents and businesses to put up displays in their windows and light them up for two evenings in March 2016 and also 2017, creating a (free) trail of interesting and imaginative displays for people to follow	This free event had more than 80 participants in the first year and resulted in people of all generations getting outside on a dark winter evening, chatting and enjoying the displays together
‘Oaticulture’ plant and seed swap, and seed bank: held twice a year and hosted by a local church	This event encourages people to try growing plants and seeds they may not otherwise grow, raising awareness of gardening and reducing waste by ensuring that unwanted plants and seeds are used by others in the community

Feedback from members of our community about our events has been overwhelmingly positive. We detail in the table below some of the feedback we have received.

Event	Comment received
Tuki Café (August 2017) – money raised on behalf of charity Open Arms Malawi	On behalf of everyone at Open Arms Malawi I would like to thank the Oatlands Community Group for putting on a fantastic event, which raised over £350 to help some of the most vulnerable children in Malawi. The event was very well run, with tonnes of support and adults and children all rolling their sleeves up, working hard, having fun and getting involved. Each and every volunteer made sure that we got the most out of the day. We met a host of local community groups and regular visitors to St Mark’s too, who were all interested and supportive of our work. It was a pleasure to get to know you all and see the enthusiasm of everyone who came together to support us. You should all be very proud of what the group have achieved and we look forward to working with you all again soon. Claire Collins, Open Arms Malawi

Tuki Café (July 2017) – money raised on behalf of charity Caring for Life	On behalf of Caring For Life, and the Harrogate Support Group in particular, I would like to thank you very much indeed, especially Victoria and the brilliant team, for the wonderful Tuki Cafe yesterday. This was a first experience for me personally, and won't be the last! As a community-enriching event it was great: a lovely happy atmosphere around the room and I believe a good time was had by all. We were really impressed by the organisation and efficient friendliness of the event. We would like to particularly praise the young helpers who went about their potentially difficult tasks with great professionalism. As for our own charity, the funds raised were far more than we had expected, and we really valued the opportunity to present the work of CFL to the local community in this way. We very much hope we might be able to repeat the cafe next year. Thank you all so much! David Young Caring for Life
Tuki Café – feedback from customers	“Just keep up the good work” “Very good service” “Really enjoyed the live singing today- made it extra special” “Great – will recommend to my friends” “Lovely warm and friendly atmosphere & music. Lovely food and Drinks. Wonderful” “The young volunteers serving us at this community café truly sparkle” “I love the knitting table - there are lots of people to help me”
Wonderful Windows 2016	“This was a fab event and it was so nice to see so many groups of people (and people in cars) going around the area. So many people had spent time and

	effort in creating such a wide range of window displays... As a community we should feel proud that we came together to pull this event off, and the organisers who did all the hard work getting it off the ground deserve a huge pat on the back for your vision and efforts. Thank you.” “Lots of people getting involved. Getting out and about with the children. A sense of common purpose meeting people in the street who were also wandering.” “Whole experience from making our display with the children at Pre-school to enjoying the other displays with my son. It felt magical and such a different experience to anything I’ve seen before.” “Loved the creativity and range of people who participated.” “Lovely simple open ended idea, could be enjoyed by young and old alike.” “The creativity of the participants and hearing how excited the kids were wandering around. It was good fun making the window display. It’s new and different for Harrogate - or even Yorkshire. Once it's had a few years of running it may become very popular.” “Really nice to see something happening in the community, reminded me of my childhood where you knew all your neighbours and doing a street party for something like the royal wedding was normal and everyone took part”
--	--

7 September 2017

Outside the Box – written evidence (CCE0189)

1. This response comes from the Rural Wisdom project, which is developing ways for rural communities to support and work well for older people. It brings together work in local communities in Scotland and Wales as well as links with people in other parts of the UK. These notes draw on what we are hearing from older people, especially those who live in rural communities.

2. The overall message is that older people care about citizenship and about civic engagement, and want to be part of promoting them. This includes a lot of practical supports that they give to people of all ages, and they would like to be more involved.

Question 1

3. For many people, being a citizen and engaging in their community means identifying with a local community or geographic place as much as identifying with a country. There are people who have lived in their area for many years and want this to be a good place for the people coming after them – but they feel this longer-term view is generally not respected or understood, including by politicians and staff of public bodies who are often taking a short-term view.

Question 2

4. There needs to be many, frequent ways for people to strengthen their sense of belonging to the UK and to their own local area. People want more activities and events that bring together people across ages, recent arrivals and people who have lived here a long time, people who use different languages and have different cultures. Their experience is that people have a sense of belonging to a place when they work together to create something and are all welcome to be part of it. Community connectedness then gets reinforced when people see and talk to each other day-to-day. The most effective shared events are usually those organised by community groups for a practical purpose with community links as the welcome side-effect.

5. People are telling us of the many ways these opportunities are being undermined. There are closures of community facilities such as town or village halls, libraries and shared open spaces, and losing local shops, where people used to meet and have the conversations that create social connectedness.

Question 4

6. Older people care a lot about politician and electoral engagement, partly because they remember the advances in society and people's circumstances that have been achieved. But there is a risk that older people are overlooked in discussions about electoral and political engagement.

- There are real problems in older people who have dementia and other health problems not being able to vote because care providers and others do not understand the rules on incapacity and voting, and/or are not willing to give people the practical support they need to vote.
- Campaigns that focus on younger people can give out a message that older people's views do not matter so much.
- Older people could help encourage people who have less confidence around electoral and political participation, but they are rarely given opportunities to do this.

Question 7

7. The main way to support civic engagement is for public bodies to show that they really do want to hear what people have to say. This means getting right the consultations and other engagement with people who live in that area or are interested in that topic.

- Ask people what is important to them, rather than only have a pre-determined plan or set of priorities.
- Allow long enough to have a real dialogue and bring the conversation to where people already are.
- Act on what people contribute and report back on what has been achieved before starting on the next consultation.
- Remember that civic engagement has to be made to work for everyone - thinking about the language that is used, communication routes and all the good practice on equality and diversity.

8. Civic engagement relies on opportunities for people to talk over issues and ideas with other people to help them work out what they want to say. It is also important for people to hear a range of views and experiences. This is another way in which losing community groups and opportunities to meet a wider range of people within communities damages our society.

Question 9

9. The main factors that we are hearing from older people who live in rural areas are people not being visible and people not being respected – and we expect this applies to many other people who feel 'left behind'.

10. In practice, most decisions are made by people who talk mostly to other people who are like themselves and who communicate in the ways that they use. Older people and people living in rural areas often feel they are not visible to decision-makers or to the people who are influencing decisions. Aspects of this include:

- Not knowing about opportunities to participate, because the flow of information does not reach many older people when it is circulated through routes they are not part of.
- Not being able to get to the places where discussions happen, or events not getting out to rural areas and lack of transport and high costs for people getting in to towns.
- Poor internet access in many rural areas - when information for consultations and responses can only happen on-line people are denied a voice.
- The pace and style of much civic engagement effectively excludes a lot of people.
- When people feel that no-one is going to listen to what they have to say, they stop making the effort to contribute. The main factor people mention here is whether they have been given any evidence of previous consultations or other engagement leading to positive changes.

11. Another problem is when voluntary organisations are said to be ‘representing’ people who live in that area or share circumstances. For example, it is now common for Third Sector Interfaces – the old Councils of Voluntary Service – to have a place on public bodies in Scotland that is counted as the voice of all people using public services and their families, as well as the voice of all voluntary organisations and community groups. Some of the people taking on these roles try to check out with people in the area, but there is not the time or resources to do it properly. Inevitably, a small number of groups have more influence than others, reinforcing the sense of other people being ‘left behind’.

12. Practical steps that can help overcome the barriers include all the good practice around supporting real equality and diversity. But what will underpin it is a change of approach: having more time for open conversations from the outset, going to where people are, and showing people that their contribution is welcomed and respected.

Question 10

13. The experience of many older people is that social integration, citizenship and civic engagement are closely interlinked, and that good social connections and inclusion is at the heart of making things work better for everyone.

14. Many older people feel they are not included when people talk of social cohesion. They are concerned about the ways older people are presented as dependent and having little to contribute.

15. These are a few of the examples we know of older people taking action that enhances social connections in their community:

- Organising most of the community activities in rural areas, including groups for children and young people and events that bring the community together
- Looking after buildings that are shared by the community

Outside the Box – written evidence (CCE0189)

- Encouraging and supporting people who are new to the area until they find their own friendships and get settled in
- People living in a care home meeting people using an ESOL class, to let them practice ordinary conversations
- Inviting young people, including those who find school a challenge, to do activities like gardening and mending things that benefit other people as well as build skills and confidence, and encouraging them around employment options.

Next steps

16. The people we have met look forward to the next stage of the Select Committee process and want to be part of the conversations that follow.

Contact for this response

The response was brought together by Anne Connor of Outside the Box, which hosts the Rural Wisdom project.

There is more information about Rural Wisdom at www.ruralwisdom.org.

Outside the Box supports a range of community projects and enables people who feel excluded to have a voice and make changes in their communities. There is more information about what we do at www.otbds.org

8 September 2017

Professor David Owen – written evidence (CCE0021)

1. Citizenship has a dual face: as a legal status as an equal consociate in a self-ruling polity and as a form of activity with others directed to the common good.

Addressing the first face, four trends are significant: (a) the collapse of the norm of single nationality (whereas in 1960 70% of states disallowed dual nationality, now 70% permit it), (b) the rapid spread of expatriate voting rights (nearly all the world's democracies now have provisions for expatriate voting), (c) the gradual development of non-citizen voting rights, especially at local levels (but also at national levels – see New Zealand for most developed case), and (d) the emergence, at varying levels, of regional (supranational) citizenship or entitlements to civic statuses such as (in its most developed form) EU citizenship.

These trends point to what we might call the 'transnationalization' of the state which combines a recognition that the (civic) nation is not limited to the territory of the state and that the old citizen/alien distinction no longer adequately captures the range of civic statuses within the territory of the state and across states. In an increasingly globalised world, sustaining strong links with expatriate citizens (mobilising the economic and political support of diasporas) and engaging in inclusive integration of immigrant denizens is a sensible strategy for sustaining the 'effective sovereignty' of the state.

Addressing the second face, it is important to note that citizenship operates across local, regional subnational, national, supranational (EU) and transnational contexts. Civic engagement is not just a matter of local volunteering but also of acting in the different contexts in which one has civic standing (think for example of the importance of remittances from (and even to) the UK, or of the civil society organisations formed by expatriate citizens to act across borders). One of the great challenges today is that of enabling the reach and connectivity of civic activity across different contexts and not fixating on measuring engagement in one as if it was a way of measuring civic engagement as such. Two examples:

- a) Many migrants do engage in civic action such as volunteer work in their local communities – whether this is UK citizens in France or non-UK EU (or non-EU) citizens in the UK – but many are also engaged through contemporary finance and communications technologies in transnational civic action in their 'home' states. Both home state and state of residence can support these activities or put obstacles in their way or, even, design mechanisms to link local and transnational action. What tends to happen is that states focus on civic action in their territory and overlook the wide forms of civic action that are going on.
- b) If we consider the UK, a problem of citizenship in England is that it has a highly centralised state and a relatively weak local government structure (except perhaps in London and now Manchester, etc, with empowered mayors) so that there is no strong sense that local civic action or political involvement is effectively connected to the national level. The centralisation of political party structures has also supported the widespread sense of disempowerment at local levels, and devolution of party structures may also be an important part of re-engaging people in civic life. There is an important potential role for regional citizenship to mediate and connect local and national levels but this is likely to require stronger forms of regional governance than currently exist.

In brief, citizenship in the 21st century is complex and messy – it runs across different contexts of governance and at different levels of governance – and characterised across OECD states, in ways that have supported the rise of populism, by a sense of disempowerment that, I think, needs politicians to worry less about values and rather more about empowerment. Unhealthy values will flourish in contexts where people feel disempowered, that their agency is ineffective.

What citizenship have to do with identity? Here we need to distinguish two issues. The first is that citizenship entails an identity – being British is a civic identity. The second is that the experience of citizenship, of one's civic identity, is mediated through one's other (social/cultural/economic/religious) identities. A key issue here is the relationship between one's civic identity and one's other identities, that is, whether one experiences one's civic identity as being at odds with one's cultural or religious identity or, indeed, as denigrating or demonizing that identity. One of the problems with talk of "British values" is that either these are so abstract as to be indistinguishable from the values of any liberal democratic states or they are given substance through a particular limited cultural thick interpretation of them that is parochial and acts as a mechanism for marginalizing other ways in which these abstract values can be manifest. What actually matters is that citizens have an effective sense of civic identity in the sense of identifying with the main social and political institutions of society, of valuing these institutions as a whole (which can be valued on the basis of a variety of different values!), and that requires that they experience themselves as included within them (this point applies to migrants, those in post-industrial wastelands, the elderly, etc.) – this is the sense of belonging that matters in a liberal democratic state. Pride in being or becoming British should be encouraged when it is reflective pride in these institutions, a pride which is exhibited not least by criticism of elements of them when they are failing to sustain an inclusive sense of belonging. (Nb. the patriotism of criticism and dissent is the reflective form of patriotism.) And rituals such as citizenship ceremonies can, done properly, be important – but only if the commitments made by the state in the ritual are not contradicted by the experiences of everyday life.

How can this be supported? Honest critical history in schools is important – acknowledging the mistakes and cruelties of the British state and trying to show where it has learned and improved on the basis of these errors, drawing attention to the role of the social and political struggles of excluded groups in changing the make-up of the state (the struggle for democracy, the struggle against empire) in a way that links civic activity to the increased legitimacy of the British state. Being able to participate in the vernacular of civic life is also important – and ideally free (or, if not, very subsidized) English language lessons for immigrants as a basic civic responsibility should be supported (even if making citizenship conditional on a language test is less justifiable). But there are also wider issues about social mixing that need to be addressed through longer range work on urban planning, schooling and making sure that we avoid spatial and job segregation in our society.

3. I see civic engagement as a duty – but would stress that civic engagement can take many forms. The partner who looks after the kids while the other partner attends a political meeting or does voluntary work or engages in a community meeting is enabling ‘civic work’ – one might push this point further and note that vast amounts of (typically gendered) care work is done as unpaid labour and can be seen as ‘civic work’. So in this general respect, monitoring or enforcing civic engagement does not seem a plausible option. But there are some general forms of civic engagement that could be specific duties and could be relatively easily monitored and enforced. These are:

- a) Compulsory voting.
- b) National Civic Service.
- c) The Duty to Work.

I’ll take each in turn.

- a) The only good argument for compulsory voting is that it addresses the problem of a systematic lack of voting by the most disadvantaged members of society. Since we know that if people do not vote in the first 2-3 national elections that they are eligible for, they are likely never to vote, one way of addressing this point is to make voting compulsory for the first 2-3 elections that you can vote in. Personally I have no problem with unrestricted compulsory voting on condition that the ballot also includes ‘None of the Above’ so that political parties (a) cannot claim a spurious legitimacy from the exclusion of this option and (b) because it would incentivize political parties to make their manifestos have general appeal and not simply appeal to those currently likely to vote.
- b) National Civic Service, e.g., as something done between 18-25 as chosen by individual, if it is properly designed with a wide range of options may be worth serious consideration not only for its civic character but also for its potential role in social mixing, that is in exposing people to others of different classes, ethnicities, sexualities, etc. Given the degree to which social fragmentation into niche groups (reinforced by social media) is prevalent in contemporary society and supports the formation of social stereotypes, the ‘enforced’ mixing of national civic service might be one counterforce to the fact that traditional sites of social mixing (church, pub, party) have suffered significant decline.

- c) The Duty to Work – this is more tentative and depends importantly on the state being willing to take up the role of ‘employer of last resort’ but done sensitively it would acknowledge both that one important civic duty is to contribute through work and that work is an important social source of self-respect.

4. It seems to me to make sense to have a lower voting age for local elections than national elections both as a training ground and because votes at local elections are more likely to show the direct effect of voting and hence support participatory disposition.

I would also universalize the franchise in local voting for all (non-transient – c.6 months) residents as many states have already done – municipal governance largely concerns services to residents and all residents should be entitled to a say on how their schools, roads, hospitals, etc. are governed. This would also thereby provide an initial civic basis for the political integration of immigrants.

It is a problem with the FPTP system that vast numbers of people either experience their vote as wasted or feel constrained to vote for the ‘least bad’ option from their political standpoint. Adopting a proportional system (not AV) would provide a way of addressing this that is urgently needed as a matter of engaging people both by allowing new political parties, including regional political parties, to emerge and by pushing existing political parties to be less lazy and less focused on marginal constituencies. FPTP may have made sense in an age where parties mapped straightforwardly on core social cleavages but it now distorts our political system in a way that threatens the basis of representative democracy (cf. Peter Mair, Ruling the Void) and is likely only to encourage political extremism.

14 August 2017

Dr Alison Davies, Peterborough Racial Equality Council – written evidence (CCE0056)

This submission draws from a forthcoming report on a study conducted by Peterborough Racial Equality Council in partnership with the Open University. The study explores the views of young people from minority ethnic backgrounds on what, in their experience, are the main barriers to community cohesion in their small city, and how they would build a better understanding between communities.

The principal sources of data are a survey of 450 young people aged between 14 and 19 from black and minority ethnic backgrounds, using open ended questions and free responses, followed by discussions with individuals and small groups. Individual responses are denoted by the survey number (111).

The responses reported here relate to:

- The values that all of us who live in Britain should share
- The relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion

British values

The survey asked; 'If you were asked to decide upon some 'British values' what would they be?'

The young people were largely uncomprehending of the concept of 'British Values'. However, they understood Islamic values, Christian values, and humanitarian values very well and demonstrated these eloquently in response to questions about 'how to improve community relations'. However, they struggled to identify any that could be labelled as specifically 'British'.

'There are no such things. Values such as politeness, non-violence, non-discrimination etc. are values that should be universal. One cannot simply deem a particular group of values to be British. As a British citizen myself, I find the idea of British values to be absurd' (311)

Others (13%) highlighted the changing nature of British society, reflected in changing values.

'I don't know [what British values should be] as British culture is constantly changing, so will the British values. We need global values!' (277)

Some suggested statements of values with irony:

'Pick on someone different to you' (109)

'We need to get rid of all these immigrants, they're taking our jobs' (127)

The most frequently expressed responses (20%) offered popular icons such as 'fish and chips', 'drinking tea' or 'the Queen'. Respect for people and helping them irrespective of background were stated as aspirational values by 15%, but 'tolerance' was not sufficient.

'Tolerance – is that how much you can take of something?' Asked A.

In the vision for society held by these young people, there are many values beyond tolerance.

Social cohesion and civic engagement

The young people were asked; 'What is the biggest barrier to community relations in the city?' and 'What could be done to improve relations between communities and faith groups in the city?'

25% of respondents perceived the greatest barrier to be the segregation or lack of communication between different groups within the city. A further 18% specifically cited language barriers, indicating that funding for English / ESOL classes and EAL specialists should be a government priority. Correspondingly, the suggestions for improving engagement given by 28% involved the organisation of some kind of activity in which young people from different communities would come together. School and informal social encounters did not seem to fulfil this purpose but organised gatherings, social events, and sports tournaments, did. A further 19% proposed interfaith events and festivals.

The other main barrier to cohesion was deemed (by 21% of respondents) to be ignorance, or lack of understanding about each other's cultures, leading to stereotyping and judgemental attitudes. A further 15% specifically cited overt racism. This barrier, all agreed, should be addressed by better teaching about different cultures and faiths in schools and community settings. It should be noted that this cohort of young people had already received the standard input of 'citizenship education' through Personal Development Education or PSHE, but they believed that a much deeper and better informed understanding of different beliefs was required to change attitudes.

'We can definitely teach more about all religions and cultures – to get an understanding of everyone's faith and culture. I think it would bring us closer as a community' (413)

The summary above is taken from a much longer report of the study which will be published by the Open University later in the year.

4 September 2017

Political Literacy Oversight Group of the All Party Parliamentary Group for Democratic Participation – written evidence (CCE0058)

1. About the Political Literacy Oversight Group:

The Political Literacy Oversight Group exists to promote higher levels of political literacy amongst the general population, and among young people in particular. As a non-partisan critical friend to Government departments or parliamentary select committees, the Group is able to provide the breadth and depth of expertise to sustain and advance best practice in the fields of citizenship education and political literacy. The Group plays a facilitative role for organisations and individuals already working in this space, and as such draws upon a far-reaching network of experts. In particular the Political Literacy Oversight Group seeks to work with stakeholders and policy-makers at local, regional and national levels by focusing on the development of evidence-based policy and practice. The following submission of written evidence provides concise commentaries from a selection of group members in response to questions laid out by the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement in their call for evidence. Further information about this group, and the work of its constituent members, can be found in our recently published Capacity Report.

2. Executive Summary:

Never before have the British people been asked so frequently to take decisions, with monumental consequences, about the way we should be governed and the very constitution of our political system. That phenomenon known as the referendum, once anathema in British politics, has become an increasingly frequent instrument of democratic governance in the UK. Yet these choices are taking place against a backdrop of declining civic engagement, diagnosed in anti-political research by declining levels of partisanship, diminished voter turnout, popular detachment from politics as characterised by poor performing governments and failures of accountability, and plummeting trust in political elites. In particular the latest research shows that our young people are becoming more conservative, more individualized and less likely to engage in any form of political activity (see Grasso, 2016).⁶⁷⁶ It is in this context that the Political literacy Oversight Group welcomes this timely investigation of citizenship and civic engagement.

This written submission makes a number of recommendations for the committee's consideration in the construction of their final report. These may be simplified to three key statements:

⁶⁷⁶ For the sake of maximising space in this submission, any references are provided as in-text citations and may be provided in full upon request.

Political Literacy Oversight Group of the All Party Parliamentary Group for Democratic Participation – written evidence (CCE0058)

- Citizenship education in schools should be prioritised as a policy commitment and resourced effectively, including formal programmes of assessment, Ofsted inspections of school delivery, and expanded teaching training initiatives.

- Parliamentary reforms and online education initiatives aimed at improving legislative transparency in recent years should be extended to the job specification of local and national politicians, so that the governed have regular opportunities to interact with governors.

- Extra-curricular institutions, particularly universities and the National Citizens Service, should have a responsibility to promote citizenship and political literacy in post-Brexit Britain.

Previous academic and policy work on civic engagement has tended to focus on new methods of democratic design. These have included deliberative mechanisms such as participatory budgeting and e-petitioning, voluntary employment and welfare reform, as well as considerations of lowering the voting age. These are, in essence, supply side reforms aimed at facilitating public interest and engagement in a political system that gives them agency. However, these publications and policies have largely overlooked the power of demand side reforms in general, and the role of education in cultivating political interest, efficacy and participation in particular. As the cornerstone of a civic journey for life, the Political Literacy Oversight Group believes that education should occupy a central focus of the committee's work.

The following seven sections provide evidence from seven separate expert members of the Political Literacy Oversight Group. Each section tackles particular questions from the call for evidence and provides targeted recommendations. For further information on the Political Literacy Oversight Group, please contact James Weinberg (jweinberg1@sheffield.ac.uk).

Section 1

James Weinberg: Research Lead in Youth Politics, The Sir Bernard Crick Centre, University of Sheffield; Chair, Political Literacy Oversight Group.

Qu.5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

Schools provide an invaluable platform through which to equip young people with the skills and knowledge to engage in politics, with both a capital and small 'p', in a meaningful way throughout adulthood. This is not about politicising young people but endowing them with an understanding of the law, the machinations that drive industry and trade, the formal and informal avenues of political campaigns necessary to affect systemic change in society. It is also about equipping young people with the skills of debate, critical thinking, negotiation and community-oriented organisation. In doing so citizenship education in schools can make accessible, to a broader section of our young people, these and other meso- or macro-level institutions, and in turn generate a desire or wherewithal to participate in 'political' decision making across a range of issues when they leave school (Whiteley, 2012).

The benefits of citizenship education are well documented (see section 6 by Suzy Dodd in this submission). Following on from the longitudinal study conducted by the NFER in 2002-2010, recent research (Keating and Janmaat, 2016) has shown that citizenship education in the UK can increase the likelihood of voting by 14.9% and expressive political participation in adulthood by 13.1%. Taking a broader view of citizens' civic journey, there is also robust evidence around the world to suggest that citizenship education - done effectively as part of a skills and knowledge-based curriculum - can a) mitigate socio-economic and cultural inequalities (e.g. Castillo et al., 2015), and b) reduce rates of gang membership and violent crime among vulnerable groups (e.g. Edwards Jr., 2012). These findings should be of special relevance to UK policy makers concerned with tackling growing levels of social and political inequality as well as threats of youth radicalisation.

Recommendation:

- Statutory citizenship education should be available in all secondary schools and given greater profile as a priority subject;
- Statutory citizenship education should be extended to primary schools.

Qu.5 How effective is current teaching?

Arguably the single greatest challenge facing effective CE provision in schools is teacher expertise and training. Citizenship has remained a rare specialisation in secondary schooling; only 284 Newly Qualified Teachers (NQTs) practiced the subject in 2006 (against a target of 540) (Ofsted, 2010) and in 2010 only 220 citizenship ITT places were available. Even if the initial rate of CE teacher training in the 'noughties' was maintained, it would take another two decades for each of the 3360 maintained secondary schools to have one trained citizenship teacher (Jerome and Hayward, 2009). The result is that non-specialists, with no formal training and a plethora of competing obligations, must deliver citizenship education.

A recent study of more 110 teachers from more than 60 UK secondary schools (Weinberg, under review) found that a) teachers do not have a shared understanding of citizenship and the purpose of citizenship education; b) there is a distinct gap between academic work on good pedagogy for citizenship education and classroom practice due to an absence of initial teacher training (ITT) and/or continued professional development (CPD) opportunities; c) citizenship education continues to be sorely neglected and/or ignored in state secondary schools and national education policy; d) where citizenship is taught, it is delivered with individualistic and inward looking political conceptions of 'good' rather than 'active' citizenship. However, participants in Weinberg's study outlined an immense appetite for citizenship training among teachers of all disciplines. The study also showed that where staff had trained in a cognate specialism, they were better prepared to discuss citizenship education in active and participatory terms with an understanding of effective pedagogy in the subject.

Recommendation:

- Introduce training in the pedagogy of citizenship education and political literacy as a statutory feature of all Initial Teacher Training courses.

Qu.5 Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Teachers in Weinberg's study talked in highly individualistic terms about the values of their pupils and their attitudes to citizenship education; by contrast school-based citizenship education should seek to develop a participatory culture informed by sound political literacy in order to engender measurable social impact. The curriculum as it is currently conceived, although light-touch in its approach, is not so much a problem as the lack of teacher training and the deficit of explicit support for the subject nationally among policy-makers and locally among test-oriented school leaderships. Since 2010 the importance of citizenship education has been superseded by a narrative of character education. Made manifest in symbolic policy programmes such as Social Moral Spiritual and Cultural learning (SMSC), Fundamental British Values, and Prevent, character education develops young people in soft social, emotional and non-cognitive skills that, whilst important for cultivating personally responsible dispositions, do not enhance the political literacy and participatory mindset of young people. National policy discourse must redress the imbalance between character development and citizenship education by clarifying the distinction between 'learning through volunteering with social capital as a learning outcome' (i.e. character education) and 'learning through community involvement with democratic citizenship, which includes an understanding of the political basis of community, as a learning outcome' (i.e. citizenship education) (Annette, 2003, p.140).

Recommendation:

- Issue schools with a mandate to give equal priority to citizenship education and character development. Provide expert guidance on the distinction between the two terms and how to achieve this outcome in school based curricula.

Section 2

Sarah Mills: Senior Lecturer in Human Geography, Loughborough University

Qu.6 Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Since its launch in 2011, National Citizen Service (NCS) has expanded to reach over 300,000 young people in England and Northern Ireland. This short-term voluntary programme for 15-17 year olds involves two residential experiences and a social action project. NCS is funded by the UK Government – a “Big Idea for the Big Society” (Mycock & Tonge, 2011). The programme is currently managed by NCS Trust / Department for Culture, Media & Sport, and delivered regionally via social enterprises, charities and private sector partnerships. 360,000 young people are expected to be completing the NCS programme annually by 2020-21.

Although citizenship is enshrined in NCS’ name, research has found that NCS graduates often equate citizenship solely with volunteering (responsibilities rather than rights) and that the scheme emphasises participation at the local scale as part of a national collective, rather than further connections with European or global citizenship formations (Mills & Waite 2017). Despite the benefits of the programme for young people identified in evaluations and research, citizenship remains ambiguous in the NCS framework and synonymous with ‘social action’. There is scope for NCS to foster more meaningful engagement with politics.

Recommendations:

- Introduce a greater political element into NCS via citizenship education and political literacy
- Revisit the aims of NCS and its ‘scales’ of youth citizenship in post-Brexit Britain

Research has also found that the NCS experience is shaped by regional geographies of service provision (See Mills & Waite evidence to this Select Committee). This determines the extent to which NCS participants on-the-ground have an opportunity to engage with citizenship and political education (especially in Phase Two of the curriculum). Furthermore, the extent to which NCS social action projects are ‘youth-led’ varies by region (Mills & Waite 2017).

Recommendations:

- Ensure consistency in the NCS curriculum across Regional Delivery Providers
- Prioritise ‘youth-led’ social action within the NCS offer

Political Literacy Oversight Group of the All Party Parliamentary Group for Democratic Participation – written evidence (CCE0058)

The existing format of NCS is short-term (3-4 weeks), however it does require a full-time commitment from young people during that summer, with current barriers including employment, education and family commitments. Any extension to the length of the programme would therefore further cement these barriers. The existing graduation ceremony rightly celebrates the achievements of NCS graduates and this may be lost with a more ‘public citizenship ceremony’, the dynamics of which could be politically sensitive.

Recommendations:

- Retain the existing length of NCS and graduation ceremony
- Ensure NCS remains voluntary and not compulsory

The Public Accounts Committee [\[link\]](#) has raised concerns over NCS’ value for money in comparison to third sector organisations. NCS has recently announced a three-year partnership with the Scout Association as part of a new innovation programme.

Recommendations:

- Continue to monitor NCS’ value for money and programme evaluations
- Ensure NCS is seen as part of a wider landscape of citizenship and civic engagement opportunities for young people rather than core focus of investment and efforts

Section 3

Matteo Bergamini: Founder & Director of Shout Out UK.

Patrick Ireland: Creative Director of Shout Out UK.

Qu.3 Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

When one talks about civic engagement – and the responsibilities or rights of a citizen – there is a glaring issue in the UK: we do not equip our young people, and thus our citizens of the future, with the tools necessary to engage in our political system. As such, there is a profound gap in our society when it comes to civic engagement.

Political literacy in schools should be a right of all citizens as it is also, simultaneously, their own responsibility to engage with the political system, safeguard our democracy and ultimately maintain the interests of our country. However, engaging in civic society can only be a citizen’s responsibility if they have first been told how to engage. Without offering citizens this right, they are being failed by both the state and civic society in general; and the consequence of such failure is often political apathy, populism and a lack of interest in civic society.

In January 2016 Shout Out UK (SOUK) launched a Political Literacy Course in a Pupil Referral Unit in Croydon. Since then SOUK have extended the course to schools across boroughs in London (Wembley, Harrow, Fulham, Knightsbridge, Croydon), Dartford, Cambridge and Yorkshire. These courses have demonstrated the potential of extra-curricular provision in political education specifically, but also the benefits of citizenship education in general. This is summarised in our pupil evaluations:

- How much has your knowledge of politics improved? (Out of 5: 5 being Excellent and 1 being Poor)
84% said 5 or 4
- How confident do you now feel when it comes to debating and presenting arguments? (Out of 5: 5 being Excellent and 1 being Poor)
80% said 5 or 4
- Do you feel more confident about expressing your opinions now? (Out of 5: 5 being Excellent and 1 being Poor)
82% said 5 or 4
- Overall, how beneficial do you think this course has been? (Out of Excellent, Good, Fair, Poor)
93.1% said Excellent or Good.

SOUK believes that there is an urgent need for greater attention to Political Literacy in schools. Our education system needs to cover the basics of legislation, Human Rights, and the role of local councils / MPs / Lords. Although technically included on the secondary national curriculum, these topics are not being taught effectively (if at all) to our young people.

Recommendations:

The Citizenship and PSHE curricula should be reassessed to stress the importance of Political Literacy and individual civic engagement. In particular school curricula should contain:

I. Oracy as a pedagogical focus – with debating and public speaking being a heavy part of it. This keeps kids engaged, builds their emotional resilience, confidence and employability skills as well as maintaining their interest in politics and the wider world via interesting, engaging discussion.

II. Media literacy. This should be a key focus as it addresses a growing problem; distrust in the media and the ever-growing issue of more 'likes = more credibility'.

III. An extra-curricular focus. Government departments should cooperate with external organisations already working in this space.

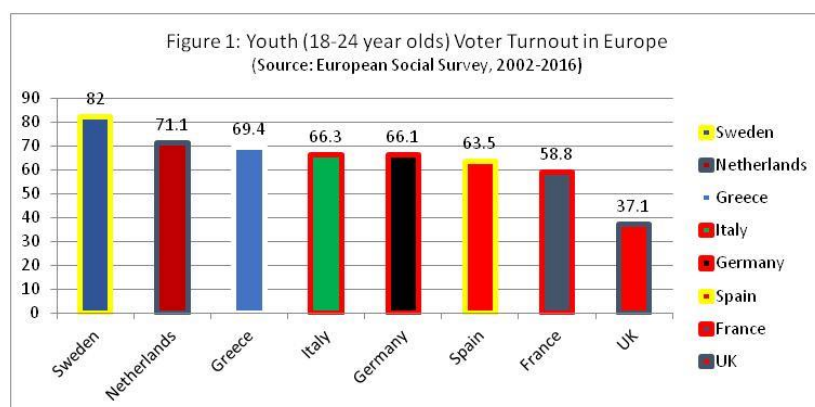

Section 4

James Sloam: Reader in Politics, Royal Holloway University; Convenor of the UK Political Studies Association Specialist Group on Young People’s Politics.

Qu.1 What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century?

The evidence presented here focuses on trends in the civic and political engagement amongst younger citizens. Young people are the ones who react most to the changing social, economic and political environment, and so offer us a glimpse of the future of our democracy.

Young people have become increasingly disenchanted with electoral politics. This is particularly the case in the UK, where younger citizens are much less likely to vote in general elections than older generations, previous generations of young people, and their peers elsewhere in Europe (Figure 1) (Sloam 2016).

Young people in the UK are interested in politics – as interested as their peers elsewhere in Europe – but are put off by the political system. They have developed new conceptions of ‘citizenship’ and ‘politics’ (Marsh et. al 2007), and have turned to alternative, issue-based modes of civic and political engagement (Norris 2003): from voting, to ethical shopping, to online petitions, to demonstrations, to poetry slams. These non-electoral forms of participation have been facilitated by new technologies, which have reduced the costs and increased the speed of political communication (Bimber et al. 2005). The challenge for politicians and government officials is to adapt to these changes in young people’s politics.

Qu.9 Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban?

In the UK, the first-past-the-post electoral system is problematic with regard to youth participation. Young people in the UK have less viable parties to vote for, and many constituencies can be seen as ‘dead rubbers’ where only one party and candidate have a realistic chance of winning. In other countries, with proportional systems of representation, turnout rates tend to be much higher, and resources for party campaigning are spread more evenly across the country.

Another factor that inhibits higher turnout amongst young people is the prioritization of older generations in public policy in recent years e.g. the triple lock on pensions versus the trebling of university tuition fees. If young people already feel detached from mainstream electoral politics, this is likely to make them even less likely to vote. If this happens, politicians are even more likely to ignore them. And, the vicious circle continues.

In Germany, by contrast, public policy succeeded in shielding young people from the worst effects of the financial crisis e.g. youth unemployment actually fell during this period. In the UK, there is also the additional issue of voter registration. With the introduction of Individual Voter Registration in 2014, over a million citizens \(disproportionately young people\) fell off the electoral roll.

These systemic problems with British democracy represent a significant hurdle for youth participation in representative politics – especially to those from poorer backgrounds. The following section sets out some ‘easy win’ solutions for strengthen youth engagement.

Qu.9 How might these barriers be overcome?

a) Political Contact

In the existing body of the research one of the most interesting comparative findings is that young people in the UK have the lowest level of contact with politicians and government officials out of all the old EU countries (Sloam 2013). This is problematic in that the existing literature also highlights the effectiveness of such direct engagement between citizens and political activists, politicians and government officials.

Recommendations:

- Each UK member of parliament should commit to holding at least one interactive session (discussions over concrete issues) in each school (primary and secondary) in their constituency over the course a 5-year parliament.
- Each local councillor should commit to holding at least one interactive session (discussions over concrete issues) in each school in their ward over each term in office.

b) Political Literacy

Another problem that hinders youth participation in democracy is lack of civic and political knowledge. It is well known that citizens who know more about democracy and how it works are more likely to become engage (Galston 2001). Yet levels of knowledge about politics and democracy in the UK are relatively know.

Recommendations:

- Strengthen citizenship education in schools by increasing the time that schools devote to the subject in general, and the teaching of political literacy in particular;
- Strengthen the role of Ofsted in inspecting citizenship education;
- Mandate universities and Higher Education colleges, as part of their widening participation and community engagement commitments, to hold democracy days in local schools (and provide support to citizenship teachers).

Section 5

Burphy Zumu: Head of Advocacy, Bite The Ballot.

Q4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

In sum, existing electoral law does not encourage active political engagement. This is evident by looking at the two key indicators of formal political engagement; (1) turnout at general elections and (2) political party membership numbers.

UK politics has seen diminishing party membership since the 1950s, barring Labour's recent surge, and turnout to general elections since 2001 have not been over 70% (Houses of Parliament, 2015; Dempsey, 2017). Numerous academic studies and public opinion surveys on the voting behaviour of the British people demonstrate evidence that political literacy (via effective political education) is required to encourage formal political engagement particularly in regards to voting rather than electoral legislation (Houses of Parliament, 2015).

Recommendation:

- A nation-wide consultation of how the Government can ensure all young citizens receive high-quality political education in the United Kingdom.

Qu.4 What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age?

Many young citizens go through their compulsory educational journey and reach the age of franchise without an understanding of our political system and it is underfunded civil society groups, like Bite The Ballot (BtB), who are left trying to equalise this scenario. For this reason, we are not necessarily championing a change in the franchise for either national or local elections. However, BtB do accept that there are credible arguments to support lowering the age of enfranchisement to 16, such as taxation without representation. Nevertheless, supply-side reforms to the franchise are not sufficient in and of themselves to stimulate political participation. This has been evident globally in those countries who have introduced lower voting ages over the last 50 years without commensurate rises in electoral turnout. Regardless of changes to the franchise, BtB feel that young citizens will neither feel more motivated to vote nor be more able to effectively hold their leaders to account without sufficient political education.

Political Literacy Oversight Group of the All Party Parliamentary Group for Democratic Participation – written evidence (CCE0058)

Recommendation:

- A nation-wide consultation of how the Government can ensure all young citizens receive high-quality political education in the United Kingdom.

Qu.4 Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The Government would argue the introduction of Individual Electoral Registration (IER) is a demonstration of electoral law encouraging active participation by granting citizens greater political responsibility. However, this seems at odds with the threat of financial punishment in the case of non-registration (Gov.uk, 2017). The main repercussions of this regressive policy have the rendering of an electoral register that is incomplete and inaccurate, with even greater disparities between over- and under-registered groups of citizens. This is exacerbated by the under-resourcing of electoral administrators, who are limited by lack of access to suitable technologies.

Recommendations:

- A review into the need for a single national electronic register to replace the 381 electoral registers that currently exist in the United Kingdom.
- The introduction of a national 'registration status' website so that citizens can check their own registration easily.

Section 6

Suzy Dodd: Secondary School Teacher; Research Assistant in Youth Politics, The Sir Bernard Crick Centre, University of Sheffield.

Q.5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education has a central role in teaching and encouraging good citizenship. Over the last twenty years, most countries have introduced or reformed citizenship curricula. Although analyses and comparisons of efficacy are still sparse, the global literature suggests that citizenship education (CE) can have an impact in three key areas: knowledge, values and participation. This impact depends on curriculum design and implementation.

Research suggests that formal CE has the strongest and most consistent positive impact upon civic knowledge and political literacy (Niemi and Junn 1998). Some studies have indicated a decline in young people’s civic knowledge in the last twenty years (Schulz et al 2009), despite a concurrent increase in CE. In Australia and New Zealand, however, where citizenship is taught as a discrete subject and formally examined, levels of relevant knowledge were sustained.

Recommendation:

- Expand the provision for teaching and assessing citizenship as a discrete subject at all levels.

Extant global research suggests that discrete citizenship teaching, particularly at the secondary level, can have a more positive impact on values than integrated CE delivered through other subject curricula (Keating et al 2010), supporting the recommendation above. Pupils’ views can become more polarised through mismanaged discussions, however, particularly in countries with a high proportion of minority ethnic groups. Pupils also tend to associate more strongly with national and regional areas after participating in relevant CE programmes. Analysts of Asian CE, which is often integrated into the wider curriculum, argue that it is failing to develop empowered, global citizens due to an overly nationalistic focus (Cha et al 2017).

Recommendations:

- Reconsider CPD and training for teachers delivering CE, with a focus on effectively managing discussions to promote positive values.
- Analyse the current CE curriculum to ensure that the promotion of national identity is not at the expense of active and global citizenship.

Comparative studies (Keating et al 2010; Schulz et al 2009) have suggested that young people are more likely to actively participate in citizenship activities if schools provide and/or promote opportunities to do so, particularly through discrete CE. This impact is often evidenced by the increasing proportions of young people participating in voluntary citizenship service programmes: from NCS in the UK to community service programmes in Bahrain. Furthermore, campaigns targeting young people can boost voter registration and turnout (e.g. Bite the Ballot), although these are rarely delivered through schools.

Recommendation:

- Continue to promote citizenship programmes through schools, and expand this to promote other modes of participation.

Section 7

Harriet Andrews – Director of The Politics Project

Qu.5 How effective is current teaching?

Political Literacy Oversight Group of the All Party Parliamentary Group for Democratic Participation – written evidence (CCE0058)

The Politics Project specialises in youth democratic education, providing youth people with opportunities to learn about the democratic system and use their voice. We deliver educational workshops for young people, training programmes for educators and a variety of dynamic resources and events.

In the last 18 months, we have designed and delivered nine political engagement programmes, working with 515 young people across 20 schools and youth organisations to deliver three events and 132 hours of political workshops. Our work has focused on Brexit, regional devolution and local government.

Through our work with teachers across Greater Manchester we have found the following:

- The majority of citizenship teaching is delivered by non-subject specialists who feel ill-equipped to deliver political literacy;
- There is no uniform approach to meeting statutory duties and little guidance on best practice including on how different requirements can be delivered together;
- Teachers feel that political and social issues are coming up in the classroom, especially in relation to the Manchester attacks, and would like to be better supported to address these issues;
- Many of the benefits of citizenship education e.g. critical thinking and oracy skills, are essential to employability but are not clearly tested in the formal exam process.

Qu.6 What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

A variety of organisations are now providing specific support to schools to enhance both the quantity and quality of citizenship taught outside of accredited courses. Some examples include:

- Smart School Councils have developed training and resources to support schools to run more effective and democratic school councils.
- Votes for Schools provide weekly resource packs to schools to support discussions around current social and political issues.
- The Politics Project has created the Digital Surgeries programme to support students and their elected representatives to have meaningful digital conversations.

Qu.6 Are they good value for money?

Through our experience of delivering Digital Surgeries in schools across Greater Manchester we have been able to increase the number of institutions delivering citizenship activities and provide more opportunities for politicians to have an active role in citizenship education. Programmes such as these are impactful because they increase democratic participation in young people in a way that is responsive to schools' needs and the practical constraints teachers face. These programmes are designed to fit into the school timetable and thought has been given to the practicality of who and how the materials will be delivered, taking away this burden from schools. With this approach, it is possible to tip the balance in favour of school-wide citizenship education across the UK.

Recommendations:

- Provide guidance to schools to highlight the synergy between various Ofsted requirements and statutory duties and how these can be delivered together.
- Increase the importance of skills development in Ofsted evaluations of schools, particularly in relation to Oracy and Critical Thinking.
- Provide schools with information about organisations that can support them to meet their statutory duties effectively.

5 September 2017

The Political Studies Association – written evidence (CCE0231)

Background

1. The Political Studies Association (PSA) welcomes the opportunity to respond to the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement.

2. The PSA was founded in 1950 to ‘promote the study of politics’. The Association is formed of some 1,900 academics, students, researchers, policy makers, journalists and teachers. We are the primary association for the study of political science in the UK and provide resources and events connecting academic research to wider audiences throughout the year. We are also the professional subject association for Politics teachers in UK schools. The Association has pursued our focus on the promotion of the study of politics in a nonpartisan way and to audiences across and beyond the United Kingdom.

Response to Question 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

3. Young people are the future of our democracy and their engagement with politics and society is crucial for its long-term vitality and survival. Teachers and the teaching profession are clearly critical to this, as they play such a central role in the development of young people's understanding of the world outside the classroom.

4. Political education through both the Citizenship curriculum and the A level in Politics is key to enabling students to think critically about their surroundings and empowering them to take their part in our political institutions and democratic life. The PSA supports political and citizenship education from primary age onwards and across a student's entire lifetime at school.

5. The Politics A level has recently been reformed and its first teaching is taking place from September 2017. This qualification requires much broader and more detailed knowledge than the previous iteration of this award. The PSA supports this and thinks that it will be beneficial in providing pupils with the required theoretical background for understanding and engaging with politics.

6. Specifically, elements of the Politics A level focus on the conceptual underpinnings of political participation. Students are required to learn about many of the facets that inform active participation in our democracy, including: different typologies of democracy and electoral systems; the British Constitution; the British political party system; the role and function of Parliament; and human rights in their contemporary and historical context.

7. The reformed Politics A level also requires entrants to learn about key political ideologies, including Conservatism, Liberalism, and Socialism. This provides further insight into how important thinkers conceive of the political world and often the place of individuals within politics. Options such as feminist and anarchist ideology provide critical reflection on these dominant discourses. This enables students to better understand the breadth of ideas across political parties and a background for decision making about their own political preferences.

8. The A level also offers a comparative element to examine political participation in the USA and an examination of Global Politics more generally. This enables A level students to think more deeply about the British political system and its strengths and weaknesses and therefore enables them as better-informed citizens to engage with the UK political system.

9. The number of students undertaking the Politics A level has been growing over recent years. The latest figures show a 12.8% increase from 15,540 entries in 2016 to 17,523. The PSA welcomes this increase as well as any measure to increase political knowledge amongst UK school children.

Phil Sooben

The Political Studies Association – written evidence (CCE0231)

CEO, Political Studies Association

Alex Prior – written evidence (CCE0251)

This evidence deals primarily with how engagement is understood within the current political landscape, as well as exploring citizens' political attitudes. In addressing this question, the author defines engagement as a consistent and meaningful dialogue between an institution and individual(s). The institution in question is the UK Parliament, a key mediator of citizen engagement. Recommendations for future improvements are centred around an informed citizenry and more effective use of existing resources. A list of referenced texts is provided at the end of this document.

Executive summary

1. It is important to be realistic about citizens' political attitudes and aspirations
2. It is inaccurate to equate voter turnout with democratic engagement, with no consideration of why citizens vote (or why they do not vote)
3. Engagement is a two-way form of communication, which necessitates establishing what constitutes 'success'
4. Low levels of citizen trust in political institutions – and a lack of satisfaction as to how they run – is not a new phenomenon
5. The gap between approval of Parliament in theory and approval of Parliament in practice risks creating a landscape of inevitable dissatisfaction
6. Public expectations of politicians are complex and often contradictory
7. These contradictions are often exacerbated by reactions to political scandals
8. Populism (which is often fuelled by political scandals) represents the antithesis of meaningful engagement
9. Some level of opposition to parliamentary politics is inevitable, given the divisive nature of politics and the non-partisan status of parliaments
10. Education and political literacy are essential to improving engagement
11. Social media is a useful tool for improved discussion, despite the continued emergence of 'echo chambers'
12. Parliaments must modernise their approach to web technology, moving away from 'broadcasting' and towards meaningful discussion
13. Physical accessibility is both a symbolic and a practical consideration within discussions of democratic engagement

Interpretations of engagement

1. It is important to be realistic about what citizens actually want from politics; specifically, what citizens are prepared to commit in terms of time and energy. Contemporary citizen engagement is characterised by many academics as a desire for influence rather than involvement, with clearly-defined points of entry and exit.

Moreover, Ruth Fox (Director of the Hansard Society) has previously argued that participation is often visible only when citizens perceive their own self-interest to be in jeopardy (2009, p.675-676).

2. Clearly, any discussion of citizen engagement must consider what citizens want (and don't want) from politics. However, academic studies frequently over-simplify these discussions by diagnosing widespread apathy or disengagement based on voter turnout figures (implying that low turnout and low engagement are synonymous). In reality non-voting is far from self-explanatory. Just as the act of voting can be highly symbolic and expressive, to refrain from voting can be equally meaningful. It is perfectly possible for a citizen to be engaged, yet not vote. Conversely, a citizen may vote and still be profoundly disengaged. Engagement is a consistent and meaningful dialogue between an institution and individual(s). It is not encapsulated by voting, or by any other single act.
3. The term 'dialogue' is a crucial point of consideration, since engagement is a two-way form of communication. Parliamentary openness is not engagement. Nor is citizen participation. Engagement is defined by the dynamic between the two. It is important to differentiate engagement from broadcasting; from a "monologue in disguise", presented as if it were a conversation" (Coleman, 2004, p.115). Parliament's efforts at communicating to citizens must be met with citizen participation in order to constitute real engagement. It is therefore important to establish a realistic quantifier of 'success' in this regard.

Citizens' attitudes to politics, politicians and institutions

4. The Hansard Society's most recent Audit of Political Engagement notes an encouraging majority (73%) in citizens' recognition of Parliament as essential to UK democracy; however, only 30% reported satisfaction with the actual running of Parliament (2017). Ipsos MORI data shows that dissatisfaction with Parliament is not a recent phenomenon, having been consistently evident between 1995 and 2010 (2011). In terms of trust, data from the Eurobarometer shows a similar trend:

Levels of trust in the UK Parliament, based on survey information from the European Commission’s ‘Eurobarometer’, indicating ‘distrust’ as a consistent majority view (2016)

Uniformly low levels of trust in political institutions contributes to a sense in which approval of Parliament is mostly theoretical. In other words, Parliament’s importance is widely acknowledged, but its performance is seen to consistently fall behind.

5. This raises the following question, linked to what Pippa Norris refers to as a ‘democratic deficit’ (2011): is there an agreeable point of compromise between citizens’ democratic aspirations and the abilities of political institutions to serve them? Matthew Flinders warns of an environment in which citizens’ demands eclipse what the political sector can realistically deliver (2012; 2012), rendering public disappointment inevitable. There is a case for arguing that the ‘tipping-off point’ for this democratic deficit has already been overstepped.
6. This situation is compounded by the often contradictory demands put on politicians as public figures, particularly the difficulty of balancing constituency work and parliamentary responsibilities (Norton, 2013; Norton, 2002). The current political landscape (facilitated by broadcast media) dictates that politicians be relatable yet professional, personable yet elite. To quote Stephen Coleman, they must be “ordinary enough to be representative, while extraordinary enough to be representatives” (2005, p.15).
7. The difficulty of meeting these expectations is made more difficult by the fallout from events such as 2009 expenses scandal. As Steven Fielding points out, the 2009 scandal’s significance lay not only in its revelations, but also its fitting “very easily into an already-established narrative in which politics and corruption were close bedfellows” (2011, p.227). Also significant was that the “desire to politically tar and feather the sinners” did not materialise into proactive engagement (Fox, 2009, p.676). This links back to the characterisation of ad-hoc democratic participation in Paragraph 1.
8. This particular thread of political opinion – automatically aligning ‘politics’ with the ‘corrupt’ mainstream establishment – is one of the hallmarks of populism. Whether populism is actually gaining momentum in the UK is an open question, but its relevance to engagement is precisely in terms of its dismissal of ‘informing’, in favour of pre-existing ‘common sense’ (Stoker, 2006, p.137), and in its “forcing [of] voters to make a choice about what they think when they do not think” (Chwalisz, 2015, p.18). Populism therefore represents a contrasting mindset to that of informed, meaningful engagement.

Recommendations for improvement

9. It is worth reiterating that politics is inherently divisive. Parliaments are political institutions that must define themselves as impartial, therefore occasional criticisms of ‘facelessness’ – even ‘irrelevance’ – are to be expected. Parliament’s administrative responsibilities are extremely difficult to negotiate smoothly, given the definitively unstable nature of politics. As mentioned in Paragraph 1, it is important to be realistic about prospective improvements.
10. Strengthening Parliament-public connections necessitates improvements in education and the spread of political literacy. Failing to do so undermines balanced reflection, opening the door to populism (see Paragraph 8). In this context academia itself can be a source of criticism; “self-referential as well as self-reverential, and often unreadable for anyone but a specialist” (Riddell, 2010, p.552). A more open working practice between academics and parliaments is required, in order to foster greater political literacy and strengthen engagement.
11. Another key resource for improved engagement is social media. As a tool, social media is conducive to the informal, fluid means by which (particularly younger) citizens engage with contemporary politics. However, it is important to consider social media alongside the points on ‘dialogue’ made in Paragraph 2 & 3. Social media discussions often demonstrate an ‘echo chamber’ effect, in which communicators seek out sources of agreement rather than challenge, jeopardising the extent to which a meaningful dialogue has been achieved (or even sought out).
12. Parliament still utilises web technology primarily as a broadcast medium rather than a discussion format. In this sense the potential of social media remains unrealised, as it is employed as an extension of existing communication techniques rather than a means for innovation. A cultural change is required in order to curb this ‘top-down’ approach. A number of parliamentary committees and departments have begun to acknowledge the importance of building forums through social media, which must be encouraged as a practice.
13. Accessibility and openness are not just cultural concerns; they are inherently practical. John Parkinson notes that in many cases, the symbolic ‘opening up’ of legislative buildings is followed by a reduction in the amount of administrative work that takes place within them (2013, p.444). Responsibilities then transfer to other (equally inaccessible) locations (Parkinson, 2013, p.444). In this case we can see a distinction between engagement as a premise and as a practice. Parliament’s ongoing Restoration and Renewal project will serve to shed additional light on this distinction. The physical accessibility of Parliament is both a useful metaphor for the accessibility of engagement, and a key practical consideration.

Sources and suggested texts

- Chwalisz, C. 2015. The populist signal. London: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Coleman, S. 2004. Whose conversation? Engaging the public in authentic polylogue. The Political Quarterly. 75(2), pp.112-120.
- Coleman, S. 2005. Direct representation: towards a conversational democracy. [Leaflet]. London: IPPR Exchange.
- European Commission. 2016. Eurobarometer interactive. [Online]. Available from: <http://ec.europa.eu/COMMFrontOffice/PublicOpinion/index.cfm/Chart/index>
- Fielding, S. 2011. Fiction and British Politics: Towards an Imagined Political Capital? Parliamentary Affairs. 64(2), pp.223-232.
- Flinders, M. 2012. Defending politics: why democracy matters in the 21st century. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Flinders, M.V. 2012. The demonisation of politicians: moral panics, folk devils and MPs' expenses. Contemporary Politics. 18(1), pp.1-17.
- Fox, R. 2009. Engagement and participation: what the public want and how our politicians need to respond. Parliamentary Affairs. 62(4), pp.673-685.
- Ipsos MORI. 2011. Satisfaction with the way Parliament works 1995-2010 [Online]. Available from: <https://www.ipsos-mori.com/researchpublications/researcharchive/2453/Satisfaction-with-the-way-Parliament-works-19952010.aspx?view=wide>
- Norris, P. 2011. Democratic deficit: critical citizens revisited. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Norton, P. 2002. Introduction: linking parliaments and citizens. In: Norton, P. ed. Parliaments and citizens in Western Europe. London & Portland, Oregon: Frank Cass, pp.1-18.
- Norton, P. 2013. Parliament and citizens in the United Kingdom. In: Leston-Bandeira, C. ed. Parliament and citizens. London & New York: Routledge, pp.139-154.
- Parkinson, J. 2013. How legislatures work – and should work – as public space. Democratization. 20(3), pp.438-455.
- Riddell, P. 2010. In Defence of Politicians: In Spite of Themselves. Parliamentary Affairs. 63(3), pp.545-557.
- Stoker, G. 2006. Why politics matters. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- The Hansard Society. 2017. Audit of political engagement 14: the 2017 report. London: The Hansard Society.

26 September 2017

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

This submission collectively addresses two of the questions in the terms of reference: do current laws encourage active political engagement [4] and how can society support civic engagement [7].

We note that the inquiry should prioritise the view that longer-term trends over the issue of civic engagement need to be understood in terms of citizens’ disengagement from the traditional arenas/institutions of formal politics, not from politics itself.

From this perspective, we argue that efforts to encourage citizenship and civic engagement have to also focus on reforming political and public institutions, rather than simply changing the behaviour of individuals or imposing new civic obligations

We also warn that while Brexit might present an opportunity to reform the existing way formal ‘arena’ politics is conducted in the U.K., the very real potential looms of a top-down, re-centralising of power that will potentially exacerbate some of the very issues that go to the heart of this inquiry.

How can society support civic engagement?

- What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement?
- What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

The Scope and Focus of the Inquiry

We welcome this salient and important Inquiry into citizenship and civic engagement in the United Kingdom. That said, we would urge the Committee to embrace a broad perspective to consider the issue of citizenship within the context of the crucial role political institutions play in shaping civic engagement. The two are deeply intertwined.

Previous similar themed initiatives have rather frustratingly tended to adopt a somewhat narrow focus concentrating for example on citizen disengagement re. traditional forms of ‘arena politics’ or ‘duty norms’ – e.g. voter turn-out, party membership etc. Subjects⁶⁷⁷ have been depicted as increasingly taking citizenship, and with it democratic politics, for ⁶⁷⁷ In narrow constitutional terms, Britain of course, has subjects not citizens. Having made this point at the outset of this memorandum, for the sake of consistency with the terminology employed by this inquiry, we will use the term citizen rather than subject henceforth.

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

granted, of being both complacent and unrealistic about what it is able to deliver. This view suggests that over time, the relationship between citizen's rights and responsibilities has become increasingly skewed; the rights of the individual have been prioritised with insufficient focus on the reciprocal duties or obligations of the citizen.

The origins of this approach are hardly new. One only has to turn to the 1970s and the oft stated argument that citizens' expected too much from politicians (who amplify the problem by ratcheting-up expectations to get elected), and were then disappointed when such expectations were not met. The result was a growing cynicism on behalf of the electorate about the political process and in turn a growing disengagement from the formal and traditional channels of civic engagement. The problem was perceived to be exacerbated by structural changes in British society, with the latter becoming less deferential and more atomised. This was seen to lead in turn, to the erosion of a sense of civic duty and with it civic engagement.

The logic of this approach is that citizens need to be much more understanding of the work of politicians and public officials and more broadly, they need to develop a more reflexive attitude towards representative democracy. Ipsa facto, the antidote is identified in calls for a greater emphasis on initiatives such as citizenship education programmes, often targeted at younger demographic cohorts.

Recent events in the form of the 2014 Scottish Referendum, the 2016 referendum on membership of the European Union, and the 2017 U.K. General Election challenge a number of assumptions underpinning this perspective. In the case of the Scottish referendum, the 84.6% turn-out - the highest of any national or regional election in the UK since 1918 - was a democratic exercise that engaged the public, and more importantly, was an election in which every vote had the potential to count. The early evidence⁶⁷⁸ from the 2017 Westminster election also reveals a notable upturn in voting among the 18-24 and 25-34 cohort. More broadly, turnout at general elections has continued to rise since the historic post-war low of 2001⁶⁷⁹. Such evidence suggests that people participate when they believe their vote has the potential to influence the outcome of an election.

We would wish to caution this Lord's Inquiry that approaches which purport to examine issues surrounding civic engagement that emphasise only changes in the nature and behaviour of society embrace only one-side of the coin.

In contrast, the argument we wish to present to this inquiry is to encourage a broader, more holistic approach to citizenship and civic engagement which focuses on the manner in which formal politics in the U.K. is currently organised and conducted.

⁶⁷⁸ House of Commons Briefing Paper (2017) General Election 2017: Results and Analysis Nos. CBP 7979, 11 July 2017 <http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7979#fullreport>

⁶⁷⁹ UK Political Info (2017) General Election Turnout 1945-2017 <http://www.ukpolitical.info/Turnout45.htm>

The Salience of Institutions

Our research⁶⁸⁰ emphasises that issues surrounding citizenship and civic engagement do not lie exclusively with citizens (who of course in the UK system are subjects and sovereignty resides with Parliament and not the people), but also with contemporary public institutions and the political process.

The United Kingdom's political system is essentially shaped by a nineteenth century conception of representative democracy prioritising top-down accountability over bottom-up engagement⁶⁸¹. Both the model and its related institutions no longer work effectively in the context of a 21st century world defined by transparency and open information. Cynicism, mistrust and lack of civic engagement are a consequence of the failure of long-standing public institutions to reflect the needs and interest of citizens, the increasing ability of citizens and the media to obtain and analyse information about public and private institutions and in so doing, be perceived to be properly accountable.

The last decade has seen a number of high profile institutional crises or scandals often involving trusted institutions such as the Police (Hillsborough; 'Plebgate'; the use of undercover officers; Stephen Lawrence), the BBC (salaries and payoffs for senior staff; and Jimmy Saville), Parliament (in relation to expenses, cash for honours); the NHS (over standards of care and the reporting of information) and most recently, local government in the light of the Grenfell tragedy (safety standards in social housing). Within this context, civic disengagement and a growth in cynicism is not surprising. Public institutions have failed to act in ways that might be expected in a democratic society.

We would argue that in many ways, these scandals are linked by a set of embedded practices within institutions, and the failure of organisations to adapt to a world of open information. The problem with all these cases is that the 'truth' has only been revealed after the event. There is a pattern of flawed decision-making in closed systems which when investigated and exposed, fuel perceptions of crisis and a growing loss of faith in public institutions.

What binds these scandals together is the distance between citizens and those who lead public institutions, particularly where policy-makers effectively take decisions in secret, and then try to cover up mistakes where failures have occurred.

Yet, it is increasingly difficult for institutions to control the flow and interpretation of information. For instance, the manner of Ian Tomlinson's death was revealed by mobile phone footage. The mistakes of Hillsborough were revealed by a long-standing campaign involving the relatives of the victims. Failures in the NHS have been revealed by a succession of whistle-blowers.

⁶⁸⁰ 'Westminster's Dilemma in a Post-Brexit World: Reconciling a 'New Politics' with the Westminster Model' ESRC, R120741 <https://www.researchgate.net/project/Westminsters-Dilemma-in-a-Post-Brexit-World-Reconciling-a-New-Politics-with-the-Westminster-Model>

⁶⁸¹ Richards, D., Smith, M.J. and Hay, C. (2014) Institutional Crisis in 21st Century Britain Basingstoke: Palgrave

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

Historically, UK institutions have been self-regulating, stemming from what was essentially a nineteenth century artefact, effectively holding themselves to account. As Mick Moran⁶⁸² has persuasively argued, the British approach to accountability was one of ‘club government’, whereby institutions set their own rules and were judged by other ‘good chaps’, in terms of whether they had broken the rules or not. This nineteenth century vision of accountability was based on the notion that citizens had to trust organisations to make the right decisions. From this perspective, the public were deemed to be either too self-interested or too lacking in expertise to be able to question the decision-makers, who with a strong sense of public duty, would ensure that the UK was governed effectively. It led to many public organisations operating within the context of an institutionalised culture of secrecy.

This approach to accountability through self-regulation was sustainable when institutions were able to control the supply of information. Hence, the accountability processes were validated against information that they formally released, while citizens usually did not have the information or resources to challenge the established, institutional account.

Citizens, Institutions and New Forms of Open Information

Overtime, this process has been undermined by the development of new forms of information:

- Freedom of information and data protection has meant that organisations have been subject to pressures to release large swathes of information, often at the behest of the media.
- The development of meta-data which allows analysis of organisational performance (for example comparison of organisational performance is now relatively easy to organise).
- The growth of open information sources for developing political organisation around exposing institutional behaviour.
- The digital storage of data means that large swathes of information are accessible in ways which were never possible before.
- This digital storage has been exploited by the growth of whistle-blowers and leaks: the activities of individuals such as Edward Snowden and organisations such as wiki-

⁶⁸² M. Moran (2007) The British regulatory state: high modernism and hyper-innovation. Oxford University Press

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

leaks have exposed institutional information in ways that previously were not possible.

- The politicisation of information – information is now subject to a wider analysis and critique, as institutions lose their monopoly of control, and there is growing distrust of institutional accounts.

Citizens, the Rise of Anti-Politics and Calls for a New Politics

This mistrust of institutions has had a growing impact on Westminster politics, reflected in the perceived growth of ‘anti-politics’, witnessed in a perceived increasing divide and disconnect between citizens and politicians.

Studies of anti-politics reveal it to be a complex, multi-dimensional phenomenon throwing-up numerous pathologies concerning power, democracy, legitimacy, participation, and accountability⁶⁸³. There has been longer-term patterns of public disengagement from traditional forms of ‘arena politics’ or ‘duty norms’ expressed for example, by declining electoral turnout, party membership and wider political participation in mainstream politics.

Elsewhere, there is the depiction of the so-called ‘left behind’, of those who are: ‘on the wrong side of social change, are struggling on stagnant incomes, feel threatened by the way their communities and country are changing, and are furious at an established politics that appears not to understand or even care about their concerns’⁶⁸⁴. As Peter Mair⁶⁸⁵ observes: ‘...traditional politics is seen less and less as something that belongs to the citizens or to the society, and is instead seen as something that is done by politicians’.

Westminster politicians are by no means immune to these challenges given their reliance on claims to democratic legitimacy as the lodestar of the representative process. Yet, it is here that our current research reveals the emergence of an intriguing paradox: a pattern stretching back over two decades of leaders of mainstream opposition parties espousing the case for a ‘new politics’, but when in office adhering to the established ways and means of governing.

In surveying these calls for change⁶⁸⁶, while the context behind them may vary, advocates for a new politics are united by a familiar ring in their rejection of the old ways of doing ⁶⁸³ See for example Hay, C. (2007) Why We Hate Politics, London: Polity. Stoker, G. (2017) Why Politics Matters: Making Democracy Work, 2nd edn. Basingstoke, Palgrave Macmillan.

⁶⁸⁴ Ford, R. and Goodwin, M. (2014) Revolt on the Right: Explaining the Support for the Radical Right in Britain, London, Routledge.

⁶⁸⁵ Mair, P. (2005) Democracy Beyond Parties Center for the Study of Democracy Papers 4 January 2005 <http://escholarship.org/uc/item/3vs886v9> p.21.

⁶⁸⁶ Richards, D. (2016) British Politics in the Age of Uncertainty: the link between politics and the need for an alternative. Illustrative, but by no means exhaustive examples include:

- May 1997, Tony Blair arguing his government: '...will govern in the interests of all our people...and restore trust in politics in this country. That cleans it up, that decentralizes it, that gives people hope once again that politics is and always should be about the service of the public.'
- April 2010, David Cameron observing that the UK electorate had been: '...betrayed by a generation of politicians, by an elite that thinks it knows best. People have lost control. The politicians have forgotten, the public are the master, we are the servant. That's what needs to change in our system...Blow apart the old system. Overthrow the old ways. Put people in the driving seat.'
- Similarly his Coalition partner, Nick Clegg, reiterated, 'This government is going to transform our politics so the state has far less control over you, and you have far more control over the state,...break up concentrations of power and hand power back to people...This government is going to persuade you to put your faith in politics once again.'
- In the 2014 Scottish Independence Referendum Alex Salmond asserted that: 'Whatever else we can say about this referendum campaign, we have touched sections of the community who have never before been touched by politics....I don't think that will ever be allowed to go back to business as usual in politics again.'
- The latest Labour Party leader Jeremy Corbyn, saw his elevation to Leader of the Opposition as: '...a vote for change in the way we do politics...Kinder, more inclusive. Bottom up, not top down. In every community and workplace, not just at Westminster...Something new and invigorating, popular and authentic, has exploded.'

In different ways and at different times, each leader in seeking office for their party has called for an alternative approach to the conduct of politics that is more devolved, bottom-up, deliberative and participatory. There is some evidence of established parties seeking to reform from within. Collectively, leaders have invoked similar rallying calls to reject the status quo by taking on vested powers and interests to change the way politics is practised. In the context of the UK, we might frame this as a search by politicians to offer a new social contract of political renewal and re-legitimation in response to a growing climate of anti-politics.

old, new, and anti-politics <http://eprints.lse.ac.uk/71927/1/blogs.lse.ac.uk-British%20politics%20in%20the%20Age%20of%20Uncertainty%20the%20link%20between%20old%20new%20and%20anti-politics.pdf>

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

Yet the very same politicians when in power have continued to work within the existing institutions of the state, and with it the way politics has traditionally been done. When surveying the recent landscape of reform in the UK, change has been limited and where major reform has occurred, for example further Scottish devolution in 2014 [alongside English devolution as a corollary] and most recently Brexit, it appears more as an unintended consequence, rather than the culmination of government policy, even less so a new form of politics.

As such, reforms have been predominantly ad hoc, grafted on to the existing Westminster system. The calls for a new politics as an antidote to the rise of anti-politics have largely gone unheeded. Instead, the British political tradition's mode of governance, captured in the Westminster model's centralising and top-down tendencies, has remained ostensibly intact. This dynamic of central control is germane to the wider issues this inquiry seeks to examine.

Civic Engagement, Governance and Pressures for Institutional Re-Design

While the Westminster system has largely remained intact, the process of governing bears almost no relation to nineteenth century governance. The levels of intervention of the state in everyday life today are manifestly different. Moreover, state intervention does not just come from a centralised government (which oversees the process) but from an almost infinite range of fragmented institutions that deliver public policy – ranging from private bodies to local government, to regional organisations, to semi-independent NHS trusts, free schools and universities.

There is a need in these circumstances to re-think both the nature of institutions, and with it the mechanisms of civic engagement. Institutions have to accept that they operate in an open information world, and that there will be challenges to their decisions if they attempt to take policies in ways that are not transparent and accountable.

In addition, both citizens and civil society organisations are participating more readily in political debate, but they are doing so outside the traditional arenas of parties and parliament. Blogs, tweets, petitions, social media forums, internet based lobbying such as 39 degrees, and the growth of political movements like Momentum illustrate a wide interest in the political, but a disillusionment with the traditional forms of Westminster arena politics.

The issue of civic engagement, both in terms of its potential decline and how it might be re-invigorated, can be understood in terms of the increasing perception of a gap between citizens/civil society and decision-makers and with it, the failure of political institutions to adapt to the demands and pressures of 21st-century democracy.

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

Elite government sits uncomfortably with what Manuel Castells⁶⁸⁷ identifies as the rise of the networked society based on a sharing of information driven by new digital technologies. Moreover, whilst inequality has increased since 1979, citizens have more control over their own lives. Elite government may have been able to function in a world of limited horizons and the ability to control information, but it is increasingly difficult to sustain in a climate in which people have greater expectations for themselves and their children.

The problem is that the flaws of the ‘club government’ model through which many of the UK’s institutions operated has been revealed, but it has not been replaced by an alternative form of legitimation. A process of demystification has led to a loss of faith in institutions among the public. What we have seen in recent years is not, as is so often claimed, a process of depoliticisation but in reality a process of repoliticisation; through different mechanisms, institutions are opened up to greater scrutiny in how they operate.

Decisions which in the past were made behind closed doors are increasingly coming under the spotlight; whatever the many faults and limitations of digital politics, new media is making a difference to political legitimacy and accountability. Information is transmitted more rapidly while disparate groups of people are able to respond at low cost. Smart phones and tablets have become an instrument of accountability over public officials, while freedom of information and large data sets are allowing challenges to the arguments of elites at the apex of large institutions.

Contrary to the defenders of the current model, accepting our democracy as the ‘least worst’ system is not enough because it is alienating voters (particularly the young), eroding civic engagement, and producing a dangerous flight from institutional politics.

The UK has never had a participatory and democratic culture; it has a politics centred on holding a circulating elite to account. But a more sophisticated electorate in a world of greater open information is no longer convinced by this system. There is a need to build a new model of politics for the 21st century rather than sustaining a model organised round the mores of the 19th century.

This requires the stretching of conventional approaches to civic engagement by adopting a broader understanding of what constitutes political engagement beyond traditional ‘duty norms’ and appeals to the need for ‘thick’ over ‘thin’ democratic practices⁶⁸⁸. In so doing, the Inquiry should consider how to systematically evaluate how far people and civil society groups can be engaged, through, for example, digital media and the different and innovative ways in which they can be included in debate and decision making. Institutional re-design might include:

⁶⁸⁷ Castells, M. (2000) The Rise of the Network Society: Economy, Society and Culture Blackwell

⁶⁸⁸ Thick democracy here invokes a sense of politics occurring within traditional arenas, between groups involving face-to-face engagement. Thin democracy offers a wider and loose connotation of politics based on [digital] communicative networks, accessing different resources and with faster means of information distribution.

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

- developing real-time accountability rather than post-hoc accountability;
- a cultural ‘accountability shift’ where the presumption is that decision processes will be exposed rather than hidden to ensure organisations abandon a ‘goldfish’ bowl ethos;
- developing open policy making, with officials losing their monopoly over access to decision makers and the sources of advice being widened considerably (something previous governments have supported in principle);
- organisations using meta data and open forms of communication to rebuild trust with citizens;
- using the internet and digital fora for political engagement and bypassing traditional forms of representation such as parties and voting.

Civic Engagement and Decision-Makers – Bridging the Gap

Civic engagement requires people to become involved in decisions that are salient to their own lives, that are not party political in a way that one party monopolises the process, with the outcomes that are about allowing ‘normal’ citizens to become involved in politics and decision-making. It may be that it has to take account of new media, that it may be populist and result in decisions that Westminster’s governing class does not like. It may be that it has to be much more flexible and responsive than existing institutions allow. It may be that participation varies from issue to issue. What blogging and Twitter and discussions boards on other social media platforms reveal is that there are many people who have distinctive views; that people are not ‘anti-politics’ when politics is about issues that interest or affect them, and that they think they can have some control over; something that has been clearly illustrated by the activism of the Grenfell tower residents.

We would emphasise that this inquiry should prioritise the view that longer-term trends over the issue of civic engagement need to be understood in terms of citizens’ disengagement from the traditional arenas/institutions of formal politics, not from politics itself. The British political tradition and its emphasis on accountable government over democratic engagement fosters a culture where policy-makers tend to infantilise the electorate.

The most recent, high-profile example of this approach is evidenced in the Brexit negotiations. The Government’s position is one in which it will deliver on a Brexit deal [ostensibly forged behind Whitehall’s closed doors] that will then be put before Parliament in March 2019. The Government argues that it is at this point that it will be held to account.

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

It is an approach that shuns consultation, civic engagement, the binding in of civil society, and more broadly political pluralism which given the highly divisive nature of Brexit would appear to be a pre-requisite for a successful and potentially lasting settlement.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

- What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age?
- Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

In our view, the evidence provided by proponents of electoral reform that a more proportional electoral system would decrease the number of ‘wasted votes’ remains compelling. The First Past the Post electoral system is increasingly untenable in a devolved polity such as the UK: for instance, until the 2017 election, the Conservatives had no Scottish representation in the House of Commons, while Labour was severely under-represented in southern England. This situation has a damaging impact on the legitimacy and effectiveness of the political system, and appears to have exacerbated civic disengagement from the formal electoral process. Crucially, the current system is failing to deliver on its supposed strength: clear accountability with the election of strong, single, majority party government.

There a powerful argument for lowering the voting age to 16 in that there is evidence that the younger that people vote, the more likely they will continue to vote throughout their lives. Moreover, it creates an incentive for young people to engage in the political system. Nevertheless, voting at 16 should be introduced with stronger civic education in schools so that the responsibilities of political engagement can be properly understood.

We are sceptical about the case for state funding of political parties: the danger of state funding is that such arrangements would further distance citizens from political parties, who would no longer be required to gather resources by encouraging citizens to donate money or time. The issue is that party politics will operate even more within an exclusive elite arena disengaged from the issues and problems that voters encounter in their daily lives. State funding also creates disincentives for parties to attract members and to engage more widely with society. One of the key issues in terms of engagement is that most people are put off existing forms of party politics. State funding would likely entrench current practices.

Concluding Comments

The case we have presented here seeks to prioritise the view that efforts to encourage citizenship and civic engagement have to focus on reforming political and public institutions, rather than simply changing the behaviour of individuals or imposing new civic obligations.

Professor David Richards, Dr Patrick Diamond and Professor Martin Smith – written evidence (CCE0053)

In concluding, we note that the vote to leave the European Union presents a window of opportunity for institutional reform and re-design. We caution though that the manner in which the current government is approaching Britain's withdrawal is not without concern: the result of the referendum on UK membership of the EU can be read as an expression of dissatisfaction with the way in which elite politics and policy-making has been conducted in recent decades; this discontent is especially pronounced among so-called 'left behind' voters. Yet the May Government's approach captured in the Vote Leave mantra of 'taking back control' appears to re-establish the British political tradition - a re-assertion of sovereignty, Whitehall centralisation, and executive prerogative – which in all likelihood will exacerbate the very disillusionment that led to the Brexit outcome in 2016, even when the UK is outside the EU. This re-imposition of Whitehall control and the attempt to claw back discretionary powers from the devolved institutions across the UK will merely risk fanning the flames of 'anti-politics', leading to further citizen disengagement from politics over the long-term.

4 September 2017

Professor Jo Shaw, Salvesen Chair of European Institutions, University of Edinburgh – written evidence (CCE0045)

With the United Kingdom set to leave the European Union in 2019, the country stands on the cusp of major constitutional change. One of the many dimensions of that overall transformation is an important change in the status of ‘citizens’. UK citizens will no longer be ‘EU citizens’, protected under EU law. Hence they lose both the bundle of socio-economic rights associated with the EU Treaties (free movement, non-discrimination, etc.) and the political status associated with this, including the right to vote in European Parliament elections. EU27 citizens retain their status, but EU citizenship loses – subject to any withdrawal agreement negotiated under Article 50 TEU – most, if not all, of its political and legal traction in the UK. In other words, EU27 citizens will be ‘third country nationals’ in the UK. So far as we can tell, subject to whatever transitional arrangements are put in place for those who are presently in the UK or have some attachment to the UK that needs to be protected (e.g. former residence), the status of ‘second country national’, which nicely describes the ‘privileged foreigner’ status of EU citizens resident in other Member States at present, will disappear at the point of Brexit.

The issue of Brexit and EU citizenship receives scant mention in the Select Committee’s Call for Evidence. It is none the less one of the most important items of context providing the background to the Committee’s work on citizenship and civic engagement because of the important status changes to be introduced and the processes through which the UK and its citizens and residents are going. It is worth noting – in the context of the Call’s interest in political participation – that adding the total number of EU citizens resident in the UK to the number of UK citizens long term resident outside the UK creates a total which is larger than the number of votes which separated the respective tallies of Leave and Remain. And yet those groups of people, few of whom had the right to vote in the Referendum, who are some of those most intimately affected by the Referendum outcome, as regards their legal status and ‘citizenship rights’.

This response to the Call for Evidence therefore proceeds on the assumption that it is important to itemize the citizenship-related dimensions of Brexit, so that this roster of implications can be carefully built into the Select Committee’s deliberations. These reflections need to go beyond setting up a simple dichotomy between ‘British citizens’ and ‘others’, because the reality is much more complex. Nor should the work of the Committee be premised on the assumption that Brexit marks a straightforward revival of national sovereignty in relation to citizenship matters, along with everything else. International law, and some aspects of EU law, will continue to affect these questions, especially if a withdrawal agreement is successfully negotiated under Article 50 TEU. But internally there is an ethical imperative for policy-makers to proceed in a manner that is conscious of the threat to individual rights that Brexit poses. This is a threat that is unprecedented in the context of citizenship developments within the UK's core European territories (i.e. leaving aside questions relating to the treatment of citizenship status and 'subjecthood' in current and former colonies and territories, as well as the historic and ongoing implications of the unraveling of the British Empire).

Professor Jo Shaw, Salvesen Chair of European Institutions, University of Edinburgh – written evidence (CCE0045)

A country which is about to embark upon a phase of major constitutional change is a country that needs to take a hard look at the contours of its citizenship regime, in order to ensure that it is operating optimally. A citizenship regime encompasses the formal legal status of membership – or nationality as it is sometimes known – as well as other elements. 'Nationality' is the status recognized under international law, the external dimension of which 'sorts' persons and allocates them to one, or sometimes several, states (depending upon national approaches to dual citizenship). Internally, citizenship determines access to some residual rights that most western liberal democracies reserve only to citizens, such as absolute protection against deportation (also prohibited under international law), most rights to vote and stand for election (although the UK has been an exception in this sphere with its allocation of rights to Commonwealth and Irish citizens hitherto, as well as rights under EU law), as well as access to many public service positions, especially in areas of national security and defence.

Beyond formal membership in this sense, citizenship as a membership status generally has fuzzy edges, because so many rights and duties (e.g. to pay taxes) or opportunities to provide service (e.g. to serve in the armed forces) can and do attach to various categories of settled non-citizens. Those who enjoy rights similar to, but not entirely identical to those of citizens, are often called 'denizens'. Residence is a very important marker of this type of entitlement, which is why cases where stability of residence is threatened receive prominent coverage in the media. One recent example is that of Shane Ridge, who was born in the UK and who long thought that he was a UK citizen. He was incorrectly judged by the Home Office not to be a UK citizen and received a warning that he had no right to reside in the UK because he did not have leave to enter as a non-UK citizen, and that he should therefore leave the country where he had lived all of his life. In this case, it seems that UK law was too complex even for the Home Office to understand, and it was forced into an apology and a rapid climb down when it transpired that in fact Ridge was a UK citizen via his grandmother.⁶⁸⁹

Many of the fuzzy edges of citizenship involve not only rights-based elements, but also aspects of identity and belonging: the feeling of 'home'. In this context, Prime Minister Theresa May's 'citizens of nowhere' comment during her speech to the Conservative Party conference of 2016 undermined confidence in the inclusiveness of the UK citizenship regime in its apparent dismissal of the values and practices of multiple identity and attachment which are important not only for EU27 citizens resident in the UK (and their families, from wherever they hale) but also for many UK citizens who have been, are currently, or were in the future planning to use their EU citizenship rights. It is one thing to rail against the entitlements of ‘citizens of the world’ who are literally, with their airport lounge passes, business class travel and travel-friendly passports, ‘citizens of almost everywhere’, but quite another to lace that challenge to ‘elites’ also with an attack on ‘citizens of nowhere’, many of whom have few if any choices about where they live. For these groups, low cost air travel and coach travel are more familiar forms of transport than business class air travel. With statements such as May’s, there is a risk that those who are exercising free movement rights end up feeling as if they are less than equal citizens in the societies in which they live, even if they still have full rights to be there. At this moment of constitutional change, there is a risk that a statement from a leading politician claiming that ‘this is citizenship and this is not citizenship’ will be unhelpful and demoralizing for those most at risk of a loss of rights following Brexit.

⁶⁸⁹ See Home Office in the media: 30 August 2017, <https://homeofficemedia.blog.gov.uk/2017/08/30/home-office-in-the-media-30-august-2017/>.

With the UK leaving the EU, an important distinction between the operation of EU law in relation to free movement and the broad structure of UK immigration law will disappear. UK immigration law operates on the basis of ‘permissions’ – leave to enter and remain, ‘indefinite leave to remain’, etc. This is what the ‘settled status’ that the UK intends to offer EU citizens resident in the UK at the time of Brexit will be; it will not be a ‘rights-based’ status, as is EU citizenship, which offers individual citizens rights anchored in EU free movement law in the Treaties and secondary legislation, and guaranteed by national courts, under the supervision of the European Court of Justice. But more than that, the evidence thus far (largely anecdotal, but also research-led deriving from projects undertaken by academics such as Professor Catherine Barnard, Dr Nando Sigona, and Dr Charlotte O’Brien amongst others) highlights the sense of ‘loss of home’ that EU citizens have already been experiencing, which is affecting their conduct in a variety of ways. With EU citizenship likely no longer to provide an effective back-up status, many people who feel vulnerable are applying for UK citizenship, although first they must establish the intermediate status of ‘permanent resident’ under EU law. This is a status that the UK government appears determined to render legally meaningless after Brexit, with all EU27 citizens needing to apply for settled status, regardless of whether they have already obtained a permanent residence card. Other EU27 citizens, including many highly skilled workers as well as those in the vital hospitality and agricultural sectors, are articulating current and future intentions to leave the UK, and yet other workers and service providers are declining the opportunity to come to the UK because they see it as a less attractive destination both economically and culturally. These actions will not only harm the UK economy but also the fabric of UK society, as children in particular experience a sense of dislocation and loss (including UK citizen children who are members of transnational families who are forced into difficult decisions because of the operation of the harsh UK family reunion rules).

Focusing now on the issue of naturalisation, the question can be asked whether there is an ethical imperative on the part of the UK as a state to make adjustments to its regime of citizenship in order to make it more accessible for those groups of resident EU27 citizens who see this as the most important step if they are to retain both a sense of belonging and legal security. The excessive cost of UK citizenship,⁶⁹⁰ and the sense that those who do have substantial resources may well have various other means of protecting their interests through the ‘purchase’ of residence permits and even citizenship (in some countries) highlights the intrusion of issues of economic inequality deep into the fabric of citizenship in a way that is disturbing, given that citizenship is meant – above all – to be about equality. Matthew Grant has argued that UK citizenship has become rather unattractive in recent years,⁶⁹¹ and this situation may become worse if the bureaucratic systems are placed under ever higher levels of stress after Brexit, through the ‘settlement’ process and more and more applications for naturalisation. It is also important to recognize that for some EU citizens naturalisation is not an option, not only for reasons of cost, but also because their country of origin has a very restrictive approach to dual citizenship: problems will arise for some Dutch, Swedish, Austrian and Estonian citizens as a result of this, because they do not wish to be placed in the situation of making an invidious choice which EU citizenship protected them from having to make.

One interesting dimension of the post-Brexit vote contestation of these issues of citizenship and belonging has been that there has been much more civic engagement around this status than there was before it became an ‘endangered species’. The factors which prompted the Brexit vote are, of course, not an issue for the Committee, but it is worth pointing out that for decades EU citizenship – as a set of rights and principles – has largely been taken for granted both in the UK and elsewhere in the EU. But many UK citizens are starting to see that they will lose something of value as a result of the UK’s departure from the EU, even if this is something as apparently trivial as the EHIC card. It is also arguable that the increasing realization that the task of protecting the rights of UK citizens resident in other EU states as well as EU27 citizens in the UK is rather more complex than was evident in the airy assurances of those advocating a Leave vote in 2016 has perhaps further undermined the delicate relation of trust between citizens and politicians which is central to a sense of effective civic engagement in a liberal democracy. This final point should certainly be a matter of concern for the Committee as it develops its work.

31 August 2017

⁶⁹⁰ Recently noted in the Economist: <https://www.economist.com/news/britain/21648699-becoming-british-costly-business-paytriotism>.

⁶⁹¹ See M. Grant, “‘Citizen of the world’? Think again: British citizenship after Brexit, 21 November 2016, www.democraticaudit.com/2016/11/21/citizen-of-the-world-think-again-british-citizenship-after-brexit/.

Professor Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University, in collaboration with Dr Katherine Botterill and Dr Gurchathen Sanghera – written evidence (CCE0080)

Professor Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University, in collaboration with Dr Katherine Botterill and Dr Gurchathen Sanghera – written evidence (CCE0080)

Background to submission - our comments here draw upon our Arts and Humanities Research Council project about the everyday experiences of Muslim and non-Muslim young people growing up in urban, suburban and rural Scotland. Overall this project worked with 382 young people from diverse ethnic, religious and cultural backgrounds including Muslim young, other South Asian youth (such as Sikhs, Hindus and non-religious South Asians), asylum seekers and refugees, international students, Central and Eastern European migrants and white Scottish youth. Most lived in Scotland's main cities, but some were from Dumfries, Fife and Inverness. Our final report is available here:

<https://research.ncl.ac.uk/youngpeople/outputs/finalreport/>

Key summary points

- Racism and Islamophobia are everyday experiences for many ethnic minority youth in Scotland. Efforts need to be made to challenge racism in order to prevent divisions within and between communities;
- Participants expressed a frustration with the ways in which Britain's Asian communities are represented as lacking any internal diversity;
- Ethnic minority youth are interested in talking about politics and aware of political issues (including international, national and local politics); opportunities for them to engage in politics and in public life need to be made more transparent in order to maximise opportunities and awareness;
- For those who have engaged in political and public life, some were worried that they may be seen as too political or as radical and others still were frustrated by troubling stereotypes based on assumptions about their gender, race or social class. Simplistic stereotypes about Muslim young people in particular need to be challenged in order to enable them to participate in public life.

In response to the questions identified by the Committee, we respond in particular to questions 7 and 9 below:

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Professor Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University, in collaboration with Dr Katherine Botterill and Dr Gurchathen Sanghera – written evidence (CCE0080)

7.1 Resilience of young people - Although racism and Islamophobia were significant factors in the everyday lives of our participants, many young people demonstrated resilience to everyday racism and felt able to manage and respond to it. Racism needs to be challenged but the resilience demonstrated by young people is a significant strength that could be built upon to promote participation in public life.

7.2 Strong concern about and interest in global politics - Many of the young people involved in our research were passionate about and interested in global political issues. They engaged in debates about such issues and were knowledgeable about the role of politicians and others in world affairs.

7.3 Strong ethic of care - Many of the young people who participated in our research demonstrated a strong ethic of care for others and expressed and practised this through a number of avenues such as: volunteering; community activism; and voicing a strong interest in political issues (international, national and local).

7.4 Politicised by the Scottish independence Referendum - Many young people in our research – including those who were previously not interested in politics – were politicised by the Scottish Independence Referendum and the lowering of the voting age to include 16 and 17 year olds. This engaged and interested cohort of young people are an asset and could be utilised in order to promote participation in public life.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

9.1 From our research with diverse ethnic and religious minority young people as well as white young people, we found the following barriers when it comes to them being active citizens and to engaging politically:

9.2 Everyday racism - The vast majority of the ethnic minority youth who we have worked with in our research experienced racism; some experience it on a daily basis. These experiences varied widely and included physically aggressive forms of discrimination (e.g. extreme violence), having a headscarf pulled off by a fellow passenger on public transport or having bricks thrown across the street. There were also experiences of name-calling, taunting, or individuals being made the subject of jokes and “banter” in public. Our participants also referred to experiences of racism online such as on social media. Young people felt it is important to talk about racism and referred to racist incidences on the basis of accent, skin colour, faith, dress, nationality and ethnicity. Young people explained that racist incidents tended to be triggered by media stereotypes and people who were under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs. Our participants understood that racism can be both covert and overt. Encountering and responding to racism was context-dependent, based on the intersection of place, community size, peer and intergenerational relations, and personal identities.

Professor Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University, in collaboration with Dr Katherine Botterill and Dr Gurchathen Sanghera – written evidence (CCE0080)

9.3 Islamophobia - Interconnected with racism, many of our participants felt discriminated against because of their perceived religion and so experienced personal and institutional forms of Islamophobia (as people often assumed they were Muslim). That being said, young Muslims questioned the usefulness of the term 'Islamophobia'. The term is seen to be 'othering', reinforcing difference, which in turn further marginalises Muslims. Young people preferred the term 'racism' to 'Islamophobia'. The media, including social media, are catalysts of anti-Muslim sentiment. We have written about Islamophobia based on this research: <https://theconversation.com/eight-ways-that-islamophobia-operates-in-everyday-life-64444>. More recently – and since this research has been completed – we are concerned about the high levels of public Islamophobia and rise in hate crimes particularly connected with Brexit.

9.4 Legacies of negative media representation - Even although some media outlets may be making an effort to change how they represent Britain's Asian communities, there is a legacy of exclusionary headlines and problematic images about British Asians that continually re-circulate; these are very damaging for ethnic minority youth.

9.5 Gendered and racialised stereotypes - a strong theme across our project is about the problematic stereotypes placed upon many ethnic minority young people, including the ways in which these are gendered, racialized and shaped by other markers of social difference. These powerful stereotypes operate to keep ethnic minority young people in their place and may restrict them for engaging in public life. Such stereotypes present a significant set of barriers for young people.

9.6 - Fear of being misrecognised as 'radical', 'extreme' or 'oppressed' - an important barrier to participation in public life that we found in our research was a reluctance amongst some young people to engage in politics in case of misrecognition. Here, young Muslims – and those who were mistaken for being Muslim - were concerned about being labelled as too 'political' or as 'radical'; this led some young people to avoid talking about politics entirely.

9.7 - Lack of awareness of the heterogeneity/diversity of Asian community in UK - all of our participants were concerned (and some were angry) about the lack of awareness of the diversity within the Asian community in the UK. They felt labelled, misunderstood and misrepresented as they were regularly assumed to belong to a homogenous Asian community that lacked any internal diversity. Young people were eager to correct this and to point out divergences, differences and disjunctures within the Asian community (and within sub-groups of this community) whether this be based on politics, faith, family or education.

9.8 The importance of locality and the significance of place in shaping engagement - the focus of our research is upon Scotland and young people from a range of locations across urban, suburban and rural Scotland participated in the research. We found that the local context in which young people grow up often has a strong influence over the likelihood or not of them participating in public life. Some participants were frustrated by assumptions that Scotland is 'white' and is not home to a significant Asian community.

Professor Peter Hopkins, School of Geography, Politics and Sociology, Newcastle University, in collaboration with Dr Katherine Botterill and Dr Gurchathen Sanghera – written evidence (CCE0080)

9.9 Religious vis-à-vis ethnic and racial classifications - in some contexts, the classification or division of communities by religion and/or race and ethnicity is not particularly helpful and may construct barriers to participation in public life. We found that many young Muslims and other ethnic and religious minority young people were discriminated against because they 'look Muslim'. With such an example, it would be more useful to engage with such issues through working with a diversity of ethnic and religious minority groups rather than only focusing on one specific religious group. Also, in some places, the Muslim community is small and it may be more helpful to identify barriers to participation based on being a South Asian or based on being BME.

The team who did the research

Peter Hopkins is a Professor of Social Geography at Newcastle University and has conducted research about Muslims in Scotland for over fifteen years. He has a PhD from the University of Edinburgh. His books include 'Geographies of Muslim Identities: Diaspora, Gender and Belonging', 'Muslims in Britain: race, place and identities' and 'The Issue of Masculine Identities for British Muslim Identities after 9/11: A Social Analysis'. He recently led a large AHRC-funded research project about the everyday geopolitics of Muslim and non-Muslim young people with the others involved in this submission.

Dr Katherine Botterill is a Lecturer in Human Geography in the School of Life, Sport and Social Sciences at Edinburgh Napier University. She has research expertise about migration, mobilities and geopolitics, and was a full-time researcher on the everyday geopolitics research project.

Dr Gurchathen Sanghera is a Lecturer in the School of International Relations at the University of St Andrews. He has conducted research with Muslims in both England (particularly in Bradford) and Scotland. He has published on a range of issues connected to this including: social capital, gender

6 September 2017

Professor Jennie Popay and Dr Emma Halliday – written evidence (CCE0149)

Introduction.

This submission is from Professor Jennie Popay and Dr Emma Halliday in our individual capacity. We welcome the opportunity to provide written evidence towards the Select Committee’s work as it considers issues related to citizenship and civic engagement. Our submission draws on research on the social determinants of health inequalities and in particular the potential positive impacts of civic engagement involving communities of ‘place’ (residents of a geographical area) within the UK context. We focus on evidence related to engagement approaches that seek to increase the ‘collective control’ residents of disadvantaged neighbourhoods have over decisions that affect their lives. Examples include initiatives that allocate funding to communities who take action around shared priorities in a geographical area (place based initiatives) or models of working that enable more equitable collaboration between communities and public sector and other organisations. In particular we provide evidence to contribute towards questions 9 and 12 of the evidence call.

Response to Q9.

Why so many communities and groups feel “left behind”:

1. Scale of health and social inequality in the UK: There is a very significant body of evidence documenting the scale and nature of the health inequalities associated with inequalities in social and economic living and working conditions. These inequalities are seen across almost all causes of mortality and many diseases including mental illness. However, perhaps the most profound dimension of these inequalities are those associated with life expectancy and healthy life expectancy (years without chronic illness) at birth between more and less disadvantaged areas of England. For example, based on figures for 2008-13 there is a 6 year difference in life expectancy and 20.2 year difference in healthy life expectancy between women living in the most and least deprived areas – the figures for men are 8 years and 19 years respectively. There are also significant inequalities between different regions, with health being worse on average in the north of England than in the south even when people are living in the same socio-economic circumstances. It is important to stress that these inequalities in health outcomes are not inevitable: as a recent paper in the BMJ has shown, the period of increased social investment between 1997 and 2010 across the whole of government, targeted at disadvantaged areas and groups, was associated with a decline in health inequalities.⁶⁹²

⁶⁹² Barr B, Higgerson J, Whitehead M. Investigating the impact of the English health inequalities strategy: time trend analysis. BMJ. 2017 Jul 26;358:j3310. <https://doi.org/10.1136/bmj.j3310>

2. Lack of control as a driver of inequality: The causes of health inequalities are complex and multifaceted but there is conclusive evidence that the social and economic conditions in which people live and work are primary drivers.⁶⁹³ In this context, there is a growing body of evidence on the importance for health of the control people have over decisions that have an impact on their lives.⁶⁹⁴ Though much of the research has focused on control at the individual level, there is increasing interest in the social and health impact of ‘collective control’ by communities of interest or place which theory and some albeit limited research suggests may ‘work’ in the same way.⁶⁹⁵
3. Stigmatisation of economically deprived areas: The impact of stigma associated with inequality presents significant issues for groups already experiencing considerable disadvantage. These processes of stigmatisation are shaped by the attitudes of those living or working outside an area, including journalists, as well as residents of other neighbourhoods and public officials working locally and nationally. Exploratory work during the Communities in Control study (see point 6) identified that residents perceived negative or stereotyped images connected to the areas where they lived, to affect life chances, investment into the area, social cohesion and wellbeing.⁶⁹⁶

Barriers to active citizenship:

4. Existing research reviews have identified a range of factors acting as barriers to non-participation in decision making/civic activities by residents of disadvantaged areas, as well as challenges affecting on-going participation in programmes of engagement.⁶⁹⁷ These barriers include:
 - 4.1. (Mis)understandings of non-participation: Professionals may misunderstand a lack of participation as resulting from apathy or a ‘lack of capacity’ among the community. Community members may, however, enact non-participation or be unwilling to engage with external agencies as a rational decision, which is based on

⁶⁹³ CSDH. Closing the gap in a generation: health equity through action on the social determinants of health. Global Commission on Social Determinants of Health. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2008. Available at: http://www.who.int/social_determinants/thecommission/finalreport/en/ [accessed 6 Sept 2017]

⁶⁹⁴ Ibidem.

⁶⁹⁵ Whitehead M, Pennington A, Orton L, Nayak S, et al. How could differences in ‘control over destiny’ lead to socio-economic inequalities in health? A synthesis of theories and pathways in the living environment. Health & Place. 2016;39:51-61. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.healthplace.2016.02.002>

⁶⁹⁶ ‘How are communities tackling poor reputations of local neighbourhoods?’ Briefing for ESRC Festival of Social Science Event. Available at: <http://www.lilac-healthequity.org.uk/> [accessed 6 Sept 2017]

⁶⁹⁷ See for example, Popay J et al, Community engagement in initiatives addressing the wider social determinants of health. A rapid review of evidence on impact, experience and process (2007) <https://www.nice.org.uk/guidance/PH9/documents/social-determinants-evidence-review-final2> poor experiences of previous engagement efforts by professionals or where communities perceive past funding (e.g. regeneration) to have had little impact.⁶⁹⁸

- 4.2. Lack of capacity in systems: Emphasis is typically placed in programmes on the capacity of lay communities to engage within society. However, successful engagement and partnerships requires action to release and also build the capacity of whole systems (people who live and work in an area for example and the institutions responsible for commissioning and delivering public and private sector services). This includes for instance action to develop appropriate skills and competencies of organisational staff; tackling a dominant professional service culture; the overall organisational ethos and culture; and the dynamics of the local and national political systems.⁶⁹⁹ For a model attempting to address these issues at the neighbourhood system level, see NIHR Collaboration for Leadership in Applied Health Research and Care for the North West Coast (under point 7).
- 4.3. Power dynamics between communities and agencies: The imbalances of power has been frequently neglected in engagement activities or programmes. Community scepticism and conflict may result from a lack of clarity or disagreement about the degree of influence that members of the public hold or should have with regard to decision making.^{700,701}
- 4.4. Influence of social context: Where initiatives aim to engage within a geographical setting, pre-existing social conditions/cohesion may affect the abilities of people living and working in an area to engage with each other. This is influenced by the extent communities have a shared sense of place, a shared history, or previous experience of engagement. Such factors can influence whether communities are willing to interact or feel able to come together around shared interests within their community. While such factors have traditionally been construed as barriers to participation, the process of engagement may, over time, result in new and

⁶⁹⁸ Orton L, Halliday E, Collins M, Egan M, Lewis S, Ponsford R, Powell K, Salway S, Townsend A, Whitehead M, Popay J. Putting context centre stage: evidence from a systems evaluation of an area based empowerment initiative in England. Critical Public Health. 2017 Aug 8;27(4):477-89.

<http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/09581596.2016.1250868>

⁶⁹⁹ Pickin C, Popay J, Staley K, Bruce N, Jones C, Gowman N. Developing a model to enhance the capacity of statutory organisations to engage with lay communities. Journal of Health Services Research & Policy. 2002 Jan 1;7(1):34-42. <http://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1258/1355819021927656>

⁷⁰⁰ Popay J, Whitehead M, Carr-Hill R, et al. The impact on health inequalities of approaches to community engagement in the New Deal for Communities regeneration initiative: a mixed-methods evaluation. Southampton (UK): NIHR Journals Library; 2015 Sep. (Public Health Research, No. 3.12.) Available from: www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK321028/ doi: 10.3310/phr03120

⁷⁰¹ Pickin, C. Popay, J. Staley, K. Bruce, N. Jones, C. Gowman, N. (2002) Promoting organisational capacity to engage with active lay communities: Developing a model to support organizational change For health, Health Service Research and Policy; 7 (1)34 – 46 strengthened social connections and cohesion as residents come together and engage with each other, and with other organisations.⁷⁰²

Response to Q12.

5. There is some evidence of health and social impacts for individuals and communities arising from civic involvement in initiatives aiming to involve communities in neighbourhood decision making. Particularly, there is evidence that engagement of citizens is an important element of successful action for cohesion in local communities. Evidence summaries are provided from public health studies of two English place based programmes (New Deal for Communities, Big Local) and a model of neighbourhood resilience being tested in the north west of England.

5.1. The New Deal for Communities (NDC) initiative was a government-funded programme introduced in 39 of the poorest neighbourhoods in England in 1998. The aim was to improve the social conditions and health of people living in these areas. Local residents had to be involved in planning and delivering NDC projects but they were engaged in different ways in different areas. Our research identified different approaches to civic participation ranging from those that gave residents considerable influence over NDC decision-making and build community capacity for engagement to those in which professionals were more likely to engage with residents more instrumentally to gain support for their organisation's agenda. The results show a mixed picture but the general pattern in these results suggests that, in those NDC areas in which residents had the greatest influence over NDC decisions and opportunities to participate, local people were more likely to report that the NDC had improved the area, and that relationships in the community, levels of trust and mental health had improved over time than residents in areas in which they had less influence.⁷⁰³

5.2. Over the longer term, however, pressures faced by the NDC programme to deliver 'early wins' and the initiative's top-down performance system appeared to create a disempowering environment at odds with a more gradual community development process needed for true empowerment and engagement to evolve. NDC local programmes that appeared to retained their commitment to an ethos of civic engagement and community influence over time were able to draw on organisational 'resources' that protected or enabled this ethos to be sustained (e.g. strong leadership committed to empowerment values) in the face of governmental pressures to spend funding and show results.⁷⁰⁴

⁷⁰² Orton et al. 2017.

⁷⁰³ Popay J, Whitehead M, Carr-Hill R, et al. Available from: <https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK321024/>

⁷⁰⁴ Popay J, Whitehead M, Carr-Hill R, et al. Available from: <https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK321019/>

6. The *Communities in Control (CiC) study*⁷⁰⁵ is assessing the health impact of the Big Local programme. Big Local is being rolled out in 150 areas in England with funding from the Big Lottery.⁷⁰⁶ The study's first two phases (2014/17) were funded by the NIHR School for Public Health Research (SPHR) and undertaken by a collaboration of five members of NIHR SPHR1 (the LiLaC collaboration between the universities of Liverpool and Lancaster, the universities of Sheffield and Exeter; The London School for Hygiene and Tropical Medicine; and Fuse; The Centre for Translational Research in Public Health). The findings reported here present an early assessment of the health and social impacts of programme that will continue to unfold over the longer term.

6.1. Impacts at the collective level arising from civic engagement: The study has identified numerous examples of the positive impact that the exercise of collective action by residents is having on the physical environment and on social relationships in Big Local areas. The findings also show how communities experiencing place-based stigma (which other research has shown to have negative impacts of life chances and quality of life) can take positive action to improve the reputation of their neighbourhood and the people who live there. Across these examples there is a common thread of how the process of taking actions around neighbourhood issues is resulting in the accrual or strengthening of community resources (e.g. social networks, physical and financial resources, power) within these local systems as residents take action themselves, collaborate with others or seek to gain a greater voice in, or influence decisions taken by others. On the other hand, the research also found examples of how 'feedback loops' can negatively impact: with collective action generating conflict and dampening confidence when residents' perceived their efforts (e.g. local projects or events) to have not been successful.

6.2. Individual level impacts of civic engagement: Longitudinal survey data from 15 Big Local areas has provided some evidence of improvements in subjective assessments of control and mental health among those residents most actively engaged in Big Local. While these findings are based upon a relatively small sample, this supports a hypothesis that empowerment of residents at the collective level may have positive effects on mental health and wellbeing for those who participate. However, impacts are complex. For example, residents most closely involved in Big Local activities also reported challenges and stress from participating in these collective decision making processes. In some cases, these experiences were reported to have had significant negative impacts on subjective feelings of wellbeing.⁷⁰⁷ In contrast, other residents reported that involvement, particularly social opportunities beyond core decision-making structures, had positively transformed their subjective wellbeing. This points to the need for initiatives to create multiple opportunities to increase the breadth and depth of participation and for evaluations to track the differential effects of these over time.

⁷⁰⁵ NIHR SPHR 'Communities in Control study', Available at: <http://sphr.nihr.ac.uk/health-inequalities/about-the-communities-in-control-study/> [accessed 6 sept 2017]

⁷⁰⁶ <http://www.localtrust.org.uk/>

⁷⁰⁷ NIHR SPHR (July 2017) Health Inequalities Research Programme: Communities in Control Study Phase 1 & Phase 2. Final report. Available from: j.popay@lancaster.ac.uk

7. NIHR Collaboration for Leadership in Applied Health Research and Care for the North West Coast: Promoting resilience at a systems level: Throughout the UK severe funding cuts are straining the capacity of local governments, Decreased public funding for services increases pressure on individuals and communities to cope with socioeconomic adversity without external support. Promoting individual or community resilience alone is not enough to reduce health inequalities locally. Enhanced resilience at a systems levels, underpinning engagement between paid workers, the institutions they are employed by and communities, has the potential to improve the social drivers of improvements in collective and individual health. The NIHR CLAHRC NWC has a programme of work focusing on developing system resilience in nine neighbourhoods in the North West of England. Features of this work include promoting more equal collaboration between residents, Local Authorities, community organisations and private sector organisations where appropriate to understand, and influence, action that can promote system resilience,⁷⁰⁸ as well as resident led local enquires to help plan for action and help evaluate the impact of changes put in place.⁷⁰⁹

8 September 2017

⁷⁰⁸ Porroche-Escudero A, Popay JM, Barr B, Mosedale SL, Ring A, Sadler G, Simpson G, Wheeler P. Systems resilience: improving public health through collaboration and community based participatory research. BMJ Open. 2017 Mar 6;7(Suppl.):A6. <http://dx.doi.org/10.1136/bmjopen-2017-016492.18>

⁷⁰⁹ CLAHRC NWC 'Evaluation under the spotlight for CLAHRC NWC Neighbourhoods for Learning.' Available at: <http://www.clahrc-nwc.nihr.ac.uk/news/article.php?title=134> [accessed 5 Sept 2017]

Project for the Registration of Children as British Citizens – written evidence (CCE0079)

Introduction

The Project for the Registration of Children as British Citizens (PRCBC) is a registered charitable company set up in November 2012 in order to raise awareness of registration and the importance of citizenship, as well as to support and increase the number of children and young adults who register as British citizens.⁷¹⁰ We have also encountered several examples of children and young people who acquired British citizenship by birth but are without a passport and facing significant barriers to securing Home Office recognition of their citizenship – particularly where a British or settled parent is no longer contactable or is estranged and refusing to cooperate.

In the near five years of its existence PRCBC has represented over 200 children and young people to register as British citizens, or obtain British passports to prove their status. It has dealt with over 20 judicial reviews of Home Office refusals to register British citizenship. So far all those that have concluded have led to the Home Office registering the child or young person as British. We have advised numerous other individuals and organisations in person, by phone and by email.

Our experience and other research show an increasing number of children and young people have been born and spent all their life in the UK but are not British citizens; and many others have spent all or most of their life that they can remember here. They feel completely British but are not yet formally citizens and face huge barriers to becoming citizens.⁷¹¹ Very many of these children and young people born in the UK are entitled to register as British citizens. This includes children born in the UK who are stateless and who have an entitlement to register as British citizens. Those children not born here, but whose future clearly lies in the UK, may be registered as British citizens at the discretion of the Home Office. Many of these children, their parents and carers, are unaware of these rights. Children entitled or otherwise able to claim British citizenship are in many cases wrongly described as ‘migrants’ and their need for formal recognition wrongly treated as a matter to be solved by pursuing an immigration status. Depriving them of British citizenship, however, leaves them in a precarious position, subject to immigration law powers for many years and, in several cases, at risk of losing a right to register as British altogether.

The barriers to obtaining citizenship are many:

⁷¹⁰ More information about PRCBC on our website, <https://prcbc.wordpress.com>

⁷¹¹ For example, COMPAS, at http://www.compas.ox.ac.uk/media/PR-2012-Undocumented_Migrant_Children.pdf and executive summary at http://www.compas.ox.ac.uk/media/PR-2012-Undocumented_Migrant_Children_Executive_Summary.pdf

- Information – many children and young people, and their families, do not know they are not British and, therefore, do not find out about how they might be able to become British
- Legal advice – following the implementation of the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, legal aid is not available for advice and representation (unless exceptional case funding is secured) on British nationality law, even for lone children, and many lawyers are insufficiently familiar with it, meaning it can be hard to find out that a right to register exists
- Home Office practice – decision-making is poor, unnecessary evidential demands are made and the Home Office often fails to act on information it already holds that would confirm citizenship or an entitlement to it (e.g. the fact of a parent’s British citizenship or settled status) meaning expert legal assistance is often needed
- Fees – the fee for a child seeking to register as a British citizen is £973, well over the £386 the Home Office states it costs to process a registration claim. This means that at least 60% of a child’s registration fee is purely profit.⁷¹² There is no provision for fee waivers and the fee is not refunded if the application is refused. There are other or additional fees that may apply in individual cases.⁷¹³
- Good character – children over 10 have to satisfy the Home Office they are ‘of good character’ even when they would otherwise be entitled to citizenship. The current Home Office policy applied to children applying to register whether by entitlement or discretion is the same policy guidance as for adult migrants wishing to naturalise as British citizens.⁷¹⁴ The normal provisions of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 do not apply in relation to nationality and

⁷¹² See PRCBC and Amnesty International-UK joint Briefings on fees, April 2017:

<https://prcbc.wordpress.com/why-are-children-not-being-registered/>

⁷¹³ Requesting a review of a Home Office refusal is £321; confirmation of British citizenship is £234; British passport fee for a child is £46.

⁷¹⁴ This has been raised as a serious concern in a recent report by the Independent Chief Inspector of Borders and Immigration (ICIBI) Report: A short inspection of the Home Office’s application of the good character requirement in the case of young persons who apply for registration as British citizens:

<http://icinspector.independent.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/07/A-short-inspection-of-the-Home-Office—s-application-of-the-good-character-requirement1.pdf>

See also Home Office response to the Independent Chief Inspector’s report: ‘A Short Inspection of the Home Office’s application of the good character requirement in the case of young persons who apply for registration as British citizens’ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/home-office-response-to-the-report-a-short-inspection-of-the-home-offices-application-of-the-good-character-requirement-in-the-case-of-young-persons> immigration matters,⁷¹⁵ so any caution or conviction as a child can always be considered even after it is treated as spent.

This is the background from which PRCBC is responding to parts of the Committee's questions 1 and 2.

Question 1

In PRCBC's experience, British citizenship is of considerable importance to a child and young person's identity. This is the case both when a child who considers and believes themselves to be British discovers that she or he is not, and when that child or young person is then registered as British. In the intervening period, the sense of not belonging is palpable for a child or young person who discovers themselves to be excluded from rights, recognition and opportunities that she or he had anticipated and which are possessed by her or his peers.

For someone who was born in the UK, or brought to this country at a young age and who may have no recollection of any other place, this feeling of exclusion may be especially powerful.

When PRCBC represents older children, who have grown up here registering as British, we ask them to write to explain why they want to become British. Some of the statements made by these children are reproduced below:

"British citizenship is very important for me because not having it has held me back a lot and prevented me from going on journeys with sports teams or even being a part of them. I feel like I can make the most out of having it and contribute to the country in the future. I should have British citizenship as I am a boy who is very integrated and comfortable in British society and as there are no other places I could possibly call home. I should have it in order to better my life and contribute to Britain in the future."

16-year-old boy, parents from Nigeria, lived in UK since he was two

"Becoming a British citizen is very important for me as this would help me in my plans to study Accounting and Finance in a university. Also accounting companies such as KPMG requires its employees to have unlimited status within the UK, without the citizenship I will not be able to pursue my dreams therefore I would feel I have failed in life. Also, I am very British from heart therefore I always feel awful that I don't have a British citizenship and when people find out that I do not hold a British citizenship some people instantly see me as an alien and treat me as if am a lesser of a person."

17-year-old girl, parents from Pakistan, lived in UK since she was six

⁷¹⁵ Section 56A of UK Borders Act 2007, inserted by section 140 of the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, at <http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2007/30/section/56A>

“As I am not a British citizen, I have felt insecure amongst my friends. Despite being fully integrated within the community and having the same upbringing as them, I feel that I am not seen as sharing the same identity as them. I feel uncomfortable explaining my situation to other people because my friends would expect me to have citizenship already and they would find it unusual if I don’t ... if I was a British citizen I would feel more at ease around other people my age. It is important for me be granted British citizenship now so I can feel that I have a rightful place in the country where I grew up and so that I can maintain my current friendships and study. I want to become British because this will bring me more stability in my life. If I was British I would be able to continue my life in the country that I grew up in and remains my home.”

17-year-old girl, parents from India, lived in UK since she was four

“I believe that I am integrated into British society, my understanding of life in the UK, UK society and the UK Economics mean that in the future I hope I will be a valuable asset to the UK. I intend to use all knowledge gained and yet to gain to acquire a job where I will be able to be an active citizen of British society. I intend to continue to grow up here, purchase my own home as well, raise my family in this country as work here.”

17-year-old boy, parents from Nigeria, lived in UK since he was four

“I only imagine my future living in this country, and this is my only home. ... I want to become a doctor to help people from all over the world who live or visit the U.K. ... I am an optimistic and social person but sometimes I do feel worried and stressed out having only been granted Leave to Remain and not British citizenship. I believe that I should be granted British citizenship as I am already integrated into British society and have been living here since I was a child.”

17-year-old girl, parents from Pakistan, lived in UK since she was five

Question 2

British citizenship is not solely acquired by birth or attained through naturalisation. Children’s rights to register as British citizens are not well known and have long been and continue to be overlooked or ignored. This is at the heart of why tens of thousands of children and young people are effectively deprived of British citizenship to which very many are entitled, and others could secure, by registration. There are several reasons why it is vital the Committee does not replicate this oversight. Firstly, children cannot naturalise. They may register as British citizens. Secondly, and especially important, naturalisation is a matter of discretion whereas for the majority of affected children registration is a statutory right. Whereas the Home Office policy and practice consistently fail to understand or respect the distinction, naturalisation is intrinsically linked to immigration status. Registration is not. Settled status (indefinite leave to remain) is a precondition for naturalisation. Registration by entitlement is of persons born in the UK. Not only have such persons no need for an immigration status, they are not migrants. Thirdly, failing to recognise registration rights of children and young people, or to distinguish this from immigration and adult naturalisation, repeatedly leads to situations in which children's rights are simply overlooked either because their rights are not recognised as independent of parents or guardians or their citizenship rights are never considered; or both.

The foregoing is a vital consideration, which should underpin the Committee's consideration of citizenship. We do not make submissions on the other questions on which the Committee are consulting. However, if rights to register as British are not kept firmly in mind, there is a very real risk the Committee will make recommendations in relation to such concepts as 'civic engagement', 'active citizenship', 'rights and responsibilities', which would further exclude and deprive children of British citizenship, including where it is their statutory right.

Any such result would be a serious blow to these children's best interests, which are already very far from respected, leaving many children and young people in the UK to suffer various deprivations, exclusions and risks by reason of their not having British citizenship even when born in the UK and entitled to obtain it. A child or young person may be deprived of the opportunity to hold a British passport, and thereby to travel overseas. She or he may be excluded from free healthcare, lawful employment, rented accommodation, social assistance or a student loan. She or he may be unable to vote or to pass on British citizenship to her or his child. She or he may be at risk of immigration powers, policies and practices including powers to detain, remove or deport her or him; or being required to make repeated applications for short periods of leave to remain for many years, potentially at significant cost and at risk of prohibitive changes to rules or fees. For many these concerns become increasingly acute at or as adulthood approaches, but for some the impact may be at a much younger age.

Our recommendations

A key over-arching recommendation for the Committee, therefore, is to remove or mitigate the existing barriers to tens of thousands of children and young people in the UK exercising their rights to register as British, and thus to fuller participation in society. This could be done by:

Recommendation 1

The Home Office should ensure that children's best interests are a primary consideration in its nationality decision-making, and its statutory duty to promote the welfare of children is actively respected in this area of its work.

Recommendation 2

The Home Office should ensure that it does not impose unnecessary and inappropriate evidential hurdles in policy or practice to children exercising their right to register as British or to securing a passport or other formal recognition of their British citizenship. The Home Office should also facilitate a child's right to British citizenship where it can confirm matters material to the child's entitlement from its own records (e.g. confirming the nationality or settled status of a parent).

Recommendation 3

The Home Office should ensure that its consideration of the 'good character' requirement in children's British citizenship registration respects and relates to the circumstances of children, and does not merely replicate its application of this requirement in adult's registration or naturalisation cases. Parliament should consider removing this requirement for children's registration or raising the age at which it applies.

Recommendation 4

The profit element should be removed from children's registration fee in all cases, including where their right to register continues into adulthood. There should be a waiver of the fee for children who cannot afford it.

Recommendation 5

Where a child is 'looked after' by a local authority, there should be a fee exemption. This would prevent the shifting of costs from central to local government.

Recommendation 6

There should be active and effective promotion of the rights of children to register as British citizens.

Recommendation 7

There should be legal aid available for children to receive advice and assistance in relation to their citizenship rights.

Solange Valdez-Symonds

Director and solicitor

6 September 2017

Pupils 2 Parliament – written evidence (CCE0258)

Summary

- The views of 281 primary school children aged 9 to 11 are reported.
- 72% knew they were British Citizens, 8% that they were not British citizens. One in five children (20%) did not know whether or not they were British Citizens.
- 80% of the children were very proud or quite proud to be British or living in Britain.
- Most usual reasons for being proud were freedom, safety, equality and the NHS . Most usual reasons for not being proud were the weather, terrorism, and hearing bad news.
- The twelve top rights the children thought child citizens of Britain should have were education, housing, to give their opinions, clean water, food, freedom, a right to vote, family, medical treatment, the right to play, and not to be taken into slavery.
- The top nine duties and responsibilities children thought child citizens have were to keep to the law, help others, help clean at home, do chores, not to litter, look after their pets, respect others' faiths and religions, help and care for friends, and keep themselves safe.
- The communities children told us most frequently that they felt they belonged to were their sports clubs or teams, their group of friends, their school, and their non-sports clubs and groups.
- 71% of the children said that their opinions as a child were a little, or not much, taken notice of.
- The three top British values identified by the children were taking responsibility for each other, caring, and democracy.
- The three top ways children currently engage in helping other people were helping someone they come across that needs help, donating to charity, and taking part in events for charity. The top ways children would like to be able to help others were helping people with MS, raising money for charity, helping homeless people, and giving food to a food bank.

Pupils 2 Parliament – written evidence (CCE0258)

- 60% of the 9 to 11 year olds asked intend to vote in elections when they reach voting age.
- Ceremonial events made 53% of the children feel more proud of Britain, but did not make 45% more proud.
- Of seven key elements of primary school citizenship education, the two that children considered they had learned and understood best were about people's different religions, cultures and backgrounds, and how to work out what is true and fake in what the media and social media tell us. The two that children considered they had learned and understood least were how Parliament and Councils work, and how to research and find out for themselves what is happening in the country and the wider world.

Introduction

1. This report is a formal submission to the House of Lords Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee, in response to its inquiry on citizenship and civic engagement.
2. The report is from Pupils 2 Parliament, a project to enable school pupils to consider and feed in their views to parliamentary, national government and national body public consultations and inquiries. The project has been approved by the Clerks of both Houses of Parliament to use the term 'Parliament' in its title.
3. Pupils 2 Parliament aims to bring the particular viewpoint of children and young people to those conducting inquiries and consultations - plus the uniquely fresh and often challenging analysis that children and young people bring to decisions and policies.
4. The project also gives school pupils the chance to learn about and consider key issues and decisions being made by parliament, national government and public bodies, and genuinely to participate in democracy by feeding their views into real national decisionmaking.
5. Pupils' views are independently gathered through discussions with groups of pupils led by someone from Pupils 2 Parliament, usually with a member of school staff taking notes of the pupils' views. We use information from the relevant consultation or inquiry document to explain the issues. We specialise in putting the issues and questions even-handedly, without leading pupils in any way or suggesting any responses. All views come spontaneously from pupils, with no adult prompt on what they might say.
6. The information we gave to pupils about this inquiry came from the documents on the parliament website. The topics we asked the pupils about to find out what they thought they had learned well and understood from citizenship education at school, were selected from the list of objectives given by the Department for Education for Key Stage 2 in primary schools.

7. I am grateful to the staff of the Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee for their wish to receive and consider a report of pupils views from Pupils 2 Parliament on this subject outside the formal public consultation period, so that we could gather children's views in school term time. We agreed the questions we asked pupils with the Committee's policy staff, and added some they asked us to put to children, to make sure that we were asking questions that would be useful to the Committee.
8. This report contains all pupil views given, without selection, comment or addition. The views reported are entirely pupils' own views, and nothing but pupils' views.
9. Views in the report came from 281 primary school pupils aged 9 to 11, in 9 focus groups across 8 schools. These were Belle Vue Primary School, Stourbridge; St George's CE Primary School, Clun; Eardisley CE Primary School; Gig Mill Primary School, Stourbridge (two groups), Hob Green Primary School, Stourbridge; Orleton CE Primary School; Staunton-on-Wye Endowed Primary School; and Stokesay Primary School, Craven Arms.
10. This report represents the vital perspectives of child citizens on central issues of citizenship and civic engagement, both as present citizens and as future voters, and I hope that their views will provide the Select Committee with a serious and valuable input to their deliberations.

Knowing whether you are a British citizen

11. We wished to know how many of the pupils were sure they were British citizens, how many were sure they were not British citizens although living in Britain, and, importantly, how many children were not sure of their own citizenship.
12. Out of 270 9-11 year old children answering this question, 80% knew what country they were citizens of, but 20% were not sure of this. 72% said they were British citizens, and 8% that they were not.
13. Some of the reasons for uncertainty about citizenship were being unsure about which UK countries counted as 'British' (for example, could one be both Welsh and British at the same time – which of those was one's country?), having one or both parents from different countries than Britain, and exactly where the boundaries of a country such as England were in the borderland with Scotland.

How proud are children of being British?

14. We asked all the children how proud they were of being British or of living in Britain.
15. Of 256 children who answered this question, a large majority (80%) said they were very or quite proud to be British or living in Britain. 20% were not really proud or definitely not proud. The most common answer was, from almost half the children (49%), was to be quite proud.
16. We invited children to give us examples of why they felt proud or not proud to be British or living in Britain.
17. Some children said they felt proud to be British, but were not really sure why. It was just that it was their country. It was also where they have their families. One felt proud because they had friends in a different part of the country. Some children just felt proud of Britain because they had been born part of it.
18. One reason for being proud of Britain was that we have more freedom and rights here than in many other countries. It is a free country. It is an independent country. You have of course to keep to the laws and rules in Britain, but these have been “set fair” compared to many other countries. A view linked to this was that “Parliament makes good choices”.
19. Some said they were proud that Britain is a country where people are not always judged for being in a minority group. The country is fair and not racist, and the colour of your skin doesn’t matter.
20. Children also said that we have more safe food and clean water compared with other countries, and more housing and hotels than some countries. We also have farms with sheep and cattle. Britain is also quite a wealthy country. These made them feel proud.
21. Other children said they felt proud because they had what they needed in Britain, including important things like shelter. Yet others felt proud of Britain because there have not been any recent wars here. Not having many natural disasters in Britain, such as earthquakes, tsunamis and tornadoes, made some feel proud.

22. Having a good army was also given as a reason for being proud of Britain, so was how the armed forces had protected the country's people in World War II, and how we are an island country surrounded by sea and with a strong navy. There was a view that Britain sticks up for itself.
23. Some children were also proud because animals are usually well treated in Britain; "we take them seriously and try to look after them".
24. Another reason for being proud was that Britain has achieved a lot compared with other similar countries, and one child said that having the Olympics and sports competitions had made them feel proud. English has become one of the most known languages in the world. Britain had once owned a lot of the world. Some however said that they felt less proud because they felt the country had not achieved very much.
25. Having big cities in Britain with lots of attractions in them made you feel proud.
26. Other children felt proud to be British because of our NHS and ambulance services, which everyone can use for free. You don't have to pay to get help from a doctor. However, as with many of the points raised, the health service counted both ways. Another view was that lack of doctors and the long hours junior doctors have to work were reasons for feeling less proud of being British.
27. Having special landmarks was given as another reason for being proud of Britain, as was Britain having "a lot of nice people". It is a "nice place to live". Some felt proud of the area where they lived. One child summed it up when they said they were "proud of the area that I live in and the people that live there". A further reason was that Britain does a lot to raise money, and things like clothing, to help people elsewhere in the world. Britain is also free of most deadly or poisonous creatures. For many reasons, Britain feels a safe country to be in.
28. One common reason for not being proud, or being less than very proud, was the British weather, and how cold and wet it is.
29. Another common reason was the amount of litter left around the country. Some said there is too much pollution. One said there is too much smoking of tobacco.
30. A further reason for not being so proud of Britain was that there are no large wild animals here. Another was the state of the economy; "we're getting into minus numbers of money". The fact that not everyone has housing made one less proud of the country. A different view in another group was that we build too many houses in some places but we don't always focus on the schools that are needed. In one group we heard that voting to leave the EU was a reason for being less proud of Britain, because prices had started rising.

31. Not having wars in Britain had made some proud, given that some countries had been suffering from wars for many years. But there was also the view that the country might be in the middle of a war soon, and that made you less proud of your country.
32. A few children did not feel proud of Britain because of other people coming into the country from other countries.
33. Another thing that made some proud made others not proud. Having nice people in Britain had been said to make some proud of the country. One child said "we are a small country, but we are still here and help each other". Another thought that "even though there are lots of drugs around, everybody is happy and cheerful". But in another group there was a view that people aren't so nice to other people, which made you less proud to be British. In yet another group a reason for not being proud was that there are "nasty people around". There were also bad people coming in with deadly weapons. One child said "I didn't say I am extremely proud because I've been living in Britain most of my life, but people haven't always been kind to me".
34. Other things that made children not proud of being British or living in Britain were the bad state of the roads, the way different people get treated in different ways, and the problem of people attacking those who don't believe the same things they do. The fact that this keeps happening made some children feel that the police and others were not doing much to stop it, and that made them less than proud to be in Britain.
35. Terrorist attacks were a big factor for many children. For some, recent terrorist attacks in Britain, in places like London and Manchester, and the fact that Britain wasn't able to stop these, made them less proud to be British or living in Britain. "I'm not really proud because people in Britain hurt people – there are terrorists and I don't feel people are doing enough about it", "I'm proud to be living in Britain, but lots of things have been happening, like people being harmed, and we're not doing much about it". But for others, having fewer terrorist attacks than some other countries was a reason for being proud to be British. One view was that we can be proud that Britain has clear gun laws, which not all countries do.

36. Hearing so much bad news all the time about things in Britain made you feel less proud of the country.
37. Some children gave us reasons for being in the middle about pride in Britain. One said they were “proud as I know the language and was born here, but on the other hand I want to go to different countries and speak different languages”. Another said that they were happy to live in Britain, and that was better than living in some countries with poor conditions, but they weren’t proud of living here; “I could be just as happy in France or Germany”. The same point was made in another group; living in Britain is “just as good as living anywhere else”.

What rights do children believe they have as British Child Citizens?

38. We defined ‘rights’ as things all children should get whenever they need it, things all children should be allowed to do, things no child should be made to do, things all children should be allowed to know, and things all children should be saved or protected from.
39. We asked children to put forward rights they thought all children living in Britain should have, whether these were rights they already have, or new rights children wanted to propose. Some schools were UNICEF Rights Respecting Schools (and taking part in Pupils 2 Parliament counted towards that award), others were not. Many children knew about the list of children’s rights in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Many others had not.
40. These were the top eleven rights put forward by the most children (in order with the most frequent first):
- To go to school and have an education
 - To live in a house or shelter
 - To say what you think and give your own opinion (including on the rules you have to follow)
 - To have clean water
 - To have food
 - The right to be free
 - The right to vote in national votes and elections
 - To have and stay with your family
 - To have medicines and medical treatment by doctors or in hospital
 - The right to play
 - Not to be taken into slavery.

41. Here is a number of quotes from children, summing up their views of general children's rights:

"I have the right to be me", "the right to be what you want to be", "the right to company and love", "the right to enjoy our lives while we have them", "the right to be free and happy and not worry about bad things and enjoy", "the right to live life as a normal person", "the right to go out and not get hurt", "children should have the right to do what they want to do within reason".

42. Here is the complete list of other rights, which were each put forward by one or two children. They are in no special order. The list is very long, but we have not left out anything that even only one child put forward. We hope it is a good resource showing the huge range of possible future children's rights that have been put forward by children themselves:

to know about the timeline of British history, to go anywhere and not to be worried about attacks, to do what we want with our own money, to go into any country without being stopped, to have a name, if you are fostered or adopted, the right to know that and who your parents are, not always to be bossed around and not always to have to do whatever an adult tells you to do, not to be blamed for something by an adult on the basis of what other children say, not to be given homework, to ride a horse on a bridle path, not to be harassed by motorists when riding a horse as a child, not to have other children or adults going onto your property, to have a brief period of free time if you are stopped from playtime with others, the right to pass examinations, rights about everything, children and animals should have the same rights to medicines they need, to have a home, even if it isn't with your own parents, to have transport, to rest and relax, to be warm, to have fun, to have and choose clothes, the right to help other people, to have choices, to have luxuries, to have help when you need it, to have dental treatment, to have electricity, to be healthy, to go on holiday, to go shopping, to have first aid, to be heard and listened to by adults, not to be abused, to be treated well, to keep cows (a right shared with adults and families), to have friends, to have help from the emergency services, to have pocket money, to be able to get money from the bank and to do jobs to earn money, not to have to go to work, to help look after your parents' animals, to be gay, to have a good environment, to believe in a religion or certain thing, the right to know and say what your rights are, the right to take responsibilities, to have fewer but longer school holidays and terms, the right to choose who to speak to about problems and not to have to speak to just anybody, the right sometimes to do just what you want to do without being controlled by one person or group of people or by adults, the right to some time alone when you want, not to be bossed about by other people than your parents and teachers, not to be pushed against your will or forced to do things, not to be made to fight in a war, not to do any dangerous jobs, to have a guardian, to have your views respected, to have health checks, to sleep, the right to follow your dreams, children have the right to be as respected as other citizens, to be kept safe and protected, to have parents who understand and obey the laws about child cruelty, not to be hit or hurt by parents, guardians or anyone else, not to be shouted at by teachers, to be taught by parents why you need to stay away from strangers - from a very early age (one and a half to two), to experience a day in the life of an adult, to be kept safe while travelling, to choose your own sports and activities, privacy, not to have people smoking near you, not to be treated cruelly, to know what is going on around the world, to wear your own style of clothes, to have the chance to do what you want to do, to be allowed to play football, walk your dog, and play other ball games in local parks and other local places - without notices saying 'no ball games', to have lower age and height limits for many fun activities, and children have the right to be noticed a bit more.

43. One child said that children should have the right to have adults accept that part of being a child is to be annoying.
44. One child asked a key question about citizenship: "are the British Values rights?"
45. On the right for children to be noticed a bit more, one child summed this up by saying "children should be noticed a bit more – on the news, it is always about adults". They wanted the news to cover the world of children more.

What duties and responsibilities do children believe they have as British Child Citizens?

46. After discussing rights, we asked children what duties and responsibilities they thought all children living in Britain should have – what being a British citizen or living in Britain means you should do as a child.
47. These were the top nine duties and responsibilities put forward by the most children (in order with the most frequent first):
 - To keep to the law
 - To help other people
 - To help clean at home (including toilets!)
 - To do your chores
 - Not to litter – put your litter in bins

- To look after your pets
- To respect other people's faiths and religions □ To help and care for your friends
□ To keep yourself safe.

48. Quotations summing up some of the responsibilities of children were:

“give when you can”, “always believe in yourself”, “when old enough to go out on your own, be responsible”, “do what you can”, “don’t be nasty to your friends, be nice to them”, “appreciate one another”, “if someone has annoyed you, don’t take it out on others”, “respect others’ lives”, “don’t be influenced to do bad things”, “help ensure people do the right thing”, “be nice to each other, be kind, look after the world, don’t litter”, “treat others how you would like them to treat you”, “our duty is to look after people and not to harm anyone”, “respect everyone even if they don’t respect you”, “make sure you know the laws, so that you don’t break them because you don’t know”, “don’t make fun of people’s backgrounds and where they come from”, “be kind to everyone, no matter who they are”, “don’t make fun of what people look like”, “respect people’s dreams”, “every child has responsibility for their own personality”.

49. Here is the complete list of other duties and responsibilities of children, which were each put forward by one or two children. They are in no special order. As with the list of rights put forward by the children, this list is very long, but we have not left out anything that even only one child put forward. As with the rights list, we hope it is a good resource showing the huge range of duties and responsibilities different children consider they have as child citizens:

Not to make fun of someone of a different colour, to respect others, not to abuse the environment, don’t steal vehicles, respect things that aren’t yours, look after others in your family, help look after younger children and be responsible in caring for them, to be respectful, not be mean, to appreciate people who are different from yourself, to be fair, not to be racist, not to make a big deal out of something small happening, not to accuse people wrongly of stealing, to be kind, to be democratic, respect what farmers have spent time and money to grow, respect people’s languages, only make criticisms that help people to do better, don’t judge people by things like the colour of their eyes, be truthful, go to school, to study, to help and look after one another, look after those around you and animals, do as you are told, listen, do your best in everything, do some school work when you are away on holiday, dress yourself, help when requested, follow rules, don’t bully people, respect each other’s thoughts, views and opinions, respect the right of teachers to teach you, to eat and not waste food that you have bought, pick up litter, keep your teacher busy so that they keep teaching their pupils, to be given and to do your homework, be grateful for the food you have, take notice of what your parents say and ask you to do “within reason” (that is as long as they are not asking you to do something that you know is wrong), obey British Values, accept that teachers have a duty to look after their pupils, to get out of your room and away from your screen and play outdoors, help injured animals you come across, look after the environment, never to kill anyone, never to get into a stranger's white van, to look after yourself, to look after your own stuff and belongings, not to destroy other people's property, not to smoke, not to get into fights, be responsible and get a job, represent your country, try not to do anything bad, be responsible for your friends, be responsible for your own privacy, respect your teachers and other people who try to do their best for you, don't hack, don't damage people's houses set fire to houses or break their windows, report a dangerous bug if you find one, don't steal from people or shops, respect animals be responsible towards them and feed them if they need it, don't kidnap and keep a stray animal that has identification on it, tidy your room, be happy, remember your homework, get yourself and your stuff prepared to get to school, be responsible for your own hygiene and health, not to smoke unless you are over the legal age, cross roads safely, take responsibility for your own money and spend it properly, be responsible for your own actions, help your parents.

- 50. In one group we heard the view that there is a duty on everyone not to make harm and attacks on people get worse by the way we react; "even though people harm us, it doesn't mean we have to harm them back".
- 51. One child said that although children have the right to freedom, they also have a duty not to abuse this right; "don't overdo the right to freedom because if you use it to break the law, you will lose your freedom by being in jail".

The communities children belong to

- 52. We defined 'communities' as groups of people you belong to, outside your family or the household you live in. These could be groups of people you spend time with or do things with, or wider groups of people across your local area or across the whole country that you feel you are part of, even if there are too many for you ever to meet them all. Children could tell us about more than one group or community where they felt they belonged. We have reported below all the communities or groups that children told us they felt they belonged to.
- 53. The type of community children most often felt they belonged to was a sports club or team. 28% felt they strongly belonged in their sports clubs or teams. The most usual of these sports communities was a football club, team or squad, or a football development academy. Others included rugby, hockey, running, fencing, cricket, mountain biking, motocross, paintballing, golf, netball, basketball, athletics, trampoline, swimming, martial arts, karate, boxing, dirt biking, kick boxing, British Gymnastics and dodgeball clubs and teams. There were special elements of being part of a team, for example the fact that team members all “communicate during games”.

54. While many spoke of being part of a team that work together and help each other, many also spoke of feeling part of the wider sporting community of all the people taking part in their sport.
55. Some told us they felt part of these communities, not only because they were groups sharing an interest or activity together, but because they had stronger links with the people they knew in the group. As one child put it, “I feel part of gymnastics because they help me”.
56. The second most common group children said they belonged to was their group of friends. 14% of children told us they felt they strongly belonged in a group of friends. As one put it, “I belong to my friends, who care about me”.
57. The third community children most commonly felt they belonged to was the community of their school. 11% of the children felt their school was a group they strongly belonged to. One said “school’s like a big family”. Others said they felt they most belonged to their school class or their school year.
58. Again, feeling you belonged to your school community went further than just being with people you felt you belonged with. It could include wider things your school gave you; “I feel like I belong to my school because I wouldn’t be this far in my life”.
59. Four children said they felt they were a part of the future community of children they would join next at school, either the next year above them, or, for two, the high school they would go to in the next school year. Two other children felt they belonged to the community of children younger than themselves, below their own year at school. Two children felt they still belonged to the community of their old school, and one to the community of the local cathedral school.
60. The fourth most common communities children felt they most belonged in were nonsports activity clubs. 10% of children told us they felt they strongly belonged in these. They included clubs for science, art, dance, Spanish, drama, dog training, sewing, gamers’ squads and ballet. Some of these were school or after school clubs, others were local clubs or activities outside school. One pupil told us they felt they still belonged to the community of the old dance group they used to attend.

61. The next most common community children felt they belonged to was a community of those learning and playing a musical instrument. This included those who felt they belonged to a music group or a group of instrument learners, but for some it went much further to include the wider community of all players of their instrument. Instruments the children played included brass instruments, the flute, guitar, drums, clarinet, and keyboard).
62. Again, one child told us they felt they still belonged as a part of the community of the old music school they used to attend.
63. Although this did not come from many children, there are clearly a few who feel that their main community, or one of their main communities, is that of a school, activity group or club that they used to go to in the past.
64. Some told us they felt they really belonged with the community of their teachers at school. They saw teachers with their pupils as a definite sort of community.
65. Eight children told us they felt they really belonged to the faith community of their Church or Mosque.
66. Six children told us they felt they really belonged to the community of England, one to the community of Scotland, one to the community of Ireland, one that they felt they belonged to the community of Britain. Five others told us they felt they belonged to the community of the whole world. One said they felt they belonged to the community of “everyone”. One child said “I feel I’m part of England ‘cos no-one says to get out”.
67. Five children told us they felt they really belonged to a group on YouTube.
68. Other communities that smaller numbers of children felt they belonged to were: supporters of particular football clubs, atheists, the community of heaven, children in speech, language, maths and reading support groups, the farming community, the community of their parent’s military friends, video gaming groups, Scouts, Guides, Beavers, Brownies and former Brownies. Many of these included belonging to the wider community across the world, as well as the particular local group they were part of.
69. Other communities were given by just one child each. Here is the full list of communities they told us they belonged to, listed in no special order: the community of Parliament, the community led by the Queen and Prime Minister, the community of all children, the people of Africa, people who play X-Box, the community of horse lovers, the family of their activity instructor, the family of their football coach, ‘the people who care for me’, the people of the county I live in, the people of the valley I live in, the community of my village, the skiing community, people who wear glasses, people who feel they have special needs, England rugby supporters, the eco community, a movie theatre group, and the community of all animal lovers. One child listed a number of international cities and communities they felt a link with.

- 70. Even though we had asked about communities outside their own families, some children still told us how important it was to belong to a family. One of these children wrote to us; “I belong to my family because they guide me through hard things each day”.
- 71. In some groups, children asked if communities had to be groups of people. Some told us they felt they really felt belonging when they were with animals, such as their dogs, horses, household pets, or animals on farms they lived on. One child from a farm wrote; “I feel like I belong with my sheep, because they make me happy!”

How much notice do children think is taken of their opinions?

- 72. The international list of children’s rights (the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child) says children have the right to have their say on things that affect them, and to have their opinions taken seriously. So we wanted to find out how much children thought their opinions really are taken notice of, across all aspects of their lives.
- 73. Out of the 233 children who answered this question, 16% said their opinions are very much taken notice of, 38% that they are taken notice of a little, 33% that they are not taken notice of much, and 13% that their opinions are not at all taken notice of. The two most usual answers were that children’s opinions were a little, or not much, taken notice of. Overall 71% said their opinions were either a little or not much taken notice of.
- 74. One child summed this up for many when they said that in this country “our opinions don’t matter, only adults’ views matter”.

What are British Values?

- 75. We asked children to tell us what they saw as “British values” – things that made people British, things that everyone living in Britain should share, think are important and support.
- 76. Some of our groups had discussed British Values as part of their citizenship at school, and there was a list of British Values on the wall in one classroom we met in. In this question, we asked children to tell us what they themselves thought were the most important British Values, whether these were ones they had learned about in school, or were ones they had come up with for themselves.
- 77. Our groups were less certain about what they saw as British values than they were about the rights, duties and responsibilities of children living in Britain. They put forward fewer values than they had put forward rights, duties and responsibilities.
- 78. The top three values put forward by our groups, in order with the one given to us by the most children first, were:
- Mutual respect
 - Caring
 - Democracy and voting.
- 79. These other values (not in any particular order) each came from two or more children:
- Fundraising and charity
 - Equality
 - Individual liberty and freedom
 - Rule of law
 - Kindness
 - Tolerance □ Joyfulness.
- 80. These values (not in any special order) came from one child each: paying your way (paying bills and for your house, taxes, fuel, and rentals), the monarchy, courage, tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs, determination, friendship, perseverance, thankfulness, politeness, engagement, love, helping the poor, honesty, teamwork, happiness – and tea and crumpets.
- 81. On equality, some things were definitely British values, but still need working on. One boy said everyone should be equal, but there were still big inequalities to deal with, such as the fact that women footballers don’t get paid as much as men players.

82. On honesty, one child said that the spread of terrorism is based on dishonesty and people not owning up to knowing about things.
83. On democracy, one child said that “everyone has to have democracy in their lives”.
84. Tea and crumpets were put on the list because they define something basic about being English.
85. The view was put that a value is something more important than a law or anything else.

How are children involved with and for other people?

86. The Committee were particularly interested to hear what children do with others to help other people, and what more they would like to be able to do with others to help other people. We asked some of our groups to tell us what they did with others for others, outside their own families or households.
87. Although children were able to tell us about many sorts of activities they do, or would like to do, there were not so many activities done specifically to help other people, or done with others.
88. These are the things three or more children told us they did with others to help other people outside their own families or households:
 - Helping people you come across who need your help, for example if someone has fallen over or dropped their money or their shopping
 - Making donations to charity
 - Doing events (for example, sales, book stalls) to raise money for charity.
89. These ways of children already helping others each came from two children:
 - Making things to sell for charity
 - Helping run the school bank
 - Helping a disabled relative
 - Swimming gala or sponsored swims raising money □ Bike rides raising money.

90. Here is the complete list of things children told us they were doing to help other people: helping people who are struggling in some way, helping someone look for something they've lost, helping at a Scout group, serving on the School Council, helping friends with video games, run a race to raise money for charity or special causes like water aid, taking food and drink to people on the street (for example giving a homeless person a cake from a stall), helping teach other children to do tricks in a dance group, helping at swimming group, counting house points, tidying up, never littering the environment, helping make tea at a charity event, helping others through the 'classrooms in the cloud' scheme, raising money for poor people, asking a lonely child if they'd like to play, checking that a child sitting on their own in the playground is OK, helping neighbours carry their shopping into the house, giving money for the poor, helping friends, being a reading buddy to help children read, giving things to a charity store, sponsored walks, playing football for charity, giving someone directions, charity runs (and Colour Runs), going to visit someone who wants to see you even when you don't want to, helping at a care home, helping at a food bank, giving some Christmas money to help someone seriously ill, and "respecting friends and classmates".

91. As well as ways they currently helped people, two children wanted to tell us about ways they helped animals too, both generally helping animals and also doing things to help endangered animals in other countries.

92. We then asked some of our groups to tell us additional things they would like to be able to do with others to help other people. Here are the five things that each came from two or more children:

- Help people with MS
- Raise money for charity
- Help homeless people
- Give food for a food bank
- Generally help people that need your help

93. Other things that each came from just one child were: a sale at school to raise money to help people, helping people with mental health problems, a bake sale for charity, helping a very ill relative more, help my country, helping old people, help to get smoking outlawed, help to stop terrorist attacks, help other people to sky dive, help save lives, help people who have been slaves, visit a poor country to help build classrooms there, go to Africa to help provide food and water, encourage people to do sports instead of watching TV, a Macmillan bike ride, a run to raise money, help people with balancing problems to ride a bike, start a company in the future and give money from it to charity, help police and ambulance people to stay safe, help people who haven't had an education, help evacuated children, a sponsored rugby match, raise money through a motocross club, pass an unexpired car park ticket on to someone else, help people who don't have much help, help my country in the Army, give out Christmas presents at the hospital.

94. Again, even though we had asked children to tell us of things they would like to be able to do to help other people, some told us of things they would like to be able to do to help animals. These were to become an animal physiotherapist, to help injured and endangered animals such as rhinos, to act as a guard to endangered animals such as giraffes, and to become a pilot transporting sick or injured animals.

95. On raising money to help other people, one child said they would like to “do something I like for a long period of time to raise money”.

Will children vote in elections when they reach voting age?

96. Voting in elections and referendums when an adult is a key part of citizenship. We asked all 281 children in our groups whether they thought they would, or would not, usually vote in elections when they became 18. Children answered this question by putting tokens into ‘yes’ or ‘no’ money boxes.

97. 60% of the children answered that they thought they would usually vote in elections when they reached voting age. 37% of the children answered that they did not think they would usually vote in elections once they reached voting age. Six children abstained.

98. We hope it will be useful to the Committee to know that the intention to vote in the future stands at 60% of the 9 to 11 year olds asked. (This may perhaps be compared with the regular findings for those aged 18 – 24 in the Hansard Society’s Audit of Political Engagement).

99. We also hope that this information will be helpful in thinking about citizenship education, which the Committee’s staff have said is of particular interest to the Committee.

Do ceremonial events make children feel more proud to be British?

100. One of the questions asked in the Committee’s inquiry was whether ceremonial events make people more proud to be British. We asked all 281 children whether seeing or taking part in local or national ceremonial events made them feel more proud to be British or living in Britain. We explained that this was different to whether or not they enjoyed the events.

101. Just over half the children (53%) felt more proud of being British or living in Britain because of ceremonial events.

102. 45% said that ceremonial events do not make them more proud. Four children abstained on this question.

Children's involvement in decisions

103. The Committee is interested to know about how far children take part in making decisions outside their own families or the households where they live. We asked the children in some of our groups to give us examples of decisions they do have a say in outside their family or household, and then to tell us of any other sorts of decisions they thought they don't have a say in but thought they should have a say in.

104. Here is the full list of decisions children did have a say in outside their own families (not in any special order):

- Choosing your friends (this was the most frequent decision children made)
- Having a say on the school council
- Having your say by putting your opinions to your teacher
- Decisions when playing with friends
- Voting for Head Boy and Head Girl at school
- Voting for school House Captains
- Choosing sports Captains
- Choosing which motocross races your team takes part in
- Players' choice in football
- Choosing clubs to join
- Voting for members of the school council □ Having a say through Pupils 2 Parliament
- Having a say through a school suggestions box
- Choosing what to buy with your own money □ Designing cheerleader outfits for competitions □ Choosing your own shoes.

105. Here is the full list of decisions children did not have a say in, but thought they should have a say in outside their own families (again, not in any special order):

- Children's Mini-elections when the country votes
- Voting on who should become Prime Minister
- Having a say whenever someone tells you to do something

- Voting about school dinners
- Having a say in deciding how long you should play electronic games or on your phone
- In choosing your own sweets
- In choosing your own cheerleading class
- In choosing your own horse riding gear
- Choosing what to buy with your own money
- The decision on how much pocket money you should get
- Choosing where your motocross team races
- Taking part in more consultations
- What you want to do later on in your life
- Voting on who is right to look after the country
- Having a say in decisions about improving things at school
- Writing to the government to tell them our opinions and what as children we think they could do better.

What have children learned from their citizenship education at school?

106. The Committee’s staff asked us to find out from children how well they thought they had so far learned about citizenship at school. So we took seven key areas of citizenship education from the government’s list of things to learn in years 5 and 6 in primary school. (This is the Department for Education’s voluntary list of ‘objectives’ in Key Stage 2 Citizenship).

107. We went through those seven parts of citizenship with all of the children in our groups, and asked them to tell us whether they had learned each one well at school and now understood it.

108. Here is the list of the seven parts of citizenship we asked them about, with the ones children understood best at the top. In brackets after each one is the percentage of the 281 children who said they had learned and understood it:

People’s different religions, cultures and backgrounds (80% of children)

How to work out what is right and what is wrong in what the media and social media tell us (66% of children)

How laws are made (55% of children)

What democracy is (48% of children)

Current affairs – what is happening in our country and the wider world (43% of children)

How to research and find out about things that are happening (40% of children)

How Parliament and local Councils work (39% of children).

109. I am grateful to the Heads and staff of the eight schools for letting me carry out these discussions with their pupils, to the members of staff of each school who took notes of the pupils' votes and views, and above all to the pupils themselves who gave their fresh thinking, views and ideas for this report.

QED Foundation – written evidence (CCE0062)

1. QED Foundation is a national charity founded in 1990, which works to promote the social and economic advancement of disadvantaged communities, with a particular emphasis on the needs of ethnic minorities. Our main focus is on influencing social policy by working in partnership with the private, public and third sectors to address barriers to integration. However, we also deliver education, training and employment services direct to communities. First-hand experience of this work at grass-roots level informs our campaigning activities.

2. We are submitting evidence based on experience gained through supporting more than 30,000 people from ethnic minority backgrounds through education and training. We have helped 1,000 women in Pakistan to develop English language and life skills before coming to the UK.

We have chosen to answer questions 9, 10 and 11.

3. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

4. The last decade has seen some progress in ethnic minority representation in public life, with a record number of 51 MPs from non-white backgrounds sitting in the House of Commons in 2017. However, these successes cannot overshadow the fact that it is much more difficult for people from BME communities to achieve their potential and enjoy the same quality of life as their white counterparts. If you are from an ethnic minority background, you are more likely to be unemployed or have a low-paid job that is not commensurate with your skills and experience. Low incomes create a vicious circle of child poverty and poor educational attainment. The absence of visible role models from similar ethnic backgrounds in many areas of public life further reduces young people's aspirations.

5. In August 2016 the Equality and Human Rights Commission report Healing A Divided Britain revealed that 82% of hate crimes in England and Wales are racially motivated. Many commentators have ascribed the sharp rise in offences following the Brexit vote to xenophobic political rhetoric, which was seen as legitimising racist attitudes. Prior to the referendum many Muslim communities already felt victims of a climate of suspicion caused by government anti-terrorism strategies. Such an environment promotes a 'siege mentality' in disadvantaged communities and discourages engagement in wider civic life.

6. While we believe inability to speak English is the main barrier to active citizenship faced by many isolated BME communities, lack of transport is another important factor. Many families do not have access to a car and bus and train fares can be prohibitively expensive. As women from some ethnic minority groups rarely leave their immediate neighbourhoods, they are more likely to feel at home engaging in activities in familiar settings.

7. Recommendations

8. Measures to promote the social integration of Muslim groups should focus on the benefits of increased diversity and active citizenship rather than linking community cohesion to anti-terrorism measures.

9. Political parties should crack down on the use of inflammatory and provocative language in public debate.

10. The media should take a more responsible and equitable attitude to reporting sensitive issues relating to faith and ethnicity including coverage of Far Right and Islamic extremism.

11. Opportunities to engage in active citizenship should be made available to people from minority faith and ethnic groups at trusted neighbourhood venues such as community centres and places of worship.

12. Public bodies should actively recruit for leadership roles such as school and college governors and board members from BME communities. These measures could include asking successful role models to talk about their experiences and encourage others to follow suit.

13. Efforts to promote active citizenship should focus on those BME communities that have shown least social and economic progress and face the highest levels of disadvantage including Pakistani, Bangladeshi and Somali groups.

14. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

15. The last 18 months have seen the publication of a glut of reports highlighting shocking levels of social segregation. Whilst people from similar backgrounds will always want to live in close proximity to each other, they should have opportunities to mix with people of different faiths and ethnicities in the workplace. We therefore see increased diversity at work as a crucial first step to encouraging active citizenship yet much work needs to be done before this is a reality. The Healing A Divided Britain report revealed that the previous five years had seen the number of long-term unemployed young people from ethnic minority backgrounds almost double while it fell slightly for their white counterparts.

16. Some individuals face many barriers to participation because they belong to overlapping communities of interest. For example, in July 2016 a House of Commons select committee report found that Muslim women, 65% of whom are economically inactive, suffer the greatest economic disadvantage of any group due to their ethnicity, faith and gender as well as a combination of all three factors. Underlying reasons include discrimination and Islamophobia, stereotyping, pressure from traditional families, lack of tailored advice around higher education choices and insufficient role models.

17. In addition many Muslim communities are concentrated in post-industrial areas with few employment opportunities. In 2016 a Policy Exchange report revealed that the former mill towns of Oldham, Bradford, Batley, Halifax, Blackburn, Keighley and Accrington - all with large south Asian populations - were among the ten worst integrated places in England and Wales.

18. Workplace diversity is further reduced by the tendency of many ethnic minority parents to steer gifted children towards a few favoured professions such as medicine and law whilst others follow their relatives into low-paid jobs with few opportunities for progression such as restaurants and taxi driving. However, QED Foundation has successfully used madrassahs as bases for delivering careers advice to Muslim students and their families. We have also worked to strengthen links between these Islamic educational institutions and mainstream schools.

19. QED Foundation initiatives aimed at increasing workplace diversity have included:

- job 'melas' or fairs, where young people have face-to-face access to a wide range of employers
- producing a series of programmes promoting non-traditional careers with Yorkshire Television and distributing them to community groups throughout the region
- working with the Home Office to promote 'fast-track' Civil Service careers to high flyers from south Asian backgrounds
- supporting directors and senior managers of 800 large private and public sector organisations to recruit, retain and reward BME employees

- helping 350 small and medium-sized companies in England and Wales to address underrepresentation of ethnic groups

20. While much attention has been paid to levels of ethnic segregation in schools, there has been less focus on further and higher education. Ethnic minority students are greatly underrepresented at Russell Group universities and the EHRC report found that 89% of apprenticeship starters were white.

21. Recommendations

22. Young people from BME backgrounds should be encouraged to aspire to careers in a wide range of industrial sectors and at all levels of seniority.

23. Trade associations and professional bodies should do more to encourage men and women of all ethnicities to consider more diverse employment opportunities.

24. Universities, colleges and other educational institutions should build links with disadvantaged communities and offer additional support and mentoring to BME students.

25. Economic regeneration initiatives, including the proposed Northern Powerhouse, should ensure that people of all faiths and ethnicities will be able to share in the future prosperity of the area.

26. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

27. English language training is the single most important factor in facilitating the successful integration of new arrivals to the UK. The ability to communicate with people from the host community is also critical in promoting citizenship and civic engagement among second-generation immigrants, particularly women.

28. However, ESOL classes are best delivered as part of a holistic package of support. For example, QED Foundation was funded by the EU to run courses for third-country national women in Yorkshire and London including English language training. Students also benefited from support with confidence building, communication skills, personal finance and accessing health, housing and education services. There were visits to employers to see the world of work at first hand and opportunities to explore British heritage and culture.

29. We have also trained English language teachers in Pakistan and run pre-departure courses to prepare over 1,000 women to join their husbands in the UK. This approach has since been adopted elsewhere in the EU and we have recently run a similar pilot programme for men in association with the University of Bristol.

30. Unfortunately the majority of interventions aimed at increasing English proficiency do not reach the people who are most in need of help. These people may be additionally handicapped by poor literacy levels in their own language and many college courses assume a higher degree of competence than is the case. Furthermore, institutional settings may be intimidating and unsuitable venues for educating people who have little experience of venturing outside their immediate community and limited access to transport.

In contrast, voluntary and community-based organisations are often able to meet the needs of the most isolated individuals because they have spent many years developing a deep understanding of the neighbourhoods they serve and winning the trust and goodwill of their diverse populations. They are also best placed to build bridges with wider society by engaging volunteers to help immigrants develop language skills and familiarise themselves with their surroundings.

31. However, their ability to deliver these much-needed services is now severely compromised as they have been progressively starved of resources, particularly the withdrawal of the European Fund for the Integration of Third-Country Nationals. This programme was replaced by the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund in all EU member states in 2015. Although the UK has been allocated €370m and the national programme states that the government welcomes the involvement of the voluntary and community sector, to date there have been no assurances that any financial support for its work will be forthcoming.

Meanwhile organisations that are well placed to support the naturalisation process are being forced to scale back their operations, with the resultant loss of expertise and experienced staff.

32. Recommendations

33. English language tuition is best provided by trusted organisations and community anchors working at grass-roots level such as female-led madrassahs. Sufficient funding should be made available to cover outreach activities and offer crèche facilities to meet the students' childcare needs. Training should also be available at times that enable women to combine learning with family and home responsibilities. If necessary, the delivery of culturally appropriate tuition might entail single-sex classes.

34. In addition to ESOL classes, new arrivals need a wider range of support such as confidence building and an introduction to life in Britain.

35. Pre-departure training in English and life skills should be available to migrants before departure to the UK.

36. ESOL provision should be extended to settled ethnic minority communities as well as new arrivals.

37. The government should make a firm commitment to set aside a proportion of the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund to support voluntary and community sector initiatives helping newcomers to settle in to life in the UK, including English classes.

5 September 2017

Queen's Park Community Council – written evidence (CCE0100)

Queen's Park Community Council (QPCC) is London's first and only parish council, established in 2014. It is co-extensive with the Queen's Park ward of Westminster City Council, with a population of 13,769 (2015). The ward has the highest number of households (1,632) with dependent children, and the highest number of Black / African / Caribbean / Black British residents, in Westminster. The Index of Multiple Deprivation (2010) places 33 per cent of the ward in the top 5 per cent most deprived in England. In terms of its diversity, the ward is ranked in the top 0.8% of England. In the City Survey (2012), 30 per cent agreed that they could influence decisions affecting the local area and 22 per cent wanted to be more involved in decisions taken at borough level.⁷¹⁶

We welcome the establishment of the Select Committee and the opportunity to contribute to its work. Our comments below address mainly your second and seventh questions, with reference also to questions 9 and 10. Our experience reflects the response of citizens when they are given genuine opportunities to participate in and contribute to local governance. The logic is that more meaningful citizenship – through local representation around local issues – generates higher levels of civic engagement.

We wish to stress the role of community development in the history of QPCC. Several years of high quality, sustained community development carried out by Paddington Development Trust succeeded in engaging residents, leading to a successful campaign to establish their own local council, thereby taking responsibility for addressing a number of local issues. In diverse urban areas particularly, it is hard to see how such formal empowerment can be achieved without sustained investment in community development.

With reference to the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other; we note a tendency towards segregated schooling in the Queen's Park area, with many local parents apparently opting for non-local schools because of the demographics. This seems to suggest that integration is not the preferred option for many native citizens. While many residents lead by example in promoting integration and active civic engagement, their efforts need to be reinforced by authorities and employers.

We identify three particular components of civic engagement in Queen's Park, as follows:

The importance of scale – Queen's Park is an appropriate scale (boundary approximately 2 miles round) to make democracy work as a cultural characteristic, which people can be proud of and to which they feel they can contribute unproblematically. Within wider local government, ward boundaries are too weak functionally and QPCC can be seen as a reaction against that.

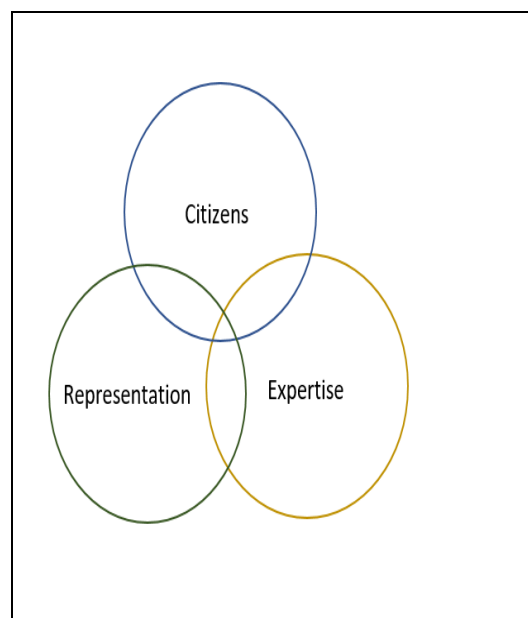

⁷¹⁶ Sources for these data can be provided on request.

Information and awareness – people will not readily engage if they do not understand the different levels and responsibilities of governance, or if they feel their views are not represented. As it is, too many people emerge from the UK education system with scant understanding of how local government works or what purposes it serves. Further, in Queen's Park some of our population have come from parts of the world with weak traditions of democratic involvement.

From our point of view, it is critical to involve local people as much as possible in the preparation and dissemination of information about what the council does and has done. At all levels of the process, wide representation at decision making level is key.

Addressing democratic detachment. In the global context, democracy is in turmoil. Detachment from democratic processes is a huge barrier to civic engagement, and low levels of civic engagement jeopardise democracy. In Queen's Park, we sense that it is possible to promote participative democracy as an immersive culture – by this we mean that we want it to become a resilient, uncontested feature of day-to-day life in families, schools, workplaces, community groups, and voluntary and statutory organisations.

To this end we are exploring the effects of changing the relations between the classic governance roles of 'citizen', 'representation' and 'expertise'. Thus for example, by involving more residents on working groups which feed directly into Council, or in augmenting the work of paid staff through their own expertise, we increase the amount that gets done and can make the effects of local governance more apparent to more people, thus stimulating a virtuous spiral of civic engagement. This would be represented by larger overlaps between the circles in the diagram.

Concluding remarks

Increased levels of civic engagement will follow from closer association with democratic processes and a more pervasive democratic culture. Both the processes and the culture can be made more meaningful through local governance driven by community development, as we believe is shown by the experience of QPCC. The challenge now is, how to ensure that the relation between local government and residents feels like part of a natural continuum, not seen as something detached or in conflict?

7 September 2017

Dr Kingsley Purdham, University of Manchester – written evidence (CCE0071)

Deal Or No Deal? The Rights, Responsibilities and Returns of the Citizen and the State

Introduction

Research that colleagues and I have conducted including on behalf of the Electoral Commission, local authorities and the Economic and Social Research Council directly addresses a number of issues under consideration by the Select Committee on Citizenship and Citizen Engagement.

This submission is a summary of published and ongoing research into: young peoples civic engagement, religious identities and rights claims, Muslim political participation, citizen involvement in governance and the responsiveness of the democratic political system. The full references to the research are given below.

There are three key themes: 1. Competing rights claims and the recognition of different aspects of identity including British values; 2. An unresponsive political system – deal or no deal; 3. The citizen and state information gap.

The views expressed here are those of Dr. K. Purdam.

Research Evidence Summary

(1) What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity? (8) What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Britishness – Research with religious groups in the UK suggests that the sense of citizenship in terms of values and attitudes including Britishness is variously interpreted. Overall the policy emphasizes of citizenship, community cohesion, multiculturalism, equal opportunities and freedom of speech were seen as more helpful than Britishness in supporting religious groups participation in society. The research found that Sikh, Muslim and Jewish organizations were more likely than Christian respondents to view the policy emphasis on Britishness as helpful. This is a challenge to the popular representations of the attitudes of religious groups including in the media.

Competing Identity Rights Claims – This research suggests that despite the multidimensional nature of identity, aspects of identity are increasingly in competition in terms of legal protection in the UK. As a result, there are concerns about a developing legal hierarchy of identity characteristics including in relation to religion and sexual orientation. There is a heightened sense of equality rights claims amongst, and between, different populations and this includes concerns and claims that are not actually reflected in the present legal framework. This may reflect a detachment from the changes in the law and the rights of different religious groups, and in the short term it may be contributing to increased tensions. It is clear that identity based rights claims need to be in the context of the acceptance of the equalities legislation.

Civic Engagement and Persistent Poverty - A further aspect of the issue of civic engagement is the persistent poverty many people in the UK face. An estimated 13.5 million people live in relative poverty (60% of the median income) and 19 million people do not have an adequate standard of living according to the Minimum Income Standard. Moreover these may be underestimates given the impact of the poverty penalty and the additional costs people with limited financial resources can face for essential goods and services. This means that financial survival can take precedence over civic engagement and greater involvement in governance and decision-making. Until the levels of poverty are fully understood and effective policies introduced to reduce them the levels of civic engagement are unlikely to increase in the UK.

Key references: Purdam, K., Royston, S. and Whitham, G. Measuring the “Poverty Penalty” in the UK. (2017) Significance. 14, 4, p. 34-37; Purdam, K. (2017) A Travel Map of Life Expectancy. Environment and Planning A, 49, Issue 7, pp 1453-1457; Purdam, K., Weller, P., Contractor, S. and Ghanea, N. (2017) Religious Organizations and the Impact of Human Rights and Equality. Politics, Ideology and Religion. 18, 1, pp 73-88; Garratt, E., Chandola, T., Purdam, K. and Wood, S. (2016) Income and Social Rank Influence UK Children’s Behavioral Problems: A Longitudinal Analysis. Child Development. doi:10.1111/cdev.12649; Purdam, K., Garratt, E. and Esmail, A. (2015) Hungry in the UK? Hungry? Food Insecurity, Social Stigma and Embarrassment in the UK. Sociology, 50(6), pp.1072–1088.

(2) Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Belonging and Engagement - Research I co-led suggests that rather than a primary focus on ‘Britishness’ or ‘British values’ a focus on the rights and responsibilities of citizenship underpinned by commitment to community cohesion, multiculturalism, equal opportunities and freedom of speech could be effective.

An aspect of this relates to the importance of citizens having a sense of belonging including being part of the decision-making that can affect their local area. Many communities feel disempowered, let down by the political system, misled by the claimed value of public consultation and ignored by politicians. For example, our research suggests that during the last two general elections only around 50% of electoral candidates replied to enquiries from the electorate. Less than a third of responses directly answered the question posed. Even so there is an interest amongst citizens in being part of the decision making in their local area as part of governance partnerships - if real power is devolved. This is the deal or no deal approach - where rights, responsibilities and returns equally apply to the citizen, politicians and the state.

Key references: Purdam, K., Weller, P., Contractor, S. and Ghanea, N. (2017) Religious Organizations and the Impact of Human Rights and Equality Laws. Politics, Ideology and Religion. 18, 1 pp 73-88; Purdam, K. and Crisp, R. (2010) Measuring the Impact of Community Engagement on Policy Making. Journal of Civil Society. 5, 2. pp 169-186; Richardson, L., Purdam, K., Cotterill, S., Rees, J., Squires, G. and Askew, R. (2014) Responsible Citizens and Accountable Service Providers? Environment and Planning A. 46, 7 pp 1716 – 1731; Southern, R. and Purdam, K. (2016) The Changing Representation Interface: Democracy and Direct Contact with Politicians. Journal of Civil Society. 12, Issue 1 pp 101-120.

(3) Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship.

Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced? (7) How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Decision Making and Responsibility - This research examined the role citizens can take in local decision-making including through the use of community contracts working alongside local politicians and council officers. The research highlighted how citizens can feel a greater sense of being part of a community by being involved in the decision-making. A key aspect of this was the mutual commitment and shared responsibilities between citizens and policy makers. However the involvement of citizens must be directly linked to the policymaking process and decision making in order to ensure public engagement. Again this is an example of the deal or no deal approach and has implications for both the citizen and the state.

Helping and Reciprocity – This research examined the extent to which citizens help other people in their local area and the role reciprocity has in pro-social behavior. Helping other people is a key component of civic society. The research found that those people who reported helping other people were less likely to expect help in return. The local context of helping was also shown to be important. People who live in an area where they perceive other people help each other are less likely to expect help in return for helping. However younger people compared to older people were found to be more likely to expect help in return for helping. This suggests the developing role of conditional helping in local communities. This may be a long-term issue for community cohesion. There is again a direct link here to deal or no deal approach to civic engagement and citizenship.

The Language of Governance and the Recognition of Citizens - There is a disjunction between the language of governance and everyday life. For citizens and the state the language of governance needs to evolve. For example, if paying tax is a 'contribution to society' then it should be named as such. If helping a neighbor is contributing to well-being then it should be recognised and measured as having a value. Many of the valuable everyday voluntary activities of citizens often go unmeasured in official statistics. This is part of the public information gap or what can be termed the citizen and state information gap.

Key references: Purdam, K. and Tranmer, M. (2014) Expectations of Being Helped in Return for Helping. Population, Space and Place. 21 pp 66-81; Purdam, K. and Tranmer, M. (2012) Help in Context: A Multilevel, Multivariate Analysis of the European Social Survey. European Societies. 14, Issue 3, pp 393-415; Richardson, L., Purdam, K., Cotterill, S., Rees, J., Squires, G. and Askew, R. (2014) Responsible Citizens and Accountable Service Providers? Environment and Planning A. 46, 7 pp 1716 – 1731.

(9) Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome? 10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Diversity, Civic Engagement and a Sense of Place – This research highlighted the challenges people can feel about increasing levels of diversity and change more generally. For example, most people over estimate the level of ethnic and religious diversity in the area where they live. This is part of a wider problem of how informed people are about population change. This extends to other issues such as the levels of crime and anti-social behavior in their area. This is another part of the citizen and state information gap. Knowledge about your local area and the UK population as a whole should be part of the responsibilities of citizenship. But it also applies to the state including politicians who should ensure they have evidence-based knowledge about the circumstances, experiences and attitudes of citizens.

Research with Muslim local elected councilors highlighted their diverse and multiple identities including having critical views towards some mosque leaders. Their political concerns were dominated by the politics of everyday life such as local planning issues and refuse collection. In many ways Muslim councilors were typical of local politicians in the UK in terms of predominantly being older men. However there was also evidence of the electorate contacting Muslim councilors from outside their ward in order to seek out councilors who had an identity who they felt more closely matched their own. The essentialising of identity can create barriers. It would be of value to follow up this research and examine if, and how, the councilors political attitudes and experiences have changed.

Understanding Change - A key issue in relation to civic engagement is how people understand and respond to change. For example, in relation to cultural identities people can often be searching for, and feel more comfortable in, an authenticity that never truly existed or which was partial and transitory. These ‘imagined authenticities’ can become a barrier to social change and integration. This can be addressed through a focus on a better understanding of identities and global values. This is again linked to the citizen and state information gap described above.

Key references: Purdam, K. (2000) The Political Identities of Muslim Local Councilors, Local Government Studies, 26 No 1, Spring 2000 pp 47-64; Purdam, K. (2001) Democracy in Practice, Politics, 21, No 3 September, pp 147-157; Weller, P., Purdam, K., Contractor, S. and Ghanea, N. (2013) Religion or Belief and Equality. Britain in Global Contexts. London, Bloomsbury; Purdam, K., Weller, P., Contractor, S. and Ghanea, N. (2017) Religious Organizations and the Impact of Human Rights and Equality. Politics, Ideology and Religion. 18, 1, pp 73-88; Simpson, L., Purdam, K., Gavalas, V. and Tajar, A. (2009) Jobs deficits, neighbourhood effects and ethnic penalties - explaining labour market inequalities amongst ethnic minorities. Environment and Planning A. 42, 4. pp 946-963; Norman, P., Purdam, K. and Tajar, A. (2007) Representation and Local Democracy, Political Geography, 26, Issue 1, Jan pp 57-77; Purdam, K., Fieldhouse, E., Kalra, V. and Russell, A. (2002) Voter engagement amongst ethnic minority communities in the UK, London, Electoral Commission; Russell, A., Fieldhouse, E., Purdam, K. and Kalra, V. (2002) Voter engagement amongst young people in the UK. London, Electoral Commission.

6 September 2017

Owais Rajput – written evidence (CCE0118)

My major question and key point is that what does the future hold for British Muslims and I want to start from one of the largest Diaspora community, British citizens of Kashmiri heritage living on the UK land (Three Million and in most cases they are forth & fifth generation born & brought up in UK), and at present they are nowhere in British political system. In past and in present they not included in UK Censuses. Same applies to other heritage background Diaspora community with Muslim faith living on UK land. Kashmiris community both living in UK and abroad whereby its evidently clear that none of their key identities is unknown to the current world, yet the division between themselves (Kashmiris community) is undeniable gapping in high rate?

My submission also reflection of Benedict Anderson Revised Edition 2006 (Imagined communities Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism) pg xi states that it is not only the world that has changed its face over the past twelve years. The study of nationalism too has been startlingly transformed - in the method, scale, sophistication, and sheer quantity.

As is the case of the world today, both national and international communities, they are undergoing a period of substantial change and economic pressures. Despite the fact that such a climate can generate feelings of uncertainty and concern amongst diverse communities, it can also present opportunities for development and innovation. However, there are many arguments as well as researcher subjective belief that immigration often equals to inadequate support, sympathy or even rejection. Despite the various equality and diversity acts, the primary source of problems that have stressed some communities have still not been addressed.

Therefore, an extensive theoretical and qualitative approach with some quantitative research is needed to look at three major areas.

1. A general introduction to the socio-political issues of State of Jammu & Kashmir in the 19th and 20th centuries and how this has affected Kashmiris living in the UK.
2. Issues of identity (religion, language, culture, heritage) within Kashmiris community living in the UK
3. Cultural perceptions and the differences between young and older Kashmiris living in the UK
4. Physical, mental health and Dementia limitations in British Kashmiri community living in the UK.

Therefore, conclusively, this research will aim at searching what books / articles have been published on UK Kashmiri Muslims

What do these books / journals tell us about their true culture, religion, language and their origin with interest to focus on the missing information if any?

More important, looking into the possibility of engaging in research with local communities through interview and questionnaires with hope to capture the true-life experience of Kashmiris living in the UK

RESEARCH AIMS:

A decade ago, UNESCO reported that 450 million people of the world's population develop a physical or mental limitation at some time in their life cycle (UNESCO Courier, 1981:8). In 2000, these number was expected to rise to 600 million (Mittler, 1990: 54) A significant number of these people are children who, because of hunger, malnutrition, or lack of adequate health care, are marked for life with a disabling condition. Surprising, Kashmiris communities living in the UK form a significant segment towards this statistic; researcher's question is can this be controlled if not solved if the true identity of Kashmiris community living not only in the UK but across the globe is made known to the world today?

Therefore, I believe that it is imperative to investigate the identity of Kashmiris and barriers such as Physical Barriers, Negative Attitudes, Cultural issues and believes that affect or hinder a positive progression with the Kashmiris living in the UK.

RESEARCH QUESTIONS:

This research will look at the identity, social, economic, political and religious makeup of British citizens of Kashmiri heritage and how it has been kept invisible and excluded by the British State and society (deliberately or unintentionally). The research looks deeper into Kashmiri identity and compatibility with British society, does it present problems? Kashmiris socio-economic position in UK such as education, employment / lack of employment, provision / facilities, organisations among UK Kashmiris (religious and social), elements of radicalisation within UK Kashmiris and lack of UK Kashmiris de-radicalisation model in the UK Government such as Channel referrals. This research looks into Kashmiri culture (Biradiri, language, and religion). Different theories of migrations such as (a) push-pull (b) chain migration to understand why Kashmiris migrated to the UK from 1900 to 1980s and Demographics of Kashmiris in the UK. This research also looks into the formation of a new identity of Kashmiris as Pakistani or Muslim and their inability to assert their Kashmiri identity, and the role played by social analysts. Generational differences, the role of the media within migrant communities and case studies of Kashmiris to understand Problems and challenges of UK Kashmiris.

British citizens of Kashmiri heritage are experiencing social exclusion and economic disadvantage in the UK, but that the trouble of distinguishing Kashmiris has implied that their needs frequently ignored. In most authority reviews like the census 2011, it is believed that British citizens of Kashmiri heritage largely report their ethnic group as Pakistani. The reasons most often cited for identifying Kashmiris as distinct from Pakistanis are:

1. Identity: although Kashmiris may self-identify as Pakistani, this may not be their strongest or preferred identity. Linked with the desire of some Kashmiris for a separate Kashmiri State.
2. Resource allocation / service delivery: local authorities and other organisations may not distribute resources evenly between different parts of the self-reported Pakistani population. Organisations may make assumptions about the needs of B.K. population, for example, that Urdu is the only language required for those with low English language proficiency.
3. Monitoring inequalities: Kashmiris are disadvantaged than other Pakistanis as a result of their rural background. Their experiences may be 'masked' by those of other Pakistanis when they combined in the same ethnic grouping.
4. Kashmiris are likely to suffer racial discrimination and disadvantage in the UK. Not fully recognising this group in the census makes it difficult for decisionmakers to measure and respond to specific aspects of socio-economic and cultural disadvantage (UK census, 2011).

Division for Education and Skills (DFES) National information "the confirmation of minority ethnic students" demonstrates that Kashmiris would prefer not to distinguish as Pakistanis; In one of the tables, it appears, almost 9,000 Kashmiri Pakistanis, 10,000 Mirpuri Pakistanis, and 52,000 different Pakistanis. This demonstrates Kashmiris need their personality yet for reasons unknown open administrations Chiefs keep on identifying Kashmiris as Pakistanis. This opposed to the prevalent view, Kashmiris being content with Pakistani or Muslim character and the interest for Kashmiri incorporation inside the British State and society, is because of the political circumstance in South Asia is not valid. Taking a gander at the hardship, inner city destitution ghettos, mobs of Bradford, Leeds and numerous other inward city regions where Kashmiri people group can be found, the contextual investigation recommends that the quest for personality be a British issue. This further confirmed in that amid the 2001 enumeration, figures more than 20,000 individuals ticked other and self-affirmed as Kashmiri. (Office for National Statistics 2006) Finally, the study has found that Pakistani instruction achievement likely is in standard with Indians i.e. above national normal yet when blended with Kashmiris we get the other picture, which implies that of all Black and Minority Ethnic (BME) bunches Kashmiri instruction underachievement is the most noteworthy. This also suggests a genuine conversation starter for open administrations suppliers to perceive the issue no matter how to look at it and attempt to address it.

According to Punch (pg 2005:46), good research questions is Clear, Specific, Answerable, Interconnected, Substantively relevant.

Therefore, for the sake of this research my questions will be more influenced by Benedict Anderson "Imagined Communities" whereby I will be looking into the following points whereby I will be closely working with the community for better understanding.

Researcher will be investigating:

1. What is the true identity of Kashmiris nationalities living in the UK?
2. What is the meaning of "Biradari" about Kashmiris community living in the UK and how does family relations influence it?
3. Do we have a common language within Kashmiri community or is it a diverse language and its origin; also does the Kashmiris living in the UK retain the originality of their language or has it changed and what caused the changes?
4. How does the original cultural influence modern culture within the Kashmiris living in the UK and does the young generation buy in the old cultural norms or influenced by super western changing culture?
5. Is there any room for social change and how will it affect the relationship between the elder and younger Kashmiris living in the UK?

METHODOLOGY:

With the use of articles, books and written journals I will do a very detailed Literature Review to identify missing information regarding the identity of the Kashmiris living in the UK.

The Equalities Bill (2010) is one such piece of legislation that imposes a duty to achieve fairer cultures within organisations. People from specific marginalised groups, such as within disability studies (where in our case we will be applying this into Kashmiris immigrants), have proposed a social solution to reducing discrimination through an environmental approach that seeks to remove the barriers to equity by increasing fairer access and greater opportunity (Swain et al 2003). Holbeche (2001) argues that commitment to the organisation's ethical codes and values can enhance personal development if the learning process is also understood and shared by people across the organisation. Indeed, from the perspective of the new Bill, when people across the nation understand the value added to it by a commitment to equality, strategies for change can be seen as levers towards improving socialising and integrating. This means that compliance with legislation is not considered to be an additional pressure rather it is a minimum standard in addressing unfairness, and enhancing human wellbeing which requires a more widespread and deliberate intervention.

To capture the true identity of the Kashmiris living in the UK through literature review, Researcher will theoretically investigate more into:

ISLAM IN THE UK:

In July 2006 Sheffield City Council and partners commissioned a report by Meridian Pure of Warrington; it found that “The Yemeni community was the first Arab community who were settled in the UK”. The report also traced the history of the Yemeni community in Britain back to 1885 (Allen; Okoro; Rosenfeld, 2001). However, the migration of Muslims to the UK after the Second World War is of great importance to the current demography of Britain because for economic reasons, initially as part of the post-war reconstruction of Britain. The UK Muslim community has grown from around 20,000 in 1950 to 2.7 million, which is 4.8% of the whole UK population (UK Census, 2011) this pattern of migration was to be the foundation of the present day British Kashmiri community.

BRITISH CITIZENS OF KASHMIRIS HERITAGE ETHNOGRAPHY

'British citizens of Kashmiri heritage' are the people who emigrated from State of Jammu & Kashmir, or they have genealogical origination there. The bigger part is from the Pakistani-coordinated Kashmir. By intricacy, 'Dr. Majid Siraj' a first expert from the Indian-controlled Kashmir, now settled in Srinagar, after his retirement from Leeds UK, observes that 'it was exceptional for normal specialist's people to get Passports or IDs in Indian-held Kashmir'.

KASHMIRIS IN BRITAIN:

England has gotten feedback as being in charge of the Kashmiri debate since it ruined the issue in 1947. At the point when Douglas Hurd, as a Foreign Secretary in 1995 requested that India consider human rights in Kashmir, India reacted that Britain had not felt it 'important to learn the desires of the settlements to which it exchanged force, including India, itself-and it had countenanced proceeded with brutality in Ireland as opposed to allowing the separation of the UK.'

BRITISH CITIZENS OF KASHMIRI HERITAGE COMMUNITY CURRENT POSITION:

It is widely accepted that "HARD TO REACH" communities are defined by socio-economic and political marginalisation, due to ethnic, cultural, religious and class differences (Jones; Newburn, 2000). This has led to feelings of alienation and "victim - hood" on the part of the British-Kashmiri community (B.K.), (Abbas, 2007). In their view, they are non-stakeholders in today's secular British system (Habibullah, 2009). This is compounded by the wider Islamophobia faced by all Muslim communities and the on-going human-rights abuses and occupation suffered by their counterparts in the sub-continent (Kaul; Kachru, 1998).

RELIGION AND LANGUAGE:

It is relevant to point out that there is not one Islamic category, but many 'Islamic sects' (Knott; Khokher, 1993). This perhaps explains why there are trends within Islam that have an ambiguous relationship to violence and offer justifications for its use or even extol it (Strawson, 2008). Strawson observed that "There is in fact an intense conflict within Islamic discourse over the issue, which since the late nineteenth century has been connected to the position of Muslims in a world that has been perceived to be dominated by colonialism and since 1945 increasingly by the West” (Strawson, 2008; Ter Haar, 2008).

CONCLUSION:

Lot of Diaspora communities living on UK land are still classified as hidden or hard to reach communities. Policymakers & decisionmakers have very little or no insight of Diaspora communities living on UK land. I focused on British citizens of Kashmiri heritage living on UK land to just make it easy and understandable. If we really want to talk about ‘Social Integration’ then we should include all Diaspora communities living on UK land including British Kashmiris in Dialogue process. Political Parties and civil society really needs to understand a lot about Diaspora communities.

RECOMMENDATIONS AND FURTHER PLAN OF ACTIONS:

I submitted case study of British citizens of Kashmiri heritage, firstly migrated in 1890 in UK and now in mostly cases they are 4th and 5th generations born & bred in UK). Civil society really needs to do more research studies work in all Diaspora communities living on UK land to get insight of day to day issues and to understand factors of gap between policymakers and the Diaspora communities.

Notes:

Key features:

1. What features of nationalism do other countries have? I am thinking of the US and India, particularly who seem to be very pro-nationalists. Scotland might also be worth looking at.
2. Are people proud to be British? If so, why.
3. What is the relationship between the State and its citizens. I see a scope for bringing in the proposed Bill of Rights and Responsibilities.
4. Youth Brief – we lowered the voting age in the Scottish Independence vote of 2014. But not, in the EU referendum. Why and how has this affected the outcome of both.
5. Voting rights and responsibilities. For example, you will be aware the ECJ required the UK to give prisoners the right to vote, which, rightly was ignored by the Gov. How can the State encourage people to participate?
6. Education brief – (see para. 5 particularly). Should citizenship and its traits be a compulsory part of the education system?
7. Voluntary citizenships. My daughter last month did the National Citizenship Service and the Duke of Edinburgh awards, both on which I have asked her write about, as part of our “facts to support our opinions”. Can I ask we all look amongst our own relatives and contacts for this?

Owais Rajput – written evidence (CCE0118)

8. BAME/Muslims feeling left behind. I would use the word “ignored”. Thoughts?
9. Social Cohesion – undercover thoughts on the Burka ban, which rightly, has been rejected by the Gov. But also, the recent riots against the state and incitement of protests capitalism, nuclear power, trident, austerity etc. what is fuelling this rise?
10. How important is it citizens are proficient in the English language?
11. Role models who promote a positive vision of Britishness. This one will be interesting and an opportunity to approach and deal directly with such peoples.

Quick intro’s –

Ash Zaman is the Deputy Chairman of the Conservative Muslim Forum. Owais was formerly a member of UKip who left in protest against UKip’s position to ban the Burka which was widely covered on the msm, including Sky News.

Brother Owais, as discussed yesterday, I attach the brief from the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement, which is looking for written submissions on citizenship in modern Britain and looks at a wide spectrum of the population.

I also attach some preliminary bullet points to consider – this is not meant to be an exhaustive list but a preliminary starting point. You may want to concentrate on one particular part or parts, please let me know.

This is an opportunity to talk put across the point, we as Muslim are an integral part of British society and make up what is meant by ‘British values’. As a Muslim and former PC for Ukip, who left in protest against of their stance on banning the Burka, it will be interesting to hear your views on the point of ‘social integration’.

I think the brief is something the CMF, as the official affiliate Muslim group of the Conservative Party can add real value.

8 September 2017

Supplementary Evidence from Zanib Rasool MBE – (CCE0267)

The organisation I work for [Rotherham United Community Sports Trust] supports young people who do not attend school; many are excluded. We need to look at work with young people outside school in youth settings. Sadly many of those giving the most cause for concern are often not in schools.

As an organisation we are training up our sport coaches in youth work so they can engage with young people and fill in some of the gaps left by loss of youth service posts and closure of open access sessions for young people and detach youth work, as there is no one there to listen to young people on the margins.

Work with parents is vital as you learn from your parents rights and responsibilities, acceptable behaviour and many of our children across all communities don't have those parents. A good example of this is with schools who are teaching children about healthy eating and having healthy school dinners and parents then undoing that work by giving them take-aways almost every night. I learned social responsibility and duty from my parents and working hard, they were Commonwealth immigrant who came here in the early 1960s.

Even though I am not a sports person myself I have found it is a good tool to engage young people. Over 12 months we have organised 23 football tournaments bringing teams across Rotherham and regionally together through our Kicks programme, an evening diversionary programme to reduce ASB. (Similar programmes are delivered across England by community football programmes like ours under the umbrella of English Football League Trust.) Football is a global game developed in England and we can engage men quickly through football even if they don't speak a word of English, and we use sport as a hook to progress them on to other things like ESOL.

We run a grassroots football club called United 4 Communities with players from all backgrounds playing in a Sunday league, young players from Dinnington playing with young people of Asian backgrounds living in the town centre, they know they have to play as a team to win and that is the only reason that stops them from fighting each other. Through sports we engage them in education, volunteering and apprenticeships.

The Muslim women we are working with play netball every Saturday evening and have played two competitions with a women's netball team from Barnsley, and would not have otherwise met. We are now looking at putting them in regional competitions, some wear traditional clothes and the hijab, the clothes they wear are not important, it's the participation and integration. Sport is a great tool to integrate all sectors of community.

I am just about to start my doctoral research in ESOL and I am finding there is a long waiting list for people wanting to learn English and that the English language learning provision is not adequately resourced. We must not also forget there are many people in white working class communities who cannot read and write.

Restless Development – written evidence (CCE0198)

We find poverty is a big divide and fragments communities as often people in white working class mining areas in Rotherham presume all the resources are going to minority community, and they feel they have been forgotten and often get drawn in to racist ideology as they don't have any direct contact with other people so rely on the media.

The faith community is also doing some great work, a church near me has been running a mother and toddler group every Thursday for 30 years, all run by volunteers, it is attended by mum and toddlers from all background including my own nephew and that is the age we need to start. One of the Islamic centres in Rotherham hosted a Macmillan coffee morning and invited the care home residents next door to attend, it was lovely to see young people and the Imams serving tea and samosas.

My colleagues are currently working in another Mosque in Rotherham delivering health sessions to children and young people alongside their Quranic classes. They have an hour of their usual lessons and then an hour with our health team. The Mosques are slowly starting to follow the lead of the churches.

Muslim women especially are playing a very active role in Rotherham, my mentor who set up the first Asian women's organisation in Rotherham in early 1980s and now in her 70s is still running the centre accessed by many women from new arriving communities wanting to learn English. I think sometime in policy we are represented as passive and not engaged civically, and in reality in many cases it is the opposite.

We need to invest more in ESOL provision as there is high demand for it. More schools need to open their doors to parents learning on same site as their children so you create a family culture of learning.

We need to relook at the cuts in youth provision as youth workers did some great work around personal relationships, racism, the holocaust; the list is endless and there is only so much schools can do.

Sport funders perhaps also need to look at not only increasing participation in sport and making people healthier but also focus on community cohesion through sport and linking people together.

Restless Development – written evidence (CCE0198)

Introduction

Restless Development is a global agency that works with young people to demand and deliver a just and sustainable world for all. It is run out of strategic hubs in ten countries across Africa, Asia and in the UK and USA, with a wider network of partners across the world. Reaching over 500,000 young people a week, one of its four key goals is to ensure young people have a voice so that they are able to drive change as active citizens. The organisation supports young people to actively engage influence and inform decision-making processes, deliver programmes and shape their own communities. Ensuring that young people are active citizens and that their voice counts means that they can bring about transformational change for whole societies.

In the UK, Restless Development supports a diverse network of more than 1000 young people to volunteer, campaign and become active global citizens. Examples of its work include the coordination of Youth Stop AIDS; a youth-led movement and campaign network that acts to ensure governments, global institutions and corporations are committed to ending AIDS by 2030. It is also a member of the DFID funded International Citizen Service (ICS) consortium, having supported over 3000 young people to contribute to development impact across Africa and Asia, but also take action after placement to becoming life-long active, global citizens.

Summary

- The nature of citizenship for young people is changing - they are participating in communities in different ways than previous generations.
- British citizenship education should be placed within a global citizenship framework, to reflect the increasingly diverse societies, both online and offline, that young people inhabit.
- Young people need to be provided with the necessary skills, training, opportunities and networks in order to develop as active citizens. This should be provided through structured engagements - which will ensure people are independent active citizens in the future.
- Restless Development supports lowering the voting age to 16 in the UK, based upon experience that if young people are properly supported to take part in active citizenship activities for the first time, they are far more likely to do it again independently.
- If young people are given a voice in the decisions that affect them, they can be active citizens which will allow them to lead transformational change in communities.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 According to traditional citizenship indicators⁷¹⁷, youth civic participation has decreased over the 21st century. In the UK fewer young people vote in elections, or formally join political parties, as compared to their older counterparts - a trend that has persisted and widened over time. These findings have been associated with a rise in young people's scepticism towards established institutions and political processes⁷¹⁸. However, our experience shows that youth are participating in civic spaces, and taking action in their communities - just in different ways to previous youth generations. We therefore recommend that discussions associated with 'civic engagement' and 'citizenship' are broadened to support emerging and exciting forms of youth civic participation in the UK today.

⁷¹⁷ “The New Global Citizen: Harnessing Youth Leadership to Reshape Civil Society” (Rhize, September 2016).

1.2 At Restless Development, we support hundreds of diverse young people each year to take action during the 'Action at Home' phase of their ICS placement. During this 6-month phase, young people are supported and encouraged to take action in their local communities on issues chosen by them. We have found that, when given the freedom and support to take action on issues closest to them, young people today will endeavour to take on a wide range of community activities. These activities are not always captured in traditional models of citizenship. For example, many volunteers use technology to raise awareness of local and global issues, through platforms such as blogging, podcasts, videos, and using social media to create change. Other volunteers attend protests, organise events at their universities, and lobby MPs to act on issues that they have experienced first-hand whilst volunteering overseas. The themes volunteers take action on vary widely, and many stay connected to the experiences and relationships they developed overseas when taking action.

1.3 Although young people may be perceived as less visibly organised in their neighbourhood around traditional community centres, such as religious institutions and youth centres, our experience shows that young people are still driven to build new communities and take civic action through harnessing features of their identity and interests, such as LGBT+ issues, climate change, economic inequality, and more. During our trainings, we encourage volunteers to reflect on their personal stories and their values to help them identify opportunities and networks to take action within, based on their shared identities with other young people.

1.4 As the above example shows, young people are moving away from the 'dutiful' approach to citizenship, which is motivated by community belonging and affiliation to existing institutions. Youth today are leading the growth of social movements, which operates when individuals collaborate in looser networks, centred on community action and shared values.

⁷¹⁸ "Most young lack interest in politics - official survey" (BBC, February 2014)

Civic engagement today is less focused on loyalty to the state and nation, and is increasingly motivated by personal identity and experience, asserting individual rights, and connecting with other young people, both within and across national borders. Through these new interactions, young people are forging new global identities whilst based in Britain.

1.5 An example of a youth-led movement is Youth Stop AIDS, one of Restless Development's leading campaign networks. Established for 13 years, the youth-led movement speaks out, takes creative action and engages those in power to ensure that governments, global institutions and corporations are committed to ending AIDS by 2030. The movement was set up by young people in the UK who had witnessed the HIV epidemic whilst volunteering overseas. It now operates through a broad network of youth groups based across the country, which use technology and community meetings to build relationships, develop strategic thinking, and take action on the global HIV epidemic.

1.6 This growth in social movements has been supported by online and offline networks and tools. Young people are creating and defining new approaches to social change, using technology to build new ways to create change within their communities. Peer-driven networks, grassroots organising, and offline contact are still important elements in this. Institutions should focus not on creating these networks for social change, but should instead identify and support them.

1.7 Central to all of this is the demand by young people to have a voice on the decisions which affect their daily experiences and their personal identities. Crucially, if a diverse range of young people have a voice and are given the tools and access to influence those in power, it will help to ensure that they can realise their leadership potential and bring about transformational change for wider society.

Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 For our youth network, being British today is inextricably linked to being a global citizen. Their citizenship narrative is not about being 'British first', but about being a global citizen who is proud to live in a country which leads on and cares about global issues. Citizenship in the UK can thus be strengthened by increasing the emphasis we place on the concept of Global Citizenship. Young people today live in a digital age where traditional borders and experiences of national identity are being reshaped constantly through globalisation and technology. Both local and global issues can move young people passionately to take action, due to the pervasive and borderless nature of modern technology.

2.2 Global citizenship is a critical aspect of British citizenship. Britain's important global role must be furthered by its citizens', not just its government. We recommend that institutions learn from young people and their ability to stand in solidarity with global causes. When young people feel connected to wider movements, and if they have the tools they need to create change and influence the powerful, they can be highly engaged and committed to global issues. This is something to celebrate in terms of civic engagement.

2.3 For example, young people within our network are increasingly proud and ready to defend Britain's commitment to 0.7% of GDP going to international development, as well as our government's leadership on global issues such as LGBT+ rights and climate change. At the time of this submission, young people across the country have been contacting and meetings with their MPs to express their pride in Britain's commitments overseas. Such globally focused actions are a reflection of modern British citizenship, encapsulating some of the aspects that make young people proud to be British. This further strengthens the argument that modern notions of British citizenship should be discussed within a global citizenship framework.

2.4 Another example of British young people exercising their citizenship rights to speak out on global issues was the Action/2015 campaign, a global coalition that came together united by the belief that 2015 was a critical year for progress in the fight against climate change, poverty and inequality in the formation of the Sustainable Development Goals. Restless Development supported a diverse group of young activists in the UK to engage and mobilise the public during this campaign. Through an evaluation of the campaign's accomplishments, it was demonstrated that youth in the UK emerged as the key focus of the campaign⁷¹⁹. When given the support and integrated into a wider movement for change, youth generated great enthusiasm for the action/2015 work in the UK and led much of the strategic thinking behind the campaign.

⁷¹⁹ Action 2015 Campaign Evaluation (Firetail, February 2016):
<https://drive.google.com/file/d/0Bywm4VwGJMMbWFIKbWxkdkRLaGc/view>

2.5 The above examples demonstrate that many British young people are ready to act as global citizens and do not see a disconnect between taking civic action to drive change on local and global issues. Attempts to strengthen people's identities as British citizens should also embrace the global dimension of the modern youth experience, particularly with regard to an increasingly diverse national landscape.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

3.1 In the UK Restless Development would agree with the lowering of the voting age to 16. This would allow young people to meaningfully participate in the democratic process and help provide them with the voice essential to their active citizenship.

3.2 At the age of 16 young people in the UK are treated as capable, responsible citizens in a number of ways, including being able to gain employment, pay income tax, get married, join the army or even become a director of a company.

3.3 The majority of 16 and 17 year olds are still in formal education institutions. This provides the ideal setting to support young people to register to vote, understand the democratic process, discuss and debate the issues with their peers, and put their citizenship education into practice. Furthermore, if standardised support is given through formal institutions, it decreases the reliance on family and individual networks to be able to guide young people through the process of voting for the first time, thus increasing the likelihood of a more diverse range of young people registering and turning out to vote.

3.4 Our experience has shown that if young people are properly supported to take part in active citizenship activities for the first time, they are far more likely to do it again independently. Therefore if 16 year olds are supported to vote by their schools and colleges, we believe that more of these young people are likely to vote again in the future - thus increasing the overall youth voter turnout. Voting also encourages engagement with decision makers as part of the democratic process. At Restless Development, we have taken this approach within our 'Youth Decide' events, giving young people the space to engage with, debate and shape their opinions on major political topics - such as Brexit, the refugee crisis, and reframing the vote. These quarterly events build on each other to foster a habit of political debate and engagement amongst young people in the UK.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

4.1 Young people should be supported on their journey to active citizenship, being provided with the skills, training, confidence and tools to engage and organise within their communities. If they are supported through initial engagements, then they will do it independently in the future. This can be supported by encouraging active citizenship through formal education, which could cover crucial elements such as how parliament works and our voting system.

4.2 Political participation, and the potential to engage with and influence decision makers, is a crucial element of active citizenship. Institutions must take care not to de-politicise lessons on civic engagement, and must recognise that young people need to have a voice in the decisions that affect them - this is the key factor to ensure ongoing civic participation. Young people must recognise that they have actual power to create change, and must understand how to use that power effectively.

4.3 We would also recommend that civic education is delivered in an engaging way, so young people are not deterred by the concept of active citizenship and the formal civic processes. At Restless Development, we have recently conducted a training audit to ensure that all of our trainings with volunteers are as youth-led, participatory, and engaging as possible. Fostering youth leadership and peer-support within trainings and citizenship schemes is particularly important, as these are tools needed to ensure long-term civic engagement for young people.

4.4 As discussed above, young people today are embracing a more active and participatory form of citizenship, rather than more 'dutiful' models of citizenship. Therefore, any formal educational initiatives or non-formal programmes focused on good citizenship should reflect and strengthen the leadership potential, political awareness, and critical thinking abilities required for youth to meaningfully participate in civic spaces.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

5.1 Voluntary citizenship programmes are a good first step at mobilising and supporting young people, but longer-term structures and support are needed to embed active citizenship. For example, it is important for funding to be long-lasting and sustainable, in order to support young people for longer periods when they are embedded in own communities. This will sustain the habit of civic engagement and ensure that citizenship programmes are not tokenistic or perceived by young people as one-off activities, separate from daily life.

5.2 Throughout our delivery of the International Citizenship Service, we ensure that volunteers understand that being an active citizen is a lifelong journey - not defined by taking a one action in their communities, followed by an official stamp to mark completion of the programme. We work with a diverse range of young people, many of whom were often not previously engaged in politics or community action. We expose these young people to a range of tangible ways they can take action and have a sustainable impact in the UK and abroad (e.g. through working in host communities overseas, learning how to engage with MPs, joining campaign stunts, and more). We also encourage volunteers to stay connected to the wider Restless youth network in the future, through using social media platforms; encouraging them to go back to their schools and communities to motivate other young people to get involved in community action, and through our ‘Youth Decide’ events (described below) to connect individuals to the wider network.

5.3 Building and nurturing this network of active citizens is an important way of ensuring that youth understand that being an active citizen does not end after the 6-month programme. Instead, the journey of active citizenship can continue on far beyond the official time period prescribed by the programme. This approach was also demonstrated through our experience leading the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation Development Advocates programme, which equipped young people with the skills to continue to speak out and shape development priorities well beyond the programme timeline.

5.4 However, our experience is that appropriate investment for ‘active citizenship’ is increasingly hard to come by. With funding focused on fixed outcomes of youth engagement, the flexible funding that encourages youth-led active citizenship activities is limited. There is an opportunity for the ICS programme to better fund and support collective active citizenship activities that would have a greater sustainable impact on local and global communities.

5.5 Having a voice, and being able to influence those in power is an essential element of active citizenship. Trying to separate politics is to ignore this crucial element of citizenship. At Restless Development, we run a global project called the Accountability Advocates. As part of this initiative in the UK, young people have been trained to work on the implementation of the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). A team of young people collect data to monitor and hold the government to account on the SDGs in the UK, whilst also linking up with the wider global movement of accountability advocates. This initiative is a prime example of long-term active and political civic engagement, led and designed by young people who are supported to take action on issues that affect their lives.

5.6 Voluntary citizenship programmes should be available for everyone - and we should push for their inclusivity - but they are not right for everyone, so should not be compulsory. Young people should choose what sort of active citizenship works for them. Structured citizenship programmes should thus incorporate tailored and adaptable support, to ensure that young people can find a pathway to a form of citizenship which works for them. This model of personalised support is a crucial part of how Restless Development supports young people to become active.

5.7 We think that public citizenship ceremonies are not necessary, especially when substituted for personalised support, recognition and connection to a wider movement. In our experience, offering tailored 1:1 support to young people as they take action in their communities means that volunteers feel that their work and achievements are recognised, without the need for a formal ceremony. Moreover, it is important for young people to understand that active citizenship does not 'stop' after a programme has been completed; they should see themselves as developing the long-term habits of civic engagement.

5.8 Citizenship programmes offer exceptional value for money; they provide outcomes for the individual young people; but crucially for also the communities in which they take action; and longer-term as their active citizenship continue. Appreciating value for money requires an acknowledgement of the holistic nature of a schemes outcomes and its ability to impact on the individual, community and short and longer-term.

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

6.1 We recommend that institutions should invest in community-based and national organisations that have the expertise in supporting young people in civic engagement and are committed to creating spaces for young people to connect and take action. This provision of skills, opportunities is crucial to encouraging active citizenship.

6.2 At Restless Development, we have been demonstrating the power of supporting young people to lead and create spaces for civil society discussions and initiatives. Our series of ‘Youth Decide’ events are organised and facilitated by young people within our youth network. These events focus on topical global issues and bring together diverse young people to meet, discuss and collaborate on how they can take action on these issues. For example, during the Brexit election, young people came together in London to listen to other points of view, engage in immersive theatre techniques to understand different perspectives, and develop their opinions in a safe atmosphere. The creation of community spaces and investment in young leaders is a powerful way to build civic engagement, amplify youth voices, and grow community awareness.

6.3 Given the changing nature of citizenship, as noted above, there should be more flexibility in understanding what ‘civic engagement’ is and as a consequence, what types of initiatives should be funded. We recommend that funding for civic engagement is focused on youth-led community action, and on providing movements with the capacity to meaningfully access and engage with influencing spaces in which youth can impact change on local and global issues.

6.4 The government should also consider the implications of the Lobbying Act and the restrictions this places on engaging young people in active citizenship activities. The restrictions place strain on programmes, staff and volunteers, that rely on public communications and engagement in topical issues. One example is in the run up to the recent General Election volunteer’s blogs about the election were edited before being posted online, a direct contradiction of encouraging young people to freely speak out on politics. Given that amplifying youth voice is one of the foundations of active citizenship, the government should consider how the Lobbying Act impacts citizenship programmes and youth engagement in political processes.

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

7.1 As noted above, youth will define and exercise their citizenship in diverse ways. This could be a potential barrier if not embraced. For example, many citizenship initiatives could feel distant and rigid for young people who are driven to create change based on their lived experiences, but who lack knowledge of formal processes, wider citizenship concepts, or access to real decision-making spaces. This is particularly the case for minority youth groups, who do not see themselves represented in government or the establishment. Such lack of representation can alienate the concept of ‘politics’ and power from ordinary young people, and needs to be addressed to make ideas of formal citizenship and civic engagement relatable for minorities.

7.2 At Restless Development, we have also led on influencing governments globally to make political processes and spaces more youth friendly. This could take the form of structured, meaningful and effective participation in official policy processes, the promotion of formal and informal spaces where young people can engage with each other and the community at large, and volunteering schemes. We also advocate engaging with young people in the spaces where they already meet - be this is in communities, online or at universities.

7.3 21st century notions of identity are being reshaped by young people, as civic engagement is increasingly based on individual values and personal experience. Many young people view themselves through the lens of intersectionality, aware of how structural barriers to participation (such as race, class, gender and disability) can help or hinder their opportunities in life. Youth will thus feel motivated to take action on the issues and causes that they personally relate to, and not necessarily to notions of citizenship rooted in formal institutions and concepts. Institutions need to adapt to this changing reality by working directly with young people to co-create personalised routes for young people to get involved with civic activities.

7.4 In the specific case of citizenship programmes, there is a need to push for inclusion and diversity to ensure the opportunity is accessible to people from all parts of society. This may require additional investment, but ultimately strengthens the initiative. For example, within the International Citizenship Service programme, Restless Development has undertaken many measures to ensure that we can ensure young people are fully supported to lead and take action overseas and in the UK.

7.5 These adjustments can include fully understanding and altering programmes to support volunteers with mental health conditions; helping volunteers to access housing benefits once they return to the UK; providing personalised guidance on identity concerns such as sexuality and race; and more. Government funding for the programme ensures that any young person can access the opportunity, regardless of economic background. This is absolutely crucial to ensuring that certain groups do not feel “left behind” in citizenship opportunities - the first step is to acknowledge all the potential barriers and actively address them when recruiting and supporting young people to take action.

Mrs Violet Rook – written evidence (CCE0020)

The rights and responsibilities attached to citizenship

A citizen in the United Kingdom should have a voice in the community, to create fairness, equality and liberty for all for this and each generation now and in the future.

A chance to live a life which is protected by laws established in time via the legislature, common law and the judiciary.

I took part in the project in regard to a preamble for a written constitution in 2015 and this was a step towards that process of encouragement of active citizenship. Parliament needs to be open to such ideas which promote comment and to allow comment to lead to debate.

Citizens need to have the knowledge to join organisations locally and make their views known. Social Media promotes some active participation, but many people are afraid of personal involvement. This needs to be overcome if democracy is to be real for the next generation.

Local groups need to feel that their voice is heard and how to make it heard. Information via education and use of knowledge in regard to Parliamentary procedure can aid these ambitions. Our constitution is a balance of what went before, it shows where we have been and what we have created and how we have arrived at the decisions of today, and shows the way to the future.

The state of citizenship education and the role that it plays in creating active citizens

This should begin at school and be part of the National Curriculum. It should continue throughout childhood and be part of the qualifications obtained on leaving full time education. I studied the British Constitution O and A level GCE examinations and have also completed a MOOC course via Future Learn online. These courses were once considered unnecessary, but are vital in the 21st century if citizens are to understand the state and how it works.

Education in regard to citizenship and civic engagement should be conducted at a local, regional and national level. Events which are in progress at this time including visits to local government council meetings by school children and visits of councillors and members of parliament to schools to explain their role should be extended and be mandatory to their role. And adults attending a least once refresher Course on government in ten years would help understanding of any changes taking place.

Topics for education

Citizenship and civic engagement education

1279

Mrs Violet Rook – written evidence (CCE0020)

- should become part of the National Curriculum.
- should be mandatory at GCSE O and A level
- adults have a mandatory one day refresher course every ten years.
- all politicians eg members of parliament and councillors (parish, town county councillors) have a mandatory role to visit schools at least annually to explain role to pupils. These visits to be stated on their own website and on Parliamentary register.
- Members of Parliament to inform constituencies regarding work via email, text and social media weekly.
- Residents to be able to give views to MP's via active live feeds to Parliamentary debates.

The ways society can support civic engagement and the role of Government and Parliament. The relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion.

Individuals can be supported via being aware of their rights and the opportunities for involvement in civic engagement. I was involved with an organisation called Community Voices in Newcastle which brought together many individuals from all cultures and across generations. This involved representation in regard to Partnership Boards in the city where representatives from the Council, business, the public services and the voluntary sector all came together to discuss and make decisions regarding health, education and civic concerns.

Though these were not social groups, individuals brought together in this way made friends and learnt from each other. This led to a social cohesion which was praised by most of those involved and gave benefit to the city. Individuals learnt about other countries and different methods of government and how to adapt and co-operate.

Educating society via encouragement in civic engagement seems to prove that knowledge helps to unite.

Ways of Support

Provide education via National Curriculum

Local, regional and national encouragement for all cultures to be included in public, voluntary organisations with resources to allow information.

Made it mandatory for Councillors and Members of Parliament and House of Lords to attend schools at least annually to allow pupils to ask questions.

Pupils to see at least one civic engagement event in school year.

Video conferencing with MP's and local and national groups.

Mrs Violet Rook – written evidence (CCE0020)

Video conferencing with Parliamentary Committees and local and national groups on a regular basis to allow for comment and debate.

Video conferencing at a local level with Councils and residents and schools on a regular basis-real time.

Information is power therefore all generations need to be kept in touch with the real world and how decisions are made and feel they have a voice in such decisions or at least the voice can be used and hope give it could be heard.

14 August 2017

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

1. About the RSA and the Citizens’ Economic Council

1.1 The Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) aims to help citizens create fulfilling lives and a flourishing society. Supported by our 29,000 Fellows, we share powerful ideas, carry out cutting edge research, and build opportunities for people to collaborate.

1.2 The evidence in this submission draws upon qualitative evidence gathered by the RSA Citizens’ Economic Council research programme,⁷²⁰ which has engaged with 244 citizens across the UK on their experiences of economy and society in the following ways:

- An Economic Inclusion Roadshow: 12 focus groups across the UK engaging with 190 ‘left-behind’ citizens on economic inclusion (See Appendix A).
- The Citizens’ Economic Council: Engagement with a demographically diverse (see Appendix B), and randomly selected 54 citizens across the UK over five days in five months through a ‘jury-style’ deliberative process on economy and society.
- Crowdsourcing economic policy: engaging with over 1000 citizens on policy challenges identified by the Citizens’ Economic Council.

1.3 Our contributions in relation to education also draws upon the RSA’s experience working with a Family of seven RSA academies, as well as its work on creative learning and development through the Action and Research Centre.

2. Executive Summary

- Citizenship, including understanding how it is both supported and sustained, is a complex concept. The factors that shape it are individual (personalities and motivations), based on social networks, groups, and people’s environment, as well as wider social and global influences. Steps taken to strengthen citizenship therefore, will similarly need to be nuanced if they are to be successful.
- Effective civic engagement strengthens and deepens citizenship, and removes barriers that might exist preventing citizens from getting engaged. It also accounts for the risks of ‘engagement’ burnout and takes steps to safeguard citizens accordingly.

⁷²⁰ The RSA’s Citizens’ Economic Council Prospectus (2016): <https://www.thersa.org/discover/publications-and-articles/reports/economics-for-everyone-prospectus-for-the-citizens-economic-council>

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

- The RSA see learning and development, both in schools and in later life as critical to supporting active citizenship and civic engagement. Citizenship education has enormous potential to strengthen citizens’ sense of belonging and citizenship.
- Recent work at the RSA has illustrated the importance of investment in civic engagement capacity if we are to encourage a sense of belonging and citizenship amongst those most ‘left-behind’ by national economic policy.

3. Citizenship as a complex phenomenon

Citizenship was a reoccurring theme in the deliberations of the Citizens’ Economic Council and the participants outlined the following dimensions as of importance:

3.1 Citizenship as a social contract

Citizenship meant the gaining of civic and social rights, in exchange for wider civic and social responsibilities. Citizens suggested that citizenship involved looking beyond individual self-interest towards considering the wider collective good.⁷²¹ Those who fulfilled their responsibilities by adhering to laws and social norms, and contributing to society in some way, should have access to the basic rights of a citizen such as food, shelter, and work.

3.2 Citizenship is an important counterweight to consumerism

Participants recognised the tensions they experienced between wanting to be a ‘good citizen’ and the reality and pressures of their everyday life. For example, citizens contrasted their longer-term desire for food policy to promote healthy eating, sustainability and fair rewards for those in the supply chain, with their shorter-term desires for cheap, readily available and low cost food. Such examples demonstrate the importance of engaging with citizens in a more meaningful way, should policymakers seek to understand what it is that citizens want beyond market signals and consumer choice.

3.3 ‘Contribution’ needs to be understood broadly and barriers to it addressed

“We should value all types of contribution...even being parents.”

Participant, Citizens’ Economic Council

Citizens highlighted the gap between many forms of social contribution, and what is measured and therefore valued as an economic contribution (in GDP terms). For instance, we heard from a group of care workers about their experience of the disconnect between the contribution of care work and the way in which it was valued. Other participants in both the Roadshow and Council suggested society should appreciate contributions including parenting, unpaid childcare support, and volunteering. It was noted that many individuals ⁷²¹ This reflects a longstanding philosophical tradition, with roots in the thinking and analysis of Aristotle, Rousseau, Locke and Rawls. Social contract theory is not limited to the traditions of Western political thinking; its origins emerge from the work of 3BC Buddhist emperor Asoka.

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

may want to contribute but may face barriers including: a lack of time, poverty, or social circumstance (e.g disability). Structural problems within the democratic system were also mentioned; citizens felt that often engagement processes might be tokenistic rather than responsive, and spoke of disillusionment and apathy with democratic processes due to prior negative experiences. Promoting a stronger sense of citizenship requires understanding the structural barriers that prevent people from participating, and taking steps to address those barriers. Citizens must also be safeguarded against engagement ‘burn out’, by taking care not to ask them to commit beyond what they are practically able to give and volunteer:

“There’s pressure on the citizen to do more. I’ve always seen myself as a good citizen because I worked hard in school and did all the right things, and then you expect to get an amazing job but it doesn’t work like that. ... It isn’t valued that we do those little things like look after someone... But there isn’t anyone asking me ‘are you okay?’”

Participant, Citizens’ Economic Council

4. Effective civic engagement facilitates more active citizenship

4.1 The Citizens’ Economic Council proposed the following definition of engagement:

“Citizen engagement and empowerment”⁷²²

Citizens have the knowledge and capacity to positively contribute to society and the economy.

Citizens have the information, knowledge, capacity, understanding and the opportunity to participate to the degree they wish, in local, regional and national economic policy making.

Citizens are engaged and empowered to make decisions as communities – in ways that affect them locally and nationally.

Citizens are able to participate in their workplaces and in their roles as consumers, suppliers and employees.”

4.2 The most effective way of strengthening citizenship is to ensure good civic engagement is embedded in the course of the everyday life of the community. As the RSA report Community Capital details, empowerment also comes from being part of a social network and peer support, giving people a sense of self-efficacy and ability to engage as a citizen.⁷²³ Furthermore, people identify as citizens on multiple levels at the same time: community, region, nation (England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Island), state (UK), European and ⁷²² This paragraph is from the Citizens’ Economic Charter, co-created by the Council during their deliberations (See Appendix C for the full charter).

⁷²³ The RSA. (2015) Community Capital: The Value of Connected Communities. Available at: <https://www.thersa.org/discover/publications-and-articles/reports/community-capital-the-value-of-connected-communities>

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

global. A sense of belonging and connectivity is best built from the ground up - at a local level - and only with strong roots can a stronger sense of identity and pride be built.

5. Learning and development, both in schools and in later life as critical to supporting citizenship and civic engagement

“I think there should be more life education.... This would mean that children as they grow older then can make more informed decisions about their futures.”

Participant, Citizens’ Economic Council

5.1 Education has an essential role to play in ensuring that young people have the knowledge and skills they need to be active citizens. The schools in RSA Academies, serving disadvantaged communities in Birmingham and the Black Country, are committed to providing a broad education that prepares children for the world beyond school. Students engage with workplaces, receive support for volunteering opportunities and enterprise programmes, and receive age appropriate careers advice and guidance. Unfortunately the narrow school accountability frameworks at both primary and secondary school, combined with real terms funding cuts are putting pressure on state schools to reduce the amount of time they are able to devote to these aspects of a child’s education. Recommendations to support and encourage all schools to prioritise citizenship would be welcome. This view is echoed by findings from the Citizens’ Economic Council, which proposed a National Review of Citizenship Education to address low levels of public understanding of economics, politics and society:

“Review the current curriculum on life skills, any advice that’s out there, what post education formal opportunities for self-education are there. Are we teaching people to be good citizens? Are schools providing at thorough understanding of mental health?”

Participant, Citizens’ Economic Council

5.2 The Citizens’ Economic Council’s workshops with those of school age revealed that young people value and gain a great deal from civic engagement, and there are ways of encouraging young people to engage beyond voting. In Paris⁷²⁴ and Boston⁷²⁵ for instance, the cities’ participatory budgeting processes actively invite and welcome engagement from young people and children below voting age on how to spend their city’s budget.

⁷²⁴ A proportion of Paris’s investment budget was reserved for spending on youth and education projects. In 2016 a new school framework enabled 66, 155 children to vote in determining how that money is spent. Mairie de Paris. (2016) The Participatory Budget of the City of Paris. Available at: <https://www.paris.fr/actualites/the-participatory-budget-of-the-city-of-paris-4151>

⁷²⁵ Through Boston’s ‘Youth Lead the Change’ initiative, young people aged 12-25 have offered and voted on over 700 ideas for urban improvements through online crowdsourcing and public vote. In the programme’s first year, 1,500 young people cast votes at polling places in schools, community centres and transit stations across the city. City of Boston. (2017) Youth Lead the Change. Available at: <https://www.boston.gov/departments/boston-centers-youth-families/youth-lead-change>

6. Civic engagement can address the exclusion experienced by those ‘left behind’

6.1 People feel ‘left behind’ as a consequence of their interactions with the economy and the lack of opportunities available in their communities

A consistent theme throughout all workshops was a sense of inequality, lack of trust and imbalance in power between politicians, corporations, economic institutions and citizens. Many participants said that this made them and those that they knew feel disillusioned with the system and less likely to engage. Another strong theme that emerged was that a decline in services available had affected people’s sense of belonging to a community and being in an environment that enabled them to reach their full potential. We heard of concerns such as: lack of access to local voluntary and community services; uncertainties about the future of a local community centre; funding cuts to the police, NHS, and educational institutions; and the lack of good quality job opportunities, all of which affected peoples’ ability to take part in society. More specific barriers mentioned were the lack of translation services or language classes, particularly in some of the multicultural areas we visited, such as Birmingham and Oldham. In Oldham, the citizens of Bangladeshi, Indian and Pakistani origin we spoke to felt disempowered by the disappearance of local civic support such as translation services, which had previously helped to strengthen community cohesion, and improve dialogue with public services.

6.2 Investing in people and places is necessary to unlock civic engagement

6.2.1 Civic engagement initiatives form an important part of investment in people and place. The RSA’s Inclusive Growth Commission has called such initiatives ‘social infrastructure’⁷²⁶ – ensuring that as many people as possible are able to both contribute to and benefit from growth. We understand social infrastructure as including early years support, education, skills and lifelong learning projects, early action and early intervention work and investment in community development. These are all crucial in helping people, communities and places connect to the benefits of economic activity – as well as to ensure those citizens and communities ‘left behind’ are able to realise their full potential as active citizens.

6.2.2 We found that citizens demonstrate, benefit from, and value social leadership. Very often social leadership is forged from necessity; building informal social networks and relationships to strengthen resilience in the face of economic exclusion. Many also spoke of the untapped potential citizens had to demonstrate social leadership, that could have been realised had they access to greater (financial and non-financial) support that understood the needs of the community.

⁷²⁶ Inclusive Growth Commission. (2017) Inclusive Growth Commission: Making our Economy Work for Everyone. Available at: <https://www.thersa.org/discover/publications-and-articles/reports/final-report-of-the-inclusive-growth-commission>

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

“We work closely with the government, the local authority – we think we can do a better job as we are crowdsourcing ideas from the bottom up... we know how to solve our own problems – we just need the funding to get on with it.” - Participant, Ardenglen Housing Association, Glasgow

6.2.3 One example we encountered was that of a community group of older women who were given a small amount of NHS funding and supported by a housing association to run activities such as gardening and walking in one of Glasgow’s most deprived areas. When the funding ran out, the group had enough of a stake in the initiative to keep it going – and it continues to this day. One avenue to build membership and belonging is to better understand, identify and support social leadership in communities, and the kinds of civic institutions that can act as vehicles for strengthening sense of citizenship.

6.2.4 We have seen further examples of this through work the RSA has undertaken with community businesses⁷²⁷ across England. Across a wide range of community led businesses, from farms to community centres, we have heard about similar stories of positive impacts from the agency which local civic participation can provide. In Leeds, for example, having successfully developed a community health and wellbeing centre, the New Wortley Community Association is now developing community housing in the local area.

7. The importance of investment in civic engagement capacity

7.1 The key message from our workshops was that people will only engage if they feel it is meaningful and there is chance of them affecting change. Central and local government, and civil society organisations should be prepared to share power and co-produce initiatives with citizens if they are sincere about encouraging civic engagement. The RSA propose that:

7.2 Government conducts a review on, and creates a code of practice for civic engagement

The government last conducted a review⁷²⁸ and created a code of practice on consultation in 2008, which is now archived.⁷²⁹ We propose that a new review is undertaken, and a code of practice is created which moves beyond consultation, towards a wider range of civic engagement approaches.

7.3 Local government structures embed civic engagement into their governance

Combined authorities, LEPs and local authorities have an opportunity to use their new powers to work with residents, civil society and businesses to embed deliberative civic engagement approaches into their decision making processes. We propose that such bodies

⁷²⁷ RSA is delivering a leadership programme for people involved in community business across England. For more information see: Community Business Leadership Programme.

⁷²⁸ Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform. (2007) Effective Consultation. Available at: <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20090609052113/http://www.berr.gov.uk/files/file44374.pdf>

⁷²⁹ Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform. (2008) Code of Practice on Consultation. Available at:

<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20090609023708/http://www.berr.gov.uk/files/file47158.pdf>

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

work together to co-design and establish a charter for civic engagement for their city. This would set out a shared vision for engagement, the principles upon which it will be based, the practical ways in which citizens will be supported to get involved and the influence and impact they can achieve.

7.4 The government pilot and implement voluntary national service on policy issues

Participants on the Citizens’ Economic Council proposed setting up a form of voluntary national service for citizens akin to current jury service. This would pay individuals for their time and reimburse employers so that they could participate in national citizens’ panels that learnt about and advised government on policy issues. These are approaches that have been tried and tested across the world; notably through Ireland’s constitutional convention⁷³⁰, and through deliberative citizens’ reference panels, citizen assemblies and councils in Canada⁷³¹ and Australia⁷³² at a local government level.

⁷³⁰ For more information see: Convention on the Constitution. Available at:

<https://www.constitution.ie/Convention.aspx>

⁷³¹ Recommendations from the Toronto Residents’ Reference Panel on the Davenport Community Overpass (2017). Available at :

https://static1.squarespace.com/static/55af0533e4b04fd6bca65bc8/t/55e48e32e4b01d0dc78b6144/1441041970276/Davenport_Panel_Report_EN.pdf

⁷³² City of Melbourne. (2017) Participate Melbourne: 10 Year Financial Plan. Available at:

<https://participate.melbourne.vic.gov.au/10yearplan>

Appendix A: Economic Inclusion Roadshow focus groups – make-up, recruitment, themes

Theme	Location	Date	Participants	Partner(s)
Industrial decline	Port Talbot, Baglan Community Centre	15-Oct-16	14 residents of Port Talbot. The participants were from a range of age groups, and mainly from socio-economic groups D, as well as some C2 and E.	Recruitment Agency
Low paid work	UNISON, London Offices	18-Oct-16	13 members of UNISON’s Homecare Workers Panel. 12 careworkers (all female) and one care receiver (male). The participants were middle-aged; they were predominately white British but two participants were from black and Asian and minority ethnic (BAME) groups, and there was one white South African.	UNISON
Disability discrimination	Islington, Disability Action in Islington Offices	26-Oct-16	21 members of Disability Action in Islington. The participants were from a range of age groups and ethnic groupings.	Disability Action in Islington; Tamsin Curno
Ethnicity and low income	Oldham, Coppice Neighbourhood Centre	08-Nov-16	19 local residents from ethnic minority backgrounds: Indian, Pakistani and Bangladeshi. Many participants were from low-income backgrounds; 13 of the participants were female; and the majority were middle-aged but there were also some participants aged 18-30.	Doing Social; Coppice Neighbourhood Centre

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

Youth perspectives	Tipton	22-Nov-16	Two groups (of 14 and 16 participants) at post-16 level. One group of nine participants at Year 8 level. Predominately white British, several international students from Norway and Italy.	RSA Academy Tipton
Industrial decline	Clacton-on-Sea, Baptist Church Hall on Pier Avenue	03-Dec-16	11 residents of Clacton-on-Sea, Holland-on-Sea, and Jaywick. The participants were from a range of age groups, and primarily from socio-economic groups C2, as well as some D and E.	Recruitment agency
LGBT discrimination	Central Birmingham	07-Dec-16	10 members of Birmingham LGBT Network, around a third of whom were from BAME groups and one Eastern European.	Birmingham LGBT
Debt and money	Birmingham, Aston	12-Jan-17	14 participants, the majority of whom were women. Participants were recruited from the Money Advice Service and the English as a Second Language (ESL) groups. Participants were predominately from BAME groups.	Birmingham Settlement
Declining community services	Birmingham, Kitts Green	12-Jan-17	19 participants, from a range of age groups. Predominately white British but a few participants from BAME groups.	Birmingham Settlement
Community resilience and housing	Glasgow, Ardenglen Housing Association	18-Jan-17	Nine participants, all white British women aged 40+.	Ardenglen Housing Association

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

Youth perspectives	London, Camden Town Hall	31-Jan-17	30 participants from a range of ethnic backgrounds, aged between 15- and 19-years-old. Schools were invited to partake on the basis that they had a free school meal intake of over 40 percent.	Greater London Authority (GLA) Fiona Tycross Assembly Member (AM)
--------------------	--------------------------	-----------	---	---

Appendix B: Composition of the Citizens' Economic Council

ETHNICITY

- White British
- Black British
- British Asian
- EU National

SOCIAL GRADE

- AB
- C1
- C2
- DE

Appendix C: The Citizens' Economic Charter

During the course of the Citizens Economic Council we asked our citizens to identify key themes and values by which they thought our economy should be governed. These are laid out in the Economic Charter below. These values were created by councillors from a range of different ethnic backgrounds, age, socio-economic class and gender, and should be recognised as universal in the same way that the UN's Universal Declaration of Human Rights are. Labelling values as 'British' is not only false as many of these values are internationally recognised, but also counterproductive to creating a shared sense of identity; by trying to erect differences rather than appreciate commonalities this type of rhetoric establishes further division and segregation.

A citizens' economy is one that secures:

Fairness

- Citizens are able to make an equal contribution to the economy, according to their means and their ability.
- Citizens have equality of opportunity within an economy.
- The gap between those citizens who can make contributions and those who have access to opportunities and those who do not is closed, through education, transparency and policy.

Social justice

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

Where no citizen fails to have their basic needs met, and vulnerable citizens are protected.

We understand basic needs as:

- Food
- Shelter
- Healthcare
- Access to work
- Participation in society
- Education
- Ensures that everyone has what they need, everyone contributes and everyone's contribution is valued equally.
- Creates policies that support the realisation of these goals, through increased government investment in the necessary infrastructure.
- Ensures equality of access to opportunities and confers rights upon citizens. It also confers responsibilities upon citizens.

Innovation for social good

- Involvement in innovation: Decisions made about the economy should provide many opportunities for all citizens to be involved in innovation. Economic decision-makers should have a strategy in place that allows all citizens to influence innovation.
- Innovation to secure social justice: Innovation should be led by and aim to contribute to social value and social need – understood as developing new ideas and ways of working that help communities and individuals to achieve social justice.
- Innovation has a purpose: Whether for profit or non-profit, organisations and businesses aim to secure innovation that promotes social justice.

Sustainability

- Economic sustainability: Sustainability should aim to secure a more resilient economy in the longer-term, able to withstand and weather crises in the financial system.
- Environmental sustainability: Economic decisions must consider long term impacts on the environment and society (communities and citizens), and take into account the indirect consequences of policy changes and external conditions or impacts eg technological change. Sustainability requires us to manage resources well for the long term; preserving our soil, water, forests and clean air for our basic needs.

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

- Social sustainability: Social sustainability seeks to build mixed and balanced communities – ensuring that citizens with diverse skills and a diverse workforce can live in any area of the country.

Governments should think beyond the constraints of short-term, political timeframes when formulating economic policy. Longer-term thinking must be secured and ensured by continuity of government policy, which seeks to protect the planet and people.

Citizen engagement and empowerment

- Citizens have the knowledge and capacity to positively contribute to society and the economy.
- Citizens have the information, knowledge, capacity, understanding and the opportunity to participate to the degree they wish, in local, regional and national economic policymaking.
- Citizens are engaged and empowered to make decisions as communities in ways that affect them locally and nationally.
- Citizens are able to participate in their workplaces and in their roles as consumers, suppliers and employees.

Devolved power and decision-making

- Stronger accountability between citizens and institutions should be created with national economic institutions directly responsive to, and supportive of local government, shifting away from a ‘top-down’ model of decision making.
- In turn, local government should be responsive to locally agreed priorities, generated by citizens.
- Decisions should be made at a local level where possible, seeking to re-establish trust.

Accountability and transparency

All institutions making economic decisions should have stronger accountability to citizens and provide mechanisms through which citizens can hold them to account for their decisions. Transparency underpins all of the values laid out in this Charter. Transparency means:

- Providing public access to unfiltered and straightforwardly presented information, through multiple channels and using a wide range of platforms (for example online, paper and so on)

Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Commerce and Manufactures (RSA) – written evidence (CCE0088)

- Information should be both understandable and trustworthy.
- Systems must encourage the transparency, impartiality and independent scrutiny of leaders within them. Those leaders should have clearly defined roles, and the appropriate knowledge and skills to make policy that is fit for purpose
- Having the appropriate legislative and regulatory framework in place to enable citizens to monitor performance against the Charter values, supported by an effective enforcement system.

7 September 2017

The Runnymede Trust/Race on the Agenda – written evidence (CCE0214)

2. Pride in being British will be at its strongest when everyone is treated fairly by our institutions, has equal opportunities in school and at work, and has equal access to our public services. Without this, government will not be able to engender belonging and pride in citizenship for all. Miscarriages of justice undermine our identity as citizens. For BME groups, these injustices are clear in education, in the labour market and throughout the criminal justice system. This will be expanded upon further in our response to question 9. The impact on belonging is clear, with research by the University of Manchester showing that those who fall victim to institutional racism are half as likely to feel connected to Britain.⁷³³ Government must live up to its promise to its citizens – a country works for everyone - to ensure pride in citizenship.

Reducing the cost of the citizenship application process would help strengthen newcomers' identity as British. From April 2017, an adult wishing to naturalise has to pay £1282 and an additional £80 for the citizenship ceremony.⁷³⁴ The monthly gross income for an adult above the age of 25 working full time on the National Living Wage is £1218. The cost of the naturalisation process is not affordable.

4. Voting is the symbol of citizenship and engagement with the state. Citizens should have a say in how our government is run and our institutions are shaped. Yet people from BME backgrounds are less likely to be registered to vote. However, this should not be taken as an indication of disengagement. Once registered, BME turnout rates are very similar to white British ones. Worryingly, the proposed constituency boundary changes run the risk of disproportionately disenfranchising BME voters. Drawn only to include registered voters, the proposal will increase constituency sizes where BME are more likely to live, diluting their voting power. Government should be mindful of the unintended consequences of current and proposed electoral polices and mitigate any disproportionate impact. The boundary changes should not be based on those already registered.⁷³⁵

Additionally, the younger age profile of BME people, accounting for 20% of 18-21 year olds, make them more likely to have recently changed address.⁷³⁶ Lowering the voting age would bring more BME people into the franchise. Additionally, a survey by the Electoral ⁷³³University of Manchester (2013). Diversity or deprivation – what's the issue? Available at:

<http://www.ethnicity.ac.uk/medialibrary/briefings/publications/diverse-neighbourhoods-policy-brief.pdf>

⁷³⁴Home Office (2017). Fees with Effect from 6 April 2017 for Citizenship Applications and the Right of Abode. Available at:

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/607005/NationalityFeesLeaflet_2017.pdf

⁷³⁵ Omar Khan and Kjartan Sveinsson (2015). Race and Elections. Available at:

http://www.runnymedetrust.org/uploads/RaceandElectionsFINAL_interactive.pdf

⁷³⁶ Khan and Sveinsson (2015). Race and Elections.

Commission in 2015 found BME voters were twice as likely to say they would have voted if they could vote online or if voting was held over the weekend.⁷³⁷ We support the recommendation of the Digital Democracy Commission that secure online voting should be an option for all voters.⁷³⁸ A lack of awareness amongst Commonwealth citizens of their right to vote was another major cause of non-registration. Outreach is needed to ensure widespread awareness of voting rights for Commonwealth and Pakistani citizens living in the UK.⁷³⁹

5. It is essential that pupils and students have a solid understanding of how participatory democracy and government works, what our rights and laws are, and how we live together in a multicultural society. A survey by the Electoral Commission found a deficit of information was key to understanding lower rates of BME voter registration. 21 percent of BME people who failed to register gave lack of information about political parties, compared to four percent of unregistered White people.⁷⁴⁰ Cementing knowledge of political parties and our political system in schools is paramount. Equally, how we can live together successfully in a multicultural society should be part of this teaching.

History has an important role to play in training pupils to be tolerant citizens in a future society that is cohesive. The past has the potential to bring us together as country, by bringing shared experiences of a long-existing multi-ethnic Britain to life. Equally, it should not gloss over the painful and less talked-on aspects of our history that is often missing from our school books, our classrooms and our national discourse. We cannot create a truly unified society until we acknowledge how and why the stereotyping, inequality and discrimination we are still fighting in the UK came to be. The history of British colonialism and migration should be a compulsory part of the curriculum. The Runnymede Trust, with partners at the University of Manchester and Cambridge University have created an online resource – Our Migration Story - to support teachers and students studying migration to Britain.⁷⁴¹ It is important that teachers and trainee teachers have the support and resources they need to teach citizenship effectively.

6. The National Citizenship Service (NCS) plays an important role in sparking an interest in social action in young people. However, to encourage a long-term commitment to active

⁷³⁷ IPSOS MORI (2015). Electoral Commission Post-General Election 2015 - United Kingdom. Available at: http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/_data/assets/pdf_file/0009/190944/May-2015-UKPGE-Public-opinion-survey-Data-tables-UK.pdf

⁷³⁸ Electoral Reform Services (2015). The Digital Democracy Commission. Available at: <https://www.electoralreform.co.uk/news/blogs/digital-democracy-commission>

⁷³⁹ Khan and Sveinsson (2015). Race and Elections.

⁷⁴⁰ IPSOS MORI (2015). Electoral Commission Post-General Election 2015 - United Kingdom. Available at: http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/_data/assets/pdf_file/0009/190944/May-2015-UKPGE-Public-opinion-survey-Data-tables-UK.pdf

⁷⁴¹ Runnymede Trust. Our Migration Story. Available at: <http://www.ourmigrationstory.org.uk/about.html>

citizenship that is good value for money, government should give support to smaller, local civil society organisations that carry out similar work. NCS currently runs over a 4-week period. Incorporating a longer-term local community project into the programme would encourage enduring commitment to active citizenship.

The NCS Trust currently has contracts with nine providers, across 18 regions, to deliver the programme. Diversifying the delivery partners to include local charities already working with young people has the potential to bring down costs and utilise the expertise these organisations have. This also has the potential to lower the cost of the programme. The Public Accounts Committee found that the cost-per-participant at its current level is too high. Action must be taken to ensure tax-payers money is spent efficiently and effectively.⁷⁴² Additionally, volunteering and social action works because participants have the choice to take part and give back as they see fit to the causes that matter to them. NCS should not be compulsory.

7. Civic engagement is primarily the responsibility of government. As discussed, it is imperative that government ensure ethnic inequalities, and inequalities in general, are minimised to guarantee civic engagement for all. Third sector organisations encourage civic participation either as a direct objective or by creating volunteering opportunities. However, these organisations are facing financial insecurity coupled with an increase in demand. Between 2010 and 2012, NCVO data revealed that income from government to UK charities fell by nearly 9%, in real terms, equalling £1.3bn.⁷⁴³ The BME voluntary sector has fared far worse. In 2007, 53% of funding for BME organisations was from statutory sources, setting the scene for a decade of financial insecurity.⁷⁴⁴ Government can support civil society initiatives that encourage civic engagement in two ways: by supporting them to become financially stable and by listening to the expertise these organisations have gained from their work and using it to inform its policies.

8. All of us in Britain should support the common values that we all share. These values are not unique or exceptional to Britain.⁷⁴⁵ These include tolerance, acceptance, belief in equality and democracy, and respect for the rule of law.⁷⁴⁶ Research by the Dr Lindsay Richards and Professor Anthony Heath revealed that socioeconomic status is the best

⁷⁴² The Committee of Public Accounts (2017). National Citizen Service. Available at:

https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmpubacc/955/95507.htm#_idTextAnchor012

⁷⁴³ NCVO Civil Society Almanac (2014). Over £1bn of government income wiped from charities. Available at: <https://www.ncvo.org.uk/about-us/media-centre/press-releases/621-over-1billion-government-income-wiped-from-charities>

⁷⁴⁴ Voice4Change England (2015). Who is the BME voluntary sector? Available at: <http://www.voice4change-england.co.uk/content/who-bme-voluntary-sector>

⁷⁴⁵ Grouzet, F, Kasser T, and Ahuvia, A. (2005). Journal of Personality and Social Psychology Vol. 89, No. 5, 800–816

⁷⁴⁶ DfE (2014). Guidance on promoting British values in schools. Available at:

<https://www.gov.uk/government/news/guidance-on-promoting-british-values-in-schools-published>

predictor of support of tolerance, equality and the rule of law. Higher income and education levels correlate with stronger support for these values. Once you adjust for these differences all ethnic groups expressed a similar level of support.⁷⁴⁷ The citizenship of women, ethnic minority groups and the country as a whole, can be strengthened by reducing socioeconomic inequality.

9. BME people and working class communities feel ‘left behind’ for a number of reasons that directly reflect their socioeconomic position and treatment by institutions. The ‘left-behind’ includes both the white working class and ethnic minority working class. These communities have close shared interests and would benefit equally from policies aimed at all low income groups.⁷⁴⁸ For example, Black Caribbean pupils, Gypsy, Roma and Irish Traveller students and white working class boys on free school meals had the lowest attainment at GCSE in 2015 and 2016.⁷⁴⁹ Both income and ethnicity effect the educational outcomes of pupils at school.⁷⁵⁰

Further research indicates that this is also the case in the workplace. The Trade Unions Congress (TUC) and Business in the Community (BITC) documented that racist bullying and harassment at work is commonplace across the country. BME employees are less likely to be identified as having high potential or be promoted.⁷⁵¹ The recent report by the Social Mobility Commission made clear that young Muslim people are facing Islamophobia and discrimination at work and at school. The result, only 6 percent of Muslims are in ‘higher managerial, administrative and professional occupations’ compared to 10 percent of the overall population.⁷⁵² Even when qualifications are taken into account, ethnic minorities are more likely to be unemployed than their White counterparts.⁷⁵³

⁷⁴⁷ Dr Lindsay Richards and Professor Anthony Heath. Social integration and British values: how divided are we? Available at: <https://www.britac.ac.uk/blog/social-integration-and-british-values-how-divided-are-we>

⁷⁴⁸ Dr Omar Khan and Dr Faiza Shaheen. Minority Report Race and Class in post-Brexit Britain. Available at: <http://www.runnymedetrust.org/uploads/publications/pdfs/Race%20and%20Class%20Post-Brexit%20Perspectives%20report%20v5.pdf>

⁷⁴⁹ EHRC (2016). Healing a Divided Britain: the need for a comprehensive race equality strategy. Available at: https://www.equalityhumanrights.com/sites/default/files/healing_a_divided_britain_-_the_need_for_a_comprehensive_race_equality_strategy_final.pdf

⁷⁵⁰ Gargi Bhattacharyy et al. (2003). Minority Ethnic Attainment and Participation in Education and Training: The Evidence. Available at: <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20130402115910/https://www.education.gov.uk/publications/eOrderingDownload/RTP01-03MIG1734.pdf>

⁷⁵¹ Ruby McGregor-Smith (2017) Race in the Workplace. Available at: https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/594336/race-in-workplace-mcgregor-smith-review.pdf

⁷⁵² Jacqueline Stevenson et al. (2017). The Social Mobility Challenges Faced by Young Muslims. Available at: https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/642220/Young_Muslims_SM_C.pdf

⁷⁵³ NAO (2008). Widening participation in higher education available at: <https://www.nao.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2008/06/0708725.pdf>

The criminal justice system also treats people unfairly. A Black man is still five times more likely to be stopped and searched by police than a White man in England and Wales.⁷⁵⁴ David Lammy MP's recent review of the criminal justice system found a third of young people in custody have spent time in the care system. A third of the prison population were homeless before entering.⁷⁵⁵ Furthermore, the 'Prevent' strategy has led some Muslim groups to feel they are being treated unfairly, stereotyped and socially excluded.⁷⁵⁶

These considerations are more urgent given the unequal outcomes in the job market and unfair treatment by institutions engender the belief that politicians do not serve BME communities. A survey by the Electoral Commission found that 26 percent of BME respondents that had not registered to vote chose "Don't like politics/politicians, or nobody represents my view" as the motivating factor. This is compared to 2 percent of White respondents. For our society to be united around common values and generate active citizens, it is imperative that our institutions work for everyone. We continue to call on government to prioritise tackling economic inequality, disproportionality in the criminal justice system and discrimination in the labour market.

10. Civic engagement is inextricably linked to integration and social cohesion. As discussed previously, inequality in the job market and education, coupled with discrimination and racism, not only affect attachment to Britain but also the likelihood of registering to vote. Citizens must feel that government works for them, politicians represent them and institutions treat them fairly to feel like full citizens.

Schools, universities and workplaces are important sites for integration – a vital opportunity to meet people different from ourselves. Additionally, structures and processes within these institutions significantly affect an individual's outcomes and perception of their stake in society. Research by James Laurence at the University of Manchester shows that positive interactions with ethnic minorities at work improves attitudes towards minority groups.⁷⁵⁷

Catney, G, Sabater, A (2015). Ethnic minority disadvantage in the labour market available at:

<https://www.jrf.org.uk/report/ethnic-minority-disadvantage-labour-market>

Alexander, C, Weekes-Bernard, D and Arday, J (2015). The Runnymede School Report Race, Education and Inequality in Contemporary Britain available at:

<http://www.runnymedetrust.org/uploads/The%20School%20Report.pdf>

⁷⁵⁴ EHRC (2016). Healing a Divided Britain: the need for a comprehensive race equality strategy.

⁷⁵⁵ David Lammy (2017). The Lammy Review An independent review into the treatment of, and outcomes for, Black, Asian and Minority Ethnic individuals in the Criminal Justice System. Available at:

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/643001/lammy-review-final-report.pdf

⁷⁵⁶ Saffron Karlsen and James Y. Nazroo (2015). The Sociological Review, Vol. 63, 759–78. Available at:

<http://journals.sagepub.com/doi/pdf/10.1111/1467-954X.12313>

⁷⁵⁷ James Laurence (2017). The key to a more integrated society: understanding the impact and limits of social mixing. Available at: <http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/politicsandpolicy/understanding-the-impact-and-limits-of-social-mixing/>

Negative contact with ethnic minorities at work does have the opposite effect, but the impact is much less severe than in neighbourhoods. Research by the University of Manchester reveals that those living in communities with higher levels of deprivation were more likely to say that people in the area do not get on well together.⁷⁵⁸ BME groups are more likely to live in deprived areas and more likely to be in poverty. It is essential that government makes tackling BME inequality and deprivation a priority to ensure our society is cohesive and citizens engaged. This would increase diversity in workplaces and education concurrently to successful integration.

11. English language proficiency is integral to ensure successful integration and this has been widely acknowledged in the Casey Review and the report of the APPG on social integration.⁷⁵⁹ English language skills facilitate integration in the job market and in education. It aids access to services and enables social mixing. These must be targeted and accessible to the groups that need them. Classes should be flexible and include community and college-based services to take into account a variety of working patterns and hours. Crèche provision for those with childcare needs should also be available.⁷⁶⁰ Adequate funding for these classes is essential.

As previously discussed, the naturalisation process is too expensive, amounting to more than the monthly salary of someone on the National Living Wage. Government should reduce the cost to encourage citizenship acquisition. As it stands, the citizenship test unduly focuses on culture and history over more practical lessons for life in Britain. British culture is multifaceted and there is no universal experience. We support the analysis of Dr Thom Brooks that the test is too expensive, inconsistent and requires the memorisation of irrelevant information that is unlikely common knowledge for British-born citizens.⁷⁶¹ Instead, the citizenship test should prepare newcomers to navigate the civic landscape: how to vote, how to access services and how our institutions work.

12. RECLAIM is a social change organisation that works with working class young people in Manchester. They work with young people which are deemed ‘hard to reach’ or disadvantaged and run leadership programmes for 12-15 year olds from working class communities and run an Alumni Network until they are 22. Their variety of programmes train young people to be active citizens, supporting youth-led campaigns as well as working with universities and employers to reduce the barriers faced by working class youth.⁷⁶²

⁷⁵⁸University of Manchester (2013). Diversity or deprivation – what’s the issue?

⁷⁵⁹ Dame Louise Casey (2016). The Casey Review: a review into opportunity and integration. Available at: <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/the-casey-review-a-review-into-opportunity-and-integration>

⁷⁶⁰ Refugee Action (2016). Let Refugees Learn. Available at: http://www.refugee-action.org.uk/campaigns/let_refugees_learn/

⁷⁶¹ Brooks, Thom (2013) ‘The Life in the UK citizenship test: Is it unfit for purpose?’ Durham Law School Briefing Document, Durham University.

⁷⁶² RECLAIM. <https://www.reclaim.org.uk/Pages/Category/About-us>

Equally, Advocacy Academy support young leaders from marginalised groups to develop the skills and confidence they need to campaign on issues affecting their communities. They bring in campaigners, academics, local councillors and MPs over eight months to train participants to lead a grassroots campaign in their community, and deliver a speech to their MP in the House of Commons.⁷⁶³ These initiatives focus on encouraging civic participation long-term and focus on young people from backgrounds that are least represented in public life.

⁷⁶³ The Advocacy Academy. <http://www.theadvocacyacademy.com/#the-latest>

Scottish Older People's Assembly – written evidence (CCE0212)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

The Scottish Older People's Assembly's particular interest is in ensuring that older people are enabled to influence the policies and services that affect them. This presents a challenge as retired people often are more isolated from other members of the community and less adept at accessing and responding to digital means of communication. Older people are often portrayed as a burden on the community. There is a need to overcome that and create a situation in which their experience and lives are seen to be valued.

We have set out some proposals below which we would be pleased to present personally. The aim of these being to identify new ways of building bridges within and between communities, and to support civic engagement. How to think about citizenship and civic engagement in a more vibrant, positive and integrated manner is of particular interest to the committee.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

Lack of confidence in the effectiveness of the political system is probably not so much a matter of laws as attitudes and behaviour of politicians. There is a tendency for politicians to believe that their only function is to operate within the parliamentary (or council) bubbles.

Public perception of the government is coloured by the adversarial nature of the Party system. If one says black the other feels obliged to say white. It is probably inevitable in our election process, but it gives the impression that inter-party point scoring over-rides the commitment to working together for the common good of citizens. Improving appropriate public participation in policy formation and implementation would help to improve that. There are many non-political representative groups who could be involved in relevant parliamentary discussions to help keep them objective.

We too often have the impression that citizens and their representatives are seen as a nuisance or distraction from the business of the Parliaments, councils and public bodies and that contact is quite grudgingly allocated to meetings with them. We appreciate that elected representatives have jobs to do but nevertheless they should understand that their prime function is to represent all of the people and not just their own parties. They should make an effort to prioritise their contact with the public.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Our experience is that the Scottish Parliament and government are more open to contact with the public than Westminster. We appreciate that. While we believe it is well intentioned our experience is that interaction with the public and representative bodies is often not as productive as it might be.

For example, public access to Cross Party Groups is welcome, but very few MSPs attend and then often only briefly. Too often the meetings become just a series of reports from the various public groups. That is useful in networking and disseminating knowledge, but there is usually no impression that the MSPs will take the issues forward to government for consideration or action. There should be a more systematic procedure of reporting which MSPs will progress particular issues -perhaps in conjunction with the body that raised them - and a commitment that they will report back on whether policies or suggestions will be adopted or implemented.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

The proportion of older people in the population is steadily increasing. Yet all too often the social benefits of longevity are portrayed negatively as a problem, rather than as an achievement to be celebrated. Older people are regularly exposed to that. There is a need to build confidence in the contribution positive benefits older people bring to society.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

We believe that the Scottish Older People's Assembly has helped to overcome some of the above challenges in Scotland. Our approach has been to hold regular consultative meetings with a wide range of older people all over Scotland inviting them to express their concerns and their proposals for improvement of existing, or suggestions for new services and policies. We then act as their voice in relaying their views to Ministers and officials of the Scottish and to a lesser extent, UK governments. We believe that is an approach which should be developed and encouraged.

More background about SOPA and our activities follows: -

The Scottish Older People's Assembly (SOPA) was formed in 2009 and became a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation in April 2016. It is led by older people, comprising 25-member organisations representing around 36,500 older citizens across Scotland. Our purposes are the improvement of human rights, the interests of older people, the equality and diversity of older people and citizenship and community development for older people. We influence decision makers on legislation, policies and services applying to older people and hold an annual national Assembly in the Debating Chamber of the Scottish Parliament enabling direct contact between older people and politicians. Please see our website for background information at www.scotopa.org.uk As a result of this exchange older people become aware of Scotland's democratic system, how policies and legislation are developed and how services are implemented.

Since April 2016 more than 900 people have participated in 21 SOPA meetings around Scotland, two Scottish Parliamentary receptions, one Westminster reception and one national Assembly. The morning session of the Assembly, held in November 2016 was chaired by the Parliamentary Presiding Officer Ken Macintosh and Alex Cole-Hamilton MSP chaired the afternoon session. Keynote speeches were given by the Minister for Social Security, the Chairperson of SOPA and 13 older people who represented member organisations. The afternoon session dealt with preventative issues and a dialogue between politicians and officials was hosted by Alex Cole-Hamilton MSP. 160 delegates attended the Assembly involving 67 different organisations from a wide range of equality groups. The majority were from the Central Belt, but Dumfries and Galloway, Scottish Borders, Grampian, Orkney and West of Scotland were represented. We delivered a report on the Assembly and presented it to the Scottish Government. See our December newsletter for details. <http://www.scotopa.org.uk/2016assembly.asp>

Efficient maintenance of our website and social media which includes all of our events and activities has doubled and boosted reaches and engagement with older people and stakeholders over the internet.

A post-assembly letter to the SOPA Coordinator from Jean Freeman MSP, Minister for Social Security stated "I congratulate you and your colleagues on what you have accomplished during the past year to advance equality for older people and for arranging such a successful event."

The Westminster reception was hosted by Mhairi Black MP early in 2017 and dealt with the anomalies and negative effects within the current pension system, particularly those linked to WASPI. Christine Graham MSP hosted the Scottish Parliament reception that celebrated older people's contribution to democracy and how discrimination towards the older LGBTi community disadvantages them. Trading Standards Scotland in Partnership with SOPA delivered a third reception hosted by Alex Cole-Hamilton MSP. This event singled out some of the issues raised during the national Assembly relating to Scotland's National Outcome - "We live our lives safe from crime, disorder and danger". Mr Cole-Hamilton said: "This was one of the most enjoyable events I've had the pleasure to host. I think we should make it an annual event. What do you say?!"

"Our strength as active citizens derives from the participation of our member organisations. We are pleased that has been recognised in the public and political sphere. Holyrood Magazine which organises prestigious conferences, now routinely invites older people from SOPA to participate, when older people's issues are being discussed. Recently 4 representatives of our membership organisations formed the panel of their conference on isolation and recounted the experience of their members. When Archie Noone, SOPA and Alzheimers Scotland Dementia Working Group spoke at the Holyrood conference on “Supporting an Ageing Workforce” about his personal experience of dementia, he demonstrated that it does not prevent someone from good humouredly chairing a conference.”Tom Berney, SOPA Chair

In addition to the compliments above, and following our 2015 Assembly 25 MSPs put forward a motion to state support for SOPA and congratulate us on being short listed for a Glasgow Herald Award.

The Scout Association – written evidence (CCE0202)

1. Introduction

- 1.1. The Scout Association (herein also referred to as TSA or The Association) welcome the opportunity to submit evidence to this Inquiry. As the UK's largest co-educational youth organisation, we deliver non-formal education and everyday adventure to over 460,000 six to twenty-five year olds across the UK: activity that builds character, changes lives and has a positive impact in communities.
- 1.2. TSA is a federation of over 8,000 individual Scout Groups, Districts and Counties, all of whom are independent charities led and maintained by a network of over 150,000 volunteers.
- 1.3. TSA welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the inquiry. The evidence submitted is based on existing literature, learning from TSA and a consultation with other national youth organisations.

2. Executive Summary and Recommendations

- 2.1. British society is changing, and recent events have exposed the growing divisions within our society. In a time of increasing segregation, active citizenship and giving young people a sense of belonging has never been more important. Supporting young people to make a positive contribution and engage with their local community is key to giving them a sense of belonging in their communities.
- 2.2. There is a crucial role for the youth sector to play in promoting civic engagement amongst young people. The sector is already doing exceptional work in empowering young people to make positive contributions to their community. However more that can be done in partnership with government.
- 2.3. Rather than overlook enduring solutions in favour of new ones, we urge government to expand the reach and impact of current civic engagement programmes to ensure greater prioritisation and promotion by public bodies and private sector businesses.
- 2.4. This submission makes a case for core funding of programmes that build active citizenship (such as Scouting) in young people from as early an age as possible and supportive infrastructure.

2.5. Namely:

2.5.1. Core and targeted funding

2.5.2. Increasing likelihood of partnership between formal and non-formal education

2.5.3. Revisit the previous Governments manifesto commitment to 3 days voluntary leave

2.6. This response uses Scouting as a case study of what that approach could achieve in terms of citizenship and active citizenship

3. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21 century? Why does it matter and how does it relate to questions of identity?

3.1. TSA believes itself to be a great vehicle for civic engagement in the 21st century. By this we mean that Scouting empowers children and young people, to be active citizens who can make positive contributions to their local communities and the world around them.

3.2. A comparison study found that young people involved in Scouting scored 29.1% higher on Active Citizenship than non-scouts. Furthermore Scouts reported volunteering for 82 hours over the past twelve months, whereas non-Scouts contributed 24.

3.3. Young people are keen to participate meaningfully in their local communities, however many believe that they are not afforded the opportunity. Polling conducted by ComRes for TSA, found that 82% of 12-24 year olds across the UK believe it is important that young people help to solve some of the biggest social issues in this country, but only 36% believe they were given that opportunity.

3.4. We believe that young people, if empowered, can play an important role in their communities. However this can only be achieved through continued funding and support for youth social action projects.

Benefits of engaging young people in civic engagement.

3.5. Encouraging young people to become active citizens is one of core objectives of Scouting. Research has demonstrated considerable benefits for young people, as a result of their civic engagement through Scouting.

- 3.6. Research released by the University of Edinburgh has shown that Scouting and Guiding during childhood can be linked to a lower risk of mental illness in middle-age. The analysis was drawn from the National Child Development Study – a long running study of almost 10,000 people from across the UK who were born in November 1958. Around one-quarter of study participants had been in the Scouts or Guides, and were found to be around 15% less likely to suffer from anxiety or mood disorders, compared with others.
- 3.7. Civic engagement through organisations like the TSA also helps improve the life chances of young people in terms of education and employment. Polling conducted by ComRes for TSA revealed that 89 per cent of Scouts identified that Scouting had helped them to build ‘key employability skills including social, team working and leadership skills. Young people involved in Scouting also scored 19.5% higher on Life Skills and Employability than non-scouts.
- 3.8. TSA research also suggests that Scouting can assist the development of team-working, leadership, resilience and problem-solving, as well as demonstrate commitment and resolve. In a poll conducted by ComRes young people involved in Scouting scored 17.0% higher on Leadership than non-scouts and they also scored 10.5% higher on Problem Solving than non-scouts. They can also provide access to networks and social opportunities that are valuable for future employability.
- 3.9. Supporting and creating opportunities for young people to meaningfully participate in their communities helps them develop a strong sense of agency and belonging. In a recent comparison study, young people involved in Scouting scored 17.3% higher on belonging than non-scouts.
- 4. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?
- 4.1. The evidence is clear that engaging young people in social action at an earlier age has a positive impact and results in a stronger sense of citizenship. Research published by think tank Demos shows that the 29% of young people currently participating in social action develop self-discipline, resilience and empathy by doing so⁷⁶⁴. Furthermore, evidence from the CBI (See CBI First Steps report) shows that social action helps develop optimism, determination and emotional intelligence - skills which are key to employability.

- 4.2. We know that teachers and schools do a fantastic job of teaching citizenship, and we firmly believe that where citizenship forms part of the curriculum it should be encouraged and supported.
- 4.3. Nevertheless, teachers currently fulfil a multitude of different roles; trying to build pupils' subject knowledge; whilst also developing them as individuals.
- 4.4. Research from Demos also revealed that less than four in ten (39 per cent) of state school respondents agreed that their school provided enough opportunities for volunteering and social action compared with 70 per cent of fee-paying school respondents⁷⁶⁵.
- 4.5. Schools and teachers should therefore not shoulder the entire burden of developing young people as active citizens, particularly schools which have insignificant resources or knowledge to provide meaningful citizenship education.
- 4.6. There is a crucial role for the third sector to play in supporting schools to deliver citizenship education. Partnership work is essential to achieving these shared outcomes for young people.
- 4.7. Such partnerships have proven to be hugely successfully not only in building young people's understanding of citizenship but also helping them build vital character attributes.
- 4.8. In 2014 with funding from the Department of Education's Character Education Grant fund, we piloted Character by Doing, a pilot programme designed with Demos, to deliver extra-curricular Scouting activities to 126 children aged 8-10 years old, in schools across England. Participating schools were selected on the basis of deprivation ⁷⁶⁴ J. Birdwell, R. Scott, D. Koninckx (2015) Learning by Doing, Demos.

<https://www.demos.co.uk/project/learning-by-doing/>

⁷⁶⁵ J. Birdwell, R. Scott, D. Koninckx (2015) Learning by Doing, Demos.
<https://www.demos.co.uk/project/learning-by-doing/>

and a lack of similar activities in their wider community. The pilot provided teachers and parents with the tools to bridge the gap between formal and non-formal education, and boost children’s character capabilities such as empathy, grit and leadership.

- 4.9. The pilot’s evaluation report, ‘Learning by Doing’ conducted by Demos, concluded that non-formal learning activities, such as Scouting are an important way of delivering character education, and essential for young people in developing key character attributes.
- 4.10. The ‘Learning by Doing’ report also demonstrated that teachers are keen to include more non-formal education in schools. In a representative survey of 800 teachers, 72 per cent agreed that non-formal education should be recognised in the national curriculum and 60 per cent thought that every pupil in the UK should have the opportunity to take part in activities like Scouting as part of their school routine⁷⁶⁶.
- 4.11. The Scottish inspection framework currently includes the recognition of pupil’s skills development, outside of formal school learning.
- 4.12. Since 2008, the Curriculum for Excellence in Scotland advocates a holistic approach of the learning process, recognising the skills pupils can achieve through non-formal education, such as Scouting. For example, working with the Scottish Qualification Authority, students from the Queen Anne High School have secured formal recognition of the skills they had developed through a Scout expedition and were awarded the SQA Leadership award, a level 6 qualification on the Scottish Credit and Qualification Framework. The 2013 school’s inspection report recognise the benefits of the partnership between Scouts and the school, recognising that the programme had supported pupils to develop into responsible citizens, effective contributors, confident individuals and successful learners.
- 4.13. Schools can use third sector partnerships to provide meaningful opportunities. This is particularly successful in Germany through the Schule Plus initiative. The programme is best described as a “unique social online-network connecting schools with external partners, who offer various external offers to enrich the schooling curriculum.” It is free of charge for schools and helps them to connect with a range of organisations, including from the third sector, to “enhance the learning of students”.

⁷⁶⁶ J. Birdwell, R. Scott, D. Koninckx (2015) Learning by Doing, Demos.
<https://www.demos.co.uk/project/learning-by-doing/>

4.14. There is a real opportunity for the Committee to make bold recommendations that the government revisit its priority on Character Education, particularly the expansion and renewal of the Character Grant, Sugar Tax and the after-school activity funding, which the current Government discontinued.

5. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they involve a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens

5.1. We believe that NCS is a positive addition to the current list of citizenship programmes available to young people. It produces positive outcomes in young people, has the right ambitions, is well led and reaches young people who may not have had any prior experience of social action. We have examples of young people in Scouting who have taken part in NCS reflecting how positive an experience it was.

5.2. Scouting is very comparable to NCS in terms of stated outcomes and activities used to reach those outcomes. Where the two programmes differentiate is in volume of contact, length of involvement and intensity, in that Scouting has a much higher volume of contact, over a longer period of time but in a less intense way.

5.3. The Scout Association has eleven Programme Objectives across five domains (namely physical, intellectual, emotional, social and spiritual. These objectives explicitly cover the NCS stated outcomes of teamwork, communication and leadership skills, transition to adulthood and engagement with the community.

5.4. Considering that the majority of sections within Scouting will have young people from three or more different schools, and that they regularly mix with young people on a District, County, national or international level through Scouting, we also facilitate the last of NCS stated outcomes, social mixing.

5.5. In terms of how these outcomes are reached, NCS uses a mixture of residential (two weeks) and a local community project (60 hours). Scouting uses a balanced programme that spans practical, character and employability skills through programme evenings (weekly during term time), regular camps and residential (weekends, often around once every two months, and school holidays) and with social action projects embedded across our award scheme. All of these activities involve care and supervision by fully trained adults.

5.6. Considering the substantial cost associated with running NCS compared to other civic engagement programmes like Scouting, it is essential that NCS funding also go towards supporting less expensive programs with similar outcomes.

5.7. We are delighted to be working in partnership with the NCS Trust to test different NCS models that will allow us to deliver NCS whilst bolstering our own, complimentary, capacity.

6. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Building a cross-departmental approach

6.1. Government and Parliament can best aid this by providing the framework and the support required to help deliver programmes. This includes core funding, common efficient impact measurement, brokering partnerships with formal education, in both delivery and use of facilities, and supportive policies on volunteering and employment

6.2. There needs to be a real cross government department focus on youth policy that identifies new streams of funding, such as utilising dormant assets, and building sustainability in the programmes required.

6.3. Providing organisations with core funding is an essential part of building sustainability in projects. Core funding allows organisations to experiment with new funding models, foster new partnerships, and develop new approaches of delivery, whilst being agile and responsive to the needs of young people.

6.4. We would also suggest the committee urge government to provide incentives for schools to allow community use of space out of school hours which is focussed on active citizenship. With the cost and availability of community facilities rising in recent years, schools can provided much needed space for the delivery of social civic engagement programmes.

6.5. TSA is entirely volunteer-led with support from a small number of paid staff. Scouting for young people relies on the efforts of over 150,000 adult volunteers in both front-line and support roles. Currently nearly 51,000 young people are on waiting lists to take part in Scouting because we lack the adults to run local Groups.

6.6. We are not alone and recruitment and retention of volunteers challenges organisations throughout the UK of all sizes and interests. Our experience is that many of the barriers to volunteering are not to do with legislation or motivation, but more simple factors such as time and the willingness of employers to accommodate volunteer commitments.

6.7. Although employers agree on the positive impact of volunteering on their business, with 94% recognising that volunteering can add to personal skill sets, the reality for Scout volunteers is very different, with many employers reacting negatively to their involvement.

6.8. Employers should be encouraged to take volunteerism into account in performance reviews. In fact, 50 percent of companies on Points of Light's 2014 Civic 50 list include community engagement work in performance reviews for at least some employees.

7. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

7.1. As an organisation TSA have established shared values that we promote to all our members and young people. These values underpin the fundamentals of Scouting and set out the expectations of everyone involved.

7.2. These values are:

7.2.1. Integrity - We act with integrity; we are honest, trustworthy and loyal.

7.2.2. Respect - We have self-respect and respect for others.

7.2.3. Care - We support others and take care of the world in which we live.

7.2.4. Belief - We explore our faiths, beliefs and attitudes.

7.2.5. Cooperation - We make a positive difference; we cooperate with others and make friends.

7.3. Our values are a uniting force within the Scouting community, giving young people a sense of purpose and a feeling that they are a part of a much bigger community connected by a shared way of thinking.

7.4. They also help to foster positive character traits within our young people. Young people involved in Scouting scored 15.6% higher on Responsibility and trustworthiness than non-scouts.

8. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Facilitating opportunities for social mixing

8.1. There is increasing evidence that structured and institutional segregation is on the rise – particularly amongst young people. Findings from the Social Integration Commission proved that young people under 17 years old have 53% fewer interactions with other ethnicities than would be expected if there was no social segregation⁷⁶⁷.

8.2. It is this social segregation which fuels mistrust between communities and promotes further segregation amongst the younger generations.

8.3. There are already real costs to our economy and society of not taking sufficient action to promote social integration. According to a study by the Independent Social Integration Commission, this lack of social integration is costing the British economy £6bn a year and failure to tackle the issue threatens to create a nation of segregated schools, thwarted careers and gated communities.

8.4. We believe that Scout Groups have an important and unique role to play in facilitating social mixing and providing opportunities for young people and adults to build friendships based on common interests rather than differences.

8.5. Dame Louise Casey’s review of Opportunity and Social Integration recognised this, and drew particular attention to the potential of Scouting and other uniform groups in improving positive social interactions between young people.

8.6. Furthermore in 2014 Amir Cheema, a Muslim national Scout volunteer won the Points of Light award, for his role in bringing young people from different backgrounds together through the use of Scouting. Mr Cheema was praised by former Prime ⁷⁶⁷ ⁷⁶⁷ Social Integration Commission, How Integrated is modern Britain?

http://socialintegrationcommission.org.uk/SIC_Report_WEB.pdf

Minister David Cameron, for improving community cohesion in his role as a Group Scout leader.

- 8.7. In keeping with our strategic goal of bringing Scouting to more deprived communities, we have been setting up groups in most deprived areas of Sheffield. One of the groups chosen was based at Owler Brook Primary School in Page Hall. The Page Hall was chosen because of tensions since the arrival of large numbers of Slovakian Roma families.
- 8.8. In setting up the group we identified several cultural barriers to civic participation from the Roma community including:
- 8.8.1. Mistrust and a distorted understanding of “outsiders”. The community’s long standing history of discrimination and persecution meant that there was an initial lack of trust from the community towards TSA volunteers. Local TSA groups were able to tackle this through networking and building links with partners already working within the community.
 - 8.8.2. Familial responsibilities and obligations. Roma are a very family centred ethnic group and some children and young people may have never spent a night away from home without parents/carers – this could be due to financial restrictions in addition to traditional family rules but it also meant that the residential element of Scouting had the potential to cause anxiety and stress. To combat this TSA volunteers were encouraged to invite elders from the family to join the young people at the residential.
- 8.9. The new Scout group provided a much needed safe space for different communities in Sheffield to get together and explore the commonalities of their identity, and understand their differences.
- 8.10. We are driven by the belief Scouting can be used to help facilitate social mixing and help young people from marginalised communities become pivotal members of their local communities. However we need support from government and supportive infrastructure to expand our activities into the communities which need it the most.
- 8.11. Without government funding from the Youth United Fund and the supportive local infrastructure which existed (Owler Brook Primary School and local volunteers), we would not have been able to achieve our outcomes in Page Hall.

Scout Association – supplementary written evidence (CCE0272)

- 8.12. We strongly urge government to utilise money from dormant assets to support programmes such as Scouting boost social integration across the most segregated communities in the UK.

Scout Association – supplementary written evidence (CCE0272)

I would like to further take this opportunity to provide the committee with information on some of the points raised during the evidence session.

The University of Edinburgh study on Scouting and mental health referenced by Matt is called, Be(ing) prepared: Guide and Scout participation, childhood social position and mental health at age 50—a prospective birth cohort study. The study was conducted by researchers at the Universities of Edinburgh and the University of Glasgow, and has been published in the Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health. The findings were drawn from a lifelong study of almost 10,000 people from across the UK who were born in November 1958, known as the National Child Development Study.

On the number of female Muslim Scouts, our census does not currently record the religion of young people within the Movement. However of the young people in the Muslim Scout Fellowship we know that 57% are girls.

During the oral evidence session the committee also touched upon the issue of full time volunteering. To reiterate we believe that full-time volunteers should be legally recognised. For more information on how legal recognition can help further promote civic engagement and citizenship, we would urge the committee to contact City Year UK.

As mentioned during the session The Scout Association has embarked on a pilot partnership with the National Citizen Service (NCS), that is expected to be worth about 1.5 million to the charity. We will be working in partnership to achieve our shared goal to help young people prepare for the future and develop crucial skills for life. This partnership aspires to co-design and pilot ideas through NCS's new Innovation Programme on a trial basis for a three-year period, enabling even more young people to realise, and achieve, their potential.

The partnership will:

- Open up new opportunities for The Scout Association to deliver innovative NCS programmes, enhancing the impact and quality of the Explorer Scout and Young Leader experience by integrating the NCS experience within Scouting. This will support the growth of both organisations and offer new opportunities for social mixing

- Offer unique social action and personal development opportunities for NCS graduates to support Explorer Scouts, Scout Network, the Young Leaders Scheme and adult volunteering in Scouting. This will help extend the reach of NCS beyond its core programme and support sustainable growth for Scouting
- Offer new roles for NCS graduates to support the growth of Scouting in disadvantaged communities, increasing the reach to communities that stand to benefit most
- Allow both organisations to test and learn new approaches that will improve outcomes for young people and deliver good value for money

Liam Burns

Head of Policy, Innovation and Strategy
The Scout Association

SENSE – written evidence (CCE0102)

Sense is a national charity that supports people with complex communication needs to enjoy more independent lives. Our expertise in supporting individuals with complex communication needs benefits people of all ages, as well as families and carers. We provide information and advice, offer a wide range of flexible services and campaign passionately for the rights of the people we serve.

At Sense we believe that everyone, no matter how complex their communication needs, deserves the right to be connected and part of society. It's why we strive to unlock barriers to communication so everyone can enjoy meaningful lives – be it through speech, sign, touch, movement, gesture, sound, or art.

To respond to this consultation, Sense has drawn on a wide range of evidence from key areas of our public policy work (health, social care, education, employment welfare and benefits), practice knowledge from Sense services, and our contribution to Jo Cox's Commission on Loneliness.

Question 9: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups? How might these barriers be overcome?

Those with complex communication needs can include wide range of people. From people who are deafblind, to those with multi-sensory impairments, complex needs, or autism. We all need to be connected yet we all connect differently. As we currently live in a context where communicating through hearing and sight is heavily relied upon, for those who do not there can be significant barriers to engaging equally and fully in everyday life – including civic engagement and citizenship.

Loneliness, isolation, and exclusion

Recently, Sense produced a report and led a one-month campaign on tackling loneliness and isolation in relation to disability as part of Jox Cox's Commission on Loneliness. Increased civic engagement and citizenship can contribute to tackling loneliness. However to do this it's necessary for central government, devolved and local governments, with the support of third sector organisations, to address underlying contributors to loneliness across a wide range of public policy areas, such as:

1.1 Disability awareness and discrimination

Throughout Senses' public policy work, we have found that a lack of disability awareness has been a key contributor to barriers across a range of areas. Unfortunately, much more still needs to be done to increase understanding of disability across public life; from greater awareness of how to make things accessible and the importance of doing so, to understanding what disability is and how the way we understand it then affects how we address barriers. It also includes having more positive and diverse representations of disabled people to directly challenge the common underestimation of disabled people. This is vital in preventing both direct and indirect discrimination so that people can fully participate, engage with, and contribute to society.

1.2 Accessibility (including public spaces, local services, the workplace, leisure or transport)

A lack of accessibility across public life such as leisure activities, the workplace, or public transport can act as a barrier to civic engagement. Featured in Sense's report on loneliness, Ian explains how "Simple things like going to the pub can be a stressful experience when you have both sight and hearing impairments. I have to try hard to hear in noisy places and even walking to the bar can be a challenge because of my tunnel vision. There aren't many venues for young people that are accessible to someone like me. Meeting friends is difficult."

Sense's report on loneliness also highlights that inaccessible transport can be a significant barrier - preventing people to live independently and engage in public life. Understandably, being restricted in when you can leave your house can result in isolation.

Another example was highlighted in the Sense Case for Play report which found that many families with disabled children could not use their local parks, outdoor play areas, or attend local leisure activities as they were not suitable.

To address this point, it is important for understanding of accessibility to be further increased across a variety of sectors and for accompanied training to be developed where needed. One way in which Sense has been doing this is by providing specialised toolkits for specific environments and professional roles such as for play settings or employers.

1.3 Information and communication

Accessible information is vital to any informed participation and good communication is fundamental to meaningful engagement in relationships, social groups, and public life. For those with complex communication needs accessible information and communication means making sure information and communication is provided and translated into a format that is accessible to the individual. What is accessible for each person can vary greatly. It can include British Sign Language (BSL), hands on signing, deafblind manual, braille, large print, speech to text, audio, or easy read.

A lack of accessible information and communication can often be a significant barrier in civic engagement and citizenship. Some examples include: continued issues around information, communication and voting. Another example recently highlighted in the concluding observations on the UK government's progress in meeting United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD) is the provision of interpreters for those with hearing impairments and jury duty.

Sense has been a leading organisation on the importance of accessible information, reflected by our involvement in the development of the Accessible Information Standard and consultations with disabled people relating to its implementation. Many of the learnings from the Standard and accompanied processes can be applied across a variety of the other sectors.

Accessible information needs to incorporate technology in an increasingly digitally-focused world. More awareness-raising is needed around what technology is available to support people's access to information (and communication). Sense has been involved in the Heritage Lottery Funded Online Today project aiming to get more people with complex communication needs online.

Barriers can be further overcome by drawing on the expertise and guidance of long standing specialist organisations like Sense, especially when it comes to meeting communication needs across a variety of sectors.

Question 10: How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Sense has a number of initiatives which address barriers, leading to more meaningful civic engagement and citizenship by bringing communities together. These are suitable and accessible services that are embedded within local communities. Initiatives such as these should be highlighted as good practice, signposted to those in need, promoted to local communities, properly funded and supported. Below are a few examples:

1.1 Sense TouchBase Pears

TouchBase Pears is a pioneering, multi-purpose centre which offers a range of day service opportunities for people with complex communication needs. Also open for the local community and the general public, it is a space that brings people together in a welcoming environment where everyone can feel connected, included and part of the community.

Developed and designed by Sense with a focus on sustainability and creating value for the whole community, the aim of TouchBase Pears is to promote social inclusion and help meet our vision of disabled and non-disabled people enjoying activities and our facilities side by side. We consulted with all sectors of the community to ensure we created a facility that will benefit everyone.

The centre has a family-friendly café, a sensory garden, art exhibitions and performances, children's activities, a wide range of rooms and facilities for hire, and a community library. Sense are incorporating much needed employment and training opportunities for disabled people and designing services (around sports) directly in response to what those using services have expressed interest in.

1.2 Sense Buddying Project

Sense has over 40 years of experience developing short breaks for children and young people with complex needs where volunteers provide primary care and facilitate activities. Buddying is a supportive friendship between two people living in the same community who share common interests. Young disabled people 'buddy up' with their non-disabled peers who enjoy similar leisure activities and hobbies.

A buddy is not a relative or a paid worker but rather is someone who offers a young person who has complex sensory and communication difficulties a supportive friendship. The voluntary nature of a buddying arrangement, and the fact that time spent together is mutually negotiated, offers a different kind of a relationship than with family members or paid professionals. Relationships are characterised by greater perceived equality, sincerity, and are often more long-lasting.

A volunteer buddying scheme can fill the social and emotional gap that may not be met by existing statutory provision. The child or young person can follow their preferred interests, gain increased confidence, get out and about in their local community, develop vital skills towards independence and above all, socialise and make friends.

Buddying provides an opportunity for like-minded disabled and non-disabled peers to come together and develop friendships through a shared interest and hobby. In this regard, though the scheme is primarily for disabled people, it is providing civic engagement opportunities for the volunteer as well by building equal relationships, friendships, and closer communities.

1.3 Sense shops as local community hubs

Sense has around one hundred charity shops across the country. Increasingly the aim of these shops is to become community hubs to bring people together, volunteering (such as the National Citizens Service), and campaigning. For example, as part of Sense’s month-long campaign with Jo Cox’s Commission on Loneliness, Sense shops hosted a number of events and activities.

Conclusion

This consultation response has outlined barriers to civic engagement and citizenship faced by disabled people (in particular those with complex communication needs). In a society that heavily depends on communication via sight and hearing, it is vital to address how this can marginalise those who do not communicate in this way. In particular, this means increasing disability awareness, ensuring accessible information and communication, and improving accessibility in general across public life. What central, devolved, and local governments can do is support suitable and accessible services that are embedded within communities, and draw upon the expertise of organisations like Sense.

7 September 2017

John Shaddock – written evidence (CCE0182)

Topic 4 Political engagement and the voting process

4.1 In 1944, a review of Parliamentary Boundaries led to a change to the current position where the voting system serves the needs of the politicians, not the citizens. Politicians are interested in electors, not citizens, so the boundaries have been drawn to suit the politicians (i.e. equalising the number of electors in a constituency). In a representative democracy, MPs should represent all those in the constituency, of whatever age, whether registered to vote or not. The voting franchise determines who can choose the representative, not who should be represented. Children, the homeless, Members of the House of Lords etc. should all be in the compass of an area's MP. To equalise MPs' workloads, boundaries should be drawn on the basis of population, not electorate.

4.2 The current adversarial system created by 'first past the post' elections has certain merits. Citizen engagement is not one of them. Not only are 'non-winning' votes wasted and so not fully reflected in democratic debate, but any engagement tends to be of the 'stop the other lot' variety – dialogue, nuance, balance are all casualties. A form of proportional representation would encourage citizens to see that, even when unsuccessful overall, their votes do carry weight. In a system where the government has only 35%-45% of the popular vote, the majority of citizens will feel their views have been ignored.

Topic 7 Supporting civic engagement

7.1.1 These comments are based on the broad assumption that 'civic engagement' largely takes place at the local level. The history of the development of local services was to meet the needs of the town or city - initially health, sanitation, public order etc. - with the advent of industrialisation. There has been a problem in local affairs that the recent emphasis has been on 'service provision'. The internet-enabling of public services has further pushed the concept that local services are services in the market sense, provided in response to public demand. Despite this, at local levels there are very few universal services to individuals. Services like housing, social services, income support, aids for independent living, literacy programmes etc. are usually received by only a small proportion of the population of an area.

7.1.2 At the local level, government has been concerned not merely with providing services to individuals, important though that is. Education is a service not only for the direct recipients, but also for those who want to live in an educated society. The local level has been a focus for the management of issues of sustainability, community cohesion, economic and social development, local vitality etc. The functions government has used to address these issues include physical planning, economic strategy, environmental management, promotion and events, tourism support; there has been input on crime management, transport, waste disposal, air and water quality, health priorities etc. These are universal services; they are, arguably, the most important local services. They tend to have long-term impact. But they are not services to individuals and they are not particularly amenable to market solutions. They usually require the political balancing of competing interests.

7.1.3 Often, a solution will only be as good as its level of public acceptability and that is dependent on a number of factors including leadership, trust, communication, mode of coercion, perceived importance. All these require some degree of dialogue between citizens themselves and between citizens and government. At the community level the particular strengths include:

- Citizens have shared experience of public policy in practice (as it affects their area)
- Ability to form a common understanding of issues and causality
- Experience of interaction of different public policies on, for example, education, social care and crime
- Capacity to bring volunteer strengths to address community issues (i.e. solutions not necessarily resource-dependent)
- Long-term relationships
- Opportunities to engage with decision-making processes

7.1.4 The weakening of the role of local democracy, including the outsourcing of functions to private sector organisations operating behind the curtain of ‘commercial confidentiality’, has distanced local citizens (and local representatives) from the capacity to influence the nature of their lived environment. Local authorities now very rarely identify new functions to address emerging needs; civic responsibility – from the perspective of both leaders and citizens – has been profoundly weakened.

7.1.5 To address these issues, power needs to be given to cities, towns and villages to be able to address local issues comprehensively. The fragmentation of local services needs to be addressed and corrective action properly resourced; subsidiarity should be the order – if it can be done at the local level, it should be done at the local level. Citizens should be trusted. Central Government tends to operate in silos – the joining up needs to be done at the local level and in response to local experience. Infantilisation by centrally-imposed solutions leads to disempowerment. If people feel like citizens, they will act like citizens.

7.2 An important dimension is information. This is a vital role for central government. Citizens need information to act meaningfully at a local level. Providing tools, education, support etc. for the development of local information systems – without seeking to control the data – is an intervention which is seriously lacking in civic life. This is an area where central government could have a very significant impact on civic engagement.

8 September 2017

Sheffield for Democracy – written evidence (CCE0065)

“Sheffield for Democracy” is an informal group set up by local campaigners, many of whom were involved in the “Yes” Campaign in the May 2011 referendum. It is a non-partisan campaign group for greater transparency, accountability and representation in both local and national democracy. It is linked to national organisations such as the Electoral Reform Society and Unlock Democracy. These campaign for greater democracy, an informed populace, citizens rights, a fairer voting system and more accurate representation of the public will in Parliament; we support them in these aims and work with them.

In addition, locally, we are campaigning for

- better scrutiny arrangements in public bodies: Sheffield City Council; the City Region Combined Authority; the Police authority including the Police and Crime Commissioner for S.Yorkshire, and associated Police & Crime Panel
- better community engagement and citizen involvement in locality management
- better engagement with our MPs and City councillors, including providing opportunities for interchange of perspectives including through public forums
- more transparency and more mechanisms to enable people to be better informed about the work of our elected representatives (for example, web-casting of public meetings)
- better understanding of when, if, and how referendums should be used

1. Citizenship is usually expressed as the status of a person recognised as being a legal member of a sovereign state or multiple states. It enables us to feel part of the community; to be able to express our wishes and needs in that community. However citizenship & Identity are now fluid concepts in the 21st Century. The flood of Britons applying for dual citizenship after the Brexit referendum is a symptom of a weaker link between individuals and the ideas of Nationality. The UK has many citizens living and working here who do not hold official papers as UK Nationals but have been part of the fabric of our society for tens of years. Similarly we have many UK Nationals living and working abroad who retain only their UK citizenship despite many years passing since their emigration.

The most important part of this is the idea of Civic Engagement, which should not be bounded by rules on Nationality or citizenship. All people living and or working in the boundary of the state and connected to the state through taxes, familial ties and access to services should have access to civic engagement. Identity changes depending on the context of the question being asked. In this way, the means by which people engage with citizenship need to be similarly flexible, with different contributions recognised

2. Citizenship should be about membership & belonging but that is not how it is perceived. It is seen as conferring special rights to one set of people in a community, and excluding others, and is therefore as often divisive as it is collective in nature. There should certainly be a framework for outlining the rights & responsibilities of citizens (and Governments) in the form of a written constitution. We are currently citizens both of a Nation state and a conglomerate European state, though this is being removed from people irrespective of their own choice in the matter. The aim should be not to encourage “Britishness” but to affirm a welcome to those who are here and wish to be part of this community, which may be expressed by an individual as identifying with one of the many different communities that form our nation.

Education is the key role in the encouragement of citizenship & for fostering engagement. Pride in a single citizenship (British for instance) should not be encouraged to the detriment of other citizenships; putting one form of identity above others is divisive and would discourage people who see that citizenship as just another aspect of their overall identity (French, Irish, Pakistani, Scottish) from being as engaged as they might otherwise be. (Of course this is not to minimise other important sources of identity: e.g. gender/sexuality/religion/ideology)

3. Civic Engagement, i.e. voting, political participation, writing to MPs, getting involved in the community, organising protests, etc is important. Social media, used responsibly facilitates this. It is about sharing values and rights and obligations.

How the relationship between citizenship & engagement is defined is a question that requires more exacting consideration than is possible here. The principles of that relationship should be defined by a binding written constitution that is widely debated and widely consulted upon, taking the best from our own Parliamentary & legal frameworks and adding lessons from other systems around the world.

4. Current governance arrangements deter political engagement. In particular we draw attention to the over-centralisation of powers including what are local responsibilities and requirements; and crucially, fiscal arrangements. The relationship between the citizen and their local, county/regional & national governance structures are overly complex and misunderstood. Too many laws are created centrally and simply delivered by lower tier government and this is confusing and therefore a deterrent to engagement.

Most importantly, representation should reflect the way people vote. First Past the Post is a broken system that delivers contrary and therefore divisive results at both National & local levels. It contributes to apathy as many feel their vote will not count. The age, method of voting and the registration process should reflect a more direct correlation approach to representation, Proportional Representation being the obvious preference in that respect. Registration should certainly be automatic, linked to achievement of majority (or citizenship) through something like the NI Number. We need this fair proportionate voting system for all state and civic elections. If you can work and pay taxes, marry, serve in the armed forces at 16, you should also be able to express your views in elections. The future of this age cohort is significantly affected by political decision making.

Proportional Representation works for regional assemblies in Scotland and Wales so why is it not available for national government in the whole of the UK

5. Citizenship should be part of the curriculum throughout a person's full time education. The content may be different as age progresses but the process should focus more on the roles and responsibilities of citizens & governments (at all levels) including how to be a part of that governing process; how to take part effectively in those processes; if necessary, how to effectively challenge the status quo. Current coverage in schools seem to be open to being sponsored by outside agencies and to press their own agendas rather than an agreed broad understanding of the citizenship relationship. (i.e. Banks teaching money issues, aiming to create good consumers and encourage debt spending).

Schools and colleges should have systems that educate students in the democratic systems of government and offer the opportunity to reflect on that experience. A significant and effective method of doing so is to involve students routinely in the governance of their own institutions, and to have opportunities to reflect on those processes.

Faith schools mustn't be allowed to override the basic tenets of freedom, justice and human rights which are taken as a given in this country.

6. Having very little knowledge of the National Citizen Service, suggests to us (as relatively engaged citizens) that their profile is not very significant. Without safeguards, it is likely that such programmes can and will become politicised, either by the organisations delivering the programme or the government sponsoring them. The dangers of this should therefore bring into question whether they should have formal or statutory support from government.
7. Society can support civic engagement through the approach of Governments at all levels being more transparent, accountable and public facing. Rules for governance meetings should be outlined more rigorously and always aim to favour public scrutiny and accessibility above party political, privacy or corporate commercial confidentiality.

The webcasting (broadcasting live via the internet) of meetings should be standard at all levels of Government and appropriately funded from the centre. Archiving of such broadcasts should also be normal practice for all levels of government.

The encouragement to ensure that decision making and consultation is pushed to the lowest feasible level of society is also vital; funding (from the Centre) should be a part of that solution. Neighbourhood meetings and albeit small spending budgets at this level can make a significant difference to people's engagement.

There should be more citizens panels to look at complex issues that face us. (e.g. the 2 assemblies run by the Electoral Reform Society etc on local devolution in 2016). Less formal events such as MP Paul Blomfield's 'Big Conversation' can help engagement with voters <https://www.facebook.com/events/361426474277364>

8. We should all be more aware of our rights under the Human Rights Act and these base rights should be the values we are expected to share. Beyond that we run the risk of creating values that are desirable rather than necessary or, even worse, politically motivated by whichever party is ruling at the time.

Current threats to these values are increasingly from the devaluing of local control (cuts to local budgets & services) and the dilution of local control through privatisation and outsourcing. The democratic deficit these practices create is well documented and the supposed economic benefits are lacking evidence. Any service being delivered by the lowest cost contractor cannot be the best service and politicians are poor contract experts.

The idea that majorities are always right needs to be challenged: constitutional changes need substantial majorities; rights and interests and issues of concern to minorities need to be intertwined in our thinking, and their protection to be part of our approach to democracy. We must also be wary of the concentration of power in too few hands. For instance mayoral and police and crime commissioner positions need adequate democratic accountability.

9. Communities & Groups are feeling 'left behind' as they fail to see any benefit from new legislation or supposed economic growth. The welfare state has moved from being supportive and inclusive to seeming punitive and denigrating. Unemployment figures are widely seen as unsound statistics and many 'new' jobs are both precarious and uncertain in earnings ability. Those in extremis of poverty or perceived discrimination are unable to engage in the basics of society, never mind become engaged in political activity. Because of lack of these social and economic rights, there is poor involvement through our vaunted but hugely deficient "democracy". This will only be overcome with a system of support that allows even the most vulnerable in society to live with respect and dignity. The idea of Universal Basic Income is gaining ground as a potential solution for this very reason.

A considerable amount of money from EU regional policy will cease to be available to many poorer parts of the UK when Brexit kicks in. Government must bear that in mind when developing policy post Brexit. Responsibility doesn't just lie with the individual, it lies with government as well.

10. Programmes aimed at improving citizenship & engagement are often at odds with attempts to improve integration. A much more sophisticated approach is needed. The promotion of 'so called' British values and the imposition of divisive measures like 'Prevent' emphasise difference and promote ideas of 'right thinking' ways of being. Social cohesion and to some extent integration is a long term process, often over generations. If we look at how second and third generation migrants live, it often bears little resemblance to their forebears. Knowledge and understanding of each other is the most effective measure to oppose alleged extremism on all sides. We are unaware of any forced integration policies which actually work to generate a happy and stable population.

11. Whilst proficiency in English is a desirable skill for all UK citizens it should not be a prerequisite for residence or citizenship. It is however important that institutions & employers in the UK who benefit from foreign staff, students or employees be responsible for providing the training they may need to adapt to living here.

However, to encourage and enable integration, it is essential that English language classes (English as a second language ESL) are available to children and adults, free and locally based. This is not currently the case. These classes should be tailored to the communities served.

12. See our comment above (para 7) re MP Paul Blomfield's efforts as an example of good practice in engagement with elected representatives

5 September 2017

Dr Mark Shephard, Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Strathclyde – written evidence (CCE0023)

My submission addresses sections 5 through 9 and my briefing paper and Ted talk do address ways to engage online that could facilitate a more tolerant and cohesive society (point 12).

Introduction/Overview

Following ESRC/AQMeN funded research* on the content of Twitter and BBC Have Your Say discussion threads in the run-up to the Scottish Independence Referendum (2014) I identified 5 'F's' to avoid doing online (foul; false; foggy; flannel; and flaming) as well as 5 'F's' to think about before engaging online (followers; facts; fashion; filtering; and fallout). Education Scotland already use my TEDx talk as a component in classroom teaching (5 F's to avoid). The policy brief below extends this Ted talk and is of salience to your points 5 through 9 and also point 12 It focuses on simple alliterative exercises that should help build better online (and offline) behaviours, so contributing to better citizenship. Given the heated online discussions over issues such as Scottish independence and Brexit, it also makes sense for this brief to be disseminated and used by teachers in secondary schools in England, Wales and Northern Ireland as part of citizenship education (for example, the citizenship component of the National Curriculum, the National Citizenship Service, and Politics A and AS...).

*This brief was derived from a wider social media project on Scottish independence funded by the UK Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) in conjunction with the Applied Quantitative Methods Network (AQMeN) as part of the 'Future of the UK and Scotland' research programme (www.esrc.ac.uk/major-investments/future-of-uk-and-scotland).

Improving online political literacy for effective public engagement

This Policy Brief draws on the author's research of online social media discourse during the 2014 Scottish independence referendum. It aims to stimulate classroom discussion and awareness of how to improve online literacy for effective political and public engagement. Using examples from research of online discussions of the Scottish independence referendum, it identifies online behaviours that undermine effective public and political engagement (5 F's to avoid), as well as things to be aware of when reading and/or entering into debate with others online (5 F's to consider). This IPPI Policy Brief is aimed at those who teach social media in the classroom as well as for any citizen who reads and/or engages in debate online.

I Introduction and background

Social media use has gone from a small minority activity to a majority activity within a relatively short space of time (Ofcom, 2015) and is particularly popular with younger people (Langford and Baldwin, 2013). Even if you do not use social media you are likely to indirectly consume it as traditional media not only responds to stories that start on social media, but often include extracts in their coverage. As well as the opportunities to share information and to interact with others using social media, the Youth Citizenship Commission (2009) identified a number of concerns with the use and consumption of social media including: selective consumption and interaction; inadequate representation of sides; limited characters with which to communicate; and the capacity of users to know what is valid. Of course, this is not just a problem for youth. The concerns raised by the Citizenship Commission have resonance for anybody directly and/or indirectly trying to make sense of the world around them through online interaction.

Unlike driving a car, there is no licence required for online social media engagement. This means that lots can go wrong that need not, provided that citizens are made aware of a few core behaviours to avoid and things to look out for when engaging online. This is arguably important across all domains of life from interpreting online restaurant reviews to knowing where to book your holiday. In politics this is important because political campaigns now widely employ social media (see for example, Gibson and McAllister, 2011) and we know that social media can alter participation and voter turnout (see for example, Bond et al. 2012) and can set agendas and even alter electoral outcomes (see for example, Hogan and Graham, 2013).

Although our research on social media usage during the Scottish independence referendum suggests that bad behaviour online is very much a minority activity on average (Quinlan, Shephard and Paterson, 2015), news stories illustrating bad practice online and its consequences for both recipients and those posting are commonplace. Those targeted, as well as those targeting, come from all walks of life and the whole point of this brief is to use examples from our research to illustrate some core things to avoid and some key things to look out for online. My goal is to use some of the clangers spotted in the course of our research into online behaviour during the Scottish independence referendum to help create a more informed and capable citizenry more able to effectively engage online.

From our research, I posit 5 core 'Fs' to avoid and 5 core 'Fs' to consider before engaging with online social media.

II 5 Fs to avoid

- 1) Foul - The first 'F' to avoid is the foul. Adding swear words or using threatening words (or even gratuitous smears such as 'Slimeball Salmond' or 'Clown Prince Cameron') against people and/or organisations and/or political viewpoints is likely to be abusive and offensive to those who are targeted, to some who are reading a thread, and even to those posting the foul should the public and/or media and/or their employer turn on them. The same is true of offensive imagery that might accompany any post. Being foul rarely adds to a debate, and often detracts from it. In addition, too much wasted time is used challenging foul posts, thereby eroding the space and time available for serious discussions of points that are being made. Fouling can also close down debate as the side targeted ‘spirals into silence’ making it difficult to know what is the true balance of online opinion. This can then lead to all manner of misunderstandings about the online balance of opinion, and even inaccurate inferences about the state of public opinion.

- 2) FLAMING!!! – The second ‘F’ to avoid is flaming behaviour (of which ‘foul’ can be viewed as an extreme subset). Classic examples of flaming behaviour include angry-looking UPPER CASE usage, multiple exclamation and/or question marks (!!! ... ???). Flaming is also associated with dramatic, over-the-top posts, for example: ‘please vote YES in the #indyref and close the door on the way out!!!’ or ‘Do these damn jocks not realise the EU is the REAL problem, not the UK? smh!!! #IndyPlan...’ or ‘No-one is going to get between me and a Scotland passport - no one!! #indyref’ or ‘more pandas in the zoo than Tory MPs. LOL!!!’. Like foul posts, these kind of posts add little to the debate of the issues and too often simply serve to wind people up and so needlessly ratchet up tensions.
- 3) False – The third ‘F’ to avoid is starting and/or spreading false information. Even if you don’t start false information, it can be very tempting to retweet and/or share posts that you like either because they support what you believe, or more usually because they oppose views, and/or groups and/or people with whom you have no affinity. This ‘F’ can be difficult to correct as it often requires you to research a topic more thoroughly by cross-checking information from a variety of sources. If in any doubt, resist the urge to be first to circulate the information. Think about the damage you could be doing to individuals (and possibly their families and even their employees and associates) who are subsequently found to have been falsely accused. Do you want to be a false accuser?

False posts are also quite easy to commit when resorting to generalisations. For example, if a politician is caught doing something wrong, it is incorrect to infer that all politicians (or all politicians that share the party affiliation) are like this. A common example of a fallacious contribution that cropped up in the online discussions on the independence debate, is when someone claims to know what a whole nationality thinks (either because they think they know this, or they have asked a few friends, neighbours or office colleagues), for example, ‘Having a debate on Scotland's #indyref in London office. Most English here believe UK subsidises Scotland and that Scots are a drain..’. In fact this comment commits more errors, for instance, failing to spot that Scotland is part of the UK, and a further rather eye-wateringly simplistic assertion that ‘all Scots are a drain’.

Another example of generalisations and fallacious posting evident in the independence referendum online posts was when one English person or one Scottish person said something, and that view was then aggregated up and attributed to all English or all Scottish people, for example, ‘Shows how far the English are removed from democracy when they are incapable of accepting other opinions’. Again, cross-check information, seek out representative public opinion polls and exercise extreme caution when generalising from an individual to a group, or even a group (e.g. a political party policy) to an individual (e.g. a party member who does not support their own party’s policy). False posts often overlap with foul and FLAMING!!

- 4) Foggy - The fourth ‘F’ to avoid is being foggy/unclear. If people do not understand what you are saying, this can negate the purpose of your post and it may cause misunderstanding and even tension escalation. Our research provided a few examples of localised phrases which caused confusion to those trying to interpret what the contributor was on about, for example, one of our researchers had no idea that ‘wee Eck’ referred to Alex Salmond. Of course, there is nothing wrong with localised phrases per se, and diversity of languages and dialects has many positives, but if you are communicating across regions and nations, as the person using ‘wee Eck’ was doing, then it makes sense to use words and phrases that people can more easily understand to avoid misunderstanding.
- 5) Flannel - The fifth ‘F’ to avoid is flannel/repetition. If you have made a point, move on otherwise you risk being ignored when you do make a new point as people will associate your name with the same old view they have read over and over – a bit like the ‘cry wolf’ fable. Some of the contributors in our data sets repeated points that they had already made and some indeed promised to not repeat themselves and then promptly did so. The reaction from others can be indifference or even hostility.

However, as well as the 5 ‘Fs’ to avoid, my research also pointed to there being:

III 5 Fs to consider

- 1) Followers – The first ‘F’ to consider is followers/audience. Before you post something online, it is worth thinking about who the potential audience or ‘followers’ are likely to be. One of the online data sources I studied was the BBC’s Have Your Say comments sections at the end of online news stories. Assuming proportionate online news consumption (supported by BBC data on consumption patterns by nation) online contributions from those living in Scotland are likely to be outnumbered by comments from those living in England by approximately 10 to one because the population of Scotland is 5.3 million whereas the population of England is 53 million. This population asymmetry can mean that those in the minority (Scotland) can feel that they are not being given the same degree of opportunity to air their opinions as those in the majority (England), when in fact data can reveal that proportionate to population, the minority (Scotland) might actually have a bigger say on average than those in the majority (England). Indeed, we might even expect this given the nature of the news story on Scottish independence.

Dr Mark Shephard, Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Strathclyde – written evidence (CCE0023)

This perception of bias becomes even more acute when talking about political parties that only stand in Scotland (for example, the SNP) and for whom the 10 to one ratio becomes even smaller due to levels of support versus non-support within the 5.3 million Scottish population. Assuming 50 per cent SNP support in Scotland and 0 per cent SNP support in England⁷⁶⁸ (based on the 2015 General Election result), the 10 to one ratio might become more like a 20 to one ratio of comments against versus for the SNP. This can then look biased even if it is representative of the English and Scottish publics. The point here is that the media may appear biased because of the online public commentary reflecting the hugely divergent population asymmetries in the UK, and not the views of the media outlet per se (although that is not to say that the media may or may not be biased as well).

At the disproportionate and unrepresentative end of the spectrum, you might be contributing to an online group pre-disposed towards one view over another (for example: Yes Scotland; and #yes; or Better Together; and #no). This can lead to dissonance between what happens in a vote and what you thought was going to happen based upon your choice of information sources that you choose to interact and side with. This lack of cross-checking of information can then lead you to more easily slip into the 5 Fs to avoid (see section above).

- 2) 'Facts' – The second 'F' to consider is the often illusive belief in and demand for 'facts'. Critiquing the opposition for not having facts is common online (e.g. 'Salmond might as well have started his white paper with 'dear Santa' for all the facts that were in it. #indyref'), as is the capacity to believe that your side has all the facts (e.g. '...I have just ordered my #indyref white paper, so I know the facts!'). If you are a partisan, the "once people know 'the facts' they will vote for our side" becomes a lazy mantra. However, in searching for 'facts' you have to be aware of self-selection bias, for example, picking the polls and news stories that suit your argument. Of course, there is nothing wrong with taking a side per se, but it is important to cross-check your information across the sides before you do so.

This is not to claim that 'facts' do not exist. We can find out what the current price of oil is and we might know what the current interest rate is, for example. However, it becomes much harder to predict what 'facts' may be in the future as oil prices and interest rates might change. What we think we can achieve today may be even more possible in the future (or indeed less so) and for this we will often require a certain amount of best-case and worse-case scenario predictive modelling based upon what we know about how things work, or how things might work if we change them (drawing upon comparative research for example). Albeit mildly guilty of the foul, this tweet shows an appreciation of just how difficult it is to get facts about the future: ‘Don't you just love the daft tweeters seeking post #indyref facts?’. Also, the economy and economic ‘facts’ are not the whole story.

⁷⁶⁸ Of course, we know from the TV debates that a number of voters in England liked the performance of Nicola Sturgeon and liked many of the party's policies and so the 20 to one ratio is likely to be an overestimate. The underlying point of perceived bias and under-representation is still likely to hold true though.

- 3) Fashion – The third ‘F’ to consider is fashion. Just because there is more of one view out there does not mean that this is necessarily ‘right’, ‘true’, or ‘fact’, or indeed, the view of the majority. Our aggregate data of Twitter and Facebook for the Yes and No campaigns illustrated a sharp rise in support for Yes in the closing weeks of the campaign. If you were to conclude that Twitter and Facebook were representative of public opinion, you might have predicted a ‘Yes’ victory. This is not to say that fashion is not important as it might be useful in detecting movement in polls for example, before it actually takes place as our data seemed to be quite good at doing. The other aspect to ‘fashion’ is that sometimes when one side becomes very fashionable, the other side(s) may stop questioning this ‘fashion’ and either go underground and/or become silent (‘spiral of silence’). This is not because they have been won over, it is more because they feel they have been run over to the point where contributing is pointless given the anticipated counter-barrage.
- 4) Filtering – The fourth ‘F’ to consider is filtering. Some social media forums like Twitter are more relaxed about what people can post online, whereas other discussion forums like the BBC Have Your Say comments have stricter rules and moderation. If there are rules, you might want to know what these are in the first place before you get into trouble and/or offended at being blocked/removed. Knowing about the rules (or their absence) will also help you make sense of what you are likely to come across on the particular forum you are using. There is also filtering by character length (for example, 140 characters for Twitter) which can mean that some social media forums may be more appropriate than others to convey detail and nuance.
- 5) Fallout - The fifth ‘F’ to consider is fallout. What are the likely implications of your post? In short, think, think, and think again before posting. Put yourself in the shoes of any opponents receiving the post. Would you like to receive it? Will there be consequences for your future and/or your family’s future? There are invariably no prizes for being first, so think before posting, or at the very least re-read it.

IV Other common sense considerations

So you know what to avoid and you know what to consider, and you still mess up! If we are honest I think we all mess up online from time to time, but there are a couple of other things we might also want to consider to help reduce this and increase our capacity to be effective in online engagement. First, it is better to be clear about what you are saying rather than to get the honour of saying it first. Think through the above ‘Fs’ before posting. Second, if you are angry, and/or under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs, then you need to think seriously about whether you should even be online. We all know about ‘don’t drink and drive’ and even ‘don’t drink and dial’, and we should probably add to this list: ‘don’t drink and digit’ and ‘don’t do drugs and digit’. Think of a Twitter traffic light system for your mood or state of mind, for example: Green = Tranquil Tweeting; Amber = Topsy Tweeting; and Red = Tanked Tweeting. After all, you don’t want to be known as a ‘twit on Twitter’... or indeed worse...

Dr Mark Shephard, Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Strathclyde – written evidence (CCE0023)

Policy proposals/action recommended:

Proposal 1 – Education Scotland already use my TEDx talk as a component in classroom teaching. Use my Policy Brief (original International Public Policy Institute brief available here) that illustrates and extends the number of Fs of the TEDx talk to provide more points for discussion in the classroom.

Proposal 2 - Given the heated online discussions over issues such as Scottish independence and Brexit, it also makes sense for this brief to be disseminated and used by teachers in secondary schools in England (and indeed Wales and Northern Ireland) as part of citizenship education (for example, the citizenship component of the National Curriculum, the National Citizenship Service, and Politics A and AS...).

16 August 2017

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

Democracy notionally assumes equal rights for its citizens, but in practice the right to vote in formal elections, engage in civic structures and participate in civil society has not always been available across the board. Despite historic extensions in suffrage, voting restrictions related to age or nationality continue to prevent many young people and UK residents without British citizenship from voting. Beyond this, there are social groups that do not participate as much as others, and may therefore feel under represented or without voice in decisions. Social and political exclusion can adversely affect social cohesion and perceptions of political legitimacy, reproducing alienation from the mainstream.

Young people are among the social groups that disproportionately engage in formal politics. Concern about the lower proportion of 18-25 year olds voting in elections has led to stronger calls for formal political education in schools as a precursor to lowering the voting age.

During the 2015 General Election, there was a growth in projects and campaigns to teach or train young people in politics. London Borough of Lewisham initiated the longest running youth democracy programme in 2002, formally launching a Young Mayor election in 2003. Since then there have been 13 young mayors elected in Lewisham and each year thousands of young people participate in these formal elections alongside related opportunities for young people across the borough. This programme allows young people to vote for their own representatives and creates opportunities for collaborations in the civic arena across generations. This programme has been emulated in other cities of the UK and interest is growing in the model across the EU.

Our submission relates to citizenship and young people and is based on an ongoing evaluation of Lewisham Young Mayor Programme (LYMP) that began in 2012. The research was conducted using mixed methods:

- a. Base line surveys of each cohort of candidates over five years
- b. An ethnographic study of participation in the annual election campaigns
- c. Interviews with adult stakeholders, programme founders as well as young candidates, alumni and advisors
- d. Exit polls over four years at a sample of schools

LYMP operates in the context of political education being offered in a number of sectors:

a. Schools

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- i. Already host formal mechanisms of political education, whether through subject areas like sociology and general studies or 21st century citizenship lessons as part of a broader PSCE agenda, prompted by the work of Bernard Crick (1998). Crick had promoted ‘political literacy’, to enable young people to understand the political world around them and their role within it.
- ii. Some political science academics are calling for compulsory political education
- iii. Some practitioners who support a reduction in voting age for sixteen and seventeen year olds have called for regulated political education

c. National Citizens Service

- i. a social action programme to inculcate values of volunteering and service as part of citizenship obligations.
- ii. Now a major provider of one off short term (summer) opportunities for 16 year olds.
- iii. The NCS message to 16 year olds is that they have citizenship responsibilities. However, only some UK nations permit that age group to vote in elections
- iv. Votes at 16 campaigners, including Lewisham Young Mayors have pointed out that since under 18s can, engage in NCS, school councils and social action, they can work and pay taxes, but they can’t have the right to vote until they are 18.

c. Youth work

- i. Provides social and political education, typically through informal education and learning.
- ii. An outcome of austerity has been the dramatic closure of most local authority youth provision.
- iii. Youth workers are increasingly looking to engage with schools and non traditional sites like hospitals.

d. Religious and Faith Groups Faith groups have always offered youth services. The reduction of local authority provision has turned a variety of religious/faith based institutions into primary providers.

e. Community Projects working on specific issues, with particular disadvantaged groups or localities. In providing specialist advocacy, support or services, these organisations tend to promote equality for social cohesion. These include Operation Black Vote, which has worked to encourage ethnic minorities and young people to register to vote.

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- f. Youth sections of political parties operate to promote a particular political party. Traditionally, these have not been particularly successful. In 2017, Momentum, a Labour Party group, successfully engaged young people in the general election.
- g. Youth Democracy/Youth Participation programmes include Young Advisors, Youth Parliaments and Young Mayors. These have grown and are overseen by the British Youth Council. BYC coordinates sittings of the Youth Parliament, supports the 'Votes and 16' campaign and the Young Mayor Network. European Youth in Action and Erasmus programmes have supported strategic networks and exchanges promoting youth democracy.

Restricted suffrage

- a. Many of the educational political literacy projects and ideas outlined above are based on the idea that political issues are really questions of expertise and knowledge.
- b. This approach comes from elite theorists of democracy, such as Edmund Burke - his theory of representative democracy favoured restrictions on suffrage because it placed a premium on the wisdom and superiority of elites who were deemed to have access to a body of reliable political knowledge and political competence.
- c. From this perspective, elites are believed to know best, as those with access to key knowledge are considered best placed to represent and choose representatives.

Universal Suffrage

- a. An alternative perspective of representative democracy comes from JS Mill, who favoured universal suffrage on the basis that 'It is important that everyone of the governed have a voice in the government,'. (cited in The Concept of Representation, H.F. Pitkin, 1972:202)
- b. Mill saw democracy as about the representation of opinions rather than about utilising expert knowledge. From this perspective, political issues are a matter of whim and viewpoint and so subjective opinion based in own life experience trumps scientific knowledge. From this perspective, formal knowledge transmission is not key to political education but learning from lived experience is.
- c. LYMP does not assume that formal transmission of political literacy is a prerequisite to citizenship rights. For LYMP, the challenge is to encourage political participation by encouraging debate, questioning and reflection.

The Young Mayor Programme in Lewisham (LYMP)

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- a. A vibrant and internationally renowned civic youth participation programme, launched in 2003 by the first directly elected Mayor of Lewisham, Sir Steve Bullock.
<https://www.lewisham.gov.uk/mayorandcouncil/youngmayor/Documents/YMCommemorativeBook.pdf>
- b. The programme pivots on the annual election of a Young Mayor (aged 13-17) who represents the 11-17 year olds who live, work or go to school in Lewisham. The annual elections are run to fill four roles: Young Mayor, Deputy Young Mayor and two Youth Parliament Representatives.
- c. The Young Mayor has a budget of £25-30 000. The Young Mayor and advisors consult young people on how to spend this budget and present their proposals to the Mayor and Cabinet for approval.
- d. Unsuccessful candidates tend to stay involved as Young Advisors. The Young Advisors meet weekly, in the town hall and engage with professionals seeking advice, offering services or requesting feedback from young people.
- e. The Lewisham model purposely provides minimal formal political because it is built on the ethos that political participation is about having the opportunity to share opinions. As one young person has said 'why do I need training to have an opinion?'
- f. Bernard Crick's essay on Politics as a Form of Rule: Politics, Citizenship and Democracy (2004) points to the importance of promoting political literacy. In LYMP this is achieved by giving young people opportunities to become voters, campaigners and candidates. Participants grow a deep political awareness through engaging in the politics of representation and/or the politics of deliberation and social action. These are cultivated through:
- g. The model allows young people to learn about politics and elections by engaging in real, formal elections. The process of standing as a candidate encourages a strong civic identity. Deciding who to vote for provides young people with the opportunity to exercise a right to vote alongside civic responsibilities.
- h. A weekly young advisors forum develops democratic group work and is core to the programme. The Young Advisors meeting is oriented towards deliberation and social action in the form of a team that acts in support of the four elected representatives but also to collaborate with policy makers, service providers and other young people
- i. Opportunities for intercultural contact during and between elections. The election brings young people from across the borough into contact with each other on a range of sites and produces learning through those conversations. International exchanges also boost international perspectives.

LYMP - doing politics for real

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- a. Offers opportunities for political engagement eg. with police, politicians
- b. Allows young people to define issues and engage in critical dialogue
- c. Creates opportunities for young people to share and contest opinions
- d. Develops spaces for young people to engage with adults in debate that respects young people's expertise
- e. Enables experiential and informal learning

How many young people have participated in the LYMP elections?

- a. 316 young candidates for Young Mayor of Lewisham between 2004-2016
- b. 50 formal positions representing young people filled through 13 Young Mayoral elections
- c. 42-56% turnout – significantly higher than in local adult elections
- d. Core supporters of each candidate engage actively campaign
- e. 25-30 Young Advisors meet weekly

LYMP Collaborations:

- a. Schools and Colleges are partners in the programme. They host polling stations and hustings for Young Mayor elections.
- b. Some schools use LYMP election period as an opportunity to run assemblies on democracy or run their own school council elections
- c. School council representatives that are elected or appointed through school-based processes meet the Young Mayor at an annual meeting. LYMP visits schools to consult on budget proposals.
- d. Primary Schools students are not eligible to vote or stand as candidates but do meet regularly with the Mayor and LYMP representatives to learn about the Young Mayor's Programme and have an opportunity to quiz a young person about what its like to be Young Mayor and what a Young Mayor does. One elected Young Mayor has highlighted how he was inspired to become involved as a result of one of these events
- e. Young Offenders Forum encourages youth voice amongst young offenders in a collaboration with the Youth Offending Team (YOT).
- f. Children in Care Council representatives are Looked After Children (LAC) supported by a dedicated participation officer. The Young Mayor collaborates with this group.

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- g. Neighbourhood Assemblies allow councillors to work with Young Advisors to explore how neighbourhood forums might include more young people and as neighbourhood structures have evolved, so have the links with young people.
- h. Greater London Authority (GLA) has a Peer Mentor Scheme (young people employed by the GLA) with a Youth Participation officer, that LYMP has worked with.
- i. House of Commons visits have been arranged either as a tour or to influence policy. The most high profile of these was when the Young Mayor and Advisors joined Gordon Brown round his table at Downing Street to discuss plans for youth policy at the time. More recently there has been significant engagement with the Votes at 16 lobby.
- j. 10 000 Hands and Safe Havens Campaign led by Jimmy Mizen Foundation in partnership with LYMP
- k. British Youth Council (BYC) Votes at 16 campaign has been actively supported by LYMP.
- l. Erasmus exchanges enable young people to exchange ideas and engage in international debate

Minority engagement: The programme has been notably successful at involving candidates who are young women, from BME backgrounds and/or have a disability.

Social Media: An online presence matters

- a. Online visibility of candidates has been reflected in recent year results, with those with the most interactive, diverse and entertaining online presence also attracting strong voting numbers.
- b. As digital technology, community radio and social network sites have diversified, so has their usage in young mayoral elections.

Why Young People Become Candidates

- a. Young people are motivated to stand for election for a combination of altruistic and personal development reasons and hold the position of Young Mayor in high regard. Candidates say they want to make a change in Lewisham, want to help or speak for others and hope the experience of standing will provide them with significant personal development.
- b. Candidates treat the positions as of higher significance than anything else they may have been engaged in before and sometimes candidates stand several times before being successful. Candidates' previous experience is primarily gained from school, though in 2014, a larger proportion of the candidates had previous experience as Young Advisors

Youth Democracy as a Youth Work process

Dr Kalbir Shukra, Senior Lecturer, Goldsmiths University of London with Malcolm Ball and Katy Brown, Advisors to the Young Mayor of Lewisham – written evidence (CCE0026)

- a. LYMP is facilitated by professionally qualified youth workers based in the town hall offices
- b. The youth workers offer young people opportunities for civic and political engagement that is consistent with traditional youth work ethos and methods
 - i. allowing young people to define issues based on their lived experience
 - ii. engaging young people in conversation and critical dialogue
 - iii. creating opportunities for young people to share and contest opinions
 - iv. developing spaces for young people to engage with adults in debate, respecting young people's expertise

Voting Age

- a. Lewisham Young Mayor elections are important for testing the arguments that:
 - i. young people under 18 aren't mature enough to make an informed decision
 - ii. that young people wouldn't turn out to vote if the voting age were to be lowered
 - iii. under 18s wouldn't make a mature decision.
 - iv. These arguments are examined in the 2017 article 'Extending democracy to young people: is it time for youth suffrage?' by Kalbir Shukra. It can be read on <http://research.gold.ac.uk/20166/> or <http://www.youthandpolicy.org/y-and-p-archive/issue-116/>

Recommendations

- a. That voting age is reviewed and lowered to include more young people
- b. That programmes be developed to support young people to stand for election as councillors
- c. That youth work be envisioned to support young people (outside of school) in developing their opinions through active engagement as citizens. On this basis the youth worker's role in citizenship would be to offer opportunities for young people to engage in conversation, opinion formation and deliberation, value lived experience but be open to hearing other perspectives
- d. That local authority programmes engage young people in local democracy, build intercultural communication and social solidarities for community cohesion.

18 August 2017

Mr Michal Siewniak – written evidence (CCE0201)

Polish national living in Welwyn Garden City (Hertfordshire)

Submission is in my personal capacity. All my responses are based mainly on my experience of working in the Community & Voluntary Sector as well as time in which I served as a local Councillor.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

I am an EU migrant from Poland, a local 'community activist'. I was brought up under communism in Poland, and when I watched the collapse of the Berlin Wall in 1989 I never dreamt that Europe could change so much in such a relatively short period of time. Growing up in Poland in 1980's was an interesting experience! From time to time, I have to "pinch" myself as I still can't believe that until 1989 Poland as well as many other Eastern European countries were separated and we were not able to travel freely abroad, express openly our views, practise our religion or even watch foreign TV. I still remember queuing and trying to get basic items in order to bake a Christmas cake. We were also not allowed to learn English so I was taught Russian. Overall, our freedom in those days was hugely limited. This is why I feel that citizenship and civic engagement matter so much! My childhood has most definitely shaped me (which I only understood when I migrated to the UK) and helped me to understand how important it is to be actively part of the process.

I do feel that we in Britain take for granted our 'freedoms' also when it comes to voting and being aware of the political & democratic processes. This is also why I think this exercise, led by the Houses of Lords, is so important, practically today when we are experiencing an 'identity crisis'.

We all have different experience when it comes to 'identity'. I am from Poland, but I also identify myself as a Christian and 'Global Citizen'. We are 'wearers of multiply hats' which in many ways reflect the society we live in; diverse and very multicultural.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

I will try to respond to first part of the question. I feel that despite many success stories there are still gaps in relation to civic engagement. Understanding the benefits of democracy increases people's confidence in terms of engaging with Government and Statutory Institutions. It increases their opportunities to improve job prospects, living conditions and health. Understanding democracy or what citizenship is & means build a sense of ownership over our own circumstances. I do believe that it hugely helps in becoming proactive members of our communities and move away from feeling a victim of our own circumstances.

I have mentioned below many projects which I've been running to strengthen and promote the citizenship. Organising social outings (trip to the Houses of Parliament) could have wide range of benefits to our people. Many of us have seen the Houses of Parliament but have no physical sense of its history and current work. Visiting the Parliament would enable people to see "Parliament in action". Meeting e.g. local MP will give participants an opportunity to ask relevant question and it will raise their aspirations.

Irrespective of cultural, social and economical barriers, encouraging people (maybe in particular from minority backgrounds) and develop a sense of inclusion and belonging. All these planned activities would help to build new networks, partnerships and most importantly they would put our residents at the heart of civic activism.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

I don't think that laws encourage active political engagement. I had a privilege to stand and win a seat in Welwyn Hatfield. I took huge pride and responsibility in representing my residents. Having said that, less than 35% voted when I was elected. People are disconnected, there is a lot of distrust and confusion.

It is now more than 12 since the EU referendum. I have lived in a number of European countries but I don't remember seeing anything like the effect of the vote. It seems to have resulted in a complete lack of ability to have a mature debate on issues which affect us all, like globalization, migration and the refugee crisis. I truly feel that we've lost an ability to listen to each other. We are no longer able to build a space for a real dialogue. 'Cheap journalism', sensationalism do not help. Instead of projecting a balanced and matured debate, many of the newspapers try to divide us. This also discourages people and very often those who have no voice, became even more isolated and disadvantaged.

As a councillor, I have suggested to reduce the number of local elections (from each year to every other year) so protect public finances (in our area that cost is £100,000) but also to reduce the number of elected members. Some of my ideas didn't go down very well and at times I felt discouraged and disheartened.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

I think that schools and educational authorities play a vital part in promoting the 'citizenship agenda'. I also think that a lot more needs to be done to encourage students from a very young age to learn how to debate and discuss many important issues. I have been involved in number of initiatives (see question 7). I have recently attended a meeting which took place in the Netherlands (June 2017). It was so refreshing and uplifting to see many people who believe in united world. It was a really important experience for me which once more demonstrated that we have a huge responsibility to bring unity where there is disunity or bring and understanding where there is hate and divisions. Maybe because we are in difficult, uncertain and turbulent times, we should try a bit harder to become, wherever we are and whatever we do, 'Champions and Ambassadors' for Unity. We all have a huge part to play in being builders of bridges not walls. We all should, in every single environment, to take every risk and use every opportunity to each person we encounter that there is so much more than unites us than divides us. I've tried always to do my part. As an employee of a local secondary school, I've set up a 'debating club' which brought together many students from a lot of different backgrounds. The school itself has a bad reputation however this small initiative enabled me to interact with students and discuss with them many topics which at that time were relevant (e.g. first talks of Scottish Independence Referendum etc.)

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

I think that community and voluntary sector has a hugely significant role to play. As a Service Manager for a local charity, I am in 'position of influence' to promote 'citizenship and volunteering'. Only last weekend (2 September), I've run a really successful Volunteering Fair which brought together almost 20 local providers which were trying to recruit new volunteers. Each of these organisations is a real champion for their organisation and we all need to create an environment where volunteering (which is so strongly linked with the citizenship agenda) is recognised as a way to address some of the issues which your inquiry is trying to resolve. I am so proud to be working in such a vibrant 'industry'! It is evolving, no doubt, we have to be smart. Since I started in the sector nine years ago it's changed incredibly, and now with tightening of budgets and resources, we are adapting by learning new techniques, adopting new technologies and collaborating even better. We have to use every opportunity to make a difference and serve our communities. This means in fact – creating active citizens!

Very often charities are perceived as fluffy - this is wrong, each charity is essentially a business, a social business and we're accountable to our funders so we have to show that we are making an impact - every single day.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

I have been involved in running number of initiatives which promote civic & community activism. The 'Parliament Week' is one of my favourite campaigns in the UK. The Parliament Week is a UK-wide programme of events and activities that inspire, engage and connect people with parliamentary democracy and processes. I have helped to organise 8 trips to the Houses of Parliament (via the Houses of Parliament Tour Office and local MP's) as well as many debates which encourage people to debate & learn e.g. "European Elections – why would I bother to vote" (Hoddesdon, March 2014), or "Youth and Democracy Debate" with a local secondary schools (Hatfield, November 2016).

The aim of each of these projects is to increase civic participation within residents. These projects, which are always delivered in partnership other agencies, help to address the issue of civic engagement and build a platform for "community activism". My main objective is always to enthuse people to get involved in democratic processes and intensify the dialogue between institutions and their citizens. I absolutely love them and I think that are critically important! The next trip takes in November 2017.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

I watched the collapse of the Berlin Wall but I would have never dreamt that Europe and Poland will change so much in such a relatively short period of time.

I think that recent turbulent times have created a lot of problems and divisions. It is 'us against them'. In a way, I don't want Europe to be divided again. I went through that experience and I want us to work together to address the global issues. I don't want us to take a step back. I would like us all to recognise and champion diversity and challenge prejudice, in any way and form.

From my point of view re - building trust, so damaged during this campaign, may take a lot of time. I hope it won't affect building the cohesive society which I want to be part of.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

I've always tried to demonstrate that even though I come from a minority background, I can be a 'net contributor' (not only in financial terms). One of the things which I've learnt in Britain is not to stigmatise people. Only because you come from an ethnic background, it doesn't necessarily mean that you are 'hard to reach (or as I prefer to call these groups 'EASY TO IGNORE!)). Do we do enough to effectively interact with these, very often distinctive groups? It really doesn't often has to be a sophisticated project. A smile or a nod or any other act of kindness can help to build bridges. And that is a lot of truth in saying that even though we have the greatest technology, there is so much which keeps us apart. We all need to take some responsibility and actions and demonstrate each and every single day, with new 'pair of eyes' and seek opportunities to create a platform for engagement and dialogue. Barriers and walls will fall down (as they did in 1989) and I hope that having a 'BME or any other label' won't stop us from making this lovely planet a better place.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

In my case, the whole experience of living in the UK enabled me to improve my life chances and my language skills. It has also helped me to break down various barriers and recognise the importance of diversity. Settling in the UK, trying to be part of the local community, encouraged me to get to know other cultures and people of other faith groups. The whole experience has broadened my horizons and it made me more tolerant and rounded person.

I have been always proud to be from Poland but I also knew that I had to do my part to integrate. That didn't of course losing my 'Polish identity'. I've also tried to use other campaigns to bring the recent migrants and the local community together (e.g. Hatfield Polish Day in September 2009) or even 'utilise' national tragedies (e.g. plane crash with Polish MP's) which enabled me to introduce Poland to many people who came along to our commemorating events.

Today, in a current political debate, I also think that the UK's ability to demonstrate modern and forward thinking society where people from all sorts of walks of life are treated the same, have been affected.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how? This is very important issue. I don't think that you can effectively become an active citizen when your language skills are not good enough. Unfortunately with poor ESOL provision, that is not always easy. I like the Danish model which almost enforces people to learn the language as soon as they arrive into the country. The initial emphasis is on the language and upskilling e.g. refugees so that they become independent and 'self – sufficient' as soon as possible. A lot of resources are put in place which long term helps to break down barriers and smooth the integration process. Also, many residents are encourage to volunteer as quickly as possible in order to boost their job prospects.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Lech Wałęsa, was the leader of the Polish Solidarity Movement, a guy who helped to bring down communism in Poland. The reason I think he was an impressive guy is because he was just an electrician, and he didn't have impressive qualifications, but he led a movement that helped free my country. He had faith, believed in something and was able to mobilise a nation.

More locally, a true British hero – Jo Cox who said that a lot more unites us than divides us. I love the 'Great Together Campaign' which was set up in her memory of Jo Cox. Local communities were invited to get together with their neighbours to share food and celebrate all that we hold in common. There were more than 100,000 events organized across the UK e.g. street party, shared barbecue or a picnic. What mattered was that people had fun and opportunity to bring communities closer together. Jo was a true 'Ambassador for Citizenship'.

Dr Michael Skey, Lecturer in Communication & Media, Department of Social Sciences, Loughborough University – written evidence (CCE0031)

Research on questions of nationality, belonging and civic engagement in Britain has exploded in recent times as policy makers, academics and media commentators have looked to make sense of an increasingly diverse, and sometimes divided, population. My own research⁷⁶⁹ has focused on the attitudes and experiences of what I have labelled the ethnic majority, those who position themselves at the centre of national life and articulate a more secure sense of belonging to the nation in relation to ethnic minorities. I want to make two points in my submission. First, to argue that too much of the discussion of this topic tends to focus on minorities and what they should or shouldn't do to better integrate into British society. Such an approach is deeply problematic for a number of reasons. First, it emphasizes ethnicity, rather than say class, region or gender, when it comes to thinking about integration. It is arguable that the 'distance' between working and middle class groups in Britain is a major stumbling block to wider social integration but few, if any, government proposals address this issue, preferring to focus on ethnicity or culture. Second, it generally ends up stigmatizing some of the poorest and most vulnerable groups in British society. Third, it fails to acknowledge the extent to which claims to belonging (I am British, I am part of this community) need to be also recognized by other more dominant members of a given group. In the case of Britain, there are countless examples of ethnic majority members refusing to acknowledge the claims of minorities to belong in this country.

Therefore, in trying to make sense of these debates, it is absolutely imperative that we begin to explore the attitudes and experiences of members of the ethnic majority; where are they situated within these debates, what is at stake for them and why might such issues be of particular significance at the current time? What my research has shown is that many members of the ethnic majority are feeling increasingly anxious and insecure about some of the wider socio-economic transformations they are witnessing and, as a result, believe that their own privileged status within the nation is being undermined. In other words, they feel that they are losing out. Now, we might not like some of the ways in which such anxieties are expressed but simply dismissing them as backward or uncivilized or racist, doesn't enable us to engage people or offer more effective means for building bridges between different groups.

The second point I want to make concerns the English question, which again often tends to be overlooked when policy makers are discussing Britain and Britishness. Devolution in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland has meant that the situation of the English has also shifted and the possible consequences of this need to be addressed.

⁷⁶⁹ National Belonging & Everyday Life, Palgrave MacMillan

Put simply, making a claim to be British is quite different to making a claim to be English. For instance, when it comes to defining belonging in Britain the terms of the debate are changing; that is, the distinction between non-whites as the interlopers and whites as the hosts is beginning to unravel. Furthermore, attitudes among both ethnic majority and minority Britons are also shifting. In the former case, there is a general tendency towards greater acceptance of ethnic diversity and a willingness to recognise non-whites as British.⁷⁷⁰ In the latter case, there is growing anecdotal evidence that second and third-generation ethnic minorities are increasingly willing to assert their own sense of belonging and entitlement in relation to more recent arrivals.⁷⁷¹ In other words, they increasingly view Britain as ‘their’ country and, as a result, lay claim to the benefits (economic and social) that flow from this. This is borne out by much of the survey evidence which notes that the majority of ethnic minorities are more than willing to identify themselves as British. This is an interesting development, and indicates the extent to which ‘British’ has become a marker of civic rather than ethnic identity for increasing numbers.

But what about England and Englishness? It is worth noting that in all the discussions of devolution, relatively little has been said of the consequences this might have for minority groups in England. This is because ‘English’ remains a far more exclusionary identity category than ‘British’, and one that is often rejected by ethnic minorities and increasingly embraced by members of the majority as a way of distinguishing themselves (in both senses of the term). In other words, debates on devolution are having a major impact on how ethnic minorities, who have so long struggled to be recognised as belonging to Britain, define themselves and are defined by the majority. This is something that few people have acknowledged even as the signs of a tentative debate around Englishness have emerged over the past few years. It may yet become another fault line in the ongoing and shifting debates around what it means to belong in Britain, and England, in the contemporary era and, as such, should be addressed by policy makers when they are looking to build programmes for improving civic engagement and community cohesion.

22 August 2017

⁷⁷⁰ <http://www.britishfuture.org/articles/reports/new-report-the-melting-pot-generation/>, accessed 9 August 2014.

⁷⁷¹ <http://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/video/2013/mar/18/ukip-immigration-eu-toilets-video>, accessed 9 August 2014.

Nigel Slack – written evidence (CCE0109)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1 Citizenship & Identity are now fluid concepts in the 21st Century. The flood of Britons applying for dual citizenship after the Brexit referendum is a symptom of a weaker link between individuals and the ideas of Nationality. The UK has many citizens living and working here that do not hold official papers as UK citizens but have been part of the fabric of our society for tens of years. Similarly we have many UK Nationals living and working abroad who retain only their UK citizenship despite many years passing since their emigration.

2 I would therefore argue that the most important part of this inquiry is the idea of Civic Engagement, which should not be bounded by rules on Nationality or citizenship. All people living and or working in the boundary of the state and connected to the state through taxes, familial ties and access to services should have access to civic engagement. Identity changes depending on the context of the question being asked. Am I British? Am I Christian? Am I unemployed? Am I a Team supporter? In this way, the means by which people engage with citizenship need to be similarly flexible.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

3 Citizenship is not about membership & belonging but that is how it is used by state institutions. It is seen as conferring special rights to one set of people in a community and is therefore as often divisive as it is collective in nature. There should certainly be a framework for outlining the rights & responsibilities of citizens (and Governments) in the form of a written constitution. We are currently citizens both of a Nation state and a conglomerate European state, though this is being removed from people irrespective of their own choice in the matter.

4 Education is the key role in the encouragement of citizenship & for fostering engagement. Pride in a single citizenship (British for instance) should not be encouraged, putting one form of identity above others is divisive and would discourage people who see that citizenship as just another aspect of their overall identity (French, Irish, Pakistani, Scottish) from being as engaged as they might otherwise be.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

5 The conversation about how the relationship between citizenship & engagement is defined that is a question that requires more exacting consideration than possible here. The principles of that relationship should be defined by a binding written constitution that is widely debated and widely consulted upon, taking the best from our own Parliamentary & legal frameworks and adding lessons from other systems around the world.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

6 Current laws deter political engagement. The relationship between the citizen and their local, county/regional & national governance structures are overly complex and misunderstood. Too many laws are created centrally and simply delivered by lower tier government and this is confusing and therefore a deterrent to engagement.

7 Most importantly representation should reflect the way people vote. First Past the Post is a broken system that delivers contrary and therefore divisive results at both National & local levels. The age, method of voting and the registration process should reflect a more direct correlation to representation, PR being the obvious preference in that respect. Registration should certainly be automatic, linked to achievement of majority (or citizenship) through something like the NI Number

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

8 Citizenship should be part of the curriculum throughout a persons full time education. The content may be different as age progresses but the process should focus more on the roles and responsibilities of citizens & governments (at all levels) including how to be a part of that governing process and how to effectively challenge the status quo. Current coverage in schools seem to be sponsored by outside agencies and to press their agenda rather than an agreed broad understanding of the citizenship relationship. (ie. Banks teaching money issues, aiming to create good consumers and encourage debt spending) citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public

9 Having very little knowledge of the National Citizen Service, suggests, as I am a well engaged citizen, that their profile is not very significant. Inevitably such programmes can and will become politicised, either by the organisations delivering the programme or the governments sponsoring them. They should therefore have no formal or statutory support from government.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

10 Society can support civic engagement through the approach of Governments at all levels being more transparent, accountable and public facing. Rules for governance meetings should be outlined more rigorously and always aim to favour public scrutiny and accessibility above party political privacy or corporate commercial confidentiality.

11 The webcasting (broadcasting live via the internet) of meetings should be ubiquitous in all levels of Government and appropriately funded from the centre. Archiving of such broadcasts should also be normal practice for all levels of government.

12 The encouragement to ensure that decision making and consultation is pushed to the lowest feasible level of society is also vital and funding (from Centre) should be a part of that solution. Neighbourhood meetings and albeit small spending budgets at this level can make a significant difference to people's engagement.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

13 We should all be more aware of our rights under the Human Rights Act and these base rights should be the values we are expected to share. Beyond that we run the risk of creating values that are desirable rather than necessary or, even worse, politically motivated by whichever party is ruling at the time.

14 Current threats to these values are increasingly from the devaluing of local control (cuts to local budgets & services) and the dilution of local control through privatisation and outsourcing. The democratic deficit these practices create is well documented and the supposed economic benefits are lacking evidence. Any service being delivered by the lowest cost contractor cannot be the best service and politicians are poor contract experts.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

15 Communities & Groups are feeling 'left behind' as they fail to see any benefit from new legislation or supposed economic growth. The welfare state has moved from supportive and inclusive to punitive and denigrating. Unemployment figures are widely seen as unsound statistics and many 'new' jobs are both precarious and uncertain in earnings ability. Those in extremes of poverty or perceived discrimination are unable to engage in the basics of society never mind become engaged in political society. This will only be overcome with a system of support that allows even the most vulnerable in society to live with respect and dignity. Universal Basic Income is gaining ground as a potential solution for this very reason.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

16 Programmes aimed at improving citizenship & engagement are often at odds with attempts to improve integration. The promotion of 'so called' British values and the imposition of divisive measures like 'Prevent' emphasise difference and promote ideas of 'right thinking' ways of being. Social cohesion and to some extent integration is a long term process, often over generations. If we look at how second and third generation migrants live it often bears little resemblance to their forebears. Knowledge and understanding of each other is the most effective measure to oppose alleged extremism on all sides. I am unaware of any forced integration policies actually working to generate a happy and stable population.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

17 Whilst proficiency in English is a desirable skill for all UK citizens it should not be a prerequisite for residence or citizenship. If that hurdle were to be applied throughout the world most UK born people would be unable to live anywhere else but in the UK and we would see a mass return of UK emigrants (mostly pensioners) in places like Spain and France. It is however important that institutions & employers in the UK who benefit from foreign staff, students or employees be responsible for providing the training they may need to adapt to living here.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

18 Can't think of one.

Nigel Slack – written evidence (CCE0109)

19 Whilst this may not be the most academic or detailed of responses it should be noted that it originates from a member of the public that deals with the issues around engagement on a regular basis, an an active and engaged citizen in my own right.

7 September 2017

Smartmatic – written evidence (CCE0232)

Introduction

This document is a response to Question 4 in the Call for Evidence document, with particular focus on the impact of changes to the voting and voter registration process.

Smartmatic is the global leader in the provision of election technology. Smartmatic is a multinational company headquartered in London that designs, engineers and deploys technological solutions aimed at helping central, regional and local governments to fulfil their commitments to their citizens to deliver safe, secure and transparent elections and to increase accessibility for all voters.

Smartmatic regularly contribute to international research and think tanks exploring the benefits of automation in elections. An increasing number of governments are introducing tools that allow citizens to vote electronically (in polling stations or other physical locations) and remotely, via the internet. Why? Because technology based elections increase election integrity and improve security and transparency whilst making voting more accessible. More people can vote, in an easier and more convenient way, increasing the mandate of elected representatives and bringing individuals closer to those who are responsible for delivering the services upon which they rely in their everyday lives. Election technology is also able to drive down the costs of elections - at a time where local authorities are seeing less budget year on year and election administration teams are being asked to deliver more for less.

This submission provides further information on the use of electoral modernisation technology to encourage participation and improve accessibility for all voters.

Why do we need technology in 21st century elections?

Governments, who are committed to delivering fraud-free, open, transparent and fair elections, must continue to ensure that the procedures and practices that govern them are balanced with accessible processes that encourage engagement and participation from all voters, including those in hard-to-reach groups.

This is a challenge now being met by an increasing number of governments worldwide by the introduction of technology to the voting process. This includes two key channels of technology deployment:

Remote on-line voting - casting a vote using the internet from an unsupervised voting location; and

Electronic voting - using technology in a polling station or polling locations to facilitate the casting and recording of the vote, often with a retained verifiable paper audit trail.

However, in reality technology is now being used to improve almost every stage of the electoral cycle (see Figure 1 below); from the administration of the electoral register through the auditing of political parties expenses, right through to the manner in which those voters are authenticated at polling stations and how they subsequently cast and record their vote.

Voting technology improves all the variables by which an election can be measured including accuracy, transparency, security, accessibility and cost. Technology allows local authorities to:

Increase the speed of all processes (voting, verification, counting, result publication, etc.);

Improve the accuracy of election counts by eliminating human error (intentional or involuntary)

Eliminate subjectivity in the adjudication process

Well-designed election technology also creates mechanisms to allow voters themselves to audit election results and offers unprecedented levels of transparency which are absent from traditional paper based voting processes.

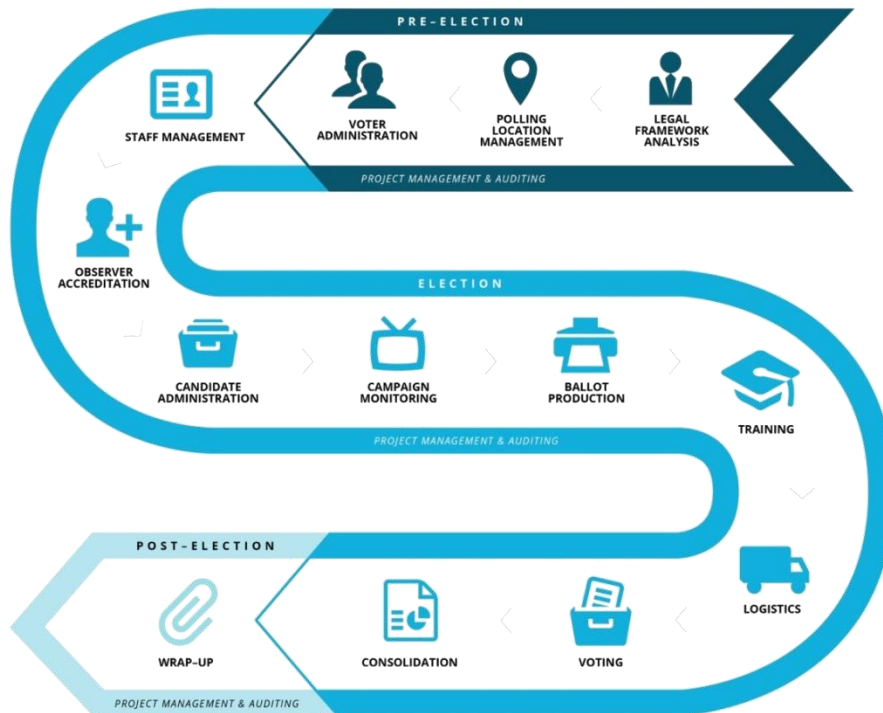

Figure 1
Participation

In the UK, there has been a dramatic and ongoing decline in participation of elections over the last 20 years, with the exception of a small number of electoral events, such as the Scotland Independence and the EU Referendum, which saw participation levels that buck this downward trend.

Whilst the 2017 General Election saw an increase in turnout of 2.6% from the 2015 polls, overall General Election turnout has fallen by 13% percentage points in the last century. Of the 46.9 million eligible voters in 2017, only 32.2 million voted.

Of the UK's 19k elected officials, over 95% are elected on a less than 50% turnout. Average turnout in the local elections is 36% and average turnout in PCC elections drops to a sorrowful 15%.

In addition to poor turnouts, closer analysis of those voters participating in UK elections shows a concerning growing inequality in participation, with very low turnouts amounts certain voting groups. Unequal turnout matter because it reduces the incentives for government to respond to the interests of non-voters and threatens the central claim of democracy which is that every citizen's preference or vote is of equal value.

Youth turnout did increase in the 2017 general election, increasing from 43% to 54%. However this still means that 46% of young voters play no part in electing our government. Of the estimated two million blind or visually impaired voters, it is estimated that less than 30% vote.

The Electoral Commission have confirmed that the electoral register is under represented in a number of key areas which include:

- Students and younger people (under 35);
- People living in the private rented sector;
- Certain Black and Minority Ethnic (BME) groups;
- British citizens living abroad;
- Commonwealth and EU citizens

Despite various costly government promotional drives, of estimated 5 million British citizens living overseas, only a tiny fraction of 300 thousand are registered to vote. Of those registered, a significantly small percentage actually vote.

Challenges

There are many varied reasons for participatory decline. Yet technology that is being deployed today, by many governments around the world, seeks to meet some of the participation and accessibility challenges.

More than ever before, voters travel temporarily or relocate permanently. Citizens are travelling greater distances to work, working longer hours and having to balance an increasing number of personal and professional responsibilities, such that the challenge of voting at a particular location on a particular day is ever growing. Yet the electoral administration processes that support them, for both registration and voting, are rooted in the 19th century.

Voters now demand and receive an ever-increasing availability of online services both for government and commercial transactions. The digital service for voter registration, whilst successful, has raised voters expectations. Voters assume that online registration leads to online voting, and the realisation that this is where the digital interaction stops, and that their only voting option is a purely paper process, is leading to voter dissatisfaction. 82% (41 million) adults in the UK access the internet every day. In 2016, 70% of adults accessed the internet on-the-go, from mobile devices. 89% of households in the UK have internet access. Whilst we bank, date, submit our taxes, renew our TV and driving licences and apply for passport updates online, we cannot vote online. The proliferation of internet enabled personal devices mean that voters from all backgrounds are more connected than they have ever been. The internet, smartphones and social media have dramatically increased citizen engagement. These tools have given everyone a level playing field to express their opinions.

Elections are becoming increasingly complex and more frequent. Historically the UK electoral system was dominated by first past the post elections. The UK now sees regular use of Supplementary Voting for Directly Elected Mayors and Police and Crime Commissioners, STV in Scotland and Northern Ireland and Closed Party List systems for the GLA. In the Greater London Authority elections, there are 5.4 million voters, with three ballot papers, and three different voting systems. Ballot papers and supporting materials are only provided in English. Over 2.9 million Londoners were not born in the UK, over 1.4 million Londoners only speak English as a second language and London has over 20 commonly spoken languages. At the last GLA elections, just under half a million votes were rejected and whilst some of these may have been intended, the vast majority would undoubtedly have been through voter confusion and unintended mistakes. With an average turnout of less than 50%, this means that the for future elections rejected ballot papers could exceed the winning margins.

It is increasingly likely that we will see changes to the voting methods available in the devolved regions of Scotland and Wales in the coming years, with both the Scottish and Welsh Governments expressing a desire to reform elections in their regions to increase democratic participation and accessibility. These are regions that, geographically, are more isolated from the current paper based system with Highland and Island authorities. This could result in a two-tier system where alternative voting methods are available to voters for local and regional electoral contests, but with those same voters being required to revert to paper based systems for national elections and polls.

Voters with disabilities face a significant challenge when trying to exercise their democratic right to vote. Whilst wheelchair access to polling stations had improved in recent years, there are still a large number of voters with disabilities who are unable to visit polling stations and are required the use of a proxy vote or, if visually impaired, a plastic template that provides extremely limited assistance. Not only is this undermining voter privacy but it also directly contravenes the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Person with Disabilities that the UK has signed and ratified. The RNIB 2017 Turned Out Report highlights how the current voting system is failing to insure the rights of all voters to vote independently and in secret, with only 1 in 4 of those blind or partially sighted members surveyed saying that the current system is fit for purpose. Voters with visual impairments are quite rightly asking government to consider how they access voting in a way that allows them to vote unaided.

Technology Solutions

Online Voting

Online voting provides a far greater opportunity for voters to participate in the election process by offering a more convenient, yet secure, channel for voting and potentially, an extended voting period – a methodology used in Estonia. Online voting can be particularly effective in driving up the levels of participation in traditionally underrepresented groups such as military voters, overseas voters and voters with disabilities.

Online voting can offer the perfect platform to bring the ballot to the voter in a more accessible and secure way than other remote voting methods. Online voting provides a secure platform for voters with disabilities to cast their vote from home without having to attempt to visit a polling station, or rely on other trusted companions or assistants to vote in proxy or assist them during their in-person voting. Online voting integrates seamlessly with accessibility tools such as braille keypads, sip and puff tubes and screen readers (e.g. JAWS) to ensure that blind/low vision voters and voters with motor/physical disabilities are afforded the same democratic rights as able bodied voters.

Cases in the USA, Estonia and Australia have all seen increases in participation. In the New South Wales State Election in 2011, online voting was made available for voters with disabilities and those who lived a defined distance from a polling station. The post-election report summarised that “usage of iVote greatly exceeded expectations by threefold, with almost 50,000 electors using it. We estimate that access to iVote enfranchised around 30,000 electors who were unlikely to vote had iVote not been available”.

One of the most underrepresented voting groups is young voters. Research has shown that online voting could boost youth voter turnout to 70% in a general election. Tech savvy Post-Millennials and Generation Z voters have grown up knowing nothing but an internet enabled life-style. Their social lives and increasingly their education, work and professional lives are conducted online. The decision in Scotland for 16 and 17 year olds to be enfranchised saw over 109,000 voters added to the electoral register and of this amount, over 75% voted. Yet it seems unlikely that this level of turnout can be maintained for other election events, where the need to visit a polling station or complete a complex postal voting pack will provide sufficient relevance to these voters and the way in which they engage in all other aspects of their lives.

Whilst a permanent online voting option could see a significant impact on the engagement of young voters, in Estonia, far from creating a digital divide between young and old, the take up of online voting has actually been age, sex and politically neutral, with all voter profiles choosing to cast their vote in this way.

Electronic Voting

Despite paper and pencil being the way in which voters in the UK have been casting their votes in secret ballots since 1872, many mistakes are still made by voters. This is increased in elections where there are combined polls or more complex voting systems such as supplementary voting, where voters cast a 1st and 2nd choice, or the single transferable voting method, where voters rank candidates in the order of preference.

eVoting technology can be used to assist the voter, in the privacy of the voting booth, to correctly cast their vote in different election types, minimising inadvertent marking errors and flagging if voters have over / under voted. It is also possible to swap instructions easily from one language set to another, to ensure that eligible voters, of all backgrounds and needs are met. The friendliness of user interfaces – to which we are now accustomed via our phones and computers – can make voting more accessible. Large screens and large fonts can be used to assist those with limited sight. In automated elections voters from all age groups consistently report that it is easier to vote electronically than with pen and paper. In addition, it has been widely demonstrated that it facilitates voting for those with lower literacy levels, because they can simply touch a screen that shows the logo, face or colour of the political party that they wish to vote for.

Smartmatic – written evidence (CCE0232)

eVoting technology, such as touch-screens, provides significantly higher levels of accessibility and usability for voters with disabilities, than traditional paper methods. eVoting technology can be integrated with audio voting, sip and puff technology for navigating around the ballot paper, and touch/braille pads.

Other Electoral Modernisation Technologies and Process Changes

In addition to online voting and eVoting in polling stations, there are many other technologies and process changes that are being used specifically to increase participation and improve accessibility to the democratic process of both electoral registration and voting. Some examples include:

Voting on additional days polling days – facilitated with early online voting

Voting in any polling station/mobile polling stations – facilitated with centralised electoral registers and poll-book technology, for the electronic marking of the register

Mobile Device Identity Authentication – allowing voters to use their mobile phones to assure Electoral Registration Officers of their identify rather than the complex, costly and time consuming process of sending, receiving and processing paper based copies of identification documents.

Estonian Elections – Additional Information

The Estonian internet voting solution is the longest standing, most technologically advanced, and highly trusted internet voting solution in existence. It has been used to support binding government elections since 2005, and to date has delivered eight nationwide elections. Such is the level of public trust in the system that during the last two elections held, 31% of the participating voters chose to cast their vote online.

Estonia is one of the most connected countries in the world and is ranked 15th in the UN e-Government Readiness Index (EDGI). Over time the Estonian Government have developed a citizen-orientated culture, and the physical and digital infrastructure to make best use of it. As an example, more than 90% of Estonians declare their taxes online.

There are a number of key principals upon which the Estonian i-Voting system is based. These are:

i-Voting is optional – voters may also cast their ballot by post, or in person at a polling station

Multiple voting – voters may cast their vote as many times as they like, and only the last vote to be cast will be included in the count.

Soroptimist International Durham – written evidence (CCE0064)

Paper dominance – voters may choose, after voting online, to visit a polling station and vote on paper. This process will nullify their digital vote and only the paper vote will be included in the count.

To follow is a link to a video showing a short introduction to the Estonian i-Voting process <https://www.facebook.com/SmartmaticTechnology/videos/vb.397107633694904/814290911976572/?type=2&theater>

Soroptimist International Durham – written evidence (CCE0064)

The meaning of citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century

1. We need to ask ourselves, “What does it mean to be British, what are our values, beliefs, and recognise cultural and ethnic diversity?”
2. Society has undergone significant change in the last 60 years which has led to a far more inclusive and enriched social profile.
3. Each of us needs to have understanding of how the law works, so we can recognise what is legal/illegal and the purpose of the law.
4. British society offers everybody the means to engage in a wide range of inclusive opportunities and active participation, both at local level and wider national and international engagement for the benefit of the individual of wider society and the global dimension.
5. As Soroptimists we have become involved with local members of the Guiding movement in County Durham and developed a joint challenge badge with Rainbows, Brownies, Guides and their leaders all taking part in civic engagement activities including raising funds for the charity MND.
6. We have also enabled a local school for children with a variety of physical and mental issues to visit the Prince Bishop Alpacca Farm. This has made a significant difference to their ability to relate to one another, our members, the animals and the wider community. Children who rarely spoke of their experiences outside of school were talking to teachers and their families about a simple visit which had proved to be a life changing experience. 7 Citizenship is about making sense of the society in which we live leading to respect, engagement, empowerment and support for others irrespective of race, belief and gender. 8 There are various ways to be a good neighbour some of which are outlined above.
7. We all need to engage in the processes of democracy as it enables each of us to have a voice. We’re concerned that the electoral process seems to be less relevant to young people and wondered if the way to improve that would be to look for example, at greater use of social media, electronic voting, systems designed to be relevant to the way in which particularly young people live and experience the world around them.

8. Several of us answered practice citizenship test papers. Whilst relieved that we all achieved at least the necessary 75% required to pass we felt that the certain questions were of little relevance in modern day Britain. They seemed rather to test the ability to read and retain information from a handbook rather than true citizenship. How many born and bred in this country, without reading that handbook, would know when the Romans succeeded in conquering Britain, the date of the Union flag and when the Tower of London was built? All of these were questions to be found in the citizenship tests

The rights and responsibilities attached to citizenship

1. All citizens need to be aware of their rights under law, both criminal and civic.
2. We are concerned that we live in a society which is dominated by the rights of the individual rather than a recognition that each of us has responsibilities to each other and the wider society. A “rights” dominated society is very selfish, self-centred and unhealthy.
3. Rights as a global citizen are equally important, such as awareness of the ecological threats to the environment
4. We need an awareness of global issues directly and indirectly impacting on society
5. The right to a good education is essential if each of us to make a positive contribution to our society
6. The right to have one’s individual needs respected is essential.
7. We felt, that whilst the needs of the individual were important they should not exclude the needs of others. In the past, the community took responsibility for the children living within its boundaries and this offered safety and protection for young people, a respect for authority and a recognition that bad behaviour would be challenged and have consequences. Members felt that this had been badly eroded to the point where challenging the behaviour of a child or young person could lead to violent, or at the very least unpleasant, consequences for the adult raising concerns.
8. Responsibilities as a good citizen at, local, national and international level is a cornerstone of good citizenship
9. Understanding that one’s actions will impact on the lives and wellbeing of others is the mark of a good and responsible citizen

The state of citizenship education and the role that it plays in creating active citizens

1. Citizenship should be compulsory at least until the age of 16. In real terms it remains subject to the constraints imposed by the nature of school curriculum choices. It needs to form an active part of the national curriculum. Post 16 it is more likely to be reflected in choices made in relation to further education. It features within programmes such as the D of E Award Scheme, (but members expressed concern at the cost of undertaking such a scheme due to the nature of the challenges required of young people). It is embedded into alternative qualifications such as the International Baccalaureate where a key element is active citizenship and voluntary work.
2. Schools have always promoted active citizenship and engaged young people in issues, charities, community project, global crises.
3. The current national curriculum covers a wide range of relevant issues one of the key elements reflects the increasingly diverse and inclusive nature of British society within local, national and European context.
4. The importance of beliefs that reassure, challenge bigotry and Insularity are an important part of each child and young person's education.

The role of voluntary citizenship schemes such as the National Citizen Service

1. Members felt that the National Citizenship Service had great merit and understood that it had been difficult to obtain wide recognition and support for the scheme across the country whilst noting the concerns of the National Audit Office Report.
2. The inclusivity of the Scouting and Guide movements which transcends religious belief, encourages diversity, promotes friendship and encourages gender equality and volunteering at a local, national and international level in working on community projects.
3. The Duke of Edinburgh Award encourages active participation. Raleigh International encourages fund raising through events to finance the projects undertaken globally.

The ways society can support civic engagement and the role of Government and Parliament in supporting that

1. Greater education creating the personal belief that individuals can make a real difference is vital.

2. Funding targeted appropriately at relevant groups. The Princes Trust is a good example of this on a national scale.
3. Each regional MP could create a clear organisation within the respective constituencies funded directly through Government funding.
4. Members noted the effectiveness of past campaigns such as “Keep Britain Tidy” which were remembered by all ages, not just those who were adults at the time it was initiated. Government should look for similar relevant eye-catching campaigns which would benefit society as a whole.

The values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support

1. Members felt that above all the word RESPECT should apply in our everyday lives. This would include matters listed below and this isn’t an exclusive list.
2. The freedom to worship and a respect for individual beliefs and faiths.
3. Respect for diversity has long been a feature of British society and has enabled many citizens of other countries to settle and live a peaceful life within our country
4. To respect and seek to help vulnerable members of society such as those with special needs, the financially constrained and the old person who lives on their own. Being a good neighbour, on the street, in the tower block, in the town and internationally is at the core of being British
5. The law of our country is respected internationally due to fairness and justice being at its core.
6. Respecting others and understanding the consequences of one’s actions on others.
7. Concern was expressed at the bullying culture which seems to have developed as a result of social networking. An incident which, in the past, would have been over and forgotten in a day is replayed over and over whilst watched by many others. This needs to be tackled at all levels of society and seen to be completely unacceptable.

The relationship between civic engagement and social cohesion

1. There is a duty on all of us to make sure that British society is inclusive so that all can benefit from the rich diversity of cultural integration, sharing, embracing and celebrating the best of the contribution all can bring.
2. There are such connections, significantly Notting Hill Carnival, Chinese New Year, the Asian celebrations (Melas) of cultural engagement across the North East.

South Tyneside Council – written evidence (CCE0148)

3. Civic engagement when achieved for the benefit of a community creates a sense of civic and community pride, a feeling of personal contribution, active participation and respect for and understanding of all British citizens.
4. Concern was expressed that life is now lived at a hectic pace and the opportunities taken up in the past to volunteer have become rarer. Members spoke of having several years at home with children which enabled them to volunteer at school, nursery and youth groups. Parents now are often both working full-time a short time after their children are born. This may be for financial and/or personal reasons, but it reduces their capacity to volunteer in their local communities. Whilst recognising the positive social aspects of nurseries it can also lead to children being institutionalised from a very young age.

5 September 2017

South Tyneside Council – written evidence (CCE0148)

Area of Interest: The ways society can support civic engagement and the role of Government and Parliament in supporting that

1. South Tyneside Council welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Select Committee's work to identify ways to promote civic engagement. In particular, we hope that by describing an engagement mechanism we recently developed and employed to considerable success, we can help to encourage and enable more local authorities to leverage existing networks or develop new networks to facilitate the engagement of broad communities in both small- and large-scale policy change.
2. South Tyneside Council began our Brexploration initiative in June 2017. This initiative has been an effective exercise in supporting civic engagement, facilitating targeted cooperation between society and local government, and establishing communicative pathways between society and wider Government and Parliament.
3. Brexploration is a proactive, collaboration engagement vehicle, aimed at gathering local stakeholder perspectives, needs and priorities which relate to Brexit. It has been a particularly effective mechanism for soliciting views and perspectives which will inform future Council responses to changes in policy and circumstance that Brexit may bring, as well as shape proactive actions taken by the Council to limit negative repercussions and maximise benefits of Brexit for our area.
4. Brexit is a change which has impacted and has the potential to impact so many aspects of public and private life that it would be impossible for the Council (or indeed any individual organisation) to claim to understand or attempt to respond to the situation without consulting widely. Effective civic engagement around this issue is therefore essential. In developing Brexploration, the council established an effective mechanism for itself (and indeed wider regional partners) to be able to listen to and learn from community leaders and stakeholders.

5. The Council already undertakes a range of general and specific community engagement and consultation activities, including land development consultations, regular community area forums for residents and partnership boards which facilitate close working with local business, health and third sector communities. The Brexploration project is a new and flexible consultation vehicle which has been set up in response to Brexit, with the understanding that findings have the potential to shape a number of current and future council activities.
6. Brexploration was originally conceived as an Overview and Scrutiny People's Select Committee exercise which sought to gather evidence from representatives of different major local sectors. However, the initiative quickly evolved into a wider, more collaborative engagement framework relevant to stakeholders across the wider North East region.
7. The regional aspect of the exercise has been important in supporting civic engagement in other local government structures, including the North East Combined Authority.
8. The Brexploration launch event took place on June 30th. The 4-hour event consisted of a scene-setting plenary with national and international context provided by hosts Alan Donnelly (former North East MEP) and Mark Easton (BBC News Editor), a series of themed roundtable discussions inviting delegates for their thoughts and contributions, and a plenary which allowed for full-group summaries of roundtable discussions and cross-theme questions and answers.
9. Approximately 350 individuals and organisation representatives from across the private, public and third sector were identified and approximately 80 of these delegates were able to attend the event. Invitees were selected for their knowledge and experience of and capacity to speak for different parts of local society and the economy. The invitee list included organisations the Council already has strong working relationships with, as well as a wide range of organisations new to the Council. The objectives of and reasons for the exercise were made clear, and invitees were encouraged to bring ideas and evidence that would help to shape a collective local response to Brexit. By pitching the event at a high-level, emphasising the collaborative element of the event and reaching out to and inviting major business and community leaders, the Council ensured that, at this critical stage, the consultation was relevant and appealing to invitees, and therefore was successful in bringing together a sufficiently diverse range of those important community stakeholders with pertinent and detailed insights into different parts of the community and the economy.

10. Delegates were invited to choose one of three roundtables to attend and contribute to. The Increasing Prosperity discussion was led by Alan Donnelly, and examined considerations such as the region's needs and concerns in terms of trade and international direct investment. The Workforce and Skills roundtable, guided by Caroline Theobald CBE, of FIRST Face to Face, looked at current and anticipated shortages in skills across different sectors, considered options for immigration and training solutions and identified specific asks of the government relating to priority sectors. The Community Collaboration discussion, guided by Collaborate CIC CEO Dr Henry Kippin, gave close consideration to community strengths and needs and how successful devolved services and former-EU powers could function.
11. The event was significant in that it not only facilitated useful discussion and engagement between Councillors and Officers and the public and business community, but also supported collaborative dialogue between representations of different parts of the community. For example, the Collaborative Communities roundtable brought together trade union representatives, the Police and Crime Commissioner, and the leader of a local international community organisation, among others, allowing them to listen to each other's perspectives, identify shared priorities and build working relationships. The event also gave an opportunity for representatives such as MEP Jude Kirton-Darling to share their insights and research. Councils have an important role to play in forging these inter-community connections which are foundational to a health civic society.
12. Following on from the launch event, Brexploration has split into two tracks: 1) a local process, which will be driven forward by the People's Select Committee, and will inform local policy responses to Brexit –related changes, and 2) a regional/national process, wherein a report is under development, based on initial discussion content and built upon through a wider consultation process, which will be championed and delivered to national government with the aim of shaping Brexit negotiations.
13. Delegates expressed appreciation of and satisfaction about the initial event, and it was suggested and broadly agreed upon by the wider group that the initial event should be followed up by a series of further discussions which could allow more in-depth look into specific issues. The Council and those involved are looking into how these potential continued discussion opportunities could be best facilitated.
14. The collaborative aspect of the Brexploration project has been central to its success. The Council have been flexible and open to partner involvement throughout, and anticipate future elements of the project to be taken forward by interested partners as much as by the Council itself. It is also notable that individuals from a range of political parties were invited the event, and the event was not limited by existing associations or memberships of particular structures. This afforded broad-ranging, meaningful discussion which transcended traditional political fault lines and facilitated genuine cross-engagement and collaboration.

15. South Tyneside Council recommends that this style of engagement exercise, which leverages and grows networks, could be employed by other local authorities as a means of developing policy which satisfies the needs and concerns of a wide range of constituents and stakeholders.

8 September 2017

Professor Hugh Starkey, Professor of Citizenship and Human Rights Education

Dr. Tania de St Croix, In Defence of Youth Work – written evidence (CCE0218)

1. Introduction

1.1 I am submitting this evidence on behalf of In Defence of Youth Work, a forum for critical debate that was formed in 2009 and organises seminars, conferences, and substantial online discussion amongst youth workers and other youth practitioners.

1.2 In this response, we mainly address questions 5 and 6.

2. Citizenship education (Q5)

2.1 We would like to remind the committee that education is wider than schooling and universities (formal education). While it is undoubtedly important for schools and universities to focus on political participation, it is also important to create conditions where a wider education sector – in our case, informal education, youth work, and community education – can flourish. This is particularly pertinent when we are discussing citizenship and political education. Political participation is best exercised in ‘real’ political situations, rather than only as role play; in other words, education through citizenship rather than only education about citizenship.

2.2 Youth and community work have a long history of being conceptualised as personal, social and political education. However, our political education role has not always been at the forefront, depending (ironically) on the policy priorities of the time. At times, political education has been envisioned in its more formal aspects even in youth work – e.g. youth parliaments, youth councils and young mayor projects. Such projects are valuable where they actively engage with a range of young people including many from marginalised backgrounds and communities (see for example the Lewisham Young Mayor project), rather than simply mirroring the demographics of Westminster.

2.3 The wider political education role of everyday grassroots youth work (e.g. youth clubs and street-based youth work) is intrinsic to an approach that treats young people as ‘creators, not consumers’ (Smith, 1982). While this has perhaps been neglected in recent youth policy and funding streams, mainstream youth work has a vital role to play, particularly in engaging with young people on issues that schools would struggle to deal with (such as young people who would like to campaign on education and schooling itself), and in engaging young people who are marginalised both in the schooling system and in having a say on political issues. Young people who do not feel comfortable or successful in school may not be inspired if political education is only, or mainly, associated with school.

3. National Citizen Service (Q6)

3.1 Youth and community work has a long history of engaging young people over the long term – and particularly in working class and ethnically diverse communities, as well as with marginalised groups such as young LGBT people and young disabled people’s groups, and groups of young carers and young people undergoing particular challenges. While these groups have been closed down or lost funding, the National Citizen Service has been funded extremely well. There is no evidence that the National Citizen Service is more effective than year-round, community-based provision with a wider age group (youth work engages with young people aged 8-25, particularly 13-19, whereas NCS works with young people aged 16-17).

3.2 As youth workers we know that many young people enjoy NCS and get a lot out of it. We also know many young people who say it is not for them, for various reasons; these young people are never mentioned, however, and there has been a lack of research into why some young people are not interested. It is hardly surprising to youth workers that NCS is enjoyed by many young people and has some positive impact; NCS uses various methods long established in youth work (residential, social action projects, learning in groups, life skills, reflective discussions). However, it is aimed at young people of a narrow age range, is a ‘one size fits all’ model, is short-term, and appeals to certain kinds of young people who are already engaged in their communities and ambitious to go to university. Youth work has a history of engaging more widely, for a longer time period.

3.3 Lengthening the NCS is not the answer. While a short programme is able to achieve certain outcomes, only community-based longer-term provision that ‘starts from where young people are starting from’ is likely to engage young people who are not interested in NCS.

3.4 Making NCS (or any similar scheme) compulsory would lead to resentment and many practical issues. Telling young people they ‘must’ do citizenship activities or volunteering would be authoritarian, hypocritical, and contradictory to the nature of these activities.

3.5 The ‘value for money’ of NCS has been the subject of ongoing scrutiny (National Audit Office, 2017; Public Accounts Committee, 2017). £1,863 per participant (NAO, 2017, p.4) is a high cost for what is effectively a short summer scheme for 16 year olds in comparison to year-round provision for a wider age range. The Education Select Committee’s (2011) Services for Young People inquiry recommended that NCS was not continued in its current form in the light of ‘concerns about the scheme’s cost and practical implementation’ (p.60). ‘Value for money’ concerns have re-emerged in recent months, as official bodies have criticised the high cost per place, the money wasted on unfilled spaces, the lack of financial accountability, and the need for evidence on longer term impact (NAO, 2017; Public Accounts Committee, 2017). Its costs have risen steeply each year as it has been scaled up for increased participation: the government has committed to the rather striking figure of £1.26 billion over the 2016-2020 period (NAO, 2017, p.4).

3.6 At a time when young people are calling for renewed investment in youth work (UK Youth Voice, 2017), we would like to suggest that the NCS spending is reviewed – not only on its own merits in terms of ‘value for money’ but in comparison to what has been lost in the time when NCS has been funded. It cannot be right that the government cannot afford to fund youth work, but can afford NCS, which costs a great deal more per space. At least some of the resources used for NCS should be diverted to community-based youth work, and to free training and education for youth and community workers (including volunteers) in political and citizenship education.

3.7 While its per-person costs have risen, NCS has gradually been reduced from a two month scheme to a three or four week project. Costs are rising but the provision is becoming shorter. Rather than emerging from what young people in local areas say they want, NCS takes similar – sometimes identical - forms in every region of England and, more recently, Northern Ireland. It is closely controlled and prescribed: its programme, timings, outcomes, and evaluation are embedded in the contracts that providers are required to adhere to – this does not tend to promote active citizenship and reduces the potential role of young people in shaping what they do on NCS.

3.8 Even in the ‘social action’ element of the scheme, which is specifically intended to be designed and carried out by young people, the need for a ‘social action experience’ to take place within a tight timescale militates against genuine involvement at young people’s pace and starting from their concerns. For example, the group observed as part of an independent research project was tasked with painting a ‘community room’ in a college, a project that was pre-designed by regional staff (Mills & Waite, 2017).

3.9 Whereas political and citizenship education is a skilled role, most NCS ‘leaders’ are employed on temporary contracts for a few weeks or months each year. Poor pay – even for senior roles – is endemic, and is likely to become worse in the light of recent pressures on NCS providers to lower their costs.

3.10 Currently, there are 9 regional NCS providers, of which three are profit-making companies (NAO, 2017); others have ostensibly non-profit but have well paid senior staff and are reliant on NCS for their income. There should be no room for profit-making (or very high salaries) in the political and citizenship education of young people.

3.11 Below the layer of regional providers running NCS, other organisations (mostly small specialist providers) are subcontracted to deliver the scheme in local areas. It is well established that small, local organisations can lose out in subcontracting relationships: they are asked to share the risk of the larger organisations but have smaller reserves, and suffer disproportionately when targets are not met. This risk will be intensified now that the NCS Trust has been directed to recoup money from ‘unfilled spaces’ - any youth provider will know that an unfilled space does not mean that money was not spent (for example, a residential venue will not refund the cost for a young person who does not turn up). As well as the risk to smaller youth providers, there is presumably a risk to the reliability of evaluations. The ‘payment by results’ arrangements that incentivises recruitment will also, inevitably, incentivise organisations to exaggerate the number of young people who have signed up to and ‘completed’ NCS.

3.12 A particular orientation of NCS towards citizenship is suggested by the way in which it is evaluated. Since early pilots of the scheme, young people have been asked to agree or disagree with various statements at the beginning of NCS and after taking part. Their results are compared with a ‘control group’ of young people who did not participate. In past versions of the evaluation, young people have been asked whether they agree that ‘In the long run people get the respect they deserve in this world’, and ‘If you don’t succeed in life it’s your own fault’ (see de St Croix, 2011; 2016). These statements reproduce the message that failure is our own fault, and that social context or structural disadvantage does not matter. The agree/disagree statements in more recent iterations of the evaluation have been less obviously crude, but the vast majority of the changes measured by NCS remain fundamentally individualist and neglect the role of social inequalities.

3.13 NCS is fundamentally based on product rather than process; on consumption rather than creativity; on the quickest possible throughput of both young people and youth workers for maximum profit. However, an immediate closure of NCS – even if it is replaced by neighbourhood youth work - may not be the best way ahead. If politics is to become more decentralised and participatory, it is vital that policy changes must not be imposed on people – particularly marginalised groups of young people and precariously employed workers.

3.14 Therefore, we suggest that serious consideration is given to reviewing NCS and, in the shorter term, redirecting some of its future expansion-oriented funding towards community-based youth provision. NCS should be reviewed holistically alongside youth work provision and resourcing, both nationally and locally. Ideally, after a period of transition, the resources currently allocated to NCS should be devolved to local communities for participatory budgeting by young people, youth workers and community members. Certain principles must underpin this budgeting: for example, money should be ring-fenced for young people’s informal leisure-time services that they attend by choice; young people and youth workers should have a say on how programmes are carried out; and youth workers must be trained, valued, and supported. In making these decisions, local committees may well build on some of the positive aspects of NCS, that themselves draw on many decades of youth work history and practice: the residentials, the emphasis on groups, and on young people’s action and political education. Other elements might be rethought: the layers of profit-slicing, the restriction to 16 year olds, the short-term nature of the project, and the ‘packaged product’ orientation that militates against genuine youth participation. Any change should not be sudden or imposed; time must be taken to discuss the possibilities with young people and youth workers, to think about how we can learn from the successes and limitations of various forms of youth provision, and how we can best use resources to benefit young people – taking into account the need for specific attention to potentially marginalised social groups.

3.15 The way that youth citizenship programmes are run must be congruent with the message of those programmes. Therefore, localised versions of NCS can be considered, yet only alongside other forms of youth work. Local, participative decision-making means that, in some local areas, the idea of keeping a ‘summer’ or ‘school leaver’ element could be retained. The point is that such decisions must be made locally, primarily involving those most affected and most knowledgeable – young people and youth workers.

References

de St Croix, T. (2011) ‘Struggles and silences: Policy, youth work and the National Citizen Service’, Youth and Policy, 106: 43-59 de St Croix, T. (2016) Grassroots youth work: Policy, passion and resistance in practice, Bristol: Policy Press.

Education Select Committee (2011) Services for young people, London: The Stationary Office.

Mill, S. and Waite, C. (2017) Brands of youth citizenship and the politics of scale: National Citizen Service in the United Kingdom, Political Geography, 56: 66-76.

NAO (National Audit Office) (2017) National Citizen Service: Report by the comptroller and auditor general, January, London: Cabinet Office and Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

Public Accounts Committee (2017) National Citizen Service: 46th report of session 2016-17, March, London: House of Commons.

Smith, M. (1982) Creators not consumers: Rediscovering social education (2nd Edn), NAYC Publications.

UK Youth Voice (2017) Youth Voice manifesto: Dear Prime Minister, London: UK Youth.

Tania de St Croix, 8th September 2017

Biography: Tania de St Croix has been a youth worker for over twenty years, and is now a Lecturer in the Sociology of Youth and Childhood at King's College London. Her recent research explored how part-time and volunteer youth workers are affected by policy in their everyday practice: see 'Grassroots youth work: Policy, passion and resistance in practice', published in July 2016 by Policy Press.

Step Up To Serve – written evidence (CCE0210)

Submitted by: Dr Rania Marandos (Step Up to Serve), on behalf of the #iwill campaign on September 8th, 2017.

Introduction: The #iwill campaign is focused on making meaningful social action part of life for 10-20 year olds across the UK, irrespective of their socio-economic background or geography.

Our response to the select committee draws on thinking shared with us by many of our partner organisations who have made #iwill pledges to support the campaign's work. By ensuring social action is embedded into the lives of young people, the UK can become a more socially conscious society where civic engagement is the norm for people of all ages and from all backgrounds.

We are answering questions 1,5,6,7,9,10, &12 to recommend that youth social action is recognised and celebrated as a significant meaningful means of developing active citizens from a young age, thus creating a habit for life.

Throughout our submission, we recommend that recognition and celebration of youth social action and its benefits should be embedded into the education system and other non-formal education settings, as well as by government, businesses, voluntary and public sector organisations.

We also recommend clearer support for earlier entry points to participation in social action, with continued investment through the #iwill fund, and ensure that more social action opportunities are available to all young people, including those from the most disadvantaged backgrounds.

We recommend engaging with the Full-time Social Action Review to encourage new and alternative forms of long-term quality social action projects as a means of developing active citizens.

We recommend that Government work to make it easier and more rewarding for people to volunteer, enabling charities and volunteers to support our public services (especially our health and social care services).

We recommend that Government strengthen volunteer development and management across organisations that are primarily focused on areas and communities where groups feel 'left behind'.

We recommend that Government supports a greater call for young trustees on charity boards, or for young people to be consulted on decisions that directly impact them and wider society.

We recommend that Government act upon the findings of the Casey Review into Opportunity and Integration by developing and embedding a framework of social action opportunities for young people.

“SELECT COMMITTEE ON CITIZENSHIP AND CIVIC ENGAGEMENT”

Written Response from Step Up To Serve, the charity coordinating the #iwill campaign

Submitted by: Dr Rania Marandos (Step Up to Serve) on behalf of the #iwill campaign on September 8th, 2017. This represents collective views and is not the perspective of any one organisation. Please also note that some #iwill partners will be submitting individual responses.

Introduction

The #iwill campaign is a UK-wide initiative that aims to make social action, which includes activities such as campaigning, fundraising and volunteering, part of life for as many 10 to 20 year olds as possible by the end of 2020. Through cross-sector partnerships, the campaign is evidencing and communicating the benefits of youth social action, working to embed it in the journey of young people and collaborating with organisations to create more high quality opportunities for participation. The campaign is focused on ensuring that young people have the opportunity to engage in meaningful social action irrespective of their socio-economic background or geography.

The campaign was launched in 2013 by HRH The Prince of Wales with cross-party support and has since received endorsement from the Prime Minister, during her speech⁷⁷² on the ‘shared society’ at the Charity Commission in January 2017. The campaign is coordinated by the charity Step Up To Serve and led by over 730 cross-sector organisations across the UK.

The campaign is working with the business, education, health and social care, and voluntary sectors to embed youth social action into all areas of society in order to increase the likelihood of it becoming the norm for young people. Participation in youth social action has what we term ‘a double benefit’ – a benefit to the wider community through helping others and contributing to social inclusion and cohesion, as well as to the individual themselves, through the development of qualities⁷⁷³ and skills⁷⁷⁴ for life that improve employability. There is evidence⁷⁷⁵⁷⁷⁶ that regular social action is also linked to improved emotional wellbeing and reduced anxiety. As such, we believe youth social action should be strongly considered when discussing citizenship and civic engagement in UK society.

Our response draws on thinking shared with us by many of our partner organisations who have made #iwill pledges to support the #iwill campaign’s work. A full list of pledging organisations is available on our website here.⁷⁷⁷

Questions:

- 1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century?
 - a. Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

⁷⁷²The Prime Minister’s speech at the Charity Commission, 2017 (<https://www.gov.uk/government/speeches/the-shared-society-prime-ministers-speech-at-the-charity-commission-annual-meeting>)

⁷⁷³ Behavioural Insights Team (2016). Evaluating Youth Social Action. (<http://www.behaviouralinsights.co.uk/education-and-skills/does-social-action-help-develop-the-skills-young-people-need-to-succeed-in-adult-life/>)

⁷⁷⁴ Ipsos MORI (2017). National Citizen Service 2015 Evaluation. (<http://www.ncsyes.co.uk/sites/default/files/NCS%202015%20Evaluation%20Report%20FINAL.pdf>)

⁷⁷⁵ Ipsos MORI (2016). The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016. (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%2520National%2520Youth%2520Social%2520Action%2520Survey%2520-%2520Headline%2520findings.pdf>)

⁷⁷⁶ Ipsos MORI (2017). National Citizen Service 2013 Evaluation - Two years on. (<http://www.ncsyes.co.uk/sites/default/files/NCS%202013%20YO%20Evaluation%20Report%20FINAL.pdf>)

⁷⁷⁷ #iwill pledges (www.iwill.org.uk/iwill-pledges)

The UK is currently faced with many challenges and there are uncertainties and divisions in communities up and down our country. We are clear that supporting young people to change their communities and themselves through civic engagement (or social action), is a uniquely powerful way to build a more integrated, socially mobile and healthier society, showing that there is more in common than that which divides us.

We believe developing opportunities for young people from all backgrounds to get involved in activities that make a positive difference to themselves and to those around them will have a long-term, unifying impact on the future of our country, and becoming an active citizen at a young age helps this to become embedded - a habit for life.

It has been said that ‘volunteering is the ultimate exercise in democracy ... when you volunteer, you vote every day about the kind of community you want to live in’. We also believe that by ensuring social action is embedded into the lives of young people, the UK can become a more socially conscious society where civic engagement is the norm for people of all ages and from all backgrounds.

There is already evidence suggesting that many young people value social action, with c. 40% taking part regularly and recognising the double benefit⁷⁷⁸, which is an indication of the appetite among younger people to become active citizens. This is particularly of note in comparison to the adult levels of formal volunteering, at around 25%.⁷⁷⁹ Through social action, young people can also play a vital role in facilitating others to engage with their civic duty, i.e. through campaigning, organising rallies, designing petitions, or leading student councils. Taking part in social action can also lead to answering questions of identity, perhaps through minority rights campaigning, LGBTQI groups, or supporting immigrants within their communities. A greater understanding of identity, and how it manifests in civic engagement, is an important outcome of participating in social action and learning more about the communities in which you live.

For the #iwill campaign, citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st century is about developing a habit of social action for life, with an early commitment seeded in primary school continuing throughout the education system and into early working life.

However, there is a persistent socio-economic gap in participation in social action, and we need to ensure that young people in all areas of society are able to participate, and to benefit from doing so. This would ensure that civic engagement is more representative of UK citizens. It matters because through participating in social action to become active citizens, young people gain skills and qualities essential for employment and active citizenship in adulthood. A CIPD survey⁷⁸⁰ reported 67% of employers say candidates with social action experience demonstrate better employability skills. As well as this, getting involved in social action that embeds the 6 quality principles⁷⁸¹ led to robust improvements in character qualities like empathy, cooperation, resilience, problem-solving and sense of community.⁷⁸²

⁷⁷⁸ Ipsos MORI (2016). The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016. (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%2520National%2520Youth%2520Social%2520Action%2520Survey%2520-%2520Headline%2520findings.pdf>)

⁷⁷⁹ Cabinet Office (2016) Community Life Survey 2015-16 (<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/community-life-survey-2015-to-2016-data>)

⁷⁸⁰ CIPD and YouGov (2015). Learning to Work Survey. (<https://www.cipd.co.uk/knowledge/strategy/volunteering/social-action-guide>)

It also leads to improved levels of well-being:

- Average life satisfaction score (out of 10) for those participating in youth social action is 8.6, compared to 8.1 for those not. Similar to the difference between permanent employees who are happy with their job and those who don't have a job and are seeking work.⁷⁸³
- Sustained increases in personal resilience and marked decrease in levels of anxiety, two years following participation in a social action programme.^{784,785}
- Links to improved levels of feeling that life is worthwhile.⁷⁸⁶

Recommendations

Ensure youth social action is recognised and celebrated as a significant means of developing active citizens from a young age, thus creating a habit for life. Recognition and celebration should be embedded into the education system and also into other non-formal education settings.

Create new, and build on existing, social action opportunities to ensure that they are available to all young people, including those from the most disadvantaged backgrounds.⁷⁸⁷

Government could incentivise businesses to help create more opportunities, so that growth in the number, range and accessibility of good quality youth social action opportunities becomes self-sustaining for the longer-term.

2. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

- a. At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory?
- b. Should there be any exemptions?
- c. Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes?
- d. How effective is current teaching?

⁷⁸¹ <http://www.iwill.org.uk/about-us/principles/>

⁷⁸² Behavioural Insights Team (2016). Evaluating Youth Social Action (<http://www.behaviouralinsights.co.uk/education-and-skills/does-social-action-help-develop-the-skills-young-people-need-to-succeed-in-adult-life/>)

⁷⁸³ Ipsos MORI. (2016) The National Youth Social Action Survey, (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%2520National%2520Youth%2520Social%2520Action%2520Survey%2520-%2520Headline%2520findings.pdf>)

⁷⁸⁴ Ipsos MORI (2017). National Citizen Service 2015 Evaluation (<http://www.ncsyes.co.uk/sites/default/files/NCS%202015%20Evaluation%20Report%20FINAL.pdf>)

⁷⁸⁵ Ipsos MORI (2017). National Citizen Service 2013 Evaluation - Two years on (<http://www.ncsyes.co.uk/sites/default/files/NCS%202013%20YO%20Evaluation%20Report%20FINAL.pdf>)

⁷⁸⁶ Behavioural Insights Team (2016). Evaluating Youth Social Action. (<http://www.behaviouralinsights.co.uk/education-and-skills/does-social-action-help-develop-the-skills-young-people-need-to-succeed-in-adult-life/>)

⁷⁸⁷ The Department for Education's #iwill pledge (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/pledge/department-education/>)

e. Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education has a pivotal role in teaching and encouraging good citizenship given its reach into communities and to young people across the UK. Of particular note is the fact that young people from lower socio-economic groups are more likely to be supported into social action by a teacher or college leader, rather than parents.⁷⁸⁸

Education should not, however, be viewed as the only sector that has a contribution to make. We believe that educational establishments themselves will also benefit from embedding a whole-school or college approach that engages community partners in social action, with good citizenship and better connectedness to the local community being amongst a long list of likely positive outcomes. There is an opportunity to raise the profile of citizenship studies by connecting the practical application to other activities and subjects young people are doing.

A summary from a 2007 report⁷⁸⁹ looking into civic engagement across 13 OECD countries states that:

Merely offering more schooling or more citizenship studies is a limited and partial response. More promising is to address the quality of learning experiences and approaches to learning both inside and outside formal school settings ... Some forms of learning seem to work better than others in fostering Civic and Social Engagement – learning environments that stress responsibility, open dialogue, respect and application of theory and ideas in practical and group-orientated work seem to work better than just “civic education” on its own.

There should be greater emphasis and stronger curriculum recommendations for social action as a tool for developing good citizens. This should be included from as early as possible in the education journey, as evidence⁷⁹⁰ suggests that starting social action from a young age is a key determinant in forming a habit of social action.

We would advocate that this emphasis begins at least from Key Stage 2, and continues right the way through into apprenticeships, university, and employment. A recent NUS report⁷⁹¹ showed that students agree, and that they made their own recommendation that Government should improve and expand the provision of Citizenship Education at Key Stages 3 & 4. Types of activity are currently referenced in the Citizenship curriculum for Key Stages 1

⁷⁸⁸ Ipsos MORI (2016). The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016. (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%2520National%2520Youth%2520Social%2520Action%2520Survey%2520-%2520Headline%2520findings.pdf>)

⁷⁸⁹ OECD (2007) Understanding Social Outcomes of Learning (<http://www.oecd.org/edu/ceri/understandingthesocialoutcomesoflearning.htm>)

⁷⁹⁰ Ipsos MORI (2016). The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016. (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%2520National%2520Youth%2520Social%2520Action%2520Survey%2520-%2520Headline%2520findings.pdf>)

⁷⁹¹ NUS (2017). Students Shaping the Post 16 Skills Plan. (<https://www.nusconnect.org.uk/articles/students-shaping-the-post-16-skills-plan>)

& 2⁷⁹² but there should include a more explicit ask, with a wider range of examples of activity, and emphasis on the value placed on this by the Department for Education.

Citizenship and civic engagement should be a golden thread in education, taught within the context of different subjects. A recent education survey⁷⁹³ found that there was an increase in teachers citing lack of education system recognition as a barrier to embedding social action within their schools (5% in 2016, 11% in 2017). Interestingly, this gap is seen most starkly between teachers in schools with the highest proportion of pupils eligible for Free School Meals (15%) compared to schools with the lowest proportion (8%)

There should also be a commitment to ensuring all young people, across the whole school, or college, have access to opportunities to participate in social action.

In discussing the types of leaders that are most effective in leading schools, this Harvard Business Review report⁷⁹⁴ shows that their favoured type of leader collaborate[s] with local organizations to bring students' attention to the opportunities around them and arrange trips abroad to open their eyes to other cultures ... In short, they take a holistic, 360-degree view of the school, its stakeholders, the community it serves, and its role in society.

We would assert that embedding social action into the culture of the school follows this model, and would provide not only a generation of active citizens, but improve education systems as the below quotes from partners demonstrate. There are further quotes and recommendations available from the #iwill campaign's 50 champion headteachers and principals⁷⁹⁵.

"Our interest in youth social action began when staff noticed that some students not only struggled to acknowledge the positive aspects of their lives but had developed a sense of materialistic entitlement for their contributions. We took inspiration from other schools ... then researched and tested theories on looking at life positively. The result was 'Steps to Awesomeness', which celebrates appreciation, positivity, kindness, setting goals, courage, participation, exercise and community service... We believe it's really important for schools to recognise the value of social action and character education alongside academic achievement." – Alison Wyld, Headteacher, All Saints Church of England Junior School

"Over the past three years, the grades of the school have dramatically improved and social action has a huge part to play in this. It encouraged the students to be interested and hard working in all aspects of life, including academic work" Andrew Day, Executive Director, Northumberland CofE Academy.

"Youth social action is a great way for young people to develop key character strengths and life skills whilst transforming their communities. I pledge to celebrate school leaders who embed social action in their vision and practices and promote best practice sharing through the NAHT networks, so that all young people can fully participate, irrespective of background or need." Russell Hobby, former General Secretary, NAHT.

⁷⁹² Curriculum recommendations for KS1 & 2 programme of study: Citizenship

(https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/402173/Programme_of_Study_KS1_and_2.pdf)

⁷⁹³ NFER Survey into Teacher's Attitudes 2017 (as yet unpublished)

⁷⁹⁴ Harvard Business Review (2016). (<https://hbr.org/2016/10/the-one-type-of-leader-who-can-turn-around-a-failing-school>)

⁷⁹⁵ 50 Champion Headteachers and Principals (education.iwill.org.uk)

“It was a wonderful feeling for the whole College to have social action highlighted in [our recent Ofsted] inspection report, and fantastic to see recognition of the value of social action for our students from Ofsted. It is this kind of promotion of social action which will mean more College leadership teams are willing to say #iwill and develop opportunities like these for their students, benefitting not just the learners, but also their communities for years to come.”
Graham Razey, Principal, Canterbury College and East Kent College.

There are more examples of Ofsted demonstrating how social action is being applied to good effect in a selection of schools and colleges here⁷⁹⁶.

Recommendations

Put more emphasis on a whole-school/college approach to embedding social action into guidance documents and communications, with a particular focus on primary ages. A recent example of a guidance document emphasizing social action is the Department of Education’s guidance on embedding social action into study programmes⁷⁹⁷.

Apprenticeship Trailblazers should be encouraged to consider how they can embed social action into new apprenticeship standards and end of apprenticeship assessments. Over time, we would hope that positive examples, properly evaluated, would lead to Government committing to include social action elements in all apprenticeships.

Local authorities to provide guidance on reliable youth social action providers and help connecting schools and local organisations with each other.

- 3. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?
 - a. Are they the right length?
 - b. Should they be compulsory, and if so, when?
 - c. Should they include a greater political element?
 - d. Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony?
 - e. Are they good value for money?
 - f. What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Quality⁷⁹⁸ social action programmes can develop active citizens through engaging volunteers with their communities. NCS has been a very high profile indication of the support of government for social action, and active citizenship. They have provided much in the way of evidence for the benefits of participation, not least in the context of evidencing social cohesion and integration as a consequence of taking part through greater community awareness.⁷⁹⁹

In terms of length of programme, we would recommend that the wider journey is taken into consideration, and how social action could be encouraged from earlier, and across a longer period of time. By engaging younger people from an earlier age, NCS would no longer be seen as the gateway to social action, but rather another stepping stone, or another route, into creating active citizens.

⁷⁹⁶ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/social-action-good-examples-from-schools-and-colleges>

⁷⁹⁷ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/16-to-19-study-programmes-guide-for-providers>

⁷⁹⁸ <http://www.iwill.org.uk/about-us/principles/>

⁷⁹⁹ <https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmpubacc/955/955.pdf>

We would also welcome (and are actively supporting) greater collaboration with voluntary sector partners, similar to the recent partnership demonstrated by NCS and Scout Association⁸⁰⁰ to help support young people continue their journey between opportunities. Examples include the Challenge's HeadStart⁸⁰¹ programme that allows young people to continue their social action journeys, linking it to skills development ahead of employment. When considering the length of programmes, it is important to take into account the needs of young people. Young people, especially those from less affluent communities, often require flexibility to combine social action with existing commitments, such as jobs or caring responsibilities. For example, one of our young #iwill Ambassadors⁸⁰² said "NCS seemed too long for me as straight after GCSEs, I had a job and having 4 weeks off would not have been acceptable however I know people that did it and loved it."

In regard to other routes for creating active citizens, we welcome the current Government Review into Full Time Social Action⁸⁰³, which will look at the opportunities and the barriers associated with taking part in full time social action. Experiences noted from other countries with legal status for full time volunteers, suggest that the UK could expect greater levels of participation if similar policies were adopted here. Young people, including NCS graduates, who are keen to continue their social action journey, would be incentivised to do so.

As part of the #iwill campaign, the #iwill Fund has been established, with £20 million investment from Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport and £20 million investment from Big Lottery Fund. The #iwill fund has attracted 12 additional match funders to date who have matched a further £20 million of those funds – a total of £60 million investment committed to date. This will invest in opportunities for 10-20 year olds to support their social action journey and is another way that government and wider funders are investing in this area alongside NCS.

Recommendations

Ensure that there is clearer support for earlier entry points to participation in social action, with continued investment through the #iwill Fund.

Encourage collaboration with the wider sector to: a) increase the quality of social action; b) improve the signposting to and from citizenship programmes to new opportunities in order to support young people's social action 'journey' from 10 - 20; c) ensure value for money from learning from best practice; and d) connecting with smaller local organisations to strengthen communities, particularly in areas of low social mobility.

Engage with the Full Time Social Action Review to encourage new and alternative forms of long-term quality social action projects as a means of developing active citizens.

4. How can society support civic engagement?

a. What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement?

b. What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

⁸⁰⁰ Scout Association and NCS announce exciting new partnership

⁸⁰¹ <https://www.headstart-thechallenge.org>

⁸⁰² <http://www.iwill.org.uk/iwill-ambassadors/>

⁸⁰³ <http://www.iwill.org.uk/government-announces-review-into-the-legal-status-of-full-time-volunteers/>

It is in the interests of government at every level to develop pathways for people of all ages and from all backgrounds to become engaged in community activity. It is our view that government should lead by example, creating and facilitating projects and opportunities for people to get involved in making a positive difference, in partnership with third sector organisations and wider civil society.

As mentioned above, supporting this kind of culture from an early age, through formal and non-formal education, is something government should prioritise in order to develop lifelong civic habits.

Innovative and collaborative funding models should be explored that take a strategic approach to investment in communities where there is the greatest level of need. This is the model that the #iwill Fund⁸⁰⁴ follows, which is a joint investment by DCMS and The Big Lottery Fund, along with a growing number of match-funders. It supports a wide range of youth social action projects across England. We are currently exploring, with governments and funders in the devolved nations, scope for extending this investment to ensure it becomes UK-wide with an aspiration to further increase total investment into opportunities for young people to make a difference in their communities throughout the life of the Fund.

Third sector organisations have a special interest in developing active citizens. However, many charities unintentionally put up barriers to participation, especially for young people. We are calling on third sector and public sector organisations to consider lowering age restrictions, to develop flexible, youth-friendly social action opportunities, to celebrate the role young people can play through social action, and to ensure young people have a voice and are represented in decision-making processes.

All employers, including businesses of all sizes and in all industries, and including public sector employers, have a role to play in supporting youth social action and civic engagement among young people. Many employers already recognise the value this brings to their talent pipelines and the broader development of skills, behaviours and attitudes that are valuable in the world of work. But many are not yet embracing this agenda. We believe there would be value in strong messaging from central and local Government, from trade bodies and other umbrella organisations working with businesses and employers, in support of employers who are actively working with their local communities to support youth social action. Incentivising businesses would drive a culture change.

Research⁸⁰⁵ confirms that parents, as well as teachers, have a significant impact on whether or not their children are likely to be active in their local community. We are therefore keen to ensure that parents are given the flexibility to become civic role models by volunteering themselves as well as actively encouraging and supporting their children to take part.

Recommendations

⁸⁰⁴ <http://www.iwill.org.uk/about-us/iwill-fund/>

⁸⁰⁵ Ipsos MORI. (2016) The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016 (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%20National%20Youth%20Social%20Action%20Survey%20-%20Headline%20findings.pdf>)

We support the recommendations from the National Council for Voluntary Organisations⁸⁰⁶ to make it easier and more rewarding for people to volunteer, enabling charities and volunteers to support our public services (especially our health and social care services).

Promote the idea that supporting people to access social action will build their skills and help them to find work, and message consistently about the skills, behaviours and attitudes built by social action that are valuable to employers.

Policy-makers, across departments and political parties, should proactively recognise the difference volunteers make and show continued support for the work our partners are engaged in to enable young people to take practical action in the service of others.

Government should encourage and support more employers to recognise the value of volunteering and social action in their business processes, for example during recruitment. Consideration should be given to incentivising businesses to create more social action opportunities for young people from all backgrounds to build their skills for employability, linked to making a positive difference in local communities.

Similarly, education providers should be encouraged by Government to embed more widely opportunities for students to make a difference through volunteering and social action as they learn.

We recommend the development and use of the data platform Horizon⁸⁰⁷ to better understand the gaps in provision and enable strategic investment.

5. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”?

- a. Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban?
- b. How might these barriers be overcome?

Those that already feel ‘left behind’ by society may do so for a variety of market, social, or political reasons. Yet these groups may have the most to gain from becoming active citizens through participation in social action, for example in the development of key skills, qualities and networks.

Some families have negative perceptions of social action, which, in turn, influences how young people see it. Affluent families are more likely to understand the concept of social action and its links to personal development and employability and therefore encourage their children to get involved, whilst less affluent families can either have more pressing concerns (e.g. financial issues), do not see the benefits of social action, or have a negative perception of it: “Why should my child work for free?”⁸⁰⁸

Evidence from the latest National Youth Social Action Survey⁸⁰⁹ shows that only 40% of the least affluent young people regularly participate in meaningful social action as opposed to 49% of the most affluent.

⁸⁰⁶ NCVO General Manifesto document 2017 (<https://www.ncvo.org.uk/about-us/media-centre/press-releases/1830-charities-and-volunteering-make-britain-great>)

⁸⁰⁷ <http://horizondata.net/>

⁸⁰⁸ Bamburova, (2017) MBA: ‘An exploration of the drivers and potential barriers for schools in England embedding youth social action in their culture and practice’ Henley Business School, University of Reading

⁸⁰⁹ Ipsos MORI. (2016) The National Youth Social Action Survey, 2016 (<http://www.iwill.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/download-manager-files/2016%20National%20Youth%20Social%20Action%20Survey%20-%20Headline%20findings.pdf>)

There is a need to ensure that those that do feel ‘left behind’ have a voice in designing the programmes and activities that concern them. One such way is to ensure that trustee boards are representative, for example by including youth voice⁸¹⁰ and BAME candidates⁸¹¹.

There is, however, some evidence that young people who feel excluded or ‘left behind’ may themselves be more motivated to take action and, armed with a recognition of the injustice of their disadvantage, are empowered to become active citizens. Once such example comes from one of our #iwill Ambassadors, who set up a project as a consequence of negative media coverage of young people.⁸¹² In this case, funding and business support for social action empowered him to become an active citizen, an approach which should be supported in overcoming barriers to participation.

Recommendations:

When focusing on the 12 opportunity areas as identified by the Department for Education, consider how embedding youth social action as a cross-sector activity could be a solution to addressing the disparity in participation across economic divides, as well as ensuring that youth voice is encouraged.

Ensure that local organisations are consulted and empowered to share best practice and experience.

Strengthen volunteer development and management across organisations that are primarily focused on areas and communities where groups feel ‘left behind’.

Work with funders and foundations to ensure a collaborative approach to addressing issues regarding civic engagement and participation in social action. Work with the #iwill Fund as it supports those young people not currently engaged with social action, who are often from the ‘left behind’ groups.

Support a greater call for young trustees on charity boards, or for young people to be consulted on decisions that directly impact them and wider society.

6. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other?

a. What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole?

b. How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

We asked our young #iwill Ambassadors this question, and one responded with: “There is no social cohesion without civic engagement”.

In December 2016 Dame Louise Casey published her Review⁸¹³ report into social integration in Great Britain, calling for more to be done to bridge divides between people and bind communities together. Among the key themes running through The Casey Review, is the assertion that involving young people in social action can make a significant contribution to

⁸¹⁰ https://www.cafonline.org/docs/default-source/about-us-publications/youngtrusteesreport_1682a_web_080915.pdf

⁸¹¹ <https://nfpsynergy.net/blog/twenty-things-we-learned-our-national-trustee-survey>

⁸¹² <http://saeedatcha.co.uk/story/>

⁸¹³ DCLG (2016). The Casey Review: a review into opportunity and integration.

(<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/the-casey-review-a-review-into-opportunity-and-integration>)

enhanced integration. The Review also welcomed the cross-sector approach of the #iwill campaign.

Young people and youth social action are presented as key to bridging divides in a section entitled ‘Social Interactions’ which finds that ‘interactions between people from different backgrounds play a significant part in enabling integration and social mobility’. The review goes on to say that ‘many groups in society remain relatively segregated’ and that ‘we have fewer social interactions than our population mix would suggest we should across ethnicity, age and social grade. This places a premium on social mixing among young people in schools and in wider youth social action initiatives’.

The Casey Review acknowledges the value of the work being done by #iwill campaign partners in driving the growth of youth social action, specifically referencing the impact of work by Youth United, The Prince’s Trust, NCS and Duke of Edinburgh’s Award.

Following the year-long review, Dame Louise Casey called on the Government to support activity that will: empower all communities to take advantage of modern Britain’s economic opportunities; provide more English language classes for isolated groups; encourage young people to mix in schools and across communities; and secure women’s emancipation in communities where they are being held back by regressive cultural practices.

The review also makes a clear call to action for developing and embedding a framework of social action opportunities for young people, stating that while youth social action programmes are generally ‘best provided by voluntary sector organisations, we would like to see more Government support for guiding them into the areas of most need and an onus on public sector bodies to support participation’.

Recommendations

We wholeheartedly support this position and would recommend that any future Integration Strategy from government has youth social action at its heart.

7. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

730 organisations have pledged to support youth social action and the #iwill campaign. In doing so, we believe they exemplify a tolerant and cohesive society. Examples include School Diversity Week, set up by Just Like Us⁸¹⁴, which empowers young people to encourage a more socially aware, cohesive, and caring school environment through social action. Other initiatives designed to celebrate and reward youth social action as positive visions of civic engagement include the Young Scot Awards⁸¹⁵, the Year of Young People⁸¹⁶, or the vInspired Awards⁸¹⁷, to name a few.

Below are some examples of young people that some of our other partners have supported. Thanks to a small grant from the charity vInspired, Rand (22) from Manchester set up an art therapy social action project for child refugees from Syria living in Manchester. Artful Children gives young Syrians a safe space to be creative at the same time as making friends and

⁸¹⁴ <http://www.justlikeus.org>

⁸¹⁵ Young Scot Awards – Celebrating Scotland's Young People (<https://youngscotawards.com>)

⁸¹⁶ <http://yoyp2018.scot>

⁸¹⁷ <https://vinspired.com/get-awards>

improving their English. Rand had great support from the local community and gained an award for her efforts.

“I was motivated to after hearing about the Syrian refugee crisis on the news. My dad is Syrian and I knew lots of the refugees would be coming to Manchester. I spoke to others in the community and we decided that it would be best to do something for the children who would be coming over, starting at new schools and trying to learn the language.”

Gen, 22, from London, was supported to undertake a full-time year of social action in a school by the charity City Year UK. Here is how she describes her experience:

"Full-time social action changes your perspective on life. My family have never been hugely well-off, but I wouldn't say I grew up in a deprived area either. Coming to work in Hackney and seeing the hardships that many of the students suffer was a real eye-opener for me. Now when I hear about young people being excluded from school, or even arrested, I don't make the same kind of negative assumptions and judgements as I would have done a year ago. Being a City Year volunteer has made me a more compassionate, conscientious and forgiving person."

Mohammad came to the UK as a refugee. He was introduced to The Duke of Edinburgh's Award (DofE) as part of a course college course. He achieved his Bronze Award and then showed commitment by progressing on to complete his Gold. During the programme he volunteered for the Red Cross (which he continues to do now) helping other refugees by showing them around their new community, introducing them to British culture and helping them with their English. Originally, Mo signed up to do a DofE programme to help improve his English, meet friends and experience new things. Alongside this he developed teamwork, communication and leadership skills, which supported his university application. "I believe that my Gold Award helped me to get an interview to study at the University of Southampton, and I have met some of my best friends throughout my DofE journey. I would definitely recommend the DofE to other young people."

These are just some of the partners the #iwill campaign has brought together. There are many more who work to develop young social leaders.

Recommendations

Celebrate and reward private, public and voluntary sector organisations that demonstrate how social action is improving the situation of young people across the UK as well as the communities in which they serve.

Celebrate and reward young people who demonstrate the power of youth social action in transforming lives, and building positive communities (e.g. Points of Light). Existing awards could be developed to have more of a youth focus.

Learn from Scotland's example with the Young Scot Awards, or the Year of Young People, that celebrate citizenship and civic engagement by young people across Scotland.

The Student View – written evidence (CCE0122)

Introduction

1. The Student View (TSV) is an education and media charity founded in 2015. The Student View aims to create a newsroom in every school and our site offers young people a platform to share their world through words. We combat three social malaises: youth alienation; a narrow national conversation and low literacy levels. Our work would not be possible without the commitment of over 40 leading journalists from more than 20 media organisations, who co-deliver workshops alongside The Student View team, training secondary school pupils, particularly from low-income backgrounds with weak literacy skills as journalists.

2. The Student View welcomes the opportunity to share its thinking and evidence with the House of Lords Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement in 2017. The evidence we are presenting will draw on our experiences of working with hundreds of secondary school children across Inner London since June 2015.

The Student View's recommendations to HMG Government:

- (i) Introduce a mandatory voting system including active abstention to transform civic engagement levels.
- (ii) Reduce the voting age to 16 for local and national elections to kickstart a lifetime of democratic action.
- (iii) Trial online voting with a small section of the electorate.
- (iv) Place voter registration responsibilities for first time 16-year-old voters with schools or alternative education providers.
- (v) Incorporate a practical element to the GCSE Citizenship specification within which pupils enact 'real-life' actions to benefit society. This should involve local and national politicians either in a mentoring or assessment capacity.
- (vi) Implement an equality levy paid by large employers to boost the diversity of organisations across all sectors.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

3. Political scientists John Baylis and Steve Smith term citizenship as "the status of having the right to participate in and to be represented in politics."⁸¹⁸ With voter turnout at 68.8% at the last general election, over thirty percent of voting age citizens did not act on their right to participate in the electoral process, an essential part of civic engagement.⁸¹⁹ The Student View feels that this stubborn disengagement is partly due to the lack of diversity among current MPs. The House of Commons Library reported in July 2017 that only 8% of MPs in the House of Commons and around 6% of Members of the House of Lords were from an ethnic minority background. The result is a percentage gap of 5.6% and 7.6% respectively, based on the Office for National Statistics (ONS) Annual Population Survey 2016 which calculated the non-white population of the UK to be 13.6%.⁸²⁰ Unequal representation also exists in the sphere of gender presently only 32% of MPs are female.⁸²¹ If the makeup of MPs, who work at the highest level of civic engagement in British politics does not reflect the society it represents, our elected representatives will always find it difficult to generate widespread confidence in the political system.

⁸¹⁸ Baylis, J & Smith, S. 2001. The Globalisation of World Politics. An Introduction to International Relations. Oxford University Press.

4. Mass civic engagement is essential for a prosperous democracy but this is inhibited by a lack of basic citizenship knowledge. The young people we train initially do not possess an adequate understanding of their rights, responsibilities and position as a citizen within modern British society. It is not uncommon when we first meet our TSV journalists to not know who their constituency MP is or in some cases the current Prime Minister. This alarming reality suggests a bold approach to encourage civic engagement in the UK is necessary. With one-third of UK citizens describing themselves as solely English or more English than British, 'Britishness' is under unprecedented pressure and needs more opportunities for practical expression to create a more united nation.⁸²² This report outlines that 'Britishness' does not exclude modern Britain's diverse identities. We must emphasise and celebrate the fluid property of 'Britishness' and accept its openness to constant evaluation and evolution. It is important to note that a robust British identity must be underpinned by the fundamental British values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and mutual respect for and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs and for those without faith.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

5. Our current system of voluntary voting does not encourage mass political engagement. The voluntary principle that has existed for close to a century allows citizens to easily relinquish their responsibility to participate in the political process. British citizens who have religious or any other objections should be allowed to abstain but must register their

⁸¹⁹ House of Commons Library (2017). Online, Available at:

<http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7979#fullreport>

⁸²⁰ ONS, Annual Population Survey, 2016.

⁸²¹ House of Commons Library (2017). Online, Available at:

<http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/SN01156>

⁸²² YouGov (2017). Online, Available at: <https://yougov.co.uk/news/2017/01/24/what-makes-person-english-according-english/> decision to abstain by informing their electoral office before polling day or in person at their respective polling station. The Student View recommends HMG adopts a mandatory voting system to involve traditionally disengaged sections of the electorate.

6. The Student View also recommends changing the franchise for local and national elections by lowering the voting age to 16. Since 1924, Australia has employed compulsory voting in national and local elections. Supporters of the system say Australia boasts some of the highest civic participation levels in the world, with a reported 95% voter turnout in the last federal election in 2016, compared to 68.8% in the UK's 2017 general election.^{823 824} Critics argue this does not lead to a genuinely engaged electorate. The Political and Constitutional Reform Committee reported in 2014 that a mandatory voting system "would be politically very difficult to introduce in a country where it has no precedent".⁸²⁵ Yet, adopting a mandatory voting system will make elected representatives formulate policies to serve a more diverse electorate. Mandatory voting alongside reducing the voting age to 16 could alter disengaged citizens' perception of voting by viewing it as a worthwhile civic duty.

7. In the 2016 Australian federal elections there was an 86.7% participation rate among 18-24-year-olds compared to 59% of 20-24-year-olds during the last UK general election.^{826 827} Rather than seeing compulsory voting as antithetical to a western liberal democracy and contradictory to living in a free and fair society, it should be regarded as a progressive step, empowering marginalised citizens to exercise their right to vote thus increasing the intensity of their civic engagement. This view is supported by the Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR) who suggested in 2013 that first-time voters should "be required go to the polling station to vote and fined if they didn't. But they would they would be given a "none of the above" option so they were not forced to vote for a party."⁸²⁸ Currently, 16-year-olds can work full time, pay taxes, leave home, get married and join the armed forces. These responsibilities require a high level of maturity – extending the franchise to 16-year-olds should be included in this list of adult rights.

8. To accommodate a significantly larger electorate, a mandatory voting system must exist digitally. Estonia is the only nation to use online voting permanently in national elections. Criticism has been raised particularly about the security of the system. To ensure a smooth transition to online voting in the UK, the Digital Democracy Commission recommended in ⁸²³ Australian Electoral Commission (2016). Online, Available at:

http://www.aec.gov.au/Elections/Federal_Elections/2016/key-facts.htm

⁸²⁴ House of Commons Library (2017). Online, Available at:

<http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7979#fullreport>

⁸²⁵ The Political and Constitutional Reform Committee (2014). Online, Available at:

<https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201415/cmselect/cmpolcon/232/23202.htm>

⁸²⁶ Australian Electoral Commission (2016). Online, Available at:

http://www.aec.gov.au/Elections/Federal_Elections/2016/key-facts.htm

⁸²⁷ YouGov (2017). Online, Available at: <https://yougov.co.uk/news/2017/06/13/how-britain-voted-2017-general-election/>

⁸²⁸ IPPR (2013). Online, Available at: <https://www.ippr.org/news-and-media/press-releases/young-voters-should-be-required-to-vote-first-time-round>

2015 to begin this process “with a manageable segment of the electorate” such as “people with disabilities and those who live a long way from a polling station.”⁸²⁹ We recommend that HMG pilot this innovation previously outlined by the Digital Democracy Commission, doing so would represent a radical attempt to re-energise our democracy.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

9. The Student View’s journalists are trained how to interview, decide what makes a news story, write headlines, spot fake news and create feature and opinion articles. We use the medium of journalism to nurture a community of online writers and develop their critical literacy skills. The Student View’s work complements the Department for Education’s approach to promote British Values as part of pupils’ spiritual, moral, social and cultural (SMSC) development and the UN’s Sustainable Development Goal 4 by placing inclusion at the centre of our practice. The Student View also promotes fundamental British values through our values of community, truth, open-mindedness, balance and purpose. We welcome Andreas Schleicher’s, Director for the Directorate of Education and Skills at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) decision to introduce written tests on global competencies in 2018 to determine whether the young people examined are prepared for an “interconnected world”.⁸³⁰ Highlighting our interdependence as members of a wider network of online and offline citizens with local, national and global responsibilities is essential to creating a modernised citizenry.

10. While the teaching of citizenship is effective across all Key stages, the subject should be made statutory at Key stages 1 and 2 to offer a continuous civic pathway up until registering to vote at 16.

11. The Student View recommends that HMG via the Department for Education compile a public database of approved civic engagement organisations for schools to collaborate with to complement their respective SMSC strategies.

12. The Student View recommends that the GCSE Citizenship specification must be extended to include a practical ‘real-life’ component rather than the current planning task to deliver a citizenship action to benefit society. Matching local and national politicians to a local partner school to take part in this process either in an assessment or mentoring capacity would add a captivating dimension to the present GCSE Citizenship specification.

⁸²⁹ Digital Democracy Commission (2015). Online, Available at:

<http://www.digitaldemocracy.parliament.uk/documents/Open-Up-Digital-Democracy-Report.pdf>

⁸³⁰ OECD (2016). Online, Available at: <https://www.oecd.org/education/Global-competency-for-an-inclusive-world.pdf>

With around 20,000 councillors in England and 553 English MPs, there are a plethora of elected representatives for England's 3,268 state-funded mainstream secondary schools to join this powerful non-partisan project. This exciting innovation alongside voter registration, being overseen by schools or alternative education providers for Year 11 pupils could end civic apathy and alienation within a generation.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

13. In the wake of the London Bridge and Manchester terror atrocities, Theresa May declared: "We need to live our lives not in a series of separated, segregated communities but as one truly United Kingdom." These abominable acts of cowardice once again displayed the need to promote unity over division and challenge inflammatory rhetoric legitimising the latter. Dame Louise Casey's damning verdict of successive central government attempts to promote integration as 'saris, samosas and steel drums for the well-intentioned' stressed the urgency to introduce an active and muscular integration policy.⁸³¹ Diversity and integration can be increased concurrently but to work it must be a collaborative process between native and newcomer. The British Integration Survey 2016 conducted by The Challenge found that White Britons take up 38% of the opportunities open to them to mix with others from a different ethnicity in their local areas. There was not much difference among Black and Asian Britons who took up 42% and 41% of such opportunities.⁸³²

14. Opportunities for young people from different ethnic and socio-economic backgrounds must be promoted to strengthen social bonds. The Student View has partnered with King's College School, Wimbledon and Coombe Boys' School in 2017-8. This project creates a mixed private and state school group of TSV journalists who collaborate to create joint articles. King's College School's Community Projects Programme repeats this cross-sector collaboration with several other state school partners. Projects bringing together pupils from the private and state sector could combat the pervasiveness of ethnic segregation in schools. A 2013 Demos study found in that year, over 50% of ethnic minority students were in schools where ethnic minorities were the majority.⁸³³

15. Diversity and integration could be catalysed at the same time further through an equality levy paid by large employers to boost the diversity of organisations across all

⁸³¹ The Casey Review (2016). Online, Available at:

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/575973/The_Casey_Review_Report.pdf

⁸³² The Challenge (2016). Online, Available at: <http://the-challenge.org/uploads/documents/TCN-British-Integration-Study.pdf>

⁸³³ Demos Integration Hub, Education (2014). Online, Available at: <http://www.integrationhub.net/module/education/>

sectors. The revenue generated could increase the funds available to current diversity departments or initiatives working towards the aim of a workforce that is truly reflective of modern Britain at all leadership levels. The harm caused by a lack of diversity was outlined by the McGregor-Smith Review of 2017 which suggested black and minority ethnic individuals could contribute £24 billion to the UK economy each year if members from those groups were allowed to fulfil their full potential.⁸³⁴ The Student View recommends introducing an equality levy to ensure central government and civil society combine purposefully, championing inclusivity through action. Such a move could disrupt perennial problems such as the gender executive crisis. Currently, less than 10% of executive positions in FTSE 100 companies are held by women.

16. Overall, social integration and diversity in Britain is a narrative of positivity. This viewpoint is supported by a finding in The Casey Review which found that 89% of people interviewed felt they belonged "very or fairly strongly to Britain." A rise of nine percent since 2003.⁸³⁵ This evidence supports our view that it is possible to fully belong to Britain and maintain a separate cultural or religious identity. Yet there is no room for complacency. Social integration is far too often impeded by a chronic lack of visible role models from underrepresented groups, low literacy levels and the fact that historically disenfranchised groups feel their voices do not matter. This results in apathy and alienation ultimately blocking the liberating pathway to a lifetime of constructive civic engagement.

8 September 2017

⁸³⁴ The McGregor-Smith Review (2017). Online, Available at:

<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/race-in-the-workplace-the-mcgregor-smith-review>

⁸³⁵ The Casey Review (2016). Online, Available at:

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/575973/The_Casey_Review_Report.pdf

Susan Suttle – written evidence (CCE0057)

The words 'diversity', 'integration' and 'inclusiveness' by public authorities and the media in particular have become very overused, which can with so much emphasis, have the reverse effect.

In reference to Brexit, it seems likely to prove the most watered down outcome of a democratic vote in modern history. Most of us had the intelligence to realise that single market or not, Britain can not continue on its present path of increasing population unchecked. The size of the country and its infrastructure can not compete with France or Germany. In 1973, the leave vote, with as large a percentage as remain had in 2015, was forced to accept the majority vote to stay, despite seeing the EU would become more than just a common market.

Since the second world war, between the U.S and Europe Britain has become overly politically correct and a 'nanny state.' If anything is taught in our schools and colleges, it should be to see any other race for the individuals they are, not singled out as a minority for special treatment. There is often too much expected from state intervention. The stoic self reliance of the country's inhabitants of sixty or seventy years ago seems to have given way to a lack of personal responsibility. Classroom debates are also healthy and were even a part of my state education in the 50's to 60's. Certainly a necessity before school children of 16 are allowed to vote.

I recall history as a subject withdrawn from state education some years ago. As a nation we are more often apologetic of our history, traditions, faith and beliefs than proud. If Britons should not demonstrate a sense of pride in their own country without appearing xenophobic, then how can we expect others to participate in citizenship. What I saw of the citizenship question test on British life was farcical. Many white Britons do not participate in civic life, so why the necessity for others. Some I have heard consider their input ineffective in changing Government opinion or turning the tide and who can blame them.

4 September 2017

Karl Sweeney – written evidence (CCE0042)

1. Citizenship and civic engagement matter because there is currently a clear and present challenge to the cohesiveness of communities within the UK (as well as in other liberal democratic nation states) which is beginning to crystallise into an increasingly polarised and occasionally violent narrative. Whether Islamist, nationalist, far right, far left, religious fundamentalist, Europhobe/Europhile or militant environmentalist the shattering of social ‘consensus’ into multi-faceted, single issue and increasingly intolerant ‘tribalism’ is in my view the single most urgent issue of our day.

However here needs to be a distinction made between active citizenship/civic engagement/empowerment on the one hand and identity/allegiance to the nation/nationalism/patriotism on the other. This is I believe, critical to the rest of this enquiry and my responses to it below.

The first, active citizenship, has the potential to bring communities together - the second, patriotism though more superficially appealing and linked to grand institutions of power (the military, Royal Family, Departments of State) as well as sport and international prestige, has the potential to split them apart. The two concepts need to be balanced in the public/political narrative in the media, in academic study and in any legislative proposals emerging from this committee’s work.

The concept of ‘Britain’/‘Britishness’ needs to be exemplified rather than imposed in some sort of promotional branding campaign. This was the essence of the Citizenship Education programmes originally taught in English schools as part of the revamped national curriculum in the early 2000’s. Students learned about politics and communities by actively engaging in political and community-based activities and (in the case of GCSE Cit St) were assessed on this. I use the past tense here because to an extent this element has been lost in the most recent iteration of the GCSE qualification (more on this below).

At a societal level the difference between thinking about Citizenship as empowered engagement on the one hand or integration on the other can be exemplified in the very different interpretations of nation building and patriotism adopted by say Australia and USA (integration) on one hand and Germany and Canada (engagement) on the other.

The question of identity is key here. We need to assess honestly the ways in which people in this country identify themselves and thus assess the extent to which ‘Britishness’ as opposed to say, ‘Welshness’ or ‘being Black/minority/Ethnic’ or ‘European’ or ‘Muslim/Christian/Hindu’ is more prominent in people’s view of themselves and thus their attitudes and values. My sense is that today this will vary according to three factors – age, urbanity/rurality and whether born and raised in England, one of the other three UK jurisdictions or another country.

2/3/4. Taking Qs 2- 4 together, my overall response is: social cohesion and engagement cannot and should not be structurally or legislatively contrived. They must, and can, emerge from structural changes to or prioritisation of the opportunities to engage with the political and legislative process at local, regional and national level. Examples of this could be:

- making more use of web-based platforms as a way of encouraging ‘direct democracy’ at all three levels across all age ranges.
- prioritising (through the schools accountability framework, increased funding , better training) and moving to the centre of the educational process Citizenship Education as well as PSHE (Personal Social Health and Economic) education
- making local government more relevant and effective by returning some powers surrendered to Westminster and requiring a much greater degree of local civic engagement by residents if they want a say in how funds are spent in their communities.

5. The centrality of Citizenship Education and PSHE in encouraging greater social cohesion, greater resilience and aspiration among young people and a thoughtful national narrative about Britishness and what a nation should be, cannot be over emphasised. In my 35 years in the education profession, this is the single most self-evident fact I have learned. It is my view that many of the social, personal and health problems faced by young people and indeed entire communities today are the consequence of our neglect of these two areas of the curriculum over many decades. It is also my clear view that the present epidemic of on-line exploitation of children and young people be it sexual or radicalising, could have been ameliorated - and could yet be - if the central importance of Citizenship (and PSHE) had not been lost/written out of the educational agenda after 2010.

Citizenship and PSHE – like-minded colleagues and I refer to these collectively as the Curriculum for Life (C4L) – should be at the core of the curriculum at every key stage and into FE and HE also - albeit via different, stage-appropriate delivery models. It is pleasing to see progress being made in this respect with Relationships and Sex Education/PSHE, and a similar if not speedier rethink is now needed for Citizenship Education.

There should be no exemptions – and I think herein lies the single greatest challenge to this entire enquiry. This is because the educational landscape in England now is a highly complex free market comprising among others, local authority maintained schools, academies old and new, free schools, studio schools, UTC’s, faith schools of varying levels of orthodoxy and supplementary schools such as Sunday schools and madrassas. To require that Citizenship Education be made compulsory in all these would require an act of political will not seen since the ‘comprehensivisation’ programme of the early 1960’s. This is precisely why I believe it should be undertaken. The message would be crystal clear – we need to completely re-think what schools are for in this country, how we measure their performance, how we train our teachers and what we value most as educational outcomes for our children and young people.

Because of the focus on English and Maths as the key performance indicators over the last twenty five years or so and the consequent allocation of resources, training places, funding and time to these two subjects by school leaders and policy makers, current delivery of Citizenship Education is 'patchy'. This means that there are examples (two quoted below) of excellent practice with clearly positive outcomes for pupils/students, but overall delivery is a matter of 'hit and miss' in terms of whether a particular school leadership team chooses to prioritise Citizenship Education in its curriculum and thus nationally delivery of the subject is well short of the mark.

The Citizenship KS3 and 4 syllabus/programme of study needs to be refocussed on active engagement and empowerment as it was in 2007. The current, dry, 'civics' based approach – despite some positive amendments being made following discussions with ACT (the Association for Citizenship Teaching - with which organisation I have worked for over ten years). The course lacks appeal and most importantly the method by which this will be assessed from next year – ie a single written terminal exam, is entirely inappropriate for a subject of this nature and importance. If we want children and young people to model the democratic and engaged behaviours we want to see in them as adults, then credit should be given to them for doing so as part of the assessment process in schools.

Of equal significance is the current use of the Ofsted framework and its requirement that schools evidence the extent to which they prepare pupils for life in 'modern Britain' as part of SMSC (social moral spiritual and cultural) development. However, inspections are brief, often pressured events which do not always show 'typicality'. They are also infrequent and seen as a 'threat' by many schools. A more useful and productive approach would be to reintroduce Ofsted subject surveys or something very similar. These were less formal and voluntary (though I would suggest they should be a level of compulsion now), focussed on one element of the school's delivery, resulted in a letter not an inspection report (which could only be published with the school's consent) outlining the survey findings and were more collegiate in nature than inspections. This is what HMI used to do more of twenty five years ago, often in collaboration with local authority advisers and school leaders, and it could be a way of more positively engaging with school leaders and governing bodies in helping them reframe their thinking about Citizenship Education.

I would re-emphasise though that this process would have to occur once the above mentioned national level rethink had taken place and was being implemented, funded and properly managed.

6. The NCS as it stands is – a. patchy in its management and delivery at local level, b. apparently focussed on an interpretation of 'good citizenship as chiefly volunteering and team building. , c. often confused therefore with 'Character Education' which is an entirely separate concept. d. highly selectively offered.

It seems to be a youth service based offering rather than an educational one and as such I think is misnamed. The offer is valuable but it is not 'Citizenship' as defined above. NCS should thus either be re sold as a national youth service or redesigned as 'active Citizenship post 16' and delivered by teachers and/or specifically trained youth workers.

7/8. The combination of a greater focus on Citizenship as an academic subject and also Citizenship as an active process in the school and community should be enough to begin to shift attitudes and values 'on the ground' at local , regional and national level. This assumes that the above mentioned recommendations have been implemented and that there is a clear and consistent message from government at both national and local level, that 'what you think and what you do matter to us all'. The learning taking place in schools can and should be cascaded out into the local communities in which they are located. There should be such a level of communication, collaboration and coordination between school and community that the distinction between the two effectively disappears.

(Third sector organisations have an important supporting role to play but cannot be the lead bodies as this approach is fraught with problems of consistency, quality of delivery and the negative associations with the now failed 'Big Society' approach.)

The values which schools promote (often as 'British Values') are those of any liberal, democratic, inclusive, respectful and just society. Thus heads often tell me that the 'British Values' which I am training their teachers to discuss in class are those of their entire school community. The term can therefore be defined as 'those values to which British society subscribes' as opposed to values to which are uniquely British - which they are not. They are exemplified in legislation such as the Single Equalities Act and the various laws regarding hate speech and discriminatory behaviour as well as in the existence of a free press, an independent judiciary and devolved legislative bodies across the UK

Some of these values can be a challenge to some religious and 'sub-cultural' perspectives and this is where much highly focussed and well-resourced groundwork will have to be done if the approach described above is to gain any traction. This is particularly important when we consider the challenge to radicalising narratives implicit in these values. For example, equality of treatment before the law in terms of gender, race and sexual identity in particular presents an existential threat to the values held by some religious fundamentalists as well as those on the far right.

9/10. Taking 9 and 10 together, communities and groups feel left behind because there are left behind. Acknowledging this needs to be our starting point if any meaningful progress is to be made.

The present political process at local and national level is not a. accessible to many of communities and b. is not seen as relevant or receptive to their concerns.

In part both of these obstacles could be overcome in the medium to long term by implementing the re-think of Citizenship education both in and out of the school environment already described. More needs to happen in terms of adult education for what might be called ‘political and economic literacy’. When adult or community education was a part of local authority provision it was in general well accessed and competently delivered, especially when this was done by trained teachers. Losing it has come at a cost.

All voices need to be heard but this needs to happen in safe spaces, in properly managed discussions, in local groups in which it becomes self-evident to all that even at local level a democratic process is the only fair and equitable way of ‘pleasing most of the people most of the time’. The key challenge here will be getting results on the ground that matter to the groups around the table – again at both local and national level. With results will come buy-in. Without them, the status quo and societal fragmentation will prevail.

The reconciliation of ‘diversity’ with ‘integration’ will come from this process as more people realise that in a pluralist liberal democracy there need be no contradiction between the two. A strong democracy can accommodate both respect for difference and a sense of belonging to a larger whole – but only if all people have access to the decision making process and see evidence of progress on the ground.

11. Free ESOL classes for adults and, crucially, high quality, fully funded ESOL support in classrooms, is vital if newcomers are to have any real access to all of what has been described above.

The so called ‘Citizenship Test’ would be largely redundant if the measures described in my responses above were to be properly implemented.

12. ACT/Home Office ‘Building Resilience’ projects (in which I was involved in an advisory capacity) for example - <https://www.teachingcitizenship.org.uk/resource/immigration-and-protest-case-study-dover-2016-act-building-resilience-project>

<https://www.teachingcitizenship.org.uk/resource/extremism-and-terrorism-reported-media-act-building-resilience-project>

Stoke Damerel Community College, Plymouth (‘Modern Britain’ as a curriculum area) - <https://www.sdcc.net/2-uncategorised/1081-modern-britain-council-meets-for-first-time>

The Five Nations Network (for which I am England Lead) - see especially St Eunan’s primary school, Glasgow – Pupil Voice in a deprived area: <http://www.fivenations.net/workshop-and-seminar-resources-2017.html>

‘No More Boys’ and Girls’ (BBC TV August 2017) showing the power of a coherent, properly planned and resourced teaching programme to change fundamental attitudes and values in a relatively short time frame. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/mediacentre/proginfo/2017/33/no-more-boys-and-girls>

These examples show that the seeds of the changes we want to see are already present - but they are thinly scattered across random parts of the country in an ad hoc manner.

Karl Sweeney – written evidence (CCE0042)

We need a national rethink of how we broadcast them more widely and a thought-through preparation of the ground in which we wish them to take root.

Placing citizenship education in schools and communities at the very centre of what we see as the purpose of education is the key to making this happen.

30 August 2017

Taking Yourself Seriously – written evidence (CCE0144)

Contributors:

Kate Pahl, Professor and Principle Investigator of the ‘Taking Yourself Seriously’ Project, University of Sheffield

Zanib Rasool, Co-investigator and Chair of Rotherham independent hate crime scrutiny panel

Mike Fitter, Co-Chair of the City of Sheffield Cohesion advisory group and also on the management committee of ‘Whose Your Neighbour’ a voluntary organisation that promotes social cohesion across different divides.

Katy Goldstraw, Research Associate, Edge Hill University

Panni Loh, Member of the Critical Thinking Group for the ‘Taking Yourself Seriously’ Project.

Summary

The ‘Taking Yourself Seriously’ project is funded through the Arts and Humanities Research Council’s Connected Communities programme and runs from 2017-18. We are exploring artistic approaches to social cohesion in Rotherham and Sheffield, working with social cohesion community workers and artists from both areas. We use artistic methodologies to explore: the hidden histories of three generations of Muslim women; how young people can discover shared interests and passions through the arts; and the role of an adventure playground as a hub for social cohesion.

Key findings

1. History is important. People need to identify with their past in order to be responsible British citizens. Civic engagement and identity are tied to one’s history, roots, the journey of migration and things of value that migrants bring with them, their language, social practices, faith and way of being, they are all important to them.
2. Artistic approaches are important. These include approaches such as drawings, poetry, paintings and writing that open up a door to a different kind of lens, a different ‘way of knowing’ and articulating the voice of people often on the margins. Artists have a role to play in capturing events and moments in the lives of hidden communities through visual narratives, poetry and writing, and performing arts, so that we can understand better the everyday lived experience of different people. Artistic approaches allow us to consider our layered identities; they allow us to see the world through alternative lens, to view questions of identity in visual, poetic and narrativised ways that offer an alternative view of identity.

3. Dialogue and collective action are important. Society can support civic engagement by collective participatory action. Arts methodologies for social cohesion are complex, integrated and emotional. Arts methodologies empower the process of social cohesion through an alternative lens, they offer an opportunity to build dialogue and reflect alternative knowledges.
4. Social cohesion and integration do not mean the same thing. Much would be lost if we all became the same. When integration is advocated, what is frequently meant is assimilation: “They need to learn to be more like us”. Integration means we (different social groups) bring different things to the table and we each change as a result of contact. We are strengthened by diversity and must be careful that integration does not mean assimilation.
5. Lived values and valuing the unexpected are important. A school or a workplace that values the diversity and the contribution of all those present, and welcomes the unexpected guest, because of what they might bring, can create and achieve and thrive. In schools and workplaces if there is a lack of diversity then a quest should be made to gain this exposure by external visits or invitations to seek the opportunity to be enriched by the experience of mixing with those different to us, to achieve social cohesion which would not necessarily mean integration.
6. Shared values are linked to trust. Trust and notions of shared belonging and identity are threatened when inequalities or perceived inequalities persist. Recognising and taking steps to rectify inequalities within society, creates opportunities for citizenship to be nurtured.
7. Deprivation is a real threat. The Sheffield Cohesion Strategic framework has a key principle: “cohesion is not threatened by diversity it is threatened by deprivation” (Ratcliffe & Newman, 2011). Deprivation is strongly linked to inequality, especially in times of austerity.
8. Social cohesion involves co-production. This also involves acknowledging a diversity of voices. Partnerships are at their most effective when all opposing voices at the table can be heard. There is a need to be diverse, to have conflicted conversations.
9. Social cohesion is a process. Building social cohesion involves spending time with people, face to face contact, having mentoring systems in place, working in partnership, listening to people, and acknowledging inequalities
10. Place is important, as is valuing where you live. Framing communities within a variety of geographically anchored reference points offers an understanding of why communities feel 'left behind.' It does not help to describe communities as 'deprived'; instead it is important to find out what people know.

11. Citizenship, civic engagement and social cohesion, integration are linked concepts yet hold their own definitions. Perhaps the link between citizenship, diversity and integration itself should be questioned. Our research suggests that valuing diversity, multiple and layered identities and complexity offers an alternative approach to integration. By embracing diversity and acknowledging peaceful conflicted ideologies, animated dialogue in schools and workplaces can be nurtured to recognise diversity and create a mosaic image of cohesive society.

8 September 2017

Dr Henry Tam – written evidence (CCE0012)

Dr. Henry Tam, author of ‘Communitarianism: a new agenda for politics and citizenship’ (Palgrave Macmillan, 1998), and ‘Time to Save Democracy’ (Policy Press, forthcoming – 2018); Director (2011-2015), Forum for Youth Participation & Democracy, Faculty of Education, University of Cambridge; and Head of Civil Renewal (2003-2010), Home Office/Dept of Communities & Local Government.

1. ‘Civic engagement’ is sometimes taken to mean involving citizens in doing good work in their communities, when its use should be focused on engaging citizens in democratic political processes. In the former sense (incorporating cash giving, volunteering and helping strangers), the UK already performs better than other European countries according to the annual survey commissioned by the Charities Aid Foundation (2016 figures). However, in the latter sense of democratic participation, the UK lags behind most other European countries (e.g., France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Belgium, the Netherlands, Austria, and all the Scandinavian countries. Source: ‘The End of Voters in Europe? Electoral Turnout in Europe since WWII’ by Pascal Delwit, published in The Open Journal of Political Science, 2013, Vol. 3, No.1, Table 3). The civic engagement that needs most urgent attention in the UK is that which is concerned with connecting more citizens with their own democratic governance.
2. There is a vital difference between socio-cultural identity on the one hand, and civic-political identity on the other. In the UK, people have multiple social and cultural identities – they are at the same time English (or Welsh or Scottish); Humanist (or Catholic or Church of England or Jewish or Muslim or Buddhist); of Anglo-Saxon/Norman/African/Asian/Slavic descent; a Mancunian (or Londoner or Geordie); traditionalist/progressive; devoted to some sports team; and dedicated to one or more causes. They rarely view themselves as being attached to just one of these to the exclusion of others, and governments should not assume that one of these should be their prime identity. By contrast, from a political point of view, there is no question that the civic identity of a British citizen, whose rights are protected by the UK government, and who is responsible to that government and his/her fellow citizens in relation to a defined set of obligations, is of the utmost importance. Some commentators have conflated the need to remind citizens of what it means to be a British citizen, with the desire in some quarters to champion particular social and cultural identities as the defining features of being British. That is a mistake that lawmakers must avoid. The role of civic engagement is to connect citizens with their political identity, as codified by the system of democracy under which they live. (There is a further dimension of European citizenship which should not be ignored).

3. Political citizenship commands support and respect when the government provides stability and security (in military, legal, social and economic terms) to people who then feel that the reciprocal package of rights and responsibilities that binds them to the state merits their commitment. Genuine pride and allegiance cannot be encouraged except through the state setting out and honouring its promises as a fair and effective governing institution for its citizens. Citizenship education, civic ceremonies, lifelong learning, all have a part to play, so long as they relate to relevant policies and practices, and not to rhetorical gestures or hollow symbolism.
4. Military service, unpaid service to local communities, voting, have all been discussed in relation to whether or not they should be made compulsory for all citizens. The one form of civic engagement that should be top of the list for consideration is action learning in democratic governance processes and policy making. All citizens should engage in participatory deliberations where they can learn about what are being put forward, what are their implications according to their advocates and their critics, what they think are the pros and cons in the light of discussing them with others likely to be affected, and expressing their preference. Such participatory events, at the local, regional or national level, require expert organisation and facilitation, and can only work with the full support of the relevant government bodies. Once they are effectively set up, participation in them can be made a condition for casting a vote in elections or referendum, as that would reduce the likelihood of people voting in ignorance of what they are voting for or against. People are required to learn to drive before they are allowed to drive; perhaps they should have to learn to vote before they can cast their ballot.
5. Both the rights and responsibilities for political engagement should be strengthened. In terms of rights, it ought to be made much easier for people to register to vote and turnout to vote with polling stations at close proximity to their home. The voting age ought to be lowered to include those aged 16-18 since there is no evidence that they would be less able than people of a higher age to judge how they should vote. (It should be noted that although there is much talk about bringing in electronic voting, the increasing risk of hacking, especially by foreign regimes, suggests caution is needed before electronic voting supersedes physical voting). In terms of responsibilities, the suggestion made in paragraph 4 above outlines the need for citizens to engage in action learning about policy deliberation and informed voting before they are ready to vote.
6. As the development of awareness and understanding of how public decisions can affect one's life, and how one can play a part in shaping those decisions, education has a critical role in enabling citizens to engage effectively with their government. It means that education should cultivate reasoning skills, aptitudes in interrogating the veracity of information, and practical know-how in taking part in deliberating with others as to what policy options or possible candidates would be the optimal choice. Whatever is taught inside a classroom should be connected to action learning activities outside the classroom, through giving democratic input into local authorities and other public bodies. Greater attention should be given to, not so much the curriculum, as the status of citizenship classes (which ought to be recognised as key to securing participatory rights for students) and the competence of teachers in engaging students (which need to be improved through specific training).

7. There is a long standing misconception that encouraging people to be ‘good/active citizens’ in the sense of initiating/organising/helping out with worthy community projects, is equivalent to developing citizens who will be engaged in the political governance of their country. While voluntary activities, promoted by agencies such as the National Citizen Service and others, are socially commendable, those activities teach little about how to participate in public policy evaluation, analysis of electoral contest arguments, or conflict resolution in tackling polarised assumptions about political options. And there is no evidence that they lead to any notable increase in political engagement among people who did not previously engage. It would be far better to value programmes that are designed to promote voluntary good work for what they are, and not invoke tenuous links to civic engagement (in the political sense) as justification for them. In order to raise civic engagement in democratic political processes, what is needed is a substantial increase in the number of action learning activities that are tailor-made to expand citizens’ understanding, skills, and experience in shaping public policies (see paragraph 4 above).
8. If we focus on civic engagement in democratic politics (as opposed to the promotion of good work by citizens), one of the best examples of a sustained and high impact support programme is provided by ‘Together We Can’, the programme for civil renewal and community empowerment implemented by the UK government in partnership with local authorities and community organisations across England from 2003 to 2010. The programme involved coordinating the activities of 12 government departments to provide support to national, regional, and local groups to experiment, learn, share, and promote practices that help more citizens engage in the democratic development of policies that affect them, especially in areas where trust and participation in the activities of government bodies were at the outset low. Specific projects included community hubs for ‘Active Learning for Active Citizenship’; ‘Guide Neighbourhoods’ that help communities learn from each other regarding how to engage with public bodies; ‘Civic Pioneers’ that promote tried and tested engagement techniques across local authority areas; resources to expand the use of participatory budgeting in deciding how to allocate public resources; and use of community audits to target local problems. More details can be found from:
 - ‘Together We Can’ action plan (outline of the cross-government plan):
<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20120919132719/http://www.communities.gov.uk/documents/communities/pdf/151933.pdf>
 - Annex to ‘Together We Can’ action plan (a summary of the proposed initiatives):

<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20120919132719/http://www.communities.gov.uk/documents/communities/pdf/152822.pdf>

• ‘Together We Can’ 2005/2006 review (reports from the Secretaries of State and Ministers on progress in 12 Government Departments):

<http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20120919132719/http://www.communities.gov.uk/documents/communities/pdf/151402.pdf>

9. Any discussion of values should bear in mind the distinction between socio-cultural identity and civic-political identity (set out in paragraph 2 above). People with diverse socio-cultural identities will have a range of values, some overlapping, some clearly distinct. There is no inherent reason why they must all have the same socio-cultural values (e.g., how they worship, what they eat, the music they like). But under their civic-political identity as British citizens they are all bound by the values of an inclusive democratic state that oversees the reciprocal granting of protective rights and enforcing of compliance responsibilities. On the threat to these values of citizenship, two things should be noted. First, the freedom to pursue diverse socio-cultural values does not extend beyond the point where the pursuit of any such value undermines the rights and responsibilities of a democratic citizen. In other words, no one can claim that their beliefs, customs, traditions entitle them to treat any individual or group (e.g., women, ethnic or religious minorities) in a harmful or disrespectful manner contrary to the standards and expectations set under the banner of democratic citizenship as guaranteed by the British rule of law. Anyone at risk from such harm or disrespect should be assured by the government that no concession will be made to people seeking to invoke values that are incompatible with the equal protection accorded to all British citizens. Secondly, the values of democratic citizenship are derived from the civic ideal that has evolved in Britain. They ought to be honoured by the state, but does not depend on the state for their legitimacy. In other words, the government cannot arbitrarily declare what those values are, even if it commands a majority in the House of Commons. Indeed, if any British government should bring in policies that go against the values of democratic citizenship (e.g., targeting disabled people or ethnic minorities for ill treatment, withdrawing protection for women from abuse or attack), the upholding of the values of citizenship may require active protest and civil disobedience.
10. There are at least three main factors that cause groups to feel they have been left behind. First, the wealth gap between the superrich and those barely coping has led many who are daily struggling to feel that the system is not only rigged against them, but that nobody is seriously trying to change things to give them a fairer chance to get by. Richard Wilkinson and others have meticulously documented the severe negative effects of wide income inequalities on those at the bottom end of society. Secondly, planning and development policies have for decades created structurally deprived areas where low wage job opportunities, poor housing, higher than average crime levels routinely go together to give local residents a sense that they are of little concern to the wider society. This is compounded by regeneration schemes that break up neighbourhood community networks, bring in new housing and facilities that push house prices/rents up beyond what local people can afford, and push more low income people into other deprived areas where they can find an affordable place to live. Thirdly, anti-immigrant and anti-benefit claimant propaganda has proliferated to encourage UK residents with low standards of living to feel that undeserving foreigners with jobs and native Britons without jobs are getting special treatment that in effect pushes hard working families to the margins of society. To overcome these barriers, the government should consider measures to moderate the wealth gap, improve deprived areas for local people, and clamp down on hate speech and scapegoat-targeted propaganda, respectively.

11. Any country with citizens that have a diverse mix of socio-cultural identities will have a stronger sense of shared civic identity if they have more opportunities to interact freely and positively. There is evidence that mutual respect and integration are enhanced by people getting to know each other more, while prejudice is fuelled by the lack of experience of people with apparent differences. For example, according to the findings by Rose Meleady, Charles R Seger and Marieke Vermue ('Examining the role of positive and negative intergroup contact and anti-immigrant prejudice in Brexit', published in the British Journal of Social Psychology, June 2017), individuals who come into contact with immigrants more often are less likely to have anti-immigrant prejudice, and more likely to be among those who voted 'Remain' in the EU referendum. So instead of pandering to the prejudiced calls to cut diversity in order to increase integration, the government should ensure there are more opportunities for people to interact with others from diverse backgrounds so that there is less misunderstanding, less alienation, and a greater sense of togetherness. This would also suggest that policies to segregate schools by faith or allow selection by religion within a school are likely to be inimical to civic integration (Note: in existing Church of England free schools that are bound by the 50% cap on religious selection, 63% of pupils are classified as 'of white origin', but in Church of England secondaries that religiously select all of their places, 78% are white [source: government's figures as reported by the British Humanist Association, 2016]).
12. The ability to communicate in English is a vital dimension of being a British citizen, and every encouragement and support should be given to all citizens to be reasonably proficient in English. Refusal to try to learn or get help to understand English should not be sanctified as an emblem of diversity, but discouraged as a hindrance to civic solidarity. However, we must bear in mind that, just as some UK citizens have to rely on sign language or cannot read English because of their visual impairment, people who have come from abroad and may not initially be able to grasp English should not be looked down on, but given sympathetic assistance in learning to communicate in a different way. The British people should also be reminded how common it is that we ourselves do not speak the language of the countries we visit, or even settle in as expats.

As for naturalisation and arrangements such as the citizenship test, again we need to separate out concerns with civic identity from those about socio-cultural identity. The emphasis should be much less on selective cultural knowledge, and far more on civic-political information relating to the rights and responsibilities of citizenship, legal and political procedures, and how to access and check guidance on appropriate civic behaviour (e.g., registering to vote, paying taxes, learning about public policies, reporting crime, etc).

13. The 'Together We Can' programme for civil renewal (mentioned in paragraph 8 above) included support for projects that brought people with diverse backgrounds to learn from each other (e.g., ex-miners and asylum seekers in Yorkshire discussing their perspectives of local challenges; young and the elderly learning more about each other's needs and experiences that are of interest to others; people with learning disability and public service providers discovering more about what works and what doesn't), or to work together to tackle common problems (e.g., identifying problems of crime in local neighbourhoods and supporting each other with the help of the police and other agencies in increasing the sense of community safety; engaging in community health initiatives that get people to share information about key threats and how to detect and seek help to minimise health risk; involving pupils in schools in administering restorative justice that build confidence and cut disruptive behaviour). If these projects can be supported, sustained and spread to more parts of the UK, they would very likely help to promote a positive and engaging vision of British Citizenship.

6 August 2017

Rona Topaz, Disabled People Against Cuts – written evidence (CCE0019)

My name is Rona Topaz. After almost 3 decades of living in the UK as an indefinite resident, I finally decided to apply for naturalisation as a British Citizen, in order to stand for public office, and engage in the voting process. It is as a result of undertaking this momentous decision that I felt encumbered to submit an evidence paper on the theme of civic engagement for those left behind by modern UK society.

As a differently abled woman, I have consistently felt on the fringes of society, as life is geared towards the able bodied on a daily basis. Evidence of this being found in everything from ancient railway stations that can only be accessed via stairwells, to parties and concert halls with no seats provided. Disabled people are marginalised and made to be almost invisible. This has gradually improved with slightly greater visibility in the entertainment industry, but even after two decades of concerted efforts on the part of casting directors, the end results still appear tokenistic, as it is rare to see a disabled person cast in a role in which their disability is not alluded to in the script. This has long ceased to be the case with BAME actors and entertainers.

I have chosen to address the question: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind?” Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups-white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might those barriers be overcome?

Linguistically for starters. I began this paper by discussing disabled people- one of the most marginalised groups in 21st century society-and yet you fail to mention us in your question about marginalised groups....!

I will be focusing my evidence around disabled people, non-native English speakers and those who identify as LGBTI.

Civic engagement discouragement for disabled people starts at a practical level. My local political party, for example, only allows canvassing on foot, and discontinued phone canvassing. They barred someone on the autism spectrum from attending meetings. They have a profoundly deaf member who cannot attend meetings as they meet in a room with no induction loop. There is a society affiliated to my chosen political party run for and by disabled people, yet they refused to Livestream their AGM for disabled people unable to attend the meeting. This of course also excluded them from standing as an executive committee candidate.

People with learning disabilities can engage with civic life via a course run by Parliament’s Outreach. However, few people know that Parliament has an outreach service, it is very poorly publicised. I only discovered it after being invited on to the mailing list by a Member of Parliament. It is generally understood that people with learning difficulties receive a poorer standard of education, and with the welfare reforms employed by the incumbent government removing the Independent Living Fund and making benefits such as ESA almost impossible to claim, the standard of living for disabled people in general has significantly worsened, as they are ill prepared for the job market and pushed further into poverty and suicidal despair.

The Rev. Robin Griffith-Jones, D. Litt, Master of the Temple at the Temple Church, Senior Lecturer, King's College London – written evidence (CCE0123)

There are no additional provisions, such as support workers trained in behaviour therapy-for people with mental ill health, dementia, or those on the autism spectrum, who would like to attend a rally or visit Parliament. It is only recently that signers have been involved in large civic gatherings.

Similar principles apply for people for whom English is a second language. Translators are not freely available in many shops, cafes, libraries or doctor's surgeries. There is little to no support given in certain communities, as immigrants are stigmatised by a hostile right wing media given to jingoistic, xenophobic mind-sets which fuel their own agenda and create a less than welcoming and supportive environment for the non-English speaker fleeing war and terror in their own country.

Compared to countries such as Russia and Uganda, the LGBTI community has it relatively easy in the UK. However, although there have been great strides forward, it is still difficult to a degree for the transgendered, for example, to engage in civic life, owing to the same issue that plagues disabled people- a lack of a public role model, a lack of visibility. It is no longer an issue in this this country to have an alternative sexual nature, but it remains more of an issue to have had a change in gender. This can only be overcome by a shift in society's mind-set towards even greater inclusion and tolerance. We are as a country, further along this path which is one of many reasons why I personally will be proud to eventually become a UK citizen.

12 August 2017

The Rev. Robin Griffith-Jones, D. Litt, Master of the Temple at the Temple Church, Senior Lecturer, King's College London – written evidence (CCE0123)

I write as the Joint Principal Investigator of a collaborative project involving (i) The Temple and the Temple Church and (ii) the Theology and Law departments of King's College London: 21st century Britain: Moral Sources of the Common Good. We are taking up the challenge laid down by the Woolf Commission, Living with Difference, 2015, and The Casey Review: a Review into Opportunity and Integration, 2016: to mount and sustain a national conversation on British ideals and aspirations and the ways to realise them. These notes come from myself and from my colleague, Joint Principal Investigator Dr Daniel DeHanas, Lecturer in Political Science and Religion at KCL.

The Rev. Robin Griffith-Jones, D. Litt, Master of the Temple at the Temple Church, Senior Lecturer, King's College London – written evidence (CCE0123)

The project's Steering Group at the Temple is chaired by Baroness Butler-Sloss. Our Co-Investigators at KCL include Lord Judge.

We respond here to the Committee's questions only where we believe we can add most value: at Questions 7, 8 and 9.

Dr DeHanas and I will be glad to elaborate any of our points to the Committee, and are willing and ready to offer oral evidence if that would be helpful.

[Question 7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?]

1. A central challenge underlies these questions. Only central government can conceive, design, realise and sustain the genuinely nationwide promotion of citizenship and civic engagement. To be practicable, such a campaign must be centralised and, at least to some extent, 'top-down'. On the other hand, it is widely suggested that distrust of our political, economic and cultural élites – and not least, of government itself – is discouraging ordinary people from civic engagement: it seems impossible to have any influence upon or make any difference to these élites, their perceived remoteness, indifference and self-seeking. The distance in power between different groups in British society has been on view this summer, with totemic clarity, in the relationship between Council and tenants in Grenfell Tower. In the promotion of civic engagement, then, central government needs to encourage a decentralised, 'bottom up' movement.
2. Westminster naturally and rightly thinks on a capacious, national scale. Most ordinary people are energised by local issues, of personal concern to themselves, in which they can imagine having some palpable effect.
3. There is a widespread impression that our civic life has been hollowed out: that the organisations which once provided local cohesion and a shared sense of belonging have faded away, leaving no intermediate civic layer between the individual and the state. Our own consultations have testified to this: in our interlocutors' concern not just that they live in fractured communities but that within each there is often no 'community' at all, just isolated individuals and families.
4. It is in this context that our élites – not least, in Parliament – have been calling for a 'national conversation': a conversation that will bridge both (i) the lateral and (ii) the vertical divisions that seem to threaten the unity represented by the very structure of the House of Commons and by the responsibility of national government for a whole nation.

5. It is symptomatic of these divisions that our nation's leaders more often speak precisely about such divisions to each other than to those on the other side of the divides. Cumberland Lodge and The St Paul's Institute organised an important evening at St Paul's Cathedral this spring. The principal speakers were Lord (Rowan) Williams, Baroness Butler-Sloss and Lord Stern. The audience was 700 leaders: peers, judges, politicians, clergy. The Leitmotif of the evening was the alienation of ordinary people from our national élites – precisely the élites represented there in the Cathedral. Asked how this alienation was to be overcome, the speakers admitted candidly that they did not know.
6. The Woolf Commission, chaired by Baroness Butler-Sloss, published its report, Living with Difference, in 2015. The Commission called for such a conversation:

At a time when so much is dominated by the sole value of individual choice, faith leaders and other opinion leaders need to initiate discussions on the values, political and personal, they have in common with each other and with the humanist values of the Enlightenment. A national conversation should be launched across the UK by leaders of faith communities and opinion leaders in other ethical traditions to create a shared understanding of the fundamental values underlying public life. It would take place at all levels and in all regions. The outcome might well be, within the tradition of Magna Carta and other such declarations of rights over the centuries, a statement of principles to guide the development and evaluation of policies relating to the common good.

- Living with Difference, 3.14

7. The pleas for such a conversation have become a chorus: in the Casey Review, 2016; and again in the House of Lords in December 2016. A fine recent book was actually subtitled, 'Towards a National Conversation' (N. Sagovsky and P. McGrail, Together for the Common Good: Towards a National Conversation, 2015).
8. In all this we are heirs of the great political theorists of our time. Any conversation concerned with policies will soon seek the ear of Government, and so – even without any party-political affiliation or agenda – will become a small part of John Rawls' vast 'deliberative democracy' and Amartya Sen's 'government by discussion' (A. Sen, The Idea of Justice, 2009, pp. 321ff, refining J. Rawls, The Theory of Justice, 1971, 1975, 1991).
9. We might go further. Many of us are likely to value the conviction that our polity is indeed a 'deliberative democracy', run through 'government by discussion'. Without some such sustained conversation, it is not clear that ours is in fact such a polity at all. There are moments of intense and widespread public involvement: in the Scottish Referendum, 2014 (turnout 84.6%); in the Brexit Referendum, 2016 (turnout 72.2%); and in the General Election, 2017 (turnout 68.7%). But such campaigns are intermittent and almost febrile. Voters may seem susceptible to wild claims on all sides, and elections to be, in consequence, unworthy of a 'mature democracy'. More sustained, local conversations will better equip us, as a nation, both to address the major issues that will continue to face us as voters and to listen respectfully to – and even to learn from – those with whom we disagree.

10. At issue, ultimately, is the character of the democracy that we wish to sustain. Post-Brexit, we do well to acknowledge that there are two honourable but divergent principles on which a democratic polity can be built. In 2004 a Constitution for the European Union was drafted. It included a Preamble, which was headed by a quotation from Thucydides, from Pericles' great Funeral Speech: Onoma men dia to mē es oligous all' es pleionas oikein dēmokratia keklētai (2.37.1) This was mistranslated in the Constitution's English version: 'Our constitution is called a democracy because power is not in the hands not of a minority but of the greatest number' (https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/5872.pdf, at p. 14). But Pericles in fact says that the constitution is called a democracy 'because it is run for the benefit not of a few, but of a greater number.' Pericles' definition is consistent with a benevolent oligarchy or bureaucracy.⁸³⁶ There has forever been an ambiguity in the conception of power within European 'democracies'. We need local devolution and engagement, to ensure that power in Britain is to be both (i) more robustly and responsibly placed 'in the hands of the greatest number' and (ii) used for their benefit.
11. We return at the end (para 21) to some of the challenges that will face those mounting such a conversation. It will be no surprise that so many groups have called for a national conversation and so few, it seems, have launched one. At this point we suggest one refinement to the proposal of the Woolf Commission: that we do better to propose a large number of locally generated 'mini-Cartas', which it may never be possible or desirable to redact into a single, nationally endorsed 'statement of principles'.
12. It will already be clear to the Committee that the process of such conversation is as important as the outcome.
13. To mount such a conversation will be to survey at the outset the inspiring wealth of civic engagement already locally under way. Here we can adduce just two examples well known within the Church of England: the – sometimes confrontational – broad-based community organising undertaken by Citizens UK; and the quieter but equally sustained promotion of neighbourliness by Near Neighbours. Civic engagement typically grows from success in addressing one small local cause into addressing a second, larger but still local cause; and so on. The capacities, confidence and ⁸³⁶ The German translation was, of course, accurate.

dedication of a small core-group, often including professional and/or experienced field-workers in such engagement, can be essential to success. (Among the divergent agencies and models available for community action, the Government appears to have been comfortable working with Re:generate and its methods known as Root Solution – Listening Matters. Saul Alinsky's approach, made famous in Chicago and beyond by President Obama, may have seemed too combative for the UK, see L. Bretherton, Resurrecting Democracy, 2015.)

14. We believe that there are many organisations of various and sometimes unexpected kinds that could be acknowledged, encouraged, brought together and fortified in the civic engagement that they already undertake. Schools and faith-bodies are ubiquitous and already do extraordinary work 'on the ground'. For the responses of local faith-bodies to the Grenfell fire, see e.g., The Guardian, 19 July 2017. We might fruitfully look around at less obvious 'mediating' structures which will also rise to such a challenge. One of the big five supermarkets had food-vans on the Tower's estate by 3.30 a.m. on the night of the fire. Brentford, Chelsea, Fulham and QPR Football Clubs came together over the summer to provide football for the children of the estate (The Times, 15 Aug. 2017). There are depths of concern and goodwill to be tapped without any challenge to the commercial priorities driving such organisations.
15. We take a particular personal interest in the contribution of local churches and other faith institutions. We acknowledge the care with which their engagement must be sought. They are already stretched, in their promotion of a devotional life within their (sometimes small and aging) congregations. Bretherton reports the reluctance of some activists to engage with bodies so appreciably religious (Resurrecting Democracy, pp 99-105). Lord (Jonathan) Sacks has recently delivered a powerful speech invoking the classic Jewish emphasis on belonging over believing (<http://standpointmag.co.uk/node/6938/full>). We note, by contrast, that Protestantism has over centuries stressed believing as the condition necessary to belonging; 'unbelievers' do not find it easy to feel at home in such a setting. One of us remembers the churches in East Germany, before and after 1988-9: empty for years; suddenly vital to the protesters, and offering shelter and brave witness; within days of the Wall's destruction, empty again. Our own churches and other religious communities would need to be more fully resourced and enabled, in order to sustain, medium- to long-term, the wide-based conversations needed.
16. We believe that such existing local engagement can be the basis for the reflective articulation, by its participants, of their own ideals and aspirations for their neighbourhood; and can become thereby the template for a scaled-up, aspirational and articulate 'neighbourhood nationalism'. (The term coined by Les Back, New Ethnicities, 1996.) This is not to underestimate the difficulties in generating and sustaining such reflection even where there already an impressive pattern of local engagement: there will be no discernible point in devoting yet more time and energy to such engagement on anything abstract and seemingly ineffective.

17. One example will suffice here, of local engagement that can already exhaust – as well as inspire – its protagonists: Credit Unions. It is in the areas of greatest need that Credit Unions find it hardest to recruit the necessary 22 sponsors; and such sponsors can then find themselves trapped into an involvement longer – and over time, more wearingly – than they had ever expected. (Policy Studies Institute, Credit Unions in the UK, 1989, 'Running a Credit Union'; CUs have been more easily sustained when the common bond is a large-scale and supportive employer.) It would be hard to imagine, in such areas, engaging such volunteers in yet more and seemingly less practical work.
18. It is within Government's power to make such reflective articulation of ideals a standard component of education and of local government: by its introduction into the National Curriculum and into the relationship between local government and localities' residents, businesses and the third sector.
19. It is also within the Government's power to promote such reflective articulation of ideals through existing patterns of civic engagement. The Coalition Government allocated £20 million to the admirable Community Organisers Programme in England. It was known from the outset that the 500 Trainee Community Officers would be in post only for one year. One year's engagement with a community, however, was – as experienced community-workers will no doubt have told the Government – never going to be enough to generate long-term momentum. It remains to be seen whether the 4,500 Volunteer Community Officers will have acquired sufficient confidence and dedication to sustain their work without their TCOs' tutelage and support. (Evaluation at https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/488520/Community_Organisers_Programme_Evaluation.pdf; cf. R. Fisher and K. Dimberg, Journal of Community Practice, 24 (2016), 94-108. The Government has a wealth of experience on which to draw, with other such initiatives and their evaluation: such as the £80 million Community First project (evaluated at <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/community-first-neighbourhood-matched-fund-evaluation>); or indeed, in a more robust localising intervention, the Neighbourhood Planning policy.
20. We live, however, in straitened times. Any initiative dependent on Government support must not rely upon its permanence.
21. Tight budgets put a strain on all involved: there is too much already to be done, for statutory bodies to be burdened with new requirements from Government or for the third sector to load yet more upon their paid workers or dedicated volunteers. Any proposal must show local benefit within the existing remit of all those organisations ordered or invited to be involved.

22. We endorse, then, the recent calls for a national conversation, in order (i) to acknowledge, promote and enhance the civic engagement already under way and (ii) to help local communities to articulate their own ideals for themselves and indirectly for the nation at large. We acknowledge that large questions loom unanswered here. What constitutes a national conversation? Who takes part in it? Not just with a single submission and extracted sound-bites but with sustained personal engagement in the discussion. Who is going to moderate, minute and condense all the actual conversations into some final manageable form? Who will have the right to redact those conversations if some of them turn out in ways that seem unpalatable to those managing the conversations? In the terms of the Woolf Commission, who will assume the authority to formulate and disseminate any future 'statement of principles' and in whose name? Who, lacking any democratic mandate themselves or any political machinery, will try to persuade parliamentarians of both Houses, Government, Whitehall, agencies, churches and others to take note of these deliberations and of any such document, and to act on them? In Rawlsian terms, who will do the deliberating, and to what effect? In Sen's, who will be part of the discussion, and who in Government will care?
23. We should also be braced in any such conversation for the emergence of deep differences in outlook and aspiration. Not everyone in Britain, we suspect, would welcome the tolerant and cohesive society which we might hope that the conversation would adumbrate and help to realise; nor that those who would welcome it will ever agree how to define or attain it. The very passion for local change that is likely to energise such conversation may sometimes also be the passion that clouds judgement with suspicion and anger. And if such conversation ever gains traction, it is certainly possible that politically motivated activists will try to hijack it.
24. In summary, we suspect that top-down initiatives to promote citizenship and civic engagement are no longer likely to be effective. There may have been a time when large-scale reports on our national life, seeking consensus on broad directions (the 'middle axiom' approach) would percolate in detail or outline or by osmosis through central and local government, and via the broadsheets to policy-makers in all fields, and so in time affect the lives of millions who had not heard of the report, let alone read it. (William Temple's Christianity and Social Order, 1942, has been described as 'one of the foundation piers of the welfare state', D. Munby, God and the Rich Society, 1960, p. 157. Faith in the City, 1985, was perhaps met with more anger than approbation; but it did stir a lasting reflection, both within and beyond the Church of England, on our nation's ideals and a patent failure to realise them.) We fear that even the most authoritative and thoughtful 'middle axiom' report, submitted to a Government and to other agencies each burdened with its own pressing priorities for action, now sinks too readily from view.

25. We suggest, therefore, that the Committee will make an immensely valuable contribution to civic engagement by recommending to Government the ongoing 'national conversation' sought by successive reports, to be engendered and sustained through DfE (in the National Curriculum), DCLG (in the relationship between local government and its constituents) and other Departments; and to be fostered locally, within and around agencies that are already active, with local issues and concerns to the fore.

[Question 8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?]

26. We recommend less emphasis on values (which can seem retrospective and defensive) than on ideals and aspirations. Crudely phrased: what will make Britain the best Britain that Britain can be? We do not assume that everyone in Britain would welcome the tolerant and cohesive society that we hope our project will help, in a modest way, to realise; nor do we expect that those who would welcome such a society will fully agree how to define or attain it.

27. However, we do expect that holding a locally-led national conversation on ideals and aspirations can leave us changed as a nation – even if only subtly – in ways that will bring us closer to the aims of cohesion and tolerance.

[Question 9. Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?]

28. We hear on all sides that poverty undermines engagement. Few people can commit energy to civic concerns, even at a local level, if their daily lives are dominated by the urgent demands of providing for their families.
29. Poverty itself is not to be divorced from poverty of education, experience, skills and confidence. Inequalities tend to persist in durable, inter-linked structural forms (see C. Tilly, 1998, Durable Inequality).
30. We all know of divisions between neighbouring communities which are remote from each other in culture, ethnicity and first-language. We have heard, however even greater regret that there is no longer any meaningful 'community' at all, and that ever more people are isolated in consequence.

The Rev. Robin Griffith-Jones, D. Litt, Master of the Temple at the Temple Church, Senior Lecturer, King's College London – written evidence (CCE0123)

8 September 2017

Think Global – written evidence (CCE0109)

Think Global is an education charity. Our Mission is to enable people to understand and critically think about global issues, motivating and encouraging us to act for a more just and sustainable world. We do this by bringing together resources and expertise in global learning and skills development, developing policy focused activity and strengthening the global learning sector in England.

Think Global was established in 1983 as a national network for local Development Education Centres. During the 1990s we became the Development Education Association, when we included within our coalition major development NGOs including Oxfam, ActionAid, Save the Children, Christian Aid and CAFOD, as well as other organisations such as businesses, trade unions, schools and universities. In the 2000s, when we changed our name to Think Global, we expanded our network further to include individual educators.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

In recent decades, as increasing globalisation has shifted and softened the boundaries between people living in diverse countries and communities, ‘understanding the world around us’ has come to involve knowledge not only about our own local neighbourhoods and situations, but also about communities, peoples, ideas, cultures, beliefs and practices far beyond our own national borders. It is in this context that Think Global believes that ‘global citizenship education’, or ‘global learning’ as it is more often called in the UK, is relevant to understanding questions of identity.

Britain today exists within a complex and volatile global system. That system is changing and evolving more rapidly than ever before, and the world in which our young people are growing up is being shaped not only by changes within our own cities and communities, but by massive and uncontrolled forces that cross borders and continents with impunity. Preparing our young people to live and work within this global system is a major challenge confronting our society.

Climate change, international competitiveness, terrorism, large-scale migration and rapid technological advances are all having an increasing effect on how young people experience their lives, and help determine the quality of life they will have in the future. In such a turbulent and unstable world, there has never been such opportunity but with it comes real and substantial threats. Our young people need both the skills and knowledge to succeed and to understand their place in this exciting but turbulent global environment.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Learning about the world around us has always been a key purpose of education. Understanding how we fit into that world, and how our own actions can affect and influence the experiences of others, is a founding preoccupation for teachers and educators across the spectrum, from early childhood learning, through to high school and beyond.

We believe that all people, not just young people in formal education, should have opportunities to understand, critically think about and act on global issues, so that they are motivated to take action for a more just and sustainable world as citizens. The role of education is key to developing good global citizenship and encouraging young people to take informed action; it is our view that a good education prepares young people to play an active role in their communities (local and global), engage meaningfully in a political process, and understand their democratic rights.

There is a growing need to promote the shared values and informed understandings that can help the UK to build a safe, tolerant, cohesive and outward-looking society. Think Global believes that ‘global learning’ can play a significant role in educating people in the UK towards this goal. As part of their education, people need to be offered the opportunities to gain the knowledge, skills and values to equip them to succeed in and make a positive contribution to our own society and a globalised world. Global learning emphasises the concepts of equity, interdependence and respect for diversity.

Global learning (critical and creative learning about the wider world) enables people to develop knowledge about the challenges we face and skills to make decisions for themselves. Equipped with these global capabilities, people can help to make a more just and sustainable world.

Think Global defines global learning as education that puts learning in a global context, fostering:

- critical and creative thinking;
- self-awareness and open-mindedness towards difference;
- understanding of global issues and power relationships; and
- optimism and action for a better world.

Global learning is a key element to achieving implementation of SDG (Sustainable Development Goals) 4: Quality Education for All, which includes as one of its subsections Target 4.7: ‘Promote education for sustainable development and global citizenship’, which is particularly relevant to implementation in the UK. The Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) are 17 goals defined by the United Nations to tackle the world's biggest problems by 2030. The UK is one of the 193 signatories, which means it has a responsibility to implement the SDGs and to ensure that the goals relate to what is happening here as well as in other countries. The wording of SDG Target 4.7 states:

“By 2030, ensure that all learners acquire the knowledge and skills needed to promote sustainable development, including, among others, through education for sustainable development and sustainable lifestyles, human rights, gender equality, promotion of a culture of peace and non-violence, global citizenship and appreciation of cultural diversity and of culture’s contribution to sustainable development”.

As shown through the DFID-funded Global Learning Programme (GLP), it is possible to embed these opportunities in the curriculum and ethos of thousands of primary and secondary schools if a global learning approach is adopted. It is vital that this important contribution is recognised and that the benefits are understood throughout the country and by all ages. The essential role of global learning within education is both timely and necessary.

Beyond the classroom, there are some excellent initiatives encouraging good global citizenship. For example, Y Care International is the leading champion of global youth work, a discipline that engages young people to make sense of our complex world and take positive action for change. With partners in the YMCA movement and other youth work organisations, Y Care International engages young people in the UK and Ireland living in deprivation or who experience discrimination in global youth work, “enabling marginalised young people to explore the global dimension of issues affecting their lives... All too often these young people are not reached through the formal education sector and denied opportunities to influence decision making”. However, lack of funding too often means that provision is patchy resulting in these opportunities not being available to enough people who could benefit from them.

Some issues with current provision around citizenship education in schools were raised by one of our members: “Education is absolutely critical and cannot start early enough in an appropriate manner. However the narrowing of the curriculum, teacher workload and time pressure has a detrimental effect on active citizenship education. The approach is too piecemeal and superficial in many schools. Citizenship is often taught by non-specialists with poor subject knowledge and inadequate training.”

We believe every school should deliver effective teaching of global learning, where global learning is a regular practice at whole school, curriculum and classroom level. All school staff should have an understanding of what global learning is and what makes a good global learner, and should be able to critically evaluate and assess teaching and learning according to global learning principles. It is our view that global learning should be a key element to everyone’s education, not one that relies on the motivation and determination of individual schools or teachers.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

Think Global is an education charity working to help people to understand global issues. We think it's important for people to understand how we are all interconnected and interdependent on a global scale, and to be empowered to make informed decisions in our personal and professional lives. In an increasingly connected world, national interests cannot be separated from global interests; the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support are the same for people across the world – “values of democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty, and mutual respect and tolerance of those with different faiths and beliefs” (Department for Education guidelines on promoting ‘British Values’). We would also add that our common values should be based on social justice, cultural understanding and a sense of social responsibility.

The UK's decision to leave the European Union presents both challenges and opportunities when considering British values. On the one hand, the rise of racism and xenophobia and retreats to a narrow form of nationalism and patriotism present a threat to such values; on the other, opportunities can be created to help people have a better understanding of Britain's role in a global society, including our responsibilities to create a more just and sustainable world.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Global Learning Programme: Think Global is a partner in this major DFID-funded programme, which is helping teachers in Primary, Secondary and Special schools deliver effective teaching and learning about development and global issues at Key Stages 2 and 3. Building a national network of like-minded schools committed to equipping their students to make a positive contribution to a globalised world, the GLP gives teachers the tools to help pupils learn how to live in a diverse society and develop an ethos of tolerance, fairness and respect. Global Schools across the UK are also seeing the positive impact that the Global Learning Programme is having on pupils' engagement, knowledge, skills and values. In this article, Clive Belgeonne (a GLP practitioner based in Sheffield) explains How the Global Learning Programme \(GLP\) supports current school priorities such as 'British values'. For example, the Pupil Learning Outcomes (PLOs) of the GLP “include understanding the actions of governments and actions of citizens. It promotes skills such as enquiry, discussion, reflection, taking appropriate action and evaluation. Pupils consider values such as respect for diversity and rights. The GLP provides an opportunity for schools to work alongside others to engage in dialogue around the introduction of ‘British values’.” Belgeonne goes on to argue that “Sharing and understanding multiple perspectives on global issues makes it less likely that young people will subscribe to one fundamentalist view of the world. The GLP helps schools develop an ethos promoting tolerance, fairness and respect”.

Other national programmes promoting global citizenship include the work of British Council with Connecting Classrooms, E-twinning, International School Award, which along with the GLP provide excellent frameworks and resources to promote teacher education and student engagement with difference.

Think Global and 'Start the Change' project: This Erasmus+ project aims to promote understanding and ownership of democratic values and fundamental rights through the core project elements of research, resource production, teacher training and the promotion of a model of active citizenship for young people. In collaboration with European partners, Think Global is working with teachers and school students to understand young people's views on identity and extremism. Working in two hubs in north-east England and London we have conducted research with groups of students and their teachers exploring issues of identity, diversity, extremism and key issues that affect the lives of young people. The project develops an active citizenship model that will enable young people to take informed action to develop safe spaces, have agency at a community level and promote peace. It supports the young people participating in the project to develop into critical thinkers with an awareness of global issues, developing their capacity to make informed decisions and take action to develop and promote a more cohesive society.

Below are some other examples of work by Think Global network partners that we believe have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society:

The Linking Network: “supports schools and communities to develop a positive, cohesive ethos by helping children, young people and adults to explore identity, celebrate diversity, champion equality and promote community. We directly deliver a linking programme in Bradford and support local linking programmes in other areas across the country by providing guidance for facilitators, training for teachers and tried and tested classroom resources to enable linking.

We research into best practice in developing school culture and ethos supporting schools to develop the spiritual, moral, social and cultural learning of their pupils that can form a lever for positive whole school change. We do this by providing courses for leading SMSC, staff meetings on SMSC, bespoke direct support to schools to review their work and by providing extensive curriculum resources available on this website. Our primary and secondary classroom and assembly resources support teachers to promote and celebrate identity, diversity, equality and community.”

Global Link \(Lancaster\)

“Global Link's commitment to tackling extremism through the PREVENT agenda began in 2008 through our partnership with Lancashire Constabulary. Working together with Superintendent Andy Pratt, our education worker delivered Philosophy for Children training with teachers across the County, in Andy Pratt's belief that the best method of preventing extremism in schools was to develop the critical thinking and multiple perspectives required to resist radical ideologies.”

Think Global – written evidence (CCE0109)

[Devon Development Education’s Cultural Champions \[Devon\]](#)

“A Cultural Champion (CC) is a Devon resident from another culture or religion. They come into the classroom, workplace or community group to give an authentic, personal view of their culture or faith. We started a training programme in 2006 and have run 4 training courses altogether.

On a notable visit by a Kenyan Muslim to a secondary school, the planned material was set aside so that the pupils could ask questions about being a Muslim and Islam. A very valuable experience for the pupils, and a valuable insight into the myths about Islam and Muslims for the Cultural Champion.

Recognising the quality of our CCs’ work, as professional educators from BME backgrounds, CCs have been asked to assist with other work:

- The Youth Offending Team has asked them on 3 occasions to work with individual young people accused of hate crimes.
- On 2 occasions, after racist incidents in school, CCs were invited in to discuss what could be done.
- A large secondary school asked CCs to devise and run anti-racist training for the whole staff.

CCs offer training for teachers in diversity and British Values from a Muslim or Hindu perspective, which is provided through the government’s Global Learning Programme.”

Gender Respect Education Project - DECSY (Development Education Centre South Yorkshire)

This project grew out of One Billion Rising which inspired women and girls, and men who love them, to come out on the streets of more than 50 different cities across the globe on 14th February 2013. Its aim was to help children and young people to understand, question and challenge gender inequality and violence in a local-global context. The 3-year project brought together teachers of pupils aged 4-14 along with creative practitioners and young people to develop engaging, participatory and creative curriculum activities and materials which equipped children and young people to:

- Question gender stereotyping (including engaging boys as well as girls)
- Understand global and historical contexts of gender relations
- Explore issues of power, freedom and human rights in the context of gender
- Feel empowered to take action (especially through the use of social media).

Think Global – written evidence (CCE0109)

7 September 2017

Tim Parry Johnathan Ball Peace Foundation– written evidence (CCE0067)

The Tim Parry Johnathan Ball Peace Foundation (Peace Foundation) was founded in memory of two boys, Tim Parry and Johnathan Ball, who were tragically killed in the IRA's bombing of Warrington in March 1993. The Peace Foundation is an independent charity with no political or religious affiliations and works nationally and internationally to support those affected by terrorism and violent conflict.

The Peace Foundation's work and reach has grown significantly in recent years and our experience in the field of conflict resolution and peacebuilding means we are well placed to respond to some of the contemporary challenges facing our society. We work with those who have been impacted by war, terrorism and politically motivated violence and our wide range of programmes bring us into contact with individuals ranging from young people susceptible to extremism, women in diverse communities, veterans of conflict and their families as well as survivors and witnesses to acts of terrorism and violent conflict. As well as working closely with the Home Office, we work with the Ministry of Justice, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Metropolitan Police, local and city authorities, the Irish Government and other Non-Governmental organisations.

Introduction

1. The Tim Parry Johnathan Ball Peace Foundation is a registered charity, in operation since 1995. The Peace Foundation was founded in memory of two boys, Tim Parry and Johnathan Ball, who were tragically killed in an IRA bomb in March 1993. The IRA exploded two bombs, without warning, on a busy Saturday in a shopping street in the town of Warrington in the North-West of England. The bombs in bins created shrapnel that killed three-year-old Johnathan Ball and five days later, 12 year old Tim Parry lost his life. 54 others were seriously injured. The incident shocked the nation and gained worldwide publicity.
2. After the bombing, the parents of Tim Parry, supported by Johnathan's parents (Johnathan's parents have since passed away) wanted to gain an understanding of why they lost their children. Colin and Wendy Parry were taken by BBC Panorama to Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and the USA. During these visits, they witnessed work efforts aimed at creating and sustaining peace. They returned inspired, like many other victims, to try and make sure nobody ever experienced what they had gone through. Funded largely by donations they had received in the aftermath of the bombing, they formed a charitable trust.
3. A scholarship commenced in Tim's name, bringing together young people from different sides of the conflict to try to understand their differences and also share their commonalities. Wendy Parry had the idea to create a location to house the scholarship and together, they set a vision to build a centre as a living memorial to the boys. The project became a millennium goal and with the involvement of Government and the NSPCC, grew substantially. The iconic Peace Centre opened in 2000. It is a multi-purpose building based in Warrington, and houses facilities ranging from residential quarters to a café, sport and art areas to special spaces for conferences and project work.

4. Early work started by undertaking a huge and diverse number of projects and activities ranging from community youth clubs to residential programmes. In 2001 the Foundation undertook a study looking at the specific needs of GB domiciled victims of the Northern Ireland conflict and from this report work began to provide a series of activities to assist those victims. At the same time, conflict was changing, with terrorist attacks in New York on September 11th 2001 and London on July 7th 2005 (the latter remaining the biggest loss of life in a terrorist attack on mainland Britain). In addition, a gradual move to peace in Northern Ireland meant that the Peace Foundation began to develop its capabilities working not only with young people but communities generally in building peace and conflict resolution skills. The Peace Foundation is independent and funded as a charity. We do not take sides, we are not aligned to any conflict, we are not faith or political based and we do not pursue causes such as justice or truth. There is no other organisation that takes such a stance.
5. The nature of our work and programmes mean we are well placed to respond to the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement's call for evidence. The Peace Foundation's broad range of educational programmes are designed to equip participants with skills to use their experiences positively and to effect change for themselves and their communities. Our approach to conflict resolution tackles the root causes before, during and after violent conflict. Our portfolio of programmes and projects therefore deal with the prevention, resolution and response to violent conflict. Our projects are tried and tested, and supported by over 20 years of experience in the field. We retain the intellectual capital gained over these years, and continue to deploy it to counter the risks facing society today.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

6. Through our programmes, the Peace Foundation encourages people to learn about citizenship through experience, using techniques to help participants develop critical thinking abilities and explore what it means to behave compassionately towards others. We believe that education has a huge role to play in strengthening people's identity as citizens and that this type of education should not be confined to the classroom. From encouraging individuals to think about how their beliefs and values motivate behaviour, to exploring and confronting conflict, recognising prejudice and engaging in dialogue, our projects are aimed at educating, training and influencing individuals and communities so that they can prevent, resolve and respond to conflict in ways that work for them. Our stakeholders include teachers, school leaders and community leaders as well as young people.

7. Enabling people to make their own decisions and to take responsibility for their own lives and communities cuts across a broad range of areas and subjects. As such, from an educational perspective, we believe it is sensible for citizenship to be integrated into existing subjects. We are aware that as well as the statutory citizenship curriculum, elements of citizenship education appear in many subjects - such as English, history and maths - as well as in a school's spiritual, moral, social and cultural (SMSC) development outcomes. Any extension of this approach and further integration of citizenship education into existing subjects should be encouraged.

What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

8. Contemporary challenges mean that citizenship education and giving people the knowledge and skills to understand, challenge and engage in issues crosses into new and uncharted territory. For example, questions of social, moral and legal awareness come into force when considering how to equip young people with the skills to navigate themselves safely online.
9. Young people today are no different than young people of previous generations in that they may be searching for their identity, they may feel isolated, under pressure or that the challenge of navigating their transformation from child to adult is beyond their reach. The Peace Foundation's Think programmes, aimed at 14-19 year olds, Key Stage 4 and above, encourage young people to think critically and consequentially about content they interact with online and understand how to engage safely and constructively in this space. The modules help participants develop an understanding of the role of social media in how young people can positively contribute and participate in these spaces and ultimately, aim to empower young people to become responsible citizens online.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

10. In the family environment, women can play a crucial part in providing important interventions that can alter a path towards violence. Women's active participation in democracy and peacebuilding is critical. The Peace Foundation's programmes aimed at women and young women, encourage leadership and explore conflict and extremism at a local, national and international level. Our Women For Peace programmes train and support marginalised women to become more active citizens, who lead the way in preventing and resolving violent conflict through intercultural dialogue and challenging narratives.

11. For many women we work with, English is spoken as a second language. Our programmes help them develop their English speaking through public speaking and interaction with other women from their local communities. In addition, they gain enhanced skills in conflict resolution and problem solving and increased understanding to respond to local issues and participate in social action.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

12. Mother of three, Ahlam Hassan completed our Women for Peace programme in 2015. A refugee from Syria who came to the UK with her husband and children in 2013, Ahlam spoke of how the course gave her increased confidence and inspired her to help others who have faced similar struggles including those affected by recent terrorist incidents.

“I am one of the survivors of conflict and I can understand the situation with the family of the victims. I have these experiences and I can feel what they feel. I learned a lot from the course. It has equipped me with the tools, courage and confidence.”⁸³⁷

Ahlam Hassan, Women for Peace alumnus

Conclusion

13. Citizenship has to involve learning through experience and active participation. Teaching methods should not be confined to the classroom. Encouraging and helping individuals develop critical thinking abilities, building confidence and experience of thinking critically about one’s self and ‘the other’ are building blocks for becoming a responsible citizen. Online communities and participation is increasingly important in the lives of young people today and this should be addressed in citizenship education. Equipping young people with the skills to navigate themselves safely online, encouraging young people to think critically and consequentially about content they interact with online and understand how to engage safely and constructively in this space is essential. In order to do this, we must develop a greater understanding of the role of social media in how young people can positively contribute and participate in these spaces and ultimately, empower young people to become responsible citizens online.

837

http://www.warringtonguardian.co.uk/news/15202670.Women_honoured_at_Peace_Centre_for_their_work_to_tackle_violence/?ref=fbpg

6 September 2017

Mira Turnsek supplementary evidence – CCE0270

Regarding Question 142 from Baroness Redfern concerning the reasons why civic engagement and volunteering is more prevalent in the west than in the east, there are various possible explanations (as laid down in the ‘Deutsche Freiwilligensurvey’, the German Survey on Volunteering from 2014):

- weaker ties to church and religion in the eastern Länder and therefore worse infrastructure for correspondent civic engagement;
- economic factors influence the infrastructure for civic engagement (in the east there are fewer associations, less money for the funding of projects, less facilities and contact points for potential volunteers to turn to, etc.);
- socioeconomic differences in the population in the east and west of Germany, which have an impact on volunteer rates;
- different territorial structures: rural areas, which are more prevalent in eastern Germany, often register a stronger decline in population (also due to the ageing of society). This in turn also correlates with worse infrastructure for correspondent civic engagement.

Further key findings of the Fourth German Survey on Volunteering, also concerning the civic engagement of people with a migrant background, are to be found here: <https://www.bmfsfj.de/blob/115604/2606f2c77c632efddd61b274644c2f06/vierter-deutscher-freiwilligensurvey---englisch-data.pdf>

On the question on the naturalisation programme and in particular on a citizenship ceremony, I can confirm that the process of naturalisation is only formally completed with the delivery of a certificate of naturalisation. In most cities and municipalities the delivery of such certificate is done within the framework of a ceremony, where the naturalized person gets the certificate handed over by an administrator, the head of the district authority or the mayor.

More information on naturalisation can be found on the following website: <http://www.make-it-in-germany.com/en/for-qualified-professionals/visa/living-permanently-in-germany/naturalisation#who-is-entitled-to-naturalisation>

Should you need more information on the work of the Federal Agency for Civic Education (BpB), these are two useful links to the English website:

<http://www.bpb.de/die-bpb/138852/federal-agency-for-civic-education>

<http://www.bpb.de/die-bpb/138867/key-activities>

In addition, the colleagues from the BpB wanted to draw your attention to their English publication called “Beyond Us versus Them: Citizenship Education with Hard to Reach Learners in Europe” (<http://www.bpb.de/shop/buecher/schriftenreihe/236777/beyond-us-versus-them>). This volume contains a broad variety of insights, both from practitioners’ reports and academic research, on how citizenship education can reach out to socially marginalised and politically hard to reach groups, including in Great Britain and Germany.

Lastly I wanted to draw your attention again to the Federal Government Strategy to Prevent Extremism and Promote Democracy, which is available under the following link: <https://www.bmfsfj.de/bmfsfj/meta/en/en/publications-en/federal-government-strategy-to-prevent-extremism-and-promote-democracy/115450>.

UK Parliament – written evidence (CCE0126)

The Houses of Parliament’s bicameral Participation Team welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the committee’s inquiry into citizenship and civic engagement in the twenty-first century.

This written evidence highlights the range of activities undertaken by the Houses of Parliament’s Participation Team to involve and inspire the public, and to promote public understanding of the House of Lords and engagement with its work.

This evidence relates specifically to the terms of reference which cover:

- The role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship
- The role of voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service
- What the UK Parliament can do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement.

Inspiring and engaging young people

The Houses of Parliament plays an active role in educating young people about British democracy with the aim of supporting their growth into politically engaged citizens.

A key way in which this is done is by facilitating inward visits to the Houses of Parliament for groups of young people from across the United Kingdom.

In 2016-17, 92,221 children visited the Houses of Parliament’s Education Centre. These groups came from each area and nation of the UK and received free interactive workshops, tours and talks with parliamentarians. State schools from outside London and the South-East also received a travel grant.

The Education Centre runs a weekly Skype the Speaker session, during which time House of Commons Speaker John Bercow MP participates in a live question and answer session. 1844 children took part in 2016-17. Similarly Lords Live is a new initiative which runs along similar lines and involves a member of the Lords speaking with secondary school students over Skype.

The wider Education Service runs the Speaker's School Council Awards. This engages students with the work of the Houses of Parliament and rewards excellence in school council projects. 415 schools applied in 2017 with the number of students taking part in associated projects reaching 31,838.

This engagement with young people is in addition to the estimated 230,000 visitors expected to go on a commercial tour of the Houses of Parliament in 2017-18 and the over 98,000 people expected to join Democratic Access Tours (facilitated directly by Members of both Houses).

Educational outreach

The Participation Team runs a programme of educational outreach for those unable to visit the Parliamentary Estate. This involves visiting schools and communities across the country and running free interactive workshops for students aged 7-18.

In 2016-17, 482 workshops were delivered across the UK with 48,710 students involved.

A training programme is provided for teachers to engage students in learning about the British political system. 3,157 teachers were trained by the Education Outreach Team in 2016-17. The impact of this work is magnified as these teachers go on to deliver lessons themselves, reaching ever more people.

Our Universities Team works to engage students in higher education by delivering the Parliamentary Studies Module at 20 universities in 2017-18. This involves the delivery of up to 100 seminars to students and 20 visits to the Houses of Parliament with at least 550 students taking part.

The Universities Team also delivers separate student workshops, reaching over 750 students every year and is developing a new Student Leaders' Programme.

Separately, the Lords Speaker's Office runs a Peers in Schools programme which launched in September 2007.

Educational resources

As well as direct engagement with young people, the Houses of Parliament produces an extensive range of free learning resources accessed via our website⁸³⁸ and partner websites over 100,000 times in the last full reporting year. Printed resources including booklets and an election toolkit are also available to order. In addition, over 500,000 views of our videos were made via our 'Learning' YouTube channel in 2016-17⁸³⁹.

The targets in the current year for these learning resources are 80,000 downloads, 40,000 game plays and 750,000 video views. We further increase our reach via partnership resources, such as the award -winning Magna Carta digital resource produced with the National Archives in 2015, and the Your Voice Matters Girl Guide badge.

The Houses of Parliament's Massive Open Online Courses (MOOCs) for adults launched in 2016 when over 10,000 participants took part. Around double this number are expected to take part in 2017-18. This is available on the FutureLearn platform⁸⁴⁰.

Involvement with voluntary citizenship schemes

The UK Parliament participates in the National Citizenship Service (NCS) programme, and in 2017 delivered 182 sessions with the number of children booked to attend reaching 8,018.

Our tailored NCS workshops involve encouraging young people to think about issues they care about, and writing postcards to their local MP setting out their views. These are then delivered to the MPs parliamentary offices along with an address for reply.

A review of attendee feedback from July 2017 shows that out of 658 attendees, 511 (77%) rated the workshops as good or excellent.

Engaging with civil society

UK Parliament Week

The Participation Team runs the annual UK Parliament Week festival (November 2017) that engages people from across the UK with the work of the Houses of Parliament and empowers them to get involved.

In 2017 the number of registered organisations participating, including schools, uniformed groups, and religious organisations has risen to around 4000 involving an estimated 300,000 people from almost every parliamentary constituency of the UK.

Youth Parliament and Youth Select Committee

The Participation Team works with the British Youth Council to run the annual Youth Parliament sitting in the House of Commons. In 2016, 300 Members of the Youth Parliament

⁸³⁸ <http://www.parliament.uk/education/>

⁸³⁹ <https://www.youtube.com/user/UKParliament>

⁸⁴⁰ <https://www.futurelearn.com/courses/introduction-uk-parliament>

(MYP) took part with the topics debated chosen by 978,216 young people following the Make Your Mark campaign.

The Youth Select Committee⁸⁴¹ (YSC) is a British Youth Council initiative, supported by the Participation Team. The eleven committee members include Members of the UK Youth Parliament, Youth Councillors, a Young Mayor, and reserved seats and representatives from each of the devolved nations.

Engaging communities and civil society

The Participation Team works directly with organisations and communities across the UK to increase understanding of, and engagement with, the Houses of Parliament.

The focus of this engagement are those identified from House of Commons Library research⁸⁴² which outlines the extent to which certain groups – such as women, BAME communities, young and older people, long term-unemployed and people with disabilities – are likely to be less politically engaged than others.

The programme of community engagement involves delivering community engagement sessions across the UK, with 455 workshops and 20,000 individuals set to be reached in 2017-18.

In 2016-17 an average of 95% of those who attended these events agreed their knowledge of the UK Parliament increased, and over 90% agreed their knowledge of how the UK Parliament holds the UK Government to account improved. Just 45% of the public claim⁸⁴³ to know at least ‘a fair amount’ about Parliament, indicating a marked improvement as a result of attending participative events.

This work engaging communities also includes tailored Women in Parliament Workshops (20 in 2017-18) and events designed specifically for people with learning disabilities (reaching 550 adults in 2017-18).

A network of community engagement officers deliver these events across the country, with each responsible for specific regions and able to build and maintain longstanding relationships with communities and organisations.

Train the trainer

⁸⁴¹ <https://www.parliament.uk/education/outreach-in-your-school/annual-events/youth-select-committee-2016/>

⁸⁴² Political disengagement in the UK: who is disengaged?
<http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/CBP-7501>

⁸⁴³ Hansard Audit of Political Engagement 2017 <https://www.hansardsociety.org.uk/research/audit-of-political-engagement>

This programme involves providing training to enable individuals to deliver engaging sessions about the work of the Houses of Parliament in their own communities or organisations.

Around 350 trainers have been through the programme since its launch who have themselves gone on to train approximately 2,500 people in 2016-17. Specific strands have also been launched: Empower! designed for adults with learning disabilities and Women in Parliament geared specifically towards women. Just under 1000 people have been trained so far in 2017-18 with each given resources to help with their subsequent engagement.

Involving the public in select committee inquiries

The Select Committee Engagement Team works to increase the range and diversity of witnesses engaged in select committee inquiry sessions. They do this by publicising select committee inquiries via a contacts database, which includes upwards of 20,000 contacts.

They also run face-to-face participative events to support committee inquiries, and enable the committee to hear from audiences they want to hear from, but can't reach. In 2017-8, over 30 participative inquiry events are due to be held and 80,000 people contacted about relevant committee inquiries.

Digital engagement

The Participation Team also run the House of Commons Digital Debate Programme connecting MPs with the opinions and experiences of interested groups and the broader public through online debates held in advance of Parliamentary business.

Public contributions collected via the debate are shared with all Members through the debate pack to help inform the debate in the Chamber. Twenty-six digital debates have been held since the programme launched in June 2015. These are hosted on the most suitable platform for the topic and target audience, including Twitter and Facebook or within forums such as Money Saving Expert or Mumsnet.

For the reporting year 2016-17, 41,606 contributions were made by the public through this programme. This reporting year (2017-18) 20 debates will be hosted and the number of people involved is expected to exceed the previous year's reach.

The House of Commons Twitter account⁸⁴⁴ provides unique real-time coverage of the activity from the House of Commons Chamber, as well as explanatory content on the work and role of the House of Commons. 200,000 people follow the account, with users predominantly based in the UK and with an existing interest in the work of the House. The reach of the account is far wider than the followers, as shares and comments from this core group spread messages through their networks. The monthly impressions for the account far exceeded the 1 million target in 2016-17, averaging 3.5 million.

⁸⁴⁴ <https://twitter.com/HouseofCommons>

Public enquiry service

The House of Commons Public Enquiry Service responds to questions from the public on the work, role and history of the House of Commons via a telephone line, email and post service. In 2016-17 they responded to 14,655 enquiries and similar levels are anticipated in 2017-18. This service is of particular importance to audiences without online access.

The team also provides simple fold-out guides and posters explaining the work of the House of Commons with over 50,000 distributed each year through visitors to the House of Parliament, direct orders by groups and organisations, and partnerships such as a selection of regional libraries in 2016-17.

Please note the House of Lords also runs an enquiry service but this is not based in the Participation Team.

Future strategy

This evidence outlines the ways in which the Houses of Parliament Participation Team seeks to inform and engage the public and help create politically engaged citizens.

The Participation Team is currently engaged in updating its strategy leading up to 2021 and intends to continue to increase both the delivery and reach of this work, capitalising on new methods to engage and continuing to play an active role in creating a thriving parliamentary democracy.

8 September 2017

Understanding Everyday Participation – Articulating Cultural Values Project – written evidence (CCE0186)

Summary and recommendations

Understanding Everyday Participation – Articulating Cultural Values (UEP) is a five-year research project funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council part of their Connected Communities: Cultures and Creative Economies programme. (For more information on the UEP project and response authors, see final page).

We thank the Committee for identifying the extent to which technological and social change is presenting new challenges and opportunities for the definition and practice of citizenship and civic engagement in the UK today, and for opening this inquiry.

Our response to this inquiry is based around four central recommendations:

1. We must recognise that citizenship, civic engagement, participation, and social cohesion involve collective obligations on the part of public authorities and wider society. It is essential not to individualise the responsibility to ‘integrate’ onto marginalised individuals or groups; the responsibility must be shared. We recommend guarding against this exclusionary tendency, and for ensuring all policy proposals stemming from this work are framed as state or collective actions, rather than coercively expressed individual duties.
2. To successfully foster a new sense of citizenship or civic engagement there must be shared experience between individuals, particularly children as part of their education. We recommend a substantial investment in and facilitation of initiatives that give young people the opportunity to connect with their peers and the wider civic communities of which they will ultimately become members as part of every child’s school-age education.
3. The values that will underpin a renewed concept of citizenship must be derived in conversation with the diverse groups, communities, and individuals who together constitute British society. This will require new means of investigation, and negotiation, as the voices we need to hear from the most are unlikely to be present among responses to this inquiry. We recommend a new exercise in outreach that dispenses with current methodologies and audiences, in an attempt to create a wide-ranging conversation about the values and commitments that underpin life in Britain’s traditionally under- and un-represented communities.

4. It is impossible to practise citizenship and civic engagement when the institutions and spaces within which civic participation can be realised are under threat or no longer exist. We use the term 'civic infrastructure' to describe this connected network of places, buildings, and services that enable modern citizenship to be realised. We recommend that the concept of 'civic infrastructure' be recognised as an essential precondition for effectively practising citizenship and civic engagement, and that this recognition informs the approach of local and national governments to protecting and extending these vital spaces.

1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1

Citizenship has gained in prominence in recent years, after a long time off the political agenda. The primary drivers for this interest appear to be the post-2001 rise of immigration, integration, and community cohesion as issues of significant public concern.

1.2

We note also that ‘identity politics’ has played a role in destabilising some of the elements that formed the ‘modern’ (i.e. post-war British) conception of citizenship. While on the one hand a positive expression of freedom and choice, the trend towards individualisation that it represents and reinforces has also had negative effects on social cohesion and the potential to build shared visions of the future.

1.3

This modern model of citizenship has also been proven self-limiting, insofar as its construction has been almost exclusively legal and centred on a discourse of ‘rights’ that has failed to affirm the reciprocity of social obligations (each right we enjoy is also a responsibility to respect that right for all others) and the wider, non-legal elements of civic engagement and participation that equally constitute an individual’s membership of a political community.

1.4

The Understanding Everyday Participation project’s work has demonstrated that people still take membership of a collective seriously. We have found that positive feelings of collective, communal identity remain, that could form the basis for a renewed concept of citizenship.

1.5

Any discussion of the relationship between citizenship and identity must recognise and set out to address the ongoing stigmatisation of many groups within Britain, targeted by ethnic, cultural, and economic difference. In addition to moving beyond paying lip-service to diversity, a substantive concept of citizenship must be capable of overcoming such stigma in a positive and constructive, rather than combative, way.

1.6

National identity proves a problematic anchor for a concept of citizenship because individuals and communities do not live or participate ‘nationally’. On these bases, we believe it makes sense to attempt to disentangle the concept of citizenship from those of identity.

1.7

Research in Glasgow by Kye Askins has recently argued that a move away from citizenship toward a concept of citizenry, equipping citizens for effective participation and interaction in an age of ‘super diversity’, is necessary. In this alternative model, the complexities of citizenship are accounted for and seen instead as a process which exceeds 'any fixed status of citizenship to be achieved in the formal political sphere'.

1.8

We must also further acknowledge the significant longitudinal variation in relationships to citizenship. When approaching the subject, we are forced to ask the question “citizenship, for whom?” and address the fact that disparities of wealth and opportunities between generations have introduced substantial variance into the experience of citizenship between age cohorts.

1.9

Finally, it must also be noted that the UK’s lack of a written constitution has played a role in the states of ambiguity and ambivalence that characterises the contemporary reception of citizenship. Serious consideration must be given to the formal codification our constitution and citizens’ rights and responsibilities.

8 September 2017

Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers (Usdaw) – written evidence (CCE0163)

The Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers (Usdaw) is the UK's fifth biggest trade Union with over 435,000 members. Membership has increased by more than 17% in the last five years and by nearly a third in the last decade. Most Usdaw members work in the retail sector, but the Union also has many members in transport, distribution, food manufacturing, chemicals and other trades.

As a democratic, membership organisation, Usdaw seeks to develop and support its diverse membership to be engaged in their workplaces and wider communities. Usdaw operates a Political Fund which was endorsed by a 93% yes vote from our members in our most recent Political Fund ballot in 2013, which gives the Union a strong mandate for political campaigning to help support our industrial objectives.

The following response has been compiled to reflect the views and concerns of Usdaw members. The response is in line with policy set at our Annual Delegate Meeting (ADM) which is the Union's sovereign body. All Usdaw members have the opportunity to put forward proposed policies to the ADM, and these policies are then voted on by representatives from workplaces around the country. Usdaw works hard to ensure that our members and representatives are engaged in the work we do.

Questions

Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be enforced/monitored?

Any moves to further build reciprocity into the relationship between citizen and state should be approached carefully. In terms of welfare, for example, so-called 'workfare' initiatives have in the past displaced retail workers and undermined terms and conditions for existing staff, where they could be replaced with cheap labour.

Usdaw believes that all citizens, or permanent residents with leave to remain for two or more years, should have the same formal rights. Further, asylum seekers should not be held in prisons or detention centres, as such treatment falls short of human rights conventions and does not provide the groundwork for a positive relationship with the state. Asylum seekers should have the right to work if able to do so, with temporary work permits provided for those able to work whilst awaiting processing or appeals against deportation.

Rights and responsibilities should apply not only to private individuals, but to businesses also, including multinationals trading in the UK. These companies benefit from the National Health Service that keeps their employees healthy, from the infrastructure like roads and rail that allows them to ship their goods, from the education provided by the state to all children, and statutory maternity and paternity pay to name a few examples. Tax avoidance, that allows businesses to take all this from the national pot while not putting anything back in, must be clamped down on. Employers who do more than meeting the basic minimum of paying their full tax, should be eligible for incentives such as tax relief for things such as providing on-site childcare facilities and educational opportunities for their employees.

Do current laws encourage political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The Government should be doing all it can to encourage lawful voting and ensure a high turnout.

There is certainly a case to be made for lowering the voting age, which should be explored further. The Scottish Independence Referendum allowed 16 and 17 year olds to vote, with turnout among those voting for the first time at the age of 16 and 17 at around 75 percent. Following this, the Scottish Parliament voted to lower the voting age to 16 in Scottish parliamentary and local elections. In the 2017 General Election, a far higher youth turnout was seen than in previous years.

Following the move from household to individual voter registration, Usdaw is concerned about the current complexity of the registration process and the number of people who have dropped off the electoral register. Further, manifesto proposals from the Conservative Party commit to an increased tightening of the registration process which will mean ID will need to be taken to the polling station. Usdaw believes these measures are not a proportionate response to the very low levels of electoral fraud reported by the Electoral Commission and is concerned that this will disproportionately impact our lowest paid members who may not have or be able to afford a passport or driving license.

There is concern about whether EU nationals currently living in the UK will lose their right to vote in local elections following Brexit. We believe this needs to be looked into urgently to ensure that as many people as possible are able to have their say on local services that affect them.

Finally, Usdaw believes that First Past The Post (FPTP) is the fairest and most transparent process of voting and would be opposed to any move towards changing the electoral system to proportional representation in local or Westminster elections.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

It is the responsibility of the Government to ensure a socially inclusive curriculum for all. There should be no exemptions under the curriculum for any school-type, including faith schools, academies, free schools, foundation schools, grammar schools, grant-maintained or private schools.

Citizenship classes should be compulsory, and provide young people with the framework to be responsible and engaged citizens. This should include information on practical matters such as taxes, mortgages, how to vote and rights at work. The national curriculum should include political education, including trade union studies and/or history. This would equip young people with the skills and knowledge to be active citizens and encourage them to become engaged in workplace and civic democracy.

Religious Education in schools can combat misunderstanding, discrimination and prejudice, including Islamophobia and antisemitism, and may help foster greater understanding and sensitivity between communities where there is considerable diversity and difference. Further, Usdaw supports British Sign Language becoming part of the curriculum and available to study for GCSE. This would support integration between the hearing and Deaf communities and allow Deaf people a greater space in public life. The curriculum should also include first aid education, which would benefit the whole of society and give people the skills and confidence to act as effective 'good Samaritans' in an emergency. Sex and Relationship Education (SRE) should be statutory and LGBT inclusive to ensure education on LGBT equality starts early and tackles homophobia, biphobia and transphobia.

Usdaw believes, however, that education does not end when someone leaves school, and that far greater emphasis should be placed on lifelong learning, adult and workplace education. Government should actively listen to the needs of employers and trade unions to provide more funding for lifelong learning, allowing employees the opportunity to gain recognised qualifications.

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Civil society organisations, including trade unions, are in many respects constrained by The Transparency of Lobbying, Non-party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014. This limits the ability to promote civic engagement by placing onerous restrictions on matters such as spending and campaigning on political issues - including non-partisan causes - which is a particular burden in relation to staff spending and constituency regulations. Further, Section 11 of the Trade Union Act 2016, which relates to trade union political funds, is likely to severely curtail unions' abilities to politically campaign due to overly restrictive rules on opting-in to the fund. Usdaw believes Parliament should seek to repeal or heavily amend this legislation to allow unions and charities to campaign, and support member campaigns, on political issues.

Governmental institutions should, as far as possible, give people a stake in their own communities. There should be greater awareness of, and appropriate funding for, Credit Unions to be set up in local communities. These initiatives provide ethical and democratically accountable financial support for groups which may otherwise struggle to fund their projects or get them off the ground. Ring-fenced funding should be available to local councils to allow them to keep open community spaces which can be rented for free, or a nominal fee, for community groups and campaigns.

Finally, Usdaw believes that the Patron Saint days should be made additional statutory Bank Holidays by the Government. The UK has some of the lowest levels of public holidays in Europe. These extra days would allow people more time to spend with their families and communities. Volunteering in the community could be particularly encouraged as a Government and charitable sector joint initiative on these extra days, from people who might not ordinarily be able to find the time.

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their status be strengthened?

The values all of us who live in Britain should share and support are diversity, equality, respect, and justice.

Diversity means celebrating that which makes people different - be it food, music, cultural traditions and so on - and finding areas of common ground. Interfaith and intercommunity organisations are already doing important work here which should be commended and supported. Local and national government should invest in, and support, initiatives which promote dialogue and understanding between different groups in society to prevent tensions and promote co-operation and events which allow people to learn about the traditions of others.

Justice means the public being able to have faith in institutions, support for victims, and no-one being priced out of seeking justice. The Supreme Court judgement in R (Unison) v Lord Chancellor makes plain that 'Access to the courts is not, therefore, of value only to the particular individuals involved [...] the idea that bringing a claim before a court or a tribunal is a purely private activity, and the related idea that such claims provide no broader social benefit, are demonstrably untenable'. If rights cannot be enforced, those rights are rendered meaningless. This is particularly pertinent with regards to the changes to judicial reviews, which is the legal measure for private citizens to hold the Government to account, as part of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 - including changes to the cost capping orders. Further changes to small claims court fees are expected as part of the Civil Liability Bill, which are not encouraging and are potentially unlawful in light of the tribunal fees judgement in that they may similarly be considered to restrict access to justice. Usdaw opposes any measures which make justice saleable, including the cuts to Legal Aid, and the fees to lodge a claim in the Small Claims courts which can be as high as £10,000. Such measures put justice out of the reach of ordinary people.

Police cuts have meant that community police have fewer links to the communities they serve, and the police are less visible 'on the beat'. Usdaw's research as part of the 'Respect for Shopworkers' campaign clearly shows that far too many people do not report incidents of violence or abuse from customers, and there is concern that when people do report it, that the police may be struggling to respond effectively to incidents that take place in store.

Equality means everyone being able to participate in society. There are a number of threats to equality, particularly in relation to internet harassment and a resurgence of violent white-supremacist groups. The Government should work much more closely with internet service providers to tackle the problem of targeted harassment online, which particularly affects women, LGBT people (transgender people especially), and black, Asian and minority ethnic people, with the intention of driving them out of online spaces.

Why do so many communities and groups feel 'left behind'? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

One of the biggest barriers to active citizenship is insecure, low paid work, particularly where there are no fixed hours to allow people to plan their lives outside of work. This cuts across different groups, and is particularly acute for parents and carers, and those doing shift work which alternates between days and nights. The so-called 'gig economy' is exacerbating this issue. This could be addressed by the introduction of a right to guaranteed hours representing 'normal' hours over a 12 week reference period, and asking the Low Pay Commission to review the implementation of the recommendation from Matthew Taylor's Review of Modern Employment Practices for an increased rate of the National Minimum Wage for non-guaranteed hours. Further, Usdaw is clear that the 'Swedish Derogation' loophole in the Agency Workers Regulations needs to be closed in line with the recommendations of the Taylor review.

Austerity has meant that many community spaces, not seen as a funding priority by local councils when compared to, for example, social care and local transport, have closed. This includes facilities such as youth clubs, sports facilities and libraries where the public have been able to interact. Further, community pubs have been closing at an alarming rate. The closure of these facilities in their community, or reduction in available programmes, provides fewer opportunities for people to get involved. This has had a particularly big impact in rural areas, with the slow withdrawal of services such as local banks and pubs, corner shops and post offices etc, being compounded by the loss of publically owned facilities. The Government should provide greater support to community interest companies and co-operatives, which allow many of these facilities to not only remain open, but provide a greater democratic input by the communities they serve.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

17. Outside of the home, work is one of the places that people are likely to spend the most of their time and therefore diversity in the workplace is a hugely important factor in normalising relations between different communities and allowing negative stereotypes to be dispelled through experience. This is particularly vital since the European Referendum, which saw a large spike in hate-crimes arguably as a result of negative portrayals of migrants and refugees in the media and overall tone of the debate.

18.

The Government should abandon the philosophy of voluntarism being adequate to counteract labour market discrimination and introduce legislation that places public and private sector employers under a duty to promote equality and to monitor the impact of such a duty. In practical terms, this requires the amendment of the Equality Act 2010 to introduce a private sector equality duty equivalent to the public sector equality duty. The Government should also legislate to make employers responsible for third party harassment of their workers, by customers, clients and contractors, following the recommendations of the TUC's 'The Cost of Being Out at Work' and 'Let's Talk About Racism' reports.

19.

20. The effectiveness of workplace equality policies is dependent upon employers collecting and analysing data about the composition of their workforce and the effect their policies and practices have on different groups of employees. The Equality and Human Rights Commission and Acas advise that employer equality policies should be regularly monitored and reviewed to ensure effectiveness. Usdaw proposes that the Gender Pay Gap Reporting regulations 2017 are extended to determine the nature and degree of discrimination at work suffered by Black, disabled, LGBT and women workers. Following the recommendations of the TUC 'Let's Talk About Racism' report, employers should work with trade unions to establish targets and develop positive action measures to address racial inequalities in the workplace. Aspirational targets should be set for diversity within organisations, with progress measured against these targets annually.

21.

22. Employers should promote a culture of respect for diversity, including reasonable accommodation of individuals' rights to wear religious symbols, to allow employees to bring their 'whole selves' to work. For those who celebrate festivals and cultural events which are not recognised by statutory Bank Holidays (including Christmas and Easter), there should be greater awareness of the significance of these days and the importance of flexible working patterns to accommodate them where appropriate. Guidance should be issued to all employers about accommodating the religious and cultural practices of employees, such as observance of Ramadan, without negatively impacting those not taking part in these observances.

23.

How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

The ability to communicate with others is one of the most important elements of treating social isolation of first and second generation immigrants and promoting cohesion. It affects the ability to access services, such as the NHS, and to meet others outside of their own home and cultural community. Funding cuts from the Skills and Funding Agency for ESOL provision have meant long waiting lists in many areas to access courses. Eligibility is a further issue, with people in work denied the opportunity to take part in Government funded courses - all too often this work, due to language barriers, is precarious and low-skilled employment which does not allow for the disposable income necessary to self-fund the course and escape this poverty trap. The problem then becomes generational, with parents unable to pass on English skills to their children, leaving their children further behind their peers when they start school.

Surviving funding for functional skills such as English and Maths is currently being cannibalised by apprenticeships, with little support available for other standalone qualifications. The need and the demand is clearly there, but the funding is not. For Usdaw training courses in functional skills, consistently 20-25% of learners speak English as a second language. Usdaw has gone from providing 750 ESOL courses in the period 2010-2012, to 257 courses in the period 2012-2014, to virtually none at present. This is not for a lack of appetite for such courses, or because demand has reduced, but because of the lack of funding available to provide them. A return of Government funding for ESOL to pre-2009 levels should be considered an urgent priority.

In the workplace, poor English speaking skills are a potential health and safety risk not only to the individual, but to colleagues. If employees have difficulty understanding instructions or notices, particularly in sectors like retail distribution, warehousing and production where heavy machinery is used, simple errors can be catastrophic. Employers should have a duty to identify and support employees whose English skills need improvement with specific ESOL training and paid release to attend classes where necessary.

Summary

Nurturing civic engagement requires a holistic approach from the Government to empower citizens to become engaged in their communities. Swinging cuts across the public sector and in local government have meant fewer opportunities for people to become engaged citizens, if they do not have the skills, knowledge and motivation to try to establish their own independent networks. In some areas, this means activity is duplicated at a low level by various groups, without support to link their activities together, pool resources and have a greater impact. Restrictions introduced by Parliament on civic society organisations such as charities and trade unions have constrained the ability of these organisations to educate and empower their members and supporters to become engaged citizens. The labour market can also act as a demotivating factor in civic participation, by not allowing the flexibility with regards to time and finances to get involved.

Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers (Usdaw) – written evidence (CCE0163)

8 September 2017

United Nations Association UK (ANA-UK) – written evidence (CCE0135)

UNA-UK's evidence submission offers answers to eight of the questions put forward by the Committee. If you require further information regarding any aspect of this submission please do not hesitate to get in touch.

What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1. UNA-UK is Britain's only charity dedicated to building support for an effective United Nations. Over the past 70 years we have built a network of members, local branches, youth groups and partner organisations in all four nations of the UK. This network is diverse, encompassing people from all walks of life who believe that the major challenges we face can only be solved through international cooperation; and who subscribe to the values of the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. While our supporters' interests vary greatly – from famine to nuclear weapons, climate change to cyber security – they share a sense of global citizenship, which they see as an integral part of their identity and value system, as well as a responsibility to discharge.⁸⁴⁵
2. Citizenship in the 21st century does not stop at our borders. We can no longer say what happens “over there” does not affect us. Challenges such as climate change do not respect borders and require international cooperation. The same can be said of traditionally domestic issues like employment, thanks to our global supply chain. Today, a civil war can have consequences far beyond the country's shores, by fostering extremism and organised crime, by forcing people to flee their homes, or by disrupting economic production in the surrounding region. Disasters like floods can affect people across the globe, through food shortages and price hikes for instance.
3. The line between national and international interests is disappearing. At an event hosted by UNA-UK in May, UN Secretary-General António Guterres said: *“We see more and more irrational behaviours and nationalism is one of those irrational behaviours in the sense that it's not through nationalism that we are going to solve our problems. We are going to solve our problems through dialogue, mutual understanding and international cooperation”*⁸⁴⁶

⁸⁴⁵ See the findings of a survey carried out as part of UNA-UK's Stand For campaign on British values: www.una.org.uk/news/britons-tell-una-uk-what-they-stand. The survey sought to determine the extent to which people expected the government to abide by their personal values. It was conducted twice – once with our supporters and once by the pollster ComRes on a representative sample of the British public.

⁸⁴⁶ Excerpt of Secretary-General Antonio Guterres' London speech, 10 May 2017, hosted by UNA-UK. Mr Guterres' full remarks on citizenship and identity have been included as Annex A

4. The ease by which information, people and ideas cross political boundaries has enabled disparate communities to campaign together for progress. 21st century citizenship needs an open civic space to facilitate such engagement, as well as governments that recognise its value. This should include opportunities for genuine public consultation on global issues alongside efforts to improve the global literacy, including understanding of institutions like the UN, which offer our best hope of solving problems that transcend borders.
5. Identity is a question of personal choice. Many of our supporters see the label “global citizen” as empowering and unifying when raising their voices on global issues or seeking support for causes they hold dear. The concept of global citizenship is important because it acknowledges our shared responsibility to address challenges in our increasingly interconnected world.

Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

6. Providing a supportive and enabling environment for global citizens is vital. It is equally important to recognise that the role of government is not to be prescriptive when it comes to identity – an individual’s identity can be multiple, complex and overlapping. Public figures, particularly politicians speaking on behalf of the Government, should take special care to acknowledge the complexity of individuals’ system of identities. Our supporters were deeply concerned by the Prime Minister’s remarks to the Conservative Party Conference in September 2016: “If you believe you are a citizen of the world, you are a citizen of nowhere.”⁸⁴⁷ Whatever her intentions, these comments were interpreted as an expression of insularity. Instead, ministers should make vigorously the patriotic case for internationalism.
7. In December 2016, UNA-UK commissioned a poll which demonstrated that the British public have internationalist instincts, but that recent political trends have made them wary of an explicitly ‘global’ political agenda.⁸⁴⁸ The results showed that British values are closely aligned with those enshrined in the UN Charter. However, people’s views on international issues do not always reflect these values. Moreover, they do not expect their government to act in line with them. This implies a failure to articulate a vision of Britishness compatible with the positive internationalist role Britain seeks for itself on the world stage.

⁸⁴⁷ Prime Minister Teresa May, 5 October 2016. See: www.standard.co.uk/news/politics/theresa-may-sparks-twitter-backlash-over-citizen-of-the-world-remark-in-conservative-party-a3361701.html

⁸⁴⁸ UNA-UK worked with professional pollsters, ComRes, on research into the personal values of the British public. See: www.una.org.uk/news/britons-tell-una-uk-what-they-stand

8. The Government should seek to set out such a vision. An important first step would be to signal the importance of global citizenship, global cooperation and global institutions, in particular the United Nations. The UN should be a source of national pride, as an exemplar of British international leadership and of British pragmatism in creating a mechanism to advance national and global interests in tandem.
9. Civil society, educators and the Government can all play a role in supporting an outward-looking patriotism that takes pride in the UK playing by the rules on the world stage and investing in the international system the UK did so much to create – a British Prime Minister was at the forefront of establishing the UN; a Briton served as its first Acting Secretary-General; and British lawyers helped write the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. Celebrating our contribution to the international system, and recognising how vital that system is to our security and prosperity, would promote understanding that our national interest lies in a multilateral future.

Do current laws encourage active political engagement?

10. We will focus our answer on the Transparency of Lobbying, Non-party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014 (“Lobbying Act”), which we believe has discouraged active political engagement and which, as we set out in a letter with civil society partners,⁸⁴⁹ has had a chilling effect on civil society’s ability to engage in the national political debate. This view was echoed by the UN Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association. In a statement on 21 April 2016, he noted: *“The Lobbying Act has had a chilling effect on the work of charities during election periods, with many opting for silence on issues they work on.”*⁸⁵⁰
11. Civil society has a crucial role to play in political engagement. It informs and deepens the debate, it mobilises the public on matters of substance, and it provides for a free exchange of ideas between policy makers and the public. UNA-UK recommends that the Lobbying Act is repealed or amended to ensure that civil society can provide this vital public service.

What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

⁸⁴⁹ Guardian article on charity sector concern over Lobbying Act, 6 June 2017:

www.theguardian.com/politics/2017/jun/06/chilling-lobbying-act-stifles-democracy-write-charities-party-chiefs

⁸⁵⁰ Statement by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association, 21 April 2016. See:

www.ohchr.org/EN/NewsEvents/Pages/DisplayNews.aspx?NewsID=19854&LangID=E

12. UNA-UK was a strong supporter of the inclusion of citizenship education in national curricula in the UK. At the time, we made the case that teaching about the UN should form part of this education, and we have since lobbied twice – successfully – against the removal of references to the UN in national curriculum for England and Wales.⁸⁵¹
13. We feel that this provides a good starting point for helping young people to understand that in our modern world, with its increasingly porous national borders, the role and function of international organisations is increasingly relevant to our lives. We would like to see the curriculum further developed to explore the role of the UN, and the UK within it, in tackling issues such as trade, migration and cyber security.
14. Our UN teaching materials provide further information and ideas for developing the curriculum, including through practical exercises like Model United Nations and local action.⁸⁵²

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

15. One of the primary ways in which the Government and Parliament can support civic engagement is by making it more worthwhile. This could be achieved through more, and more meaningful public consultation exercises, particularly when it comes to foreign policy, as well as support for greater public engagement with international organisations, particularly by young people. UNA-UK's April 2017 report "Keeping Britain Global" contains recommendations for Government action to deepen public understanding on international issues⁸⁵³, and a second report, published in January 2017, details practical steps for strengthening civil society engagement with the United Nations.⁸⁵⁴
16. The Government can also support civil society organisations through the language it uses. Referring to the work of civil society organisations working in areas such as human rights and international development in terms of civic engagement, national pride and British values would help create greater support for these organisations.

⁸⁵¹ In 2014, the updated version of the National Curriculum in 2014 included teaching about the UN. In earlier drafts of the curriculum, the UN was omitted. See: www.democraticlife.org.uk/2013/09/18/citizenship-is-here-to-stay-reactions-to-the-dfe-final-national-curriculum-for-2014/

⁸⁵² See: www.una.org.uk/get-involved/learn-and-teach/un-matters-teaching-pack

⁸⁵³ UNA-UK's Keeping Britain Global report was released in April 2017. Top-level recommendations have been included as Annex B. For a full copy of the report, see: www.una.org.uk/file/11726/download?token=Dm3ArkGS

⁸⁵⁴ See: www.una.org.uk/file/11621/download?token=agw75Vy5

What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

17. UNA-UK champions the principles that underpin the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and believe these principles provide inspiration and common ground to all people, whether or not they have a British passport. Our research has demonstrated that these values are broadly shared by people in the UK (see footnote 2).
18. These values are coming under threat from the increasingly negative debate on human rights protections in the UK, which should be considered against the backdrop of a sharp increase in the number of racially or religiously aggravated crimes recorded following the EU referendum.⁸⁵⁵ Widespread misinformation and damaging rhetoric on issues such as immigration, in the media⁸⁵⁶ and from political parties is undermining the ability of communities to engage in the debate about the future of their own rights.^{857 858 859} There has also been a rise in inflammatory language used by sections of the media to attack individuals and institutions that represent what are generally held to be quintessentially British values, such as the rule of law.
19. UNESCO's Promoting Tolerance initiative makes clear the link between teaching on universal human rights and combatting intolerance, reinforcing the need to tackle this issue through education as well as advocacy work at a national level.⁸⁶⁰
20. More joined-up government thinking on citizenship could help avoid pronouncements that represent a clear threat to British values and which could lead to disengagement with UK politics.⁸⁶¹ Over time, disengagement can become a security risk by leading to alienation, polarisation or, more simply, widespread public disaffection and apathy. Conversely, an informed and engaged public is a security asset that can support resilience at the community level and activity participate in decisions put to them on the UK's future prosperity and security.

⁸⁵⁵ See: www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/crime/brexit-hate-crimes-racism-eu-referendum-vote-attacks-increase-police-figures-official-a7358866.html

⁸⁵⁶ See: www.theguardian.com/media/greenslade/2016/sep/16/the-new-european-on-the-brainwashing-of-britain-over-immigration

⁸⁵⁷ See: www.thetimes.co.uk/article/anti-migration-rhetoric-hurt-uk-reputation-f2tv6v83q

⁸⁵⁸ See: www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/ukip-accused-of-scare-mongering-in-anti-immigration-poster-campaign-ahead-of-european-elections-9273100.html

⁸⁵⁹ See: newsocialist.org.uk/labour-immigration/

⁸⁶⁰ See: www.unesco.org/new/en/social-and-human-sciences/themes/fight-against-discrimination/promoting-tolerance/

⁸⁶¹ Recent examples of government spokespeople engaging in rhetoric which undermines the value placed on the rules-based international order, and thus undermining the notion of Britishness are contained in ANNEX C

21. The Government could also send a powerful signal by ensuring its conduct reflects British values. This is a central theme of our reports “Leading by example” (on human rights)⁸⁶² and “Keeping Britain Global”⁸⁶³. In brief, we would like to see the Cabinet Office take a greater responsibility for ensuring that the words and actions of all ministers and all departments work to strengthen the UK’s commitment to the international system of rules and norms that are so important for the continued health of the country.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other?

22. Civic engagement leads to better-informed citizens and encourages them to have more diverse networks and experiences. This, in turn, promotes social cohesion. This is one of the aims of UNA-UK’s “global citizens” programme, which uses a common interest in global issues to bring people together and stimulate action in schools, workplaces and communities around the country.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

23. Promoting a positive, internationalist vision of British citizenship – and translating this into action – is one of UNA-UK’s core objectives. To further this objective, we have run a number of initiatives, including events bringing together young people and policy-makers, teaching materials on global issues⁸⁶⁴ and outreach to encourage public participation in UN and Government consultations. UNA-UK also used to support British youth delegates to the United Nations, by running the selection process, providing training and mentoring, facilitating national youth consultations and organising post-trip activities.

ANNEX A: UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres’ full remarks on the subject of citizenship and identity, speaking in London on 10 May at an event organised by UNA-UK. (For a film of the event, see: <https://youtu.be/r03uZJtmP30>)

“The most important contribution that Europe has given to the to the world civilization has been the values of the Enlightenment but unfortunately these values are being put into question today; tolerance the primacy of reason; we see more and more irrational behaviours and nationalism is one of those irrational behaviours in the sense that it's not through nationalism that we are going to solve our problems. We are going to solve our problems through dialogue, mutual understanding and international cooperation.

⁸⁶² See: www.una.org.uk/leading-example-practical-proposals-uk-action-bolster-un-human-rights-pillar

⁸⁶³ The top-level recommendations of UNA-UK’s April 2017 report “Keeping Britain Global” have been included as Annex B. For the full report, see: www.una.org.uk/keeping-britain-global

⁸⁶⁴ See footnote 9

“But it's not probably nationalism is nationalistic xenophobia, it's anti-semitism it's anti-muslim hatred. We are seeing the development of these kind of feelings in our society and it's something we need to fight but it's not enough to fight it ideologically. It's not enough to say this is wrong. We need to look into the root causes of that and many of those root causes are in the fact that I mentioned when I was speaking a few minutes ago the fact that many people felt left behind, many people felt that globalization has undermined their interests then an irrational approach to what we have witnessed in recent times in relation to the massive movements of population to the idea that we can be threatening our identity that foreigners are coming and I going to change earth and the only way to solve this problem is investing in societies investing in the social cohesion of society the inclusiveness of societies making in society are all multi-ethnic multi-religious multicultural and the British society is a fantastic example of this I mean you have in this room we can see that expression in a very eloquent way

“But it would be a mistake to think that harmony can happen spontaneously and naturally. An investment is necessary to make each group feel that its identity is respected but to make also each group feels that they belong to the community they are part of the community and are bound by the values of the community as a whole. So I think that in our societies there is still a lot to be done in order to make sure that we address the root causes of these kind of behaviours with aggressive nationalism, different forms of radicalization against these or that group, this is something in which we need to think in the way the software of our society is organized and in the way you create the conditions for difference to be understood the difference to be respected and also those that are different to respect it to each other”

ANNEX B: Top-line recommendations from UNA-UK's April 2017 report: “Keeping Britain Global”. (For a full copy of the report, see:

www.una.org.uk/file/11726/download?token=Dm3ArkGS)

The UK should:

- Develop a cross-departmental strategy for strengthening the UN and the rules-based international system that it serves, with a current focus on supporting the new Secretary-General – including by championing UN effectiveness through merit-based senior appointments, and on seeking to keep British allies engaged, active and coordinated at the Organisation
- Acknowledge the extent to which Britain's own conduct affects the health of the international system and the standing of international law. The Prime Minister, Foreign Secretary and senior civil servants should take responsibility across Government for ensuring that statements and policies that could undermine the international system are prevented, including by ensuring spokespeople refrain from inflammatory, anti-internationalist rhetoric

- Deepen public and civil society engagement on foreign policy issues, including by enhancing the Global Britain Fund, to support educational and outreach programmes that demonstrate the value of international organisations to UK citizens
- Recognise the central role that must be played by UK diplomatic networks if Britain is to sustain or expand its influence on the world stage. This should include maintaining its 0.7 per cent GNI on Official Development Assistance, and increasing funding to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office with an emphasis on operations that support work at the UN-level as the UK seeks to justify its continued place on the Security Council and operate outside of the European Union

ANNEX C: Recent examples of government spokespeople and back-bench politicians engaging in rhetoric which undermines the value placed on the rules-based international order, and thus undermining the notion of Britishness

- Prime Minister Theresa May’s promise to abolish human rights laws if they “get in the way” of attempts to combat terrorism.
- Work and Pensions secretary Damian Green dismissing a report of the UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) as “patronising and offensive”.
- Prime Minister Theresa May characterising attempts to apply international laws to British military actions as “activist, left-wing human rights lawyers [who] harangue and harass the bravest of the brave”.
- Comments on the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention (WGAD), with former Foreign Secretary (now Chancellor) saying they had made "a ridiculous finding", and attacking the credibility of the experts involved, and former Foreign Minister Hugo Swire mocking the Working Group on twitter.
- Philip Davies MP’s racially charged attack on the UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association in which he said (of the Kenyan Special Rapporteur), “this lecture on human rights by somebody from Africa is staggering. He should clear off back to his own continent to look at some of the grotesque abuses of human rights that take place on a daily basis led by people like Robert Mugabe.” The Government failed to defend the rapporteur in an official response.
- Stewart Jackson MP describing the UN's special rapporteur on housing as a "loopy Brazilian leftie with no evidence masquerading as a serious UN official". She was also referred to in the media as a "Brazil nut" and "a dabbler in witchcraft who offered an animal sacrifice to Marx”, yet the official Government response was not to defend the rapporteur but to state that they found her conclusions “staggering”.

- The rhetoric from the Government on the European Convention on Human Rights.

8 September 2017

Universal Peace Federation – written evidence (CCE0177)

- 1) At Universal Peace Federation (UPF) we have various projects and programmes spanning across many areas of peace-building and making concerted efforts of bringing people together from various backgrounds, cultures, religions and coming from different walks of life and professions. The idea being that once we get to know one another, we find that we have a lot in common. We then provide an equal platform for all to discuss topics of common interest.
- 2) One of the major areas of interest is “Youth Empowerment & Involvement in Society and Politics”. For a decade we have been holding an important annual event, the “Young Achievers Award”.
- 3) Young adults are recommended by UPF's UPF Ambassador for Peace network from its interfaith and other contacts from diverse backgrounds. We then select 10 - 12 young people who have contributed greatly to their communities and uphold them as role models. They have a chance to speak at the Houses of Parliament about their project before their Member of Parliament presents them with a UPF “Young Achievers Award”. This introduces them to Parliament and their constituency Member of Parliament as well as encouraging them to continue their efforts.
- 4) A couple of years ago, young achievers, who were so inspired by each other, approached us to ask if they could meet regularly at UPF offices. We started by having ad-hoc meetings about 18 months ago which were very well received by the young achievers as well as other young people wishing to join the group.
- 5) The young achievers, several times, come to learn from each other and become inspired/encouraged to campaign and lobby for things that interest them (e.g. human rights, climate change, helping refugees, etc.). This has resulted in a group of young people who we support to work together for the development of an altruistic attitude and foster public mindedness. Some who regularly visited the refugee camp in Calais inspired others in that group to go with them.
- 6) This developing group meets fairly regularly (at least six times a year) with a focus on providing activities for other young people and they share their experiences with friends thereby educating them about politics and Parliament.
- 7) Universal Peace Federation, as a Partner of Parliament Week, will be taking this engagement further during this year's Parliament Week on 14th November at the Houses of Parliament. The idea is to have a form of “Speed Pitching” by the young people to a pair of Parliamentarians from different parties who will answer the questions raised based on topics of interest (e.g. housing, taxation, NHS, education, etc.). Groups of five young people (20 in total) will rotate through pairs of Parliamentarians (4 pairs in total) grouped by topic in order to ask questions with 10 minutes per rotation - giving each Parliamentarian around 3 minutes to reply. This will allow for at least two questions per rotation. One group representative of the young people (four in total) will later give a response of their impressions from the answers given by the Parliamentarians. Afterwards, Q&A and comments will be welcome from the audience. In this manner, they are introduced to more Parliamentarians and have some experience of the democratic process.

- 8) A few years ago, the topic of Parliament Week given to us was “Youth Engagement in Politics”. Since then we have carried on with events discussing this whereby young people and Parliamentarians discuss various ways of furthering youth engagement in Politics. Furthermore we have partnered with and continue to support an organisation led by young people, who directly teach political literacy to youth in schools. We are always encouraging young adults to learn how to teach political literacy to help our partners.
- 9) As partners to Parliament Week, every year we are taking part and bringing more numbers of people, including youth, to Parliament and our success has been recognised. We were awarded a Certificate of Achievement last December by the speaker of both Houses of Parliament regarding Parliament Week.
- 10) Our planned activity for Parliament Week this year is in collaboration with the International Association of Parliamentarians for Peace (IAPP). UPF together with IAPP also holds events on the theme of Prevention of Radicalisation in which we invite parliamentarians, religious leaders, experts on radicalisation and young leaders to debate this topic. We aim to get 50% youth participation as young people are so very important regarding prevention of radicalisation.
- 11) Regarding minimising the isolation and exclusion of youth in general, we have worked on putting together a major programme, for over a year now. We formed a Consortium of people of diverse backgrounds and multi-faith in nature as well as representing people young and old of various abilities and coming from different professions. The idea is for young people to learn to get on with one another appreciating each other’s culture and faith and understand what we mean by British Values. The challenge of getting to know understand and even like one another is based requires a tried and tested Residential programme of around 10 days, when young people work together on a service project – this will help them to see the good in one another and see the value of sharing a common cause. Full details of the project can be sent to you. We are seeking funding in the coming months. We have given the name of ITLAS, Integration through Learning and Service.
- 12) We also offer courses of Good Governance & Character Education, periodically & Youth Leadership workshops/seminar annually.
- 13) We would very much like to have an opportunity of meeting you in person and attempt to reply some of the questions raised in your link, based in our experience and we would very much like to explain further the details of the ITLAS Project, besides other programmes like the Youth leadership one.
- 14) Universal Peace Federation has a set of principles to promote greater harmony and positive contributions among the different communities that make the fabric of living in the UK. A slogan of UPF is that humankind is one family of races, nations and religions etc.. It implies that we are an interconnected human family with familial obligations to each other. We endeavour to make partnerships with diverse groups of faith, nationality and culture. Thus we have had a large number of meetings in Parliament or in our Headquarters with those partners.

- 15) These included celebrating several religious holy festivals together that occurred at a similar time. Black History Month, the 60th Anniversary of signing the ANC Charter, Africa Day and hosting former President of Malawi, Dr. Joyce Banda, or Yvonne Chaka Chaka are some of the African diaspora events that have been convened under UPP's and our partner's banners.
- 16) Another was the gathering of the representatives of Chinese groups based in the UK in a Parliament Committee Room hosted by our Patron Virendra Sharma MP in order to form an umbrella body that could reflect Chinese community in the UK views and concerns to the Government or to UK political parties. As a partner we could support by arranging a venue that assisted the meeting while the substance of the discussions was led by our partner group.
- 17) A Mongolian Professional Women's group, Mothers of Congo, Roadworks Media, Justina Mutale Foundation and groups that highlighted the Prevention of Sexual Violence in Conflict for example were all partners with whom we worked to raise awareness of issues that were not our speciality. The long term result of these varied activities is that when we convene a United Nation's Day programme such as International Day of Women, Holocaust Day, Human Rights Day etc. we can gather a diverse group of ethnicities and backgrounds. This makes a wide dialogue of perspectives possible that is valuable for mutual inter-community understanding. This is important given the influence that international tensions have on the relevant diaspora groups here in the UK.
- 18) By inviting people to participate in a consideration of an issue in Parliament it enables them to change their thinking about the political process and realise that those who are involved in politics are not so different from themselves. At least one young lady told the Baroness who was hosting an event on Women's Empowerment that she was going to think about a career in politics after her experience speaking at one of our events.

8 September 2017

University of Hertfordshire – written evidence (CCE0248)

Introduction

Academic and professional staff at the University of Hertfordshire have grouped together to submit the evidence below. A list of contributors is included at the end of this document.

The evidence reflects opinions formed through academic research and personal experience. Their expertise covers a range of issues, including research into well-being and housing, experience working in education in citizenship engagement and experience as an elected official. They also have personal experience of engaging in local government and the National Citizen Service. All contributors to this evidence share a belief in the importance of civic engagement.

The range of their expertise demonstrates the wide variety of different circumstances that can impact on active citizenship. If the Committee would like more information on any aspect of the evidence below, we will be happy to provide more detail.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

For members of the University involved in civic activities outside of their work, citizenship and civic engagement reflected being engaged in society, whether that was acted through your work, your personal life or in wider civic activities such as voting, volunteering or campaigning. It was felt to reflect connection and active engagement.

For researchers whose work is focused on communities, there was concern that the move to frame people as ‘consumers’ in their engagement with public services has led to the concept of the citizen has been largely expunged from policy discourse. The danger of this is in undermining the role of the active citizen, which necessitates involvement in – or the capacity to be involved in – the framing of public policy and services, and not just feeding back, as a ‘customer’, on the quality of goods/services on offer by administrators on behalf of politicians. So citizenship does matter, if people are to be empowered to influence public life, and identity matters also, as the consumer-citizen dilemma highlights.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

There was a general agreement among members of the University that citizenship ceremonies can be a positive marker of belonging. This is reinforced by the research that has been carried out by one group of academics at the University on how experiences can help create memories which have the potential to transform relationships. Their studies, suggesting that social events and festivals have a positive impact on individuals and relations with others, would seem to indicate that we should not underestimate the importance of ceremonies and events for the people involved if we are concerned with their positive recollections.

There was less universal agreement on encouraging pride in being or becoming British. It was recognised that there are many different aspects to being British that might make an individual proud of their citizenship. For some people this may be the monarchy, for others the achievements of sportspeople, the reactions of ordinary people to national events, or public institutions such as the NHS or BBC. But that one of the freedoms of British citizenship is that there is no requirement or expectation to be ‘proud’ of your nationality, and that this freedom is also something to value and consider carefully when we look to encourage national identity.

- 3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

There was no broad agreement on this questions, but members of the University did consider if there was a place for civic responsibility to be developed among young people in different ways, through education and encouraging volunteering.

- 4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

While there was disagreement on some aspects of this question, such as whether to lower the voting age, there was strong agreement that measures should be introduced to make voting easier, whether this was technological developments towards e-voting, making it easier to turn up and vote at any polling station, or moving election days to the weekend. There was also some support for making voting compulsory, as long as there is a ‘none of the above’ option.

- 5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Given that these respondents all work in a university, it should not come as a surprise that they all regard education as vital to encouraging citizenship, although there are differences of opinion as to how 'formal' this education needs to be. There was discomfort with the idea of 'good' citizenship, with 'active' being seen as a term that better expresses the desire for engagement, without pre-judging what form that engagement should take.

A researcher with experience of working with inner-city communities in a civic engagement context suggests that, in terms of citizenship education, too much attention is paid to formal schooling, teaching and learning. Research suggests that learning from experience as an active citizen, through non-formal, community-centred, collective processes of critical reflection on manifestations of active citizenship, are key to learning the skills required to be an effectively active citizen. However, opportunities for this type of learning are limited, as community activists (e.g. parent governors, tenant association representatives, patient consultative committee members) are often denied the time, space and resources to engage in such reflection.

Within formal education, it was pointed out that the principles of inclusivity and equality needed to be established within the practice of education (and other public institutions). If citizens are valued and supported in their education then they are more likely to succeed, making them more likely to become active citizens. For example, there are indications, including poor levels of literacy and numeracy, that certain learners are not being supported or equipped to develop fully and productively. If a society wishes to benefit from engaged citizens, then it needs to engage with them first.

With regards to civic education within school, it was felt that this should focus more on society than politics, giving young people the information they need to become engaged and be heard.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

Those members of the University who have had interactions with the National Citizen Service are very positive about it. The young people who have taken part have grown in confidence, independence, acceptance and understanding and participants have gone on to remain active citizens, engaging in volunteering. But there were frustrations that there is no continuation within the programme, such as former participants who wanted to return and mentor or support current participants but found themselves unable to do so. They wanted to be able to capture the intense four-week programme into something ongoing, and were frustrated by the organisation.

As the research previously mentioned indicates, memory creation can be positive for the well-being of individuals. A NCS citizenship ceremony, that acted as a rite of passage, could be a powerful and positive signal of belonging that stays with people.

However, it is important to note that formal programmes are not the only, or even the most effective forums for encouraging citizenship. Research suggests that citizenship, if it is learnt at all, is learnt in later life, informally, and through experience. For this reason, we need to be looking at how we can capitalise on the experiences of active citizens to inform and educate others (including younger people) on the realities of active citizenship/civic engagement. Work has previously been carried out by a researcher on residents groups working with schools to provide real-life case studies of citizenship in action. In translating their activities into the language and discourse of the Citizenship curriculum, the resident representatives began to see themselves, and talk about themselves, in terms of active citizens.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Members of staff who hold elected office in local government reflected that people can be excluded from attending formal civic events as they often fall during “office hours” which has in part contributed to the stereotype of civic leaders being of retirement age. Employers can help by allowing flexible working where possible but local governments need to be taking the lead on this by being mindful of the timing of their meetings. This applies not just to being a councillor on a committee, but also to any members of the public who are interested in the content of the meeting or indeed wish to make a representation in person.

Reflecting on technological changes within society, there was concern that people need to be better educated on the use of their data to ensure that trust between individuals and government is maintained. Ongoing education about what ‘consent’ means, how to exercise it, and on the rights and responsibilities of individuals and organisations will be critical to developing and maintaining relationships of trust between the individual as citizen and those collecting data, including government and government sponsored agencies. As a matter of course, individuals and communities should be seen as co-constructing and collaborating in designing the evolving digital society in which we increasingly live and act as citizens.

Researchers within the University wanted to emphasise that encouraging civic engagement cannot be undertaken lightly. Their research suggests that facilitating the engagement of disenfranchised or marginalised groups takes active, sustained and skilled communication, it cannot be enough to talk at people and tell them what is available. Instead, groups need to be brought into a conversation around society and their involvement in it.

- 8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

- 9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

Our researchers who looked at the positive impact of events to create memories, have also carried out research with older people aiming to tackle social isolation. When working with this group, they found that one of the key problems was tackling issues around public transport in rural areas. While keen to engage with events in their communities, this group felt isolated and that their independence was compromised by the lack of transport, which left them dependent on others to be able to take part in events.

One researcher at the University has highlighted the extent to which tenants in social housing are left behind, ignored, marginalised, stigmatised, under-valued. They highlight that ahead of the tragedy at Grenfell Tower the tenants, functioning as active citizens, had warned local policymakers and service providers of the very real danger of catastrophic fire. Their warning was ignored: they were left behind, in spite of their attempts at being active citizens. The emphasis placed on the housing and property market in the UK, and the pivotal role of homeownership in political campaigning, reinforces the marginalisation of tenants in social housing. For tenants to be empowered as citizens, the relationships between property/home ownership, social inequality, social values, and political interests will need to be examined.

Those within the University who had experience as representatives within local government highlighted that the use of the term ‘left behind’ was emotive and not always helpful, often linked to communities reaching for reasons why they had not received services or opportunities that they felt others were able to access. Using the term reinforces and increases the sense of separation between groups, not a good first step towards bringing them together.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

In approaching this question, members of the University were keen to reflect on how to allow individuals their own views while also approaching a sense of community. There was reflection on the suggestion by philosopher John Rawls of ‘overlapping consensus’, which involves citizens not having to put their personal identity on the back burner but finding ways of developing a broad consensus that draws upon their identity.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

There was consensus among members that some English language proficiency was important to be able to navigate and interact in society. But that this could only be expected if ESOL classes are well-funded and widely available.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Members of the University reached for a number of role models from Malala to sports teams (such as the 100m relay team who have Nigerian, Jamaican, Trinidadian and Iranian/Moroccan heritage). It was also highlighted that there are active cross-community projects within Northern Ireland which aim to integrate communities and promote cohesion.

Contributors

Dr John McCormack, Centre for Sustainable Communities

Denise Homes, Academic Registry

Kathleen Fetigan, Development and Alumni Relations

James Broach, Careers and Enterprise

Monica Kanwar, Occupational Health and Safety

Dr Allan Jepson, Hertfordshire Business School

Dr Paul Wernick, School of Computer Science

Adam Huntley, School of Health and Social Work

University of Kent Centre for Philanthropy – written evidence (CCE0006)

Overview

The Centre for Philanthropy at the University of Kent has conducted a number of research projects since our founding in 2008 that contribute to the study of active citizenship and civic engagement. There are four areas of the Select Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement's focus in which our research and teaching can make a contribution, and we consider these in turn.

3. Freedom of philanthropic action – time and money – is an essential part of its nature and should never be enforced. In a report we contributed to, Motivations of Sports Volunteers in England: A Review for Sport England (2016), co-authored by Dr Eddy Hogg, we found that the best way to encourage long-term commitment to civic participation is to adopt an approach which seeks to develop 'volunteer capital' through ongoing flexible support and encouragement for those who wish to engage. Rather than seeing civic engagement as a transaction where service is provided in the expectation of some immediate reward, we argue in this report that engagement should be seen as a process where life circumstances mean that taking part is more straightforward at some times during the life-course than others. We argue that good volunteer management, provided by paid staff or other volunteers, can support people to maintain their involvement even in times when engagement is less easy.

This argument – that we need to see civic engagement as a process and not something which can be seen as immediately transactional and must certainly never be enforced – is supported by evidence presented in the article Constant, serial and trigger volunteers: volunteering across the lifecourse and into older age (2016) by Dr Eddy Hogg. In this paper it is argued that lifelong commitment to civic engagement can be fostered through supportive organisations that have flexible ways of engaging and allow people to maintain a relationship with the organisation even when life circumstances prohibit them from volunteering much time.

Evidence:

Motivations of Sports Volunteers in England: A Review for Sport England is available at <http://tinyurl.com/y7okhndn>

Constant, serial and trigger volunteers: volunteering across the lifecourse and into older age was published in Voluntary Sector Review in 2016 (vol 7, no 2, pp 169-190). Copy available on request to e.hogg@kent.ac.uk

5. Previous research suggests that encouraging, but not forcing, active citizenship is the best approach. We do that through our teaching on two undergraduate modules:

Kent Student Certificate in Volunteering Platinum Award – this module, delivered at our Canterbury campus by Dr Eddy Hogg in partnership with Kent Union, supports students in undertaking 100 hours of volunteering across three different placements. One of these must be off-campus in the wider community and another must involve some form of leadership. Supported by a short series of lectures exploring the nature of volunteering and active citizenship, students are encouraged to critically reflect on their experiences of volunteering and the impact it has had on themselves as individuals, the organisations they have helped and on wider society.

Social Justice Practice – this module, delivered at our Medway Campus by Dr Eddy Hogg, supports students in undertaking 100 hours of volunteering in charities of their choosing in the Medway area. In addition students attend a series of weekly lectures over the academic year in which they learn theoretical and practical knowledge, and explore debates about volunteering, active citizenship and the third sector. Through academic essays and reflective diaries, students assess the impact that their volunteering has had on themselves as individuals and use their academic learning to explore the issues addressed and impact made by the charities with whom their volunteer.

We also believe that a charity workforce that understands the importance of active citizenship and is skilled in supporting active citizens is essential. This is why we launched the United Kingdom's first Masters Degree in Philanthropic Studies in 2016. This degree programme, delivered online and aimed at existing charity sector professionals, meets a gap in social science teaching provision for those working in, or seeking careers in, the sector. We are clear that the best way to support active citizenship and civic engagement is to have a highly skilled and professional workforce able to support the endeavours of those keen to donate their time and money. Our MA seeks to deliver on this goal and to help to develop an even more skilled and knowledgeable charity sector workforce for the future.

Evidence:

Module handbooks and other documents relating to all of this teaching is available on request to philanthropy@kent.ac.uk

6. Our research shows that engagement in active citizenship by young people is a key way of ensuring civic engagement in adulthood. It teaches young people the value of civic engagement and the ways in which it can be done, but perhaps more importantly it gives them the confidence that they can and will make a difference by getting involved. This is evidenced in our report Side by Side: A case study report of the experiences of young people supported by West Kent Extra (2015), by Dr Alison Body and Dr Eddy Hogg. In this report, we explain how the relationships between young people and the professional staff and adult volunteers who support civic engagement are crucial. Through these positive relationships, young people are able to experience – often for the first time – having a voice and feeling that they can influence decision making processes which affect them. We found that youth service provision which focuses on giving young people a voice has clear lasting impacts for creating strong communities. Our findings suggest that young people engaged in youth social action programmes are more likely to volunteer, have a strong desire to ‘give back’, are more likely to engage in community participation and advocacy, and have an increased sense of social responsibility and supporting others.

This report makes three key recommendations, each of which are relevant when planning active citizenship programmes for young people:

1. There is a clear case for the continuation of open access provision built on lasting relationships, which has a proven impact in reaching marginalised and disadvantaged young people.
2. Voluntary sector organisations and in particular the paid staff and volunteers who are their public face have a real strength in their ability to form long term relationships with beneficiaries. It is important that such organisations and schemes have a plan to harness or move forwards those young people who wish to ‘give back’ and develop sustainable models of volunteering and social responsibility.
3. There are many examples of youth participation good practice; however youth focused organisations need to focus on how young people can continue and increasingly set the participation agenda.

Evidence:

Side by Side: A case study report of the experiences of young people supported by West Kent Extra is available at <http://tinyurl.com/y8uwkodw>

9. Barriers to engagement in civic engagement do not just exist for traditionally marginalised groups, as our report Philanthropic Journeys: new insights into the triggers and barriers for long-term giving and volunteering (2014) by Dr Beth Breeze finds. Looking at the civic engagement of London-based senior professionals, we found they faced five main barriers when seeking to get involved in civic engagement:

1. A lack of confidence that skills and experiences gained in the private sector would be useful to charities
2. A lack of belief that engaging with charities would benefit them in their personal and professional lives
3. Lack of time due to commitments at home and at work
4. Lack of awareness of appropriate opportunities to get involved
5. Concerns that charities would be badly managed

We found that with good management and with the right opportunities made available, these barriers can be overcome. In particular, policymakers need to understand that active citizenship is better conceived as a lifelong journey than as a series of unrelated acts. This is more likely to achieve the overall goal of a stronger civil society.

Evidence:

Philanthropic Journeys: new insights into the triggers and barriers for long-term giving and volunteering is available online at <http://tinyurl.com/y8srzhvu>

Final Comments

Three things are clear from our research:

1. Civic engagement needs to be understood as a lifelong process, not as a moment in time or a series of unrelated acts. Joining up different types of engagement at different life stages means people can be supported to give their time and talents in the long term.
2. There is a clear need for well-trained and knowledgeable professionals to manage civic engagement and to ensure that those who want to volunteer their time can do so, and be properly supported in their efforts. Management and support are especially important for those who have not been socialised into civic engagement or considered it as being the kind of thing people like them do.
3. The support needed to enable good citizenship and civic engagement to take place has a cost. Professionals need to be trained and resourced, and volunteers need to be facilitated and supported. The target of increased civic engagement is clearly reliant on a properly resourced infrastructure, from both government and the third sector.

3 August 2017

University of Reading, Institute of Education and the Citizenship Foundation – written evidence (CCE0222)

Summary

Introduction, Experience and Expertise

David Kerr is leading expert on Citizenship education and civic engagement with unique experience in terms of policy, research and practice. He is Consultant Director of Education at the Citizenship Foundation in London and Head of Initial Teacher Training at the University of Reading. David was Professional Officer to the Citizenship Advisory Group chaired by Professor (Sir) Bernard Crick. He was seconded to Department for Education (DfE) and QCA in London in support of the citizenship education initiative in England.

He was Chair of the PISA advisory group developing a framework and test on Global Competence for PISA2018. He has led major research studies in citizenship education at national, European and international level. He was Associate Research Director for the IEA International Civic and Citizenship Education Study (ICCS) with responsibility for the study's European module and for the EU study of Participatory Citizenship in Europe. He directed the Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS) in England and co-directed the ESRC funded Citizens in Transition (CiT) study.

He has worked closely with the Council of Europe since 1999 on its Education for Democratic Citizenship and Human Rights Education project (EDC/HRE) and is currently the EDC/HRE National Co-ordinator for the United Kingdom (UK). He is also an ACT Council member.

Recommendations

The meaning and purpose of Citizenship and Civic Engagement in the 21st Century

Q1 What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st Century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

- 1. The meaning and purpose of Citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century must be clearly defined and understood across society. Above all, it must proactively set out to empower all people, and particularly young people, to learn, live and work with confidence in a rapidly changing world.

- 2. The definition and understanding of Citizenship and civic engagement must recognise the reality of the central challenge facing all societies of how to educate people in democratic contexts which are very different from what has come before. It must take note of and contribute to international efforts to collectively address this challenge.
- 3. All political parties, including the Government, must collectively agree on the meaning and purpose of Citizenship education and civic engagement. They must recognise the central role of education and curriculum in helping young people understand why civic engagement matters and how they can participate actively, responsibly and confidently.
- 4. The meaning and purpose of Citizenship education and civic engagement will need to be constantly reviewed and updated if it is to remain relevant to the needs of people in a fast-paced, intercultural, interconnected and interdependent world. It must prepare people with the requisite capabilities for engagement both in the UK and beyond.

Strengthening Citizenship and Civic Engagement

Q2. Are there ways of strengthening people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role?

Q4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

- 5. The deficit model of citizenship and civic engagement in the UK needs to be urgently addressed by the Government with recognition of the crucial role that education can play in repairing this deficit.
- 6. The Government should ensure that young people understand their legal rights and responsibilities through the distribution of Young People's Passport and have opportunities to record and publicly celebrate their civic engagement in relation to learning, living and working in society through a Citizenship Record of Engagement.
- 7. Consideration should be given to setting up a Commission to revisit lowering voting age from 18 to 16, through a gradual approach that would allow 16 year olds to vote in local and devolved elections in the first instance.

Educating for Citizenship

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Q8 What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? How can these values be strengthened?

8. The Government and public authorities should recognise that building a lasting culture of Citizenship and civic engagement must be founded on a strong foundation of effective Citizenship education and that this must be a key goal and aim for education and curriculum.
9. DfE must encourage all education institutions to consider what their civic mission is and how they educate young people to understand and actively participate in realising it.
10. DfE must urgently replace the current Citizenship National Curriculum with one that is fit for purpose for the 21st Century. The design of the new curriculum should be overseen by a new Citizenship Advisory Group representing all relevant groups in society.
11. DfE should consider placing the education of young people to address controversial issues at the heart of the new education for citizenship at curriculum and whole-school level.
12. There is an urgent need to rebuild a robust evidence base on the state of Citizenship education and to continue to contribute to and learn from education and Citizenship best practice in other countries in Europe and internationally in order to remain relevant and effective.

A Joined up Approach to Citizenship and Civic Engagement

Q7 How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives and increase civic engagement?

13. Government needs to be seen to be valuing and promoting Citizenship education and civic engagement across Government and society. A Minister and a Senior Civil servant should be given the remit to develop coherent policy and positive communication for Citizenship education and civic engagement and coordinate with other government departments and local and devolved governments working on citizenship policy.

- 14. Government and political parties must ensure that the promotion of Citizenship and civic engagement is built on cross-party support and consensus to prevent it falling prey to the whims and ideologies of particular Ministers and political parties.
- 15. The DfE should follow up the Crick Report recommendation for the setting up of a Standing Commission on Citizenship education and civic engagement in order to monitor its progress and make recommendations for continued improvements going forward.

For further information about this submission, please contact David Kerr

University of Reading, Institute of Education and the Citizenship Foundation – written evidence (CCE0222)

This submission is made to the House of Lords Committee on Citizenship and Civic Engagement by David Kerr representing the University of Reading, Institute of Education and the Citizenship Foundation (CF).

8 September 2017

1. Introduction, Experience and Expertise

1.1 This submission is from David Kerr in a professional capacity. It is based on my relevant experience in the field of Citizenship and Civic Engagement and unique expertise developed in linking policy, research and practice in the UK, as well at European and international level. I was closely involved in the introduction of Citizenship as a statutory subject in the National Curriculum in England in 2002 and have continued to monitor and assess its progress from that point as well as that of Citizenship education and civic engagement developments across the globe.

1.2 In terms of policy expertise, I was Principal Officer to the Citizenship Advisory Group, chaired by Professor, Sir Bernard Crick. I brought evidence of Citizenship and civic engagement developments in other countries for consideration by the Crick Group. Alongside Bernard, I coordinated the writing of the Group's Final Report, particularly the sections on how the new Citizenship curriculum should be delivered in schools. I was then seconded to the Department for Education (DfE) from 1999 to 2006 to help to turn the vision for statutory Citizenship in schools into a reality through the creation of a network of support. This included the setting up of the professional subject association (Association for Citizenship Teaching (ACT)), creation of the new one-year ITT PGCE Citizenship course, development of new Citizenship GCSE and A level qualification and engagement with government agencies such as Ofsted and QCDA. I was also involved in liaising between DfE and other Government Departments that delivered aspects of Citizenship and civic engagement policy such as the Ministry for Justice, Home Office, Department for Communities and Local Government and Foreign Office.

1.2 In terms of research expertise, I was Research Director at NFER of the DfE commissioned Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS) from 2001 to 2010. This was a ground-breaking study that evaluated the progress and effectiveness of the new statutory Citizenship subject in schools in England. I also co-directed the follow-up ESRC study that followed that cohort as they moved from schools into adulthood. I was also Research Director for England's participation in the large IEA comparative study on civic and citizenship education – CIVED – from 1996 to 1999 and became Research Director from 2006 to 2009, with responsibility for the European module, of the follow-up 2009 IEA International Civic and Citizenship Study, in which England also participated. I have also directed research studies for the Council of Europe and European Commission on active citizenship and liaised with Eurydice on surveys of citizenship education across European countries.

1.3 In terms of practice expertise, I was the subject lead for the first ITT PGCE Citizenship programmes at University College London and the University of Bristol and am currently Head of Initial Teacher Training (ITT) at the University of Reading. I was a Trustee of ACT and the Citizenship Foundation (CF) and am currently a member of the ACT Teaching Council, Consultant Director of Education at CF and Deputy Chair of the Citizenship Subject Expert Group. I am also the UK coordinator for the Council of Europe large-scale Education for Democratic Citizenship and Human Rights Project (EDC/HRE) and have helped to develop Citizenship education practice and policies in a number of countries including Turkey, Chile, Colombia, Norway, Sweden and Hungary. I was Chair of the Expert Group that has helped to develop the new Global Competency framework for OECD as part of PISA 2018.

1480

The Committee has, in places, redacted the names of individuals to prevent them from being identified.

1.4 I have contributed to the submissions to the Select Committee from the Citizenship Foundation and ACT. However, I believe that my unique experience and expertise built up in relation to research, policy and practice in Citizenship education and civic engagement, in the UK and more widely, puts me a strong position to offer further insights and recommendations in relation to a number of the Committee's questions. My evidence addresses parts of questions 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 8 and 9 and all of question 5. I am particularly keen to ensure that policy, research and practice remain connected in relation to Citizenship and civic engagement both in education and across Government, and that the UK continues to contribute to and learn from developments in Europe and internationally. This connectivity is vital if Citizenship education and civic engagement is to remain relevant for the challenges of modern society and fit for purpose, particularly for our young people. I would be happy to give oral evidence to the Committee in support of my insights and recommendations.

2. The meaning and purpose of Citizenship and Civic Engagement in the 21st Century

Q1 What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st Century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

2.1 The Crick Report in 1998 recommended 'that citizenship and the teaching of democracy is so important both for schools and the life of the nation that there must be a statutory requirement on schools to ensure that is it part of the entitlement of all pupils'. This was based on a concern that approaches at the time were uncoordinated and inadequate for 'animating the idea of a common citizenship with democratic values'. The Report further cited the words of warning of the then Lord Chancellor concerning democratic society in the UK: *'We should not, must not, dare not, be complacent about the health and future of British democracy. Unless we become a nation of engaged citizens, our democracy is not secure.'*⁸⁶⁵ Almost 20 years later, sadly, similar warnings and concerns ring true. This is, in part, because the actions taken by the Government in addressing the Crick Report have not proved https://www.teachingcitizenship.org.uk/sites/teachingcitizenship.org.uk/files/6123_crick_report_1998_0.pdf

⁸⁶⁵ See

'lasting and effective' as the Group hoped. It is also because the challenges faced in defining what citizenship and civic engagement means in the 21st Century have become more complex, wide-ranging and fast moving.

2.2 The root cause of the challenge of defining what Citizenship and civic engagement now mean and why it matters is the rapid pace of change in 21st society and the wide-ranging, fast moving, irreversible impacts that is bringing to societies. Governments and cross-national agencies across the world are struggling with the question of how to educate people for Citizenship and civic engagement in democratic contexts that are very different from what have come before, in terms of aims, purposes and approaches. There is no full scale answer to this question as yet. However, what is clear from emerging thinking is that the answer will involve encompassing new capacities and approaches that emerge from a number of common trends and needs. These include recognising and addressing that the meaning and purpose of Citizenship and civic engagement must:

- Emphasise a strong global dimension alongside national and regional (e.g. European) dimensions;
- Contain changed conceptions of identity that accept the notion of people having multiple identities – often termed 'cosmopolitan citizenship' – that range from the local to the global;
- Accept the complexity and cultural diversity of society brought about by the growing movement of peoples within and across countries and continents;
- Recognise the growing power and reach of automation and of information and communication technologies (ICTs):
- Recognise the potential for division, conflict, controversy, violence and non-democratic attitudes and actions to develop and spread;
- Promote the importance of and need for people to interact respectfully with others within and across communities and borders;
- Promote the importance of dissolving tensions and (re)building social capital and community cohesion as a defence against the negative impacts of change;
- Encourage the development among people, particularly young people, of open and flexible attitudes and values that aim to unite and bond a common citizenship across communities, countries and continents;
- Inculcate the need for quick and constant creative, collaborative and ethical decision-making and actions if society is to prosper in the face of the challenges to 21st society and democracy.

What is abundantly clear from this context and emerging thinking is that:

- The meaning of Citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st century is more complex and challenging than at any time in society
- Getting the meaning right – in terms of definition, tone, aims and approaches – will be critical for the future survival of democracy and democratic society in the UK and across the world

- The meaning will need to be constantly reviewed and updated in order to be both reactive and proactive in the face of rapidly changing societal contexts
- There will be a need to develop globally competent citizens who can actively engage for the good of humanity
- Education and curriculum will have a crucial role to play in meeting these challenges for current and future generations of young people
- The contribution of education and curriculum will need to be comprehensive across all sectors, ages and parts of society, interdisciplinary across all subjects and responsive to current and future developments in society.

2.3 The work that I have been leading with OECD and PISA 2018 in drawing up a definition of and framework for Global Competence is a step in the right direction. It is helping to proactively address the question of how education and society can rise to the challenge of educating for citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century. The definition of Global Competence proposed by OECD for PISA 2018 is instructive and worthy of consideration in terms of its implications for the meaning of citizenship and civic engagement in the UK in the 21st Century and the role of education and the curriculum in educating for citizenship and the teaching of democracy in and beyond schools.⁸⁶⁶

Global competence is the capacity to analyse global and intercultural issues critically and from multiple perspectives, to understand how differences affect perceptions, judgments, and ideas of self and others, and to engage in open, appropriate and effective interactions with others from different backgrounds on the basis of a shared respect for human dignity. (OECD, 2016)

2.4 I fully support the ACT and CF submissions that if we want a vibrant and healthy democracy where every citizen feels their voice matters and they can play an active part in democratic decision-making and public life, then every young person must have access to an entitlement to high-quality Citizenship education. Citizenship education cannot be left to chance. The Government and all political parties have a collective duty to prepare people to properly understand and participate actively and responsibly within it. However, I would add that the meaning, conception and approach to such Citizenship education and citizen participation must take account of the realities, emerging thinking and responses that I have outlined above. Without this it is doomed to be ineffectual, short-term and out of step with global developments. In 21st Century society we have to prepare all our young people for the realities and possibilities arising from learning, living and working in a fast-paced, intercultural, interconnected and interdependent world. To do otherwise will be to fail in our duty to educate them properly, leave them unprepared and vulnerable and further threaten the security of democracy in the UK. Addressing citizenship and civic engagement is even more important now than it was in 1998 when the Crick Report was published. There is still time to take action that is 'lasting and effective' as Professor, Sir Bernard Crick put it but we must act quickly, purposefully and collectively.

⁸⁶⁶ See <https://www.oecd.org/education/Global-competency-for-an-inclusive-world.pdf>

Recommendations:

- 1. The meaning and purpose of Citizenship and civic engagement in the 21st Century must be clearly defined and understood across society. Above all, it must proactively set out to empower all people, and particularly young people, to learn, live and work with confidence in a rapidly changing world.
- 2. The definition and understanding of Citizenship and civic engagement must recognise the reality of the central challenge facing all societies of how to educate people in democratic contexts which are very different from what has come before. It must take note of and contribute to international efforts to collectively address this challenge.
- 3. All political parties, including the Government, must collectively agree on the meaning and purpose of Citizenship education and civic engagement. They must recognise the central role of education and curriculum in helping young people understand why civic engagement matters and how they can participate actively, responsibly and confidently.
- 4. The meaning and purpose of Citizenship education and civic engagement will need to be constantly reviewed and updated if it is to remain relevant to the needs of people in a fast-paced, intercultural, interconnected and interdependent world. It must prepare people with the requisite capabilities for engagement both in the UK and also beyond.

3. Strengthening Citizenship and Civic Engagement

Q2. Are there ways of strengthening people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role?

Q4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

3.1 The identity of people in the UK as citizens is currently almost non-existent beyond holding a passport by citizens of birth and possibly taking part in Citizenship ceremonies to celebrate citizenship through naturalisation. Beyond this there is little that formally and proactively makes people feel that they are citizens of the UK united by common membership and bonds of belonging. This deficit model of citizenship and civic engagement needs to be urgently and centrally addressed by Government if people are to understand what citizenship and civic engagement means in the UK and why their participation matters. There is a crucial role for education of citizens for citizenship and for this to be a critical part of the educational process. The Citizenship Education Longitudinal Study (CELS) which I directed found that attitudes to citizenship and civic engagement are formed by young people by the time they are adolescents (age 14 to 16) and that these inform their actions and level of participation as they move into adulthood.⁸⁶⁷ This underlines the key role of education and schools in this process. The submissions from the Citizenship Foundation and ACT make strong recommendations in this respect. I would like to add to these by drawing attention to the need, as part of this educational process, for the provision of up-to-date information for citizens, particularly young people, in the UK concerning how the political, legal, social and economic system in the nation works. This should include balanced information on the key issues facing society such as Brexit and devolved government, in order to provide young people with strong foundations on which to base their participation and engagement. Alongside this there needs to be careful consideration given as to how the key milestones and experiences in being a UK citizen can be publicly identified, recorded and celebrated.

3.2 In terms of up-to-date information for citizens on how the UK system two initiatives from the Citizenship Foundation are worthy of consideration as exemplars of what it required in a more consistent and systematic form. The first is the Young Citizens Passport, which is in its 16th edition, and provides a succinct and accessible overall guide to young citizens' legal rights and responsibilities. The YCP has previously been distributed to generations of young people for free via DfE and the Home Office, though this is no longer the case.⁸⁶⁸ Such distribution would be a simple way of ensuring that all young people have instant access about their political, legal, social and economic rights and responsibilities. The second is the Brexit for Young People pack, which is an attempt to help young people decide what is important for them from the Brexit negotiations, so they can articulate these as citizens.⁸⁶⁹ This is an example of a balanced, practical resource which sets out simply and clearly the key issues on a common topical issue. Such balanced knowledge and information is often difficult to find by citizens but is critical to underpin their responsible participation.

3.3 Alongside the production of knowledge guides that help people understand their rights and responsibilities as citizens is a need to agree on the key milestones that mark the development of active citizens over time and consider how these can be publicly recorded and celebrated. What I am calling for is the development of a Citizenship Record of Engagement (CROE). This is an active on-line document which actively records and publicly celebrates at crucial milestones the citizenship experiences of young people and citizens as they learn, live and work in modern society. It could include learning experiences in school, acquiring a (new) passport, participation in voluntary activities such as National Citizen Service, participation in community activities, getting to the age of voting, being available for jury service, voting in elections etc. It would be a personal record that could be publicly celebrated at public ceremonies such as school assemblies, University graduation, and Citizenship ceremonies. Such a process would considerably raise the profile of being a UK

⁸⁶⁷ See <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/cels/>

⁸⁶⁸ See <http://www.citizenshipfoundation.org.uk/main/resource.php?s418>

⁸⁶⁹ See <http://blog.citizenshipfoundation.org.uk/downloads/who-has-the-power-to-brexit/> citizen and would help to strengthen a sense of common membership, citizen efficacy (the sense that participation has an impact) and belonging.

3.4 Consideration should also be given to regular public education initiatives that encourage and provide opportunities for citizens to work together for the common good of communities and societies. The example of annual Citizen Action Days in Austria run by the Polis organisation provides an interesting model of such an approach.⁸⁷⁰ In Austria, each year, from May to June the Austrian Government encourages and funds a scheme for schools, civic organisations, public authorities and communities to work together, through Citizen Action Days, on projects at local and regional level that promote citizen engagement and participation and bring different generations together. These projects are then celebrated at regional and national level.

3.5 In terms of laws concerning active political engagement evidence and recent developments suggest that the time is ripe to review the current laws concerning the franchise and in particular revisit the question as to whether the voting age should be lowered from 18 to 16. Recent political engagement through the votes on Brexit, the General Election and the Scottish Referendum have underlined the huge appetite of young people and young voters (age 18 to 24) to understand and have a say on the key political issues of the day. This appetite is further fuelled when they are well-informed and feel that their voice matters and will make a difference. The Brexit vote may have had a different outcome if more 18 to 24 year olds had participated in the numbers that they did in the recent General Election. Furthermore, the granting of the vote to 16 year olds in the Scottish Referendum showed that young people could be trusted to use their vote sensibly and responsibly. It also energised the teaching and learning of Citizenship education in schools in helping young people to use their votes wisely. Developments in other countries should also be considered here in providing answers as to how citizens can feel more connected and engaged and how young people can be successfully inducted into the political process. The Nordic countries continue to lead the way in terms of democratic engagement in society, while Austria has successfully lowered the voting age to 16, firstly through local municipal elections and then to general elections and Serbia, Bosnia and Montenegro have permitted voting between the ages of 16 to 18. This gradual approach is one that should be considered in relation to the UK and UK countries via local and devolved elections in the first instance. There is also scope to register voters when they are at school and when they enrol at university to increase voter registration numbers.

Recommendations:

- 5. The deficit model of citizenship and civic engagement in the UK needs to be urgently addressed by the Government with recognition of the crucial role that education can play in repairing this deficit.

⁸⁷⁰ See <http://www.politik-lernen.at/site/aktionstage>

- 6. The Government should ensure that young people understand their legal rights and responsibilities through the distribution of Young People’s Passport and have opportunities to record and publicly celebrate their civic engagement in relation to learning, living and working in society through a Citizenship Record of Engagement.
- 7. Consideration should be given to setting up a Commission to revisit lowering the voting age from 18 to 16, through a gradual approach that would allow 16 year olds to vote in local and devolved elections in the first instance.

4. Educating for Citizenship

Q5 What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Q8 What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? How can these values be strengthened?

4.1 A number of submissions, including those from the Citizenship Foundation and ACT, have presented evidence underpinning recommendations to recognise the critical role of effective education for citizenship in underpinning attempts to raise the profile and status of Citizenship and Civic Engagement in the UK. Effective education for citizenship provides the crucial foundations for building a culture of citizenship and civic engagement in the UK. I strongly support this assertion based on my experience and expertise in promoting Citizenship education in England and in other contexts. Education, particularly effective Citizenship education, is essential if teaching and encouraging good citizenship is to take root across society and reach all people, particularly young people. Building a common sense of Citizenship that encourages civic engagement should to be a key goal of education and an underpinning aim of the curriculum, including the National Curriculum. This goal and aim needs to be shared, understood and acted upon by all those working in education.

4.2 There is strong support for making Citizenship a compulsory statutory subject not just for 11 to 16 years olds (Key Stages 3 and 4) but also extending that statutory status for 7 to 11 year olds (Key Stage 2) and including it in post-16 education and training as young people get access to their adult citizenship roles and responsibilities. There is also a strong argument for including it in higher education. I believe that that all education institutions – schools, colleges, universities – should consider what their civic mission is and how they seek to educate young people to understand and actively participate in realising this mission. This involves learning not just through the curriculum but also contributing to the wider culture of the institution as well as connecting to the communities associated with the institution, what have been defined as the 3 contexts or Cs of effective citizenship education – curriculum, culture and community(ies).

4.3 Given the imperative to promote effective education for citizenship as an underpinning foundation for Citizenship and Civic Engagement, it is clear to those involved with Citizenship education that the current arrangements for and approaches to teaching and learning Citizenship in schools are not fit for purpose. This includes the framing and content of the Citizenship National Curriculum programmes of study, the nature of the Citizenship qualifications, the training provided to teachers and senior managers in schools and the identification and evaluation of best practice. Education for Citizenship in England, and much of the UK, is currently severely lacking in all these aspects. Put simply the current arrangements are a severe impediment to making progress. They cannot provide the breadth and depth of the education and teaching required to meet the demands of preparing young people for Citizenship and Civic Engagement in the 21st Century, as I set out in Section 1 of this submission. Rather there is a need for a fundamental review of current approaches that takes account of the urgent need to prepare all young people for the realities and challenges of Citizenship and Civic Engagement in modern society.

4.4 This situation has arisen as a result of a gradual breakdown in the political consensus that lay behind Crick Report and the introduction of statutory Citizenship into schools in 2002. The Crick Report had the support of all political parties, thereby ensuring that Citizenship and Civic Engagement was viewed as a common political issue rather than a divisive party political issue. Unfortunately this political consensus has been lost as education and the National Curriculum have fallen prey to the influence and ideologies of particular political parties. The reforms of the National Curriculum that were introduced in 2014 have proved particularly damaging for education and Citizenship education in promoting the type of Citizenship and civic engagement that is required for learning, living and working in the 21st Century.

4.5 The Citizenship National Curriculum, as with the rest of the National Curriculum, has been reduced to a narrow list of knowledge, with a particular focus on the UK. Citizenship is now seen as teaching young people a core canon of knowledge about UK political, legal and economic institutions and policies and the importance of volunteering. Many aspects of the previous curriculum have been removed or downgraded including: knowledge about the role of media and ICTs, local democracy, Europe and the wider world and freedom of speech; an emphasis on balancing knowledge and understanding with the acquisition of skills and attitudes; and opportunities to engage in practical experiences of active citizenship and democratic participation both in and beyond schools. The modern broader based Citizenship education that was introduced, following Crick, in 2002 has been replaced with old-style, narrow civic education from the 1950s and 1960s. This regressive development puts the UK out of step with developments in many countries in Europe and beyond.

4.6 To compound matters, though Citizenship remains a National Curriculum subject this is in name not substance. The Government promotion of the core subjects of Maths, English and Science alongside History, Geography and languages as part of EBacc provision have made it clear to school leaders, students and parents as to where priorities lie in the education system. The result has been: a collapse in the status of Citizenship in schools; the downgrading of curriculum time in many schools, with some not teaching it at all; the collapse in the numbers taking Citizenship qualifications and the shrinking of the numbers choosing to train to teach the subject. Though practice remains strong in many schools Citizenship can be classified as a subject in peril in many others, unless there is urgent action.

4.7 What is needed to reverse this sad decline is a return to the conditions that led to the setting up of the Crick Group in 1998. Then the concerns for Citizenship and civic engagement in society, and particularly among younger generations, were so severe that it sparked a desire among all political parties that action needed to be taken. I believe that we have to scrap the current approach to Citizenship education as it is largely unsalvageable in meeting what is needed from education to promote Citizenship and civic engagement. Rather what is required is a new Citizenship Advisory Group that represents all political parties as well as those in modern society who have a vested interest in educating young people for 21st Century democratic society and participation. This should include representatives from young people. The Group's remit needs to be updated to address the fundamental question, as posited in Section 1, as to how to educate people for citizenship and civic engagement in democratic contexts that are very different from what have come before, in terms of aims, purposes and approaches. The Group's deliberations must take account of emergent thinking and international efforts to answer this question. While Citizenship as a subject will be a key driver there will also be a need to make interdisciplinary links with other subjects as well as consider whole-school and wider community contexts and aspects linked to developing Global Competence.

4.8 I have been involved in recent developments which I believe provide some of the answers as to how education, schools and curriculum can proactively support the development of a common culture of citizenship and civic engagement. The first is the developments with OECD around Global Competence outlined in Section 1. The second is a suggestion for a reformulated curriculum for citizenship education for the 21st century that included developing a broader range of knowledge and new citizenship capabilities, which I outlined at a recent European Citizenship conference organised by NECE, the German Federal Civic Agency.⁸⁷¹ The third is a focus on helping teachers and schools to teach and manage approaches to controversial issues, developed with the Council of Europe and European Commission in partnership between the Citizenship Foundation and agencies and ministries of education in a number of European countries.⁸⁷²

4.9 The work on teaching controversial issues through education in schools offers hope that this approach can help to address the challenge for Governments of how to educate young people to be confident in a fast-paced, intercultural, interdependent, international world in

⁸⁷¹ See David Kerr Keynote Presentation <http://www.bpb.de/veranstaltungen/netzwerke/nece/227285/nece-conference-2016-zagreb>

⁸⁷² See Teaching Controversial Issues <http://pjp-eu.coe.int/en/web/charter-edc-hre-pilot-projects/teaching-controversial-issues-developing-effective-training-for-teachers-and-school-leaders>
See Managing Controversy <http://pjp-eu.coe.int/en/web/charter-edc-hre-pilot-projects/project-1-managing-controversy-a-whole-school-training-tool> tackling challenges posed to democratic society and democratic values by terrorism, extremism, violence and xenophobia. The two training packs on addressing controversial issues in schools, the first for teachers and the second for school leaders, were demanded by European countries and have been well received in trainings carried out for the Council of Europe under the auspices of the independent European Wergeland Centre (EWC) based in Norway. Indeed, currently the Nordic Council of Ministers from the Nordic countries has commissioned a pilot training for school teams of headteachers and teachers from each country. The outcomes of the training are going to be used to help their schools and communities educate their young people to tackle the democratic challenges in the communities, country and region. It is hoped the pilot will be rolled out to all schools in the Nordic region as their response to addressing current challenges posed by terrorism, extremism (both IS and far-right), violence and discrimination. They prefer this broader approach to addressing the threats to common values in society rather than the narrower, more targeted Prevent type policy in the UK.⁸⁷³

4.10 When Citizenship was introduced in schools in 2002 DfE Ministers were keen to evaluate its effectiveness and build a robust evidence base to improve policy and practice. They commissioned NFER to undertake the Longitudinal Study (CELS) from 2001 to 2010, ensured England's participation in the two IEA international studies of civic and citizenship education (CIVED in 1999 and ICCS in 2009)⁸⁷⁴ so as to compare progress with other countries and encouraged Ofsted to carry out regular subject reviews of Citizenship. The outcome of this research and evaluation is that there is clear evidence of what constitutes effective education for citizenship. The Citizenship Longitudinal Study (CELS) which I directed from 2001 to 2010 while at NFER found that high quality Citizenship education is found in schools that see Citizenship as a priority, where it is embedded in the curriculum, where there are Citizenship trained teachers that lead and coordinate teaching, support from the Senior Leadership team and where Citizenship is also part of a whole school approach.⁸⁷⁵ CELS also shows that pupil outcomes improve in Citizenship where there is regular time for Citizenship lessons planned, in the culture and ethos of the school and in the school's relations with the wider community. However, since 2010 that evidence base for Citizenship has been allowed to wither on the vine. There has been no follow up to CELS, England did not participate in the latest IEA study (ICCS16) and Ofsted have ceased subject reviews. There is an urgent need to build a clear, coherent national picture on the impact on Citizenship education of recent curriculum and qualification reforms through research and evaluation data.

4.2 The approach to Citizenship education in England was also informed by reviewing best practice at European and international level. As one of the last countries in Europe

⁸⁷³ See <http://eng.theewc.org/Content/What-we-do/Learning-Democracy-at-Utoeya/Teaching-Controversial-Issues-in-the-Nordic-Countries>

⁸⁷⁴ See <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/the-international-civic-and-citizenship-education-study-iccs/>

⁸⁷⁵ See <https://www.nfer.ac.uk/research/projects/cels/>

to introduce Citizenship as part of the school curriculum there was much to learn from global networks and practice in other countries. Prior to and following 2002, DfE Ministers encouraged England’s active involvement in citizenship networks in Europe involving the Council of Europe, European Commission and Eurydice as well as globally through the British Council and IEA studies⁸⁷⁶. From 2002 to 2010, England was viewed internationally as one of the leading exponents of effective Citizenship education and countries were keen to learn from our experience. However, since 2010 Citizenship practice in other countries has begun to outstrip ours, particularly in the Nordic countries, Finland and Austria to name a few. This has coincided with DfE disengagement from European and global Citizenship education networks and evaluations⁸⁷⁷ leading to a missed opportunity to continue to measure our practice against other countries and contribute to and learn from such networks. It is vital that initiatives designed at strengthening Citizenship education take account of and contribute to developments in other countries and continents across the world in order to remain relevant and effective.

Recommendations:

8. The Government and public authorities should recognise that building a lasting culture of Citizenship and civic engagement must be founded on a strong foundation of effective Citizenship education and that this must be a key goal and aim for education and curriculum.
9. DfE must encourage all education institutions to consider what their civic mission is and how they educate young people to understand and actively participate in realising it.
10. DfE must urgently replace the current Citizenship National Curriculum with one that is fit for purpose for the 21st Century. The design of the new curriculum should be overseen by a new Citizenship Advisory Group representing all relevant groups in society.
11. DfE should consider placing the education of young people to address controversial issues at the heart of the new education for citizenship at curriculum and whole-school level.
12. There is an urgent need to rebuild a robust evidence base on the state of Citizenship education and to continue to contribute to and learn from education and Citizenship

⁸⁷⁶ See <https://www.coe.int/en/web/edc/home>

⁸⁷⁷ See <http://iccs.iea.nl/>

best practice in other countries in Europe and internationally in order to remain relevant and effective.

5. A Joined up Approach to Citizenship and Civic Engagement

Q7 How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives and increase civic engagement?

5.1 There is an urgent need for a more joined up approach to Citizenship and civic engagement across Government and in collaboration with local and devolved government and with third sector organisations. Currently the situation is fragmented, inconsistent and inefficient. There are a number of government departments that are involved in promoting and supporting Citizenship and civic engagement but their efforts are not mapped and connected. They include; the Department for Education which has not provided any significant support for Citizenship education since 2008 beyond some recent funding for an ACT project on British values; the Home Office which has funded ACT to work with schools on Citizenship curriculum projects to develop anti extremism education through its Prevent innovation fund; the Cabinet Office which funds work to educate young people about democracy and voting; the Office for Civil Society at the Department of Culture Media and Sport which funds social action, National Citizen Service and new training for Community Organisers; DFID has funded the Global Learning Programme including global citizenship; and the Ministry of Justice which has funded legal education projects run by the Citizenship Foundation.

5.2 The current messages coming from Government and Departments concerning Citizenship education and civic education are also weak and confusing. I support the call from ACT for the DfE to do more to clearly signal to all schools that Citizenship is an important curriculum subject with a clear contribution to make on wider education agendas and that Ministers should make positive references to Citizenship in their speeches. For example, Citizenship provides the curriculum location, content and knowledge for exploring British Values, Prevent and anti-extremist education and the space to engage with students on a wide range of topical and controversial issues as well as supporting greater social cohesion and social justice. Trained and experienced Citizenship teachers are adept at handling such topics and issues should be valued as education leaders and experts who can work with other members of staff who lack the confidence or expertise. The current silence on these issues is deafening.

5.3 The Crick Group and its report was successful in establishing a consensus around citizenship and the teaching of democracy in schools in 1998 because it was set up with cross-party support and included representation from the major political parties and sectors of society with a vested interest in Citizenship education. This meant that there was strong support for making Citizenship a new statutory National Curriculum subject from 2002. Unfortunately, since 2002 that consensus has ebbed away and Citizenship education and civic engagement have fallen foul of the whims and impacts of the ideologies and decisions of particular political parties and Ministers. This has undermined the progress made in promoting and embedding Citizenship education in schools that took place from 2002 to 2010 and led to a waste of experience and expertise across government departments and third sector organisations.

5.4 Professor, Sir Bernard Crick, when formulating the Crick Report, was acutely aware of the vagaries of political and educational policy and of the challenges faced in introducing a new subject into the National Curriculum. He wanted to ensure that the new Citizenship curriculum was not a flash in the pan but had a good chance of taking root across schools and society. In order to try and protect the future of Citizenship education he made a recommendation in the Crick Report that there should be a Standing Commission on Citizenship education set up to monitor its progress and when necessary recommend amendments to the curriculum, inspection arrangements, teaching and learning approaches and teacher training, as appropriate. It would have been interested to see had this recommendation been put into practice what impact it would have had. Any proposals to promote and strengthen Citizenship and civic engagement will face similar challenges to the Citizenship education initiative instigated by the Crick Group. There will be a need to ensure that such proposals are given a chance to make progress, while remaining both relevant to changing circumstances in education and society and effective in terms of policies, practices and levels of support across Government and society.

Recommendations:

- 13. Government needs to be seen to be valuing and promoting Citizenship education and civic engagement across Government and society. A Minister and a Senior Civil servant should be given the remit to develop coherent policy and positive communication for Citizenship education and civic engagement and coordinate with other government departments and local and devolved governments working on citizenship policy.
14. Government and political parties must ensure that the promotion of Citizenship and civic engagement is built on cross-party support and consensus to prevent it falling prey to the whims and ideologies of particular Ministers and political parties.
15. The DfE should follow up the Crick Report recommendation for the setting up of a Standing Commission on Citizenship education and civic engagement in order to monitor its progress and as necessary make recommendations for improvement going forward.

For further information about this submission, please contact David Kerr

Unlock Democracy Greater Manchester – written evidence (CCE0052)

We are a local group of the national organisation Unlock Democracy. We chose to address four of the twelve questions (Qs 3, 4, 5, 7) as these involve issues that particularly pre-occupy us.

3. As things stand currently, for the vast majority of citizens, concepts of formal rights and responsibilities remain vague and untested, presumed as inalienable until individual events or circumstances conspire to confound this widely held misinterpretation.

The UK's uncodified constitution means that citizens, through no fault of their own, in general, have no basic comprehension of the scope and limits that constrain the activities of UK government administrations, central or local. Furthermore their rights are dependent on ad hoc statutory protection or upon judicial protection under common law.

The imminent passage of the European Union (Withdrawal) or Repeal Bill provides us with a golden example of the dangers inherent to this unique (amongst European Democratic States) arrangement, providing the Executive function with numerous opportunities to diminish the basic freedoms and privileges of UK citizens.

The UK should move swiftly towards establishing a succinct, modern and relevant codified constitution, preferably through the platform of a citizen focused and driven Constitutional Convention - a process in which political parties must be involved but only as equal participants amongst a wide array of actors representing all strands of civic society. Such a codified constitution should express rights and responsibilities of citizens and their reciprocal equivalences for layers of government, civic institutions, judiciary etc.

As people in other countries with codified constitutions know, knowledge of their constitution is learned in schools, can be accessed on-line or purchased in a book shop; probably their constitution states that all citizens should be provided by government with a copy of the constitution including its updates. When personal, local, national, even international issues are raised the written constitution can be a source of guidance for individuals to understand and decide on their opinions on the issue at hand and are in a better position to discuss the issue productively with others and when circumstances arise vote on matters with more confidence.

In Greater Manchester in 2016 the lead up to the election of the city region mayor was an opportunity to show the range of public interest in expressing how or whether their citizenship was adequately respected in politics, local and national government and systems of governance in general.

An independent initiative headlined the Greater Manchester People's Plan was launched. It provided opportunities for any Greater Manchester (GM) citizen to contribute ideas and opinions on what sort of GM they wanted in the advent to the Combined Authority and elected mayoral election in May 2017 resulting from the Government's approach to regional devolution in England.

It was an independent public engagement programme, by and for citizens and civil society. It offered a website with an online survey for people's contribution of their ideas on six major themes: homes, health and care, transport, democracy, environment, jobs and economy. Volunteers organised a programme of varied public meetings (including one on democracy) around these themes and they were publicised on the website as well as through local community networks.

The report on both the online survey responses and the contributions of ideas and views in public meetings is at: <http://www.peoplesplangm.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/04/PEOPLES-PLAN-April-2017.pdf>

It is valuable evidence of people's willingness to contribute ideas and opinions in both individual approaches online and collectively at participatory and deliberative public meetings.

In the example of responses to the theme of DEMOCRACY in both the survey and the related public meeting participants expressed how they felt democracy was getting further from their grasp. Their ideas on ways to start reversing this included interest in the use of: citizens' juries, citizens' assemblies, an elected regional assembly, re-introducing community councils, more pro-active use of local councillors surgeries including discussion sessions, defined public scrutiny roles external to the local authorities /GM Combined Authority, for instance.

The report referenced above gives qualitative and quantitative evidence on issues raised eg 60% of survey respondents favoured a directly elected assembly for GM; 69% support for changing the voting system; urgent concern that only 6% of under 25s were survey respondents; better two-way communication between local councillors and citizens; a growing readiness for more online communication eg voting registration, Council websites (as two-way platforms) and methods of voting; development of civic education programmes for democratic participation.

A codified constitution would define rights and responsibilities of citizens and reflect the evident aspirations of people for fair treatment in civic engagement. It would also clarify the extent and limitations of governance rights and responsibilities at all levels of government systems and administration.

4. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

As the GM People's Plan report shows there is an appetite in our city region for changes to the voting system. Respondents and participants expressed the view that (FPTP) 'first past the post is not working in GM' and wanted 'a more proportional system that would value every vote, capture the diversity of the city region and add healthy counterbalancing opposition to dominant parties in the belief that better proportionality in representation correlates with better overall outcomes for citizens.' 'Widespread disappointment among YOUTH event participants that as part of the GM devolution deals there had been no discussion about lowering the voting age to 16 as in Scotland'

Current law does not encourage active political engagement. People feel invisible but real barriers and frustrations with politics and the effects or other of voting: In GM young people feel 'invisible.' Says an older contributor: 'important that 'young people get a say. It's their future'. 'Official means of participation are very poor at drawing in the young.'

Culturally as expressed in mass culture TV and Radio for instance, through popular drama, films, soaps are mainly non-party political and usually not political at all, as if it's not appropriate to portray people spending some of their time interested in politics. There seems to be a convention that not talking about politics is the accepted nay preferred norm. This is not healthy in a self-proclaimed democracy.

At the national level the correlation between poor voting turnout and the FPTP voting system is increasingly highlighted; also growing distrust of politicians, their motivation and honesty, particularly relating to finance is cited as a factor.

Nationally, in addition to the point made above in GM, citizen-led national campaigns for proportional representation (PR) are increasing in prominence. Political parties – Liberal Democrat Party, Green Party, UKIP have stated manifesto support for proportional representation (PR). Although the Labour Party (LP) does not express support for PR in its manifesto there is now a LP growing campaign for PR.

Our view is that the current 'first past the post' electoral system for general elections inevitably discourages the participation and engagement of a great many of the electorate. In the many so-called 'safe' constituencies, voters who support the unsuccessful parties are effectively disenfranchised and discouraged from fully engaging with the political process because there is no chance of their representative being elected.

In addition, under a system of proportional representation (PR), there would be a more diverse parliament as smaller parties, eg Liberal Democrat Party, Green Party and UKIP, gained seats proportional to votes cast. This would result in the views and voices of supporters of currently under-represented parties being heard.

Decades of research from around the world has shown a correlation in countries which use systems of PR with many positive outcomes. These include: higher voter turnout, better gender balance in politics and fairer representation of black and ethnic minority groups.

Moreover, citizens are reported to be more satisfied with their democracies. More detail on these last points is fully expressed at: www.makevotesmatter.org.uk

5. As mentioned in our responses to questions 3 and 4 a codified constitution would mean universal access to knowledge of our rights and responsibilities. It would be a primary source for any learning at any age about these matters from childhood onwards and it would be the primary source for any age-related learning materials.

That a codified constitution is not yet in preparation is no reason to delay re-visiting the curriculum and learning programmes on citizenship and civic engagement for children and young people and what they should contain. Further it should be part of any apprenticeship or employment related training programme and university programmes.

The 14-19 year olds who attended the GM People's Plan event on YOUTH; and others taking part in events and activities organised by regional universities' youth and community academics and departments; the Political Studies Association funded Young Citizens' Assembly in GM in 2016 - have shown that given appropriate and energising material and leadership this age group does of course demonstrate enthusiasm and grasp of political decisions that affect them and others and how they can define politics from the perspectives of their own lives and others.

They also have ideas which would be very useful in devising and updating the curriculum. See report: Democratic Devolution, The future of Greater Manchester by Dr Andy Mycock and Cllr Beth Knowles on the Democratic Devolution Young Citizens' Assembly especially the young people's manifesto on Education, Identity, Democracy, Health and Social Care, Transport.) Link here to:

<https://www.psa.ac.uk/sites/default/files/Democratic%20Devolution%20-%20The%20Future%20of%20Greater%20Manchester.pdf>

Rather like our points in question 4, on this there seems to be a convention that not talking about democracy and politics with children and young people is the accepted norm. In a self-proclaimed democracy this is not healthy. Communicating the message through childhood and teenage that civic and political engagement is not an embarrassing and unfathomable minority interest but an important part of self-expression and demonstration of self-worth and the worth of others, which is vital for the health of a democratic society and the experience of being citizens.

7. One important feature of local government Statutory Duties that was scrapped in 2011 is the "Duty to Involve" at a time when the Government's stated aim was to stimulate a culture of citizen participation. Prior to this, briefly (from 2009), all local public services (councils, police and fire services and local health bodies) were all under a legal duty to inform, consult and involve local people on the exercise of their functions.

At a stroke the repeal destroyed what could have been a step in the right direction towards more citizen engagement: it would have been a legal right to citizens and service users to have a say about their local areas and services. Changes to laws and changes to culture feed each other (eg equalities; drink-driving legislation). The re-instatement and further development of this Statutory Duty should be prioritised.

Way back in 2010 an Ipsos MORI survey about whether people wanted to be actively involved in decisions about cuts in local services, found that 76% of people wanted to have some degree of information, consultation and involvement. Surely in 2017 the appetite to have a say among citizens is at least as strong if not stronger. If the independently organised events, activities and survey responses which Greater Manchester citizens took part in, contributed to, and which lead to the Greater Manchester People's Plan publication in April 2017, is noted, motivation can be alerted. <http://www.peoplesplangm.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/04/PEOPLES-PLAN-April-2017.pdf>

What is needed is more participatory democracy in addition to more electoral democracy; we need a shift towards local authorities becoming motivated and committed to an ongoing relationship-driven engagement of citizens in decision making, which is demonstration of the statutory Duty to Involve. Of course this needs dedicated funding but it should lead to better quality, more effective and consensual decision making. It is very much dependent on reviving, enhancing, valuing and sustaining a local government relationship with community networks.

We should also heed initiatives in participatory budgeting with its roots in Porto Alegre, Brazil and its further adoption in Cordoba, Spain and Chicago USA, for instance. There are key dimensions to the success or otherwise of such initiatives and they include: shared information and communication between groups of citizens and local government/politicians; attention to the bywords: scrutiny, accountability and partnership between citizens and politicians; and most of all citizen inclusion in deliberation and decision-making.

We recommend local authorities experiment in participatory budgeting, allocating a proportion of the local authority budget to such initiatives. As Dominic Grieve MP quipped: "Democracy costs money; lack of it costs more."

Authors: Stephen Broadhead, Jenny Cronin, Peter Davidson, Ellen Meredith, Sue Sharples, Joe Taylor.

4 September 2017

Urban Vision Enterprise CIC – written evidence (CCE0089)

Introduction

0.1 The following is a response to the House of Lords Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee’s paper on Citizenship and Civic Engagement in the Twenty-First Century. The response concentrates on citizenship and civic engagement from a planning and urban policy perspective, which is the focus of our work.

0.2 Urban Vision Enterprise CIC is social enterprise providing professional services in planning, regeneration, economic development and third sector organisational development. We are based in Liverpool and North Staffordshire.

0.3 Our specialisms include:

- neighbourhood planning,
- community engagement and consultation,
- housing need assessment,
- heritage-led regeneration and conservation,
- urban design, including design review,
- feasibility studies and business plans,
- community-led development and projects,
- training, continuing professional development (CPD) and education,
- third sector (not-for-profit) organisational development.

0.4 Clients include UK and national professional bodies and membership organisations, local authorities, town and parish councils, neighbourhood forums and local community groups. Urban Vision Enterprise has extensive experience of dealing with urban and rural areas, including city and town centres and villages all around the country.

0.5 The response to selected questions are included in the following six pages.

Response to Questions

1. Question 1

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 There is clearly no simple definition to citizenship. However, we would highlight potential dimensions of citizenship and civic engagement:

Everyday interaction: People live in neighbourhoods, go to work, use local shops and facilities and interact with family, friends, colleagues, and neighbours.

Democratic Processes: People can vote in elections at various levels and in referendums. Some people choose to stand as candidates for election. Others seek to scrutinise or influence elected representatives. Community engagement and consultation activities are also part of how people can influence decisions and outcomes.

Community Action: Some people choose to become actively involved in their neighbourhood and community through volunteering. This can range in scope from organising a local tea morning or helping a neighbour to developing and delivering significant community-led development, regeneration and economic development. It should be noted that community action can have a substantial impact on localities, sometimes helping to achieve substantial economic, social and environmental benefits. There are also national dimensions to volunteering, such as governance or other work for professional and membership bodies.

1.2 Citizenship and identity are intrinsically linked. We have experience of delivering projects that help build citizenship and civic engagement by developing skills, providing opportunities for volunteering, improving understanding of local areas and involving people in making improvements to their area. Such projects help to instill a sense of purpose, civic pride and belonging within a community. This reinforces the identity of both individual and community.

1.3 The planning system also involves participation. People can comment on planning applications or proposed policies and site allocations in development plans. As individuals, people may not feel empowered. But they can act as a group to promote positive change. One of the best examples of this is through the formation of Neighbourhood Forums, where local people cannot just influence local policy, but actually take a lead role in policy-making through the preparation of Neighbourhood Development Plans. These are then subject to a local referendum.

2. Questions 3 and 8

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

2.1 Rights and responsibilities are intrinsically linked. There must be a level playing field for all citizens. This includes:

- Equality of opportunity in terms of education, employment and access to facilities;
- Equality in law and also laws to protect citizens against discrimination, for example on grounds of gender, race, sexuality and disability.

2.2 For citizens, the expectation should be:

- Respect for our democratic processes;
- Respect for other citizens and avoidance of discrimination.

Much of this is already enshrined in law, though such laws continually need to adapt,

2.3 In terms of equality of opportunity, we have serious concerns over current urban policies. There are serious imbalances between different parts of the country. This is discussed in more detail under Question 9.

3. Questions 4 and 7

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

3.1 The UK's embedded democratic systems are fundamental to our way of life. However, the nature of democracy is changing. There are changing expectations. Representative democracy needs to be accompanied by more participatory forms of democracy. This needs to be built into decision-making processes.

3.2 There are various reasons why more participatory forms of democracy are important:

- National and local elections taken place at 4-5 year intervals and are based on the widest range of issues. This creates a democratic deficit in terms of opportunities to influence more detailed decision-making;

- Consultation is often a statutory requirement and this is made easier if there has been effective community engagement from the earliest stage;
- Well organised community engagement is useful in developing political consensus, maintaining public confidence and giving people a stake in their future;
- Community engagement draws on a wide pool of knowledge and expertise, leading to better informed and more realistic decisions and outcomes;
- Together, these factors help to avoid conflict, delay, and additional costs at later stages.

3.3 Consultation often takes place too late in decision-making processes. It is important to engage before detailed work is done on policy development, project development, or design of proposals.

3.4 There are various stages of community engagement and consultation. As a broad generalisation, these are:

Early Engagement (Front Loading): This takes place at the beginning of the process as a means to gathering information and evidence. This should take place before policies, strategies, masterplans, or project proposals are formulated.

Issues and Options: It is important to provide feedback on the outcomes of earlier stages of engagement. For some decisions, people can become involved in considering issues and developing options and solutions. This is the most interactive stage of engagement, potentially.

Consultation: This is a late stage where detailed proposals are tested. A failure to engage at earlier stages can result in difficulties at the consultation stage. Sometimes, consultation is a statutory requirement.

3.5 In addition to more formal methods of community engagement and consultation, participation can occur through a grass-roots approach. One example is the People's Republic of Stokes Croft (PRSC) in Bristol. The community began to 'brand' the area, which is located on the periphery of the city centre. This helped to encourage and grow a sense of civic pride and identity. This helped the area to become a hub for creative people in the city. Diverse street art on prominent gable ends and redundant buildings and also branding of street furniture (bins, benches and grit boxes) inspired a community reaction and helped create a local identity.

3.6 There is a recognised problem of trust in politics. Whilst most hold the concept of democracy in high esteem, the same can't be said with regard to those that stand for office. We have considerable sympathy for politicians who have to take difficult decisions, make compromises whilst being scrutinized by an often-hostile media. This puts many people off standing for office. There are no simple solutions to this; media scrutiny is an essential part of democracy.

3.7 It is also critical that decision makers and those running consultations do so in a manner that encourages a diverse level of engagement. It must be clear how this informs the decision-making process. This is about engaging at all stages. It is not about developing detailed options behind closed doors and then asking which people prefer.

3.8 Other barriers to active citizenship may include the method or language used in consultation. Careful consideration should be given to develop tools and materials appropriate to the audiences and maximizing the opportunity for individuals to feel they can contribute positively to the process.

3.9 We are especially concerned over the hemorrhaging of capacity and expertise in government bodies at all levels, which means that elected representatives sometimes do not have the level of professional and technical support that is required for effective and well-informed decision making. It also means that expertise in community engagement and consultation is often not available. This may have serious consequences in the future.

4. Question 9

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

4.1 Planning and urban policies are often London-centric. Policies to develop the north of the country (the Northern Powerhouse) focus on governance (city regions) and infrastructure, but there is little to address problems of development viability in areas with suppressed land values.

4.2 The London housing crisis dominates the agenda. However, in many parts of the country, socio-economic analysis indicates that economic development should be the priority.

4.3 For example, the Community Infrastructure Levy raises money in areas where the land economy is overheating, but raises nothing to address viability in the areas that need it most.

4.4 At the same time, a disproportionate amount of investment is going into London and the south-east (on a per head basis). The decision to invest in Crossrail 2 in London, but not the Transpennine route in the north, is clearly unbalanced and unjustified. This worsens geographical economic imbalances, rather than addressing them. This is unsustainable, socially, economically and environmentally.

4.5 Such decisions disempower citizens both in London and in the north of the country. In London, there is a relentless cycle of congestion, infrastructure building and development. Many citizens feel that they have little say or influence over the future of their area. This has resulted in acute land inflation, placing housing beyond the economic means of most people.

4.6 At the same time, there is a relative lack of economic opportunity in many other parts of the country. This limits the life opportunities of many people in those areas. There is a serious economic imbalance. Yet Government decisions on expenditure continue to exacerbate geographical economic imbalances.

4.7 Expenditure on housing also exacerbates economic imbalance. Much public money is spend to reduce the price of housing in areas where the land economy is overheating. But even with such subsidies, such housing remains beyond the means of many people. So the policy is at best a very partial success and in reality may actually make the problem worse by further stoking land inflation. The funding should be switched to focus on underperforming areas, to incentivise investment in employment related development. This would result in employment being located in areas with much more affordable house prices. This would help to address economic geographical imbalances, rather than making them worse.

4.8 It should be noted that in areas where there are development viability problems, the solution is often through community-led approaches.

4.9 For Government, we would suggest the following actions:

- To create a test to ensure that infrastructure, cultural and other expenditure is targeted to address economic imbalance, rather than making it worse;
- To create a greater consistency in expenditure per head of population across the country;
- To ensure all polices take account of the needs of the whole country and avoid exacerbating market failures, including both overheating and underperforming land economies; and
- To incentivise and enable development in areas suffering from land and development viability problems.
- To ensure that those involved in the decision making process deliver meaningful and appropriate community engagement consultation from the earliest stage;

5. Question 12

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

5.1 A good example from our own field of work is in neighbourhood planning, where local communities can become involved in formulating policies for the future development of their area. In addition, we work with community organisations that are involved in directly delivering development and other initiatives in their area. These are examples of community leadership.

5.2 Neighbourhood planning is a significant shift to a more participatory form of planning. We would like to see this approach extended into other parts of the planning process. Advantages of neighbourhood planning include:

- A wide range of skills input into process, often including people from the business community and local community groups;
- Policies may be focused on needs of the specific neighbourhood;
- Greater stake in and commitment to the local area;
- It helps to promote community understanding of planning and buy-in to the resulting policies;
- There are examples of neighbourhood plans enabling higher levels of growth;
- The process creates dialogue between neighbourhood planning bodies, local authorities and other organisations.
- Neighbourhood plans can lead to community projects and community-led development.

5.3 Urban Vision Enterprise prepared a plain English guide to neighbourhood planning for Locality, the body leading on the national neighbourhood planning support programme. This is widely used by groups all around England. The guide is available here:

<http://mycommunity.org.uk/resources/neighbourhood-plan-roadmap-guide/>

5.4 Urban Vision Enterprise was co-author to Connections: 12 approaches to relationship-based placemaking (August 2016). In this publication, we explored the benefits and approach of alternative methods of consultation and participation to influence planning policy and encourage participation in the process from creative industries through a process we called ‘Learning Journeys’.

Authorship

This paper has been prepared by Dave Chetwyn, Managing Director of Urban Vision Enterprise, with support from Hannah Barter, Director/Partner.

Dave Chetwyn, MA, MRTPI, IHBC, FInstLM

Chetwyn is Managing Director and Partner of Urban Vision Enterprise and has 29 years' experience in planning and regeneration in the public, private and third sectors.

Other current roles include:

- Managing Director of D²H Ltd.
- Chair of the Board of Directors of the National Planning Forum.
- Design Council CABE Built Environment Expert.
- Associate of the Consultation Institute.

Former roles include:

- Head of Planning Aid England.
- Chair of the Historic Towns Forum (UK membership body).
- Consultant heritage specialist for Crossrail Thames Tunnels Section.
- Chair of the Institute of Historic Building Conservation (UK professional body).
- Team leader in local Government.

Dave has acted as a neighbourhood plan independent examiner and has appeared as a public inquiry expert witness. He is the author of the Locality Roadmap Guide to Neighbourhood Planning and other guidance, including guides to regeneration, community-led housing and conservation professional practice. He authored parts of BS7913.

Dave has leadership and management experience with UK, national and local organisations and a strong track record in third-sector organisational development. He has advised various Government departments, groups, reviews and Parliamentary select committees on planning, regeneration, heritage, urban design, economic development, state aid and community empowerment. He has also developed and delivered numerous projects and programmes at national and local levels.

Dave is a Chartered member of the Royal Town Planning Institute, a full member of the Institute of Historic Building Conservation and a Fellow of the Institute of Leadership and Management.

Hannah Barter, MAUD, Dip T&CP, MRTPI

Hannah Barter is a Director and Partner of Urban Vision Enterprise CIC and has 14 years' experience in planning and community development, working in the public, private and third sectors. Her experience and expertise includes planning, arboriculture, urban design, community engagement and environmental education.

Previous roles include:

- Project Development Coordinator with Urban Vision North Staffordshire (Urban Vision's charitable arm).
- Chair of the RTPI West Midlands Urban Design Forum.
- Planning Officer (development control) with Rutland County Council.
- Planning Officer (development control) with Lichfield District Council.

Hannah was awarded the Chesterton Zoe Dawson Award in 2002-03 for her work on urban green spaces with Birmingham City Council.

Hannah has successfully developed and delivered numerous planning and community projects and is currently providing direct support to various neighbourhood plan groups across England. Some of the most recent projects include:

- Local Heritage Review, Enfield Borough Council;
- Local Heritage Review, Barnet Council;
- Brown Edge Neighbourhood Plan Feasibility Study;
- Linby Masterplan on Safeguarded Land 'Top Wighay Farm';
- Derby City Council THI (Stage 1 and Stage 2 bids and Phase 3).

Hannah is experienced in addressing funders' requirements, including recording outputs and outcomes, project returns and reporting, and producing financial information (including for auditing). Funders she has worked with include ERDF, Heritage Lottery Fund, Arts Council England, Historic England, and The Design Council.

Hannah is a chartered member of the Royal Town Planning Institute.

7 September 2017

Professor Nick Vaughan-Williams and Dr Georg Löfflmann, University of Warwick – written evidence (CCE0083)

1. The evidence presented here is informed by an on-going programme of academic research funded by The Leverhulme Trust (PLP-2015-081) entitled ‘Everyday Narratives of European Border Security and Insecurity’. The research involves in-depth qualitative interviews with 20 focus groups lasting for 90 minutes each and involving more than 150 EU citizens across 9 cities in the UK, Germany, Hungary and Greece: Miskolc (Hungary), Munich (Germany), Nottingham, and Thessaloniki (Greece) in phase one (November to December 2016); and Berlin, Budapest, Cologne, Coventry, and London in phase two (September 2017).
2. The aims of this research project are to investigate notions of citizenship in the context of everyday experiences of the on-going ‘migration crisis’ in Europe with an emphasis on:
 - b. how citizens see their own identity and those of their families, communities, and nations in the context of migration into Europe;
 - c. issues of societal integration, safety, and security, and the perceived threats and benefits of migration; and
 - d. questions of citizens’ awareness of and support for governments’ efforts to enhance border security.
3. The evidence provided here presents our findings in respect of the UK case, which shows that notions of citizenship and belonging in the twenty-first century are threatened by an information gap about who migrants are, where they have come from, their economic and cultural impact, and what their intentions might be; this gap is then filled with sensationalist media coverage, speculation and rumour at the level of the everyday, and this results in the emergence of cultures of hostility and suspicion.
4. While hostile, xenophobic, and sometimes racist narratives are commonplace among ‘everyday’ views on migration in European countries – including the UK – so too are volunteer and welcoming initiatives, calls for governments to do more to protect migrants and refugees, and other expressions of popular support for migrants that are otherwise denied proper representation in dominant accounts. Our research findings reveal not only a varied and heterogeneous picture, but also a common set of demands among UK citizens for access to better sources of information, less sensationalism, greater contextualisation, and higher quality public debate.
5. UK citizens interviewed for our project have articulated a clear need for access to authoritative, unbiased information about what the needs of migrants are, how they can be better supported from an integration perspective, and what they need from citizens in order to thrive in common. Supporting integration and countering suspicion and prejudice in society requires local communities and government to enhance efforts to educate publics in the UK about the costs and benefits of migration, the local and national impact of migrants, and to facilitate an open exchange of information with citizens in the UK.

6. In the UK, net long-term international migration was estimated to be +246,000 in the year ending (YE) in March 2017, down 81,000 from +327,000 in YE March 2016 (Office for National Statistics, 2017). Existing public opinion poll data on popular attitudes towards immigration suggest that European citizens' views have hardened since the start of the 'migration crisis' in 2015, with mass displacements of people on a scale not seen in Europe since the end of World War II. A Eurobarometer survey in 2015 found that 25 EU Member States, including the UK, had majority negative attitudes on migration and 90% of all respondents said that tougher border security was required (Eurobarometer 2015). In 2016, the largest number of applications for asylum (30,603 in total) in the UK came from nationals of Iran (4,192), followed by Pakistan (2,857), Iraq (2,666), Afghanistan (2,341), Bangladesh (1,939), Albania (1,488), and India (1,488) (Office for National Statistics, 2017). In the face of terror attacks across Europe, a Pew research poll in 2016 found that more than 50% of citizens in 8 out of 10 EU countries – including the UK – believed that incoming refugees increased the likelihood of terrorism.
7. Our in-depth qualitative research paints a more complicated picture, which challenges the idea that EU citizens in general and UK citizens in particular are straightforwardly hostile to migrant and refugee communities and automatically link immigration and (in)security. Citizens' concerns and the demands that they make of the media, government, and academia are far more nuanced than existing public opinion polls suggest; these methodologies do not offer detailed insights into why people have certain views on particular issues.
8. In contrast with public opinion data found in the Eurobarometer and Pew surveys, none of our participants called for outright tougher border security either in the European or UK contexts. While UK citizens in particular rejected the notion of complete freedom of movement and agreed that the state had a right to control its borders, this was accompanied by an equally strong rejection of the use of force to defend borders and their militarisation as a political response to the issue of migration into Europe. On the whole, we found no evidence that UK citizens felt that their personal safety and security are threatened directly by migration.
9. When we asked participants in Nottingham what they generally thought about migration and security, no participant made spontaneous claims about the link between irregular migration and international terrorism. More common were concerns about having to compete with migrants for access to housing, welfare, jobs, and social services, and thus issues of economic and societal security (Buzan et al 1998). The impact of immigration on cultural identity and economic security in Britain was overall of far greater concern to citizens than issues of national security or fears about public safety, which are often portrayed in tabloid media in a sensationalist fashion (Daily Express 2016).

10. In the UK context specifically there was also a prevailing sense that identity, social cohesion and neighbourliness had been challenged by the pace of economic and social change. Local communities with high immigration levels and relatively low average household incomes such as Boston (BBC 2016) feel alienated as a result of what they perceive to be a weakening of bonds between people at the level of the everyday. There were specific concerns about public spaces and the potential for anti-social behaviour such as drinking in public areas. The cultural Otherness of migrants was also debated in terms of linguistic difference, for example concerns about the ability of migrant children to follow classes in English and the potential impact on the quality of education provided in classes with high levels of migrant students.
11. However, rather than protesting the presence of migrants or their incompatibility with ‘British values’ per se, concerns were expressed generally over the limited availability of public services for all citizens in the UK, in particular education and healthcare. As such fears about migration were exacerbated by existing conditions of fiscal austerity, which have negatively impacted public services.
12. Many, but not all, of the UK citizens we listened to spoke also of the positive effects of migration and diversity for the UK economy, society, and culture. Some participants questioned whether enough efforts were being made by central and local government to promote integration between citizens and newly-arrived refugees, particularly from Syria. Others also referred to what they perceived to be an ethical obligation to support migrant communities affected by UK foreign policy decisions such as support for the NATO-led military intervention in Libya.
13. Our evidence suggests that some UK citizens are confused about how people on the move should be categorised and that this confusion also impacts on notions of British identity and citizenship. Terms such as ‘refugee’, ‘asylum-seeker’, ‘economic migrant’, and ‘illegal migrant’ are often misunderstood and used interchangeably. The distinct issues of migration into the EU and migration within the EU are a source of particular misunderstanding. In turn many participants saw this as creating opportunities for the far-right and the cultivation of public atmospheres breeding hatred, xenophobia, and racism. Conceptual confusion means that different legal categories are bundled together and thus there is an urgent need to enhance levels of education in schools about different types of migration, their histories, and the legal status of different kinds of people seeking entry to the UK as part of the citizenship curriculum.

14. Confusion about the categorisation of migrants is further exacerbated by a lack of authoritative and objective information about migration into Europe and the UK. Citizens we listened to did not generally know where to turn to for accurate and unbiased data about the primary causes of population displacements, how much financial support migrants and refugee communities are given and by whom, and how much access to social welfare, housing, and jobs they are offered and on what basis. There is widespread criticism of the role of the media in sensationalising issues relating to migration and perceptions of ‘fake news’. There is a risk that such an information deficit is then filled with misinformation and fuels cultures of envy, rivalry, and distrust, leading to a further erosion of social bonds and disintegration.
15. Citizens we met welcomed the opportunity to air their views in the form of discussion groups (Löfflmann and Vaughan-Williams 2017a). They urged greater engagement and dialogue of this kind between government, citizens, and researchers. This challenges the notion that ours is an age marked by disengagement from politics and widespread disdain of expertise (Löfflmann and Vaughan-Williams 2017b). Rather, preliminary findings support the conclusion of previous studies (Stevens and Vaughan-Williams, 2016) that participatory forms of research where citizens can engage and feel that their voices might be heard in the policy-making process could positively reinvigorate citizenship and modes of belonging in the UK.
16. In conclusion, our research findings suggest that many UK citizens do not know where to access objective, authoritative information about migration, which has a diverse impact on contemporary notions of UK citizenship, identity, and belonging. This creates a knowledge gap, which is in turn filled with speculation, inaccuracy, or misinformation that can contribute to everyday cultures of hostility and suspicion of migrant and refugee communities, which erodes social bonds. Our research suggests that the UK government should provide better and more accurate public information on migration, enhance integration between citizens and migrants in local communities, and strengthen efforts to counter anti-migration sentiment and prejudice via educational programmes; these measures would support stronger citizenship and civic engagement in the UK.

References

- B. Buzan et al, (1998) Security: A New Framework for Analysis (Lynne Rienner).
- EU Commission, Standard Eurobarometer 84, Autumn 2015.
- C. Cook, “How immigration changed Boston, Lincolnshire,” BBC News, 10 May 2016.

Professor Nick Vaughan-Williams and Dr Georg Löfflmann, University of Warwick – written evidence (CCE0083)

G. Löfflmann and N. Vaughan-Williams, "Narrating Identity, Border Security, and Migration: Critical Focus Groups and the Everyday as Problematic," Critical Studies on Security, 16 June 2017.

G. Löfflmann and N. Vaughan-Williams, "European citizens want information on migration – not higher walls," The Conversation, 3 August 2017.

Office for National Statistics, Migration Statistics Quarterly Report: August 2017

G. Sheldrick, "Fresh terrorism fears sparked after plan to rehome 20,000 refugees in Britain," Daily Express, 19 July 2016.

D. Stevens and N. Vaughan-Williams, (2016) Everyday Security Threats: Perceptions, Experiences, Consequences (Manchester University Press).

R Wike, B. Stokes, and K. Simmons, "Europeans Fear Wave of Refugees Will Mean More Terrorism, Fewer Jobs," Pew Research Center, 11 July 2016.

About the authors:

Professor Nick Vaughan-Williams is Professor of International Security in the Department of Politics and International Studies (PAIS) at the University of Warwick. He is the author of Europe's Border Crisis (Oxford University Press, 2015, 2017) and Border Politics (Edinburgh University Press, 2009, 2012) (Gold Winner, 2011 Association for Borderlands Studies Book Award) and co-author of Everyday Security Threats (Manchester University Press, 2016) and Critical Security Studies (Routledge, 2010, 2014).

Dr Georg Löfflman is Research and Teaching Fellow in International Security in the Department of Politics and International Studies (PAIS) at the University of Warwick. He is the author of American Grand Strategy under Obama (Edinburgh University Press, 2017) and has published in the journals, Geopolitics, Critical Studies on Security and Asian Security.

6 September 2017

Ms Julianne Viola – written evidence (CCE0103)

Reason for Submitting Evidence

- I am a doctoral researcher and civic studies scholar at the University of Oxford. The evidence presented here contains unique insight into the thoughts, experiences, and needs of the youth population related to the concerns of citizenship and civic engagement. This evidence has been taken directly from the in-depth interviews I conducted with adolescents for my Ph.D. thesis from 2015-2016 in the United States, a nation that has recently experienced similar political and technological tensions to those within the United Kingdom.

Questions to be Addressed

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?
2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Executive Summary

- Citizenship in the 21st century means a legal status, sense of belonging, or both, and these meanings carry weight in how people identify as citizens.
- Sense of belonging a key factor for any individual who is, or seeks to become, a citizen. Fostering a sense of belonging is critical to welcoming into Britain immigrants and naturalised British citizens alike.

Evidence

Citizenship in the 21st century constitutes a legal status, sense of belonging, or both, and these meanings carry weight in people's identities as citizens. Each person's definition of citizenship is directly related to whether and how they identify as citizens themselves: for some young people, citizenship is a legal status, while for others, it is a sense of belonging, regardless of legal status (Viola, 2017). This corroborates findings from Osler and Starkey (2006), who note, citizenship goes beyond legal status and political activity - it is also a "sense of belonging" (p. 441). Primarily, the sense of belonging in a community is a key component of feeling like a citizen – whether a natural-born citizen, a naturalized citizen, or a person living in the country and not yet a legal citizen. The ceremonial aspect of becoming a citizen may serve as a welcoming gesture to new citizens, but may not be as important to some people as the rights and responsibilities that come with this legal status of citizen.

For people living in the country but not yet naturalised citizens, there may be some frustration in feeling like a citizen through a sense of belonging, but not yet having the legal status. Several participants in my study had immigrated to the United States in infancy or early childhood, but after spending 14 – 16 years in the country, still are not yet naturalized (Viola, 2016). These young people expressed frustration for being a part of the state school system and active members of their communities, yet still unable to have same rights and privileges as their natural-born citizen peers. One participant noted that she does not take citizenship for granted, and realizes it is a legal status to be attained and worked for. It upsets her that her natural-born peers do not have to work for their citizenship, and they take it for granted (Viola, 2016). Improving the legal pathways by which individuals can become legal citizens would ease this frustration, and provide soon-to-be citizens with a greater sense of efficacy and continued contributions to British society.

To strengthen people's identity as citizens, Britain must make all people feel like they belong, regardless of religious, ethnic, or socioeconomic background. In my study, some young people, though becoming naturalized American citizens, felt a closer connection to their home country, and still wished to enjoy the cultural practices, dress, and communities of those home countries, while also embracing the new culture and traditions of America (Viola, 2017). While some naturalized citizens do feel proud to become citizens of their new country, it is also important for Britain to encourage and appreciate expression of the new citizens' home country and culture in everyday life.

Civic engagement also has different manifestations. For some peoples, civic engagement constitutes voting in elections, when one has reached the legal age to do so. For others, civic engagement means any activity that would improve the community, including picking up litter, volunteering in a soup kitchen, or petitioning against the closing of a school (Viola, 2017). As social media has become ever present in daily life in the 21st century, it has also become a means for people to interact with other people and content through social media (Viola, 2014). Many people are now learning about and coordinating protests – such as the Women's March on 21 January 2017 – through their social media networks.

Recommendations for Action by the Government

- The British Government must embrace differences among members of its population – citizens or not – and talk to the sections of society that are deemed “left behind.” Engaging with these communities directly can help to build bridges within and between communities, and support civic engagement in throughout the entire country. By directly engaging with these “left behind” communities, as I did in my research, Britain can better understand the needs of these communities and what might foster a greater sense of belonging and desire to engage civically.
- Ensuring a sense of belonging is to welcoming into Britain immigrants and new British citizens alike. At the same time, Britain should embrace naturalized citizens' home countries and cultures that they have brought to the United Kingdom. There is great social and economic value to diversity and inclusion in society.

References

Osler, A., & Starkey, H. (2006). Education for democratic citizenship: a review of research, policy and practice 1995–2005. Research Papers in Education, 21 (4), 433-466.

Viola, J. (June, 2017). Civil Discourse in the Digital Age: How American youth use social media for civic engagement. Poster presented at the International Conference on Education and Democratic Citizenship, Institute of Education, University College London, United Kingdom.

Viola, J. (November, 2016). Civil Discourse in the Digital Age: How American youth use social media for civic engagement. Presented at the Learning and New Technologies Research Group, Department of Education, University of Oxford, United Kingdom.

Viola, J. (November, 2014). Teen social media use, civic engagement, and civil discourse. Presented at the Department of Education, University of Oxford, United Kingdom.

7 September 2017

Voluntary Action Leeds – written evidence (CCE0178)

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

The citizens of Leeds create its vibrancy - a city which has an undeniably strong identity within the nation, and a great belief in itself. Citizens have created that identity, continue to contribute to its successes, and share in its limitations.

Active participation in citizenship takes many forms, from one of the longest established carnivals in Europe, celebrating its 50th anniversary, to welcoming millions of visitors to Leeds and the wider Yorkshire of which it is part. From creating jobs, to supporting incoming communities - Leeds has sufficient belief in itself to be able to showcase its successes and share them with the rest of the world.

The wider success of the city's economy, cultural and sporting life masks real differences. Whilst Leeds has amongst the highest level of business start-ups in the country, the highest growth of private sector jobs and is the strongest centre for digital growth outside London, at the same time we grapple with slow productivity growth, lower levels of 16-64 year olds with NVQ4 or higher, low levels of exports, 150,000 people living within the 10 most deprived wards in England and 80,000 people in jobs paying less than the Real Living wage. Leeds has long been recognised as having a 'twin track' economy, with communities living in close proximity having very different expectations of life and life experiences, due to their ability or otherwise to share and gain from our economic successes.

In this context, civic engagement and identity are complex and multi-layered concepts. Some people and communities may be fully engaged in their locality, or in their community of interest, but not engaged in the city as a whole. For example, some of those communities with the highest levels of poverty and poorly paid jobs, have created the vibrancy and success of the aforementioned carnival. These successes may have a life of their own, and may often be outside of, or in addition to the leadership which comes from business, from politicians, or from other sectors.

Leeds considers its multi-dimensional diversity as a strength, and we are working hard to ensure we tackle income inequality, with targeted discussions and actions on how to improve living conditions and incomes for those at the bottom of the income/wealth distribution. Consequently, we have a focus on ensuring that all parts of the community can share equally in its success and recognise that the resilience, strength and engagement of diverse communities comes in many different forms.

The citizens of Leeds already demonstrate self-reliance, and the ability to engage. Enhancing the positive influence communities have over their own lives and the lives of those around them helps solve society's challenges and engenders a sense of being part of a greater whole. Underpinning this is civic engagement - when citizens are involved on a more practical level in the political process and in tackling local issues (or in maximising the impact of local assets). Civic partners and communities can engage with each other as contributors to the local economy and civic life.

This has increased in importance following the Brexit debate, during which substantial parts of the UK demonstrated dis-engagement from politics in general, and cynicism about civic life. The outcome has created potential for people to feel un-wanted and dis-engaged – often leading to further increases in hate crime, mental health issues and people feeling they have to leave the UK despite contributing positively to the local economy.

The Lord Chancellor in 1998 said ""We should not, must not, dare not, be complacent about the health and future of British democracy. Unless we become a nation of engaged citizens, our democracy is not secure."

It is essential to support harmony, good inter-cultural relationships and for people to feel safe and welcome. Similarly, positive interventions that reduce tensions in society, underpin collective action and support the development of shared values bring citizens together. From this work a sense of citizenship will flow.

Leeds is working proactively with local citizens on the above challenges.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

A measure of success is the extent to which citizens are currently engaged in wider society. This takes many forms, and whilst some engagement may be seen as 'passive', for example watching sport, following a football team can actually be one of the most highly engaged forms of self-identity and wider belonging.

Shared events are an essential part of this, however equally (or perhaps more) important are opportunities to celebrate togetherness, shared values and positive social action. In Leeds these include large- scale events such as Leeds West Indian Carnival and Leeds Pride, along with the recent 'Great Get Together' Initiative and a whole range of smaller, more localised festivals and galas in all parts of the city; examples include the Kirkstall and Chapel Allerton festivals, the Beeston, Gipton, Hunslet, Middleton and Seacroft galas, and many others. It is notable again that many of these take place in some of the most disadvantaged communities in the city. In addition the Lord Mayor has an annual event to celebrate and thank very small, volunteer led groups for helping make Leeds a better place. Identity is also closely associated, for great numbers of people, with their religious or spiritual beliefs, , which in many forms contributes to how people engage with wider society.

People need to feel accepted and part of a shared purpose, this is vital at a local level. However, this shared purpose may not always contribute positively to society. People can be surrounded by influences that reinforce their negative perceptions of the society around them (e.g. media, extremist groups, peer groups etc.). Consequently it is essential that these negative influencers are countered by positive interactions and influences, and that this begins in early childhood, supported by communities and all service providers with which a person comes in contact (e.g. schools, social/sports groups, DWP, employers).

An example of local work is a series of Breakthrough Projects (led by Leeds City Council), focusing on tackling shared priorities, one of which is “Strong communities benefitting from a strong city”.

The aim of this work is to ensure:

“Leeds is a welcoming city, a city of sanctuary and one with a growing economy and increasingly diverse population. Whilst Leeds is one of the fastest growing cities in the UK—we know that not everyone is benefiting equally from the city’s economic success and there are high levels of deprivation in our city. This project works to deliver the Council’s strong economy, compassionate city ambition and to ensure Leeds is a welcoming city with cohesive, resilient and sustainable communities”. This project aims to:

- a. Improve resilience
- b. Sustain neighbourhoods
- c. Promote civility, mutual understanding and cohesion
- d. Promote conversations and redefine community level problem solving
- e. Develop capacity to resolve and mediate conflict
- f. Raise aspirations, particularly amongst the young
- g. Align council service delivery to community need, and
- h. Improve access to opportunities in the city.

These aims are underpinned by a range of specific projects/activities delivered by a range of partners across Leeds – more detail is available on request.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Leeds City Council and partners in other sectors have set out what they see as being the key characteristics of a thriving community, amongst which the key is:

“Members of the community feel they have control over their own lives, and influence over their own futures; they understand their role, and their contribution to the common good is recognised.”

The concept of enforcement is not recognised within this document. The statement represents a compact between the citizens and the city, each holding the other to account. It does however require commitment on both sides, a commitment by civic leaders to seek engagement, and a commitment by communities to participate. Success or failure is measured by the health and sustainability of communities, by the degree to which communities are heard, by the extent to which they are asked to contribute.

Leeds Social Value charter has been developed by the local third sector and City Council and subsequently adopted by all other key strategic partners. The Charter sets out the commitment of partners in the city to promote social responsibility, deliver social, environmental, and economic value, and maximise the impact in Leeds of the “Leeds pound”. This is set within the context of a vision for Leeds as a healthy, fair, compassionate and welcoming city in which its citizens benefit from the city’s economic growth. The charter asserts that the continued success of Leeds is dependent on enterprising and thriving private, public and third sector partners that work together, alongside active citizens and local communities, for the benefit of the whole city.

Leeds also has a ‘Social Contract’ with some of its citizens which seeks to support more active engagement with communities in the delivery of local services and promotes initiatives that aim to deliver local improvements, support the common good and underpin good community relations.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

With the support of statutory agencies in Leeds, an extensive network of forums operates within the third sector and beyond; including a network for the organisations and activities who seek to engage children and young people in the wider life of the city. Through this work there is an ongoing broad range of activities, including a recent deputation from the Leeds Youth Parliament to a Full Council meeting which led the council to support their request for the voting age to be reduced. As a result, the Leader of Leeds City Council subsequently wrote to the Minister concerned to give support for reducing the minimum age for voting to 16.

There is a growing view that the voting age can no longer be different from that at which a person may legally marry, and the engagement of young people should include a consultation, which includes them, on how that could and should be achieved.

The annual 'Make Your Mark' youth consultation in the UK was very successful in Leeds. Schools, youth groups and Leeds Youth Councillors worked to get as many young people in Leeds to take part in the ballot. In Leeds, 14,308 young people (20% youth population) from all communities took part in choosing the issue that is most important to them. In Leeds the fourth most important issue for young people was 'Votes at 16': 1660 votes.

The rapidly growing access to digital voting may also be one of those areas which should be open to consultation, and may also be a way of involving younger and more mobile people in political processes.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Education is clearly crucial, however identity seems as much influenced by issues in which people are engaged by choice outside of formal education. Where people feel they are left behind, ignored, that their views are not valued or even sought, are less likely to have a sense of belonging, and no amount of instruction will change their minds. Education can help frame the choices people make in their wider lives. Choices may be made within education which opens wider horizons for those involved, which could include volunteering; however volunteering should always remain voluntary otherwise its value is minimized. There clearly should be a place within a formal curriculum for young people to learn about the role of a citizen, and it is likely that this happens, informally at present, through various topics from history to aspects of social studies in all its forms. Mock elections have taken place within school settings over many years, and real elections are used to appoint to school positions held by students in many schools. Standardisation could come from reviewing the curriculum, but it is more likely that imaginative use of informal processes within the education system will be equally effective. It could be a measure of a good school to enquire to what extent they extend responsibility and involvement to students in constructive ways to encourage engagement and active citizenship.

Migration into the city in recent years, including from the European Union, has created a vibrant and dynamic school population, where over 190 languages are now spoken. This increase has brought both advantages in terms of the vibrancy of the school population and also challenges with pressure on some schools to cope with additional place demands and a need to ensure that all children do well at learning. Schools have developed a broad range of quality teaching techniques that are helping to improve education for all groups in our schools and to help ensure all pupils feel part of the community.

- 6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

When volunteering becomes compulsory it is no longer volunteering (it becomes unpaid work experience) and its value is much reduced. A national programme can provide the framework and could include learning about the political process; however delivery should be more closely associated with those who already provide volunteering programmes. Similarly, activity to support active citizenship should relate to the participant's own community/neighbourhood or city and aim to impact on local priorities. Provision should also always push beyond areas/places where we know young people will choose to get involved and into communities where they least likely to access mainstream opportunities.

Volunteering could be an option within a formal curriculum as long as it remains optional. It could have a theory and exam associated with it.

- 7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

We need to champion the importance of civic engagement and encourage more people to be more involved as it helps create a more engaged and democratic community.

If we work on the basis that communities naturally wish to engage, then the role of elected and paid leaders is to ensure that barriers to engagement are removed. If we need to sell the idea of engagement, we should be questioning whether the right questions are being asked. In Leeds we are working to provide the resources and structures that enable citizens to take control for themselves, on the assumption that this will lead to more local people becoming involved – in the workplace, in schools and in communities.

When people see local politics as a route to take more control over their lives, they are unlikely to need further encouragement to get involved in political processes - not necessarily by taking a paid position, but by voting, getting involved in local initiatives and volunteering.

We recognise that it is people who create communities and communities which create towns and cities; that the purpose of local and central government is to meet the needs of individuals and communities. However, once created, government (whether central or local) can take on a life and role of its own and become the focus of leadership; especially as it has the resources within its grasp to do those things which no individual or community can achieve. Central government needs to create the context in which civic engagement can happen and provide tangible support to local governments to proactively encourage it at a local level. The key risk associated with leadership, power and difficult challenges is that it can lead to being defensive; locally we strive to share information - about budgets, issues, crises and work - with stakeholders and people and then co-create solutions - aiming for it to be bottom up, not top down.

Many Third Sector Organisations are based on the concept of democracy, fairness, engagement, all of which are key values for civic engagement. It's a core part of how we work, relying on "leading without authority" and helping people to help themselves. Their responsibility is to demonstrate best practice and the benefits of this type of approach to other sectors, as well as encouraging the values and ethos of the third sector to permeate whole society. There remains, however, a risk that an over reliance on contracts leads Third Sector organisations to see funders as their primary customers and therefore to meet their needs first, however, smart approaches to (re)commissioning help tackle this. Government is also based on a formal structure of representative democracy at all levels. It is in the processes between democratic elections that "engagement" has its part to play, recognising that it is always the "detail" which has its impact, finally, on communities.

Government can support engagement as a necessary part of democracy, filling in the gaps between the formal process – removing obstacles to involvement, reducing austerity measures, looking at the true impact of decisions such as welfare benefits reform, taking time out to listen to local people and take on board their concerns, providing potential funding for local projects. For example, to support integration and involvement of migrant communities in society there needs to be a much better understanding of migrant rights, entitlements and responsibilities (by both migrants and service providers) and of the services that are available to migrants. Indeed, many services providing advice to migrants are unclear on the services that are available to meet migrant needs, including those offered by third sector providers and community based activities.

Lack of knowledge and information further compound the problems caused by the challenges highlighted above, impeding the ability of migrants to make informed choices. This reinforces the need for access to advocacy; advice; legal support; integration; navigation and informed social networks.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

There almost certainly is a set of values which are common to most people, but agreeing what those are may be problematic. Ultimately, people's values are strongly influenced by how the world treats them, and what society can do is develop a framework (such as the Declaration of Human Rights) but it is almost impossible to impose values on individuals. Leeds has developed a shared set of characteristics which we feel define a thriving community, on the understanding that all organisations should support the achievement of one or more of these characteristics – from this approach, shared values and understanding should follow.

Our ambition for Leeds is to be a compassionate city with a strong economy – for example, migrant communities are valuable contributors to the city's economy, culture and diversity and Leeds aspires to ensure people are welcomed and supported. Leeds has a long-held commitment to support asylum seekers and refugees and is dedicated to being a city of sanctuary. It is well known that many refugees play an active and invaluable role economically and whilst many asylum seekers are not permitted to work, many are active in their communities participating in volunteering and so make a huge contribution to the civic and cultural life of the city.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

When individuals and communities see a disparity between the values which we are thought to hold dear (see Qu. 8) and the way those values are implemented, they feel that they are, as the question suggests, “left behind”. Some examples:

- People and groups living and operating in the more deprived communities see some people getting richer and being more successful and feel cut off from this because of their own personal circumstances. They see the gap widening in society.
- Our ambition is for people in Leeds to be safe, feel safe and live their lives in strong cohesive communities. Being safe is a concern for all communities in Leeds. It is particularly relevant to migrant communities given increases in reported and unreported hate crime following the EU referendum, planned changes to legislation, the potential consequences of Brexit on some migrant communities and the negative perceptions of migrants in some communities which contribute to a feeling of unease in what feels to migrants, a hostile environment. Unfortunately many migrant families also live in areas of the country that are most deprived where they are often seen as being in competition with the local community, so they face issues of acceptance as well as facing poverty and disadvantage.
- Young people are more transient. They no longer grow up, study and work in the same area. They may only be in a city for the period they are at college or university and then move on and have to regularly re-create local roots. The rise of social media means face-to-face contact and local engagement reduces so they potentially feel less connected to their local physical community.

- Older people may become more isolated as they live longer but often with health and mobility issues. The concept of looking after the extended family is breaking down, even in cultural situations where this has hitherto been a core part of their culture (e.g. Indian families).

- People living in rural communities face a reduction in local services as shops, petrol stations and pubs find it harder to be economically successful so local services are reduced.

- Many disabled people face isolation due to not being able to access appropriate public transport (wheelchair accessible taxis, trains and buses). The welfare reforms also prevent some of them from being able to afford to participate in activities that promote cohesion.

To overcome barriers we need to look at the situation that the various “excluded” groups are in and discuss, with them, how they can overcome barriers as opposed to imposing solutions that people who are not in that situation think are a good idea. We need to encourage more cross-sector/cross community interaction i.e. young and old, black and white. A local example of this where elected members and people with learning disabilities (LD) ‘swap seats’ and use the council chamber to debate issue that matter to people with LD. This has then developed into a reference group called the People’s Parliament and there is an annual meeting (using this format). This work has created a much greater understanding of the priorities for the LD community and has also created long lasting relationships between the influencers/politicians/decision makers in the city, and people with LD who, historically, struggled to be heard.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Civic engagement and social cohesion are very closely inter-linked. If people don’t feel part of the local community, don’t see themselves as active, local citizens they potentially have less interest in and incentive to get more involved. This leads to isolation and the creation of ghetto-type communities. They potentially develop less respect for traditional (positive) values and laws/regulations, as they don’t see themselves as part of that local society, which can lead to civic unrest, crime and disaffection. We need to develop more mutual respect for other people’s cultures, traditions, values, religious beliefs. We need to take more time out to learn and listen. We need to embrace local diversity and see how this adds to society.

We must aim to ensure that the level of increased diversity in places like Leeds adds to community cohesion by encouraging greater integration but we face a situation whereby we have different generations of people being involved. Some of the first-wave migrants from the Caribbean and Asia found it hard to integrate, some still have language difficulties which are a real barrier to integration. Their children are now the first generation to be born in the UK and they are now of an age when some of them are also having children. These subsequent generations often feel very British – this is their home, they have shared values, they are born and grow up in a physical space and cannot see why they are not accepted as being a citizen of this country, because that's very much how they feel.

We need to celebrate diversity, bust the myths, encourage people to learn about different cultures, find role models from all communities and highlight what they bring to society. We need to encourage people from different backgrounds to both work and play together, to create stronger local communities.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

The changes to population in Leeds are set against a backdrop of ongoing immigration legislative changes, uncertainty following Brexit, sustained financial challenges to public sector services and a decline in migrant third sector funding. Local research has identified four key cross cutting challenges experienced across migrant groups which need to be addressed in order to meet shared migrant need. These are:

- An improved understanding of migrant rights, entitlements and responsibilities by both migrants and service providers, in particular, a better understanding of immigration status. The research findings suggest that this understanding could be improved by services being more supportive in their approach to migrants and facilitating access to services helping migrants to feel more welcomed and supported.
- Inadequate access to available services as a consequence of a lack of knowledge amongst migrants of the services that are available to them. Indeed, many services providing advice to migrants are unclear on the services that are available to meet migrant needs, including those offered by third sector providers and community based activities.
- Language barriers contribute to ineffective communication and present a significant hurdle to migrants when accessing services. Moreover, even when English is spoken by a migrant, or, when interpreter provision is available, there can still be gaps in communication and a fuller appreciation of the context for the migrant.

- Lack of knowledge and information further compound the problems caused by the challenges articulated in points 1-3 above, impeding the ability of migrants to make informed choices. This impedance reinforces the need for access to: advocacy; advice; legal support; integration; navigation and informed social networks.

ESOL classes are a fundamental necessity and require national resourcing.

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Some positive examples from Leeds are:

- West Indian Carnival – is a celebration of the history of African-Caribbean people and their cultures but is fully integrated into the Leeds calendar and enjoyed by people of all colours and creeds, and ages.
- The Leeds bid for European City of Culture is an opportunity to showcase and celebrate the city's diversity.
- Leeds Pride celebrates the city's thriving LGBT+ community and is one of the last remaining free Pride events, attracting visitors from across the country.
- Light Night Leeds is an annual free multi-arts and light festival which takes over Leeds City Centre over two nights and attracts thousands of Leeds' residents. A range of volunteering opportunities places communities at the heart of the event.
- Local celebrations recognising the impact of major sporting events (e.g. the Olympics and Paralympics) and the way that this creates positive local role models (Nicola Adams, the Brownlee brothers, Kadija Khan) for people that engender a sense of civic pride and provide inspiration.
- Leeds Young Peoples Leadership Programme Leadership Days, a programme aimed to develop the leadership, confidence and influence of young people from the Muslim community, engendering a new generation of young people equipped with the skills and understanding to play a more active role in the city's success.
- Migrant Access Project Plus (MAP+) - Leeds has been successful in securing funding through the government's Controlling Migration Programme. The funding will build on the existing award-winning Leeds MAP and provide for additional MAP satellites in West and South Leeds to address issues and concerns in relation to:

Voluntary Action Leeds – written evidence (CCE0178)

- working with residents to minimise low level tensions in communities and aid integration
- ensuring migrants access services in the most efficient and effective way with a view to reducing costs and pressures on services.

8 September 2017

Volunteering Matters – written evidence (CCE0242)

Introduction

Volunteering Matters welcomes the opportunity to provide evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee. We wish to set out the existing and potential role of volunteering and social action in supporting citizenship and civil engagement.

Volunteering Matters develops and delivers volunteer-led solutions to some of the most significant challenges facing individuals and their communities today. We know, through years of successful work, that investing in people through the power of volunteering makes a tangible difference, building stronger, more cohesive communities and achieving lasting results.

We would welcome the opportunity to provide further evidence in person to the Select Committee. If the members thought this useful and interesting we would aim, as part of verbal evidence, to ask one of the young women who set up and run the WASSUP project (described in our answer to question 12) to attend alongside us.

Question 1 - What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

1.1 Volunteering and social action are key forms of civic engagement. For us, civic engagement means the ways in which citizens can and do play an active part in one or more of the communities they are part of. In this submission, we will focus primarily on forms of civic engagement whereby people act, individually or as part of a group, to try to enhance the way their community functions.

1.2 Volunteering becomes part of a person's identity, how they see themselves. They are no longer just defined by the music they listen to, the political or religious beliefs they have, the job they do or once did. Their volunteering, their civic engagement, is part of their identity, how they think of themselves. Once that happens, volunteering becomes a long-term, sustainable engagement and that is to the benefit of both the individual and the society they live in.

1.3 When people volunteer they do more than help the 'beneficiary' of their activities. There are significant benefits to the volunteer, which in turn has a benefit to the local community and the UK as a whole. Volunteering has a role in providing routes out of poverty through the acquisition of skills and confidence, social integration and employment. This benefits those at the margins of the labour market, such as recent migrants.

1.4 In 2016, working with University College London, Volunteering Matters delivered a comprehensive survey encompassing the views of 607 of our volunteers. The results revealed that:

62% reported increased confidence in their own abilities following volunteering (rising to 90% for volunteers aged 13 to 25 years old).

86% said their sense of making a positive contribution increased through volunteering.

59% said their sense of feeling part of the community increased through volunteering

56% said their appreciation of other people's cultures increased through volunteering – rising to 74% for people from black and minority ethnic (BAME) backgrounds.

Question 2 - Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

2.1 Government can play a strong role in nurturing the environment in which civic engagement can flourish and this should include supporting a continued drive to promote and support the development of volunteering amongst all UK citizens, so that it is seen more clearly by all as a valued characteristic of British citizenship.

Question 3 - Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

3.1 Civic engagement is at its best when it is freely chosen. Civic engagement is something people should choose to do.

Question 5 - What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

5.1 Education has a role in teaching and encouraging good citizenship. A key part of effective citizenship education is supporting the pupils identify challenges or problems within their communities with a view to contributing their time to make things better.

5.2 Government can better promote and facilitate volunteering amongst school age children. According to the National Youth Social Action Survey 2015:

“Young people who report starting to participate in social action at a younger age were more likely than those starting later to be classified as ‘committed’ to social action. There may be some advantages to encouraging children younger than 10 to get involved in social action, in order to establish a habit of social action among the cohort of interest.”

5.3 Government should encourage and recognise volunteering within schools; it should become the norm – part and parcel of being a good community school. Already volunteers in schools help and support teachers in improving outcomes for the most disadvantaged pupils. For example, in 2016-17, 40 schools across the UK were supported by volunteers from the corporate sector in our Employee Volunteering schemes alone. Over 600 students were supported with literacy, numeracy, foreign languages and general mentoring. 98% of students stated they had seen an improvement in their volunteer-supported subjects.

Question 6 - Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

6.1 Full-time volunteering schemes such as the National Citizen Service and our own Full-Time Volunteering Programme (which has been running since 1962) can be very successful in engaging young people as active citizens. They should therefore be encouraged and supported but participation should not be made compulsory. Compulsion would undermine their ethos and could be counter-productive. Low levels of formal volunteering in most former Eastern bloc countries appear to be linked to historical suspicion of government ‘volunteering’ schemes which were not fully voluntary. Attention should also be given to what happens after a full-time volunteering placement has been completed. An understanding of other forms of ongoing volunteering opportunities should be imparted wherever appropriate.

Question 7 - How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

7.1 Government has a unique responsibility to lead and create an enabling environment. Its previous proposal to introduce a statutory right to volunteering leave could have been symbolically and practically important. The proposal should be brought back for further discussion. Please also see our response to Question 12 where we outline some of the projects we run that encourage greater civic participation.

Question 9 - Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

9.1 Disabled people often face multiple exclusions. Their potential to contribute positively to the life of their community is often overlooked by a negative focus on capacity. This is a cultural and attitudinal problem, which imaginative investment can begin to overcome. Our Choices programme offers independent living support to a wide range of people, including people with disabilities and learning difficulties, older people and families. With the support of full time volunteers from the UK and abroad, who are available for support with a wide range of tasks, including domestic tasks, companionship, supported holidays, enjoying an active social life and accessing the community, those who previously could not live alone are able to live and feel independent. Results from a recent evaluation of the project show that 79% feel more actively engaged within their community following their involvement in the programme.

9.2 Our work also supports disabled people to volunteer. Active and Supported Volunteering is a project which empowers adults with a disability, or long-term physical or health condition, to capitalise on their skills, interests and goals for the future.

For more information on barriers to volunteering please see our report <https://volunteeringmatters.org.uk/app/uploads/2017/09/Barriers-and-Benefits-1.pdf> , published September 12, 2017.

Question 12 - Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

12.1 WASSUP (Women Against Sexual exploitation and violence Speak UP) was set up in 2012 by a small group of young black or minority ethnic (BME) women in Ipswich working with Volunteering Matters. They felt strongly that there needed to be more support for women who have experienced sexual exploitation, honour-based violence or domestic abuse and wanted to break down cultural barriers that prevent young women from accessing support.

The WASSUP group consists of 20 young women who between them deliver 170 volunteering hours a month. They have developed an interactive toolkit comprising a workshop and training package which is designed to be delivered in schools and to professionals to raise awareness of the issues of domestic abuse, trafficking and sexual violence within communities and to help to create safer pathways for reporting these crimes and improving professional's practice.

In the last year, the toolkit was delivered to 260 children in ten schools in Suffolk as well as to young people in Belgrade, Nantes and Strasbourg and to Suffolk Police and a national conference on domestic abuse. The school sessions have been particularly aimed at young people with English as a second language and in areas where teachers have identified child sexual exploitation (CSE) and violence as issues. The workshops can now be delivered to young males as well as females but always in a single gender group.

All young people who participated in the sessions reported that they were relevant to them and that they felt more informed about CSE and knew where to go if they needed support. WASSUP also deliver public-facing campaigns via Twitter and the use of flashmobs. They work closely with the police and other agencies to identify young people who may benefit from taking part.

12.2 LEARNING MATTERS

Learning Matters is a study programme aimed at 16-19 year olds and delivered by Volunteering Matters with funding from central government. The programme is a blend of academic study and community engagement so that the young people involved not only learn skills but also begin to participate more in their local community. The academic aspect includes ESOL, English, Maths, Employability, Business Administration and how to access independent advice and guidance. The 'enrichment', or community engagement, aspects include civic life sessions with local MPs and councillors, sessions to enable them to navigate the NHS, understanding their rights (supported by local police), money management, social action volunteering, life skills, and sport (supported by Ipswich Town FC). The blend of the two is very important as it is part of an attempt to change the narrative from not 'what I need from the state' to 'what I can contribute to my community?'

There are currently 61 learners from diverse backgrounds: 46% are in care or are 'looked after children'; 15 different nationalities are present; only 2% identify as white British; 40% are unaccompanied asylum seeking children.

The programme was established after we recognised that no-one else was doing anything like this. Ten of our students went onto to take part in the National Citizen Service (NCS) and four of them are now preparing to train as youth workers.

Following the success of the Learning Matters study programme, a number of Further Education (FE) colleges have followed what we have done and are now beginning to set up their own courses - so many of our own alumni will graduate into a formal FE college education. As the FE sector expands this area of work, Learning Matters is likely to re-focus slightly and concentrate on those young people very recently arrived in the UK where we feel the need for the programme will be greatest.

12.3 KEO

The KEO (Knowledge Equals Opportunity) project supports migrant families in Suffolk with primary school-aged children. It aims to help families new to the UK by creating the right conditions for learning. Topics discussed with parents include: dealing with mental health problems and isolation; understanding the role of a Police Community Support Officer in the community; understanding how maths is taught in school so the parents can help their children at home; highlighting school policies and practice; advice about healthy snacks for the school lunchbox; how to encourage learning through everyday activities; educational places to visit with children.

The project has seen much greater engagement of the parents with the school (one is about to start as a volunteer helper in the classroom) and more support for learning in the home for children.

12.4 GRAND MENTORS, SPORTING CHANCE and RSVP

These three projects have outlets around the country. Grand Mentors pairs volunteer mentors over the age of 50 who will spend 1-2 hours each week building a relationship with a young care leaver who needs guidance and support to realise their potential and gain new skills through education, training or employment. Sporting Chance recruits volunteers, also 50 and over, to provide others in the same age range with opportunities to improve their health and reduce social isolation through various forms of exercise including walking football, table tennis, cycling and armchair exercises. Our Retired and Senior Volunteering Programme (RSVP) which began in 1986, operates a wide range of projects in many parts of the country. Our volunteers go in to schools to help during literacy hour and numeracy hour; they run driving schools to enable less mobile citizens attend medical and other appointments; they act as lay assessors of day care centres; they run activities in sheltered housing.

12.5: Recruitment and retention: In all our projects, volunteer co-ordinators will talk with each new volunteer to understand their motivations and interests and the skills and experiences they bring. Placements that work best and last longest are those where a good match can be made with the individual's profile and the needs of the project/potential beneficiary. In general terms, from our 2016 survey (see 1.4) that the biggest motivation for people aged 50 and over, for example, to volunteer was a desire to help people, improve things and make a difference in their communities (96%) while other high-scoring motivations include: using existing skills; having the spare time and availability to do it and to meet people, make connections and build friendships. Motivations for younger age groups often gave greater emphasis to other motivations.

Volunteer Now – written evidence (CCE0173)

Volunteer Now works to promote, enhance and support volunteering across Northern Ireland. Volunteer Now is about connecting with individuals and organisations to build healthy communities and create positive change.

Volunteer Now enhances recognition for the contribution volunteers make, provides access to opportunities and encourages people to volunteer. We provide training, information, guidance and support to volunteer-involving organisations on issues of good practice and policy regarding volunteering, volunteer management, safeguarding and governance. Volunteer Now has extensive experience in recruiting volunteers for a wide variety of roles including governance based roles. For example Volunteer Now has delivered the volunteer recruitment, selection and management for a range of events such as the World Police and Fire Games, Giro D' Italia, Tall Ships and Irish Open.

Volunteer Now has compiled this response based on feedback from a group of 14 young people who are graduates of the National Citizen's Service in the Omagh area in the past two years. This feedback was provided at an event kindly hosted by Fermanagh and Omagh District Council also involving Councillor Chris Smyth and Chair of the Council, Councillor Stephen McCann.

Question One – Summary of Discussion

The young people found the language of citizenship and civic engagement difficult to relate to. Several members of the group, who were active volunteers, explained that their volunteering had helped them to develop as a person and to understand their own values. They felt that it had helped them become more confident and established and to stand up for what they believe. Prior to volunteering there had been limited opportunities for the group to engage with local elected officials and both Councillors and young people had found the engagement beneficial. The group had undertaken a social action project on young people's mental health and this had resonated with local councillors. It seemed much easier for the group to relate to this practical example of active citizenship than the abstract concept of citizenship and civic engagement.

Question Four – Summary of Discussion

The majority of the young people felt that they would like to vote at 16 but would need better education in school about voting and broader aspects of citizenship to support them in this process.

Question Five – Summary of Discussion

Without exception the young people, who had attended a range of different post primary schools, felt that education had an important part to play in teaching and encouraging good citizenship. It should be delivered pre-16 to all young people. However current teaching was not reported as good, it seemed to depend on the individual teacher and their own level of interest. It was not seen as being an important subject in comparison to more academic ones. There was discussion of the approach taken in Southern Ireland of a transition year, after GCSE where young people while still in school had a basic timetable freeing them to undertake volunteering and in some cases optional study visits. This transition year gave them time to get more experience of life before going straight into an A level course which may not be best for them. It also provided more time to develop a greater understanding of citizenship.

Question Six – Summary of Discussion

The young people in the group were all graduates of the NCS programme and had all had a very positive experience. Overall, they felt the programme should have been longer with more opportunities to continue engagement when the programme came to an end. The group had undertaken youth social action programmes when the formal NCS programme had come to an end and this was beneficial. There was some discussion as to whether NCS should be compulsory and on balance the group felt that it shouldn't be. However one participant who had not been that keen on the programme before it began explained how much she had gained from it so there should perhaps be tasters to get reluctant participants to give it a try.

Conclusion

Language is important and often people may not understand concepts such as citizenship and civic engagement. It does not mean that citizenship and civic engagement do not relate to identity but simply that people are focussed on issues and do not always think in these terms. Volunteer Now's experience shows that by focusing on meaningful local issues and through volunteering, providing a practical response to these, participants do develop a greater sense of identity and values.

Voting age could be lowered if citizenship education was more effective in schools. Citizenship education is often not given sufficient priority and really depends on one teacher taking an interest. This does not lead to effective delivery in all schools.

Programmes such as NCS were very effective and should be longer while retaining the voluntary participation element. They should be offered to a wider group of young people.

It is Volunteer Now's view that all levels of government and all third sector organisations can support civic engagement by enabling people to play an active role in their communities. This can support a greater understanding of the needs of the community and can build a greater sense of connectedness and understanding of other people. In the current climate of austerity, a greater value needs to be placed by policy makers on programmes encouraging active citizenship and volunteering. These are often the first to be threatened with cuts and yet for relatively small amounts of money can provide real community benefits.

8 September 2017

Votes for Schools – written evidence (CCE0111)

1) What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st Century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

The 21st Century, particularly in a post-Brexit UK, presents us with a difficult and changing landscape in which the word ‘citizenship’ can be divisive, unifying or confusing. For some, citizenship highlights grievances for its ties to nationality and national identity, whereas for others it conjures thoughts of shared values and belonging to something bigger. The division is also reflected in people’s thoughts about their own identity. Some people like to think of themselves as ‘global citizens’ rather than ‘British citizens’ and others are very much the opposite, restricting citizenship to something that comes as a birth right.

While identity amongst the adult population has become a potentially partisan issue, what VotesforSchools has seen from young people is the inclination to believe that they are part of something bigger and can have an impact on something bigger. In today’s world, there are more ways than ever to engage in your community and the world, and to spread opinion. The introduction of tech outlets like social media, blogs and open letters have given voice to the previously voiceless, a fantastic step forward in terms of increasing involvement in the democratic process, but this democratisation has also created an incubator for radical and isolated views through the development of echo chambers. As a result of this, what we are seeing is a landscape that is both divisive and democratising, that is both isolating and opening, and where questions of identity are becoming linked to different interpretations of citizenship.

2) Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people’s identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

VotesforSchools sees classrooms and schools as the ideal space to explore what it means to belong, to have an identity and to find out what shared values are, because schools offer a microcosm of people representing different cultures, religions, backgrounds and upbringings. Questioning pupils through careful planning of lessons on global and controversial issues and encouraging pupils to challenge each other and celebrate their diversity of opinion is crucial for developing their ideas of what it means to be a citizen of a democratic country. Events in schools would be a brilliant way to develop pupils as citizens, so long as they have clear goals and outcomes that are focused on a sub-subject of citizenship rather than the broad umbrella or on “being British”. Examples of these could include joining a debate club, contributing to the political process in some way (writing to an MP, signing a petition), or engaging in a community project that brings cultures together, all of which would encourage a sense of community and belonging that celebrate diversity through a shared experiences outside the more divisive feelings of identity.

Our experience demonstrates that young people respond better to events with clear goals that they understand and are passionate about. The Youth Parliament could be seen as a good example of this as well as VfS organising a Question Time event in Autumn, and STEM girls events which are great for developing a shared identity for women interested in science. The end goal of all of these activities, being based on voluntary action, is that they can influence on-going active citizenship and encourage positive association with getting involved with others in your community. Other events based on “being British”, should not be encouraged until students understand what “being British” really means. Being British should be an open identity reliant on the very diversity that exists within it and one that newcomers can claim for themselves so long as they are willing to contribute to their community. As was seen by the mixed response to the British values agenda, people are uncomfortable with the term and it’s tendency to be used in an exclusive, dividing way in tabloid papers and political language, and time needs to be committed to ensuring this term is redefined. One way to do this is to encourage discussion of shared values and human rights, on shared behaviour and relationship building rather than individuals, in a democratic society like Britain, before moving on to allow pupils to define what it means to them to be British.

3) Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

We would advocate access and encouragement over formal rights and responsibilities. The state should organise positive opportunities for citizens and non-citizens that promote civic engagement in their community which assign value to the idea of citizenship for the individual and community. A legal ruling on responsibilities which is not backed up by education in this area, would do nothing to improve engagement or increase community cohesion but instead could lead to a form of aggressive populism. For the disaffected, formal rights/responsibilities could become simply another rule or force to rebel against or ignore. Our work with prisoners has demonstrated this. Instead, the state must take the lead and initiate regular engagement with its citizens that encourages contribution to the community.

4) Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

The common argument is that young people are not interested in politics, however feedback and experience within schools indicates the opposite. Students are curious about current affairs, particularly issues that are controversial, and show a keen interest in and concern over global issues. Through the teaching of citizenship, students debate and discuss issues within a forum of diverse backgrounds free from entrenched political affiliation, creating informed and empathetic citizens. Arguably, current sixteen-year olds are some of the first to have experience citizenship and PSHE in schools and for this reason should be seen as better informed and more empathetic than older voters.

Teachers are frequently asked their political stance and opinions by their students and are faced with many a challenging question about the world around them. Moreover, students have shown they often have informed opinions and views on politics and current affairs. All of this points to the fact that they are in an informed position to make a vote outside of school. Our data indicates that students are not unenthused by politics, but that they are disillusioned with politicians and don't see political parties as representative of their views. We have learnt that turnout in internal school elections is much higher in schools which teach, debate and discuss current affairs and politics, which is why it is crucial to instil in them the importance of being involved in the conversation, no matter their opinion whilst they are young, in the hopes that this commitment to voting will continue in the real world. Young people are more likely to protest and participate through means outside of voting, and this plays a large role in what it means to be a citizen in a democratic society.

If the voting age were to be lowered, it could increase political engagement, but this should not happen unless accompanied by a rigorous citizenship education. As the situation currently stands, the teaching of citizenship is compulsory in KS3 but not KS4, thus is potentially allowing KS4 students to become politically disengaged before they need to register to vote at age 18. Add to this the type of deeply politically entrenched exposure students are getting to current affairs on social media, and we risk the echo chamber effect if these students are not able to also discuss what they are seeing/hearing in a safe and structured deliberative environment. An alternative would be to provide structured citizenship education where students also get to register to vote in school. This would avoid registration being overlooked in the "grey area" where students move on to higher education where they may not register to vote and become disenfranchised. If these young people are not given meaningful ways of participating in politics, they will become disillusioned. By giving the vote to 16 year olds, extending citizenship education to KS4 and allowing registration to vote at school, political participation would most likely increase and students would be informed when casting a vote.

5) What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

Our results suggest that citizenship education should be a) available to all young people from primary to undergraduate university and b) compulsory from primary (KS1) through to sixth forms/colleges (KS5). This should include Young Offender Institutes/Prisons and forms of alternative provision that fall within the same age range. While there should be no exceptions, there should be flexibility within the citizenship curriculum to allow schools to explore needs and issues specific to their community and their cohorts. For example, communities that are vulnerable to gang culture would benefit from extra time focused on this, whereas an ethnically or racially homogenous community might benefit from more time exploring different cultures and their beliefs.

In terms of political participation, it should be encouraged but only when bound to the principle that political participation should be based on having the responsibility to have a good knowledge of the subject and an awareness of, and empathy towards other sides of the argument, before engaging politically. To be clear, this does not mean that only those educated to a high standard should engage with politics, but emphasises that there is a responsibility attempt to understand and learn about both sides of the debate. This can be achieved straightforwardly in schools. When debating the legalisation of drugs, higher learners could be expected to understand quantitative data and statistical evidence about such ideas as the impact of the illegal drug trade and the economic benefit to the state of legalisation. Lower learners would instead be expected to understand simplified versions of the same arguments, for example allowing people to buy drugs legally would generate money for the government rather than criminal organisations.

The current curriculum does need modifying to encourage citizenship and political participation across the age ranges. Feedback from the 220+ institutions on the VotesforSchools programme demonstrates that students are switching off from the current curriculum. To counter this, our aim is to bring the core tenets of citizenship to life through discussions about current affairs and debates that feel fresh and engaging. We believe bringing current affairs into the classroom is more likely to give someone tangible learnings that they can take away. For example, an adult who has been through the current citizenship course is unlikely to take away any real life learning about freedom of speech in their use of social media, whereas having a lesson where they debate the American President's use of Twitter is more likely to leave an impression that will last and have real life impact.

Overall, we believe a curriculum in citizenship should go for a two-pronged approach. Starting in KS1 and carrying right through to higher education, the first step should be to ensure that young people have the basic, necessary facts, such as geographical knowledge, population figures, how government works, rough government spending, so they have benchmarks from which to question and challenge what they read and hear in daily life. Once this basic knowledge is there, it can be built upon to then engage young people in current affairs and give them the sense that they have a both a voice and a role to play in the political developments of the present. Schools should also encourage as much as they can, the incorporation of the community in which they live, through inviting guest speakers in, engaging parents and carers, and having a feel for the issues that affect the local community within which they work, tailoring the curriculum to fill their gaps in knowledge so they can get prepared to engage in the material. It is especially crucial that more time be made in Primary schools for teachers to plan cross-curricular opportunities to develop citizenship, for tight timetables and focus on core subjects often leaves it on the sidelines. There are many ways of incorporating citizenship education into lessons if teachers are given the time to plan it into other subjects, for example focusing on planning in the skillset (debate, empathy, listening, respect) that citizenship develops in their lessons, which is just as important as the knowledge in order for pupils to develop as citizens. Furthermore, if pupils are taught citizenship through current affairs and knowledge at a young age, they will be in a much better position by secondary school to apply this knowledge and think critically about the world around them, being able to focus on developing their critical thinking, empathy and debating skills to a deeper level, which in turn would contribute to their political engagement at a later age.

6) Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

In the confines of the program young people develop skills to enable them to be active citizens. The program is effective in giving young people the opportunity to register to vote. Allowing students the opportunity to plan and deliver a real social action project. In addition, the program introduces and nurtures skills in teamwork, leadership and communication and values; trust, responsibility and understanding and empathy.

The emphasis on active citizenship features in the 3rd phase of the program. Whilst activities in the first week are both enjoyable and character building they do not have a clear link to citizenship. As a result, citizenship can be seen to have secondary focus.

A full length and condensed version of the program is currently offered. 2 young people from each 'wave' go on to the youth board. However, the majority are not supported in developing as active citizens beyond the program.

As a voluntary program, young people must be 'active' to say 'yes' and take part. The impact of compulsory attendance can be seen on the many occasions when young people are forced to take part, having been signed up to do it by their parent or guardians or as part of a college course (Croydon College). This can have a negative impact on groups as a whole as they do not have the intrinsic motivation.

The focus of the program is on social action at a community level. Whilst young people do engage in a one hour evening session looking at voter registration, impact of low turnout and government spending, this is isolated and political engagement is not embedded in the program. Increasing the political focus requires careful thought as those students who are most disengaged may be put off by an increased political focus. There is perhaps opportunity to broaden the options for the last phase of the program. This could take the form of a political motivated campaign or petition to the government on a particular issue. In addition, young people are allocated a social partner, which in some cases can limit engagement as oppose to letting young people campaign on an issue they are passionate about.

There appears to be a need to expand the programme beyond 15-17 years age group. The focus is on post GCSE students rather it would be beneficial to engage young people within 17-18 years age group as these are students who are the verge of political participation and active citizenship. These are also the students who do not have the option to engage in a citizenship curriculum at school or college.

7) How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

Central government has a responsibility for making sure the process of voting is as straightforward as possible. The registration process is adequate as it stands. The postal vote process needs to be improved. (e.g. <http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/home-news/general-election-300-postal-votes-missing-plymouth-marginal-seat-a7776376.html>, <http://www.express.co.uk/news/uk/814225/general-election-2017-postal-vote-delays-hit-thousands-of-expats>)

Central government also has the responsibility to get more information out to the public about their representatives. Currently, great work is being done by organisations such as mySociety, democracy club and Votes for Policies. While the government should not rely on the third sector to provide these sorts of services, it could work with them to give these ideas greater exposure.

Local government has a remit within which it can explore a host of options to encourage voter registration and higher turnout. VotesforSchools has begun to work with local government outreach staff to encourage young people to register to vote and encourage them to be engaged with activities in Westminster.

Schools must be seen as a central vehicle for reaching the most vulnerable and disengaged young people. However, schools cannot manufacture meaningful means of participation. Participants must have positive experiences of civic engagement if its value is to be embedded. VotesforSchools is working with schools across the country to encourage greater awareness about registering to vote and greater knowledge of the avenues to interact with the state. A large barrier to civic engagement is simply a lack of knowledge of the different ways of engaging with government.

8) What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

The values that all who live in Britain share and support must, most crucially, be identified, shaped and decided upon by those who are to follow them. Just as a teacher would create rules in a classroom using the pupils' ideas and values, so should British values be created, with shared ownership and refinement or flexibility over time if needed. The mixed response to British values has demonstrated the potential flaws in imposing a set of shared values (this is my opinion coming up) so the focus needs to come from an angle of what values should we have in a democratic, fair and human rights adhering society. Calling the values British in itself suggests there is something exclusive about them, which in reality there isn't, and brings in feelings of a divisive national identity again which leaves others who live in the UK feeling outside and pushed aside. It is especially crucial for students to arrive at the British Values on their own, through carefully planned and meaningful discussions about morality, kindness and how to treat other people. If they do not take part in defining their own sense of 'British values' then it becomes an imposed sense of identity, defeating its own purpose. This is felt in schools.

9) Why do so many communities and groups feel "left behind"? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

What we have seen in schools is that there are no outstanding groups of students in full time education who felt left behind. Whilst in education they are supported and on a level playing field to discuss their concerns. However schools do not have the capacity, time, or specifically resources to teach young people about ways in which they can empower themselves and seek change.

Much work can be done with the elderly, not specifically encouraging them to engage as they have a notably high turnout, but instead looking at giving them access to news and information about politics. This could possibly be encouraged or implemented in care homes.

10) How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Civic engagement when done incorrectly can oppose social cohesion. Partisan and ill-informed engagement can create barriers between groups. Thus citizenship, civic engagement and political participation must be underpinned by social cohesion. Opportunities for civic engagement must create and include opportunities to learn about others rather than a means to clash with others.

As well as the state, political parties have a responsibility to engage in public, cross-party debates, discussions that are non-partisan and an openness to encourage new members to join who bring different approaches and opinions. Parties have become well-drilled organisations set on a target of recruiting like-minded people and putting out uniform opinions. There should be some rules or events where parties demonstrate how they accept other opinions.

The school is a young person's first contact with a community outside of their immediate family as such it can instil an acceptance of diversity and encourage students to embrace and value it. The school can be a vehicle to raise diversity and integration.

Schools could hold a "One world Show" allows students to present aspects of their cultures to the whole school. This would encourage a broader notion of citizenship.

Diversity needs to be embedded into every aspect of school life. Classroom Displays celebrate difference, signs are in more than one language, the registers is taken in a different language each day. Integration through understanding, normalises having diversity. Restructuring of religious education is a good example if this, taught thematically encouraging a comparison of similarities and differences between religions.

Vital to integration is to keep EAL students within the classroom, allowing them time to absorb and be part of the classroom environment. Furthermore any support for EAL students is widely accepted to support native speakers. All students learn and benefit from labels and instructions given in Romanian.

It should not solely be the responsibility of the EAL student to integrate, the whole school should move to understand new cultures.

11) How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

Schools need to view EAL and SEN as distinct; the two are often conflated which can result in EAL students not being sufficiently challenged. More guidance is needed on how to challenge as well as support EAL students. A beneficial change can come for EAL students by taking the attitude that English speakers should always endeavour to pick up some of the languages in their school.

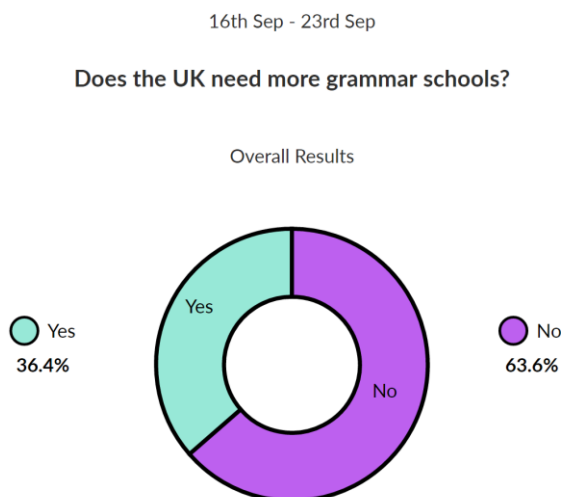

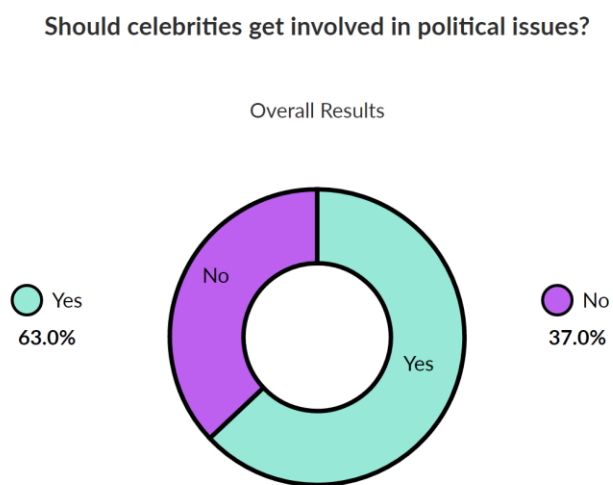

A lack of understanding of the language can subsequently lead to challenging behaviour; students struggle to articulate their emotions inhibiting any preventative action taken by the teacher.

For parents and students, greater effort needs to be made welcome and brief on the workings of English schools and society. Whilst this does occur in some schools it impact of social cohesion makes it a responsibility of government.

12) Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

VotesforSchools is working hard to encourage young people to understand and actively participate to improve their country and increase social cohesion. We are working with over 220 schools and have over 10,000 active weekly voters. The community is spread across the country, with schools from low income backgrounds and independent schools all participating. We would be happy to share our methods and data with the committee.

Please see a snapshot of our weekly debates (Sample size of at least 5,000 voters):

Votes for Schools – written evidence (CCE0111)

Does the news encourage terrorism?

16th Jun - 23rd Jun

Would you take a refugee into your own home?

7 September 2017

VSO – written evidence (CCE0211)

Introduction

VSO is an international development agency with over 55 years' experience of addressing poverty and disadvantage through our unique approach of working through volunteers. By working closely over time with carefully selected partners – from grassroots organisations to government ministries – volunteers provide the right support to help ensure that local development efforts deliver the greatest impact and lasting change.

VSO is currently managing the delivery of the Government-funded International Citizen Service programme, a development programme which brings together young people aged 18-25 to volunteer alongside young people in developing countries. The ICS programme has three main interdependent objectives: development impact in communities, the personal development of individuals and the creation of active citizens, and since its inception in 2011, more than 15,000 young people from the UK have participated in the programme. Between 2005 and 2011 VSO also led the “Global Exchange” programme with the British Council, which was a cross cultural exchange between the UK and developing countries with active citizenship at its heart.

We welcome the opportunity to give written evidence to this inquiry.

Definition of citizenship and what we mean by active citizenship in the 21st century

1. Active citizenship is one of the three core objectives of the ICS programme. The theory of change for the programmes defines the following as core parts of active citizenship: inspiring other people to take action; questioning and debating the status quo; being involved in decision-making that affects our lives; and, influencing people in power (at community as well as regional, national and international levels).
2. VSO's 'Valuing Volunteering' research⁸⁷⁸, a participatory research project conducted over two years with the Institute of Development Studies and published in 2015 involving more than 3,700 people, found that volunteering is often the first step towards greater participation in their own development and active citizenship.

Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

⁸⁷⁸ Valuing Volunteering: The Role Of Volunteering In Sustainable Development, VSO & IDS, 2015 available at: <https://www.vsointernational.org/fighting-poverty/our-research-and-evaluations/research-report-valuing-volunteering>

3. From VSO's Impact beyond volunteering study,⁸⁷⁹ which involved over 3,000 returned VSO volunteers across a broad range of ages and backgrounds from around the world, 77% of respondents reported changes in social action as a result of volunteering, with over 50% increasing the amount of volunteering that they did as a result of their volunteering experience.
4. There is a strong and growing evidence base to prove that national and international citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service and International Citizen Service (ICS) catalyse active citizenship amongst participants, which is sustained after the programmes are completed: though it is too soon to see long-term impacts of ICS on active citizenship outcomes, initial reports are that participating in the programmes do lead to longer term increases in active citizenship and social action beyond the initial "action at home" period (6 months after volunteers return). Over two thirds of returned ICS volunteers⁸⁸⁰ report that they have carried out voluntary work or completed social action since completing their placement, and 91% of returned UK and international volunteers saying that participating in the programme has affected their attitude towards social action in their community.

'Before I would help out help out with things that were happening, whereas now I feel like I start things myself. I used to just turn up and participate but now I feel like I am the mobiliser, I feel like I can do things. I contacted my friend and we are going to do something on the SDGs.' ICS returned volunteer, UK.

5. 62% of 191 participants who were interviewed 10 years after taking part in the World Youth and Global Exchange volunteering programmes run by VSO, were still taking part in some sort of community action or volunteering in their local community.
6. VSO understands volunteering to be formal as well as informal activity comprising the following key elements: it is done out of individuals' free will, it is conducted outside the household for the benefit of the wider community; it is driven by motives other than financial gain; and, it is not a substitute for paid work. Mandatory volunteering programmes, therefore would seem to go against one of the key core ⁸⁷⁹ Impact Beyond Volunteering, VSO, 2016 available at:

https://www.vsointernational.org/sites/default/files/VSO_ImpactBeyondVolunteering_MainReport_web.pdf

⁸⁸⁰ Based on latest data available from ICS reporting data in September 2017 principles of volunteering- that it should be done out of the free will of the individual.

7. From VSO's experience, participating in volunteering programmes frequently sparks an increase in political action; 55% of respondents to VSO's Impact beyond volunteering study reported that they were more involved in community, social or political action post-placement. Many ICS volunteers engage with decision-makers both during their placements and as part of their "action at home" after returning, but often need additional support with this to build their confidence and guide them through the first stages of engaging effectively. Any government-supported schemes which place a greater emphasis on political engagement should recognise the barriers, real or imagined, which discourage disadvantaged young people in particular from engaging politically.

How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently

8. Any government-sponsored citizenship or civic engagement programme must consider how issues of social cohesion can be addressed as part of their efforts. All programmes should consider diversity and inclusion in their design, including the budget, to ensure they are able to effectively recruit and support diverse groups of people. If this is not considered at design stage, they will be unable to create an inclusive programme. The first of seven quality principles of the ICS programme⁸⁸¹ is that "a diverse range of young people are given the opportunity to take part in the programme," and this has been built into all aspects of the design and functioning of the programme. ICS is a leader in diversity for a programme of its nature, compared to other European and international youth volunteering schemes.

Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

9. By bringing together young people from different backgrounds- both within the UK cohort of volunteers, and through their experience of living and working in host communities in different countries with teams of international volunteers, there is a strong body of evidence to support intercultural cohesion resulting as a result of programmes like ICS and NCS. For example, see Ahmad's account of living with a Christian host family in Zimbabwe as an ICS volunteer.

⁸⁸¹ <https://www.volunteerics.org/ics-quality-principle-diversity>

10. In addition, the Global Exchange and World Youth programmes run by VSO and the British Council, promoted cohesion by bringing together volunteers from different backgrounds. Often the deepest learnings were about UK society and cohesion; some former UK-based volunteers on the programme were more shocked by the poverty that they encountered on the UK aspect of their placements than on their overseas placements, and longitudinal research into the impacts of the programme highlighted some of the long-term effects on the participants:

“It has been almost ten years since I participated in the world youth scheme. It had a huge impact on my life and the course it took. It gave me the confidence and knowledge to become a detective in Hackney one of the most diverse boroughs in London. I honestly think that the insight the experience gave me into other cultures has made me a better police officer.” (UK Volunteer on exchange with Ghana)

How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

11. There should be greater recognition from the state of the value and impact that volunteering can bring, both to the professional and personal development of volunteers but also to the social capital and active citizenship. There can also be tangible economic benefits: a study from the Kings Fund exploring the contribution of volunteers to the NHS found that every pound invested in volunteering yielded 11 in return.⁸⁸²
12. In Germany, for example, youth volunteers are recognised as having a full-time legal status up until the age of 27. VSO sees the value in campaigns such as those led by Citiyear and other UK youth NGOs, which advocate for the recognition of full-time volunteers in the UK.
13. The current benefits system also acts as a barrier to people effectively participating in some volunteering programmes like International Citizen Service, in spite of the considerable evidence of the long-term potential of such programmes to have a positive impact on the professional development and future employability of participants. For example, individuals accessing Housing Benefit cannot take part in the programme as they will lose access to their entitlements while participating in the programme, and individuals living in live service⁸⁸³ areas for Universal credit are prevented from accessing Universal Credit for up to two years after returning from the programme due to residency requirements⁸⁸⁴. Such unintended policy consequences such be addressed across government, with greater recognition from the Department of Work and Pensions on the value that citizenship and volunteering programmes can bring to both employability and social cohesion.

⁸⁸² The Kings Fund, 2013, available at: <https://www.kingsfund.org.uk/press/press-releases/value-volunteers>

⁸⁸³ <https://www.gov.uk/guidance/universal-credit-full-service-and-live-service>

Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

14. Lessons learnt from implementing specific initiatives aimed at promoting diversity within youth volunteering programmes like ICS and other youth volunteering programmes across Europe illustrate are that there exist many barriers to participation in citizenship programmes- including cultural, economic and legal barriers. There is no “one size fits all” approach to addressing cohesion and approaches should be targeted according to the needs of the specific groups concerned.
15. As with efforts to genuinely reach those who are “left behind,” in developing countries, it should be recognised that there is a cost associated with addressing barriers to participation. Learnings from an EU funded “International Volunteering for all” project which looked at how to increase participation in the ICS programme from young people from lower socio-economic backgrounds was that often successful measures were cost and labour intensive (for example pre-assessment day workshops for applicants from lower socio-economic backgrounds) and therefore not sustainable to support participation at scale.
16. Finally, it is worth noting that the language of citizenship can be excluding for some groups- particularly refugee groups, and this should be factored into the branding and design of citizenship programmes.

⁸⁸⁴ According to guidance received by the Universal credit helpline in September 2017

Kevin Walker – written evidence (CCE0043)

Retired citizenship teacher and coordinator in English Comprehensive School; Principal examiner for Unit4 of A level Citizenship; Senior moderator for Extended Project Qualification and Projects advisor with AQA (exam board); Doctoral student of Citizenship Education at University of Plymouth.

2. Marking the transition to adult citizenship in the 16th year could be a useful educative process if linking with registration to vote. A ceremony would have more meaning if marking an achievement such as passing a basic citizenship test. My suggestion is to adapt online citizenship tests for use by UK schools and to provide a project based qualification which accredits learning from participant in community based activities. A suitable qualification already exists in the form of the Extended, Higher and Foundation Project Qualifications (EPQ,HPQ & FPQ) which is offered by most English/Welsh exam boards at levels 3, 2 and 1 respectively.

4. For lowering the voting age to result in increased participation some form of enhanced universal citizenship education in secondary schools is essential. My view is that integrating a voluntary registration process to take place in school or college at age 16 alongside formal citizenship education is a minimal requirement. This could take place regardless of the voting age for general elections and would help insure that the maximum effective registration when the individual is eligible to vote. This registration could be linked with a basic citizenship test and/or project qualification linked with a ceremony as mentioned above.

5. The term ‘good citizen’ is a difficult one as it implies a consensus on what characterises a good citizen which will differ according different political ideologies. Active citizenship is a better term as it has a legacy in the work of Bernard Crick and is less contentious for educators.

6. The NCS was included as a special topic for the A level citizenship examination in 2014. These were my comments, published in the principal examiners report, at the time. “Research by students suggested that in some centres the scheme was relatively well known whereas in others it was virtually unheard of. Generally those who had participated felt that the scheme should be more widely available and that it complimented their studies in Citizenship. It was widely claimed that those who could benefit the most were least likely to participate. A consensus view was that the aims were unlikely to be achieved without widening participation. Those who had investigated the Scottish equivalent often preferred the way in which it integrated with other aspects of education.”

My view is that the development of an active citizenship is an educative process that benefits from the full engagement of schools and colleges. Widening the impact of the NCS will depend on developing a more effective partnership with schools and colleges which itself depends on clearer guidance from the DfE.

Kevin Walker – written evidence (CCE0043)

7. Recognise the essential role of education in this process, including crucially that of adult education.

11. As suggested above the Citizenship test could be improved by applying it to all UK citizens equally including those born with this status. A basic level of language proficiency is a legitimate requirement for this test and schools and colleges are best place to provide support for this as part of their wider role. ‘Naturalisation’ rather implies adaptation to the values of the host culture rather than participation within a diversity of cultures.

30 August 2017

What Works Scotland – written evidence (CCE0142)

Please find below responses from What Works Scotland. A number of other documents which may be of relevance to this subject are available on the WWS website here, for example a recent report on community capacity building through a Community Links project in Aberdeenshire; and feedback on a recent learning journey to Paris for Scottish Community Planning practitioners to learn more about the French experiences of implementing Participatory Budgeting.

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Refer to answer to Q7

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?
3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?
4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?
5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

The Scottish education system has an important role in teaching and encouraging good citizenship across all phases of education. In order to create a responsible inclusive society the teaching of citizen education should be diverse enough to cover issues with sensitivity to a range of perspectives including: religion, race, gender, socio-economic circumstance etc. This is currently achieved through the four capacities of curriculum for excellence which help children and young people to become: successful learners, confident individuals, responsible citizens and effective contributors. Curriculum for excellence and these capacities tend to be better embedded within the primary phase while citizenship and political participation are established in some curricula areas in Broad General Education and beyond.

The Education Scotland report, Scotland's Quality and improvement in Scottish Education 2012-2016 (Education Scotland 2017) draws on inspection evidence and claims that during this period secondary schools "have provided learners with high quality opportunities for personal achievement to develop skills in leadership and citizenship through the life of their school and community" (p. 20). The report also claims that inspectors found that young people were involved in fundraising and voluntary work in their local community as developing global citizenship skills through their participation in twinning arrangements with schools in other countries.

The OECD report improving schools in Scotland (OECD, 2015) acknowledges a number of curricular "themes across learning" including sustainable development, global citizenship, enterprise in education and Scotland's culture (p. 42). This report also notes that inspection reports have highlighted improvements in different contexts including including "sport, culture and arts, enterprise, sustainability and citizenships... [and] increasingly these achievements are being accredited through a number of awards" (p. 64). However, the report also cautions against implementing reforms with an intensive focus on literacy and numeracy as these have tended to marginalise the citizenship agenda in other systems (p. 117).

While there is much good practice that has been identified by the system, both in and out of schools our experience suggests this is patchy with variations across the system. Rather than looking at curriculum redesign or new qualifications our advice is to consolidate by further embedding citizen education and political participation within the framework of curriculum for excellence. This should be compulsory and a focus for inspection and school self-review and should also be undertaken through Regional Improvement Collaboratives by moving the best examples of practice around the system to other areas where practice is less secure. It is also worth noting that the independence referendum in 2014 and lowering of the voting age have created a very politically engaged generation of children and young people compared to many other countries.

We need to take on board the caution of an over focus on literacy and numeracy highlighted by the OECD. This is a serious message and compounded by the introduction of national standardised assessments in literacy are likely to further focus teachers minds on these areas rather than on broader agendas such as citizenship education. This is a phenomenon that has been experienced in other education systems that are underpinned by high stakes testing (eg. USA and England).

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

The current spread of democracy around the world is unprecedented, and so is the level of civic aspiration, expectation and discontent with current institutional practices and notions of citizenship (Dalton, 2004; Norris, 2002, 2011). Democracy is an idea that has been continuously constructed, contested, fought over, implemented and revised (Saward, 2003, p. viii). In a forthcoming article (Pluralism and democratic participation: What kind of citizen are citizens invited to be?) Escobar explores and unpacks three different (but overlapping) theoretical models of democracy: representative democracy; participatory democracy; and deliberative democracy

The key differences between them are their emphases, assumptions and aspirations with regard to democratic life:

- The notion of democratic participation that underpins each model. That is, what does it mean to participate in democracy?
- How are publics constructed? Publics and communities are not simply pre-existing entities, but get made through the ways in which they are imagined, summoned, assembled and mobilised (Barnett, 2008).
- The role of citizens. Different understandings of democracy imply different assumptions about citizenship, and shape the opportunities that people get to participate. Therefore, for each model, we must ask: What kind of citizen are citizens invited to be?
- Institutional mechanisms. The emblematic mechanism for participation in representative democracy is the electoral contest. However, there are a range of democratic innovations that illustrate the contribution of participatory and deliberative practices (e.g. participatory budgeting, mini-publics).

Table 2. Three (overlapping) models of democracy

	Representative democracy	Participatory democracy	Deliberative democracy

Notion of democratic participation	Voting in elections to choose between competing elites	Taking part in collective action and decision-making in civic and/or official spheres	Engaging in deliberation about public issues and policies
How are publics made?	By aggregating individual preferences through electoral contests and interest groups	Through processes of collective association, collaboration, struggle and civic education	Through public deliberation that transforms individual preferences into public reasons
What kind of citizen are citizens invited to be?	Occasional voter; member of interest group	Ongoing participant in civic and official processes	Considered deliberator
Examples of institutional mechanisms	Elections	Participatory Budgeting	Mini-publics

In isolation, none of the three models are fully satisfactory. Representative democracy can be an easy target for criticism. However, as Saward (1998, p. 64) argues, participatory and deliberative democracy can't fully substitute representative democracy, and indeed they often require aggregative mechanisms for resolution and decision-making. Nonetheless, participatory budgeting and mini-publics are good examples of how different understandings of democracy can coalesce into one process that involves participation, deliberation and voting –the core constitutive practices of the three models. Accordingly, these practices can be combined in productive ways. For instance, voting after a deliberative process can combine two important democratic goods: informed and considered decision-making through deep deliberation, and legitimate decision-making through large-scale expression of popular preferences using the ballot.

Therefore, these three ways of understanding democracy overlap and can be enacted in complementary ways by combining and sequencing their constitutive practices. However, it is important to acknowledge their distinctiveness. For example, there can be deliberative democracy without participatory democracy and vice versa. Deliberation can take place amongst political or policy elites (e.g. Steiner, 2004), which is normatively desirable but doesn't fulfil broader participatory ideals of inclusion. By the same token, participation can take place without deliberation, for instance, when citizens engage only with the like-mindful, interact on the basis of interest-based bargaining, or take part in protests and boycotts. These different forms of participation can play different functions, and therefore their combination may offer new options that realise a broader range of democratic goods. This is exemplified in the case of participatory budgeting—with citizens and elected representatives engaging in both aggregative and deliberative modes of collective decision-making as part of a process that mobilises people to generate legitimacy, inclusion, transparency, scrutiny and problem-solving. Nonetheless, at the moment, elitist narratives of representative democracy can too easily overhaul participatory and deliberative counter-narratives in practice (Escobar, 2014, pp. 213-242). This much has been learned from ambitious processes like the crowd-sourcing of the new Icelandic constitution, halted in the end by political and interest group elites (Gylfason, 2013).

These models encompass not only different understandings of democracy, but also different democratic aspirations. Therefore, there may be a sense of incompatibility if we simply focus on the ideas and assumptions that underpin them –i.e. the different conceptions of the role of citizens (see Table 1). However, if we focus on practices and mechanisms, then combination seems feasible –i.e. political parties could be more participative, and interest groups could engage more deliberatively. Accordingly, there seems to be potential to develop a representative democracy that is more participatory and deliberative in its mechanisms, and where elections, political parties and interest groups are only one part of a more vibrant ecology of democratic participation. The challenge ahead is to imagine how these three ways of thinking about democracy can be brought together by combining their core practices to enrich political life and co-create better collective futures.

n.b. More information about deliberative mini-publics can be seen in Elstub & Escobar’s response to this consultation being submitted separately by Stephen Elstub

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?
9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

This warrants a call for participatory processes, physical and virtual, where citizens can meaningfully engage with those who are different from them –those “others” that can be easily dismissed or despised when they remain faceless stereotypes (Escobar, 2011, p. 23). The absence of such forums in the public sphere can have profound consequences because a lack of opportunities to be exposed to, and challenged by, difference, can diminish citizens’ capacity for engaged pluralism (e.g. Sunstein, 2009), and the narrower pluralism of elite-driven democracy may seem the only option. According to Dewey (1937, p. 467), that option that does little to ensure the sustainability and development of democracy: “unless democratic habits of thought and action are part of the fiber of a people, political democracy is insecure”. From this perspective, elitism and populism can be seen as two sides of the same coin –one predicated on the creation of committed followership, rather than engaged citizenship. In this sense, the future of democracy may depend greatly on the kind of citizen that citizens are invited and enabled to be.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?
11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?
12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

Local community-owned organisations provide an important focus for supporting, developing and extending civic engagement, citizenship and social cohesion. These organisations are community-led (democratic governance), not-for-profit bodies committed to local communities of place and/or interest and developed around community ownership of assets; often as community hubs/centres, housing, community shops, land, community renewables. These assets can provide a core income-stream distinct from larger local bodies – the state, public sector, large local employers and property-owners. This mix of community governance, independent stable income, and long-term commitment from local people provide key opportunities to build skills in citizenship and a civic engagement and partnership-working on a more equal footing to larger local bodies; for instance, acting as local community advocate and ‘critical friends’. And also to support social cohesion built around respect and understanding for local diversity.

Examples of such organisations include: community anchors or multi-purpose community organisations such as community development trusts and community housing associations – see Henderson (2015) and Baker et al. 2011; other community-owned (community sector) organisations who own an asset and then provide services and advocacy – for example in relation to: poverty, race, faith/belief, disability, gender and other inequalities; environmental, health-related, employment issues/objectives and so on. Government has a key role through in the development of these organisations through actively supporting the development of community asset ownership e.g. suitable finance and funding; organisational support; legal and policy frameworks.

8 September 2017

White Ribbon Association – written evidence (CCE0137)

Question 1: What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

Citizenship is giving people a sense of belonging to a particular area and country. It's about unity in a diverse country, as previous generations of some families have moved to the UK from other countries bringing with them their faiths and cultures. We believe civic engagement in the 21st century can be varied; from helping your elderly neighbour with the shopping or gardening, litter picking in your local area, or campaigning for better quality of living and human rights.

Civic engagement is about working together as a community to improve the lives of those who live there, and about being able to approach those who have the power to change laws such as local MP's, councillors or members of the House of Lords. It's the element that gives the common people a voice in important matters within their communities be that in a practical or political sense.

In terms of questions relating to identity it is important for people to remember in society that there is not a standard type of citizen within this country. It is a mixture of individuals of different beliefs and cultures.

Question 5: What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship?

The opening of Question 2 states that citizenship is partly about belonging. From a young age schools teach children about feelings and a sense of belonging, so informally citizenship is being taught from a young age.

Most schools play an active role in their local communities; raising money for local charities, providing food for local food banks from their harvest festivals, getting involved in community fruit and veg gardens, and many more projects. Within schools they have a voting system at times for school boards and children from the school can represent their fellow pupils on various panels within the school itself and on a regional level. Many schools run a debating programme and some of the debates are around the topic of citizenship or civic engagement.

It is important to educate children about democracy within the curriculum and what individuals can do to change issues they identify with, such as raising concerns with local councillors or MP's, or starting a petition. It would be advantageous for schools to invite local MP's so children have an opportunity to speak to them about issues which matter to them.

Question 6: Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens?

We do not have enough knowledge regarding the National Citizen Service, however, we can comment on a voluntary mentoring programme our Organisation has been running for several years, and how this has impacted on the young people and their peers who engage with it.

Our Health Champions Scheme gives young people the skills and knowledge to develop and run their own health campaigns. We regularly engage with several schools in the West Midlands area and have many stories of successful campaigns delivered by young people. It has given them a voice in issues which matter to them, whilst engaging with their peers to improve the health of their school and community.

Some of the groups have gone on to run fundraising events for local charities and have received public recognition for their work. We have received positive feedback when pupils have included their experience in participating in the Scheme on their UCAS application.

Question 7: How can society support civic engagement?

Society can only get involved in civic engagement in political terms if they are aware of law changes coming up; the information needs to be easier to find.

Local organisations, especially the smaller teams, are not aware of matters that would affect them until the very last moment, so it would be beneficial if earlier notices were sent out.

Even this consultation could have been better timed. Educational establishments are unable to contribute as it was released when most of their students/individuals who may have been interested in commenting have gone on study leave or are doing their exams. Also, there has not been much time for students of a young age to get involved in the formal response.

Question 9: Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”?

Certain communities may feel left behind in society and citizenship due to political and physical barriers. They are being encouraged to play an active role in society yet the law prevents some community groups in doing so. The system is not very accessible or easy to understand.

There are several physical barriers including a lack of communication (whether it be language barriers), or no access to the internet. A lot of opportunities for civic engagement are only published on the internet, which puts up a barrier for some rural areas and older generations.

Access to public buildings are improving, but there still needs to be more change for those with disabilities to play a fully active role in civic engagement.

8 September 2017

Vishal Wilde – written evidence (CCE0010)

Vishal Wilde FRSA is writing in a personal capacity and his views do not necessarily reflect any of the organisations he is affiliated with. He is on the list of approved parliamentary candidates for the Liberal Democrats and is an incoming Civil Service Fast Streamer (on the Generalist scheme). He writes on economic, political and financial topics as a Featured Columnist for The Market Mogul. He has written for think tanks such as The Cobden Centre, the Center for a Stateless Society (C4SS) and the Adam Smith Institute on a broad variety of topics. He is also Co-founder and Chairman of Project Shanthistan, a very nascent think tank and movement which seeks to foster peace, prosperity and cooperation in South Asia with an eventual aim of unification through promoting peoples' social, political and economic freedoms. He also conducts independent, (academic) policy-relevant research on various topics of interest.

At the time of submission, he is in the final stages of studying for an MSc in Advanced Computer Science with Internet Economics at the University of Liverpool and holds a BSc (Hons) in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Economics major) from the University of Warwick

4. Laws, by their very nature, encourage political engagement – whether it is active engagement or not is up for debate (dependent upon how one defines 'active') but living under the rule of law means that everything personal becomes political and, as such, some degree of political engagement will always be encouraged by their very existence and enforcement.

Extending the franchise in national and/or local elections in national or local elections is desirable – the UK should extend even greater voting rights.

When considering that we are already unusual amongst most countries for offering not just British citizens but also Irish and Commonwealth citizens the right to vote in these elections, for 'Other EU' citizens to be barred from voting at national elections (especially when they pay taxes) simply runs counter to democratic values. Similarly, Non-EU and Non-Commonwealth citizens should also be allowed to vote in all elections (since they are currently barred from doing so) since there can never be adequate justice for the disenfranchised if there is no equality in the eyes of the law. Up to 3.35 million people living in the country (based on a very rudimentary, rough estimate) could immensely benefit from extending the franchise. Furthermore, if they contribute taxes to exchequer, it is only fair that their interests be formally represented when it is spent. Since the franchise is already available to non-citizens in the UK, this would merely be a logical extension that is consistent with the principles of democratic justice and equality.

- Given that Britain has gained a markedly increased reputation for xenophobia and racism since the Brexit referendum, extending the franchise to all taxpayers in Britain (regardless of citizenship) would be a strong commitment for democratic equality and against xenophobia whilst also ennobling the fact that ‘citizenship’ does not merely consist of voting rights. This would also strengthen Britain’s position as a global leader in human rights and democratic values.
- In these uncertain times, it would also help ensure that skilled, productive workers are not discouraged from working here due to our especially heightened reputation for xenophobia and racism that the Brexit referendum and its aftermath has undoubtedly intensified – indeed, extending the franchise would give Britain a comparative advantage (in the sense of political institutions) over most other countries when it comes to guaranteeing the rights of those talented workers who are looking to emigrate from their home countries.

Lowering the voting age is not only desirable, it is necessary if we are to achieve a democratically equitable society. What we have right now is nothing less than systematic, democratic discrimination in terms of age.

- Children are significantly affected by government policy since they are part of households and, therefore, they should have their interests formally represented. The franchise should be extended such that the voting age is not only lowered but it is extended to all children whenever they feel fit to claim their right to vote and engage actively.
- Indeed, when considering that poorer households tend to have more children than richer households (both within and across countries), a higher voting age means that poorer households are disproportionately under-represented in parliament whilst richer households are disproportionately over-represented (and, as such, this is a political factor that contributes to various inequalities).
- The most obvious inequality here that this reinforces is the divide between the rich and the poor and, more broadly, the perennial class divide.
- From an ethnic and racial perspective, it also means that certain groups are disproportionately under-represented versus others (since, to give just a couple of examples, Bangladeshis and Pakistanis tend to have higher fertility rates than the average population, this means that their households are significantly under-represented when taking this democratic discrimination by age into account – Professor Melinda Mills at Nuffield College, University of Oxford would be able to provide more information on studies of fertility according to ethnicity).
- Another possibility is to allow parents/legal guardians to act as the ‘custodians’ of children’s’ votes and to vote on their behalf (dividing their votes between them) until the children choose to claim their votes from their parents or when they turn 16 (whichever comes first).

Changes should be made to the voting process because many people simply do not want to turn up to vote because they may feel that their vote hardly matters. Additionally, people are incentivised to ‘vote tactically’ and thereby misrepresent their true preferences which is problematic for democracy. A holistic reconsideration of voting processes and elections is required but to thoroughly investigate and explore the bases and possibilities for this, is probably beyond the scope of this inquiry.

- Establishing a ‘Ministry of Democratic Innovation and Reform’ as a permanent arm of government dedicated to democratic innovation and reform may be a desirable option (for the time being) to have voting process reform always firmly on the agenda.

5. The role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship is important but it must not be compulsory but, rather, only made available. Especially when it comes to citizenship and political participation, the ideas of previous generations must not be unduly privileged even more than they currently are – this will only serve to indoctrinate younger generations and this is, quite clearly, a slippery slope.

Furthermore, anyone who has been even somewhat politically active will know that the ability to influence outcomes and galvanise/change views to bring about a good change is not a straightforward case of ‘do A to get B’; this cannot be taught but, rather, are generally learnt by people who are keen to engage politically. After all, as society continuously evolves, the optimal mode of political engagement is likely to evolve as well and it is unlikely that a static, compulsory curriculum will aid in this process of discovery and experiential learning. Indeed, rather than making children apathetic to politics within the compulsory education system (the time they spend by compulsion within the education system could, after all, sap many of the energy and will required to politically participate), it is important that they are given adequate time and have adequate energy to directly learn about it (experientially or otherwise). Ultimately, education is far broader than simply that which is taught in classrooms.

Returning to the point about extending the franchise to all children, if children were allowed to claim the vote whenever they felt like it, this may work to increase their active political participation immediately and, by implication, improve the relatively low turnout of young adults also since they would have had access to voting rights for longer. Thus, obtaining these rights sooner rather than later would institutionally incentivise greater deliberation and active, positive political engagement.

Given that a compulsory education system is imposed upon children, it is this which is primarily at the root of a political socialisation that is not inclusive and, given the state of current affairs, a compulsory education system forces children to experience all sorts of discrimination (besides racism – faced by both students and teachers – and xenophobia, it also includes homophobia and transphobia, for example) and could even encourage bullying and increase suicide risk which is clearly not conducive to social cohesion and integration.

7. Government should allow civic engagement to evolve naturally with minimal or no interference. There are several institutional factors that constrain this but some relatively straightforward ones to address are as follows.

To begin with, charities should no longer be constrained regarding the political nature of their purposes and activity. If pre-existing charities are constrained in the political nature of their activities and new charities can be completely prevented from forming if their entire purpose is political, it makes it harder to find other vehicles by which to encourage civic engagement. Indeed, the alternative for many people is to fund and/or support political parties to help people become more politically active but political parties are inherently institutions that will collectively encourage political engagement in so far as it benefits their respective parties.

The best thing government can do is realise that political activities and purposes are often meant for ‘public benefit’ (even if the prevailing animosity and divisiveness in politics may give us good cause to think otherwise) and, as such, should come under the remit of charitable activities – of course, many (possibly most) political activities also cater for special interests but many charities that are not overtly or inherently political also only cater for narrow sections of the population; this does not make their activities any less legitimate.

Indeed, allowing explicitly and overtly political charities will help ‘out’ charities that currently seek to be ‘covertly’ political and, through an increased amount of transparency in the political system, civic engagement will generally improve. There is no need to institutionally discourage/constrain political activity in the third sector.

- Furthermore, given that there is a plurality of views and ideas in society, some efforts would simply not be financially feasible to undertake without the tax breaks afforded to the third sector and, as such, this restriction on political activities and purposes crowds out less well-resourced viewpoints and perspectives – this helps reinforce a hegemonic oligarchy of certain ideas, ideologies and interests.

The funding and spending restrictions on political parties should also be reviewed and probably lifted since, essentially, although funding limits are well-intended, all that happens is the institutional incentivisation of money being spent in more dubious ways. It also restricts political participation to those who are time-rich and/or cash-rich since those who are time-poor and/or cash-poor will face a far greater and more substantial opportunity cost in active political engagement. Thus, this is not democratically just and it is certainly not equitable. Another way to address this fundamental problem of the high opportunity costs associated with political activity is to consider the introduction of a Universal Basic Income.

- Restrictions on foreign funding should also be abolished and this would help enable the aforementioned benefits of allowing non-national and non-resident politicians to stand for election. Indeed, where political parties previously lacked personnel on this front, lifting these restrictions would feedback into encouraging positive political participation.
- Indeed, given that personnel can be a significant issue for many political parties (especially when it comes to fielding candidates), the residency and nationality restrictions on running for election should be abolished (since they deny voters choice and are, therefore, inherently undemocratic in spirit) and Britain can lead the way globally in this in order to reap the benefits that enabling non-national politicians can allow. This will also help unshackle the potential of civil society.

Notably, the USA has fewer restrictions surrounding political spending and funding and its citizens tend to be far more actively engaged in the political process than we generally are here. Of course, the USA's political climate is clearly not without its problems but fewer restrictions surrounding political spending and funding are not inherently problematic.

9. Essentially, people feel that their interests are being inadequately translated, represented and implemented by their various representatives – this failure, however, is certainly not peculiar to Britain.

A key way in which this would be tackled is through improving candidate-quality preference-specification mechanisms to enable a more democratically-just and holistic voting system that incorporates \(gender-empowering\) voter-chosen political quotas (in this way, the intersectional experiences and concerns of individuals in society may be better addressed). The aforementioned voting system is intended to promote representation along many lines (including gender identity, class, ethnicity, race, ideology, income, profession, (geographical) community, sexuality, education, disability and much more). However, this idea is still very much at a conceptual stage. Nevertheless, it must be said that the contemporary privileging and reinforcement of a geospatial-constituency paradigm of representation subtly enables a modern variant of historical feudalism in contemporary democracies.

- The problem here is that the actors who most vehemently seek systemic political reform are usually those who are not in power and, thus, systemic political reform is usually not wholeheartedly pursued or enacted until long after it was needed (by which time much damage has already been done and the adage 'better late than never' offers mild respite at best).
- Thus, it may be worthwhile establishing a 'Ministry of Democratic Innovation and Reform' as an arm of government that is permanently devoted to the purpose of innovating and reforming our democracy so that more efficient and effective ways to translate, implement and represent peoples' interests are always sought and are permanently on the government's agenda.

The relics of Colonialism (such as in the honours system where one becomes ceremonially a part of the ‘British Empire’, for example) also consistently perpetuate a divisive mentality, subtly reinforces racial and neo-colonial hierarchies. This serves as a constant reminder of atrocities committed by Imperial rule in the countries of origin of many British citizens.

- Amartya Sen, a Nobel-laureate at Harvard University, wrote in Development as Freedom that the causes of the Irish potato famine and the Bengal famine were a direct result of Imperial rule as opposed to democracy – it is important that the necessity of democratic values both in principle and practice are not overlooked if/when one is looking to justify and teach democratic values. This also relates back to question 5 of the inquiry (regarding the role of education and teaching). In a similar vein, the transatlantic slave trade, its legacy and it being made possible because of a lack of adherence to the democratic values of intrinsic equality between and amongst peoples must be sufficiently acknowledged rather than an Imperial history being unduly glorified. Any benefits of Empire can only be sufficiently appreciated after its drawbacks and harmful impacts are thoroughly accounted for (and the latter is far from being the case).
- With regards to the ‘honours’ system, many undoubtedly worthy people have sought to disassociate themselves from it, outright reject it, openly criticise it etc. on the grounds of staunch republicanism and/or disdain for colonial legacies (to give just two prominent, recurring examples of rationales). This creates an unnecessary divide between monarchists and republicans within society whilst also unnecessarily burdening the contemporary monarchy with the associations of historical atrocities from Imperialism. There have been calls to change the name of the honours from ‘Empire’ to ‘Excellence’ and these are very fair and reasonable calls – it is but one word and it is a significant step in the right direction for healing historical wounds and enabling a cohesive, peaceful and united society through showcasing commitment to it. An alternative is to change the word to ‘Kingdom’ which would help shed some (though perhaps not all) of the brutal connotations that ‘Empire’ carries – however, the most significant limitation with this alternative suggestion is that it does nothing to ameliorate the social divisions between republicans and monarchists.
- There is a general lack of appreciation for the historical reasons for the myriad of inequalities in British society but, then again, there is often a lack of understanding and consensus on this front as well.

Given that citizenship and active political engagement has become increasingly shaped by the internet, the lack of fast internet access acts as a significant barrier to active citizenship and positive political participation. If the benefits of the internet are disproportionately reaped and unfairly distributed then it works to further divide people socially, politically and economically and this will only become further exacerbated as the importance of the internet to the economy continues to increase.

Misbehaviour on the internet (especially with police being generally under-resourced and ill-equipped to deal with this) which is intended to harass or intimidate people along the lines of gender, sexualities, race, religion, ethnicity, professions or otherwise must be examined in that this can only inhibit incentives for positive, active citizenship and political participation. Perhaps the government can work together with social media entities and internet companies to verify whether various online profiles are ‘real’ as opposed to ‘fake’ so there can be a greater degree of accountability (of course, companies and individuals will likely be wary of government involvement so perhaps cooperation through some form of Blockchain technology could be used but this may also become computationally expensive).

Relating back to question 4 of the inquiry, young people would feel less “left behind” if the franchise were extended to them since, currently, older generations are making decisions on policies that will disproportionately impact younger ones and young people have limited to no formal say in how their interests are represented.

This sentiment of feeling left behind can also often stem from being subject to a restriction of opportunities due to circumstances beyond peoples’ control (being born in a poorly-resourced, rural environment vs growing up in a well-resourced, urban one or, for young people, having less choice in educational opportunities, for example). For young people, one way to address this could be to empower them to have more say in the direction of their education (through increasing school choice, improving curriculum choice, liberalising student loan use etc. or even making schooling non-compulsory entirely so young people have the freedom to live their lives how they want) and, for rural people, it could come in the form of a liberalisation of land-use restrictions (these suggestions were also included in written evidence this author submitted to the Lords Committee on Artificial Intelligence).

10. People are better citizens and are more likely to engage positively when they experience greater social cohesion, integration and trust in society. Those who feel they owe less to a society that has generally marginalised them and systematically denied them of opportunities may be more likely to contribute less to the general interest. On the other hand, there are those who justifiably see a lack of social cohesion and integration as problems to be solved and their seeking solutions to it may be their means of promoting active citizenship and engagement.

Integration works best when there are fewer inequalities between peoples and a prime way to tackle this is to alleviate educational and workplace outcomes. Educational outcomes exert, on average, especially significant influences upon peoples’ future career trajectories, lifetime earnings, opportunities, etc. and, as such, whether it be at school or university, these outcomes need to be improved.

Introducing school vouchers could not only improve outcomes for various sections of society (by helping to improve outcomes for poor students, many middle class families, students from minority backgrounds, etc.) but also help organically combat radicalisation and terrorism – the hyperlinked RSA article is but a particular example of how diversity and integration (since radicalisation is the most extreme symptom of a lack of integration and it is a two-way street) can be increased concurrently through the introduction of school vouchers.

Liberalising the student loans market in Higher Education so that student can spend their loans abroad if they desire would entail greater competition in the Higher Education sector, potentially less debt for those students who do engage in higher education (and who study in countries with lower tuition fees/living costs) and thereby empowering those who do feel “left behind” (relating back to question 10) with more choice. With less debt and similar qualifications as well as having been exposed to diverse perspectives and experiences from foreign countries, these graduates will also return to Britain and contribute to greater social cohesion and integration whilst also improving economic productivity. This would also allow British universities to increase their intake of international students to not only increase their funding in these uncertain times but also to improve the local population’s perception of foreign-nationals.

11. What follows here includes personal, anecdotal evidence.

Writing as a 23-year-old male who immigrated to the UK from India with his family when he was five years old (initially to Scotland before moving to England when eight years old), I cannot sufficiently stress the importance and value of English proficiency in social cohesion and integration. When I arrived, I recall being barely able to read English (although I could speak some, I recall a memory where, when I arrived in Glasgow, I opened my mother’s Gynaecology textbook and asked her whether certain words were the word ‘the’ and ‘a’ before formally learning more English in Scotland). I recall, in a predominantly white primary school in Scotland, sitting in English support classes before making rapid progress.

My English continued to improve rapidly but I should say that not everyone is as fortunate to have a relatively ‘good’ education and, from Year 9 – 11, I attended a private day school (Birkdale School in Sheffield, where I took my GCSEs before leaving for Kodaikanal International School in India to study the IB Diploma Programme). This day school was predominantly white and, as such, when I did excel in English classes, I was regularly derided by peers along the lines of “how can you get such high grades in English? I mean, you’re not even English” and I suspect that this is not an uncommon experience for many non-white (and, more broadly, non-English) students and teachers. Although I have relatively fond memories of my school, I cannot deny that there was undoubtedly a racial dimension to my experience that was adversely felt (although I did graduate with the joint-top GCSE results in my year, alongside a friend of Ghanaian descent). In High Storrs School (a state secondary school that I studied at in Year 8 and 9 before Birkdale), matters were also complicated by even greater ethnic and racial division owing to the much greater diversity (which had its benefits but also its notable drawbacks) but the race aspect was not felt as acutely as in a predominantly white school. Nevertheless, it is also deeply worrying that, despite \(unconscious\) segregation in schools (which has, however, improved over time), white

British pupils are the lowest achieving group at GCSE level; it is crucial that white British students are not “left behind” because this will only serve to increase animosity within society and the introduction of school vouchers could significantly help improve outcomes for poor families in particular.

Particularly significant barriers faced by newcomers coming to Britain include xenophobia and racism (and this is not restricted to particular classes of society) but I do believe that the situation here is better than in many (possibly most) other countries in the world (though, given the current state of global affairs and increasingly rampant xenophobia, this is an inappropriate standard of comparison).

Regarding the naturalisation process, if the UK is particularly keen to ensure it remains open to talent, one thing to note is the role of permanent residency in the naturalisation process. One suggestion here is that the Tier 1 \(exceptional talent\) visa could have restrictions removed, the quota for it could be significantly expanded (since there are limited places available in this category), it could be better advertised (with applications even being solicited by our diplomatic missions) and holders could have the right to apply for permanent resident status immediately (and be granted it) akin to holders of the USA’s O-1 visa being able to apply for Green Card status immediately (and, therefore, significantly hastening the naturalisation process).

A citizenship test is demeaning and an insult to democratic principles – if ‘natural-born’ British citizens do not have to pass one, ‘naturalised’ British citizens should not have to either. Freedom is an inherently democratic value – to seek to impose conceptualisations of citizenship upon aspiring/prospective citizens is inherently undemocratic. Furthermore, elevating certain ideals of a ‘model’ citizen or trying to rigidly define and impose ‘citizenship’ values can constrain the optimal evolution of citizenship in our ever-changing society – a citizenship test is essentially a tool of reactionary conservatism as opposed to the far more rational and benign, organic variant of conservatism. For the committee’s information, I am a naturalised British citizen (naturalised around the age of 16) and I did not have to take a citizenship test. Indeed, I would have found it thoroughly insulting if I was made to.

5 August 2017

Dr Joanie Willett University of Exeter – written evidence (CCE0256)

1. The questions asked in this consultation relate to legal and cultural means of encouraging civic engagement; incorporating reflection about the relationship of citizens with citizen engagement.
2. All of the literature points to the importance of citizen engagement for political communities, for a range of reasons extending from the relationship of the individual to the State, health and wellbeing outcomes, personal efficacy and self-fulfilment, and for thriving communities. What I argue below is that some of the existing spaces through which citizens can engage with the community are actually relatively inaccessible on account of their particular structures. This means that although people would like to become much better involved, there are a number of barriers within the communities with which they chose to engage. In these instances, the problem was not about lack of motivation or apathy, (which might be fixed by improved education), but was a collective issue. Neither is this a collective issue that can be fixed by legal means. Instead, it points to a changing use of technology and communication, which shifts the relationship between individuals and the state to one of participatory reciprocity, rather than one of hierarchy. We believe that new technologies such as social media and mobile phone applications are an important means of fostering multi-way communications. Using innovative communicative technologies also helps to incorporate a younger demographic into civic engagement, who are either not reached, or are 'put off' by older methods such as community newsletters, or minutes on local noticeboards.
3. In 2016 we conducted research with Cornwall Council aimed at helping engagement in town and parish council's. Our study took part in two phases. Firstly we conducted 30 face to face interviews with randomly selected members of the public at the Royal Cornwall Show (which attracts a wide demographic from throughout Cornwall), asking what people thought about parish councils. In the second phase, we interviewed 6 people on a much deeper basis, in order to understand why these individuals did not want to be stand for election for the Parish Council.
4. The findings take four key and interlinked themes: Perception, conflict, structure and communication. The question of demography threads each of these. These themes are very important for understanding better the phenomenological meanings which underpin common phrases or received wisdom.
5. In terms of a more quantitative analysis, the reason for not becoming more involved with the Council was most frequently articulated as a problem of time. However in many instances, participant's willingness to give their time was based heavily on perceptions about Parish Councils that they had gleaned from their own experiences, or from anecdotal sources. Some people who felt they had no available time were currently already volunteering with many local organisations, validating their claims. However on further questioning, this could also mean that they did not perceive further involvement with the Parish Council as a productive use of their time. This might have been because of any one – or a combination - of the following themes. Finally, the following themes can lead to a sense of alienation between the councils and the community, which is not insurmountable, but needs to be addressed.

Perception

6. Parish Councils have a very strong brand recognition in so far as people generally know that they exist. However this brand recognition does not extend to knowing what it is that Parish Councils do. Indeed, on occasions people muddled Parish and Local Authority Councillors with MP's or even MEP's. This was particularly clear in the RCS interviews, where it was common for the research team to have to describe the role and function of the Parishes. Such a lack of prior knowledge creates the space for stereotypes and inaccurate perceptions. In some cases these perceptions were drawn from media series such as BBC Radios 4's The Archers; in others, gleaned from neighbours and peer groups. The younger people interviewed were less likely to have a clear prior understanding of the activities of the Parish Council, and many felt a marked disconnect with local council activities.

7. Most often, people told us that they thought councils were dominated by older people, typically retired older men, which impacts on the gendered imagining of local government (see Farrel and Titcombe, 2016). This perception was often supported by follow up statements likening them to old boys clubs, dominated by older men. Some felt that the council was 'too old' and lacked full representative abilities because of the missing age and social groups which were elsewhere visible in the community. In both research settings, calls were made for younger people to get involved in the council as a means of making them both more representative, but also more accessible. Indeed, when people feel that a diverse range of community voices are heard within local governance, it enhances the legitimacy of decision making (Michels and De Graaf, 2010; McIntyre and Halsall, 2012; Johnson, 2014).

8. Interestingly, one participant, a young man (aged approximately 20-30) raised a challenge to this narrative. He had spent much time being active in his community and had friends that were Councillors. This respondent was keen to present an alternative perspective, and drew two individuals, one male, and one female, both also young. Generally however, even when people were being positive about the Council, participants tended to use words such as 'old fashioned' and associated with the activities of older people, and resistant to change. Conversely, one participant was very positive about the older demographic perceived to dominate Councils, as they had more longevity as opposed to younger councillors who tended to come and go.

9. Finally, although some participants believe that Councillors love their jobs, are friendly towards the community and involved in shaping positive change, other people had had bad experiences (particularly with regard to planning issues). This in turn led to participants reaching the conclusion that many Councils are dominated by councillors who are primarily there for their own interests. This lack of trust is an aspect that needs to be explored much further and is deeply connected to Putnam's (2000) work on social capital. Problems associated with lack of trust may, at least in part, be linked to national political discourses (i.e. the expenses scandal, and the contemporary debates on the EU Referendum) which lead to questions about the integrity of political representatives and their motivations for action. This perception may also be symptomatic of a general feeling of dissatisfaction or frustration at not being able to make their own voice heard, for many reasons, and which 'others' or blames political leaders. Ironically, one way of reversing this problem with lack of trust might be to improve the level and quality of civic participation (Lee et al., 2005; Putnam, 2000; Atterton, 2007; Johnson, 2014).

Conflict

10. This was an unexpected theme, and was partially linked to the perceptions of age and the councillor demographics outlined above. Conflict represents the extent to which individuals felt that participation in the council could affect their relationships with neighbours in the community. This was raised on a number of occasions, usually by females, and which may go some way to exploring the under-representation of women in public life (see Farrel and Titcombe, 2016). The problem is best related through the story of one woman in her late 30's with a young family who was elected onto the Parish Council for a period of time. This person felt that the policies and aims that she held as important had been at odds with the values and interests of the other councillors who were older and male (and more middle class). In practical terms, it meant that she had clashed severely over competing and opposing priorities, which challenged existing hierarchies (Moir and Leyshon, 2013). The families and children who she felt that she represented had less resonance with those that saw problems in terms of supporting the level of summer visitors and the businesses that were dependent on them. The social and community costs for this participant were so large that it generated a feeling of negativity about the community as a whole, and subsequently contributed to her decision to move the family out of the village in which they had lived in for years.

11. When the demographic split on the council is so polarised, and it is up to one or at best two individuals to voice alternative perspectives, a critical councillor finds little or no support for their points of view. This risks leading to feelings of hostility and animosity, which is not conducive to harmonious community relations. Part of the problem (and this links too with perception), is that some participants felt that unless you fitted with the general 'look' or 'age-bracket' of the council then your voice would not be listened to. In one instance, the participant had been a very active member of several civil society organisations within her community. However, despite knowing and understanding the locality intimately, she had not engaged with the Town Council because she did not feel that she would not be taken seriously. The perception that this participant held was primarily due to the demographic differences between her and the Councillors. This is despite the fact that some of the organisations that she worked with had been trying, in a similar vein to the example related by Guertz and Van De Wijdeven (2010), to bridge the divide between civil society organisations and representative democracy. Further, and similar to the hierarchical difficulties (Moir and Leyshon, 2013) mentioned by other participants above, she felt that any challenges that she made to current orthodoxy would be unpopular with the Council itself. Taken together, this suggests that conflict may be linked to the perception that Parish

Councils are resistant to change. If new ideas about the strategic direction of the community are seen as too different to those held by existing civic leaders, this may unsettle individuals with a more conservative outlook. This may especially be the case if the claim that Councils tend to be too old fashioned is justified. Here, we might see a tension between older ways of doing things and the requirements of current times.

12. In the parlance of social capital (Putnam, 2000) and echoing some of the findings of Atterton (2007), it may be possible to make the claim that in these instances there is excessive bonding capital between the councillors, which has created closed networks. In turn, this means that they are resistant to change, path dependant and struggle to follow ideas which come from outside their closely bonded network. The answer to which, following social capital theory again, is to develop 'bridges' outside of the closed networks, cumulatively enabling an opening of previously insular networks and Councils (see, e.g. Evans and Synett, 2007; Shortall, 2004).

Structures

13. The formalised structures of representative democracy are necessary as a means of ensuring openness, inclusivity, and transparency. It also means that people who are familiar with the process find it easier to navigate the complex systems of local government. However, these formalised structures can be (and are) interpreted as obstructive, with dominating rules and regulations (see, e.g. Moir and Leyshon, 2013). In both research settings, interviewees and focus group members had a perception that the structure of this level of government was oppressive, with many people choosing instead to spend their efforts working with community action groups which they felt were less dominated by procedure. This raises a tension between the fluidity of informal participatory local politics, where individuals can contribute to the ongoing emergence of rules and ideas, and the more rigid sphere of Parish and Town Councils. This also signals why other studies have focussed on increasing participatory, rather than representative governance (Guertz and Van De Wijdeven, 2010), encouraging better links between the two strands rather than improving participation in representative local government.

14. Often claims to not have enough time to participate in Parish Council activities were articulated in terms of structures of some form or another. For example, one contributor related that her husband had been a Parish Councillor, and enjoyed the work that he was doing in this role. However, a complex period of work that involved much travelling meant that he had unavoidably missed three consecutive meetings, leading to him having to stand down from his position on the Council. This was something that she believed to be stipulated in Council rules, and in this example at least, was strictly applied. At issue here is the perceived or real inflexibility of the structures of councils. Time would be less of a problem if council structures were more flexible and reflective of how contemporary society operates. While there were many calls for younger people, particularly younger professionals, or for people who had young families to get involved in parish electoral politics, these people all cited time constraints and inflexibility as the biggest impeding factor.

15. The inflexibility and rigidity of existing structures seems to work against people 'dipping in and out' of volunteering for the Parish Council. Whereas people perceive that, outside of the formal sphere, working within a different participatory project or organisation they may be able to adjust their time commitment flexibly as time permits. Some also stated that they felt that their avenue of choice to make effective change in their localities was through community organisations. Indeed, this appears to support the claims by McIntyre and Halsall (2011) that people prefer to get involved in community work over specific issues that matter to them. Nevertheless, when questioned on this, many people who had previously not been very positive about the work or the structure of the council, described good personal experiences of working together on projects. However, representative democracy and standing for election involves effectively signing up for a four year period, based on minimal information as to what the role entails on a day to day basis, the issues that they will be working on, and how this might affect a person's life. Indeed, people's views on the time commitments and roles necessary to be a councillor varied vastly, ranging between a few hours a week and twenty or more hours a week.

16. It is important also to bear in mind that the structures and languages used within Council processes, although existing for solid and defensible reasons, are outside of many people's frame of reference. This means that many people will find Council communications such as meetings and the presentation of minutes and notes – unfamiliar, alien, and very possibly a barrier to participation.

Communication

17. Communication emerged as a very strong theme and impacts on the perceptions underpinning the other themes. Many research participants felt that the communication they received from their Parish Councils was inadequate. Indeed, many of the issues raised above might be considered to be, at root, problems of mis-communication. We recognise that most Councils have existing means of disseminating information to the wider public, and that for the most part Councils are extremely keen to let the whole community know about all of the hard work that they are doing. However, participants still articulated many experiences of not picking up the methods that Councils are using to communicate, which indicates that changes have to be made in some places. When participants did pick up Council messages, they often experienced communication as only being one-way, effectively meaning that they register their Councillors as telling the public what they were doing and what was going to happen rather than inviting feedback or asking what the Community wanted to happen (see e.g. Moir and Leyshon, 2013).

18. This notion of the two-way nature of communication came up on a number of occasions, particularly with regards to when members of the community have tried to put new ideas before the council, or campaign for a particular policy or agenda. On several occasions, participants or people that they knew had approached their council over a single issue, most frequently the development of public play areas for children. The experiences that they related were that often their council had been slow, ineffective or obstructive, rather than open to suggestions for positive change. Many of the respondents relating these stories had developed very strong opinions regarding the subject, especially the effect it had on their children, for whom for most it was their first taste of what politics means. This is a very important point to be made. Sometimes, when an individual begins a local campaign, this is their first first-hand experience of political processes in general, and local councils in particular. People who launch a local campaign are also already politically motivated in some way, and may have the potential to become an asset to their communities. If they have a good experience (even if actually the council cannot help them), this will help them to have positive perceptions of local councils, and will increase their likelihood of getting involved in some way in the future. Further, they are more likely to talk about Councils in a positive way, with the snowball effect that this engenders as people feel more listened to, they are more invested in community decisions and feel more responsible for local services (Michels and De Graaf, 2010).

19. This is especially the case when children try to get involved in a local campaign. One participant who had only recently left full-time education, pointed out that children are one of the few groups in a community who live out most of their lives in that community. However through age and voting restrictions, they are often excluded from local decision-making processes. But pre-voting age young people are also a potential community asset and sensitive communication – especially with those who show an interest with local politics – is deemed to be highly important.

20. Moreover, less effective use of communication can misfire, leading to very positive things that the Council does becoming interpreted in very negative ways. For example, one Council in a coastal area developed some kayak racks. This potentially was a huge positive and something which was of great utility for the community. However, this was also interpreted as an area of unease, because residents expressed that they hadn't known about the new facility until all of the available spaces were taken. This was further perceived as indicative that members of the council benefited from the racks more than other residents. It is unlikely in this instance that the Council consciously intended to work to its own advantage at the expense of the rest of the community. But this example does illustrate how easily positive actions can be misconstrued, creating negative narratives which undermine the relationship between communication and trust (McIntyre and Halsall, 2012).

21. Finally, elections are not only important for enhanced democracy, but also they are a crucial way for the potential new Council and the community to have a conversation. People appreciate talking to campaigning candidates about their ideas, and the act of voting means that individuals feel that they have a stake in the Council itself. Although managing to co-opt Councillors in order to avoid elections is a cost-effective act, it was not experienced positively by any of the individuals that we spoke to as part of this research. Instead, people considered co-option and the lack of elections as fundamentally undemocratic and an inhibitor to diversity which contributes to the negative perceptions that many people carried (see also Johnson, 2014).

Going Forward

22. Communication runs at the heart of trying to improve participation in Parish Councils. Good communication would encourage more effective participation in Council decision making, and might go a long way to reducing some of the obvious dissatisfaction that we heard. It also might assist people to feel more welcome in unfamiliar structures, and certainly would help to ameliorate some of the conflict situations discussed above. It would also help to ensure more accurate and positive perceptions of local Councils, which would help to attract a broader demographic. This might go some way to ensuring that Councils and their communities mediate changing society, policy, expectations and environments in pro-active, positive ways.

23. In some regards, this feels a bit like a ‘chicken and egg’ problem. A broader demographic is needed in order to help to modernise the Council’s, but different types of people are reluctant to get involved because they perceive Councils to be old-fashioned and as such difficult to get involved in. Moreover, some issues mentioned above are easier to change than others. For example, Council structures might be extremely difficult to alter, set as they are within legislation and issues of due process and transparency. However, it may be possible to interpret or adapt the rules in line with a more contemporary understanding of the world, and good Parish Clerks may be able to assist significantly with this.

24. One of the key factors that emerged from this research, is that people do want to be involved in their communities, and they do want to help to make positive change. But they also need to feel that this is an effective and productive use of their time. Some people are satisfying their need to participate in local democracy through informal governance organisations. This is an energy and dynamism that Councils need to be able to harness.

25. Clearly, enhancing participation in Parish Councils, and encouraging people to both stand for election and to vote when elections are able to happen; covers both short-term and long-term changes. One suggestion would be to involve non-voting stakeholders (including those under-18) to be involved in the improving communication. Low tech solutions might involve developing accurate and easily accessible descriptions of the roles performed by individual council members, advertising who councillors are and what they are doing. These could form part of the Council online presence or local newsletter. It is also really important that Council successes (and indeed challenges) are communicated in an interesting and engaging way. Here, younger people might work with councillors, to help them to communicate better across generational divides. The additional benefit of this might be to help people to understand better the kinds of work that individual councillors do, supporting future involvement. This may embed young people and their families into council communicative networks, while also ensuring that the language used is accessible.

26. While the changes suggested above are low tech, the dissemination of the information does not need to be so. In an effort to modernise the structures and systems of the Council, Social Media can play an important role in updating the perception of Town and Parish Councils, while improving its communication, engagement and in turn, participation. Indeed, some Councils are doing this to great effect. Social Media offers the opportunities for users to be constantly connected, both accessing and creating content which is instantaneously disseminated to anyone in the network (Ellison and Hardey, 2014). As a community tool for a Parish Council a ‘fan page’ on Facebook would allow multiple pathways of communication, which was one of the most sought for areas of improvements in our findings. Indeed, there are already cases where e-democracy has been a success as highlighted by Whyte et al (2006) who found that in Scottish community councils, ‘web based tools enable and encourage more people to have their say in local democracy than has previously been the case through community councils', public meetings and communications'. Technology is ever advancing and to benefit from this Councils need to situate themselves within these contemporary spheres to both ensure resonance with all demographics, but also to take advantage of the numerous opportunities Social Media presents. Further to the use of social media, mobile applications, downloaded onto Smart Phones also provide opportunities to improve civic engagement and participation. A rural Parish Council in Leicestershire is at the forefront of this development, by creating its own 'App' – which mirrors the function of local government apps at a regional level (East Goscote Parish Council, 2016). Applications such as this provide handheld access to features such as a local calendar of events, notifications and instantaneous bulletins of news, online community forums, and spaces to upload and share photos of issues and events. The cost effectiveness of such technologies is also important to bear in mind when local government is still feeling the pressures of austerity measures. New technologies can undoubtedly allow new and diversified pathways for communication, however more research needs to be done to examine the effect of these kinds of instruments to improve community engagement and subsequently participation.

References

- Atterton, J. (2007) The 'Strength of Weak Ties': Social Networking By Business Owners in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Sociologia Ruralis. 47 (3): 228-245.
- East Goscote Parish Council (2016) East Goscote's Mobile App: Is this a Parish Council First?. Available: <http://theappoffice.com/wp-content/uploads/2015/04/Clerk-Jan16-p21.pdf>
- Evans, M., Synett, S. (2007) Generating Social Capital? The Social Economy and Local Economic Development, European Urban and Regional Studies. 14 (1): 55-74.
- Farrel, C., Titcombe, S. (2016) Gender and the Experiences of Local Elected Members – A Focus on Wales. Local Government Studies DOI: 10.1080/03003930.2016.1207629
- Geurtz, C., Van de Wijdeven, T. (2010) Making Citizen Participation Work: The Challenging Search for New Forms of Local Democracy in The Netherlands. Local Government Studies, 36 (4): 531-549.
- Johnson, C. (2014) Local Civic Participation and Democratic Legitimacy: Evidence from England and Wales, Political Studies 60 (4) 765-792.
- Lee, J., Arnason, A., Nightingale, A., Shucksmith, M. (2005) Networking Social Capital and Identities in European Rural Development. Sociologia Ruralis. 45 (4): 269-283.
- Michels, A., De Graaf, L. (2010) Examining citizen participation: Local participatory policy making and democracy, Local Government Studies, 36 (4): 477-491.

Wonder Foundation – written evidence (CCE0044)

McIntyre, T., Halsall, J. (2011) Community governance and local decision making: Paper presented to the “diversity and Convergence: Planning in a world of change conference”, Local Economy, 26(4): 269–284.

Moir, E., Leyshon, M. (2013) The design of decision-making: participatory budgeting and the production of localism, Local Environment, 18 (9): 1002-1023.

Putnam, R. (2000) Bowling Alone; The Collapse and Revival of American Community, London: Simon Schuster Paper Backs

Shortall, S. (2004) Social or Economic Goals, Civic Inclusion or Exclusion? An Analysis of Rural Development Theory and Practice, Sociologia Ruralis 44 (1): 109-124.

Whyte, A., Macintosh, A., McKay-Hubbard, A., Shell, D. (2006) An E-Democracy Model for Communities: Final Report of the E-Community Council Project. Edinburgh: International Teledemocracy Centre, Napier University.

Wonder Foundation – written evidence (CCE0044)

The Wonder Foundation is a charity dedicated to empowering vulnerable people through education. We work with local-led partners around the world to help women, girls, and their families access the education and support they need to exit poverty, for good.

In 2016, we released our report, Empowerment through Education: Women Breaking the English Barrier, to give a voice to vulnerable female migrants and share their perspective on the barriers they face in learning English and accessing English classes in the UK.⁸⁸⁵ We are now building on our findings by conducting new research on the impact of women-only ESOL provisions on promoting integration and pathways to active citizenship for vulnerable female migrants.⁸⁸⁶ Therefore, given the scope of these 2 research projects, our written submission is focused on addressing questions 1, 7, 8, 9, 11, and 12.

1. As part of our research, we spoke to both vulnerable female migrants and service providers to understand the role English learning provisions play in the lives of migrants in the UK. What was frequently articulated to us was that improved access to and quality of English learning provisions could improve an individual’s confidence and ability to build a life in the UK and become active members of their communities.

⁸⁸⁵You can find our report here: <http://wonderfoundation.org.uk/resources/report-women-breaking-english-barrier>

⁸⁸⁶You can find more information about our new research here: <http://wonderfoundation.org.uk/resources/current-research-how-migrant-women-learn-english>

Therefore, for many vulnerable female migrants, this potential outcome from learning English is how they have come to understand citizenship and civic engagement. That is, they view these terms as intertwined concepts, which collectively represent someone who is able to engage and interact with their fellow community members and make a positive impact on their community-at-large.

Moreover, they view citizenship and civic engagement as being more than just rights and opportunities afforded through laws; they recognise that the environment of the society also matters to ensure migrants have the support and means needed to be active and engaged. For example, several of the women we interviewed expressed how they continue to participate in English classes, despite their good command of English and understanding of UK society, because the classes were one of the few spaces where they felt comfortable and confident using English and socialising with others.

The OECD's Indicators of Immigrant Integration 2015 report supports these anecdotal accounts on the multidimensional nature of citizenship and civic engagement. For example, by analysing the citizenship and civic engagement outcomes of migrants to OECD member countries, the OECD was able to show that the more successful countries were those that had a more welcoming attitude towards migrants. More specifically, they argued that by being more accepting, these countries were fostering and creating the conditions needed for migrants to feel capable of engaging with and contributing to their new community.⁸⁸⁷

Ultimately, by recognising citizenship and civic engagement as this shared experience between an individual and their fellow community members, it can help to construct an individual's identity within a society. In other words, a collective understanding of citizenship and civic engagement can help strengthen an individual's relationship with society and, in turn, foster a sense of belonging and inclusion. This point is particularly relevant to the vulnerable female migrants we spoke to throughout our research. Many of them emphasised how they value English learning because it will help improve their lives and wellbeing in the UK and subsequently support their goal of being recognised as a member of UK society; however, they also expressed how the latter goal is difficult to attain without the backdrop of support from individuals outside of the English learning spaces.

7. In our report, Empowerment through Education: Women Breaking the English Barrier, we explored the role English classes play in improving the lives and wellbeing of vulnerable female migrants in the UK. From the interviews we conducted with both learners and instructors, we learned the value in incorporating every day themes into language learning to improve a learner's understanding of British society and customs. Additionally, we learned that classes covering practical skills and knowledge were preferred as they better aligned with the day-to-day needs of the learners and made learning more enjoyable and salient.

⁸⁸⁷OECD (2015), Indicators of Immigrant Integration 2015: <http://www.oecd.org/els/mig/Indicators-of-Immigrant-Integration-2015.pdf>

Our findings are supported by other studies analysing English learning provisions offered in other English-speaking countries, as well as literary programs aimed at females. For example, in 2 different studies where female migrants in ESOL classes in the United States and Australia respectively were observed, the researchers concluded that content focusing on pragmatic skills led to improved engagement and subsequent improvement in language proficiency amongst learners.⁸⁸⁸ In the context of women-only literary programs, UNESCO indicated in their 2013 report, Literacy Programmes with a focus on women to reduce gender disparities, that literacy programmes that were more effective in promoting literacy, breaking down socio-cultural barriers, and reducing gender-based disparities were those that had clear linkages to daily life skills and interactions.⁸⁸⁹

Given how language learning can be an appropriate space to discuss social and cultural topics, we believe that they can pave a path towards civic engagement. Therefore, we believe that the Government and Parliament could support migrants who want to become active and engaged citizens by developing a UK English-learning strategy that: a) is practical and sensitive to the learning needs of the various learners, b) improves access to English learning provisions for all migrants, and c) recognises both formal and informal settings for English learning, as vulnerable female migrants especially find value in community-based learning provisions as they can create a safe, welcoming, and empowering place to learning English. Moreover, we also recommend that any national strategy be reinforced by promoting collaboration and cooperation amongst service providers who work with migrant populations, so the needs of migrants are addressed from a whole-person approach.

Finally, even if migrants are given the resources needed to understand how to navigate and engage with their new surroundings, they will still face barriers in becoming active and engaged unless the society has created an accepting and inclusive environment for all. In other words, effective civic engagement across society means empowering an individual to be active and empowering this same individual to support others to be active, too. In our report, as a means to create this type of environment, we recommend funding national and local mentoring and befriending initiatives as they can help migrants, particularly vulnerable females, in meeting British people and feeling welcome and included in British society.

⁸⁸⁸FRYE, D. (1999), Participatory Education as a Critical Framework for an Immigrant Women's ESL Class. TESOL Quarterly, 33: 501–513. doi:10.2307/3587676; HEWAGODAGE, V. & O'NEILL, S. (2014), A case study of isolated NESB adult migrant women's experience learning English: A sociocultural approach to decoding household texts. International Journal of Pedagogies and Learning, 6: 23-40: doi:10.5172/ijpl.6.1.23

⁸⁸⁹UNESCO (2013), Literacy Programmes with a focus on women to reduce gender disparities, Case studies from UNESCO Effective Literacy and Numeracy Practices Database (LitBase): <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0022/002225/222588e.pdf>

8. Britain can be a place for diverse populations to live and work together if people are able and willing to welcome and support all who want to make Britain their home. As we have witnessed through our research, this is an attainable goal if we can share the values of inclusion, equality, and tolerance across Britain.

Some of the strongest examples on the importance of these values comes from the vulnerable female migrants we spoke with. For those who were beginning their journey of learning English, they expressed anxiety over how they are perceived and often treated due to their limited English proficiency. For example, one new learner stated, “People, when they look at me, think that I can read and write. And once someone said to me, how can’ t you read and write. You are a big woman and you can’ t really read and write. And I felt so bad.”

Unfortunately, even amongst women who had been living in the UK for many years and had improved their command of English, the feeling of not belonging persisted. Additionally, it was common for women to become discouraged from learning, which could further be exacerbated when compounded with other barriers they face (e.g. caregiving responsibilities).

What these accounts shed light on is how these barriers to English could affect their citizenship. This is why our report included 2 recommendations focused on building a culture of acceptance. The first advocates for empowering community spaces where women feel safe and welcome as it can help them build relationships and integrate, which in turn can pave the way towards citizenship. The second articulates the need to recognise integration as a two-way process; instead of having migrants, such as vulnerable female migrants, bear full responsibility for how well they can become a part of British society, we believe in preventing separation and isolation by fostering inter-cultural dialogue across the diverse populations who live in the UK.

9. Using the term “left behind” fails to recognise the multidimensionality and complexity of creating a society that empowers its members. Moreover, it blames disadvantaged individuals like vulnerable migrants and ignores how social constructs (e.g. how media can help to shape the public’s perception of migrant groups⁸⁹⁰) can exacerbate the barriers they face in being able to be active and engaged members of their community.

These barriers can be eradicated, though, by shifting away from victim blaming and instead building up the infrastructure and education needed to promote a societally-shared understanding of how active citizenship is a collective experience. What we mean by this is advocating for and implementing initiatives that bring people together, so they can work together to enrich the community they live in and share.

⁸⁹⁰COMPAS (WP-14-117), Constructing Immigrants: Portrayals of Migrant Groups in British Newspapers, 2010-2012: http://www.compas.ox.ac.uk/media/WP-2014-117-Blinder-Allen_Media_Portrayal_Immigrants.pdf

In our new research, we have explored this question in-depth and found examples of this type of approach in the U.S. These initiatives have, in fact, continued to push forward despite the immigration control agenda set forth by the current administration.

One such example is Welcoming America, which is a non-profit and non-partisan organisation that challenges cities across the U.S. to find their own ways to celebrate newcomers and long-term residents in their community and make their community a home for all. And to help support these grassroots movements of making the country a ‘nation of neighbours’, they facilitate connections, share and build on best practices, and promote change through the work of the cities and towns.⁸⁹¹ Already the organisation is making an impact on its participating communities, such as Nashville, Tennessee; by working with the organisation, this city’s “climate for immigrants was transformed from a particularly toxic one to one that embraces immigrants, and the city and its residents have reaped the economic benefits.”⁸⁹²

In the UK, a similar movement exists through the work of City of Sanctuary. As an organisation committed to building a culture of hospitality for all who seek sanctuary in the UK, they are helping to make hospitality a part of UK society. They have supported and developed over 90 different initiatives and have subsequently become a strong advocate for refugees and people seeking sanctuary.⁸⁹³

Welcoming initiatives are gaining even more traction by extending the conversation to everyone in the UK. While only an annual celebration, the Great Get Together, which was inspired by Jo Cox, invites people to come together to celebrate their community in a fun, inclusive, and welcoming way.⁸⁹⁴ This year’s celebration alone resulted in 100,000 events being held across the UK⁸⁹⁵, which suggests the feasibility of adopting a more long-term approach of recognising active citizenship as a collective experience.

11. English proficiency plays a vital role in an individual’s life in the UK, as it is a tool that can help an individual to understand and navigate their surroundings, as well as meet and befriend their fellow community members. Thus, newcomers to the UK, having recognised this link between English proficiency and their life in the UK, often seek English learning opportunities as a means to improve their command of the English language.

⁸⁹¹To learn more about Welcoming America, you can visit their website: <https://www.welcomingamerica.org/about/who-we-are>

⁸⁹²Welcoming America, Stories of Impact: <https://www.welcomingamerica.org/spotlight>

⁸⁹³ To learn more about City of Sanctuary, you can visit their website: <https://cityofsanctuary.org>

⁸⁹⁴To Learn more about the Great Get Together, you can visit their website: <https://www.greatgettogether.org/>

⁸⁹⁵Guardian (18 June 2017), Thousands flock to Great Get Together events celebrating life of Jo Cox: <https://www.theguardian.com/politics/2017/jun/17/jo-cox-the-great-get-together-more-in-common-brendan-cox-news-james-tapper>

Unfortunately, accessing English learning provisions has become increasingly more difficult, in part due to aggressive funding cuts that occurred between 2008 to 2015. For example, funding for accredited ESOL was reduced by 40%⁸⁹⁶, despite the growing number of migrants from countries with low rates of English proficiency.⁸⁹⁷ Moreover, even with the Government recently announcing a £10 million investment over the next five years in English learning for resettled Syrian refugees, it will not be able to compensate for the vast cuts made to English learning over these past five years.⁸⁹⁸

In short, the current demand for English learning is outstripping the supply of providers, which has led to less people being able to participate in English lessons. In fact, in a recent report by Refugee Action, they found that for the majority of the English language providers they interviewed in England, their waiting lists stretched to almost 1,000 people. This same report also highlighted how the funding cuts have led to a reduction in options and time-spent for English learning. This is because providers have had to consolidate and/or shorten their classes in order to cope with the cuts. For many learners, this has meant the inability or increased difficulty in accessing provisions that match their learning needs and interests.⁸⁹⁹

With access to English learning clearly being a challenge for migrants, we decided to explore this question in-depth, but specific to the experience of vulnerable female migrants. Our focus was driven by the fact that in discussions about English learning, these women are often presented as individuals who need to learn English for their families and wider society, rather than how it is a good in and of itself.

In speaking with these women, we learned how English is an essential part of their journey to feel empowered and able to make fulfilling choices, raise their aspiration and those of their friends and families, and to integrate and feel at home in the UK. We also learned of myriad, often pronounced barriers they faced in accessing English learning opportunities even with their strong motivation and desire to learn the language.

While funding could help to diminish some of these barriers, we found that other changes were also needed in order to empower these women to truly break down and overcome the

⁸⁹⁶DEMOS (2014), On Speaking Terms: http://www.demos.co.uk/les/On_speaking_termsweb.pdf?1408395571

⁸⁹⁷Skills Funding Agency (July 2016), Further Education and Skills Learner Participation, Outcomes and Level of Highest Qualification Held: https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/486852/SFR_commentary_November_2015_ofqual_update.pdf

⁸⁹⁸Refugee Action (2 March 2017), Refugees forced to wait up to two years for English lessons: <http://www.refugee-action.org.uk/4360-2/>

⁸⁹⁹Refugee Action (March 2017), Locked out of learning- A snapshot of ESOL provisions in England: http://www.refugee-action.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2017/02/Locked_out_of_learning_briefing_paper_February_2017.pdf barriers they face. These changes, which we included as recommendations in our report, are to:

- a) adopt a whole-person approach to learning where service providers work together to ensure the various needs of the learning are being met (e.g. providing access to childcare so the learner can participate in classes),
- b) ensure all countries have a national strategy on language learning that takes into consideration the wide-range of learning needs and interests of English learners, and
- c) recognise the role of community-based spaces in fostering English learning as they can create a safe and welcoming place where a learner can gain the confidence and support needed to begin engaging with the language.

Our new research builds on these recommendations, most notably the latter. By exploring the unique space of women-only provisions in community spaces, we hope to understand how they may further breakdown learning barriers and, in turn, pave the way towards better integration and opportunity for citizenship. Through our initial data collection, we have already seen how these providers are helping females of various backgrounds re-gain confidence, pursue their respective personal and professional goals, and become independent and active members of their community. As we continue our research, we hope to deepen our understanding of these positive impacts.

Finally, while we do recognise the value of English proficiency, we do not want to promote English learning as the one and only way to promote integration and active citizenship. As noted in the other sections of this submission, migrants need to feel welcomed and supported by the community-at-large in order for English proficiency to be a meaningful tool for life in the UK. In the same vein, changes to the naturalization and citizenship process should take into consideration how the country can better promote an overall culture of inclusion for all the diverse populations who have come to call UK their home. The current system and existing recommendations tend to focus on what the migrant can do, rather than what the migrant and the society can do together.

12. The Baytree Centre is one of our partner organisations and its mission is to, “create supportive pathways towards social inclusion for inner city families through education and training programme for women and girls.”⁹⁰⁰ As they are an organisation with whom we have a strong relationship and is regularly offering English learning services and activities to women, we have included them as a case study and a source of information for our research.

In studying and evaluating their work, we found that they have been able to effectively promote tolerance and help the individuals they serve in becoming meaningful members of society. This success is perhaps best explained by the fact that they offer contextualised support in a supportive, welcoming, safe, and inclusive community-based spaces. For example, their PEARL programme, which offers ESOL classes coupled with social activities, helps to bring women together to learn English in a fun, engaging, and social way.

⁹⁰⁰ You can learn more about the services offered at The Baytree Centre by visiting their website: <http://www.baytreecentre.org/>

Their impact is truly felt by the people they serve. One of their former students shared her experience with Baytree and her account captures the impact of this organisation in shaping her life in London. Specifically, she explained how the English classes she participated in helped her gain the confidence needed to pursue her goal of working for the NHS, as well as learn how to make meaningful and lasting friendships with women from different countries and cultures. More importantly, she shared that the support she received from Baytree motivated her to pursue outreach work with her community on health promotion campaigns and maternal health.

Another former student also had a similar experience. As a refugee from Kosovo, she arrived with a very limited command of the English language. However, by enrolling in the English and literacy classes at Baytree, she was given the support and guidance needed to not only learn English and acquire the skills needed to become a qualified accountant, but also become an ambassador and friend to newcomers to the Centre and London.

The success and impact we have witnessed at Baytree has subsequently led us to take on a new project, Helping Hands, that will complement the research we are conducting.⁹⁰¹ This project which brings together service providers in Latvia, Poland, Slovenia, and Spain, has developed mentoring initiatives and engaging resources to welcome and support new migrants and refugees in these countries. While Baytree itself will not be involved in the development of this project, we will use the qualitative evidence we have gained from them to help inform our strategy.

Conclusion

Working alongside vulnerable female migrants, we have learned from them that they believe in citizenship and civic engagement. However, while the enthusiasm is there, societally and institutionally-constructed barriers have hindered their ability to feel accepted and welcomed as equal members of society. We hope that these barriers can be eradicated by implementing pragmatic and durable solutions that change the way our society views migrants and refugees.

Therefore, we are supportive of the Citizenship and Civic Engagement Committee's effort to better understand the landscape of how the diverse populations who live in the UK experience citizenship and civic engagement. We hope that by sharing our work with vulnerable female migrants, we have been able to give voice to their perspective.

⁹⁰¹You can learn more about this project here: <http://wonderfoundation.org.uk/helping-hands-mentoring>

30 August 2017

Workers' Educational Association - written evidence (CCE0257)

Introduction and background

1. The Workers' Educational Association is the UK's largest voluntary sector provider of adult education in England and Scotland. We deliver almost 9,000 part-time courses to nearly 60,000 adult students each year.
2. Our mission and vision are entirely pertinent to the subject of this Inquiry.
3. Our vision is for "A better world - equal, democratic and just; through adult education the WEA challenges and inspires individuals, communities and society"
4. Our mission is made up of the following elements:
 - Raising educational aspirations
 - Bringing great teaching and learning to local communities
 - Ensuring there is always an opportunity for adults to return to learning
 - Developing educational opportunities for the most disadvantaged
 - Involving students and supporters as members to build an education movement for social purpose
 - Inspiring students, teachers and members to become active citizens
5. To those ends, Citizenship and Civic Engagement are at the centre of what we do:
 - Underpinning our values as an organisation
 - Informing our course content
 - Influencing our style of education provision
 - Determining our structure and governance – how we behave as an employer and how we organise our provision through the involvement of staff, trustees and volunteers
 - Facilitating our partnerships and who we work with
 - Setting pathways for our students, volunteers and staff so that they become more active citizens beyond their involvement with the WEA

6. In order to illustrate and expand on this, we have arranged our submission around the questions in the Call For Evidence. We would be happy to expand on any of the points either through providing oral evidence to a session of the Committee or through further written submissions.

Answers to specific questions

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

The Committee's Terms of Reference take as a starting point a level of uncertainty – crisis even – in contemporary society, referencing terrorism, declining trust in politics and politicians, inequality and disenfranchisement.

As the question puts it, the implication is that we need to take stock – as individuals and as communities – to determine what citizenship and civic engagement mean.

As adult education providers we see ourselves as facilitators - helping our students to answer this question for themselves based on factual information, informed debate and rational argument. We do not have a prescriptive or simplistic approach but recognise that by providing a safe and supported environment in which our students can explore these questions in the company of others from their local community, they will begin to form their own complex response which may in turn lead to them becoming more active and engaged as well as more confident in their own sense of identity.

Some of our courses address issues of citizenship and identity directly. Even where the course content is not specifically about these issues, the community-based style of our provision and the values which all of our teaching adheres to, often leads our students to be more engaged in their communities simply through the process of developing critical thinking skills and being more confident in their interaction with others.

We conduct an annual survey of our students' views on what difference their course has made to them. They report that:

- They become more self-confident (77%)
- More able to cope with mental health (36%) or physical health (28%) conditions
- More understanding of other cultures (50%)
- More respectful to those different from themselves (44%)
- Feeling more of a sense of belonging to Britain (35%)
- More interested in making their local area a better place to live (40%)
- More interested in local or national affairs (31%)
- They took part in a campaigning activity (20%), contacted local or national authorities (15%) or joined a political party or trade union (4%)
- More likely to volunteer (19%)

These figures are for all WEA students, there are also variations which show that the benefits are even greater for certain groups of students. For example 88% of students studying English as another language reported that they had become more understanding of other cultures through their studies (considerably more than the 50% for all students combined).

We believe that it is essential that issues relating to citizenship and identity are explored and debated in a tolerant, informed and constructive way and that no simplistic conclusions are drawn but that individuals and communities are able to navigate their own way through the complexity. Adult education provision, of the type that WEA delivers, can equip people with the skills and knowledge required to achieve this.

2. Citizenship is partly about membership and belonging. Are there ways we could strengthen people's identity as citizens, whether they are citizens by birth or naturalisation? Could citizenship ceremonies or events throughout the educational process play a role? Should pride in being or becoming British be encouraged?

Participation in adult learning is one way by which people can interact with a range of people from different sections of their local community. Through this they may achieve a greater understanding of other cultures and an impetus to be more actively involved in the community at large. Adult education can tackle isolation and provide students with new language and communication skills. It also boosts confidence and self-worth.

Citizenship ceremonies and formal “events” within the education process can help to reinforce belonging for some participants but there may also be a role for less formal processes – including non-accredited learning of the sort that the WEA provides. Students on WEA courses often develop strong connections with their community though their course does not require them to sit exams, participate in formal ceremonies or even follow a course structure specifically about “citizenship”. This suggests that different routes to the same outcome – a greater sense of belonging – can work depending on the student’s needs and preferences. A narrow focus on citizenship ceremonies or similar “events” may not be best for all students.

3. Civic engagement can be seen as both a responsibility and a right of citizenship. Beyond the existing legal framework, should citizens have additional formal rights and responsibilities? How do you see the relationship between the two? Should they have the force of law individually or be presented as reciprocal duties between citizen and state? How should they be monitored and/or enforced?

Behind this question is an assumption that people know what their rights (and responsibilities) are as citizens, which may not always be the case. Adult education is not only a means by which people can gain this knowledge but, as our research has shown, it can also increase levels of participation in voting, volunteering and other forms of civic engagement.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

As with the previous answer, it is important that people have access to the knowledge and information they require in order to take full advantage of the rights already available to them. Adult education can be a means of developing the confidence and critical thinking skills to enable people to participate fully. Even a small step, such as getting involved in a local project through participation in community-based adult learning, can heighten awareness of the wider civic context and lead to more active participation such as voting, volunteering and, for some, becoming local representatives.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

As our answers so far have already shown, education has a huge role to play in encouraging good citizenship but the question is incomplete if it does not also recognise that adult education has a vital role to play. Adults who are beyond compulsory school age and outside the FE/HE system may still want support in engaging with the political process or the best means of being active and included within their communities. It is clear that compulsory and formal education is not alone sufficient to equip all adults with a full understanding of their rights as citizens or knowledge of how best to engage with politics at a national or community level.

Adult education gives people a second or third chance at any stage in their life to re-engage with learning and through this to be more active citizens. Adult education often encourages students who have not done well in formal education but who still have an interest in acquiring knowledge and skills, as well as adults who wish to refresh or update their skills and knowledge from previous study.

The style of teaching in adult education encourages listening, participation, equality and respect for others (and their views), in a safe environment. Students are enabled to explore complex and personal issues freely, including issues relating to citizenship and political participation. Developing critical thinking skills and confidence can be achieved through adult education courses on many different topics (not only topics directly related to politics or society) so it appears that the process and style of learning is key, not only the course content. This means that outcomes such as increased participation in volunteering or voting can be encouraged in many different learning environments.

The question focuses solely on statutory and formal learning (school to university) but many of those who come to adult education courses have few or no qualifications and have not always had positive experiences of education previously. Some of those who feel most disenfranchised and most isolated may also be those for whom informal learning as an adult could be an important first step towards being more engaged, as well as (potentially) a first step towards gaining formal qualifications later in life.

6. Do voluntary citizenship programmes such as the National Citizen Service do a good job of creating active citizens? Are they the right length? Should they be compulsory, and if so, when? Should they include a greater political element? Should they lead to a more public citizenship ceremony? Are they good value for money? What other routes exist for creating active citizens?

The WEA has no comment on the NCS as such but - as previous answers have shown - the flexibility and relative informality of adult education and the outcomes it achieves in terms of active citizenship suggests that it can be a powerful alternative or complement to other programmes such as the NCS.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

We can only answer from our own perspective but the evidence suggests that adult education contributes to higher levels of civic engagement so increased investment in adult education from central, regional and local government would make a difference. We hope to have shown that adult education provision can complement and enhance other forms of support for civic engagement so adult education should fit within a wider strategy for civic engagement.

As a voluntary sector organisation which encourages civic engagement through our ethos and values as well as through our volunteer and branch structure and in the content of many of our courses, we strive to make our own contribution to supporting civic engagement.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

As a charity, we have our own mission and vision which shapes all of our work. This includes “inspiring students, teachers and members to become active citizens”. It would be presumptuous to conclude that those values should be shared by everyone in Britain but it is notable that our 68,000 strong student population is very diverse with 74% women and 27% identifying as Black, Asian, Minority Ethnic or Refugee, suggesting that our values are sufficiently inclusive to encourage groups under-represented in other settings. Our impact surveys show that 50% of our students reported that they had more understanding of other cultures and 44% were more respectful to those different from themselves (percentages which increase for students who go on to take more than one course). This suggests that ongoing participation in adult education can help to consolidate understanding and tolerance amongst a diverse group of students.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

There is an increasing body of evidence and analysis looking at the links between educational attainment and opportunity and social inequality or social mobility. Others, such as the Social Mobility Commission, are better placed than us to provide the detail of why this is. On the second part of the question – how might barriers be overcome – we point to the contribution of adult education in offering opportunities, providing a second or third chance for people who have not fully benefited from formal education system and who may be feeling marginalised or isolated within their communities.

10. How do you see the relationship between citizenship and civic engagement on the one hand and social cohesion and integration on the other? What effect does the level of diversity in schools and workplaces have on integration in society as a whole? How can diversity and integration be increased concurrently?

Our student population is diverse in many ways and the range of provision reaches out to many different groups. In previous answers we have shown how greater understanding, tolerance and social interaction can be outcomes of taking part in adult education classes. Increasing the opportunity for adults to study and share experiences together is an effective way of encouraging integration in a diverse environment. That this also enables increased levels of volunteering, voting and other active manifestations of civic engagement suggests that where the right support is offered, it is possible to address issues of engagement and integration in the same setting.

11. How important are levels of English proficiency for first and second generation immigrants and what could be done to increase them, including through support for ESOL classes? Are there particular barriers faced by newcomers to Britain? Could the naturalisation process, including the citizenship test, be improved and if so, how?

ESOL is the biggest part of our provision and around a fifth of our students are non-native English language speakers. ESOL provision has been particularly badly hit by reductions in funding across the board in adult education in recent years and the urgency in rectifying this is acknowledged in several recent reports (including the APPG for Social Integration's recent report on integration and immigration).

Obviously our provision is entirely voluntary and we work with community partner organisations to make our language courses accessible and worthwhile, overcoming the barriers which could otherwise discourage students from attending our courses. Sharing good practice from within the adult education sector about what encourages students to take up courses and what the positive impacts are at an individual and community level could help to increase the levels of language proficiency in other settings (such as workplace learning, more formal education settings and other forms of community engagement).

12. Can you give examples of initiatives and role models that have helped promote a positive vision of British Citizenship within a tolerant and cohesive society?

There are many examples of adult learners whose lives have been transformed by the experience of taking part in adult education courses and often the biggest difference which students talk about is how they have become more active and connected within their communities. Tutors and students within the adult education sector often act as role models for each other, supporting development and community involvement in a tolerant and inclusive setting.

The following example illustrates all of these elements: peer support, accessibility and encouragement, feelings of isolation turning to confidence in being more active in the community, leading to volunteering and other examples of civic engagement.

Adult students come to learning for a variety of different reasons and their subsequent paths are equally varied. What they tend to have in common, however, is a recognition that adult education can provide the inspiration and confidence to be more active citizens.

WEA student case study – Lisa Birch

Lisa's learning journey started several years ago with the WEA in Oxford. A full-time mum since she was 16, Lisa had not even considered further education until she met WEA Development Worker Emma Carney one morning at her children's school.

"Emma asked if anyone was interested in doing a free Level 1 course which could help them get back into work. My self-esteem and confidence was pretty low so the course sounded like a great idea. A few of us signed up and went shopping for new folders and pens; we felt like kids going back to school, excited at the thought of re-entering the learning environment."

"I was quite nervous on the first day, but Emma did a great job of immediately making us feel welcome and comfortable. This was crucial, as it made the experience much less stressful. The course itself was really beneficial and informative; it enabled me to realise that I did have goals and a purpose in life other than being a mum, and that helping others was really important in whatever path I chose."

With an interest in social care, Lisa's first project focused on Home-Start – a charity whose volunteers support struggling families with a child under five. Impressed by the work of the charity, Lisa signed up as a volunteer and began supporting a family herself. "This again was vital experience for me. I thoroughly enjoyed the WEA course and was genuinely sad when it finished, as it had been such a positive experience."

Lisa progressed to a Level 2 Helping in Schools course: "I thought this may be something I would like to do career-wise, and the practical experience of a placement would also help boost my skills and confidence. I knew level 2 would possibly be more challenging, and although I did find some elements of it difficult, the WEA supported me through it. The constant praise and encouragement of my tutor and other WEA staff gave me the determination to get this qualification."

Hungry to learn more, Lisa started a Take Part course which encouraged participants to get involved with decision-making in their local community. Lisa and two other mums decided to set up a Parent-Teacher Association at Barton Primary School, and she eventually became a School Governor - a post which she has now held for 3 years. She and a friend went on to speak at the Take Part conference in London, as their community work was selected as an example of good practice for others. "This was a huge experience for me, and I felt very privileged to be asked to participate. Again, this WEA course was life-changing and empowering."

Lisa became a community champion with the Barton Learning Partnership, encouraging others to improve their skills through learning. "Being a mum was still my priority, but I did not want to stop learning! This led me to apply to Ruskin College to study a Social and Political Studies degree, which I completed this summer."

"My learning journey has been a fantastic experience; I have become empowered, gained confidence and above all developed a lifelong love of learning. The WEA has helped me tremendously and is a truly valuable organisation. Its ability to reach out to people who may not otherwise have the opportunity or motivation to return to education is unique. It has inspired me to follow my passion, to help others and gain the knowledge and experience to be able to do so."

Chris Butcher, Research & Policy Officer, The WEA

1599

Dr Rick Wylie, Samuel Lindow Academic Director, UCLan, Suzanne Wilson, Research Fellow in Social Exclusion and Community Development, UCLan – written evidence (CCE0157)

Young Adults Academy – written evidence (CCE0129)

This consultation response was produced with input from young attendees of the Young Adults Academy (YAA) and we are grateful for the opportunity to provide a response to these extremely important questions. YAA is a joint initiative between Model Westminster and the Young Adults Forum, two not-for-profit organisations working to develop the political empowerment of young people. See Appendix A for more details about these organisations and contact details.

The YAA is designed to be a fun, dynamic and thought provoking three-day event, run during University/School breaks, to provide young people with a free opportunity to gain the knowledge, skills and confidence to engage with and contribute to tackling the most challenging political and policy questions of our time.

As part of the recent YAA (9-11 August 2017) attendees were asked to deliberate in groups and draft responses to selected questions from the consultation. There were 15 attendees between the ages of 16-24 from a diverse background. The groups agreed to focus on questions 1, 4, 5, 7, 8 & 9 and the responses are focused on their implications for young people.

Questions & Responses

1. What does citizenship and civic engagement mean in the 21st century? Why does it matter, and how does it relate to questions of identity?

- 21st Citizenship matters as the story of UK history is one of the expansion and strengthening of the rights and responsibilities of citizens.
- Civic Engagement involves the ways and extent to which citizens can influence and make a difference to their communities.
- Young people are accustomed to exercising more influence, control and choice in their lives. They expect to be able to do so in the provision, quality and delivery of public services and public policy development. But there needs to be time and resources devoted to empowering them with the knowledge, skills and confidence for this.

Recommendation 1

1600

It is vital that that young people receive practical political education aimed at understanding both their rights and responsibilities and how these have strengthened over the centuries. Furthermore, they need practical education around the ways they can influence politics and public policy.

4. Do current laws encourage active political engagement? What are your views on changes to the franchise for national or local elections, including lowering the voting age? Should changes be made to the voting process or the voting registration process?

- Historically speaking, young people between 18 – 25 have the lowest turnout for elections and it's important to understand why turnout for this group is so low.
- Many young people have strong beliefs about equality and justice. They are political, yet many do not vote due to disillusionment, confusion and frustration over 'Westminster Politics'. They find alternative ways to express their political views through social media and other mechanisms.

Recommendation 2.

Developing political engagement should start at school, where young people should be encouraged to exercise their vote, and enabled to develop 'political skills' like debating, campaigning, negotiating, critical analysis and volunteering.

5. What should be the role of education in teaching and encouraging good citizenship? At what stages, from primary school through to university, should it be (a) available, and (b) compulsory? Should there be any exemptions? Should there be more emphasis on political participation, both inside and outside classes? How effective is current teaching? Do the curriculum and the qualifications that are currently offered need amending?

- Political education should begin at school and should be compulsory as part of Citizenship development. Political skills, like debating, campaigning, influencing and building relationships are key skills that young people should be encouraged to develop at school
- School should provide a safe space to discuss and debate political ideas.
- Young people should understand the rights and obligations that they have as UK Citizens

Recommendation 3.

The school curriculum should include space for young people to develop political knowledge, experience and skills. For example, running a student election or campaign or such. Developing political skills like campaigning, influencing, negotiation, debating are also key soft skills in any career.

7. How can society support civic engagement? What responsibility should central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual have for encouraging civic engagement? What can the Government and Parliament do to support civil society initiatives to increase civic engagement?

- Central government, devolved and local governments, third sector organisations and the individual all share responsibility to encourage civic engagement. It would be counterproductive if only National or local Government were to encourage civic engagement without 3rd sector organisations playing a key role.
- The key is not who provides the political education. It could be charities who come into schools to provide the service. However, it is vital that Government allocates space, time and funding within the education system to foster civic engagement. What is important is that there are many providers within the space who can deliver programmes around political knowledge, skills and engagement.
- Of huge importance is that grass roots organisations are supported as they often have significant local by in and reach.

Recommendation 4.

Local and national Government should allocates space, time and funding within the school education system to foster civic engagement. The provider need not be the school itself and could be a local charity or volunteer organisation that comes in to promote civic engagement.

8. What are the values that all of us who live in Britain should share and support? Can you identify any threats to these values, which affect the citizenship of, for instance, women or various minority groups? If so, how can their citizenship be strengthened?

- British values include a belief in Human Rights and their protection. Values also include freedom of speech and tolerance.
- While there are many countries that would sign up to similar values as the UK, it's about which values are prioritised in the UK.

Recommendation 5

Political Education for young people should include British Values; how they emerged and evolved in the UK. It should also emphasise why they are important, and when and why they are not absolute. For example, where the value of freedom of speech clashes with valuing the right to protection from hate speech and discrimination.

9. Why do so many communities and groups feel “left behind”? Are there any specific factors which act as barriers to active citizenship faced by different communities or groups - white, BME, young, old, rural, urban? How might these barriers be overcome?

- Communities feel left behind when they feel that their voices or their concerns do not matter to those who govern them.
- This is especially the case for young people who often feel frustrated with UK politics. They feel they can't make a difference, It's confusing, distant and boring.

Recommendation 6

Citizenship and political education at school should encourage and include ways to engage with politics and policy making. For example, submitting consultation responses. From the local and national Government side, efforts should be made visit schools to promote engagement in key political and policy making areas. There could be a real role for Select Committees here.

Appendix A

Model Westminster

Model Westminster is a non-partisan, non-profit educational enterprise, run and managed by volunteers, on a mission to improve the political empowerment of young people. We do this by running fun interactive educational events that bring together different experts to give talks on various political and policy making topics. The goal of these events is to empower young people with the knowledge, skills and confidence to understand and influence politics and policy making. Our fun and interactive events also provide an opportunity for young people to develop skills in critical thinking, debating, presentation and group work. Contact: Grant Fisher, Director of Model Westminster

Young Adults Forum

The Young Adults Forum aims to both challenge government on UK legislation, raise awareness on current issues, and inspire the next generation of politically minded individuals. We want to motivate and engage young adults, in the making of new laws and legislation. Contact: Richard Kays, Director of the Young Adults Forum

8 September 2017
